Soldier earns MVP honors in basketball

Player builds leadership through actions

Spc. Douglas DeMaio
Bayonet staff

"There is so much good in the worst of us, an so much bad in the best of us, that it behooves all of us not to talk about the rest of us."

— Robert Louis Stevenson

Worth is a quality within one that renders one deserving of respect. In many ways, people don't judge worth on the position of a leader, but rather by the actions of a leader.

Sgt. Felicia Griffin, 63rd Engineer Company, provides leadership through her actions both on the basketball court and with her unit.

"She's a great person," said 1st Sgt. John Johnson, Griffin's first sergeant. "She stays until the job is done.

"If I ask her to do something, I don't have to think twice about it getting done to quality standard."

Griffin offers support to her unit when the accomplishment of a mission must be met, and the unit returns their support to her when she needs to fulfill her goals.

"My unit supports me," Griffin said. "Some soldiers have even came to my games. That shows great leadership and interest in what I do."

She has played for the All Army Basketball Team, the Fort Benning Bandits, for the past three years and has worked hard to improve her game.

Griffin was the most valuable player of the Southeast Military Athletic Conference.

Standing 5 feet 6 inches, Griffin averaged around 30 points a game. Her unselfishness and ability to work with others has contributed to the success of those around her.

The Bandits won the conference title at Eglin Air Force Base in Florida March 23.

"I really didn't look at the stats too much," Griffin said. "As long as we won, stats didn't really matter to me.

"Five of us have been playing together for a few years, which adds to our consistency. We work well together. I think we are a good team, and we were in better shape than most of the other teams."

Her athleticism and work ethic improved her Army Physical Fitness Test to a 278, and her leadership qualities are set by her examples and not just by her words, Johnson said.

"She lives up to the NCO Creed," Johnson said. "She's technically competent and has a good heart toward soldiers."

Griffin is filling a staff sergeant slot for her unit and is training three soldiers after recently completing the Primary Leadership Development Course.

"She earned a 99.17 percent while attending PLDC and made the commandant's list," Johnson said. "She is dynamic, well rounded and a great asset to this company."

The worth of Griffin is an attribute that rubs off on the soldiers around her, he said. Her actions and qualities are a result of her leadership and the leadership she has been provided throughout her life. In turn, she is passing on her leadership to others and is self-replicating her worth in others for them to pass along.

Steel gets by Eagles

Eagles lose last game before deploying

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

The Steel used their man-to-man defense to beat the Eagles, 51-43, in intramural basketball action March 7 at Kefurt Gym.

A Company, 1st Battalion, 10th Infantry Regiment, Steel held a slim lead throughout the game and held on against the Eagles of the 203rd Forward Support Battalion.

"We had to stick to our game," said Clifford Bennett, Steel guard. "We had to keep making our shots."

The game went back and forth in the first half. At halftime, with the score 25-24 in favor of the Steel, both teams seemed confident in their abilities to win the game.

In the second half, Jewel Brock, Steel guard, came out with five straight points.

"They were doubling Clifford, so I had to create something," Brock said.

The Eagles answered with four quick, points from Marcus Thomas, Eagles' forward.

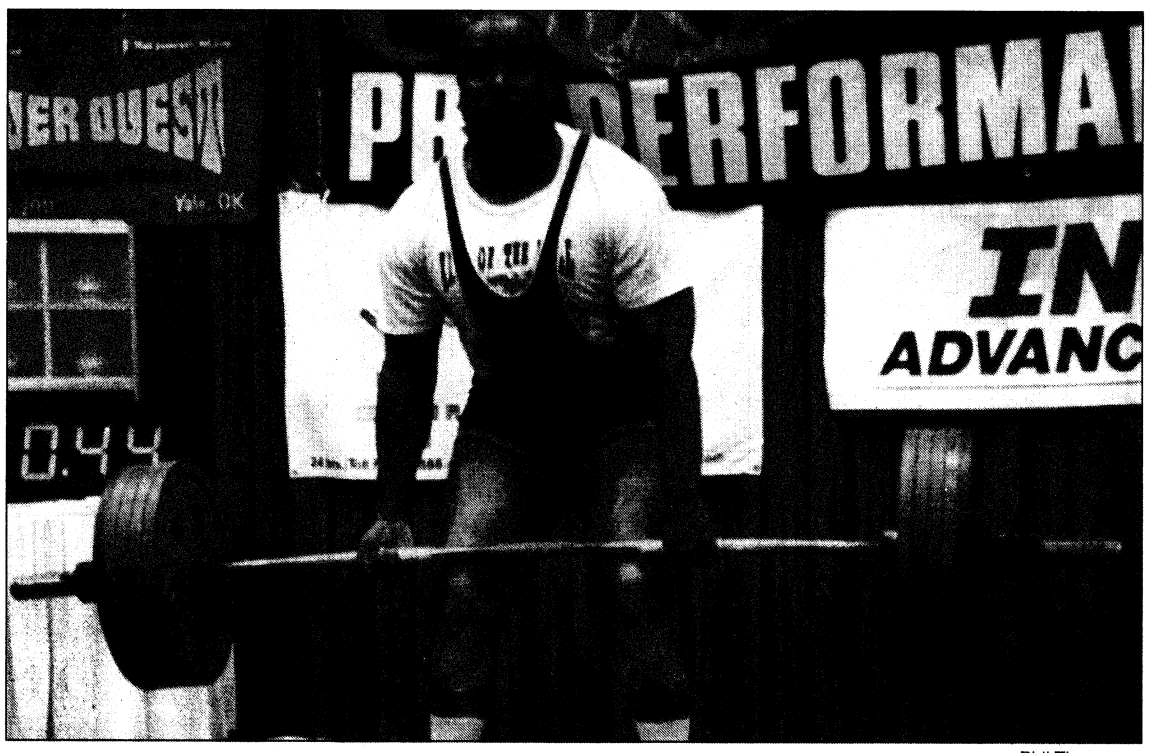
"When I pulled it, all I could feel was pain," Jenkins said. "However, I knew I couldn't give up on my team, so I had to just keep playing for the sake of the team."

The Eagles battalion deployed for Kuwait this week.

"It was our last game together, so it was all or nothing," Jenkins said.

Jenkins put the pain behind him and managed to stay an inside presence on defense for the Eagles.

Thomas led the Eagles with 13 points followed by Jonathan Adams, Eagles forward, with 12 points.



Their production in the end didn't help the Eagles to a win.

Bennett led the Steel with 17 points and Brock added 11 points.

"I just got real comfortable shooting the ball," Bennett said. "I was just glad my shots were falling."

Change won't effect tourney upsets

Spc. Douglas DeMaio
Bayonet staff

commentary

The change the National Collegiate Athletic Association is making to the men's Division I basketball tournament really isn't all too bad.

Yes, I haven't seen the tournament play out yet, but I feel positioning teams to a location convenient to their region won't have a large affect on upsets.

So then what will be the upsets of the tournament?

I have to believe there will be a 14 seed upsetting a three seed. It has happened for the past five years and my pick is Murray State over the Georgia Bulldogs. The Bulldogs have lost four of their last seven games and are definitely in trouble.

The other upset I see is University of California-Los Angles beating the University of Cincinnati in the second round.

Cincinnati will have an advantage being so close to its campus, but I don't see that effecting the outcome. The better team will win from the better conference, and the Pacific-10 is without a doubt the best conference in college basketball.

The Pac-10 has six teams in the big dance this year, and I see three of them advancing to the Elite Eight.

Wildcat Luke Walton from the University of Arizona has the all-around package.

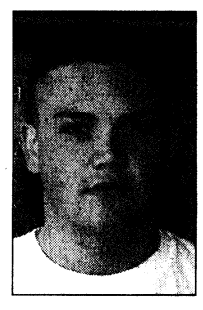
Arizona is young, but with the leadership of point guard Jason Gardner and the Pac-10 Freshman of the Year, Salim Stoudamire, the Wildcats have the potential to be in the finals once again this year.

The University of Southern California senior forward, Sam Clancy, has the ability to lead the athletic Trojans past Duke University to improve on their Elite Eight appearance from last year.

Clancy reminds me of Larry Johnson. He has the ability to score from the outside and is a dominate force on the inside.

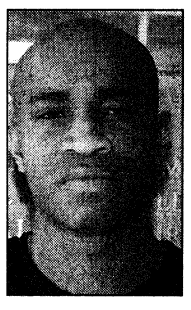
His power and jumping ability make him a serious threat to any opponent.

Duke is talented, and Jason Williams is no joke, but that will not intimidate the pressuring defense of USC.



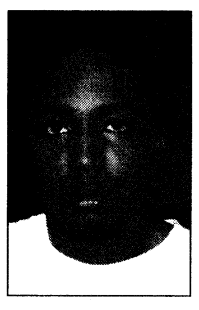
On the other side of the bracket, Juan Dixon of the University of Maryland is the fire and ice of his team, and his play will determine how far the Terrapins go in the tournament. Maryland has done poorly on the boards, but they have a deep bench that will help them make it to the Final Four where I believe they will lose to a prolific scoring team in the University of Kansas.

The Jayhawks start three guards and two forwards. There bench is not as deep as the Terrapins, but they average 93 points a game and win by a margin of 17.

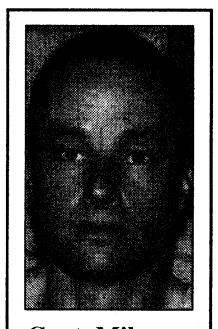


Jayhawks player of the year candidate, Drew Gooden, could very well be the best player in the tournament and will definitely average 20 plus throughout the tournament.

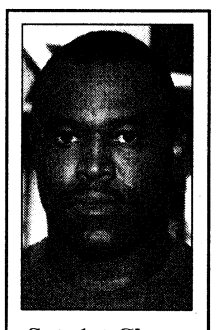
The way I see it Kansas will play the Wildcats in the finals and Roy Williams will coach the Jayhawks to his first NCAA title.



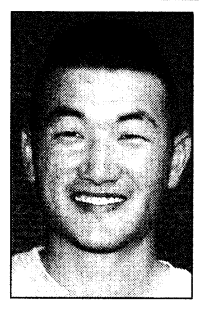
Who do you think will win the men's College Basketball Championship?



Pfc. Thomas Richter, 1st Battalion, 29th Infantry Regiment — "Oregon. They're doing pretty well this year. Plus, that's where I'm from, and I'm supporting my home team."

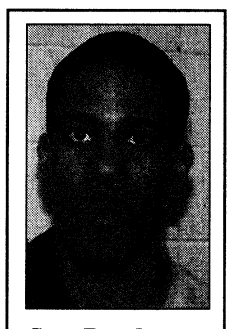


Sgt. Reginald Johnson, 1st Bn., 11th Inf. Regt. — "Maryland. That's where I'm from. Plus, Juan Dixon is unstoppable and the best player in the country."

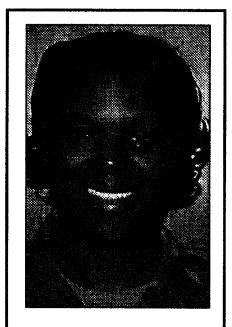


Marine Sgt. Anthony Jenkins, 773rd Helicopter Attack Squadron, Marietta, Ga. — "Duke. They have the best player in the country in Jason Williams, and their team has the most experience in championship situations."

Capt. Mike Cortez, 4th Brigade, 78th Division — "Duke. Experience and their program. They know how to win."



Sgt. 1st Class Douglas Johnson, 3rd Bn., 47th Inf. Regt. — "Maryland. They're hungry. Juan Dixon shut down Jason Williams last time they played. They've been playing good ball all year.



1st Lt. Min Choi, 2nd Bn.., 11th Inf. Regt. — "Kentucky. I just like the team. Plus, Chaplain (Maj.) Ken Yates said they're going to win."

Hester Smith, family member — "Cincinnati. They are the best team. Their defense is outstanding, and that's what wins championships."

Spc. Randy Chambers, U.S. Army Medical Department Activity — "Duke. As long as Mike Dunleavy and Jason Williams are running the offense, they'll be fine. They have too much quickness. Their defense causes turnovers, which will be the key."

Staff Sgt. Sháron Elder — "Kansas. They have a good inside-outside game. Their big men are the best in the nation. They have an excellent coach and a balanced team that can win the championship."

Cell phone policy rescinded

Mobile phone use while driving still under review

Pfc. Brian Trapp
Bayonet staff

The cell phone safety policy memorandum released March 13 was rescinded March 15.

"The policy is still under review and has not completed," said Lt. Col. E.J. Herold, deputy chief of staff. "It is still under consideration, and the review will continue for an indeterminate amount of time.

The rescinded policy stated Fort Benning personnel were prohibited from using cell phones while driving a government vehicle on and off the installation and while driving a personally owned vehicle on the installation.

No action, administrative or punitive, will be taken until the review is complete and reissued, Herold said.

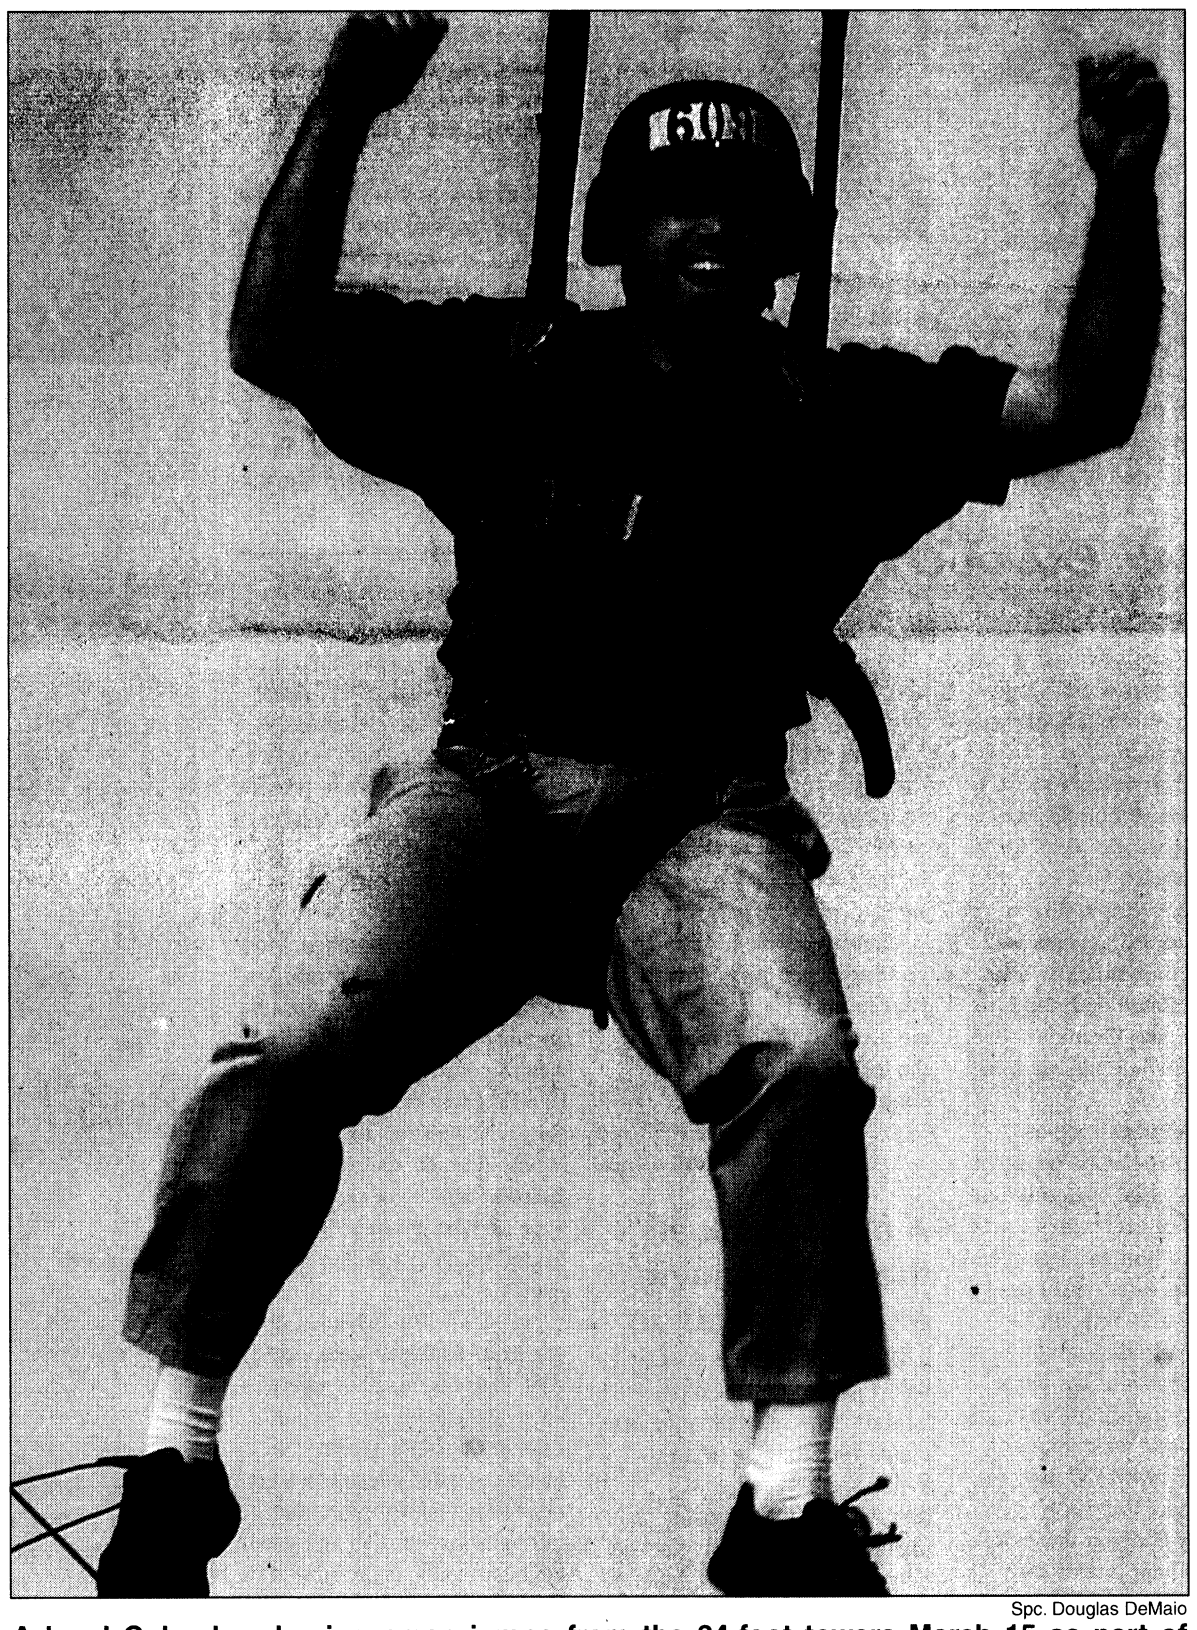
The National Highway Traffic Safety Administration determined in a 1997 report, An Investigation of the Safety Implications of Wireless Communications in Vehicles, that available evidence supported the conclusion that cell phone use while driving does increase the risk of a crash.

More than 300 cities and countries have considered laws to ban the use of cellular telephones while driving, according to the report. Four states and several foreign countries, including Japan, Israel, Sweden and Australia, have actually passed laws.

There are more than 80 million cell phone users in the U.S., according to the report, and it's unlikely cell phone use in cars will decrease anytime soon, so here are some safety tips:

• Try to avoid making calls when driving. Just as it's unsafe to look at a map or read directions, it's unsafe to focus on a cell phone.

• Use hands free units so both hands can remain on the steering wheel.



• Place calls when the vehicle isn't moving or time calls to coincide with red lights.

A 1999 report by the Center for Urban Transportation Research at the University of South Florida found existing studies to show the chances of having an accident while driving and talking on a mobile phone increased anywhere from 34 to more than 300 percent.

Also, it was reported in a 1998 study that drivers who were reported using a phone at the time of collision had a nine-fold risk of a fatality over those without using a phone.

The NHTSA study also determined phone conversations rather than dialing was most frequently reported as a crash factor, and the majority of cell phone users were in the striking vehicle.

TIM takes next step

Transformation to streamline headquarters

Laura Martinson
Special to the Bayonet©

Army Secretary Thomas White announced the next step in his plan to create a more efficient corporate management structure for Army installations to a conference of garrison commanders in Nashville Tuesday.

His plan, known as Transformation of Installation Management, will implement seven regions to oversee installation management worldwide. TIM comes after a September 2001 pledge to execute better business practices.

"Our intent is to streamline headquarters, create more agile and responsive staffs, reduce layers of review and approval, and allow commanders to focus on their mission," White said.

Fort McPerson in Atlanta will host the director and staff of the southeast region, which includes Fort Benning. TIM is expected to improve the delivery of resources and services to commanders, soldiers and their families.

Under the program, which is expected to be implemented by Oct. 1, the garrison commander will have more authority over funds and resources at his installation. Post officials believe this will mean an improvement in quality of life

RTB inducts honorary colonel March 15

Honorary colonel shares his knowledge

Pfc. Brian Trapp
Bayonet staff

The Ranger Training Brigade inducted an old, "ugly" ranger as its first honorary colonel at the Rangers in Action demonstration March 15 at Hurley Hill.

"I'm just having fun here, and coming back to see all these ugly rangers graduate recharges your batteries," said retired Col. Robert "Tex" Turner, honorary RTB colonel and the guest speaker for the class graduation.

Turner

"He was always known for calling everyone an ugly ranger, but it's a positive thing," said retired Sgt. Maj. Robert Spencer, honorary RTB sergeant major. "He always says there is someone more ugly than him out there," Spencer worked with Turner when he was the director of the Ranger Department.

Turner will provide the link between the rangers of yesterday and the rangers of tomorrow, said Col. Hazen Baron, RTB commander. It is important to perpetuate the history of the rangers.

"He was a straight forward commander," Spencer said.

However, the idiosyncrasies he had were unforgettable.

"He used to always have a cigar in his mouth, but he never lit it, he didn't even smoke," Spencer said. "He claimed he jumped (out of airplanes) with it and wouldn't lose it on the way down, but we always suspected he carried extras."

Turner now resides in Williamsburg, Va., but still does some traveling to do public speaking.

"I like to speak," Turner said. "I don't charge for my time — I do it all for fun. I even speak at West Point sometimes. I try to keep my fingers in the Army stuff."

When Turner isn't out speaking, he spends his time working on his home and his hobbies.

WOMEN'S HISTORY MONTH

Her story being told

Elsie Jackson
USAIC Public Affairs Office

I once spent a few hours of my misspent youth in the company of a true feminazi. I'm as "equal rights for all" as they come, but by the end of the audience with MS. Smith (and this was back when "Ms." wasn't a legal abbreviation yet) I could not use my name in the same sentence with "feminist."

I remember it all very clearly so it couldn't possibly have been more than a two or three or 10 ... give or take a few ... or more ... years ago.

But I digress. I was on MS. Smith's side until she started rambling on about how appropriate it was we call it history because the books always tell HIS story and never HER story. Never mind word origins, I think she really believed there was a plot to only tell HIStory.

At first, I chalked it up to her people standing in the shallow end of the gene pool when the "able to see both sides of an issue" chromosome was handed out.

Then I started really looking at my history books. By golly, a lot of it WAS HIStory.

commentary

Based on what I've seen my third-grader bring home, things are different now. I ran a quick search on "women's history" and turned up lots of chapters of what MS. Smith would have called "HERstory."

How well can you do on this HERstory pop quiz?

1. Writer, activist for Native Americans
2. America's most experienced astronaut, proved that the Right Stuff does not reside in the Y chromosome
3. First woman to receive a medical degree in the U.S., founded the first women's medical college
4. First woman to serve in Congress, at a time when most women could not vote
5. Immigrant, Peace Corps volunteer, headed Peace Corps and United Way of America, current Secretary of Labor
6. First African-American elected to the Texas Senate since Reconstruction, dynamic orator
7. Discovered the first pulsar
8. First woman to swim the English Channel, broke the time record by one hour, fifty nine minutes
9. Credited as the co-discoverer of HIV, the virus that causes AIDS

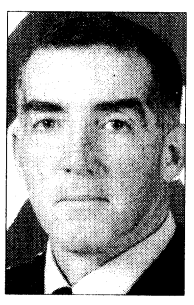
Holy season should be time of rededication

March 31 begins the great high point in the Judeo-Christian year.



Jews observe Passover, which commemorates the central event of the Old Covenant, the deliverance from bondage in Egypt March 28.

Easter is for Christians the most sacred, glorious and spiritually meaningful day of the year.

The trauma of Jesus' crucifixion on Good Friday is erased by the message of the angel at the empty tomb "He is not here. He is risen!" In the resurrection, a new supreme deliverance, the redemption from sin and death, is celebrated as the central event of the New Covenant.

We are a diverse people, joined from many faith backgrounds and spiritual walks in an Army of One. We are members of a great nation joined in a vocation that preserves, protects and defends each citizen's right to the exercise of religion and the values that a free people hold so dear.

We are appalled as we stand eyewitnesses to destruction and death.

We are seeking deliverance but feel blocked off by the barriers raised by hatred and violence. May this holy season be for each of us a time of rededication to the spiritual values that we honor as a nation.

I extend to you my wish that the message of this holy season deliver you from all fear of the future, enlighten you in the grace to enjoy what now is, and empower you to strive for what ought to be.

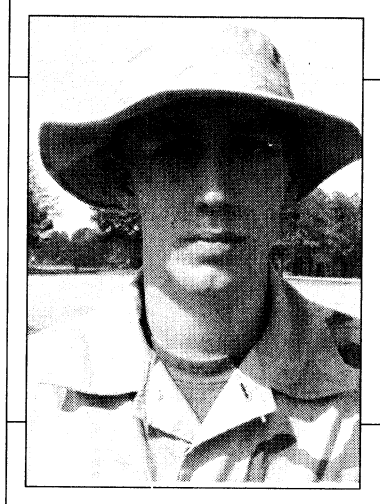
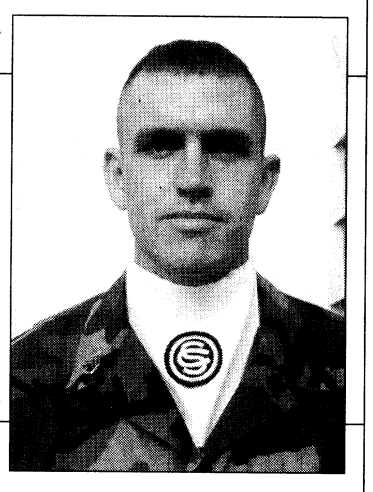
What type of sacrifices do women make for career progression?

Linda Turner, family member — "I feel working women often have to give up extra time with their children along with personal time for themselves. Army wives often sacrifice career advancement to move with their families. Sometimes that means beginning a new job at the bottom rung."



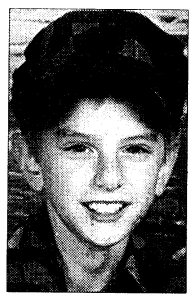
Col. Patty Graves, U.S. Army Medical Department Activity — "I believe women make many sacrifices for career progression. In an attempt to maintain balance between family life and career, they ultimately sacrifice their personal nurturing time."



Staff Sgt. Clayton Hooks, 3rd Personnel Command, Jackson, Miss. — "Women have to sacrifice being with their family as much as they would want or even not having a family. But they shouldn't have to."

Linda Lee, family member — "They may choose not to have kids. And Army wives have to start over with each move."

Pvt. Joshua Poindexter, 2nd Battalion, 69th Armor Regiment — "I don't see why a woman would make any more sacrifices for a career than a man would."



Senior Officer Candidate Jason Neumann, 3rd Battalion, 11th Infantry Regiment — "Family. Spending time with their family is what women sacrifice for career progression."

11-year-old ready to enlist

My name is Jason Brock, reporting for duty. I love the Army — I would do anything to get in the Army. If I was 18, I would enlist, but I'm only 11.

At first I wanted to be an MP. I want to be in the Army because my uncle was in Vietnam — he got ambushed and was killed. My other uncle was in the Air Force. My granddaddy was in World War II. My papa was in the Army. My dad was almost a Marine.

I'm thinking of painting my room camouflage. For Christmas, I got an Army tent and clothes.

Over and Out,

Reader offers pet tips to residents

Since my son is stationed at Fort Benning, I have been reading The Bayonet. I find the Bayonet to be very informational and well-written.

I belong to the American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. The article about the malnourished dogs found in a room in a house is a common problem.

Though I'm not an expert, I thought perhaps I could pass along some helpful ideas for your community.

Sometimes people do not understand dogs and cats are long term commitments. Pets should be treated with the love and care we reserve for vulnerable individuals such as children.

In communities such as yours, pet owners can organize so they can assist each other in taking care of each other's pets. I've had children and teens feed and walk my dogs, and I have done likewise to reciprocate.

Currently, I take care of a cat for eight months of the year. His owner supplies me with expensive food for my cats while she is away and pays me a minimal fee. It is very rewarding when you think of what could happen to a cat without any care.

The ASPCA has done studies and has proven where battered people have lived, the animals are more likely to be battered or neglected.

Violent spouses frequently use the pets to hold hostage the human family victims.

Animal cruelty is now recognized as a sign by authorities of the other serious problems within a family.

Animal obedience programs give pets appropriate behavior for family life.

If you ever wonder whether owning a pet is a worthwhile endeavor just go to the many animal shelter sites on the Internet and read the various stories about the pets.

They are always happy to see you and never notice any of your faults. The saddest ones are always the ones mourning the loss of their human companions.

A closer look at the Fort Benning animal regulation:

It seems as though some have taken "the widest possible latitude" clause in the post pet regulations to the extreme. While there's a brief description in the housing packet as to how many pets are allowed and where they should be kept, there are some additional details in the regulations that should be common sense, but may not be common knowledge. So let's refresh all of those unfamiliar with the standards.

No person on Fort Benning shall by an intentional act or disregard cause physical pain, fright, suffering or death to any animal. Violations include, but are not limited to:

- Failure to provide adequate living space and appropriate shelter from the elements.
- Failure to provide food on a daily basis or failure to provide access to clean water at all times.
- Abandoning any animal on the reservation.
- Owners of animals on post are responsible for preventing their animals from becoming public nuisances or public health concerns.
- Pets will be kept indoors, secured outdoors, or enclosed within a fence. Outdoor housing will be of the portable type and not a storage shed issued as part of the housing unit.
- Feces will be cleaned up at least one time per week per dog. Daily removal of pets' excrement from areas other than the owner's quarters is also the owner's responsibility.
- Ownership of more than two pets, except fish and small caged animals, is prohibited in family housing areas.
- Breeding or raising pets on post as a commercial endeavor is prohibited.

Failure to adhere to these rules may result in exclusion of the animal from post, loss of pet ownership privileges, termination of post quarters, and criminal punishment.

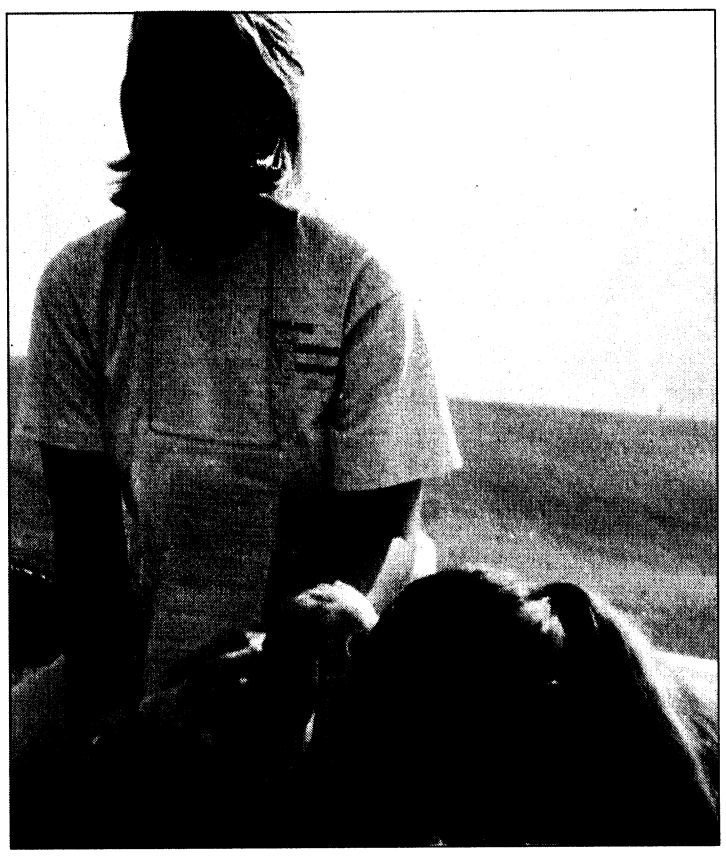
Community tests agency readiness

"The functions of the Office shall be to coordinate the executive branch's efforts to detect, prepare for, prevent, protect against, respond to, and recover from terrorist attacks within the United States."
Executive Order Establishing the Office of Homeland Security and Homeland Security Council, Sec. 3. Functions.

Sgt. Daniel Monroy
WHINSEC Public Affairs

How a community responds to terrorists, or any type of mass casualty, was tested Tuesday at the Columbus Metro Airport.



The exercise, which involved the city's fire department, police department, the Red Cross, the EMS, local hospitals — including Martin Army Community Hospital — was part of an ongoing program to test the efficiency of local agencies in response to a terrorist attacks with mass casualties.

"Since September 11, testing for weapons of mass destruction and responding to terrorist attacks has been at the forefront," said Police Fire Rescue Sgt. Norman Halloway, during a VX nerve gas attack simulation.

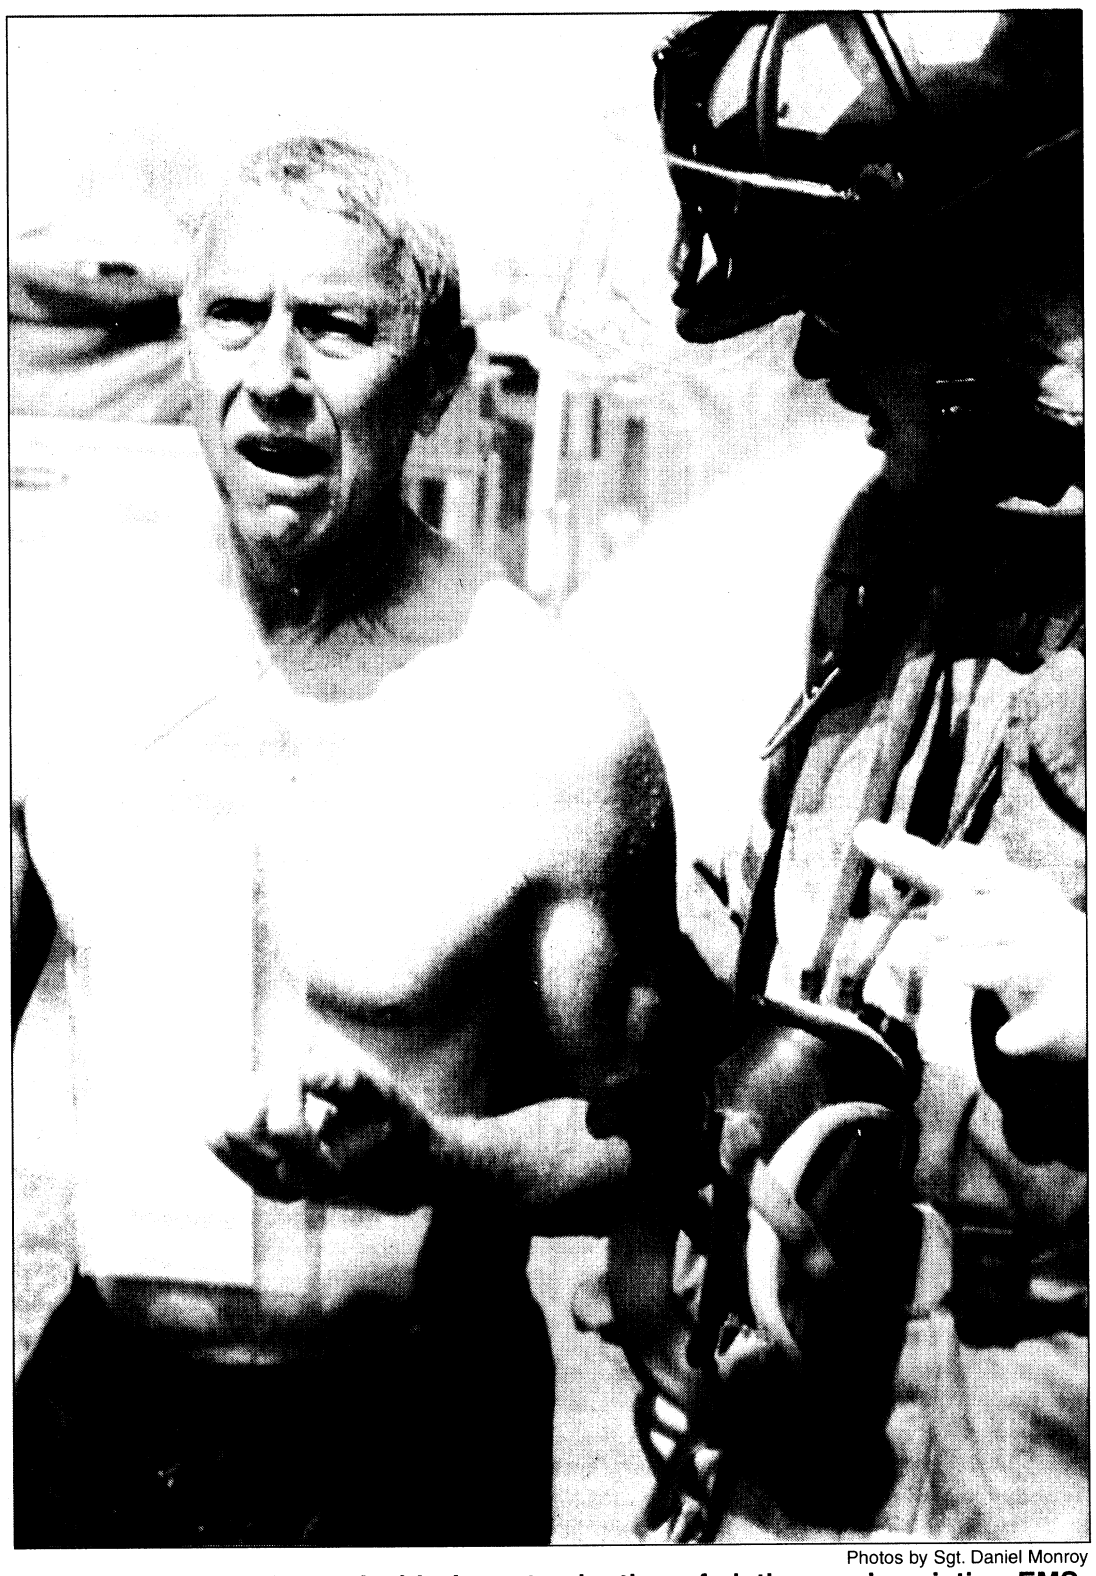
The Domestic Preparedness Program, a program that began in 1997 and will run through 2004, is charged with testing 120 of the largest cities in the United States on responding to airport disasters and has recently placed a large emphasis on preparing communities for devices terrorist might use, said Bud Marshall, DPP manager for the exercise.

International student-observers from the Western Hemisphere Institute for Security Cooperation were also on hand to watch emergency management systems at work in the U.S.

"I was impressed by the seriousness that all parties involved maintained throughout the exercise; this is what determines the success of the training, how serious and realistic you make it," said Capt. Irma Carpio an Ecuadorian student attending the Information Operations Course.

Volunteers act out pyrotechnic smoke inhalation.

Due to the magnitude of casualties and contamination such an attack would bring, response systems must consider all resources in the communtiy, Marshall said.



"Fort Benning would be very important with its medical support, fire department, policing systems and hazardous materiel team," Marshall said.

For the exercise, local volunteers from Columbus, Fort Benning and Phenix City were cast as casualties, triaged, and transported to local hospitals like St. Francis and Martin Army.

"We practiced all of last week for this exercise and set up a protocol for decontaminating victims," said Capt. Shawn Bowman, Environmental Science officer at Martin Army.

Bowman and his team set up a decontamination station near the emergency entrance and decontaminated patients before they entered the hospital.

"With something like this (a chemical contamination) patients could not enter the hospital for treatment unless they were stabilized and decontaminated for the safety of everyone else," Bowman said.

Uchee Creek holds pre-rally

RV owners visit before National rally in Perry, Ga.

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

Pfc. Chris Stephens

More than 150 RVs stayed at the new Uchee Creek Campground Rally site. The RVs were parked here while their owners enjoyed the sites around the Columbus area. These RVs cost anywhere between $200,000 and $1 million.

Country Coach Incorporated held its annual pre-National Motorcoach Rally at the Uchee Creek Campground Rally site March 14 through Saturday.

The pre-rally was held to get ready for the National Rally held in Perry, Ga., March 18 through today.

"We had about 150 country coach owners come out this weekend," said Gary J. Dweyer, vice-president of service for Country Coach Inc. "We do this for them, so they can get ready for the National Rally."

The rallies have been held for more than 20 years. It was the first time they had been on Fort Benning.

"Fort Benning has just built the rally site, and this was the first event held there," said Brian Smith, marketing director for Directorate of Community Activities. "It was really successful, and I look for future events to happen here."

The RV owners said they had a good time.

"Fort Benning is a great place to be," Dweyer said. "The people here are very friendly and are always willing to help."

While at the pre-rally, Country Coach Inc. provided complimentary services like checking engines and cleaning and washing RVs.

"The owners take the best care of their RVs," Dweyer said. "It's just like home."

The RVs have living quarters, bathrooms, full bedrooms, different power sources, kitchens, satellite dishes and roof air conditioning. The RVs cost anywhere between $200,000 to $1 million.

"Most of the owners of the RVs are retired or are about ready to retire," Dweyer said. "They saved up most of their lives for these, and now they are enjoying the rewards of their hard work."

While on Fort Benning, the owners of the RVs went on a tour of Callaway Gardens.

"It gave them a great chance to see the area and have some fun," Dweyer said

The new rally site is not the only thing that is new or upcoming at Uchee Creek.

Other attractions the RV owners enjoyed were Uchee Creek's nature trails, camping areas and a new 17-lot campsite for people with tents to use.

There is also an activities building by the rally site for use at various functions.

Uchee Creek is conforming to today's needs. Look for great things in the future Smith said.

and infrastructure where soldiers work and their families live.

"Years of underfunding our installations have taken a toll," White told the garrison commanders. "We have first-class soldiers living and working in third-class facilities. This is unacceptable."

The transformation of installation management allows mission commanders to focus training and resources on readiness, hence allowing installations to adapt rapidly to the changing needs of the force.

Although there has been some concern about upheaval in the installations' civilian workforce, the plan is meant to minimize civilian and military personnel turbulence during the transition to TIM.

"The stability of the workforce is a top priority of the TIM implementation task force and the leadership," White said. "We expect little, if any, changes in manpower at the installation level. Any initial geographical moves will most likely be voluntary."

The transition of military positions at the installation level is expected to be transparent.

The ultimate goal is to establish a structure that enables installations to provide a wider range of services and support, he said.

Colonel: Shares wisdom

"I can fix anything, and I like to listen to old hi-fi records," Turner said.

"Photography is also a hobby of mine, and now that I'm retired, I finally have time to devote to it." Turner said. "I have a huge darkroom in my basement, and I've had dark rooms all over the world. I've taken a lot of photos, and I have about a million slides at home."

He served two tours with the Ranger Department, now the RTB, as an instructor and chief of the Patrolling Committee from 1966 to 1968 and as the department director from 1982 to 1985.

Prior to joining the RTB, the colonel saw his share of combat. He served two tours in Vietnam with the 101st Airborne Division,Vietnam and the Military Advisory Command.

"I was at West Point for four years and spent 36 years in the Army and have had fun, but it's time to kick back and relax," Turner said.

Still, he will break free when he is needed to perform his new mission.

"I will do my best to do my duty as an honorary colonel, and I appreciate this to a great degree," Turner said.

Corporate day recognizes soldiers, group soars 34 ft. high

Spc. Douglas DeMaio
Bayonet staff

The commanding general and his staff greeted Rep. Mac Collins and members of the tricity community area for a Corporate Recognition Day March 15.

Maj. Gen. Paul Eaton and his staff briefed them on the threat of terrorism in the local community.

"It was interesting to get a new briefing on terrorism," said Richard Fowler, employee of W.C. Bradley. "You see it on T.V. and what's going on in Afghanistan. This allowed us to see what's going on in Georgia as compared to say Soviet Georgia."

The group also learned a little bit about some of the supporting units on post.

"The visit is a window on Fort Benning," said Lt. Col E.J. Herold, deputy chief of staff. "It gives them a better understanding of the military, who we are and the training that happens on Fort Benning."

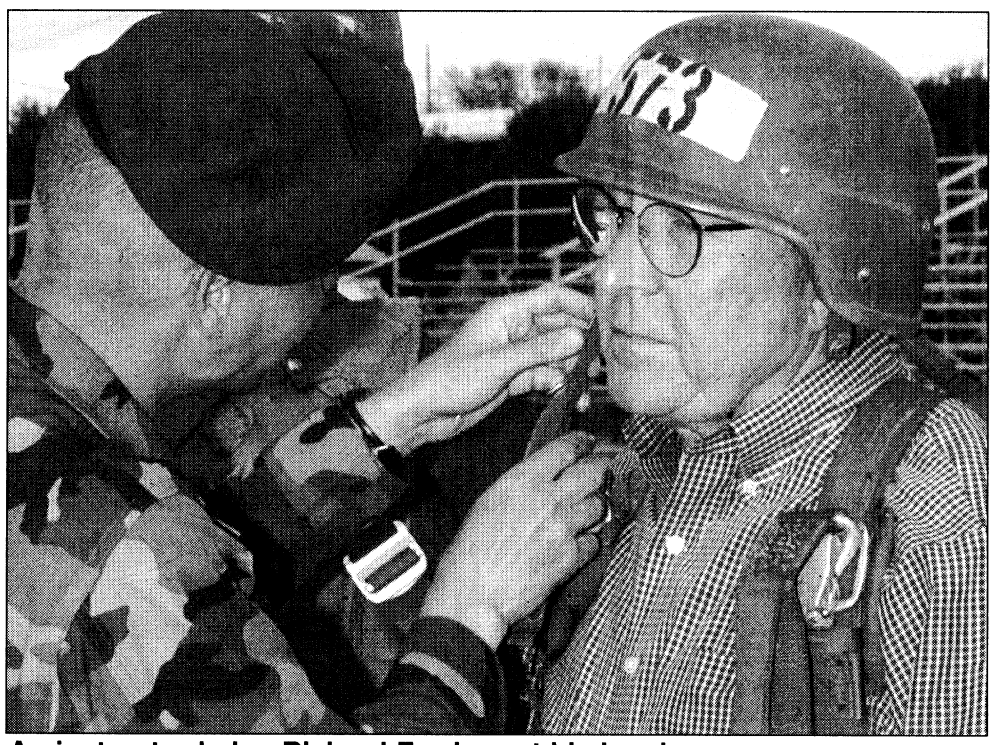
After the briefings, the group was transported to Eubanks Field. There they received a briefing about airborne training and were given the opportunity to jump from the 34-foot towers.

"I had a great time," Fowler said. "I felt comfortable with the airborne instructors. I wouldn't have jumped had I felt they weren't highly trained."

The "sergeant airbornes" are competent, well-trained and good soldiers who are responsible for soldiers lives on a daily basis, Fowler said.

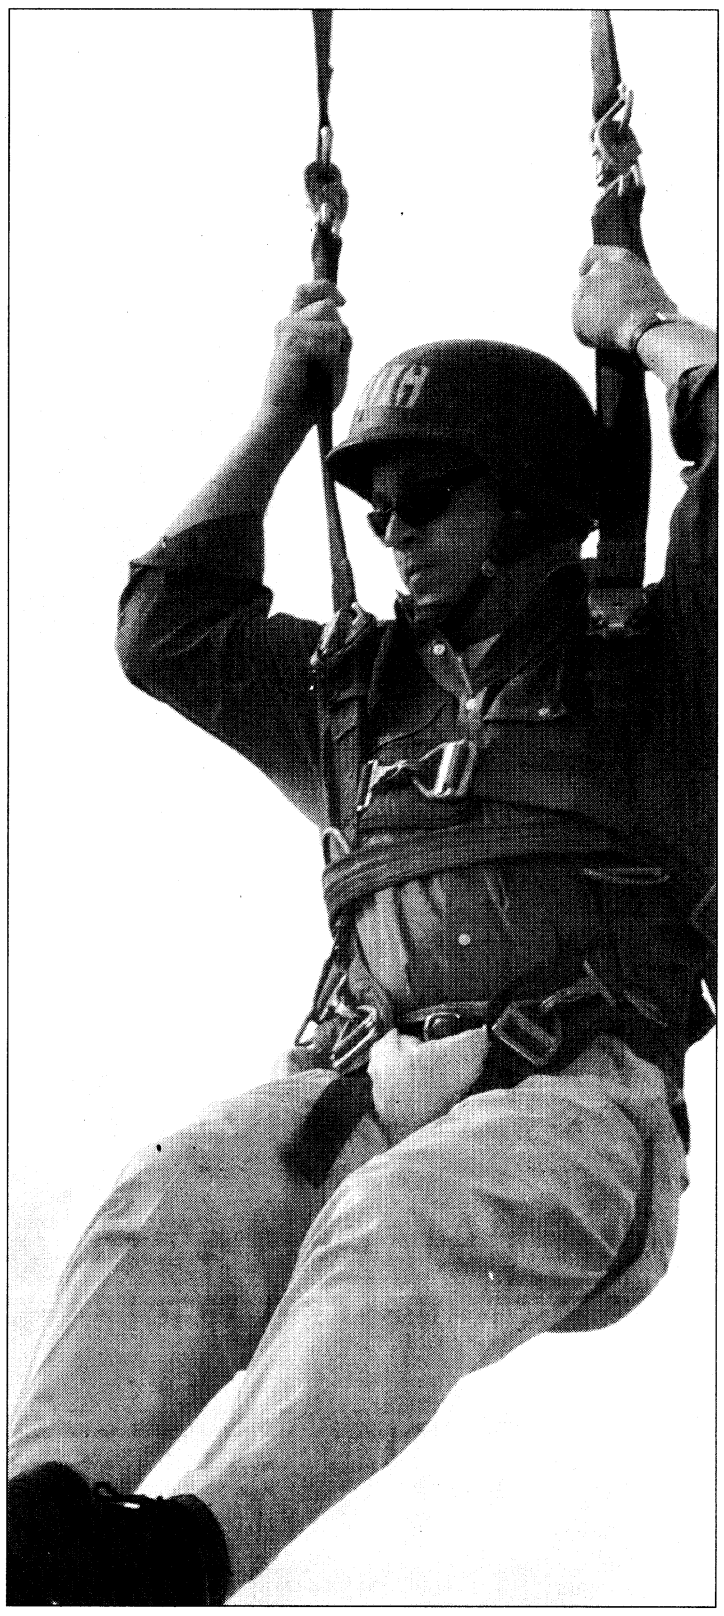
"This can enlighten them about how high-stress our jobs are," said Sgt. 1st Class Thomas Hackney, airborne instructor, who won the Post NCO of the Year. "(Corporate Recognition Day) gives the civilian population a chance to see what we do. It gives them a chance to experience what their son or daughter may have experienced.

"It really is a good thing for both the community and the military," Hackney said. "It's great to have soldiers recognized. It gives them a new respect for how hard soldiers work. We should have more opportunities like this one."



Following the jump experience, the group went to mix and mingle at the Officer's Club. The event was sponsored by the Chattahoochee Valley and Fort Benning Association of the U.S. Army.

"I think it's important to get people out here who are not normally involved with what is going on," Fowler said. "It's good to mix them all together in one room. The AUSA mixer is a bridge between the Army and civilian sector. I see the interaction taking place."



The goal was achieved by the staff and the group to bring people together, Fowler said.

29th Infantry Regiment soldier gets Top Gun Award

Combat veteran develops firearm techniques

Christina Hayashi
Special to the Bayonet©

A soldier with 2nd Battalion, 29th Infantry Regiment, won the first Top Gun Award given by ATK Alliant Techsystems, the largest ammunition producing company in the world, March 14.

The award recognizes soldiers for their work in their field and Staff Sgt. Richard Burger received the award.

Burger

Burger travels the world to teach solders how to better use their weapons.

His job was to improve marksmanship by teaching soldiers better aiming and firing techniques.

He also advised his chain of command on choosing guns and ammunition.

"It's good that infantrymen are recognized for their contributions," Burger said.

Burger received the award because of all of his work with developing techniques with firearms. His techniques are used throughout the Army and are in manuals.

"He has helped developed most of the techniques used today," said Capt. Mark Trott, Company commander for 2nd Bn., 29th Inf.

"He's a very hard worker and dependable. He is always looking for ways to shoot better and develop new techniques."

"He brings a lot of experience to the job," said Staff Sgt. Richard Dukes, 2nd Bn., 29th Inf. Regt. "Since he is a combat veteran, (Somalia with the 10th Mountain Division) he can focus on the standards."

The award was supposed to be given in October, but plans were canceled after Sept. 11.

Lunch-in celebrates women's history

Post looks back at women's achievements

Christina Hayashi
Special to the Bayonet©

Fort Benning celebrated Women's History Month Wednesday at the Officers' Club.

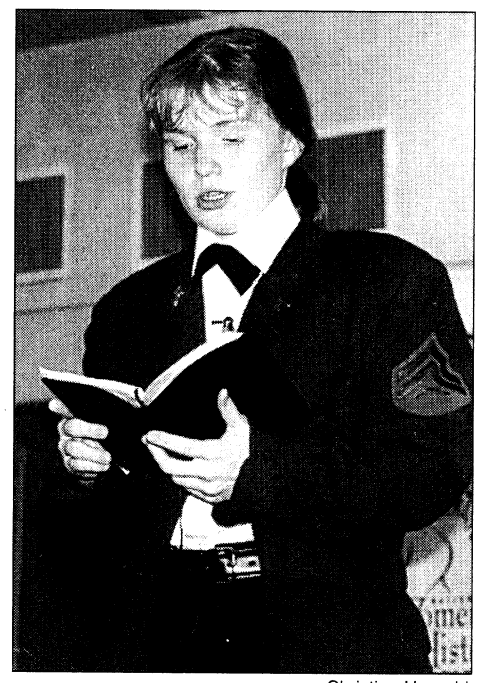
The guest speaker was Peggy Martin, former mayor of Phenix City. In her speech, she listed some women and noted their accomplishments.

Victoria Woodhull (1838-1927) was one such woman. She was the first woman to run for president of the United States in 1872, before women got the right to vote. But that isn't the only noteworthy action by Woodhull. She was the first woman to work on Wall Street as a broker in 1870.

Martin talked about Maria Goeppert-Mayer (1906-1972) who was the first woman to win the Noble Peace prize for her work on models of the nucleus of atoms.

And then there was the first Asian-American woman elected to Congress in 1964 — Patsy Mink (Dec. 6 1927). She wrote the first comprehensive Early Childhood Education act. She also had a part with the Women's Educational Equality Act and Title IX.

During the luncheon, the Phenix City Central High Chamber Winds played patriotic music. Afterward, the Phenix City Central High Select Choir sang and danced to songs from past decades.



Fort Benning schools had an essay contest for students to write about women who have made a difference. This year's winner was Brittany Martin, a fifth-grader at Dexter Elementary School, who wrote about her teacher Joyce Flatt.

Flatt inspired Martin to read.

"Now my mom has to yell at me to 'stop reading and go to sleep,'" Martin wrote. Martin received a coin from Maj. Gen. Paul Eaton, post commanding general.

Eaton also gave a coin to Annie White, Phenix City South Girard Jr. High School, who gave a dramatization called "Women as Warriors." She re-enacted roles women have had in the military in the past. White hopes to join the military.

Editor's note: Take the Women's History Month quiz on A-2 to learn some of the most influential women in their time.

Lead integrators for combat system named

Industry awarded contract

Spc. Douglas DeMaio
Bayonet staff

The development of concepts and technologies for the Army's Future Combat System is now in its beginning stages.

The idea for FCS is to develop a combat system to effectively communicate information to accomplish missions and achieve the Army chief of staff's Objective Force goal to become equipped, manned, organized and trained to be more strategically responsive, deployable, agile, versatile, lethal, survivable and sustainable across the entire spectrum of military operations, said Maj. Jason Stine, chief of Concepts, Analysis and Integration Division for the Directorate of Combat Development.

Boeing and the Science Applications International Corporation were awarded a $154 million contract and will be the lead systems integrators for the FCS concept and technology demonstration phase of the transformation.

"The selection of the LSI begins the physical transformation of the U.S. Army to the Objective Force," said Col. William Johnson, Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency program manager for the Future Combat System.

During the next 16 months, the Boeing-SAIC team will design prototype systems to fulfill the idea of the system of systems concept, Stine said. Similar to the way Microsoft integrated Excel, PowerPoint and Word to work together, the FCS will allow the technology of the Army's equipment to easily integrate and communicate with each another.

In turn, the transformation is adding additional information and responsibilities to commanders and leaders, said Col. Paul Melody, director of the Combined Arms and Tactics Directorate.

"It's an immediate challenge to the training of infantry leaders," Melody said. "Captains and sergeants will make independent decisions more than they have in the past. They won't do their own thing, but they will make decisions with the guidance they receive. They need good judgement and character."

The reason why there will be more independent decisions is because the field will be much larger than before, and the environment of the missions and the characteristics of it can change dramatically, Melody said.

"You could be handing out food one day in Somalia and the next day be fighting with a warlord," Melody said. "The infantry has an advantage over the other branches because we have done these kind of things before.

> "You could be handing out food one day in Somalia and the next day be fighting with a warlord. The infantry have an advantage over the other branches because we have done these kind of things before."
> Col. Paul Melody
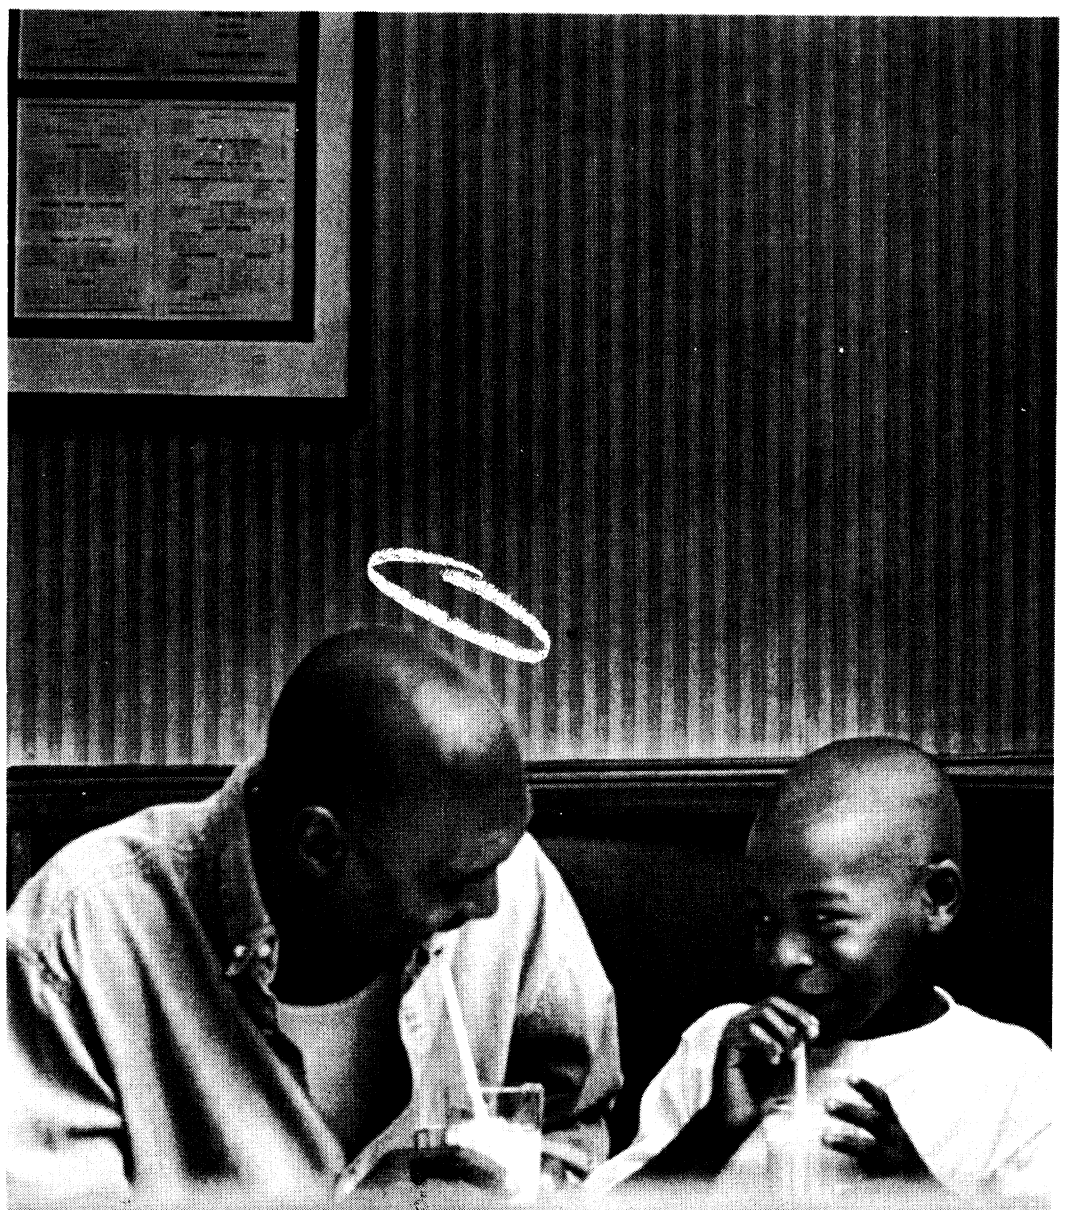
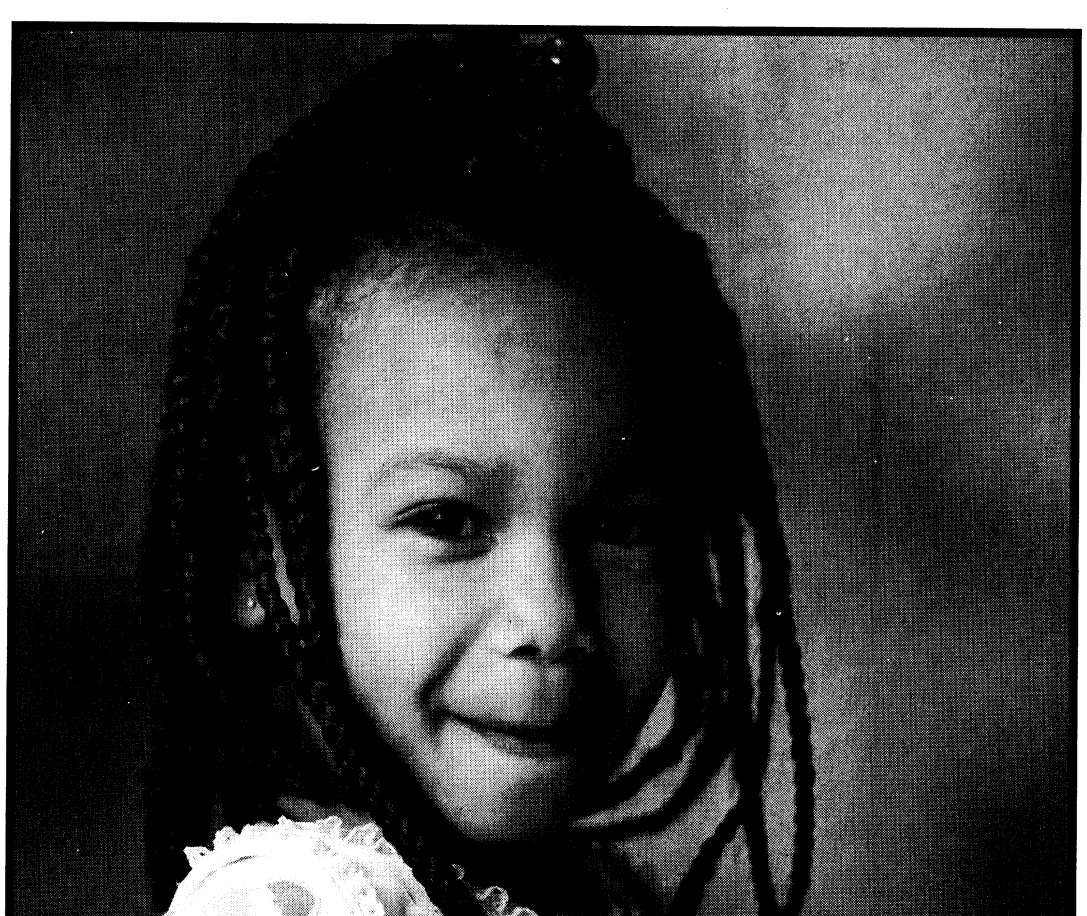
> Combined Arms and Tactics director

With such a change in technology and information soldiers are receiving, it becomes vital for soldiers to educate them self on foreign language, religion and updated news, he said.



An educated soldier will have a better chance to make the right decision, Melody said.



The FCS will allow for the Army to make better decisions through the new technology, he said.

"The Army's goal is to have sufficient information from CTD to make a decision for the Systems Development and Demonstration phase," Stine said.

Stop-loss doesn't stop promotions

Officials create new policies

Karen Roberts
Army News Service

WASHINGTON — Operations Enduring Freedom and Noble Eagle have created unique personnel policy needs for the combined Army components.

Active-Army, Guard, and Reserve soldiers need policies that merge into one centralized document, said Army officials.

"We are tying to merge policy from all three components and create a set of rules in a single source document that are consistent throughout the Army," said Sgt. Maj. Julian Edmondson, Reserve Component personnel policy integrator, Office of the Deputy Chief of personnel

The soldiers should know "policies are in place or are being put in place to support them," said Sgt. Maj. Gerald Purcell, Active Component personnel policy integrator, Office of the Deputy Chief of Staff, personnel.

The goal is to reach a point that a commander can pull one regulation or field manual off the shelf and have it apply to all of the soldiers under his or her command, Purcell said.

"Soldiers are from the active-duty, guard units, and Reserve forces and all three of the Army's components are serving together in support of Operations Enduring Freedom and Noble Eagle," Edmondson said. "They are an 'Army of One.'"

Compared to other mobilizations, units are now mobilizing and deploying soldiers to stay in country, Edmondson said.

"Noble Eagle is the biggest challenge since the lessons are being learned as we move along," Edmondson said.

Guard and reserve units are now at about 350 locations around the country working side-by-side with active-Army personnel, he said.

"The challenge is when the soldiers don't go overseas; we need to remain flexible with our policy to meet the needs of the Homeland security mission," Edmondson said.

For now, the policy is for soldiers from the Guard and Reserve who are activated for a year to remain under previous authorities with regard to promotions for E-5 and above, with the lower grades under active-duty rules, Edmondson said.

Active-duty soldiers whose status was impacted by stop-loss can still be eligible for promotion consideration as long as they don't have an approved retirement already in the system, Purcell said.

The same is true for Guard and Reserve soldiers, Edmondson said.

The number of yearly promotions is based on losses at each grade, Purcell said. One of the main reasons for promotions is to ensure we maintain a ready Army with the proper grade structure, but they also recognize the best-qualified soldiers and help attract and retain the highest caliber soldier in the Army, he said.

A quick glance at enlisted promotions for the first six months of this fiscal year compared to last year makes it appear as though we have decreased dramatically, but, in reality, we haven't, Purcell said. Before the implementation of conditional promotions to sergeant, we had to inflate the number of soldiers selected to cover for those who couldn't meet Primary Leadership Development Course requirements, Purcell said. Now the conditional promotions allow soldiers to be promoted and finish their required training within 12 months of gaining the promotion, so more of those selected are getting promotions when they are selected.

"We want soldiers to have every opportunity for promotions," Purcell said. "We are smoothing out the policy obstacles now. We have to get more enlisted soldiers referred to selection boards."

Currently, "there are some military occupational specialties where too few soldiers are being recommended for promotion and if they were just recommended and boarded, they would be promoted immediately," Purcell said.

He said, "If a specialist is doing well, then he or she should be recommended for promotion."

Some of the MOSs where there are deficiencies in the sergeant ranks have honest structural problems, but most should not be lacking, Purcell said.

Soldiers who aren't ready for promotion, but otherwise meet all of the requirements should be trained and made ready, Purcell said.

> "We want soldiers to have every opportunity for promotions. We are smoothing out the policy obstacles."

"This is a self-inflicted wound, and we can heal it," he said.

Research uses Canadian subjects

Researchers determine best field of view

Spc. Douglas DeMaio
Bayonet staff

Soldiers conducting infiltration operations at night usually require some sort of night-vision systems.

The problem is that many of the night-vision systems the Army has acquired over the years vary in their field of view, the amount of area seen through the equipment. This could affect or endanger the accomplishment of a mission.

For this reason, the Army's Human Research and Engineering Directorate, Night Vision Electronic Sensors Directorate and members of the Canadian military are conducting research on the vertical field of view.

"We have set up a system with only one variable to measure," said Capt. Patrick Schertler, project officer and test director of the wide field of view study. "We're using 36 subjects for six tasks to determine the optimal field of view."

The variable is the vertical degree the subject will see, Schertler said. The night vision directorate made a pair of day-time goggles, which simulate night vision. The view finders slide out to the side and can be replaced with different slides to limit the vertical field of view.

Tasks during the study will include driving, land navigation, target detection, close-end tasks, in-the-field movement techniques and military operations on urbanized terrain exercises.

Subjects will execute each task with the daytime goggles ranging from 40 to 95 degrees.

"Obviously, wider is better," Schertler said.

Nevertheless, the research is important to determine how the subjects perform the tasks and what the research will say, said Dr. Beth Redden, chief of the research directorate.

"We're going into things with an open mind," Redden said. "I'd like to see what the data will show."

> "Obviously wider is better."
> Capt. Patrick Schertler
> project officer

The subjects, who will determine the data of the study, are members of the Canadian military. They're participating in a U.S and Canadian training agreement called CANUSTEP. The Canadians are conducting research as well.

As for why members of the Canadian military are the only subjects — "We couldn't get troops," Redden said. "None of the units had soldiers available for the study."

Because of Operation Enduring Freedom and the deployment of Kelley Hill soldiers to Kuwait, that still shouldn't hinder the study, she said.

"We're both helping each other out," she said.

Soldiers of the 13th Corps Support Battalion sling-load an ISU-90 to a Black Hawk Helicopter Tuesday at training area G3.

Photos by Sgt. William A. Graves

13th CSB conducts sling-load

A Black Hawk flies away with the ISU-90 during training Tuesday afternoon.

Safety key to training exercise

Sgt. William A. Graves
Bayonet assistant editor

Sgt. Marcus Pratt has been around plenty of helicopters in his day. The team leader with 104th Transportation Company used to be stationed at Fort Campbell, Ky. — the home of air assault.

It was in Kentucky the air assault qualified soldier experienced what leaders of sling-load operations preach to their soldiers time after time. Pratt's buddy, "Joe," touched the Black Hawk prior to hooking the static discharge wand to the aircraft. Joe forgot the rudders had built up plenty of static electricity throughout the aircraft's fuselage. He was thrown 25 feet backward. He lied unconscious for 30 minutes and went to the hospital with a new appreciation of sling-load operations.

"It was pretty bad," Pratt said.

Members of the 13th Corps Support Battalion practiced loading ISU-90s to Black Hawks Tuesday as part of a one-week field problem.

Sgt. Ken Daniels, 104th Transportation Co., was a combat lifesaver assigned to one of 10 three-man teams who performed the exercise. One soldier was responsible for hand and arm signals. Two soldiers worked together to ground the chopper with the static line and sling-load the equipment. Leaders trained the lifesavers so they could step into service if one of the three couldn't finish the mission.

"I thought we did pretty well," Daniels said. "There are a thousand things to do and keep in mind, and we remembered to do all of them. I feel confident we can go out and accomplish a similar mission if we get the call."

Soldiers worked together and helped one another, and group cohesion strengthened as a result.

"We know we can depend on the guys next to us," Daniels said. "You can accomplish your mission better knowing they've got your back, and you've got their back."

Pratt said the exercise developed teamwork, too.

"Without (one part of the team), someone is going to get hurt, and the entire unit mission could be in jeopardy," he said. "Each person on the team compliments the other."

Having Daniels and the other combat lifesavers there was one way the battalion leadership stressed the importance of safety, Pratt said.

Furthermore, he said, besides learning about misfortunes soldiers like Joe had, soldiers learned some other key aspects of safe missions like:

- Determining how much cargo the Black Hawk can carry,
- Determining how much weight each sling leg can hold,
- Performing hand and arm signals the proper way.

As a result, the event was an invaluable educational tool that will produce dividends in the future, Pratt said.

"If you don't train for this, once you get into a situation, you could blank out," Pratt said. "The exercise helped it become second nature."

While safety was paramount during the training, speed was also key.

"You want to accomplish the mission as soon as possible," Daniels said. "In combat, you have the enemy out there who can take you out. Time is of the essence."

Speed is also pivotal to the soldiers at forward positions who anticipate the goods or equipment. For instance, many times ISU-90s carry ammunition.

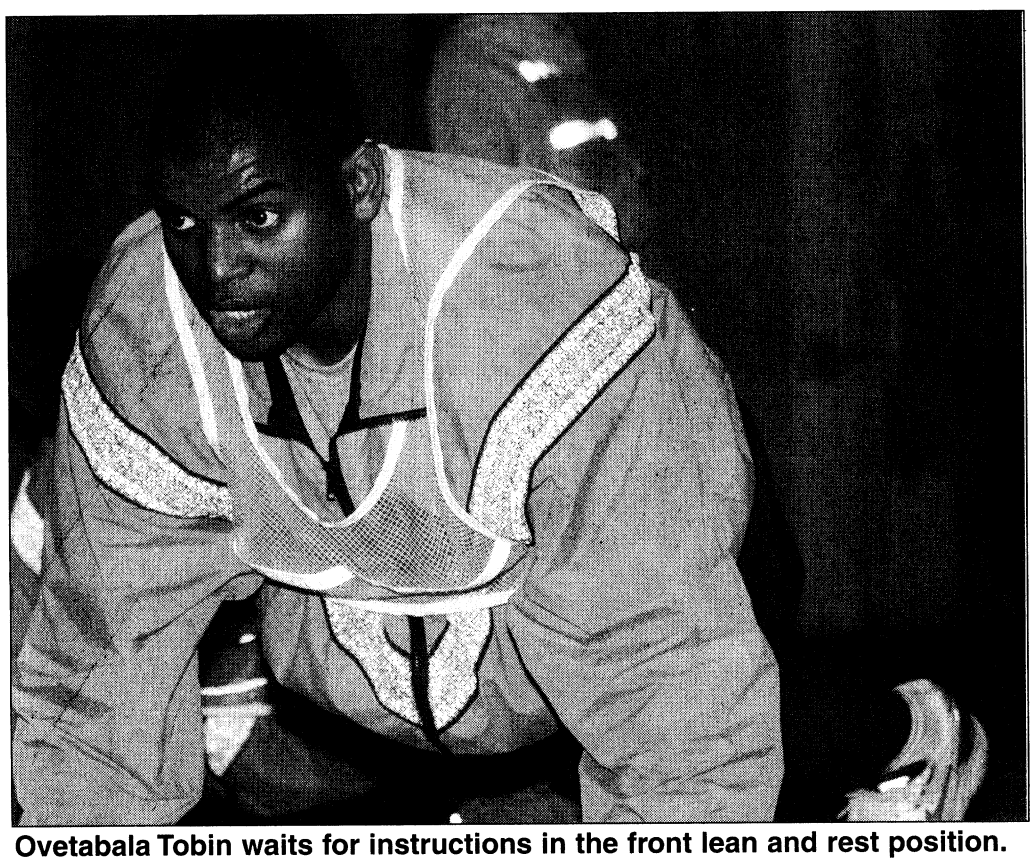
"If we don't get the ammo forward fast enough, it could hinder their mission," said 2nd Lt. Dana Embody, platoon leader, 608th Ordnance Co.

This makes training the trainer even more important.

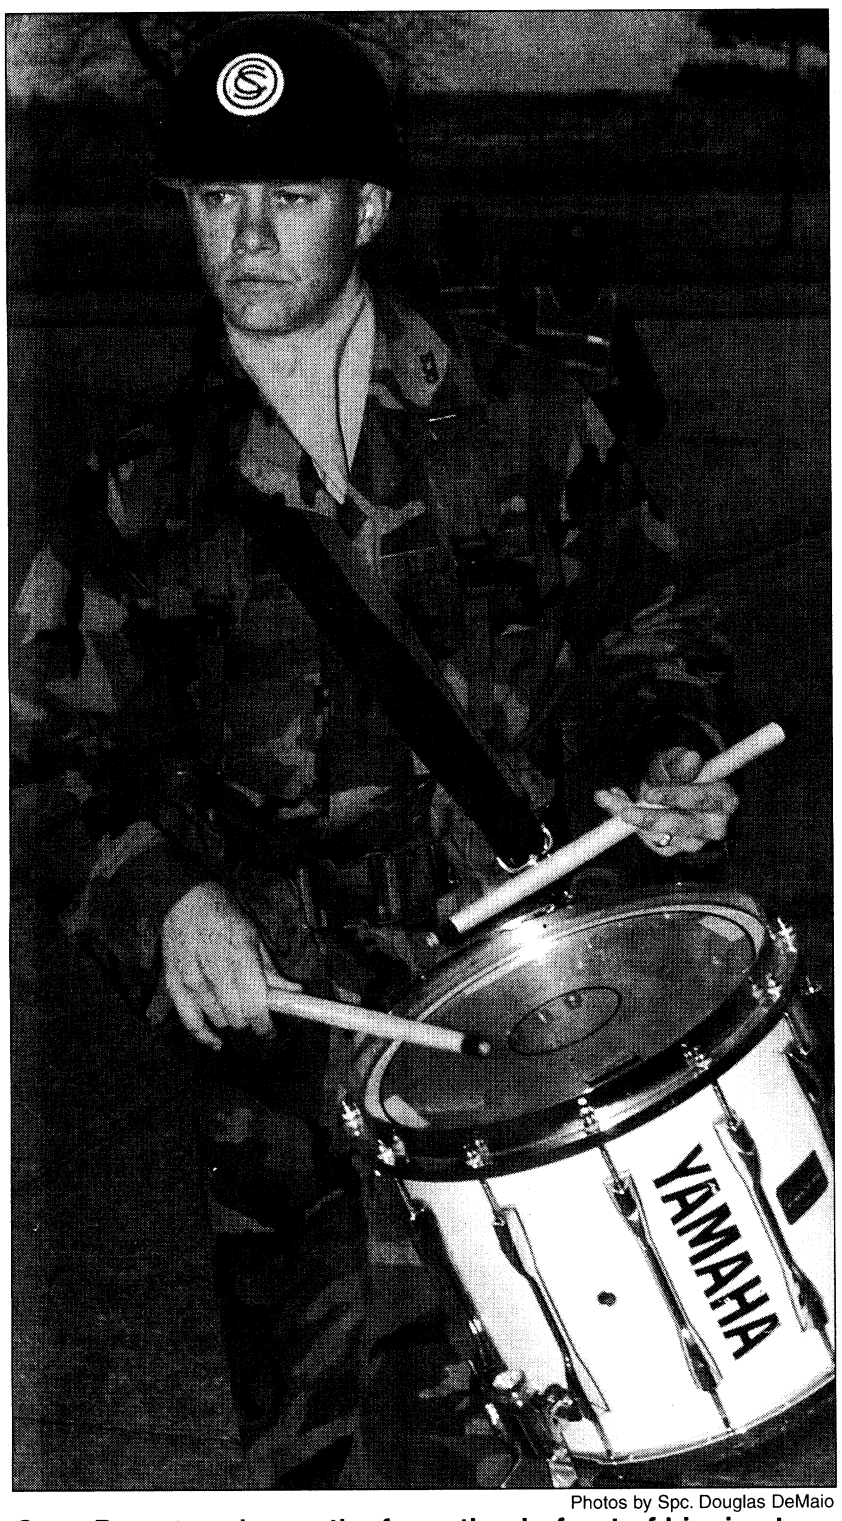
"We're always going to get new soldiers who don't know this," Embody said. "They need to be ready for anything we place in front of them, so we had our younger soldiers learning and our older ones teaching. Now, everyone who took part in the exercise can say, 'I'm comfortable teaching someone else how to do it.'"

Officers, like Embody, derived benefits from the event as well. It was her first one.

"I enjoyed sitting back and watching the soldiers learn," Embody said. "I know each of them enjoyed the fact they knew they did it right — hands-on, not out of the book, which can get old."



Sgt. Arthur Folks, supervisor with 104th Transportation Company, instructs Pfc. Nathaniel Slavens, 598th Maintenance Co., on the proper way to sling-load.



Slavens and Pfc. Rhyncouya Luck, 598th Maintenance Company, demonstrate the proper sling-load method.

30th AG gives first step

Reception sends soldiers down range

Pfc. Brian Trapp
Bayonet staff

Pvt. Jason Bice is excited to make his way to basic training to start his military career as an infantryman.

"I can't wait to get to basic training and go down range," Bice said, waiting to go to basic training at 30th Adjutant General Battalion (reception).

Approximately 2,000 to 3,000 new recruits move in and out of reception every month.

"We get the soldiers ready to go to basic," said Capt. Vincent C. Valley, operations officer with 30th AG. "We take care of their medical and dental files and their pay, so when they leave here, all they have to worry about is their training."

Barbers give new recruits the signature high and tight. They receive identification cards, uniforms, and have all their files and paper work done before they leave for basic training.

"It's very exciting to be here. I joined the Army for my wife and our future," Bice said. "There are so many benefits coming into the Army, but I can't wait to finish training and see my wife."

The Fort Benning reception center is second only to Fort Jackson for the number of soldiers going through a basic training reception station, Valley said.

> "We move about 30,000 soldiers a year, which raises some unique challenges. With so many it's a difficult job, but we have a hard-charging cadre that can handle it. The NCOs here are working seven days a week, and there is always someone on duty here"

"It's challenging here. We are working difficult and long hours here, and you always have to be on your toes," said Sgt. 1st Class Michael Johnson, senior drill sergeant, with C Company. "But I like a challenge."

The drill sergeants use their experience in the Army to set and demonstrate the standard to the new recruits.

"When new soldiers come in, we have to instill discipline because this is the first time some of them have had any," Johnson said. "We work with them, teach them to trust one another and look out for each other, and encourage them to use the seven Army values."

The drill sergeants get recruits headed in the right direction, Valley said. They will have a little to go on, when they get to the next level and have more intense training.

"When they come in here, they have nothing," Johnson said. "When they leave, they take with them some knowledge and a few very basic skills to help them in training."

There are a large number of soldiers at the facility, relative to its capacity, increasing from 930 to 1,766 maximum capacity.

"We are dealing with the increase by housing the large number of soldiers in a healthy and safe manner," Valley said. "We keep the ventilation system clean and strategically place the bunks to lower the spread of viruses."

Still, the most important reason for the success of the recruits lies in the leadership.

"The job of the NCOs and of the other staff is one of the tougher jobs on post," Valley said.

"We move about 30,000 soldiers a year, which raises some unique challenges. With so many soldiers it's a difficult job, but we have a hard-charging cadre that can handle it. The NCOs are working seven days a week, and there's always someone on duty here. We run an around-the-clock operation."

Bunny to drop eggs at Benning

Riverside site for annual Easter fun

Laura Martinson
Special to the Bayonet©

"Spring is a season of rebirth, and we welcome it," said Linda Laine, director of Youth Services. She plans to hail the season at the Easter Eggstravaganza Saturday, and Fort Benning is invited. Residents are called to drop what they're doing, grab a picnic basket, and camp for a few hours on the lawn of Riverside.

"The day is geared toward families and teaching children and parents to take time from their busy schedules to spend together," she said. "We have only two rules: parents and children must spend the day together and they have to have fun doing it," Laine said.

Several theme hunts — put on by the Red Cross, the post Vet Clinic and the golf course, to name just a few — are just the beginning of the fun to be had Saturday afternoon. But children and adults will be searching for more than Easter eggs Saturday. Guests should be prepared to find anything from golf balls, putting greens, CPR lessons (for both people and their pets), and friendly animals available for adoption.

School broadcasts in Spanish

Sgt. Daniel Monroy
WHINSEC Public Affairs Office

Getting involved in her home away from home, Lioreto Andrea Lara, a fourth-grader at White Elementary School, gives the Spanish language scoop for the school's internal television broadcast.

The 9-year old, daughter of Sgt. 1st Class Gerardo Lara, a guest instructor at the Western Hemisphere Institute for Security Cooperation from the Chilean Army, said she helps herself by helping others.

"I give the news of the day such as the menu and upcoming events for students with English as a second language and at the same time, the translations I read help me with my English as well," Lioreto said.

"Support and involvement in the local community is a crucial component in the experience guest instructors, students and their families take with them once they leave Fort Benning," said Joe Recio, chief of the International Student Division at WHINSEC.

Recio, who volunteers his time with international students, guest instructors and their families says once children get interested, parents follow in suit.

"I'm very proud of Lioreto. She's very outgoing and very suited for this," Lara said.

Child grows hair for children with cancer

10-year-old proves giving knows no age

Laura Martinson
Special to the Bayonet©

It's a hotter than average spring afternoon as Zack Arabinko and a friend toss a baseball in front of his family's quarters.

He turned 10 in January, and enjoys the same things as most children his age — Boy Scouts, video games and playing outside with his friends. Somewhat atypical for his age, Zack has an affinity for chess, hunting and a deep appreciation for a good World War II flick.

Like many of his peers, Zack knows there are others in the world less fortunate than him. But what sets him apart from the rest is he made a well-educated decision to do something about it.

When Zack's hair is 10 inches long, he's donating his locks to Locks of Love, a charity that provides hairpieces to financially disadvantaged children younger than 18 with medical hair loss, most often caused by chemotherapy.

"I can help make them feel they aren't different from their friends," said Zack, who started growing his hair — now seven inches and counting — last January. His mom jokes his long brown ringlets will make some little girl very happy.

"He's wise beyond his years," said his mother, Cecilia, who said there was little prodding to get Zack to do it. The idea came from a friend of the family and Army retiree who did the same thing.

"I think it's pretty cool he's concerned with people other than himself," she said. "It's so easy to do. If he can help another child feel better about herself with little effort on his part, there's really no reason not to."

"I can grow my hair out again in another year, and I know they can't," Zack said.

"The majority of all hair donations come from children who wish to help other children," said Jennifer Cox, executive director, Locks of Love.

Zack learned the importance of fitting in when he was 6. A schoolmate had to have surgery to adjoin the bones in his skull, and shaving his head was the first step in the surgery preparation. Zack and the other boys in his class all shaved their heads to make the transition back to school a smoother one for their friend.

Those who know him said Zack is a giver on many fronts. When he was 7, he volunteered to speak to other young children about children with special needs. His advice comes from personal experience — his younger brother Tom has high-functioning autism.

"He's always had an affinity for little ones," his mom said. "He just wants everybody to be happy."

What started out as simply "growing his hair long" is now a mission of service. The effort has become a family affair, and most recently, a schoolwide initiative. Zack and his mom will head a team in the American Cancer Society's Relay for Life in May.

"He's such a loving child," said Julie Miller, Zack's fifth-grade teacher, who was the first to offer to sponsor Zack in the Relay. His principal and teachers at Wilson Elementary School are rallying to find teammates for Zack and to raise his $100 donation to the society.

"I told him, 'It's your world. You can do it,' and I'm proud of him," said Cecelia, who thinks her son's helping heart will benefit him as well as other children.

"He really takes things to heart," she said. "I think this will stick with him for a long time."

Zack Arabinko shows off his tresses while he monkeys around on the Wilson Elementary School playground Monday. Zack is one of thousands of people who will donate their hair to Locks of Love.

Charity and duty calls!

Before you let the barber sweep away your next haircut, reconsider. Locks of Love and other such organizations have a flexible set of guidelines for hair donation.

Locks of Love accepts 10-inch minimum hair length, measuring tip to tip, not wigs, falls, or synthetic hair. Hair that is short, gray, or unsuitable for children will be separated from the ponytails and sold at fair market value to offset the cost of manufacturing.

Hair should be bundled in a ponytail or braid.

Hair is needed from men and women, young and old, all colors and races.

Hair may be colored or permed, but not chemically damaged (if you're not sure, ask your stylist).

Hair cut years ago is usable as long as it's been stored in a ponytail.

Curly hair can be pulled straight to measure the minimum 10 inches.

Layered hair may be put into more than one ponytail for donation. The Locks of Love Web site provides a list of participating fundraisers and stylists across the nation.

For more information, call (888) 896-1588, or visit www.locksoflove.org

The Columbus and Fort Benning Relay will be at Shaw High School's Kinnett Stadium from Friday 7 p.m. May 17 until 1 p.m. May 18.

The Relay is a noncompetitive, team-building event that welcomes participants from all walks of life.

Teams of 10 to 15 people take turns walking or running the track. Team members pay a fee of $10 and are asked to raise a minimum of $100 each. The money raised supports the American Cancer Society's programs of research, cancer control and patient services.

The Relay is the signature event of the American Cancer Society, and is held in every U.S. state and Puerto Rico and Guam.

In 2001, the Relay for Life raised $211 million, with more than 3,000 relay activities. The Southwest Division (Georgia, South Carolina and North Carolina) raised $31 million of the total.

The Relay is known as one huge support group for cancer survivors, hence, they are the leaders of the first lap.

Why relay?

One in three Americans will get cancer in their lifetime, and one in eight women will be diagnosed with breast cancer. In my family, every woman on my mother's side, including my mother, had breast cancer. Kind of scary, huh? Everyone is personally affected by cancer sooner or later, whether it's you or a loved one. Today, only slightly more than half of cancer patients survive, but the survival rate can be increased through more research and greater community effort. The small amount of time required to commit to the Relay is worth it. Everyone's contribution makes a difference!

Pollution pains planet, play pronounces

Community learns about Earth's ecology

"Pollution is bad. It's not good to litter," said e-Club President Olivia Sullivan, a kindergartner who introduced the annual e-Club play and played the part of Betsy Bird.

In this year's play, Mother Earth Speaks at the Pollution Solution Convention, animals gather together to discuss environmental issues like littering, the destruction of the animal's homes, pollution, lack of food and disease.

"Pollution makes animals die," Boliva Bird said. She was played by first-grader Courtney Beaton.

At the end of the play, all of the characters pledge to Mother Earth, "Dear Mother Earth, we will do our part to take care of the earth. We will never litter, we will never take more than our fair share, and we will begin today."

"I hope the play sends out the message that the earth is important. We only have one," said Earnestine Ezekiel, kindergarten teacher at Dexter. "We all have to share this. We all have to take better care of the

The Easter bunny will pay a visit to the children, and a father-daughter band, Karrie and the Kruzers, will entertain picnickers. The Youth Services Performing Arts Club plans a surprise performance and puppet show for the children.

"The shows they do are amazing," Laine said. "They need to be out in the community and appreciated.

"This day is not just for little kids. There's something for everyone," Laine said.

Planning the event has been a postwide effort.

"Many hands make light work," Laine said of her contributors, which include the post fire department, Military Police Activity, American Legion, post exchange and many more.

Some may wonder why all the different organizations on post are putting on the non-traditional hunts, but it's simply a fun way to educate and increase awareness, Laine said.

"By having pets on site, children can learn about the responsibility of being an owner, and how to raise animals," she said. But Laine also asked that guests not bring their pets to Riverside.

The golf clinics are just another way to get moms, dads, and their children together to learn the rules of a game.

Parents can give some driving lessons on the green and in a golf cart. And anyone who needs to brush up on their golf etiquette will be in luck, as post course requirements will be posted.

"People don't take the time to relax anymore," said Kathy Burns, Fort Benning golf tournament coordinator, who said the game itself can be intimidating. "It's a great way to relax with your kids. The main thing is to make it more welcoming."

And for those parents trying to recruit their own Tiger Woods, a set of junior golf clubs will be given away to one lucky child at the end of the day.

The Eggstravaganza hasn't been held at the general's home for four years. Its return marks a commitment to making the residence one to be shared by the entire community.

"We're able to do this because of the two generals before us. They were extremely dedicated to Riverside, and we're thankful to them," P.J. Eaton said of her predecessors at Riverside, who lived in guest housing so the house could be completely refurbished. The once overgrown lawn is now pruned and spacious to accommodate events such as the Eggstravaganza.

"This home belongs to everybody," she said.

The Eggstravaganza is 11 a.m. to 2 p.m. Saturday. For more information, call Youth Services at 545-3070.

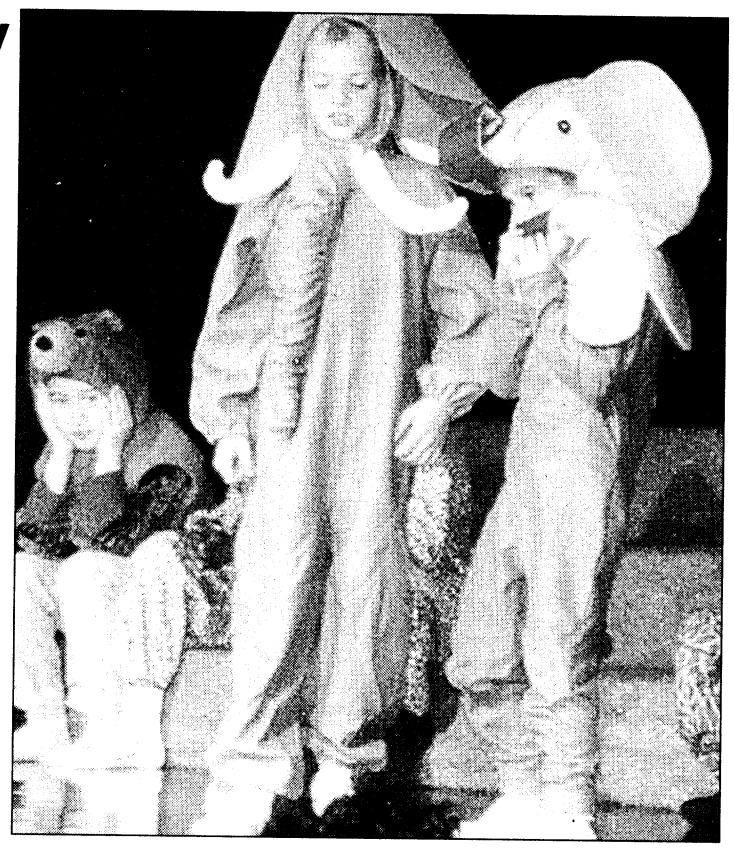
earth because it's the only one we have."

Each year since 1994, Ezekiel, a kindergarten teacher at Dexter Elementary, has written and produced the e-Club play.

Last year, the e-Club won the National Arbor Day Foundation Educational Award. A small group went to Nebraska for a weekend and helped plant the national tree, the red oak.

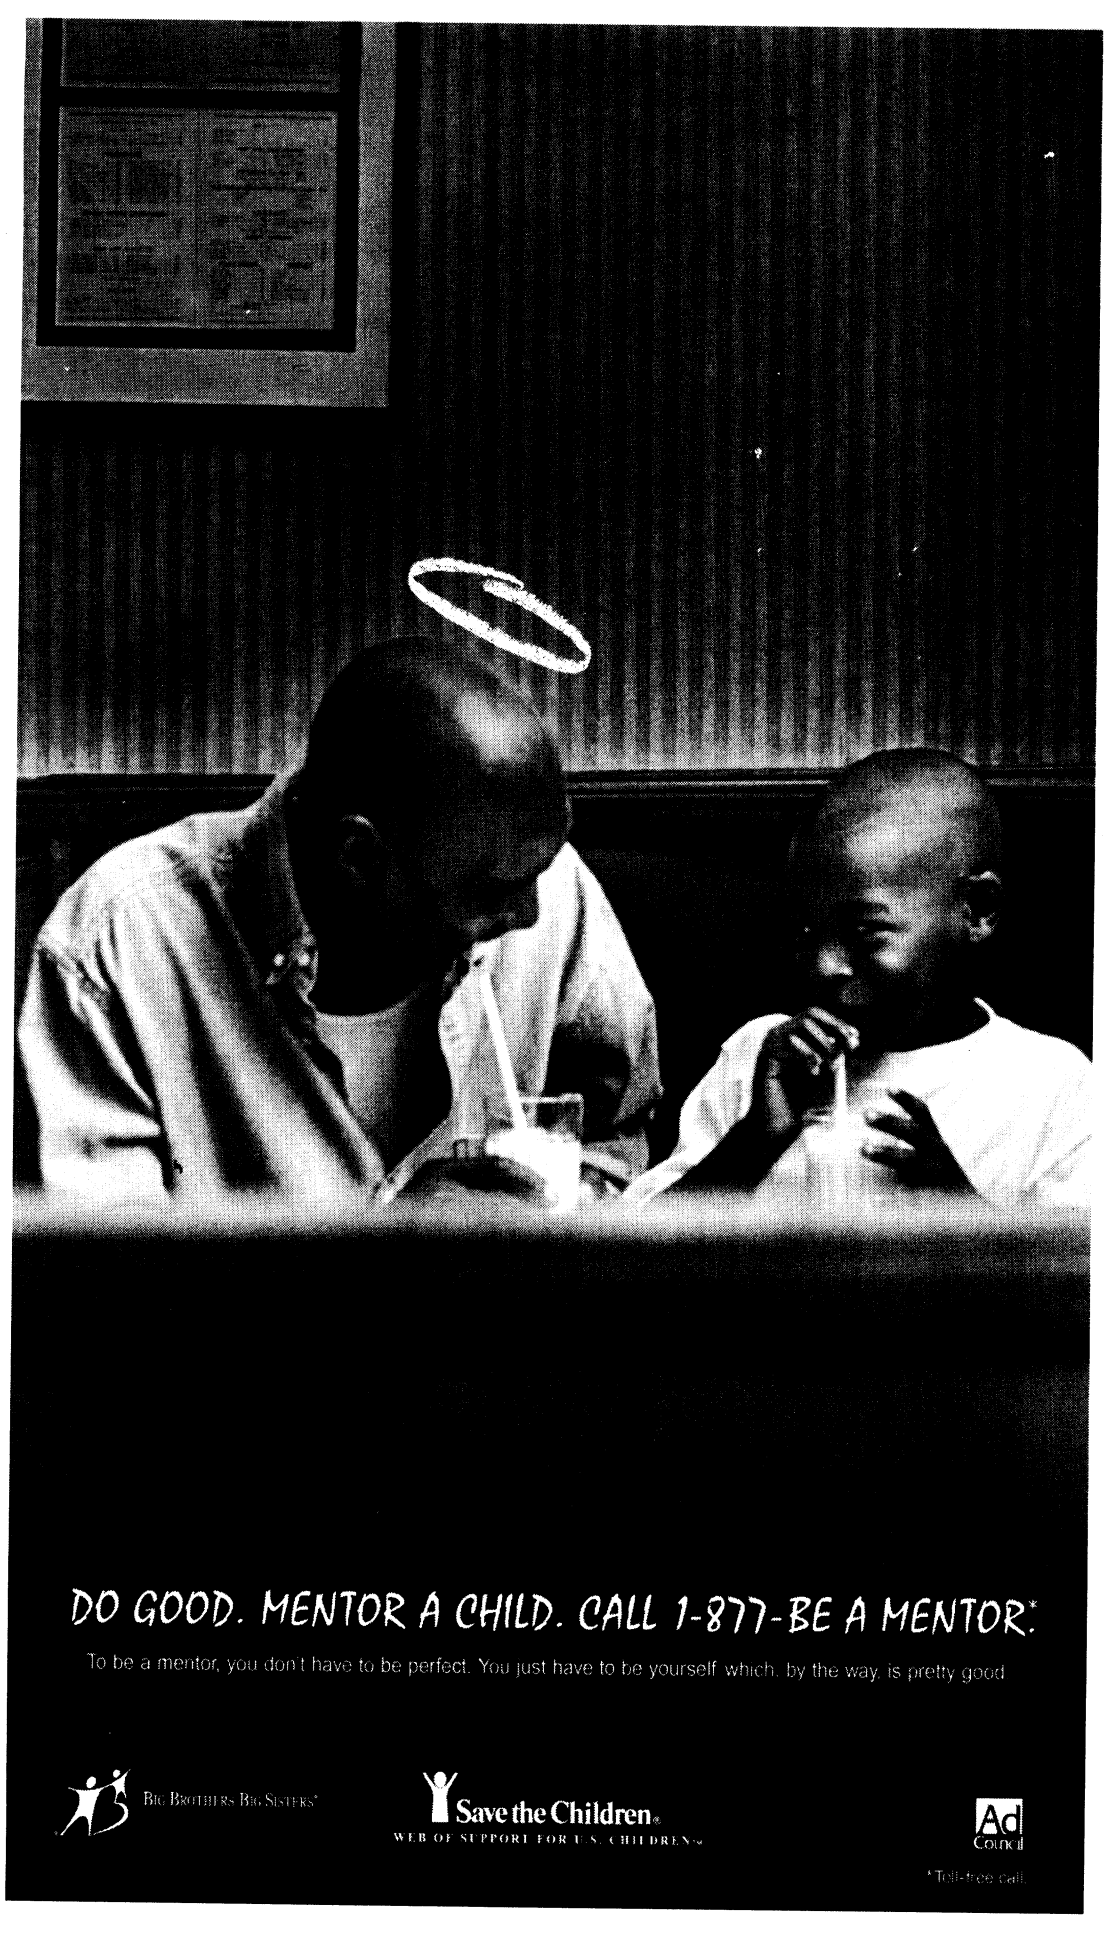


The club has also won the Keep Georgia Beautiful Award in the past.

The e-Club consists of kindergartners and some first graders. The club meets from 8 a.m. to 8:30 a.m. every Tuesday. They recycle from 8 a.m. to 8:30 a.m. every Thursday. They conduct a campus watch program where they put on gloves and pick up trash every Friday.

They have a garden where they harvest vegetables such as potatoes, onions, and peppers, and then donate it to homeless shelters in Columbus.

If the vegetables are ready for harvesting during the summer, Ezekiel calls students to pick the garden and then donates the vegetables to various homeless shelters in the community. Seeds are brought by members, donated from local companies, or from around the school.



They also recycle newspapers, plastic lids, and plastic bags that are brought from home. The recycling is also used as a math experience. They separate the items by color and then weigh and count the items. After everything is bundled, Ezekiel brings it to a recycling center.

Quiz bowl keeps students studying

Spencer PTSA

The Parent, Teacher, Student Association at Spencer High School has promoted and implemented several programs this year.

One of the most successful programs was the Educational Quiz Bowl that was offered to the entire student body as preparation for the Georgia High School Graduation Test.

The quiz bowl gave students an opportunity to study and familiarize themselves with some of the questions on the test students are required to take before graduating in Georgia.

The winner, Bracha Williams, received a DVD player and the two runners-up, Kristin Bohannon and JoAnne Boggs, received educational gift baskets.

The PTSA is currently promoting a Question of the Week. In this contest, students answer a question from various subjects such as: current events, math, English, science and history.

The student with the correct answer at the end of the week receives a prize.

The PTSA is also offering T-shirts featuring the school mascot to show school spirit and pride. The T-shirts are available in two colors, gold and white, and cost $10. The deadline to purchase a shirt is April 2.

The PTSA is comprised wholly of volunteers who are dedicated to developing and implementing programs that will directly benefit students and families of Spencer High School.

The PTSA will sponsor several more programs before the school year comes to end.

If interested in becoming a part of the PTSA executive committee or know of someone who will be an asset to the association, e-mail the school or the PTSA president Stephen T. Boston at Stephen.Boston @benning.army.mil or call 685-2027.

Q: I've always prepared my tax returns by hand and mailed them to the IRS. Recently, I heard some of my friends talking about electronically filing their tax returns. Why should I electronically file my return? Is electronically filing available at the Fort Benning Installation Tax Center?

A: More and more taxpayers choose to electronically file ("e-file") because their returns are processed faster with fewer errors. Taxpayers receive their refunds quicker and they have less contact with the IRS.

The IRS acknowledges receipt of e-filed returns within 48 hours. This gives taxpayers proof of filing. Plus, the chance of an audit is no greater than a paper return. Even a return with a foreign address can be e-filed.

Upon receipt of the return information, the IRS computers automatically check for errors or missing information.

Your chance of getting an error notice from the IRS is significantly reduced because e-filing is more accurate. Compared to mailing paper returns, there is less than a one percent error rate.

You can expect your refund in half the time paper filers do. You can receive your refund in as few as 10 days.

You can receive your refund faster if you use direct deposit. To choose a direct deposit refund, indicate on the refund portion of the electronic return your financial institution's routing transit number, your account number and the type of account, either checking or savings.

The refund is deposited automatically into your account. This is a convenient, safe and secure way to receive your refund.

You can prepare and file both federal and state tax returns in the time it takes to prepare one return. The tax preparation software automatically transfers relevant data from the federal return to the state return as the information is entered. All states that have income taxes support e-file. Most states offer benefits that IRS e-file offers.

The tax preparers at the Fort Benning Installation Tax Center file tax returns electronically for service members, retirees and their family members. You need to have a military identification card with you to use the services at the Tax Center.

Most military installations use Tax Wise software to prepare returns. Tax Wise has a system of checking returns for errors before the returns are transmitted to the IRS. That way, all returns are double-checked before they are submitted.

At the Tax Center, you have the option of either preparing your own return and having a tax preparer electronically transmit it to the IRS, or you can have your return prepared and transmitted by the tax preparer.

Whichever you choose, all services at the Tax Center are free.

For more information on e-filing, the IRS issues a Revenue Procedure containing the rules for participating in the IRS e-file program. The current Revenue Procedure can be found on the IRS "Digital Daily" Web site at www.irs.gov/prod/elec_svs/e-pubs.html.

Other information about IRS e-file and related topics can be found at www.irs.gov. When you visit this site, click on "Electronic Services" to see the latest information on IRS e-file.

For more information, come by the Tax Center, Building 880.

The Tax Center is open through April 15, Monday through Friday, from 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. The phone number is 545-4267.

BRAIN TEASERS

Exercises relax, bring focus

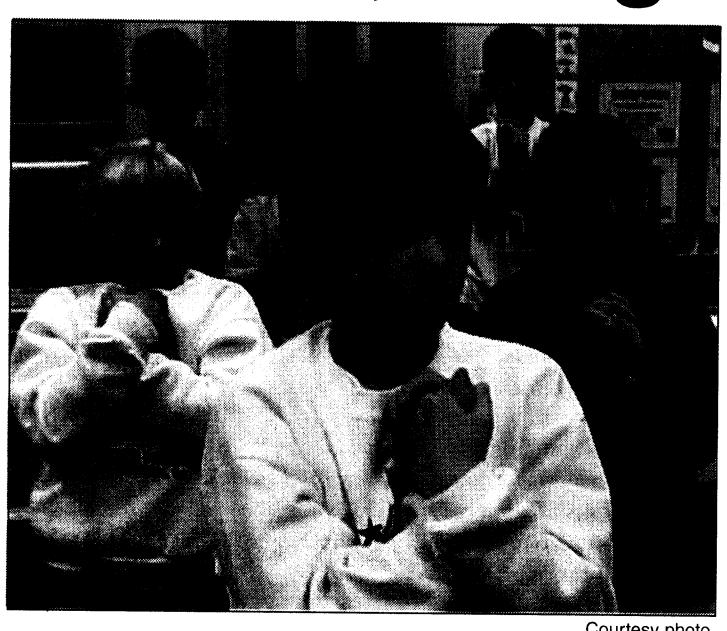
Dexter Elementary School

"They help my blood flow so I can think."

Kenneth Richardson

"After I do them, my brain feels clear."

Emily Guidry



What are these third-graders from Terri Bond's class at Dexter Elementary School talking about? Brain Gym exercises, of course.

Brain Gym exercises are enjoyable, relaxing movements especially designed to enhance learning processes and to improve the functions of the mind, according to developer Dr. Paul E. Dennison.

Students in Bond's class, along with other fourth- and fifth-grade classes, used Brain Gym exercises the week of March 11-15 during Terra Nova testing.

"Our P.E. teacher, Pam Koon, is forever finding research on how the brain and the body work together. When she offered to lead my class in Brain Gym exercises as a way to possibly enhance testing performance, I was elated," Bond said.

"The students enjoy the exercises because they are relaxing rather than strenuous," Koon said. "There are certain exercises to enhance reading functions, release stress and to focus attention. The main purpose is to activate both hemispheres of the brain to have them work simultaneously."

Courtesy photo

Chris Lockhart, Elizabeth Hernandez, Kelsey Dean, Matthew Tharpe and Storme Spencer engage in a calming activity during standardized testing.

Joyce Flatt noticed fifth-graders in her class chose various relaxers such as Brain Buttons and Thinking Caps during Terra Nova testing, each seeming to find one that was best suited for them. When asked about their favorite Brain Gym activity, Chris Cioppa chose the marching exercise to get them ready.

"It's awesome," Cioppa said.

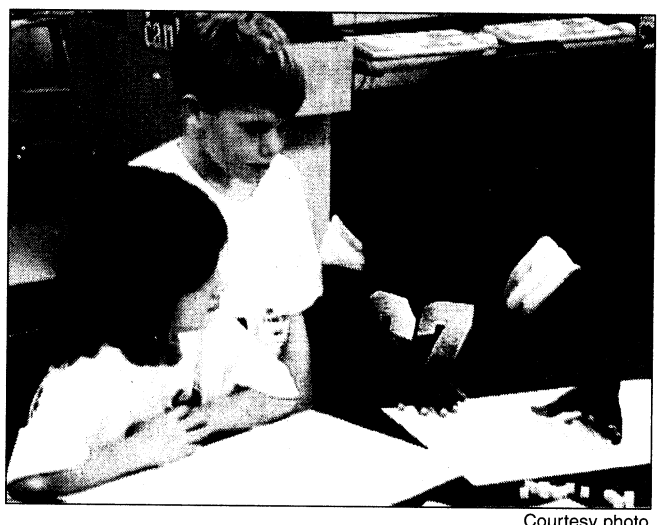
Another favorite from Brain Gym is Hook Ups, designed for those who may be feeling nervous and want to calm the mind and improve concentration.

"It helps my brain take an important test," said third-grader Josh Best.

Hook Ups is an exercise that can be done standing or sitting. Cross the right ankle over the left ankle. Hold both arms out straight in front, thumbs down. Cross right wrist over the left and link fingers. Bend the elbows out and gently turn the fingers in toward the body until they rest on the breastbone in the center of the chest. Stay in this position. Keep ankles and wrists crossed and breathe evenly in this position for a few minutes. Repeat by crossing left over right. You will be noticeably calmer after that.

Fifth-graders in Carroll Thebaud's class say this exercise hurts; however, they admit it really does calm them down when they hold the position for awhile.

They also find the Cross Crawl to have a very balancing effect on the brain. Cross Crawl is another of the cross over exercises that you do while humming.



Thebaud said their favorite relaxation technique involved a series of visualizations, beginning with visualizing themselves floating out into a warm, grassy field.

"Since many of the exercises cause the person to cross over the left side and the right side, the whole brain is activated and focused on the task ahead," said Principal Vicki Rogers.

"Students have found these exercises to be very helpful, not just for testing situations, but for life in general. They fit so well with the other brain-based activities that have become a part of our school culture — like cupstacking, sign language and juggling. We are pleased that Mrs. Koon has introduced us to this research."

More information regarding Brain Gym and its development can be obtained at http://members.aol.com/braingym.bg.html.

PASSOVER

The journey to freedom

Randy Kranepuhl
USAIC Chaplains Office

Passover 5762

"I will pass over you, and the plague shall not be upon you to destroy you ... And this day shall be to you for a memorial; and you shall keep it a feast to the Lord; throughout your generations shall you keep it a feast by ordinance forever ... Seven days shall you eat unleavened bread ... ."

Exodus Chapter 12

This is the essence of the Passover Festival marking the passage of a people from slavery to freedom. During Passover, the Jewish people are careful to eat and drink nothing with leavening.

This act of self-discipline and self-denial mandated by the Torah (the first five books of the "Old Testament") is in remembrance of that great journey and transition.

Why do we not eat leavening? We do not eat bread or leavening as recognition of the fact that the Jewish people did not have time to let bread rise during that first critical period of escape from bondage. It is a link with our past and a link to our future.

We have one or two Seder dinners (depending on to which branch of Judaism one belongs). These are grand meals in which the story of the Exodus is told every year. All people of all ages participate. There is singing and story telling and "the four questions" regarding the unique nature of this festival asked by the children.

One thing has always touched me the most: Even in the midst of the celebration and feasting there is a sense of pain at the suffering of the Egyptians. We drink four cups of wine to commemorate the seven plagues inflicted on the Egyptians. And, do you know that before we drink each cup we dip a finger in the wine cup and withdraw a drop of wine signifying regret at the pain caused our oppressors?

How many of us consider that we face the challenge of slavery and make the journey from slavery to freedom on a daily basis? There is slavery of commission. What about doing what we think may feel good when we know that it may hurt another? What about drinking and driving, although we know this is dangerous and might hurt another? And we should consider the slavery of omission. What about our telling a child we can't go to a ball game because we're too tired or too busy? What about the slavery of not putting out extra effort to ensure a spouse is considered on an anniversary or birthday because we are too busy?

Passover has been, is, and will be a time of remembrance in the past and hope for a brighter future. In this time of war and continuing crisis, such a remembrance is as important now as ever it was. May we successfully, each of us, make that journey from slavery in our darker natures to the freedom of a richer and more righteous life. And may we always remember the journey that 600,000 Jews took without which we might have never had the other two great religions (Christianity and Islam) of the Western world.

Shearith Israel Synagogue will conduct the First Seder beginning at 6:30 p.m. March 27 preceded at 6 p.m. by a short service.

All Fort Benning Jewish personnel are welcome to come and there is no cost. For non-military personnel, a small donation will be requested to cover the costs. Call the Synagogue at 323-1443 for details.

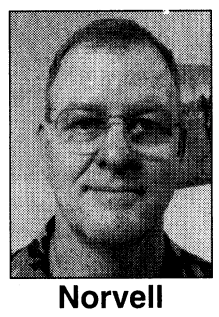
Lent offers new beginning

Chaplain (Maj.) David R. Norvell
USAIC Chaplain Office

commentary



Making a new start clarifies what the season of Lent and this special time of year is all about. Even the spring budding and blooming of the plants make the cold, gray winter fade into the background and release hope for renewed life, a fresh season and a new start.

You and I have hope of making new starts in our personal lives, relations, work places and with God.

My younger brother and fellow pastor wrote recently about Old and New

"I knew my loafers were getting old, but I never noticed how old they looked until I replaced them with a new pair. Almost immediately my most comfortable shoes began to look ragged and almost embarrassingly old.

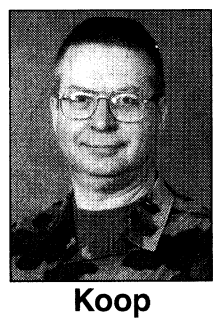
My coffee pot that has filled the house with the luring aroma of coffee for several years looked just fine sitting on our kitchen counter. Then, I saw the new one in the store. It was shiny. It was neat and clean. My old one began to look ... well, it looked old.

Norvell

The difference between the old and the new is never more obvious than when we compare our new life in Christ to our life of living for self. We may even marvel at how uncomfortable the old ways are in comparison to our new lifestyle. Paul said it best, 'Therefore, if anyone is in Christ, he is a new creation; the old has gone, the new has come' (2 Corinthians 5:17, NIV)."

As you approach a new season of the year, set your goals on making a new start. Start reading the Bible or some inspirational material every day. Start spending more quality time with your child (children, seeing each as unique, individual human beings). Start spending time with a child or family who may need your help or presence. Start getting up earlier to get ahead of the day. Start going to bed earlier for more rest. Start budgeting you money. Start planning the next phase of your life. Start that project at home you've wanted and do and said you were going to do someday. Start a new start.

Frederick Buechner said, "We cannot make the Kingdom of God happen, but we can put out leaves as it draws near. We can be kind to each other. We can be kind to ourselves. We can drive back the darkness a little. We can make green places within ourselves and among ourselves where God can make his Kingdom happen."



Making a new start begins by starting to see the need, by starting to commit to it and by starting.

Spouses provide support to each other

Chaplain (Maj.) Raymond Koop
Family Life Ministries Center

Working together, spouses of deployed soldiers can make a positive difference in their lives. No longer merely waiting, spouses are taking constructive steps to support each other while their soldiers are away for military training, temporary duty, or real-world missions.

Family Readiness Groups, also called Family Support Groups, keep the soldier's spouse informed and involved. The FRG is a key resource for spouses and families for finding the right agency to help them solve problems. It fosters feelings of belonging, control, self-reliance, and self-esteem. Contact the unit for more information.

The Army Family Team Building Program prepares spouses to meet the challenges of day-to-day life within the Army community. The AFTB is an educational program to teach Army culture and give families the skills they need for independence and self-sufficiency. Located in Building 359, it can be contacted at 545-5377 or 545-6108.

The Chaplain Family Life Center offers counseling and group support for spouses, who are dealing with the separation of a loved one due to a deployment, an unaccompanied overseas tour or any other separation for military purposes. Topics covered include, but are not limited to: maintaining family cohesion; overcoming depression, stress, and loneliness; establishing appropriate outlets for emotions, and discovering resources to aid in the coping process. The goal of the Spouses of Deployed Soldiers Support Group is to develop coping skills, maintain interdependence, and provide support for others going through a separation.

Soldiers to be featured on History Channel

The Magnum will air on T.V. 9 p.m. Tuesday

Paula J. Randall Pagán
U.S. Army Marksmanship Unit

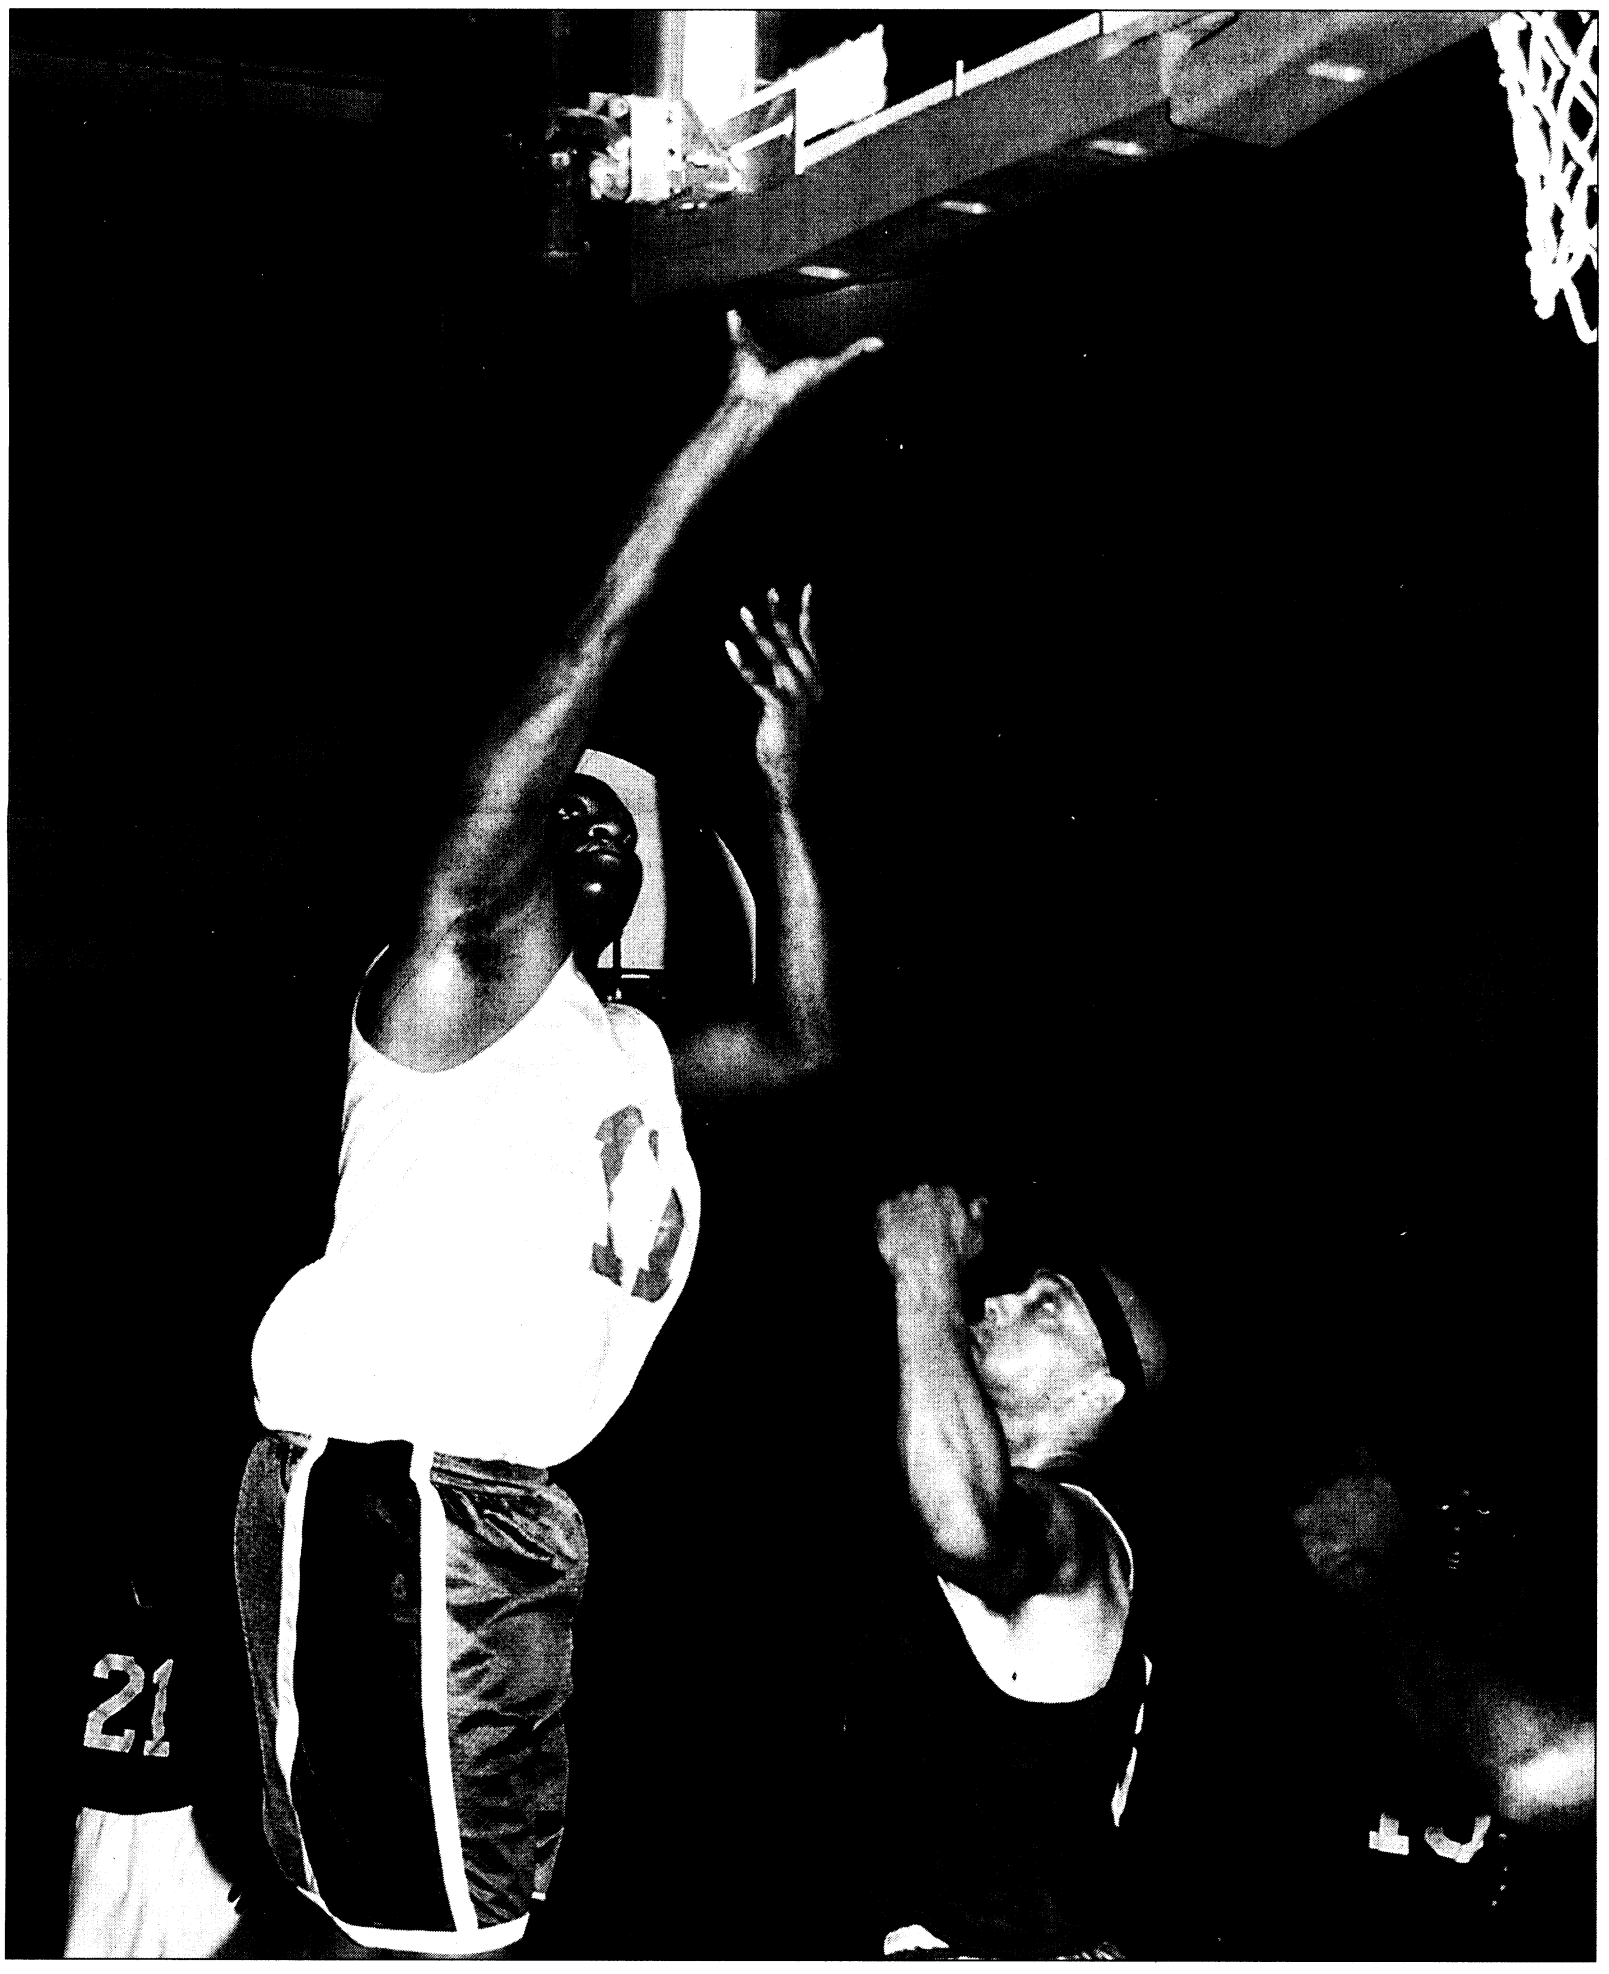
What do the soldiers of the U.S. Army Marksmanship Unit have in common with movie star Clint Eastwood? They will both be featured in a History Channel special on the Magnum, which will be at 9 p.m. Tuesday. The show is described in the History Channel's listings as follows:

"The Magnum. It's known as the most powerful handgun in the world, made famous by Clint Eastwood in the "Dirty Harry" movies. But its origins stretch back more than a century to the Indian Wars of the American West and African safaris where hunters stalked big game. Join us for a review of the history of the biggest, baddest gun available today — unlimited firepower at the pull of a trigger!"

The show, titled "The Magnum," will originally air as part of the channel's History Alive series and reruns of the show will air under the Modern Marvels series. USAMU soldiers are featured at the very beginning and near the end of the show for approximately eight minutes. The show is closed captioned and rated G.

A film crew from the Digital Ranch production company of California visited the Marksmanship Unit Nov. 29 and videotaped USAMU personnel for the Magnum one-hour documentary. Producer Tom Jennings and his crew spent the day interviewing and filming the soldiers and civilians of the USAMU for the show.

The crew spent the morning of at the USAMU ranges filming members of the Service Rifle Team shooting the Magnum. After lunch, Jennings and the crew interviewed some of the USAMU ammunition technicians while they were producing Magnum bullets and talked with USAMU gunsmiths who build the Magnums for the Army shooters.



"I think everything went great," said USAMU Service Rifle Coach Donnie Heuman. "The crew members were highly professional and dedicated to their work. They were very excited about being around the guns and actually being able to film a bullet going down range; they thought that was pretty cool. They made us feel very comfortable and it was a real pleasure working with them. We are hoping to work with them again in the future."

"The people at the Marksmanship Unit are a great group of people," Jennings said. "You can tell these individuals are top-of-the-line, both in their professionalism and how they treated our film crew. The images were superb and the people made our day at the office a lot of fun. Our visit was just a great experience all the way around and brought a lot more than I expected.

In general, my experience with them was outstanding. I had no idea what to expect and found the guys approachable and easy to work with. You can tell how much they care about what they do and how willing they are to teach others the nuances of their work.

"By far, the most interesting thing for me was being able to film the bullet in flight," Jennings continued. "The footage is just amazing; you can clearly see the rounds splitting the air as they travel toward the target. But I don't want to diminish the other things that we filmed. I found it fascinating, for example, to be standing under the targets while the shooters were punching holes in them from 600 yards. That is not an everyday experience for a civilian."

Tigers post 10-1 season on their way to championship

Military kids are champions of Columbus

Spc. Douglas DeMaio
Bayonet staff

Children from Fort Benning assembled an 11- and 12-year-olds boys basketball team that won the Columbus Park and Recreation basketball league and is looking for tournaments in the Southeast region to compete in.

The Tigers, a name given to them by the league, won the city championship for their age March 2 and posted a 10-1 record.

Their only loss came against the Boilermakers, the team they beat in the finals.

"No one thought we were going to win," said Desmond Bussey, Tigers' shooting guard. "We showed them we can compete on their level."

Less than half the team never played organized basketball, Bussey said. But that didn't stop them from giving their best effort.

"The kids practiced hard and were determined," said coach Gerome Bussey, Desmond's father. "We also received great support from the parents."

During the championship, while the Tigers had only their parents there to support them, the Boilermakers had a large crowd of rowdy supporters who were eventually silenced by the superlative play of the Tigers.

"We didn't have near as many people there as they did," Desmond said. "We just blocked out the crowd and played our game."

Being patient allowed the Tigers to dominate the Boilermakers both inside and outside, but getting into the offense was the most challenging part of the game.

The Boilermakers used full court throughout the game, but the pressure did not stifle Tigers' point guard Kahlee Tyler. It was his job to get the team set into their motion offense.

"It wasn't easy," Tyler said. "I read the defense, waited, and then hit the open man."

The win was a good feeling, Desmond said. The team wants to carry its momentum into its next competition.

The goal of the team is to qualify for the Youth Basketball of America tournament in Florida, Gerome said. The team has two tournaments coming up that could help them achieve its goal. The Tigers will play in Columbus at the Riverfest basketball tournament March 29-31.

Outlaws outlast Aces in rematch

Pounding boards gives important win to post champs

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

Behind great rebounding on both the offensive side and the defensive side, the Outlaws beat the Aces, 55-41, in post intramural basketball action Monday night at Briant Wells Field House.

The Outlaws of Headquarters and Headquarters Company, 1st Battalion, 11th Infantry Regiment, used their rebounding to beat the A Company, 1st Battalion, 29th Infantry Regiment, Aces.

"Our defense pulled it out in the end," said Thelonious McLean-Burrell, Outlaws guard. "We started out a little bad on defense, but we picked it up."

The Aces started the game on a 6-2 run, but the Outlaws came surging back with a 15-2 run of their own.

"We were getting to the ball," McLean-Burrell said. "We were making our shots and rebounding the ball really well."

The Aces called a timeout, and the Outlaws run came to a halt.

"We took the shots we needed," said Terrance Garrett, Aces forward. "We contested their shots and made them play our game."

With five seconds to go in the half, Patrick Smith, Aces guard, took the ball the length of the court for an easy lay-in to give the Aces a 24-22 lead at the half.

However, when the second half started, the Outlaws came out with fire in their eyes.

Adrian Lewis, Outlaws guard, made a 3-pointer to give the Outlaws a one-point lead.

The Outlaws increased lead, yet the Aces managed to stay in the game.

"We couldn't give up," Garrett said. "We just had to keep fighting."

Fight they did. The Aces kept the score close throughout the second half. They brought the score to 33-32 with 11 minutes to go in the game.

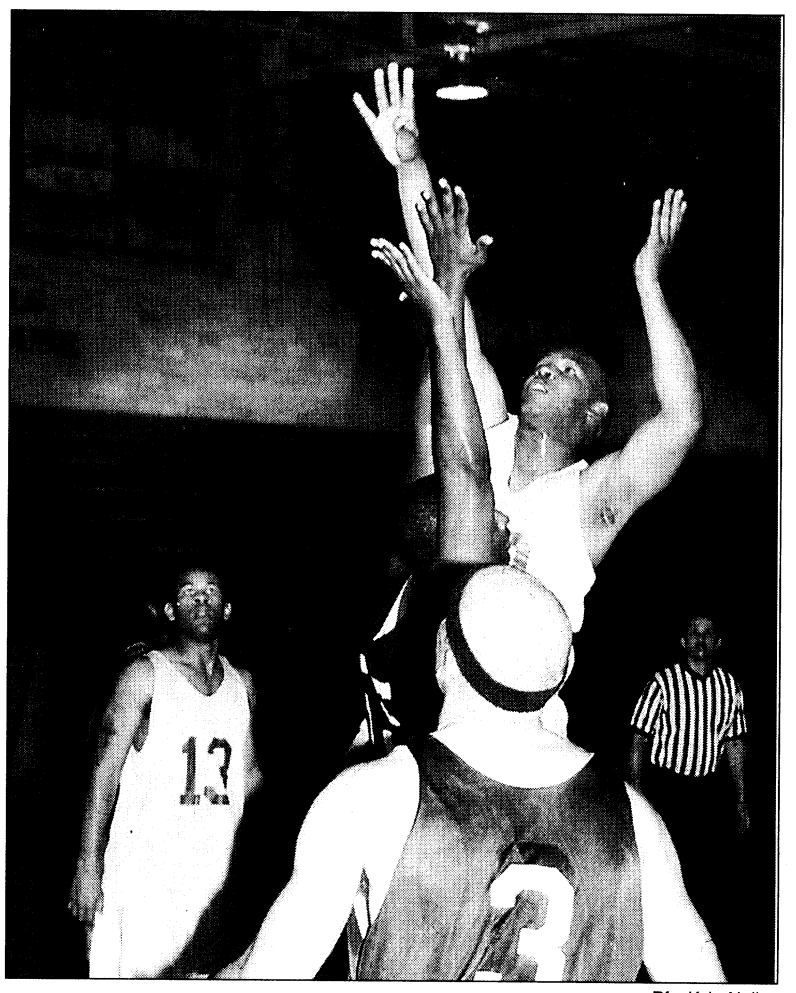
The teams traded baskets each time down the court to keep it close.

Then, with 3 minutes to go in the game, the Outlaws pulled away.

"We won the game when we had to," McLean-Burrell said. "When it came down to crunch time, we got re-focused and took over."

Lewis led the Outlaws with 19 points and Edward Thomas, Outlaws forward, added 12 points.

Freddy Washington, Aces forward, led his team with 11 points and Smith added 10 points.



> "Every team is gunning for us and looking to dethrone us. We'll be ready though. We're the two-time post champs, and nobody can take that."
> Thelonious McLean-Burrell
> Outlaws guard

The Aces will be hungry for revenge at the post-season tournament, which starts later this month.

"We want to play everyone we lost to in the regular season," Garrett said. "You can be sure we'll be bringing our best game."

The Aces are realistic about their chances. They, like everyone else, is looking to beat the post champs.

"We know we have to be careful in the tournament," McLean Burrell said. "Every team is gunning for us and looking to dethrone us. We'll be ready though. We're the two-time champs, and nobody can take that."

Teach kids to golf while their young

Golf tips by the post golf pro, Larry Cruise

Photos by Spc. Douglas DeMaio

"Golf is a good way for parents to spend quality time with their children. It helps parents teach values and morals important for a child's development."

Here are some tips to help bolster children's success in golf:

– A good age for children to begin is when they are old enough to swing a club.

"There are clubs made for kids of the correct height and weight, so don't cut adult clubs because children don't have the strength to swing them and will become frustrated."

– Toddlers to 8-year-olds should begin on the range to learn the fundamentals.

"Show them how to grip the club, keep their eyes on the ball and hit it."

– At the age of 9, kids should start joining programs.

"There are summer programs through youth sports, middle schools usually have programs, and golf courses hold parent and child tournaments throughout the year."

Their are new policies concerning children on the the golf course, so look in The Bayonet for more information.

"There will be a golf seminar for kids and parents Sunday at Riverside during the Easter Eggstravaganza."

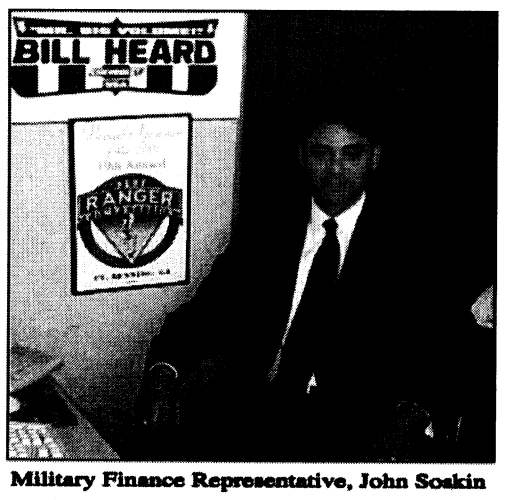
Bill Heard Chevrolet and Military Lenders Offer Loan Programs Exclusive For Military Personnel.

Jimmy Peters, Chief Military Finance Coordinator

Columbus, GA – Mr. Jimmy Peters, Chief Military Finance Coordinator will be hosting a special, exclusive sales event at Bill Heard Chevrolet this week to boost the buying power of military E-1's and up with little or no credit. "We are excited to be able to offer these programs to military E-1's and up with little or no credit and even in some instances problem credit," says Jimmy Peters. "With the various military lenders that we have affiliated ourselves with, we have several programs to fit the unique needs of our military."



These lenders are making it possible for Bill Heard Chevrolet to offer military personnel with little or no credit, and in some instances bad credit, the opportunity to immediately qualify for the new or used vehicle that fits within their budget. Owning a new or used car or truck can become a reality for military E-1's and up with as little as $29 down or $500 down with special low interest rate financing as compared to traditional state ceiling rates charged to E-1's, E-2's and E-3's with no credit history. The added bonus is that these lenders also provide a golden opportunity for the military to establish and in some cases reestablish good credit. With the simple finance terms, military personnel can easily qualify for the new or used vehicle of their choice and save thousands in finance charges! This special event is not available to the general public. ONLY MILITARY PERSONNEL MAY PARTICIPATE!!

Bill Heard Chevrolet has been a proud supporter of our nation's military since 1919, and they are always looking for new ways to help the military finance the car or truck of their choice with the lowest possible interest rates available. Military E-1's and up are no longer forced to buy from small used car note lots that only have a limited number of older, potentially unreliable vehicles to choose from for their next car or truck purchase! You can now buy from a reputable, large-volume dealership no matter what your credit situation! AGAIN, THIS OFFER IS NOT AVAILABLE TO THE GENERAL PUBLIC!!

"We love Fort Benning, says Jerry McLendon, former Vietnam Veteran and 20-year employee at Bill Heard Chevrolet. I know first hand what it's like to be new in the military with no credit and limited options when it comes to getting a new or preowned car or truck. At Bill Heard Chevrolet are always trying to make things better for our military. I feel so good about being able to help an E-1 with no credit get their credit established by buying a new car or truck that they can afford."

These programs provide a great opportunity for military personnel to qualify for car or truck they need to improve their lifestyle and still stay within their budget. As a former Army Captain and member of Special Forces, John Soskin also knows what it's like to be new to the military and to need reliable transportation.

"I remember buying my first car and not knowing how to budget or whether it was the right time to buy. The most confusing part was the financing. With the lenders we have available, we can offer easy financing terms and even help E-1's and up learn what they need to know to become auto savvy shoppers," says John.

Military Finance Representative, John Soskin

Recent partnerships with various military lenders have made it possible for respectable dealers like Bill Heard Chevrolet to offer never-before available alternative financing exclusively to military E-1's and up with little or no credit and in some cases bad credit. These programs remove many of the common roadblocks that occur with junior military personnel when trying to qualify them for traditional financing. Because these lenders finance the military exclusively, they make it their business to offer the best interest rates and easiest terms available.

"It just makes good sense to do business with lenders who have the best interests of our customers as their top priority, says Jimmy Peters. These lenders have a vested interest in making sure that the automobile purchase is a smart buy."

Bill Heard Chevrolet is dedicated to helping the military purchase a dependable car or truck that they can afford without the hassle and disappointment of repeatedly being turned down by lenders or charged inflated interest rates.

If you are military, E-1 and up and you desperately need a quality vehicle, YOU NOW HAVE A CHOICE! YOU CAN SAY NO TO HIGH INTEREST LOANS!! SAY NO TO CHEAP, EMBARRASSING AND UNDEPENDABLE CARS OR TRUCKS!! At Bill Heard Chevrolet, they're saying YES!! With easy, instant approval in most cases, you can shop for the new or used vehicle of your choice and let Bill Heard Chevrolet do what it takes to help you DRIVE AWAY TODAY!!

Soldiers deploy to Kuwait

3rd Brigade to deter Iraqi aggression against neighbor

Sgt. William A. Graves
Bayonet assistant editor

The mission may be to deter Iraqi aggression and train with Kuwaiti soldiers, but another possibility is on the minds of many of the 3rd Brigade soldiers who began deploying this week.

President Bush may call upon them to fight the war on terrorism by invading Iraq and ousting Sadam Hussein from power.

"We're as ready as we're ever going to be," said Pvt. Jeff Bray, an all-wheel mechanic, 203rd Forward Support Battalion. "No one is ever excited about war, but if we have to fight, that's why we're here."

He and others are confident the six-month Operation Desert Spring mission will be a success, but they still have jitters.

"I'm nervous," Bray said. "I don't know what to expect. I'm kind of anxious to get there and get the job done."

The battalion eased much of the apprehension with a vigorous training schedule for the past several months.

"They couldn't have prepared us anymore than they have," Bray said. "We were busy doing something every day. Our leadership has been great."

The Rochester, N.Y., native said the biggest challenge he foresees is the Kuwaiti heat.

"It's going to be a shock to me, but I'm sure I'll be fine," Bray said.

Another challenge many soldiers will face will be the separation from loved ones.

"Being away from my family will be tough," said Pfc. Chris Malay, heavy-wheel mechanic, 203rd FSB.

However, he said he is fortunate to have excellent sergeants who will watch out for his wife, Ethel, and 5-month-old son, Kristopher.

Reaction team identifies targets

Combat training in close quarters requires unity

Spc. Douglas DeMaio

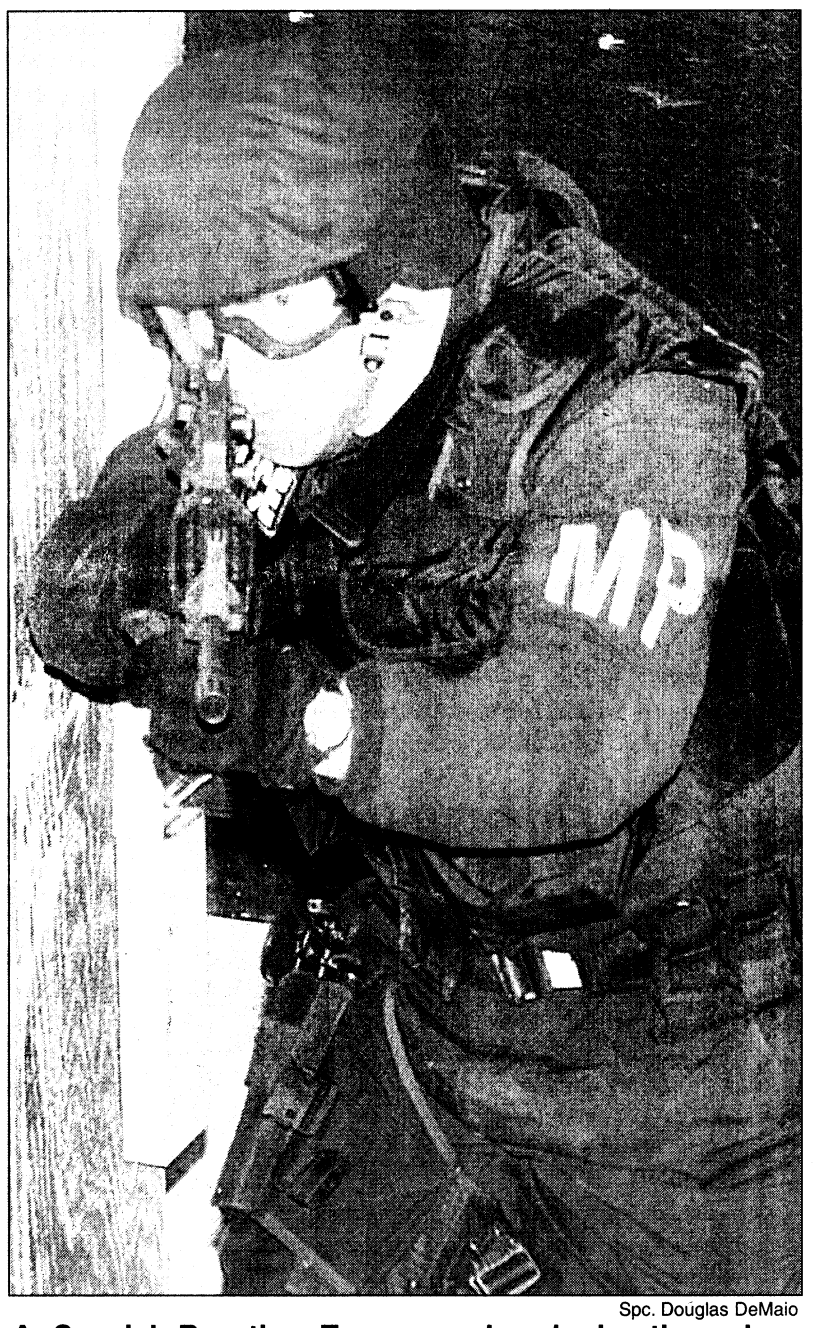
Members of Fort Benning's Special Reaction Team practiced live-fire, close-quarters combat at Brann Range Monday.

The team practiced entering a hostile building in teams of two and five. They tactically moved through each room in the building and identified whether the targets on the wall were friend or foe.

"Within two to three seconds, you must determine if it's a threat and engage it," said Capt. Andrew Sullivan, team commander.

The posters on the wall identified either a person empty handed or one with a weapon.



"It's just like a real world scenario," said Staff Sgt. Kyle Jenkins, team NCOIC. "This is the best training we'll get for this type of mission.

"It allows you to get used to a weapon firing next to you and how people move next to you with live rounds."

Clearing a building can be a very stressful mission, and moving through a hostile environment requires a significant amount of communication, Jenkins said.

The results are in, and Fort Benning, on most counts, is in great shape.

A climate survey ordered by post commander Maj. Gen. Paul Eaton shed light on how soldiers and civilians rate the work environment and quality of life on the installation.

"This is good news, a tribute to the installation," said Lt. Col. Selby Rollinson, Inspector General.

Findings indicate that overall, people are satisfied with their work environment on post, especially civilians. Even more notable is that there was a

MPs enforce Operation Slow Down

Post drivers need to be aware of law

Fort Benning drivers need to slow down.

Speeding is a problem on post and during town hall meetings residents continue to ask the community to slow down.

If Fort Benning drivers do not drive within the speed limit, they will be pulled over by the military police, said Lt. Col. Terry Kelley, chief, Law Enforcement Division, Directorate of Public Safety.

Starting Monday, MPs from the 2145th Garrison Support Unit, 178th Military Police Company with the Georgia National Guard and 157th MP Co. from West Virginia will help patrol the roads, enforcing the speed limits.

"If you are pulled over by an MP, you are subject to a ticket," Kelley said.

Speed limits protect everyone, Kelley said. And in a heavily concentrated population like Fort Benning "excessive speed cannot be justified."

The fines for speeding are:

- 0 to 10 mph over the posted speed limit is $50.
- 11 to 20 mph over the limit is $100.
- 21 to 30 mph is $200, and anything over 30 mph is a mandatory court appearance for reckless driving.

An increase in the number of speeding citations should send a message to all post residents, said Sgt. 1st Class Ken Bennett, Traffic NCOIC, DPS.

"This is a force protection measure," Kelley said. "Remember, we're protecting those who protect the world."

Fort Benning's speed limit in housing areas is 15 mph at all times.

Bank to cancel accounts

Delinquent payments lead to termination

Sgt. William A. Graves

The Bank of America gave a 60-day reprieve on its pledge to terminate its travel card program with the Department of the Army Monday, said Francis Rago, U.S. Army Travel Card Program Manager.

This includes all individual and central billed accounts used to purchase transportation services through commercial travel office contractors.

Bank of America is dropping the Army because of tens of millions of dollars in delinquent accounts among the 415,000 Army travel-card holders,

Madness hampers mission

commentary

It's that time of year again, when we bring out the brackets and see who can pick the winners in the National Collegiate Athletic Association basketball tournament. Something everyone likes to call March Madness.

The atmosphere of NCAA tournament time keeps people glued to their television, even during the working hours. The tournament becomes the topic of conversation all day throughout the office and on lunch breaks.

I'll admit it has been the topic of conversation in our office a lot.

Every half-hour or so, someone mentions the tournament, and we get in a discussion about it.

We bring out statistics we have memorized and talk about how our favorite team is unbeatable.

To make things worse for getting the mission accomplished is when the television is on during the first two rounds of the tournament. Many offices have a T.V., and every few minutes someone gets up to see who's winning or losing.

Like you, I'm very curious about who's doing well.

There's nothing like seeing Ohio State get beat, but we cross the line when the games interfere with our mission.

Out of curiosity, I asked some people if they watched the tournament and how "into it" they are. I asked if they watch college ball during regular season, too.

About 75 percent of the people I asked don't follow college basketball regularly. They don't even root for their favorite team throughout the year. They are what I call tournament-time fans.

Most people expect their team to make it to the finals every year, and when they don't make it or lose in the first round, they wonder why and complain about it.

I was talking to a guy who complained because the University of North Carolina didn't make it to the tournament.

He told me they had at least 20 wins this season. (The Tar Heels only won eight games!)

If most people followed their teams throughout the year, they'd have a better understanding of how their team will fair in "the Dance."

Maybe there was an injury or the star player got in foul trouble or they had some key losses.

Anything can happen in college basketball — another reason not to become a fan of college basketball and your team when tournament time rolls around.

Be a fan throughout the season. Ride the even keel, and maybe the 'Madness' will not lead to more gray hair and, more importantly, hinder the mission.

Here's my tax-free opinion

Bridgett Siter

commentary

Sunday is Easter, the day we celebrate the resurrection of Christ. One of the oldest and most sacred holidays known to mankind.

This year it comes right on the heels of a brand-spanking new holiday of sorts.

Those who worship the Almighty Dollar have proclaimed today and tomorrow a "tax holiday" in Georgia. By sunrise on the third day they hope to see the state's economy resurrected.

It's no coincidence this new holiday coincides with the first major spending holiday of the year. It's sure to turn this religious celebration, already over-commercialized, into a shopaholic's nirvana.

Now I'm not one to complain. I like a tax break as much as the next consumer, and with four children (two of whom absolutely-gotta-have-new-tennis-shoes-please-Mom at this very moment), I know I'll be bumping elbows at the mall tomorrow.

But a quick perusal of the list of tax-exempt items gives me pause. On the surface, it seems reasonable enough — shoes, footwear, school supplies and computer stuff. Everything students and working adults need to succeed. And then some.

But take a closer look:

Aerobicwear and antique clothing are on the list. Reading and prescription glasses are not. Hmmm.

Bandannas are on the list, though students are not permitted to wear them since they can symbolize gang affiliation. Headbands, hair bows and handkerchiefs are not on the list. More hmmm.

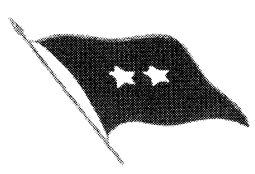
Umbrellas are not exempt, but swim caps are. Your hair may get soaked in the rain, but it'll stay dry in the pool.

Aprons and hair nets — the kind used to keep hair out of food! — are NOT tax exempt, but garters, garter belts and corsets are. I'm beginning to see a pattern of inconsistency here.

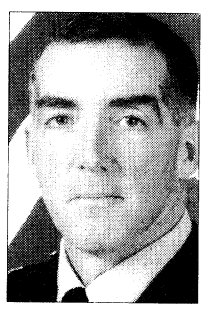
Athletic gear, such as "cups," are not exempt. Bras are. Bathing suits, belt buckles and bow ties are exempt, as are leg warmers, hand muffs (in Georgia?) and tuxedos — as long as you're buying, not renting (in which case they tax the tux).

New shoe laces are tax exempt, but buttons are exempt from the exemption. Scouting uniforms are tax exempt. Sporting uniforms are not.

A whole grocery list of computer accessories are tax exempt — but only for nonrecreational use. Yeah, right. And all sorts of school supplies, as long as they're intended for school, of course. Backpacks are tax exempt if they're used for books, not if they're used for hiking.



Rubber bands are tax exempt, though kids can't carry them to school because they're considered weapons. But staplers are allowed, and they're tax free, too. As is tape ... for school, of course, not gift wrapping.



Now I stand to benefit from this tax holiday as much as anybody, but I can't help but notice the irony that runs through this list like a bad pair of pantyhose — which, by the way, are tax exempt.

So thanks for the break guys. But don't think we don't recognize this tax holiday for what it is — an attempt, a really good attempt, to lure us reluctant shoppers into the highways and byways of commerce. We're on to you.

Now off I go to give the economy a boost and fill those Easter baskets. I'll take two corsets, please, a swim cap and a bow tie. And could you tell me where to find the antique clothing?

Preventing abuse is everyone's responsibility

Children are our future — our most precious resource, the leaders of tomorrow. We need to nurture, protect and defend them and see in them all the promise and hope of our communities and country.

Since 1974, we have been committed by law, by regulation and by action to take an active role in making sure that child abuse and maltreatment are eliminated. Abuse and neglect hurt and injure children now and undermine the potential for leadership and caregiving in the next generation.

Nurturing and protecting are the focus of the family. Yet everyone has a part to play in protecting children and preventing child abuse. Never pass up a mistake.

Our military and civilian professionals have responsibilities to assure the safety of children.

However, the nurture of children requires a contribution from everyone.

Only caring communities can produce caring, competent children and youth. Each child is special and every child deserves the chance to grow and mature and be part of a peaceful world.

Therefore, I declare April Child Abuse Prevention Month at Fort Benning, and call upon all soldiers, families, citizens, community agencies, religious organizations, medical facilities and businesses to increase their participation in our efforts to prevent child abuse, thereby strengthening the community in with we live. Protect our children — our future.

Traffic concerns

I have a concern about the intersection at Dixie Road and the Bouton Heights housing area.

There's a sign that says no left turn from 7 to 8 a.m. and 4 to 5 p.m., during the peak hours. Why isn't this enforced?

— K. Gill
Fort Benning

Directorate of Public Safety response:

This intersection does have a sign prohibiting left turns during the hours listed. Turning left during these times creates a safety hazard. During the past three years, we have run a number of operations to reinforce the prohibition.

Since Sept. 11, our MP resources have been stretched by increased mission requirements associated with access control and force protection. As a result, the coverage of that area has become sporadic.

We now have sufficient personnel, thanks to mobilized U.S, Army Reserve and National Guard units, to allow us to resume many normal operations and will shift our focus to cover that area, off and on, in the coming days to reinforce the need for compliance.

People stopped for this violation are subject to a $25 fine.

Canadians explore opportunities

Night vision gives troops new outlook

Spc. Douglas DeMaio

Spc. Douglas DeMaio

Canadian soldier, Cpl. Andrew Torrance, identifies targets while wearing daytime goggles, which limit his field of view.

Canadians are conducting research on post as part of a U.S. and Canadian training agreement between Dismounted Battlespace Battle Lab and Canada's Defense, Civil Institute of Environmental Medicine called CANUSTEP.

Alongside the Army's Human Research and Engineering Directorate, DBBL, and Night Vision Electronic Sensors Directorate, the Canadian army is determining what is the optimal field of view.

"It is obvious to us and troops that we want to maximize field of view, said Maj. Linda Bossi, the human factors technical authority for Soldier Information Requirements Technology Demonstration. "However, we want to characterize the performance benefit with various fields of view because any increase in the view increases unit cost.

"We want the best bang for the buck."

The Canadian army is in their first week of conducting research on post providing them with an opportunity to train for situational awareness and opening up a window for testing during Canada's cold season.

"We love this place," Bossi said. "Fort Benning is a unique place for the study. It has state of the art facilities to research and capture data. The DBBL staff are incredibly supportive, and the weather is perfect for our research."

Their research is educating them on the performance impact of information technologies, including wide field of view, sensors on individual soldiers and team performance across a range of tasks and terrain environments. Depending on the model and type of night vision a soldier is wearing, the soldier will not have any peripheral vision and will see anywhere from 40 to 95 degrees, which can limit the soldiers vision and disrupt a mission. Soldier experience tunnel vision when wearing night vision goggles, said Sgt. Steve Lamrock, 1st Battalion, The Royal Canadian Regiment.

"If I need to use hand signals, everyone is looking at me, and I have no eyes to the front," Lamrock said. "It affects my command and control."

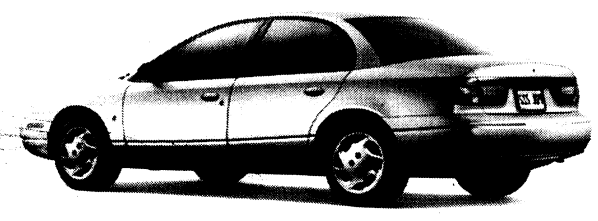
Even though the field of view is limited, the study is still extremely helpful, Lamrock said. The experience gives the Canadian soldiers a greater understanding about the infrastructure of the U.S. military.

"It makes me more versatile," Lamrock said. "I can understand the mentality. On a joint mission, if I need to get something done, it will help me understand who I need to talk with, a corporal, sergeant or master sergeant, to accomplish what needs to be done."

In addition to learning about their NATO allies, the experience so far is allowing the Canadians to gather research and technology concepts.

"We're testing equipment before we purchase it," Lamrock said. "We want to be sure it will be something we can put to use."

This will help the Canadian army spend their money more efficiently to acquire effective equipment, he said.



Their research is part of SIREQTD. Much like the U.S. Army's transformation, SIREQTD is the first phase for the Canadian army to define and validate the performance requirements for the future soldier system by demonstrating capability enhancements in command execution, target acquisition and situational awareness for the individual Canadian dismounted soldier.

In addition to the wide field of view night vision testing being conducted collaboratively between HRED, DBBL and the Canadians, this is the third in a series of experiments being conducted by the SIREQTD project at Fort Benning's DBBL. The Canadian experiments include assessment of navigation performance using 2–D and 3–D maps, auditory and tactical displays and communications with map displays sharing friendly locations.

Weight control reg under review

Changes not expected before 2003

Joe Burlas
Army News Service

WASHINGTON — While the Army is currently reviewing its rules governing the weight control program in Army Regulation 600-9, don't expect to see any changes before fiscal 2003.

That guidance and a message to stick to the current policy were sent to senior noncommissioned officers last week by Sgt. Maj. of the Army Jack L. Tilly in a "SMA sends" e-mail.

"Don't let your soldiers get caught up in the speculation about changes to the program," he said.

"Rest assured that any decisions we make will be driven by what's best for the health of our soldiers and the readiness of our Army."

Last updated in 1986, the latest review was partly prompted by a Government Accounting Office report and a Department of Defense directive for the armed services to get more standardized programs across each. Currently, weight control and physical fitness standards are developed and implemented independently by each service.

Another reason for the review, said Lt. Col. Margaret Flott, chief of the Individual Readiness Policy Division, Office of the Deputy Chief of Staff, G-1, is the Army knows more about health issues and physical fitness based upon medical science than it did years ago.

"When I joined the Army, we did physical training in combat boots and fatigues," Flott said.

"Soldiers no longer wear combat boots when doing PT because we now know that practice is not healthy. Likewise, we now wear appropriate clothing for PT.

"The review of the weight control program is about using established medical science based upon the general (United States) population — information we didn't have 15 years ago when the current regulation was written — and testing it to see what is best for our soldiers and for the Army."

The Army is still in the information-gathering stage of the review, said Lt. Col. Linda Williams, a G-1 Health Promotion Policy staff officer.

The next step will be to field test proposals and practices, she said.

Following the field test, recommendations for any changes will be staffed at both the Army headquarters and major military command levels — a process which could take up to a year — before any changes might be made, Williams continued.

"We are reviewing our current policy to determine whether changes should be made and what they should look like," Williams said.

"Our ultimate objective is to improve the health and readiness of the force."

Soldiers: Leave for Kuwait with thought of war on mind

Thoughts of his family lead to an obvious possibility of Army life — war.

"I'll wonder if we're going to war with Iraq," Malay said. "It's always going to be on my mind. But (being there) will be good for my military career — the pay will be good, and I'll receive some ribbons."

He plans to help the battalion meet its goal of taking care of the brigade and to meet many personnel goals like going to every board, continuing his education, and earning the rank of specialist.

Understanding the importance of the mission helps him cope as well.

"With all the terrorists still in the world, we have to keep attacking them," Malay said.

"If we dropped it, that would mean all those Americans died for nothing. So we'll take care of business if the president calls on us."

Battalion leadership has set them up for success by providing numerous training vignettes prior to the deployment.

"Our leaders had us doing infantry tactics to prepare for this, so, if something happens in the rear, we'll be able to take care of it," Malay said.

Soldiers of 3rd Soldier Support Battalion are ready, too.

"When I first found out I was going — right after 9-11 — I said, 'I'm not ready for this,' but then I reminded myself it is only a rotation, and we'll go do good things," said Sgt. Lasundra McDomick, personnel service NCO.

For instance, she and her soldiers will update soldiers' records when they go to boards and countless other integral personnel actions.

"I'm excited because it will be something new and different, but I'm a little sad to have to leave my son," McDomick said.

She sent Tyreese, 3, to live with her parents in Texas.

"I know he's upset his mom is going to be gone for a while, but he's in good hands," McDomick said.

Spc. LaSonya Thomas' two daughters will have nothing about which to worry, too. Her daughters, LaToya, 16, and Tierra, 7, will stay with her sister, Rhonda Jones, who gave up her house in Arkansas to come take care of the children.

"I'll be able to focus on the mission because she's there," said Thomas, a finance specialist with 3rd SSB.

"I want to get there, do what needs to be done and come back home."

Until then, she and other women will be getting used to the change in environment and dealing with the different culture and customs, she said. Wearing a veil in public and walking behind a male will be strange if they have to do them.

"It should be interesting to see it firsthand," Thomas said. "(Women) are second-class citizens there, and here, we have women in charge of men.

Regardless of the cultural differences, one thing is a sure bet for men and women.

"It's not going to hinder us," she said. "There is a system in place, and it should be easy to step in and continue the mission."

Infantry Industry Day begins on post

Contractors learn road map for Army's future

Spc. Douglas DeMaio
Bayonet staff

Soldiers can be reassured the command staff is taking appropriate steps to meet the needs of soldiers on the battlefield. Defense contractors attended two days of briefings about the direction the Army is heading with its transformation. The briefings are part of this week's Second Annual Infantry Industry Day, which is geared to inform contractors about the Army's needs.

"This gives industry contractors information on where we are with forces development and where we want to go," said Capt. Shawn Jenkins, project officer for the Directorate of Combat Development. "It provides companies with information of where the Army is heading and provides focus to the industry. It gives everybody the same starting page."

Contractors from the industry will leave the conference well informed and ready to provide their companies with information vital to the advancement of the Army, Jenkins said.

Essentially, the dissemination of information and the exchange of ideas provides the industry a road map to follow, said John Spencer, Northrop Gummar contractor.

"The key thing for us is to learn what the user really wants and try to provide that," Spencer said. "If you talk one on one, you can exchange ideas to meet their needs."

The time and activities provided throughout the conference allowed the contractors and the command to collectively exchange ideas, he said.

Collaboration is really what the day is about, Jenkins said.

"We've worked with many of these companies in the past, and we will keep working with them," Jenkins said.

The contractors feel Infantry Industry Day is necessary for the good of the U.S. Army Infantry Center.

"We need to do it every year," Jenkins said. "It's a must to keep the information flowing between us. We really appreciate the center for the opportunity."

The contractors will come back to Fort Benning for the Infantry Conference during the second week of June to display the concepts they have taken from this week.

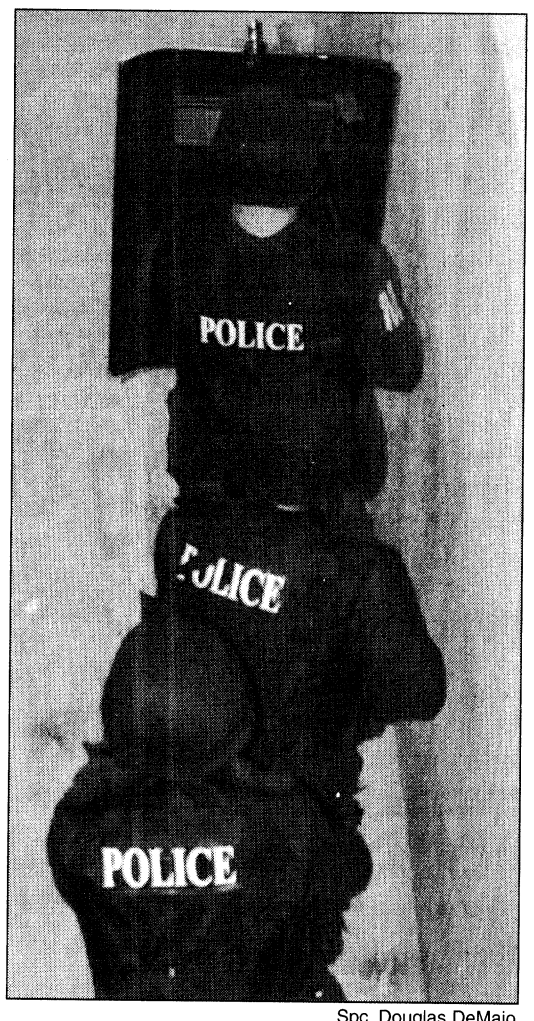
necessary to eliminate the treat is our objective," he said. "Our mission is to preserve life. Training brings more confidence and reassurance with your team. Many of these soldiers have worked with each other for a few years, so we are confident we can depend on the person next to us."

Team members find what they do to be rewarding, said an SRT sergeant.

"I like this kind of stuff," the sergeant said. "I wanted to be part of a team, and this type of training will help me if I need to clear a building in a wartime situation."

Learning how to deal with stress is an important part of the team's mission, the sergeant said. The team focuses on how members who tryout for the team deal with stress during training exercises.



"It's important to see how they respond to stress," he said. "The confusion of battle can be devastating."

All members of the SRT perform their regular duties as military police and meet standards of a highly qualified soldier. They receive a variety of training on things such as hand-to-hand combat and hostage situations among other things.

"They must shoot expert," Jenkins said. "They must have a high Army Physical Fitness Test score. They've all met the standards to be on the SRT."

Overall, the team is trained and ready for whatever lies ahead of them, he said.

"We hope we never have to use it," Jenkins said. "If anything ever happened on Fort Benning, I'm fully confident they would achieve their mission."

Bank: Cancels accounts

according to a March 25 Federal Times article. Delinquencies totaled 15 percent of all DoD dollars owed and 22 percent of all Army dollars owed.

There are 549 delinquent accounts in Training and Doctrine Command, which equates to $448,055 or 5.05 percent, according to March statistics.

Delinquencies should never have became a concern for Bank of America, said Master Sgt. Sally Toomey, NCOIC Public Affairs, who heads to Korea soon.

"I think the real problem is with individuals who don't file correct travel vouchers or who don't pay off the credit cards when they get their (Temporary Duty) settlement," Toomey said.

She has had firsthand knowledge of some misuse of travel cards.

"One young soldier I was sitting next to on a flight from Frankfurt to Atlanta made about 45 minutes of calls on the in-flight telephone," Toomey said. "I tried to mind my business until I saw he was using his government credit card — then I decided to butt-in to save him from himself."

Still, a few bad eggs shouldn't spoil the batch, Toomey said.

"I'd rather not deplete my savings or run up my personal credit cards in order to go to school en route to Korea, but I'm bracing myself for that to happen," Toomey said. "It shouldn't be that way.

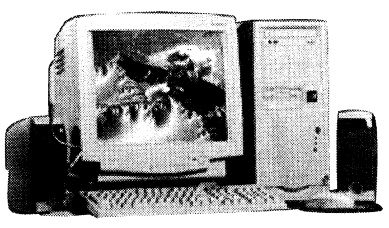
"Instead of cutting off the program, they should give everyone with an overdue account 30 days to pay it or present documentation to explain why it's not paid. If they don't have their ducks in order, collect it from their pay."

To combat the eminent stoppage by the bank, the Department of the Army travel card program manager is preparing a contingency plan for individually billed accounts.

The plan is to allow use of personal funds, including personal credit cards, government travel advances and government transportation requests.

DA is working with the Defense Finance and Accounting Service to determine how people will receive funds.

"The transportation community and DFAS are aware of the issue and are geared up to accept increased requests for (government transportation requests) and travel advances," said Cathy Cone, government travel card coordinator, Directorate of Resource Management.



Most soldiers use Carson Wagonlit Travel in San Antonio for their travel needs, according to the article.

"We will do whatever is necessary to take care of our customers," said Erma Spell, Carson Wagonlit Travel president, in the article. "The biggest inconvenience for us will be delay in payment, and there will be a lot of additional work for us and the Army."

3rd Brigade conducts change of responsibility ceremony

Brigade receives new command sergeant major

Pfc. Brian Trapp
Bayonet staff

A former 3rd Brigade battalion command sergeant major took over the 3rd Brigade Combat Team command sergeant major position March 21 in a change of responsibility ceremony on Sledgehammer Field.

Command Sgt. Maj. Mark T. Baker replaced Command Sgt. Maj. Mark A. Kellman, who had been assigned to 3rd Bde. since May 5, 1999. He will move to Fort Stewart, Ga., to become the 3rd Infantry Division command sergeant major.

"Today is indeed a special day, said Col. Daniel Allyn, 3rd Brigade 3rd Infantry Division, commander. "A diversity of uniforms in our ranks represents the diversity of our missions.

"All the soldiers are ready to deploy today."

"Command Sergeant Major Baker has an impressive biography," Allyn said. "It's no surprise he is now in power as the senior NCO of this brigade."

The transfer to Fort Benning from Fort Stewart, Ga., was a great honor, Baker said.

"It's a great day to be back," Baker said. "This truly is a home coming for me and Tracy (Baker's wife), and I wish Command Sergeant Major Kellman the best of luck."

The brigade is preparing for a deployment at the end of the month to Kuwait as part of an ongoing mission to deter Iraqi aggression.

The sole mission is to take care of soldiers in the brigade, Baker said.

"I am confident the deployment will be safe and challenging," said Maj. Gen. Buford C. Blount, division commander. "3rd brigade is the lead element of the division in supporting America's war against terrorism.

"I appreciate all the support that the surrounding community and Columbus will give to family members left behind during this deployment. The first priority of the mission is to bring everyone back safely."

The soldiers have been working up to this moment through months of training.

"We are preparing for the deployment with tough realistic training, and that's what ensures we will bring the soldiers back," Blount said. "I only ask three things of my soldiers, to give 100 percent, to follow their leaders and to follow the seven Army values."

There have been many improvements to Kelley Hill and the quality of life there, and Baker is committed to continue the progress.

"When I left Kelley Hill in the 90s, the construction had just begun," Baker said. "Now that I'm back, I can't believe all of the progress that has been made. I am deeply rooted in quality of life issue."

Baker is committed to look out for the training and welfare for the enlisted soldiers, too.

"The soldiers put me where I'm at today. I'm nothing without my soldiers," Baker said.

With the help of his soldiers, he is up to the challenge, he said.

"This is an awesome responsibility," Baker said. "This division is the busiest in the Army.

"I've been in it for a long time — so I can say that."

Baker was born in Memphis, Tenn., and entered the U.S. Army Reserve in 1982 as a combat engineer. He later entered active duty in April 1983 and completed basic training and AIT at Fort Benning.

His military education includes Airborne School, Ranger School, Pathfinder School, Drill Sergeant School, Infantry Mortar Leaders Course, Master Fitness Trainer Course.

He also has a bachelor of science degree in liberal arts from Excelsior University of New York.

Among his numerous award and decorations are four Meritorious Service Medals, two Army Commendation Medals, four Army Achievement Medals, the Expert Infantrymen's Badge, Pathfinder Badge, Drill Identification Badge and Ranger Tab.

Baker is married to the former Tracy Townsend. They have two sons, Mark Jr., 18, and Christopher, 14.

Sunshine Road bridge dedicated to ranger

Learns of honor just one day before his death

Bridgett Siter
Special to the Bayonet©

A member of the original Darby's Rangers is being honored with the dedication of a bridge on Fort Benning's Sunshine Road.

Retired Lt. Col. George Sunshine, 85, died March 8, a victim of lung and colon cancer. He learned of the tribute shortly before his death.

"We told Dad on Thursday, the day before he died. He wasn't able to speak, but he squeezed our hands," said retired Col. Michael Sunshine. "I believe he understood."

Sunshine

The senior Sunshine was hand-picked by Maj. William Darby to be the 1st Ranger Battalion's signal officer in 1942.

On the battlefield, Sunshine came to know Darby as a "soldier's soldier," but it was during card games that he came to know Darby as a friend.

"I knew Bill Darby as well as a man knows another," Sunshine said in his memoirs, written in the months preceding his death.

"He was the finest leader of combat soldiers I have ever seen. The troops adored him."

Darby awarded Sunshine a battlefield promotion to first lieutenant and the Purple Heart after Sunshine was wounded during a successful assault on a Vichy French stronghold in North Africa.

Sunshine recounted his experiences in World War II and Korea and his association with the rangers, first Darby's 1st Battalion and later the ranger's 3rd Battalion.

"(Dad's story) doesn't contain heart-pounding battle narrative. He took that with him," his son said. "Like other veterans who experience the anguish of combat, he was reluctant to talk about details."

But Sunshine matter-of-factly recounted the time he and two other rangers encountered armed Germans while scouting the port city of Palermo, Italy.

"There was a small freighter that looked deserted. (It) seemed like a good place to hole up for the night," wrote Sunshine, who was born in Austria and spoke German fluently. "On the deck, I came face-to-face with a German officer carrying a sidearm. I advised (him) that I was the advance party for U.S. troops who would enter the city in the morning.

"My German impressed him — my story didn't.

"He sized the five of us up and pointed out he had a crew of 12. We agreed each of us would hold different parts of the ship to await dawn," Sunshine said. "At the first sign of daylight, U.S. forces rolled into the city, and the German officer surrendered his weapon, crew and ship. This may have been the first time a U.S. ranger ever captured a German ship!"

In 1943, Sunshine was awarded the French Croix de Guerre with Bronze Star — equivalent to the U.S. Silver Star — for routing a large German advance in what he called "my most vivid military memory," but merely "a footnote to my history."

Again, while acting as a forward scout in Tunisia, Sunshine spotted a large number of German tanks assembling for attack and relayed the information to the rangers, who were fighting alongside French troops.

American planes were dispatched to strafe the concentration of German forces, who ultimately retreated.

Sunshine was also awarded the Bronze Star Medal with V Device and Oak-Leaf Cluster, the Purple Heart with Oak-Leaf cluster and a Presidential Unit Citation with Oak-Leaf Cluster.

Survey: Results pave way for future of installation significant increase in job satisfaction for officers, enlisted and civilian personnel than was noted in a work environment study in 1998.

"The bottom line is the work force is more satisfied and happier than then, even with downsizing and other issues that might affect their level of satisfaction," said Tony Ralph, mission systems specialist, Inspector General.

When groups were compared, officers rated higher morale, job satisfaction, level of communication and cooperation than their enlisted counterparts. Officers also rated work demands, rewards, safety and corrective actions more favorably than civilians and enlisted soldiers. What came as a surprise to test administrators was the fact that civilians also rated a higher level of morale than enlisted personnel.

Other significant findings in the work environment category suggest that 24 to 30 percent of the post population feel they have to rely on the "grapevine" or rumors for information pertaining to their job. There was also a perception of the entire work force that availability of resources is more of an issue at the organization level than the installation.

Out of 65 specific quality of life areas, only eight were found to be those which may indicate a need for improvement. Those eight areas include emergency room operations, military pay resolution, the civilian promotion system and family housing conditions. These findings may be of little surprise to those who use such facilities on post, Ralph said.

"I think if we just asked people to list what they consider to be problem areas, the list wouldn't be very different from what we have here," Ralph said.

The survey was the product of a joint effort of IG and the Quality Management Division. Results were gathered from 984 surveys out of 1,100 distributed. The accuracy of the survey was 95 percent.

Respondents answered 119 questions assessing the work environment and quality of life, and some put their personal thoughts on paper. Out of 1,010 surveys returned, 221 had written comments.

"Despite what people think, the comments do get read, and these will be read by General Eaton," said Jane Holder, mission systems specialist, Inspector General. "People taking a survey need to know it's worthwhile to write what they think. They are contributing to the process, and we take their feedback seriously."

"The statements made by people can be real eye-openers for the owners of the policy," Ralph said. The written comments, in fact, will be divided and given to the appropriate organization so they can review and get ideas for improvement or maintaining current standards.

While the survey was used to make inferences about the Fort Benning population, it was not designed to assess the "whys" behind the results. Focused surveys may be the next step in determining the root causes of problems or successes.

"We had so many objectives going into this it's hard to say why," said Ralph, who said the results would be a springboard for responsive action.

The next step was put into action Wednesday when post commanders, sergeants major and directorates were presented with the findings. Eaton encouraged leaders to look internally for problem areas in order to improve them, and welcomed advice from shareholders. He also asked that they develop a reactionary plan to improve or maintain current standards, and to challenge units and organizations that are doing well to maintain their current level of excellence.

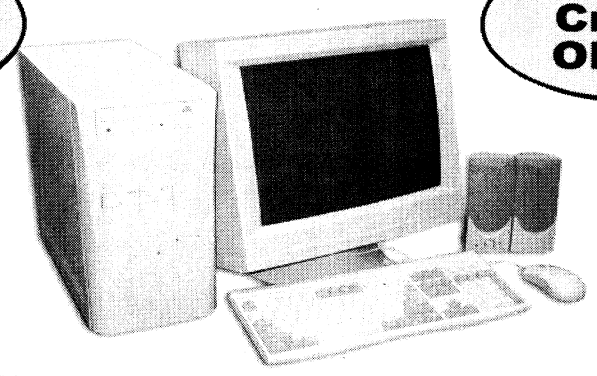
"It's useful for shareholders to have the opportunity to respond to problems," Eaton said. "There's no reason quarters should stay open for weeks while soldiers wait for housing."

Leaders were given one week to identify a course of action as well as their own personal frustrations with barriers that block their unit's progress.

"If I don't know what's important, then I can't salary the people needed to get the job done," Eaton said. "All of you in this room need to make me smart enough to do that. You have your homework."

Quick reaction to the survey is necessary to boost the morale of the organizations, Eaton said.

"Rapid signs of positive change creates a positive spirit," he said. "We will establish long and short term achievable goals for your organizations."



"This is a really great survey," said Chuck Walls, garrison manager. "It feels good to know we've been able to do more with less in the past several years. I'm glad to say we haven't moped around waiting for things to happen, but there are key points that we still need to get out and fix."

"In no way should the results be interpreted as anything but an opportunity to improve," Eaton said. "The most important part of what we're doing is outlining the way ahead. The senior leadership is doing a superb job, and that's the bottom line."

Soldiers learn hand-to-hand combat

Pfc. Chris Stephens

Pvts. Matt Williams, Matt Stiles and Mark Stenger use their hand-to-hand combat skills against one another in a triple-threat match Monday.

Basic techniques, speed key to winning in ultimate battle

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

Learning to fight can be a challenge for some soldiers. For others, it is much needed time to take out their aggressions.

However, for soldiers of C Company, 3rd Battalion, 47th Infantry Regiment, the art of hand-to-hand combat is much different, as they learned March 22.

"It's a chance to really test your skills," said Pvt. Mark Stenger. "It also shows how much we listened during the blocks of instruction."

Instruction is the key in hand-to-hand combat, said Sgt. 1st Class Loren L. Small, drill sergeant. Without knowing the proper techniques and movements for the style of fighting, Brazilian Ju-Jit-Su, soldiers can very easily injure themselves or others.

"It can be very dangerous if not used properly," Small said. "We teach the soldiers the basics, so they know how to defend themselves in an event of an attack."

Positions taught in the basic hand-to-hand combat classes are the mount, guard, side-mount, passed guard, elbow-trap escape and the stand-up bases.

Moves taught that are not allowed to be used are the guillotine choke and the rear-naked choke.

"Some of these moves we teach the soldiers can cause serious injury," Small said. "That's why we tell them what goes on in the pit, stays in the pit."

The company also uses triple-threat matches, where three soldiers all battle one another.

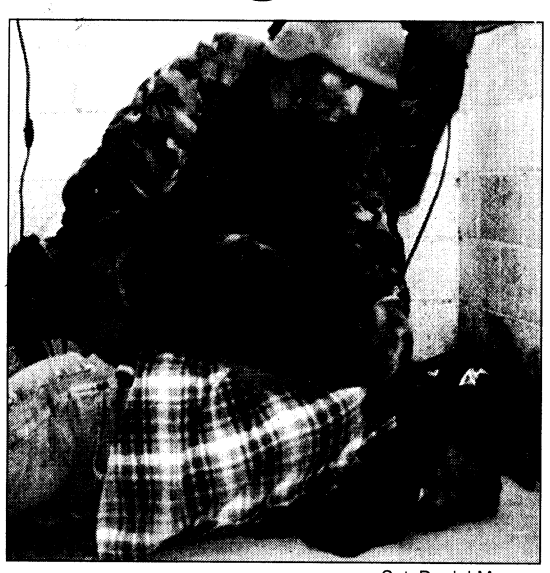
"It gives us a fun way to use our skills," Stenger said. "It's properly supervised, and it lets us go at each other."

When matched up for fights, drill sergeants do not take into account the size of the individuals they are pairing up.

"Using this style of fighting, someone who weighs 120 pounds could easily beat someone who weighs 250 pounds," Small said. "Soldiers have to be quick to react to the moves other soldiers are doing."

Hand-to-hand combat allows the soldiers to test skills they have learned. In the end, the winner of the match is not the soldier who is the strongest. It is the soldier who thinks before he moves and reacts with quickness.

Course challenges WHINSEC students



Instructors emphasize proper bust, arrest techniques

Sgt. Daniel Monroy
WHINSEC PAO

For those on the front lines in the war on drugs, success hinges on making a bust stick in a court.

Considering everything that can go wrong in a drug interdiction operation, Counterdrug Operations Course instructors from the Western Hemisphere Institute for Security Cooperation presented their students with many different scenarios in an attempt to press all the wrong buttons, March 22 at the McKenna MOUT training site.

"Months of investigative work, training and even loss of life are all for nothing if charges are dropped for the mishandling of evidence or improper procedure during arrest and seizure," said Staff Sgt. James Bobadilla, a Counterdrug Operations Course instructor.

Sgt. Daniel Monroy

A student subdues a suspected drug trafficker played by Capt. William Velazquez, instructor.

Throughout the course, students, representing six nations of the Western Hemisphere, are put through stressful situations geared to test their ability to follow proper procedures that are consistent with International Humanitarian Law.

"Their mission tonight is to navigate four clicks (four kilometers) and conduct a recon (reconnaissance) of the site of a suspected drug lord and arrest and detain personnel and confiscate evidence," Bobadilla said.

"Everything they've learned thus far will be scrutinized in this, the pinnacle of the 10-week course, exercise," said Capt. Drew Bayliss, chief instructor of the exercise and officer in charge of training.

"We have volunteers and cadre who are playing the role of drug traffickers, and they've been instructed to act unruly and resist arrest and overall be difficult," said Maj. Gilberto Gonzalez, a guest instructor from Costa Rican National Police.

Students attending the course are trained in operating in both rural and urban environments and rely on each other's strengths as military and police tacticians.

"Our military students usually lead the way in the navigation through the woods to the objective, however, our police students seem to shine in the detention of alleged traffickers and the seizure of evidence," Bayliss said.

"I think it is a good exchange of knowledge between military and police," said Staff Sgt. Jaime Vivanco, a Peruvian army soldier.

With cadre playing observer controllers and actually outnumbering students, critical tasks such as the minimal use of force and rules of engagement seldom escape scrutiny, Bayliss said.

After simulated gunfire was exchanged and the crime scene was secured, Capt. Moriama Vargas, a human rights guest instructor to WHINSEC from Venezuela, playing a "fiscal" or district attorney, conducted an investigation of the crime scene to determine if there was sufficient evidence for the courts and ensured that all the suspects in custody had been explained their rights.

"That is everything in the building," Vargas said as a team of investigators logged and prepared to transport the evidence out of the two-story building.

NCOs learn drill techniques

School gives NCOs test on leadership

Pfc. Kyle Neller
USAIC Public Affairs

Baron Frederick von Steuben would be proud to know his methods of teaching discipline to soldiers are still in good use by the Drill Sergeant Academy 223 years after he wrote the "Blue Book."

Soldiers of the academy conducted training in oral orders, also known as "pitching modules," Monday in front of Infantry Hall.

"A module is a tactful, uniform way of explaining to a new soldier how to perform a drill movement (in an efficient manner)," said Staff Sgt. Ryan Taylor, drill sergeant leader.

There are plenty of modules to learn — 33, in fact, Taylor said.

The NCOs learned how to pitch modules from the positions of attention and rest, and how to teach the proper way to render the hand salute.

"Pitching modules is the best way to teach new soldiers how to conduct proper drill movements," said Staff Sgt. Daniel Denormandie, drill sergeant leader.

"It also reminds future drill instructors of some of the tact and discipline they might have forgotten throughout their military careers."

They also learn how vital every step of every period of instruction is.

"Pitching modules teaches us the minor details to look for when training soldiers," said Staff Sgt. Kenneth Adams, student in coarse.

Given their future recruits lack of experience, keeping lessons simple is also important.

"Modules also teach us how to instruct new soldiers with minimal confusion," Adams said.

This requires tactical and technical skill.

"In order to instruct soldiers, you must first master the principles yourself," said Staff Sgt. Rodney Bogdansky, student in school.

Consequently, the school requires hours upon hours of study time.

"Memorizing modules reminds us of the attention to detail we may have forgotten since our time in basic training," Bogdansky said.

The NCOs perform all training within strict guidelines.

"The best way to train future drill instructors is to put them in the basic training environment in which they will be training their soldiers," Bogdanski said.

The discipline pays dividends.

"After they learn these modules, they will know drill and ceremony better then anyone in the Army," Denormandie said.

Travel for health care may be reimbursable

Tricare Prime to repay beneficiaries

Maj. Patrick Barrett
Martin Army Community Hospital

Tricare Prime enrolled beneficiaries referred more than 100 miles from their primary care manager for specialty care may be eligible to have their actual travel expenses reimbursed by Tricare. Under provisions of the 2001 National Defense Authorization Act, travel reimbursement is retroactive to Oct. 30, 2000.

Martin Army Community Hospital is responsible for ensuring a valid referral exists before issuing travel orders. After Tricare approves the referral, MACH will mail a travel order to the beneficiary, which authorizes the travel.

Save all travel receipts.

Upon completion of care, the beneficiary must go to the Resource Management Division at MACH, Building 9203, Stairwell C, and Room 205 for assistance in completing the settlement paperwork.

The beneficiary must fill out an SF 1164 and provide receipts, a copy of the Tricare referral and authorization and travel order.

Packets can be mailed to Resource Management Division, ATTN: MCXB-RMB, USA MEDDAC, 7950 Martin Loop, Fort Benning, GA, 31905-563.

Beneficiaries will receive reimbursement after completing and submitting these items. For all retroactive claims, beneficiaries must report to Resource Management Division with all receipts and a copy of the referral to file the claim.

The new Tricare Prime enrollee travel entitlement does not apply to travel expenses incurred by active- duty services members, active duty family members residing with their sponsors overseas, or to travel costs of beneficiaries referred under Department of Defense specialized treatment programs, which are reimbursed by other travel entitlements.

Additionally, it does not apply to transportation expenses resulting from emergency care covered under the basic Tricare Standard benefit.

The 2002 National Defense Authorization Act, signed into law by President Bush in December authorizes travel orders and reimbursement for one non-medical attendant, under certain conditions. Tricare Prime enrollees who travel with a nonmedical attendant should save travel and lodging receipts for themselves and the nonmedical attendant.

The projected implementation date for the new nonmedical attendant travel benefit is in the next several weeks. This benefit is retroactive to Dec. 28, 2001.

Exercise tests reactions of Benning agencies

Bus drivers participate in MP training

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

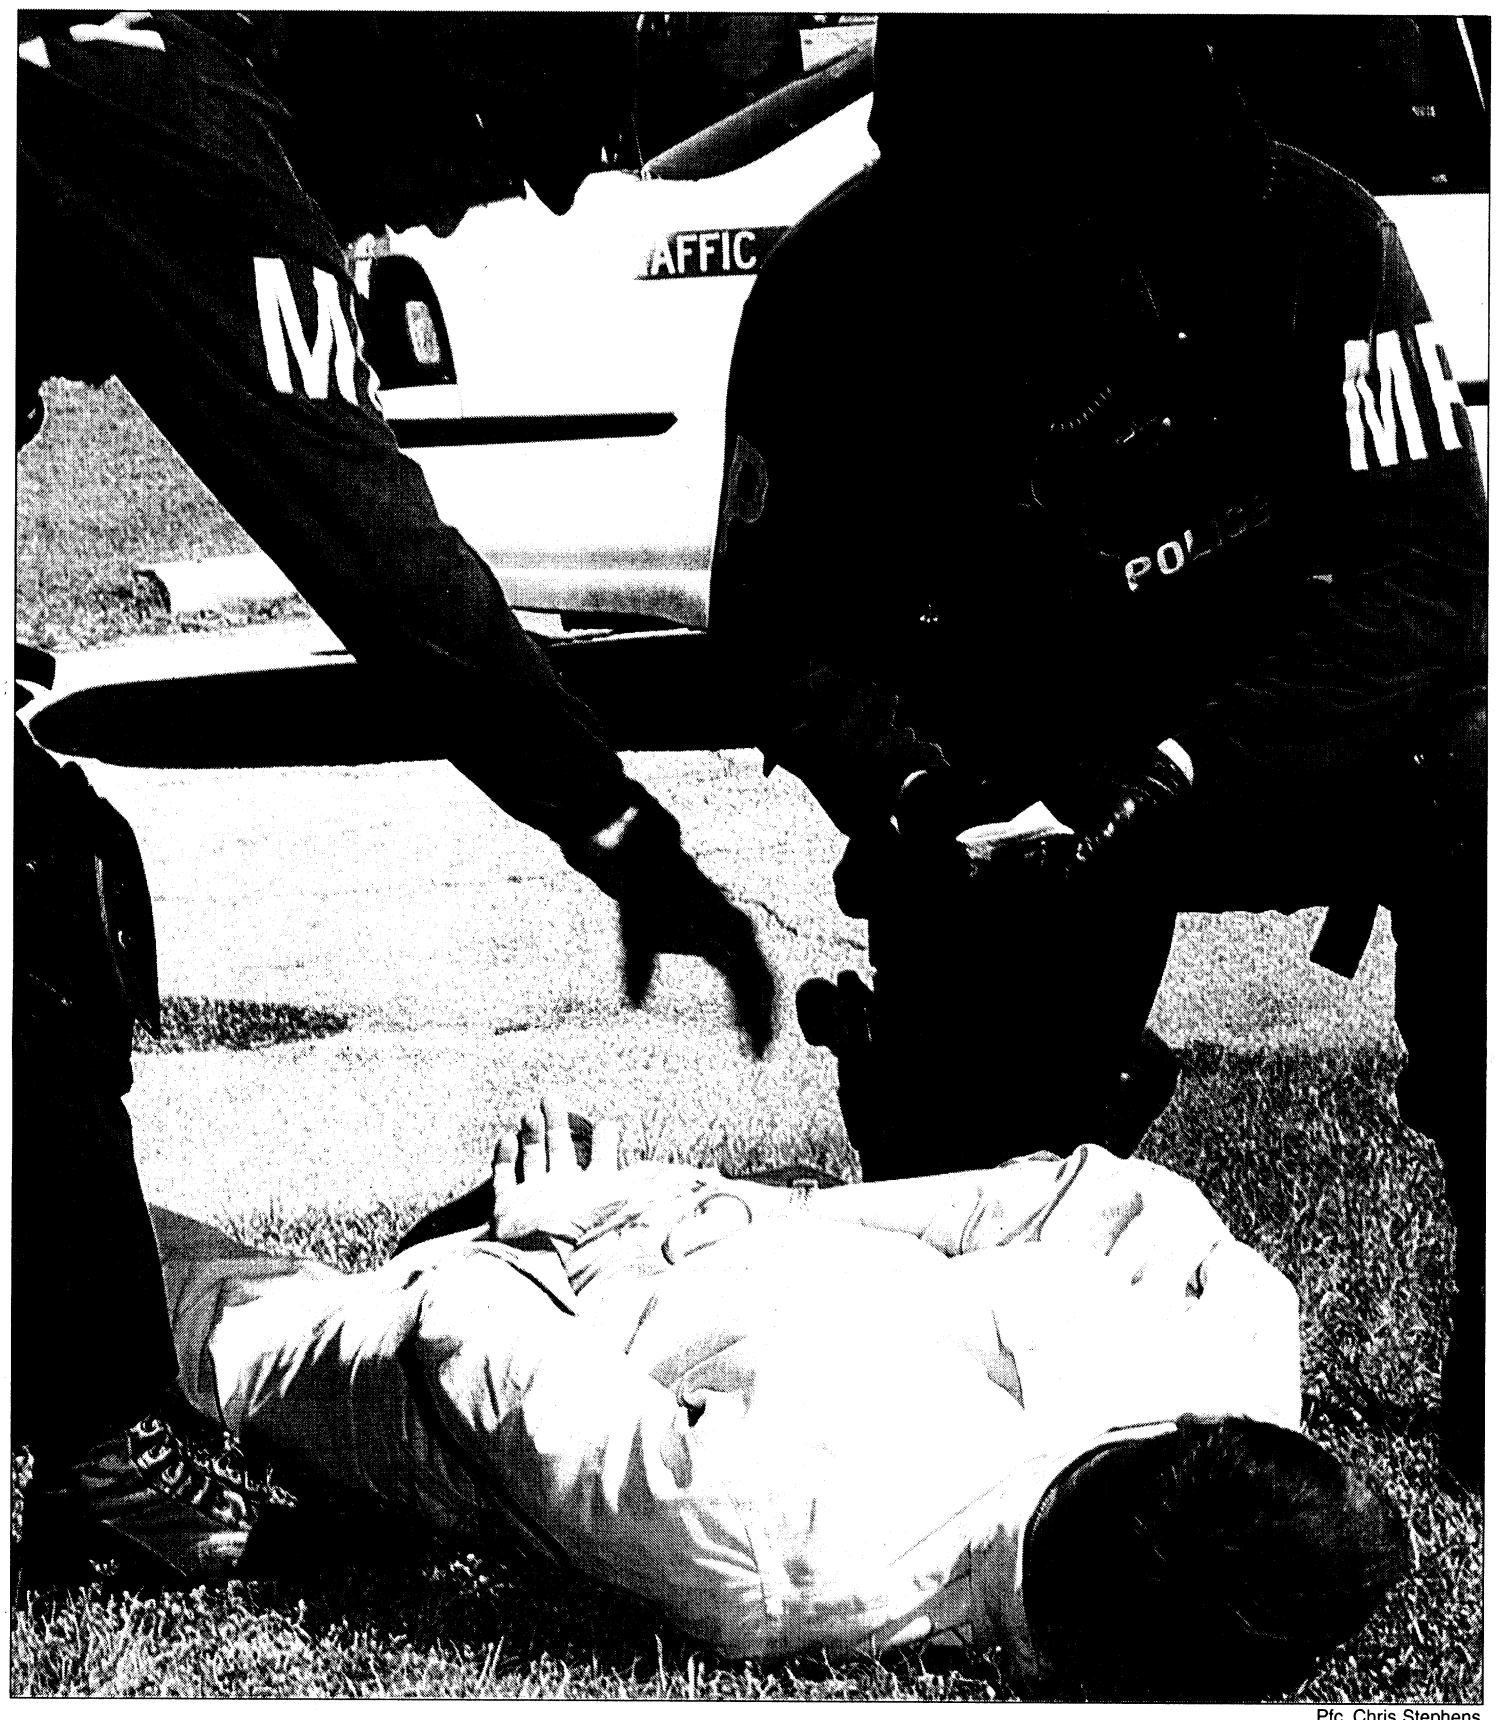
The situation is hostile. The culprit is armed and dangerous, and he's willing to do whatever it takes to get his way.

The bus drivers of the Fort Benning School System experienced this situation March 22, during a military police training exercise, which included all MPs on duty at the time.

"The exercise was held to provide a realistic situation for our MPs," said Capt. Matt Millar, who played the bad guy. "We wanted to see how the different agencies and our MPs would respond during this kind of situation."

The scenario involved a man hijacking a school bus with his daughter on it. The daughter was actually one of the Fort Benning Schools bus drivers. The other passengers were also bus drivers.

The hijacker complained his wife was not letting him see his daughter, and he just wanted to get his daughter off Fort Benning so he could see her.



He told everyone everything would be alright once he and his daughter were off Fort Benning.

But, things took a sudden turn for the bad guy.

Just as the bus was about to go past the front gate, a road block was in place to stop the bus. Thus, the hijacker demanded the driver to turn the bus around and look for another exit.

After the bus was turned around, the MPs pursued.

Tax-free holiday helps

Shoppers, on your mark!

Local venders expect a boom this weekend, as shoppers race to take advantage of Georgia's "tax holiday."

The state's general assembly and Gov. Roy Barnes declared today and tomorrow a tax holiday on most clothing and computer purchases under $100.

That means Fort Benning shoppers, who've always enjoyed tax-free shopping at post facilities, can, for a short time, venture out and still save 7 percent in state and local taxes.

Sgt. 1st Class Tom and Karen Nichols are expecting their fourth daughter. Karen said they'll take advantage of the holiday to stock up on baby items and children's clothing.

"We were shopping last weekend when I saw the ad about the tax-free shopping, so we decided just to wait," Karen said. "I'm definitely going. I just hope the crowds aren't too bad."

Barnes signed the sales tax holiday into law earlier this month, hoping to boost the state's struggling economy. A second tax holiday is scheduled for Aug. 2-3.

The tax exemption applies to clothing, footwear and certain accessories priced no more than $100 per item, general school items up to $20, and the first $1,500 of a personal computer purchase. Computer accessories are included if they are bought

Conference to bridge gap

Child advocates gather for training to prevent abuse

Laura Martinson
Special to the Bayonet©

In recognition of Child Abuse Prevention Month, the Fort Benning Family Advocacy Program will sponsor Children First in the Community that Cares, a three-day training conference that brings professionals from the tricommunity together to increase knowledge that helps prevent child abuse.

"An effective program begins with training for professionals involved in the arena," said Rebecca Welch, Family Advocacy Program Manager. "Those who train together have greater understanding of the systems, family, community, available services, and the challenges that face civilian and military families."

"This training helps the people who work with the victims of child abuse be the best they can be, to discover ways to help families through networking, and most importantly, to help the child," said Joanne Cavis, University of Georgia Extension Service. The school offers continuing education units for all licensed professionals who participate.

The conference is the fifth of its kind since the program's beginning in 1990, and was designed as "multi-disciplinary training for the purpose of developing an integrated community response model that would decrease abuse of children," Welch said.

The training helps bridge the gap between the communities, Welch said.

"Because there are so many military families living on and off post, the communities need to be able to work together and draw on the other's resources," she said.

Nearly 100 Fort Benning professionals typically attend the training, and the families of the post benefit from the knowledge gained.

"Every individual in the Fort Benning area has a special role to play in improving the welfare of our children," Welch said. "Whether or not you work directly with children…you too can make a difference in the life of a child."

The conference will be at the Columbus Convention Center, 801 Front Street, April 5-7.

To register, call Welch at 545-7517.

Community responds to neglected pets

Neighbors are reporting at-risk pets

Laura Martinson
special to the Bayonet©

The Fort Benning community is up in arms, and for all the right reasons. The public responded with an immediate outpouring of concern to the recent case of Kane and Foxy, two dogs found neglected in a post residence in February.

"We have gotten an amazing amount of feedback from the community," said Melissa Locke, receptionist for the Vet Clinic. "People are more aware of what's going on around them. We get phone calls every day from people asking about the pets in their neighborhood. They want to know what they can do about animals being inhumanely treated."

The reaction comes after the dogs were surrendered to the Vet Clinic, one of them suffering from life-threatening malnutrition. For the post community, news of this magnitude is rare, but is definitely out there.

"Calls about stray animals and pet neglect is a constant," said Sgt. Joe Cooper, community life NCO for West and East Main Post and Indianhead Terrace, who said that abandoned cats are one of the biggest pet population problems. "We need a plan to get these pets into good homes."

The community life NCOs, the vet clinic and animal control all work hand-in-hand on a daily basis to help alleviate the problem, Cooper said. But they rely heavily upon information from the residents who live in and observe the communities closely.

"We are the community informers, and it's up to us to let the post command know how the communities are doing," he said. "It's the people who actually live there every day who can tell us what's going on."

Once a community life officer is notified of a potential at-risk pet, they notify the vet clinic and animal control, who take the appropriate measures to ensure the safety and health of both the animals and people involved.

Such measures include notifying military police and the soldier's chain of command for further action taken against the abusers.

> "The main idea is to get the owners to surrender the pets so we can find them a better home."
> Pfc. Carlos Balderas,
> Fort Benning's only animal control technician

"We try to do as much as we can to rectify these situations," said Pfc. Carlos Balderas, Fort Benning's only animal control technician. "The main idea is to get the owners to surrender the pets so we can find them a better home."

Balderas is only three weeks into his new job, but said that in that time, there have been several instances where abused pets were taken from their home and adopted in less than one week, and eight dogs were adopted at the Easter Eggstravaganza Saturday.

"The animals at the vet clinic are well fed and well taken care of, but to see them go to good homes is awesome," he said.

The vet clinic has limited capacity, and if the number of animals exceeds living space, some will be euthanized.

Whether or not an animal gets confiscated from the owner depends upon the severity of the living conditions, Balderas said. Besides responding to the daily animal control calls his job requires, he's been policing the neighborhoods on post, one by one, to ensure that animals are given proper food, water and shelter. He believes his persistence will encourage residents to provide proper care for their pets if they're not already doing so.

"If residents are given a warning, they need to fix the problem, because I'm going to follow up and make sure that they did," Balderas said.

"We want everyone within the community to be on the same sheet of music," said Cooper, who said discrepancies in the care of pets and property often result in a courtesy inspection. "We just want all the neighbors to get along, and have a healthy, relaxing place to live."

Benning marks child abuse prevention month

Rebecca Welch
Family Advocacy Program

April is Child Abuse Prevention Month in the Army and this year's theme is Keeping Our Children Safe in Difficult Times.

The Army Community Service Family Advocacy Program will be sponsoring several events during the month of April in observance of Child Abuse Prevention Month and Month of the Military Child.

April 1-30 — The Army Family Advocacy Program at Fort Benning is joining many state and national organizations in a campaign to "get people to show their true colors" as part of Child Abuse Prevention Month in April. The Family Advocacy Program is a specialized prevention program which focuses on child and spouse abuse.

April 1-30 — Blue ribbon campaign: Blue ribbons will be distributed on and off post and adults are asked to wear a blue ribbon throughout the month of April, to symbolize the fight against child abuse and neglect. In the spring of 1989, Bonnie Finney, a Norfolk, Va., grandmother, took a stand against child abuse when she tied a symbolic blue ribbon around her van. It was a signal to her community of her personal commitment to involve everyone in the battle to stop child abuse. Bonnie's own grandson, Michael Wayne "Bubba" Dickenson, was a victim of child abuse.

Can one person make a difference? Bonnie Finney did! The Blue Ribbon serves as a constant reminder to fight for the protection of all children.

Wear a blue ribbon in April to support children. Put one on the car, give one to a friend, and tell him or her what it means. Knowledge may save a child's life.

Blue Ribbons can be picked up at Soldiers' Plaza Building 2624 or 2625 and at in Martin Army Community Hospital.

Family Advocacy has coordinated with the Child Development Centers and Youth Services to have educational materials available for parents and children throughout the month.

There will be a display table set up in Building 2624 with free educational materials for parents and coloring books for children throughout the month of April.

For more information, call 545-3344.

Hijacker: Takes bus, training tests reaction

There was an MP at every intersection to join the chase.

Finally the MPs stopped the bus and surrounded it, placing a car in front and two cars behind the bus.

The MPs didn't know it was a training exercise until shortly after they had visual contact with the bus, said Capt. Andrew Sullivan, the officer in charge of Fort Benning's Special Reaction Team.

"We wanted to have them treat it as if it were a real-life situation, and they did," he said.

However, the situation didn't end when the bus was stopped.

The hijacker refused to give up. He demanded a soda and a helicopter and threatened to shoot hostages.

When the hijacker's demand for a helicopter was not met within 30 minutes, he fired a single shot in the air.

It was the last straw for the MPs. They could not wait any longer for this hijacker.

Suddenly, a small explosion went off beside the bus and before the hijacker knew it, the MPs stormed on board.

There were MPs on the outside of the bus pointing their weapons at the hijacker, and there were MPs on the bus telling everyone to keep their heads down.

The MPs caught the hijacker and dragged him off the bus. The hijacker was searched, handcuffed and read his rights.

"The whole situation felt pretty real," said Carolyn Jones, Fort Benning bus driver.

"It was a great learning experience. I now know if this situation happens on my bus, the main things to do are to stay calm, keep the children calm and absolutely do what we are told."

By following these three guidelines, the bus driver allowed the different agencies to do their part in helping control the situation.

The agencies involved were the school system, Criminal Investigations Division and Directorate of Public Safety.

The mission was an invaluable learning tool for all involved, Sullivan said. Although, the situation was for training purposes, it was treated as a real-life situation.

"It's like the old-saying goes, 'train like you fight and fight like you train,'" he said.

Taxes: Suspended

with a computer base unit.

There is no monetary limit on the purchase amount, as long as no single item exceeds the tax-free dollar limit.

Though Georgia's Department of Revenue expects an estimated $11 million loss in state tax money during the four days, local merchants say they'll likely see an increase in the already strong Easter shopping season.

"Normally sales are up this weekend anyway," said Shirley Jenkins, a manager at the Columbus Target. "We're expecting even more this weekend. We're bringing in more team members and putting out as much product as possible."

For a complete list of tax exempt items, log on to the Department of Revenue's Web Site at www.gatax.org.

The Bayonet's

feature teacher

Bridgette Colburn
a sixth-grade science teacher at Faith Middle School

Personal: Colburn was born in Jamaica and moved to New York with her family when she was 4.

She met her husband, Sgt. 1st Class Tom Colburn, while teaching in New York.

"We started out as pen pals, actually. I was teaching seventh-grade science and he was in Montana training the Guard," Colburn said. "I was teaching my kids about technology and Tom was working with the Bradley. I knew that was a practical application of technology, so my students interviewed him via the Internet.

"Seven periods of seventh-graders interviewed him. I thought it was really special that he was willing to give up so much of his time for them.

"After that we kept up our correspondence and became really good friends."

The couple have a 3-year-old son, Ethan.

"He's a joy," Colburn said. "He's adventurous and curious and eager to learn. He's a very happy boy.

"He's also head-strong and willful. Those are the traits he got from his father."

Education and career: Colburn completed her graduate studies at City College in Manhattan.

"All through school, even when I was younger, people kept telling me I should be a teacher, but I resisted," said Colburn, who comes from a family of educators. "I thought I wanted to be a doctor or nurse, but someone told me I should work in a hospital for a while before I made up my mind. Well I did, and I knew medicine wasn't for me."

She decided to teach until she could make up her mind what she really wanted to do.

"By the end of that first year, I knew this was it," she said. "Since I was involved in medicine to start with, most of my credits were in science. I love science, so teaching it was a natural."

Hobbies: "Reading is my first love, especially folklore," she said. "And I love children's books. My all time favorite book is The Secret Garden.

"I like to read Dr. Seuss with my son, or Winnie the Pooh. I guess I'm drawn to the world of enchantment."

Colburn also enjoys gardening and cooking.

"I love to create in the kitchen, but I have a hard time sticking to recipes," she said. "I'm always adding to or taking away. Maybe that's why I like science. I like to experiment and discover new things."

On being married to the military: "Tom's retiring June 1, but I'm still relatively new to this whole way of life. It took some getting used to," she said.

"This is only the second place I've lived after New York. I had no idea what military families go through. I have a lot of respect for the women and families of soldiers. It's a hard life."

Plans: "When Tom and I were pen pals, we started writing a children's book," Colburn said. "Maybe now that he's retiring we can finish it. It's something we've both wanted to do for a long time."

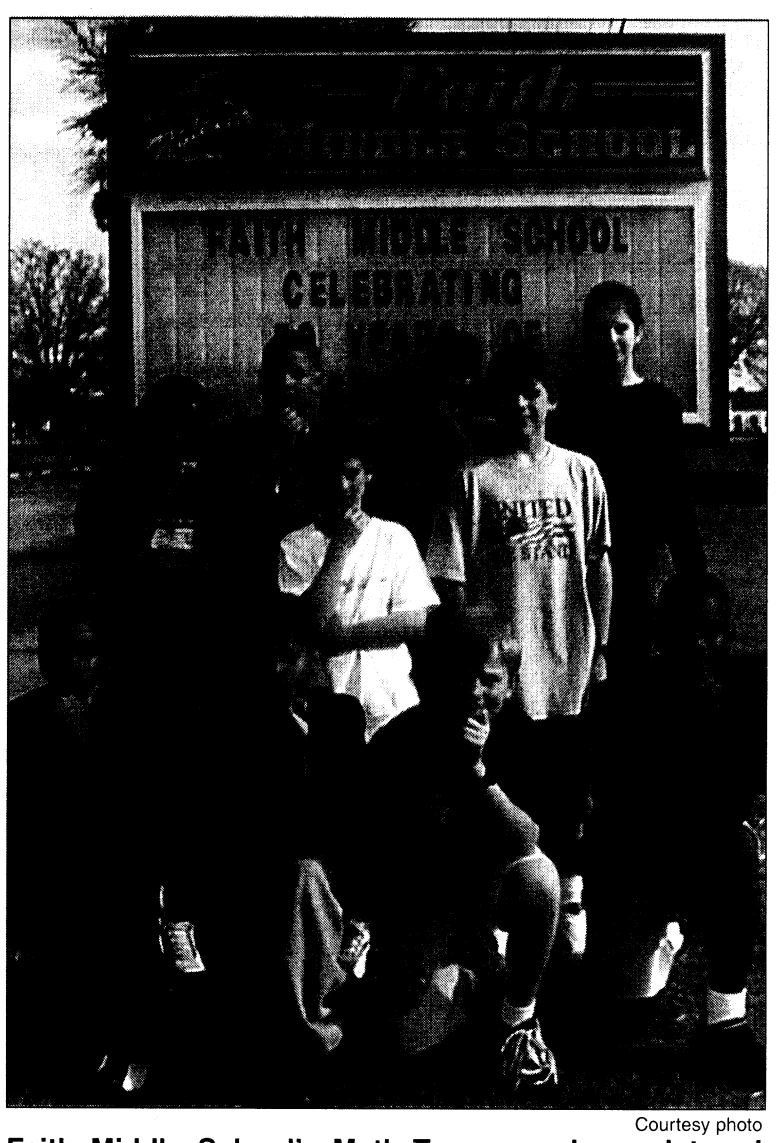
Middle-schoolers prep for math tournament

Ciphering round requires fast responses

Faith Middle School

What is the sum of the prime factors of 910? Ask any member of the Faith Middle School Math Team and they can explain the problem and help you find the answer.

This is just one of the types of math problems the team is practicing to get ready for the Muscogee County Math Tournament.



The tournament is May 4 at Richards Middle School in Columbus.

Team members will compete independently in the written portion of the contest, then in pairs on the section of the contest called the ciphering round.

In the ciphering round, which takes place in front of spectators, partners work together to solve a math problem in less than 90 seconds.

Awards are given to the three highest scoring teams; the 25 highest scoring individuals; the highest scoring sixth, seventh, and eight graders; and the highest scoring individual from each school.

Have you figured it out yet? The answer to the problem is 27.

Student work

This poem is about that awful day of Sept. 11, and if you knew the way everything would end up, would you tell everyone, or just let history take its course?

Holly Bellamy

If we could bring back that tragic day,
Of September eleventh,
What would you say?
Who would you kiss and hug,
Or would you just stand tall and shrug?
If you knew that this were to be,
Would you warn people,
Or stand back and see?
That awful day hurt and caused pain,
Would you stop it
Or let those hearts stain,
With the feelings of sadness, loneliness,
And fear.
I guess what it all comes down to is,
Would you yell out the call?
Or would you let the twin towers still fall?

The Legend Of Mekoe's Careless Decision
Kaiti Colvin

Back when the earth was still young, there was an "ordinary" family. This family had a mom and a dad, two brothers, and a sister. Everyone in this family was special in some way, except for Mekoe. Mekoe's mother was an Amazon Queen; his father was a god, his brother an elf, and his sister a nymph. Alas, Mekoe was nothing special, nor could he do anything special. He was the youngest of his family and was constantly teased and taunted by other young mythological creatures. Even the mosquito looked down upon him.

One day Mekoe was so fed up with everyone; so he decided to run away. He ran far across the country where he met an old woman named Loké. Loké's eyes looked as if they could read Mekoe's eyes like a book. This intimidated him a little, but they soon became fast friends.

As Mekoe was "unraveling" his problems to Loké one night she said, "Mekoe, I can make your dreams come true. I can make you powerful. I can make you a god or an elf."

Mekoe was ecstatic.

"What's the catch?" Mekoe asked.

"You have to give me something of value," she replied.

"Like?"

"How about all your memories for the ten minutes before I grant your wish?"

Mekoe took no time to think and agreed at once.

"What is your wish, Mekoe?" she asked him.

"I wish for immortality," he snapped.

With that Loké smirked, was gone, and was never seen again.

In the forest Mekoe wandered aimlessly for all eternity, for he was immortal, but this he didn't know. So he wandered for the rest of his life, not knowing where he was, and not knowing that he was indeed special.

AAFES recognizes student excellence

New program offers reward for grades

Army and Air Force Exchange Service

For many years Army Air Force Exchange Services has used the "Recognizing Student Excellence" program to reward the scholastic efforts of dependents of authorized customers.

To further these efforts, AAFES has "reinvented" the program with a significantly expanded scope.

The new student recognition program will also have a new name: YOU MADE THE GRADE!

Qualifying students will now have the opportunity to earn more than $50 worth of discount coupons for their favorite brands as well as a chance to win up to $5000 in U.S. Savings Bonds.

AAFES Exchanges will offer a coupon book containing more than $50 in discount coupons, along with an entry form for a quarterly drawing for three savings bonds to students in grades six through 12 with an overall average of a B or higher.

The program is designed to provide an incentive for kids to not only stay in school, but to excel.

Participating students must be in grades six through 12 and attending a public or private school, to include DoDDS. If a child is home-schooled, the student should provide written affirmation of their scholastic aptitude from a parent or other community-authorized education provider. Students must present a valid ID card and proof of an overall B average or better in order to participate. Students may receive one coupon package for every grade report they receive, but may enter the savings bond drawing only once per calendar quarter.

Each coupon package described above will contain an entry form for the savings bond drawing which the customer will mail to an address pre-printed on the form. Drawings will be held quarterly from among all of the entries received by the close of the preceding calendar quarter.

Coupon books are obtained in two ways. For those students attending school on Fort Benning, coupon books will be provided directly to qualifying students with their report cards.

Qualifying students that attend schools off post can obtain these coupon books by bringing their current report card and their military ID to the Main PX management office.

Christian faith based on truths

Easter is time to celebrate Jesus' death

Chaplain (Lt. Col.) Dan Taylor
USAIC Chaplain Office

Easter is the day in the Christian church. The resurrection of Jesus from the dead is the one thing that most dramatically sets us apart from all other religions.

Scoffers have tried to disprove it, and doubters have sought to discount it, but the resurrection still remains the singular event that sets the Christian faith apart from every other faith.

In his book A Thing Incredible?, Bill White reminds us about one of the overlooked details of this wonderful story: the stone in front of the grave of Jesus Christ, who is the risen savior.

It was an enormous rock, specially placed in front of the tomb of Jesus to keep predators, animals and burglars out.

It was secured by Roman guards and the seal of the local Roman governor to keep the faithful followers of this man, from the town Galilee, away as well.

It was specifically designed to make unauthorized access into the tomb very difficult.

The tomb was cut into the rock in such a way that the stone would properly secure it. The stone was placed in a track and rolled on a downward slant to the face of the tomb.

Taylor

To get inside of it, you would have to get past the guards and figure out a way to move this huge rock up and away from the front of the tomb.

Why was the stone moved? Not, as one children's book says, so Jesus could come out. It was removed so that others could see that Jesus wasn't there.

When the stone was moved, the guards scattered and the seal was broken.

It wasn't just rolled away, but it was lifted up over and out of the track in which it had been placed.

It was as if it had been tossed aside. Just as God invaded our world in a spectacular way at the birth of Jesus, he intervenes in a more spectacular way to show the world his most unique miracle yet.

The disciples and the world at large could see plainly what God had done.

The tomb is still open, so go see for yourself that he is not there.

God does not move in secret or do things that are hidden from our view.

There are no secret books, hidden codes or mysteries of truth made available only to a chosen few.

There are no secrets to unlock.

The Christian faith isn't some kind of tall tale that a few people concocted in a back room somewhere and made public in hopes of duping gullible people.

It is a faith of facts and events that happened in real places and in real time that are open to our inquiry and investigation. Faith for the Christian is not belief in things that cannot be demonstrated otherwise. It is trust in the God that is able to make incredible things happen.

Look — the stone is tossed away. The angel inside said we are mistaken to look for the Lord there. He is risen!

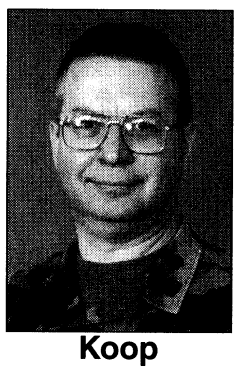
Discipline should be positive

Corporal shouldn't be major form of punishment



Chaplain (Maj.) Raymond Koop
Family Life Ministries Center

That didn't hurt," my 7-year old daughter taunted. I got down at her level and gazed intently into her eyes.

"I didn't spank you to hurt you," I replied ruefully. "I spanked you so that you would remember not to do it again."

That was the last time I used the palm of my hand on her posterior. I have never again resorted to corporal punishment.

Unfortunately, some parents use corporal punishment as their only form of discipline.

Koop

"If you do that again, I'm going to whip the living daylights out of you!"

They inflict pain as if it were the only means of punishment for their children.

Discipline means to disciple. Parents serve as role models to their children, and they should model the proper behavior desired in their kids.

Mentoring, coaching and counseling demonstrate positive discipline methods. Rewarding positive behavior, praising our children and encouraging them promotes right actions in our kids without resorting to corporal punishment (Ephesians 6:4).

Stating an obvious fact frequently stops misbehavior and promotes good behavior. Statements like, "Sofas are made for sitting, not rough housing or jumping up and down."

"If you want to jump, jump outside," informs the child what they are doing wrong, and tells them what they need to do to make it right.

Natural consequences usually suffice. Here are some examples: If you spill it or make a mess, clean it up. If you open it, close it. If you use it, put it away. If you get it dirty, clean it. If you want friends over, first clean your room.

If you would like to explore alternatives to corporal punishment, contact the Chaplain Family Life Center.

Bulldawgs win tournament opener

Free throws, inside game advance team

Spc. Douglas DeMaio
Bayonet staff

Tournament time is here and the Bulldawgs of B Company, 1st Battalion, 29th Infantry Regiment, are ready to roll. They stormed past the U.S. Army Medical Department Activity Bulldogs 42-32 Monday night in the first round of tournament play at Briant Wells Field House.

The Bulldawgs lead by as many as 15 points with less than two minutes to play, but the Bulldogs ended the game with a 6-point run to make the score look respectable.

"I think we have a good team," said Desmond Williams, leading scorer for the Bulldawgs with 13 points.

"If the guards keep playing the way they have, we should be able to take the tournament."

To begin both halves, the Bulldawgs' guards lobed the ball to the inside for points in the paint.

"We feel we have the best post game in the tourney," Williams said.

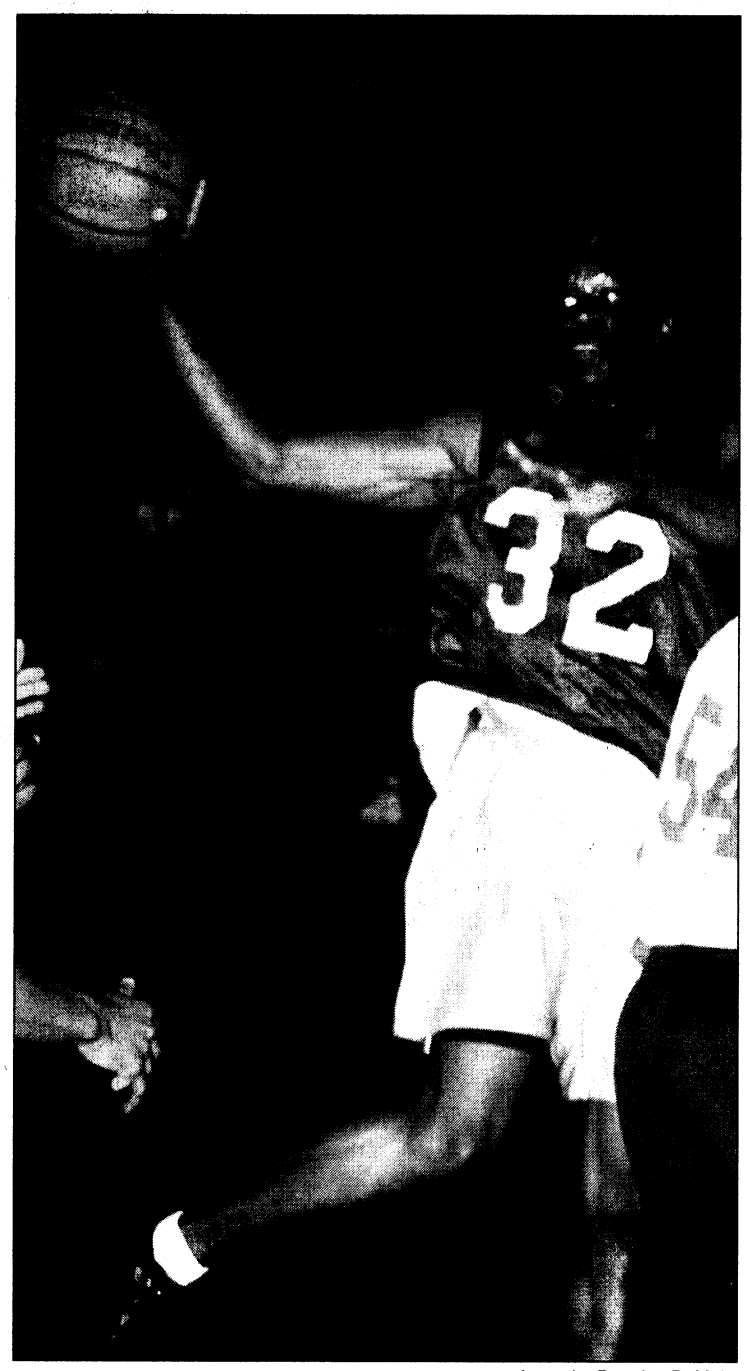
The inside play allowed the guards to spot up around the perimeter and drive the lane.

"The guards played outstanding," Williams said. "They drove the lane and drew fouls."

Free throws were the story for the Bulldawgs.

They went to the line 10 times in the first half and led, 22-18.

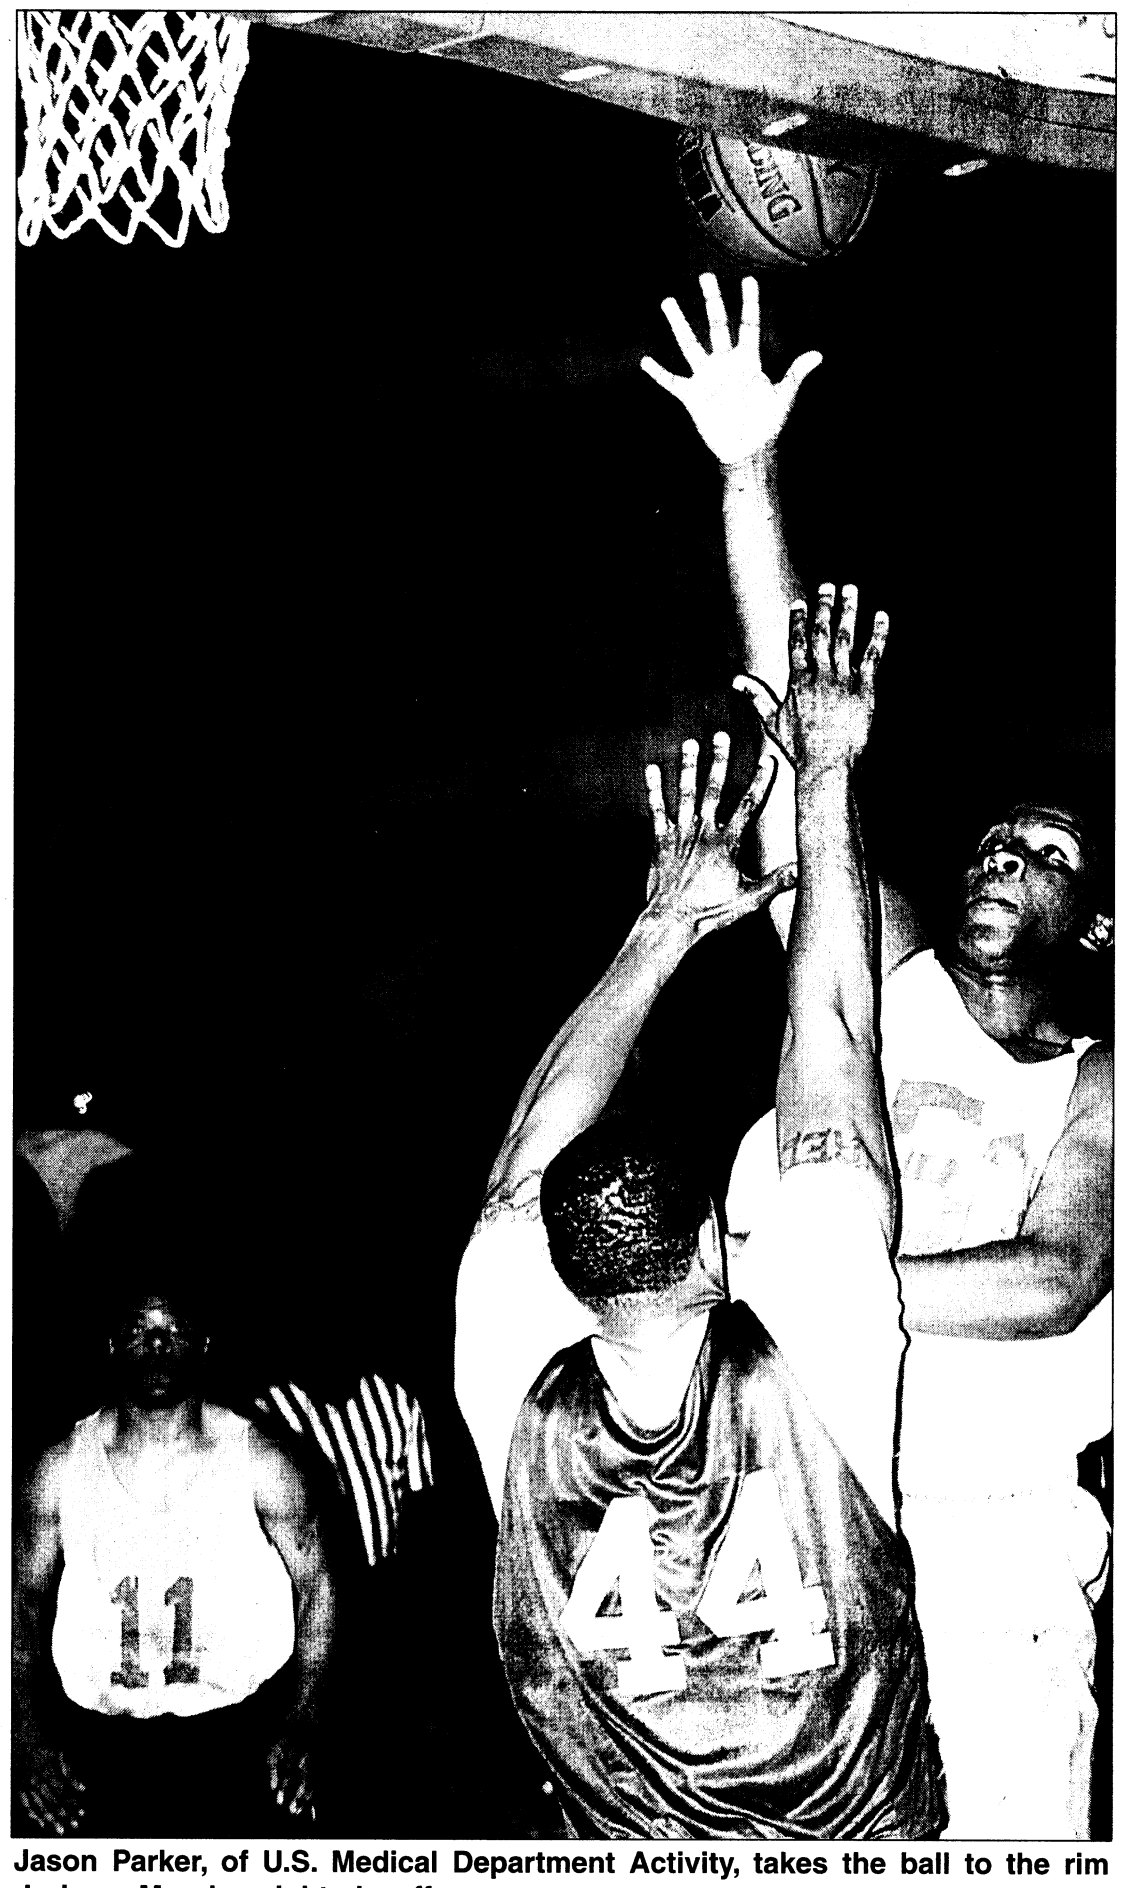
The Bulldogs relied on their outside game, but the shots just wouldn't fall.



In the second half, the Bulldawgs put together back-to-back 5-2 runs within the first 12 minutes.

From that point on, there was no looking back for the Bulldawgs.

Probably the most effective tool the Bulldawgs had in their victory over the Bulldogs was their offensive rebounding. Their effectiveness to box out and grab ahold of the rebound allowed the Bulldawgs to increase their scoring opportunities and make their way to the free throw line.



The Bulldawgs ended up shooting a modest 75 percent from the line for the night, but they will need to do better than that to beat last years champions, the Outlaws of 1st Battalion, 11th Infantry Regiment.

"I want to at least shoot 80 percent from the foul line in the playoffs to take the championship home," said Marvin Orr, Bulldawgs' coach. "As far as the champs, we'll do our talking on the court."

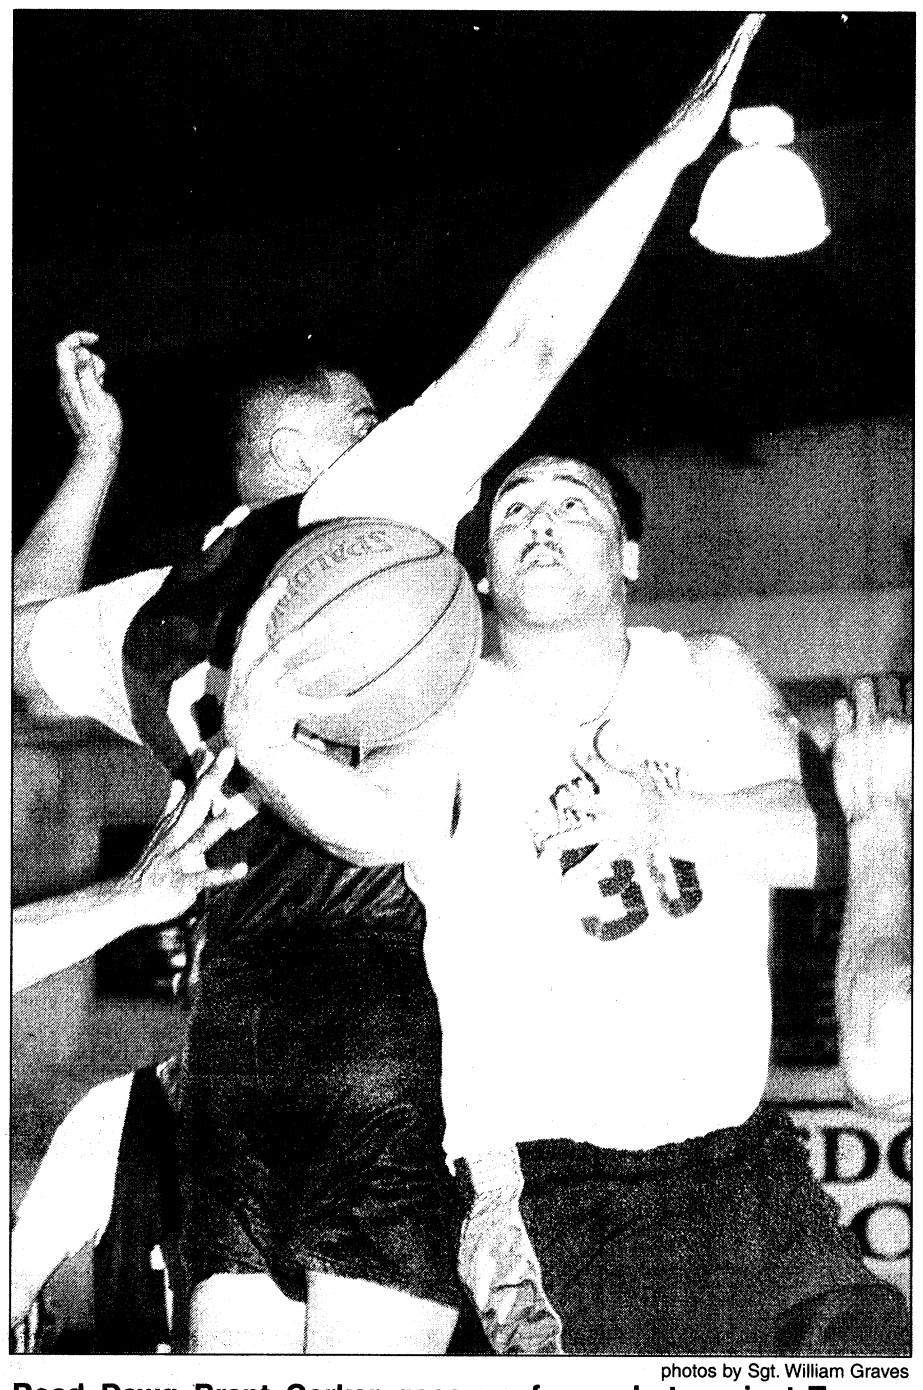
Bulldawgs' Thomas Wright, of B Company, 1st Battalion, 29th Infantry Regiment, dishes the ball off to a teammate for an assist.



Jason Parker, of U.S. Medical Department Activity, takes the ball to the rim during a Monday night playoff game.

The Road Dawgs won the overtime thriller, 43-41, behind Chris Holliday's 19 points and two clutch free throws with 2.8 seconds on the clock in overtime.

Road Dawg Anthony Stewart and the Steel's Eddie Waiters each scored 8 important points in the second half to help their teams reach OT. The Steel's Clifford Bennett poured in 16 points in the first half, but the Dawgs kept him in check in the second.

Business hits golf course

Second annual industry day begins with golf tournament

Spc. Douglas DeMaio
Bayonet staff

Infantry Industry Day on Fort Benning began Monday with a golf tournament at the Follow Me Golf Course.

"Today is all about fun," said retired Gen. John Hendrix.

Events during the tournament included the longest drive and nearest to the pin.

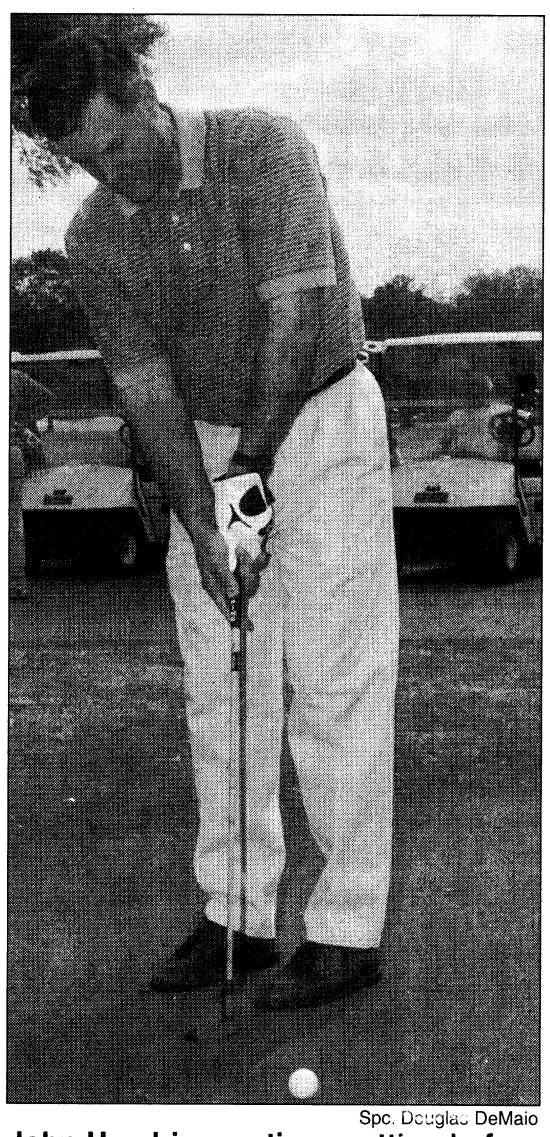
Teams of four played a best-ball method scramble.

Ron Jabavy, Steve Wiley, Willie Wells and Hendrix won first place in best-ball, and Bob Hobbs won the longest drive.

The tournament was sponsored by the Association of the U.S. Army. The second annual kick off of the Infantry Industry day opens up opportunities for defense contractors to meet with the commanding staff of the U.S. Army Infantry Center.

"The tournament is a chance to allow the contractors and people who build equipment for soldiers the opportunity to meet with the green suitors," Wells said, AUSA president.

Meeting with the commanding staff during the tournament is a great way to exchange ideas, said Omega Business Developer M.W. Mike Menser.



"It's a relaxing way to get people together," Menser said.

Furthermore, bringing people together strengthens the Army, Hendrix said.

The power of the Army lies within three pillars, which are industry, equipment and people.

"When you bring in the industry, you bring in the third pillar," Hendrix said. "We are all talking to each other to provide soldiers with the best equipment.

"The better it is, the better the Army will be."

The Columbus and Fort Benning Rugby Club won their long overdue home opener 39-7 over the Islanders of Okaloosa RFC on Saturday.

Using a strong forward attack favored by Australian coach Dave Hatton, the Cruise-a-matics jumped out to a 10-0 halftime lead.

In the second half, the Cruisers continued to play aggressively to extend their lead and finish with a decisive victory.

Key players for the game were 8-man, Ben Pry, Hooker, Roy Krueger, and rookie winger, Jeremy Bond.

The Cruise-a-matics next match is April 6 at 2 p.m. against the Yellowhammers from Montgomery.

Soldiers raise bar for detachment, themselves

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

Since the attacks on the Pentagon and the World Trade Center September 11, the U.S. has called on many soldiers to help fight the war on terrorism.

The Renegade platoon of the 988th Military Police Detachment just had a taste of what it's like.

The Renegades returned Tuesday from a deployment to the military district of Washington, where their mission was to conduct security for the area.

The platoon deployed before Christmas. They were gone for more than 105 days.

"We didn't get to spend much time with them before they left," said Amy Davidson, wife of 1st Lt. Kyle Davidson. "It was hard at first, but when I got to go up and see him for four days, it made me feel a lot better."

The deployment challenged both families and soldiers, but both overcame it.

"Before I left, my son was four months old and wasn't even crawling," said Spc. William J. Golden. "Now, he is almost walking. I really missed a lot of Working dogs retire, adjust

Handler finds joy in making dog his pet

Spc. Douglas DeMaio
Bayonet staff

They serve their country protecting everyone from the president to the loyal-Superbowl spectator. They are the working military dogs of America, and they are protecting Americans against illegal drugs, dangerous criminals and harmful explosives.

After spending many years protecting the great citizens of America, these working dogs retire and are adopted to live a dog's life unfamiliar to them.

The dogs have a tough time adjusting to the relaxation of a normal dog's life, said Sgt. Joe Bailer, Fort Benning's K9 unit NCOIC. They are used to performing their mission.

Still, the dogs make great pets, said Sgt. Kristopher Upton, a handler with the unit. They are outstanding house dogs.

"The dogs are great and very sociable," Upton said. "Although, I would not recommend them to be around children."

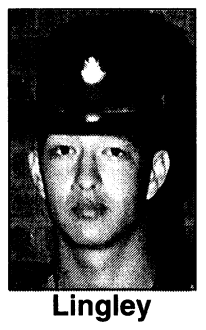
Drill sergeant recognized for excellence



Fort Benning honors leader with award

Pfc. Brian Trapp
Bayonet staff

Many consider drill sergeants the most professional NCOs in the Army, affecting every new soldier, indoctrinating them with standards by which they live their lives.

One Fort Benning soldier did it the best. The new drill sergeant of the year is Staff Sgt. Raymond Lingley, drill sergeant with 1st Battalion, 38th Infantry Regiment.

"It was an honor to be chosen," Lingley said. "It was my goal since I volunteered to be a drill sergeant. But, I'm not better than any other drill sergeant on Fort Benning."

Lingley

Lingley's own drill sergeants from basic training helped inspire him.

"Seeing my own drill sergeants in basic training made me want to be one," Lingley said.

Lingley's peers enjoy working with him.

"He is one of the most professional drill sergeants with whom I've worked," said Staff Sgt. Chardon Hyde, Lingley's senior drill sergeant. "He demands discipline and that the standard is met, and the soldiers reflect that in their military bearing."

"All my battle buddies helped me study, and the board held us to the standard that Sand Hill holds all drill sergeants," Lingley said.

The board started on the first day with a physical fitness test, then the drill sergeants had to instruct classes to soldiers as they were evaluated by judges from the Basic Combat Training Brigade, Infantry Training Brigade and the Drill Sergeant School.

"The board was very nerve racking," Lingley said. "The field of information we had to study for was so wide, it was a lot to cover."

The second day they had to pitch modules, such as instructing soldiers on drill and ceremony. Then on the third day the drill sergeants went before a formal board.

"I was spending a lot of time with my soldiers, but even just doing what we do every day helped me because that is what we're tested on," Lingley said. "I didn't do my job any differently, though."

Lingley studied everything on his own time and never neglected his soldiers, Hyde said.

"I would like to think the soldiers take from me the same things I took from my drill sergeants, learning from their experience," Lingley said.

The leader lived by a simple creed.

"Don't cut yourself short, set challenging but attainable goals, find out what it takes to achieve them, then execute," Lingley said.

Lingley doesn't quit, and he will do everything in his power to achieve his goals, Hyde said.

"Being a drill sergeant is great," Lingley said. "I couldn't ask for anything more. As soon as I could, I signed on to be a drill sergeant, came on the trail and haven't looked back."

SPRING BREAK

Summertime fun

Laura Martinson
Special to the Bayonet©

COMMENTARY

Did you ever notice how a certain scent can bring back a memory? For me, the aromas of spring and summer bring back the fondest.

Like the smell of freshly cut grass. It takes me back to a time where running barefoot was the rule, and a full two-foot tin wading pool was all my little sister and I anticipated.

Or the smell just before a summer rain. It was the one thing that could change our direction from swing sets and bike rides to mud pies and puddle jumping.

The scent of a warm summer breeze puts me right back into my grandma's backyard, where the thrill of the day was found in plucking the ripest grapes off her vine. Grandma would make jelly out of her picks, but my sister and I would snack on our finds beneath the enveloping arms of a red bud tree.

And there is one place, my favorite summer place, that has so many sights, smells and memories combined that it's hard to pick just one.

My grandparents started building it when I was four. The house, which began as a one-story with an unfinished upstairs, sits atop a hill that slopes down into Table Rock Lake.

The name was funny to us when we were little, and our parents told us it was named, likewise, for a large rock alongside the lake that looks like, well, a table.

It was originally my grandparents' summer home, and each year, the entire family, five sons and their families, would flock to meet there for a mini-reunion. For one week every summer, we ran wild, learned to ski, did flips off the dock, and occasionally got into a little trouble.

The home, which has grown each year, is where my grandparents decided to retire, and I can't say that I blame them. It holds an entire family's memories of one another, and though we now cannot all manage to meet there at the same time, we can find each other in the nooks and crannies where we played hide and seek.

I can picture every square inch of the house and grounds, and the way the lake rests during any given time of day. I can see the quiet and calm of the morning water, where only a few fishermen dare disturb the solitude. And the rush of a July afternoon, where boaters and skiers galore play in the sun like there's no tomorrow. It is my favorite place to be, and now I get to share it with my children.

I find myself now in another season of rebirth, and this time I'm the mommy, and I get to make the fun.

I now have the two little girls, and they bear a striking resemblance to the two found in my summer memories.

So I guess I'm lucky, because each spring I get called back, some 20 years ago, to a time of unparalleled innocence and freedom. And it makes me feel the same as it did back then. It draws me outdoors.

And I have every new season to remind me of those good times had.

Reservists deserve more credit

Don Dees
356th Broadcast Public Affairs Detachment, Fort Meade, Md.

WASHINGTON — "Weekend Warriors! Nasty Guard! Darn Reservists!" It's all been said.

Guard and Reserve troops have traditionally been viewed as inferior to regular Army soldiers.

When British Maj. Gen. Phineas Riall faced troops from the 6th Infantry Regiment during the War of 1812, he thought he would be facing militia members from Buffalo, N.Y. Instead he encountered soldiers who marched bravely through his artillery fires. Seeing their professionalism, Riall exclaimed, "Those are regulars, by God!"

Riall expected to encounter what today we would call reservists, and instead, he had to fight against soldiers from America's standing army.

Riall's prejudice nearly mirrors attitudes that still exist in some places regarding the Guard and Reserve. Some active-duty soldiers believe reservists just don't maintain the same standards.

Army Regulation 670-1 governs the wear and appearance of the Army uniform. The regulation does not say active-duty forces must wear it one way and reservists another. There is no provision for alternate uniforms for each component.

When it comes to drill and ceremony, Field Manual 22-5 does not differentiate between components regarding how to march.

The U.S. Army Training and Doctrine Command regulates training for all soldiers, regardless of component. Basic trainees undergo the same rigorous indoctrination into Army life, regardless of component. New recruits also must undertake training for their specific job in the Army.

TRADOC regulates this advanced individual training for all components.

Reserve-component units must validate their capabilities upon mobilization, just as active units do through exercise evaluations and rotations through Army maneuver training centers.

Senior Army leadership promotes the notion of, "one team, one fight." Comparable training requirements ensure this can be a reality.

Winston Churchill had it right when he said, "The reservist is twice the citizen." Guardsmen and reservists live and work in their communities and serve their nation when duty calls.

Some active-component soldiers assume that with only two training days a month available, reservists cannot achieve the same level of proficiency.

This assumption ignores the fact that many reservists hold the same or similar vocation in private life.

The Army relies on reservists to carry out its mission. The U.S. Army Reserve Command manages 500 units as part of the Army's Force Support Package, according to the command's mission statement. These units would be activated immediately to provide combat support and combat service support capabilities in time of full mobilization.

Today, half the U.S. Army's combat power exists in the National Guard. National Guard units have been a part of the peacekeeping efforts in the Balkans since shortly after the 1995 Dayton Peace Accord was signed. In the last rotation, force protection at one cluster of base camps south of Tuzla, Bosnia, was the responsibility of a Georgia National Guard unit.

During Desert Storm, 13 reservists were killed and 43 were wounded Feb. 25, 1991, when a SCUD missile hit the building where the 14th Quartermaster Detachment was staying. That Reserve unit sustained the most casualties of any allied unit during the Gulf War.

Leaders at every level today must promote tolerance and acceptance of their reservist counterparts.

When soldiers face an enemy today, they will not be able to make the distinction that Riall did in the War of 1812. Reserve and Guard soldiers serve and die alongside "regulars."

SCALING DOWN
Couple wins at losing game

'They were actually a little tight,' says Tony Ralph of his 68-inch pants. Ralph lost more than 300 pounds and now wears size 34.

Bridgett Siter
Special to the Bayonet©

Tony Ralph's weight-loss tale is atypical. His "weight struggle" was really no struggle at all. No yo-yo dieting. No bouts of depression and self-loathing. No fasting and gorging. By his own admission, he was fat and happy. And after 17 years of unrestrained eating, Tony weighed nearly 500 pounds.

"I never even considered dieting, didn't give it a thought," he said. "When I got out of the Army, I thought, 'I'll never have to diet or run again.' And I didn't. I gained 60 pounds the first six months."

From there it continued to climb, until he finally quit weighing himself.

"I had no idea how heavy I was. I couldn't find a scale that went high enough," said Tony, who was an instructor at Fort Benning's Combined Arms Tactics Directorate before leaving the Army in 1984.

"This is a fitness-oriented environment, so I had absolutely no credibility with soldiers," he said. "They look at an obese person and they see no discipline. Being overweight means more than excess pounds. It comes with excess baggage, too."

Still, Tony didn't try to lose the weight. Even later, when it interfered with his job at Fort Benning's Office of Inspector General, he didn't diet.

"It took me 10 minutes to recuperate from climbing one flight of stairs to my office. I couldn't even talk, I was so winded," he said. "I'd actually plan my day around avoiding those stairs."

Tony continued to drink between 6 and 12 colas a day sometimes eating a whole bag of candy bars. He ordered his size 7X shirts and 68-inch pants from catalogues.

His wife, Claudette, also battled her weight. But her's was a textbook example of post-childbirth weight gain, years of yo-yo dieting and, finally, resignation.

"I didn't have a problem till after my son was born. Then it was up and down, till I resigned myself to it. I work in an environment where that was acceptable," said Claudette, who teaches at Forrest Road Elementary.

Tony "avoided doctors like the plague," though he considered himself in poor health. Claudette was diagnosed with various weight-related illnesses, including high blood pressure, high cholesterol and diabetes.

Then one day a relative recommended Weight Watchers, and the couple decided to try it.

"Why all of a sudden, after 17 years of abusing my body? I can't tell you," Tony said. "All I can say is it was God's timing, and everything came together at once. We made up our minds to commit to it."

But not without a lot of research. Claudette said Tony "is very analytical. He researches everything to death." Tony studied the program, which he described as "a check-book system" of spending points on food and earning points by exercising, and modified it to his needs.

Claudette, for the most part, was a "by the book" dieter.

Bridgett Siter

'Now I can hug him,' says Claudette Ralph. Together, the couple lost more than 400 pounds.

The success of their diet reads like a far-fetched advertisement touting overnight weight loss. Together they shed more than 400 pounds in little more than a year.

Tony, who figured it would take at least three years to reach his target weight of 182 pounds, lost 13 pounds the first week and became "obsessed with it." He started walking, 10 minutes here and there, and worked his way up to 15 miles a day, seven days a week. And he incorporated weight training into his routine. He reached his goal March 18, having lost 304 pounds in just 62 weeks.

"It just fell off. It was remarkable," he said. "I never hit a plateau, never gained an ounce. After a few months, I could actually control how much I lost per week."

Claudette's weight loss wasn't as smooth. She hit the occasional plateau and even gained, despite never cheating on the diet. But she stuck with it and lost 110 pounds in 65 weeks. The former size 22 now shops for size six and no longer requires medication.

"My Easter dress actually had horizontal stripes on it," she said. "That's something I could never wear before. Now I'm buying anything and everything. It's fun."

The couple, both 46, is now in the "maintenance phase" of their diet program, and they'll remain there for the rest of their lives, they said.

"This is it for us. This is how we live," said Claudette, referring to their system of journaling every day's meals, mentally tabulating food "points" and regular exercise.

"I don't ever want to go through this again," said Tony, who drew strength from his faith, using his walking time to pray and meditate. "I had to recognized it wasn't God's will for me to be fat. For me there were three elements to this program — diet, exercise and a spiritual component. Prayer was key," he said.

These 'before' shots of Tony and Claudette Ralph hang on the couple's refrigerator, constant reminders to chose their meals wisely.

Tony believes his wife has been an inspiration to many family members and friends. Eight of her coworkers have joined Weight Watchers.

"We're not walking advertisements for Weight Watchers," Tony said. "There are lots of programs out there. I believe they're all good, as long as you eat nutritiously. Don't completely give up protein or carbs or fats."

And don't look for motivation in others, he said.

"Someone once asked General Perishing if it was hard giving up smoking. He said, 'No. The hard part was making up my mind to do it.' I agree," Tony said. "You have to take ownership of your weight. You can't blame it on someone else or circumstances in your life. You have to accept your responsibility. It's a self-inflicted wound.

"Then find a diet that suits your lifestyle and do something about it."

11th Regiment sergeant major to retire

Leader leaves military life after 30 years

Bridgett Siter
Special to the Bayonet©

Staring down the home stretch of a 30-year Army career, Command Sgt. Maj. James Boyett faces retirement with major wardrobe worries.

"I don't have a thing to wear," Boyett said, as he reflected on the various uniforms he donned in three decades of service and pondered the daily dilemma he'll face on the fashion front.

"I've worn fatigues, BDUs, permanent press, jungle BDUs ... I kinda liked not having to decide what to wear every day. I don't even know what kind of clothes to buy," he laughed. "I'm gonna miss the Army."

The 11th Infantry Regiment's command sergeant major will bid farewell to the regimented, regulated, rank-and-file life of a soldier Thursday. But he'll cling fast to the ethics and ethos that first drew him to the "old Army."

"It's never been about a uniform or a paycheck. To be honest, I couldn't even tell you what my LES reads," he said. "The Army has always been a way of life for me, not a job. And it will always be a part of my life."

The son of a retired soldier, Boyett enlisted in 1972, as the Vietnam War was winding down. "A peacetime Army," he called it, but one that faced monumental problems internally.

"Vietnam had ripped this country apart, and the Army wasn't popular," he said. "We faced a different kind of war within. Drugs were bad then ... even murder."

The postwar Army wasn't his father's Army, and a disillusioned Boyett would have left after his first enlistment. But the dedication and leadership of NCOs within his company inspired him to continue.

"And I've never regretted it," he said. "I'm glad I stuck it out, and if I could do it all again, I wouldn't change a thing. It made me realize how important NCOs are. It made me want to be the best leader I could be."

In the years since, through 10 stateside assignments and four overseas, Boyett has seen major changes in the Army. Housing has improved, equipment is "a heck of alot" better, today's barracks "are way better than the big open bays we had to live in," and the Army's education system has improved immeasurably.

"The enlisted soldier has always wanted the opportunity to get an education. For so long, there wasn't time. You couldn't take classes because of training," he said. "It's wonderful what they have available today."

But perhaps the most significant change is less tangible.

Boyett sees little evidence of the internal frustrations that plagued the Army after Vietnam.

"Sure we have issues, whether its berets or whatever. But we don't have the drugs and fighting we used to have," he said. "I believe in the old Army. It was hard-core. But we've come a long way toward bringing soldiers together. We're a more cohesive Army now."

Paradoxically, this "cohesive" Army is attracting more independent, free-thinking soldiers than ever before, Boyett said.

"There was no way I'd have approached my first sergeant or sergeant major when I was a private," he said. "Enlisted soldiers are a different breed these days. They're very intelligent, but very outspoken. They like to question things, and sometimes that's hard to take.

"But when push comes to shove, the Army does exactly what it's meant to do," he said. "We've proved it over and over. We're still training the best soldiers in the world."

Boyett and his wife, Charlene, will miss "the Army way of life —the friendships, the closeness you don't find in the civilian world," he said. "It's such a tight-knit society. We've always loved it, and it's hard to give it up."

"It's all we've ever known," said Charlene, the daughter of a career Marine.

"We both grew up living this life. Then we chose it ourselves. Leaving it is scary. I'm ready to retire, I'm just not ready to say good-bye to the Army."

The couple, who call Fort Rucker, Ala., home, are already making plans to visit their youngest son, Michael, in Germany, where he's serving with a military police unit, and Charlene's brother, who lives in Alaska.

And they plan to tour the states, to take a good, long look at the places they passed en route, as they criss-crossed the country from one assignment to another.

"We moved 23 times in 30 years," Boyett said. "The Army life is a gypsy's life. Now we're going to travel instead of transfer. It doesn't matter what we see, as long as we can take our time and enjoy it."

The public is invited to attend a reception in Boyett's honor at 6:30 p.m. Tuesday at the Fort Benning Officer's Club. The cost is $12.25.

For more information, call 545-8195.

Boyett's retirement ceremony will take place at 3 p.m. Thursday at the Airborne Walk across from Infantry Hall. It is open to the public.

DEERS update key

Plan rejects some elderly for ineligibility

Jeanette Graf
US Army Medical Command

Rejection! That's hardly the experience some 1.5 million jubilant military retirees and their family members expected when Congress voted to create the TRICARE For Life benefit last year for Department of Defense beneficiaries aged 65 and over.

Unfortunately, some elderly beneficiaries had TFL claims rejected because they had failed to keep their eligibility up-to-date in the Defense Enrollment Eligibility Reporting System.

Now, the DoD is taking three steps to fix this problem and ensure older beneficiaries get the coverage Congress intended them to have.

First, it is going to go back and pay previously denied claims regardless of "expired eligibility" entries in DEERS records. Claims back to the TFL start date (Oct. 1, 2001) will be reprocessed automatically: no action by beneficiaries or health-care providers is needed.

Second, DoD will continue to pay claims for such beneficiaries until Aug. 1, to give them ample time to establish or renew their eligibility.

Third, it is launching a massive publicity effort to inform over-65 beneficiaries of the absolute necessity of getting and keeping their DEERS enrollments up-to-date. (Those who have already had claims rejected have received Explanation of Benefits statements explaining the problem. But those without recent claims need to be informed before Aug. 1.

DoD policy requires beneficiaries' eligibility be reverified every four years. After Aug. 1, beneficiaries who have not gotten their DEERS status straightened out will be cut off from TFL benefits again, and this time they will stay cut off until they do get their DEERS files up to date.

Officials are concerned about two challenges: how best to get the word out to elderly beneficiaries who may be out of touch with the military and how to help immobile beneficiaries accomplish their reverification.

"Word-of-mouth may be the best way to alert them," said a U.S. Army Medical Command spokesman. "We hope people who do hear about this will pass the word on to any elderly beneficiaries they know who might be homebound and might not get the news directly."

But media popular with retirees will also be used, and DoD is working with retiree organizations like The Military Coalition and the National Military and Veterans Alliance to reach to these beneficiaries and tell them how to update DEERS.

The mechanics of the process are simple enough for beneficiaries that frequent military installations but may be challenging for those in remote areas or confined to home.

Retirees themselves usually have identification cards of indefinite duration and should encounter few problems with DEERS. However, their family members receive ID cards limited to four years of validity. After four years, DEERS terminates their eligibility for military benefits (including TRICARE) unless they renew their cards.

This is normally done by visiting an ID-card issuing facility at a nearby installation. When the new ID card is issued, the facility automatically notifies DEERS to renew the recipient's eligibility for military benefits. (Note: ID-card facilities are operated by military personnel officials — not by TRICARE or military medical officials.)

Problems can arise for individuals unable to travel to a military installation. DoD officials are exploring how to make this process easier for such people.

Meanwhile, an Army Medical Command TRICARE expert says the best advice is for immobile beneficiaries — or those caring for them — to contact the closest ID-card issuer by phone, explain the problem, and work out a personalized solution.

Policies and options vary depending on service and location. In some cases, IDs can be issued by mail for genuinely homebound beneficiaries, if someone can secure a photo of the individual.

A list of nearby ID-card offices can be obtained by doing a search (by city, state or zip code) on this DoD Web site: http://www.dmdc.osd.mil/rsl/. More information on updating DEERS is found at http://www.tricare.osd.mil/DEERSaddress/.

Another alternative is to telephone (800) 361-2620. For information on TRICARE for Life, call (877) 363-5433, (877) DOD-LIFE).

Dogs: Make friends

Spc. Douglas DeMaio

Sgt. Kristopher Upton and his adopted retired working dog, Big John, enjoy an afternoon walk.

Children can tend to be a little rough with dogs, he said. That could cause the dog to snap back at them. Seeing the dog retire and adopted can also be somewhat rough for the handler, Bailer said.

"It's tough if you were assigned to the dog," Bailer said. "You spend more time with the dog than you do with your own family."

In some ways, it's like watching a friend or family member leave knowing they won't return, he said.

Adopting a working dog is relatively new, and most of the adopters are handlers, Bailer said. In fact, Upton adopted his former working dog, Big John. Owning a working dog has been rewarding, Upton said.

"It's a great honor," he said. "I was eager to do it and more than happy to take him home with me.

"He served his country for 10 years."

The adopters and the dog are both screened before the dog can be adopted. This assures the proprietor that the future owners will take care of the dog and be able to afford any medical bills the pet will need, Bailer said.

time with my family.

"However, I knew when I joined the military, deployments were likely to happen. I just hope people realize the sacrifice soldiers make everyday for this country."

It is an honor to have a soldier as a spouse, Davidson said.

"I know the sacrifices my husband makes everyday she said. I am just so proud of everything he does."

For family members, the week prior to the soldiers coming home was an overwhelming one.

"There were so many things going on," Davidson said. "Plus, there was the excitement of Kyle coming home, so it was a time of joy and nervousness."

Soldiers were excited before being dismissed to see their families.

"Seeing my family for the first time since before Christmas, I am almost speechless," Golden said.

"I am so happy to be able to just hug my wife and kids and not let go. I just want to get back home and spend some time with them."

For accomplishing their mission and working long days in Washington, D.C., the soldiers of the platoon will now get some much needed time off.

"Members can feel pride in what they did in Washington, D.C.," said Capt. Rosalyn K. Reese, rear detachment commander.

"The soldiers went above and beyond their mission requirements and set a new standard for the company," Reese said.

OCS hits dirt during field exercise

Candidates learn valuable lessons in field

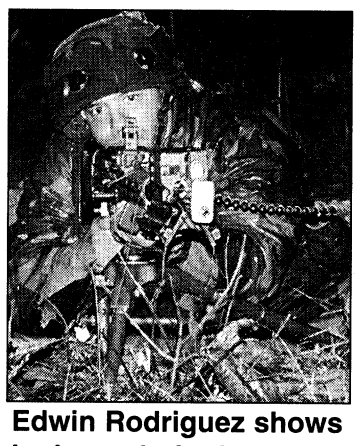
Spc. Douglas DeMaio
Bayonet staff

Any commander or leader can make a decision based off various circumstances. Making the right decision is what counts most.

Officer candidates learn valuable lessons through mock exercises, and this is why leaders give them many opportunities to improve upon their decision-making skills.

Officer candidates from B Company, 3rd Battalion, 11th Infantry Regiment, are currently at a Field Training Exercise performing tasks tuning their leadership skills.

"It's a learning experience for the candidates," said Sgt. 1st Class Andy Reese, tactical NCO in charge of the opposition force mission. "In the chaos of battle, it's extremely important leaders remain confident in their decisions."



Leaders are the ones responsible for the success or failure of the mission.

"When your leaders and subordinates see you change your decision, they're not going to trust in your abilities to lead," said Officer Candidate Edwin Rodriguez.

This is just one of the lessons the candidates are learning during their FTX, Rodriguez said.

After spending seven wet, cold and sleepless days in the field, the candidates took part in a deliberate platoon attack Tuesday.

The mission was to clear an enemy ammunitions supply point. The opposing force was to hold the point at all costs necessary, but the objective for the instructors was to teach the candidates a valuable lesson about how stressful the field environment can be, said Capt. Tony Kim, platoon tac officer.

Edwin Rodriguez shows he is ready for battle.

Rodriguez secures the platoon perimeter during an exercise Monday morning.

"This exercise is for them to learn the command and control of a platoon size element and implore some basic infantry tactics," Kim said. "As future officers, they need to know their job, so they can lead soldiers when they're mentally and physically exhausted."

Being wet, tired, cold and hungry are just a few of the emotions soldiers go through while in the field, said Jamie Bazdaric, battle captain for the OPFOR.

"The experience helps me understand what they feel and think," Bazdaric said. "It helps me to understand how to inspire them when they are exhausted and their lives are in great danger."

The leadership skills learned in Officer Candidate School will transfer across the spectrum of military occupation specialties, said Bazdaric, a former staff sergeant. The styles and knowledge gained throughout the course will give candidates a more diverse ability to motivate and train soldiers.

"At OCS, we try to give them impact training," Reese said. "We want to milk as much leadership potential in 14 weeks as we possibly can."

Bradley units to complete operator training

Civilian instructors provide insight

Sgt. John Lewis
1st Battalion, 29th Infantry Regiment

Led by some of the U. S. Army's finest noncommissioned officers, the New Equipment Training Company continues to provide instruction to mechanized infantry units receiving the latest Bradley Fighting Vehicles.

Recently, while at Fort Hood, Texas, the company finished fielding A Company, 2nd Battalion, 5th Calvary Regiment (Infantry).

A Co. is the first unit of the 1st Cavalry Division's Bradley equipped units to complete operator training in a scheduled two-year fielding plan.

Bradley instructors have always been NCOs from 1st Bn., 29th Infantry Regiment.

Historically, trainers from the training company have been known around the world as infantry professionals, representing Fort Benning, and have successfully trained mechanized infantrymen in places such as Korea and Germany.

In the late 1990's, personnel authorizations were reduced and left the company with a current total of 28 soldiers.

Helping to bear the burden of personnel loss, United Defense Limited Partners and Eagle Corporation contracted to provide teams of civilian instructors to augment the company with its mission.

"Beneficially, most of the civilian instructors are retired mechanized infantrymen," said Ron Kuykendall, company chief.

Staff Sgt. Donnie Elsenpeter, Training and Doctrine Command's Instructor of the Year, and Sgt. 1st Class Bryan Bevley, site chief, have been instrumental to the success of the training company by offering the leadership required to provide the institutional standard of training necessary to field units gaining the new vehicle.

Elsenpeter supervises instruction with the corporation and Army National Guard units.

Bevley, along with defense partern's Mark Perry, supervise three new equipment training teams that are training active duty Army units at Fort Hood.

According to the Program of Instruction, gaining units can complete instruction in 47 training days.

Presently, the company is fielding B and C Companies, 2nd Bn., 5th Calvary Regt. (Infantry), with the most recent Bradley model, known as the M2A3.

The M2A3 is the first digitized Bradley vehicle and offers improved weapons accuracy and a second generation Forward Looking Infrared sight for the gunner and commander. It also provides Force XXI Battle Command Brigade and Below communications.

This allows the mechanized infantryman increased situational awareness by permitting commanders and squad leaders to have their own digital display of the battlefield.

"A key capability of this vehicle is improved visibility of the battlefield," Kuykendall said.

The 2nd Bn., 5th Cavalry Regiment (Infantry), is scheduled to complete training in May.

As for the near future, a fourth instructor team is being created to support BFV fielding and instruction to engineer units within the 1st Cavalry Division. All fielding and instruction of the 1st Cavalry Division is scheduled for completion in December of 2003.

Basic trainees go through test

Day, night fire give soldiers test of real situation

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

Imagine sitting in a foxhole with a buddy and firing shots at the oncoming enemy.

How should a soldier feel about it, or better yet, what should a soldier do about it?

The soldiers of B Company, 3rd Battalion, 47th Infantry Regiment, experienced a mock simulation of the situation April 4.

"They're sitting in their foxholes in the firing position waiting on the enemy," said Staff Sgt. Javier A. Tinoco, drill sergeant. "Then, all of a sudden, targets pop up left and right. They have to knock down the targets."

The soldiers are given three magazines of 20 rounds each to fire at the targets.

The targets range anywhere from 25 to 300 meters away from their position.

"It gives them a chance to experience this kind of situation," said Staff Sgt. Torrence T. Brown, drill sergeant. "Some of these soldiers will find themselves out on the battlefield and will face this exact situation, with hundreds of enemy soldiers firing at them from various distances."

Not only was the goal to allow the soldiers to experience what fighting in Afghanistan, the Philipines or other combat zones may feel like, it allowed the soldiers to learn Individual Tactical Training techniques and get them used to night fire, Brown said.

"I like the experience of night fire," said Pvt. Brady C. Love. "It's good training and will help us out in the field."

To get prepared for the firing exercise, soldiers clean and oil their weapons to allow the M-16A2 rifle to fire properly.

Still, even when properly taking care of their weapon, soldiers still experience malfunctions.

"If a problem arises, I just remember to use SPORTS," said Pvt. John J. Wood.

SPORTS is an acronym of different steps taken to correct a malfunction on the weapon.

It stands for slap the magazine, pull the charging handle, observe the chamber, release the charging handle, tap the forward assist and squeeze the trigger.

"Most of the time, that will fix the problem," Wood said.

Making sure the weapon is ready to go is not the only thing soldiers do to get ready before a firing exercise.

"I calm myself down and remember the four fundamentals of firing, which are steady position, breathing control, aiming and trigger squeeze," Love said.

The drill sergeants have something different in mind.

"We want to do everything possible to get in their heads or distract them," Tinoco said. "This is a simulation of the real situation.

"In war, there are all kinds of distractions going on around you. We just want to see if they can handle it."

The soldiers used the exercise to prepare for their upcoming field training exercise where they will use all the skills they have learned for practical use.

"I can't wait to get to FTX," Wood said. "Getting the chance to use everything we've learned will give us a real test. It will show how well we comprehend our training."

Future infantry officers train to lead

Lts. beat feet down range for IOBC

Pfc. Kyle Neller
USAIC Public Affairs Office

Almost all the soldiers going through Infantry Officer Basic Course will eventually be infantry platoon leaders.

This is why officers from 2nd Battalion, 11th Infantry Regiment, were undergoing Squad Tactical Exercises at Ware Range Monday and Tuesday. STX is a basic exercise soldiers must maneuver when learning the fundamentals of reacting to contact and moving under fire in a squad-sized element.

When the squad moves through the course, they engage opposing forces in several defensive positions. The leading team seeks cover and concealment and begins laying down suppressive fire, while the following team flanks the enemy either to the right or left of the position. Once in place, the flanking team moves through the defensive position.

"This range is pretty basic," said 2nd Lt. Bruno Desolenni, student in IOBC. "It teaches how a squad should react when attacked by the enemy and how the squad moves when it is locked in a fire fight."

This training also helps the students understand how squads work together as a platoon during combat.

"Running squad-fire missions help us integrate from squad to platoon missions," Desolenni said. "Understanding how a squad moves is the first step in understanding platoon-fighting strategies."

This course teaches officers to follow as well as lead.

"To be a good leader you must also know how to follow orders," said 2nd Lt. Ken Enser.

The squad members are in positions normally held by enlisted persons, he said. The biggest benefit for the students is they can experience unfamiliar positions in the chain of command.

"It allows students to experience receiving commands from a lower echelon point of view," Desolenni said.

The future leaders gain a sense of empathy for enlisted soldiers after being in the field for several days in extreme weather.

Pfc. Kyle Neller

An IOBC student scans his area while pulling security during the Squad Tactical Exercise.

"It is good to know what our soldiers will go through," Enser said. "Our experience will help us make decisions that will benefit the personnel we will lead."

It also teaches the importance of motivation and quick thinking in a combat situation.

"We have learned the need for situational awareness," Enser said. "If you are not ready to exchange fire with the enemy at all times, you're as good as dead."

COPS bike patrol readies for summer

New bicycles help MPs protect post

Pfc. Brian Trapp
Bayonet staff

The Community Oriented Police Squad is set to put their 18 new bicycles into use this summer.

The new Cannondale Police Bikes are replacing the Specialize Hardrock model the bicycle squad was using. The new bike has a stronger frame due to better welds, and the frames are sized matched with the riders' body.

"The new bikes are a big step up," said Staff Sgt. Patrick Coiner, COPS senior squad leader. "The new parts are top brand and will not fail unless they are not maintained."

Coiner reviewed several models of bicycles for months before he decided.

"We've updated the bicycles twice since we started the bicycle squad nine or 10 years ago," Coiner said.

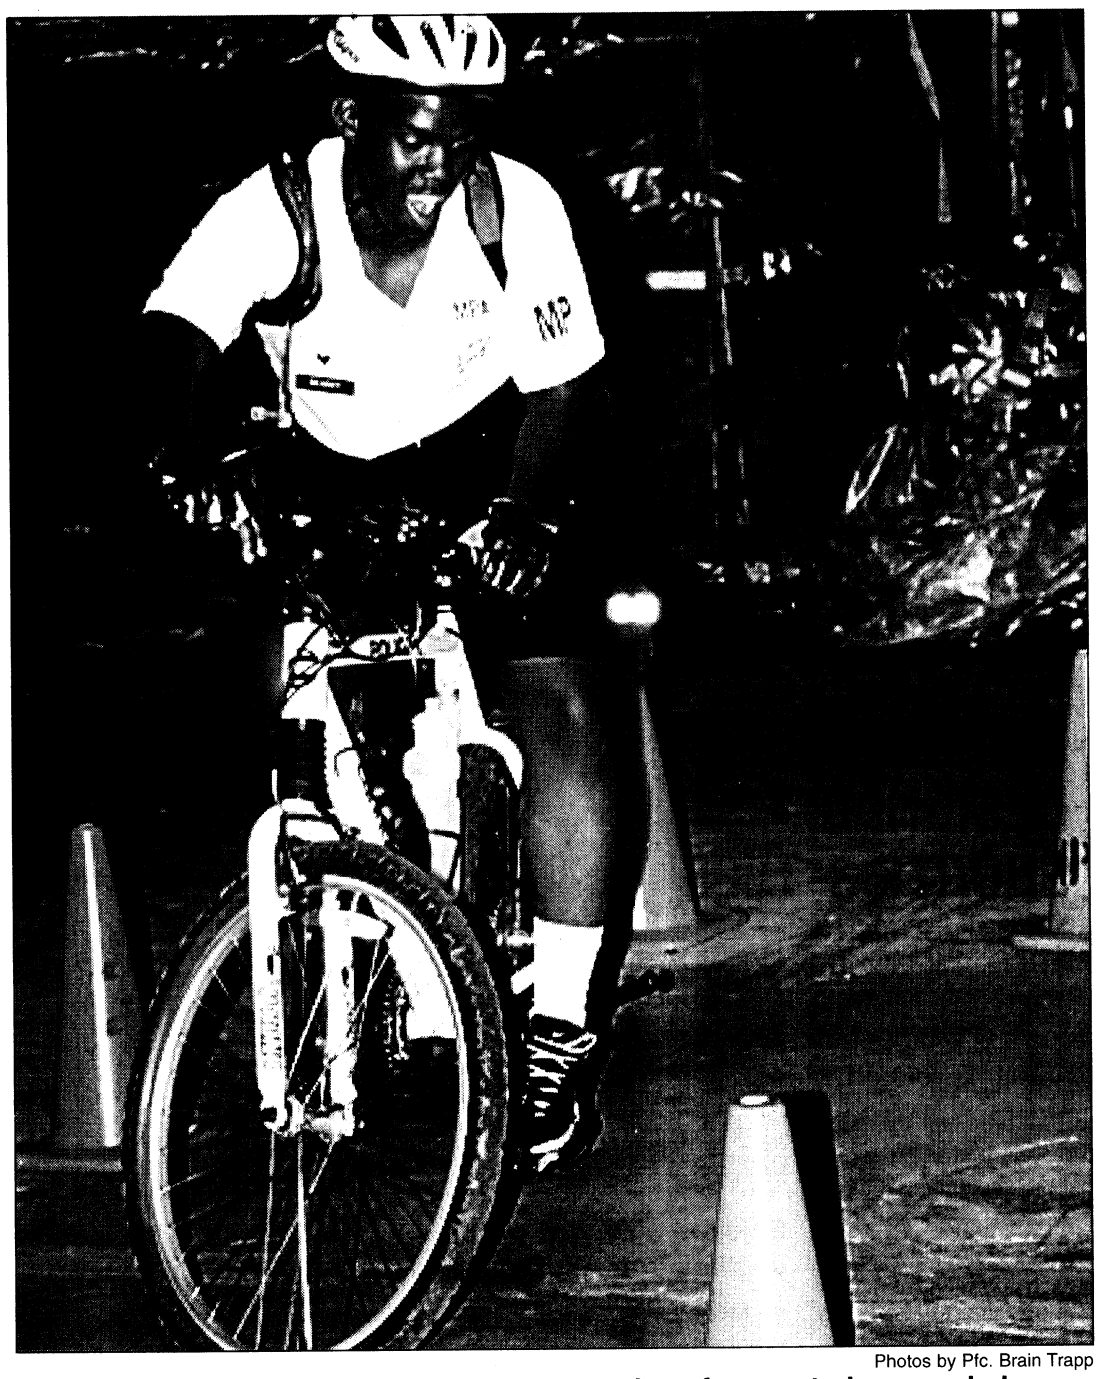
Coiner attended the International Police Mountain Bike Association basic bike course and instructors course to familiarize themselves with the new equipment and bicycle riding skills.

The bicycle squad was given its first week-long bicycle class this week. During the class, soldiers go over and master all the aspects of riding, including ascending and descending stairs.

During the first fielding of the bike, once the soldiers are efficient and proficient, they will be able to send someone to the instructors course in a few months.

"With a bicycle, we will be able to maneuver better in confined areas or large crowds like during the 4th of July," Coiner said. "The bike also makes us more approachable to the public. More kids come up and interact with us than when we are in a cruiser."

The squad members were very pleased with the new bicycles too.



"The new bike will allow us to help make Fort Benning a safer place in which to live, work and play," said Spec. Matthew Holley, team leader with COPS.

The soldiers thought the class was very beneficial.

"It helps us learn how to take different turns and skills we are going to need in housing areas, and interact with the community," Holley said.

Take child to work April 25

Children get to learn about jobs

Christina Hayashi
Special to the Bayonet©

National Take-Our-Daughters-To-Work-Day will be celebrating its 10th anniversary April 25. The Army has extended this day to include sons as well to make it Take-Your-Child-To-Work-Day.

"It is important to bring the whole family into our military life to provide insight to what parents actually do on a day-to-day basis," said Col. Joe Torres, garrison commander.

According the official Take-Our-Daughters-To-Work Web site, successful programs involve adults providing visible and positive influences, the value of people in the workplace and its effect to preserve the economy now and in the future, have a space to be heard and seen, and to help with transition into early adulthood.

Last year, some units were able to make the day into a family day by setting up activities for families allowing the whole family to see how things get done.

Children should be between 8 and 15, but may vary depending on each unit. Fort Benning personnel are encouraged to participate.

Take-Your-Child-To-Work-Day will be an excused absence from school.

"I strongly encourage Take-Your-Child-To-Work-Day because it is another great way to share our military experience with our families," Torres said.

Post to celebrate Earth Week

Focus will be to help environment

Danielle G. Durante
Directorate of Facilities Engineering and Logistics

Earth Week is just around the corner and Fort Benning, Environmental Management Division has great activities planned for the community. Initially this event was planned only for a day, but because of its importance, Fort Benning is expanding Earth Day into a week long event.

Earth Day is an international event demonstrating concern and mobilizing support for the environment. Earth Day was first celebrated April 22, 1970, and rallied more than 20 million Americans to become involved in environmental activities.

As a worldwide event, Earth Day represents the commitment of the United States and other countries to environmental security. Active-duty military, civilian personnel, families and local community members contribute significantly to the impact of this monumental event.

To kick-off Earth Week, Sally Joyce, a volunteer with the Nature Conservancy, has an interactive presentation on bio-diversity she will present to McBride Elementary School. The presentation takes place April 19 and will be given to grades Kindergarten through third grade. They will focus on how the animals interact with the forest. Joyce will have the students interact by putting on a puppet show. This gives the students the opportunity to learn and have fun at the same time.

Fort Benning's Recycling facility, starting April 22, is having their Clean Your Files Day. This is an effort by the U.S. Conference of Mayors to recycle millions of tons of office paper, saving thousands of trees.

The Environmental Management Division would like to invite students and members of the community to participate in the Environmental Fair April 23. The fair is from 9 a.m. to 1 p.m. in Infantry Hall.

The fair, will give the community the opportunity to see the different ways to clean up and preserve our environment, and how the military interacts with the environment while still preserving Nature.

Along with the fair there will be a Dirty Sock Contest from 10 a.m. to 1 p.m April 24.

What is a Dirty Sock Contest? It is a demonstration of how auto emissions affects the air quality.

The Environmental Management Division will put a white sock onto the exhaust pipe of your car, and turn your car on for 30 seconds. The person with the dirtiest sock wins a free quick lube and oil filter at the Auto Skills center, and the person with the cleanest sock wins a two-night stay in a cabin at Uchee Creek. This contest is limited to 150 participants, so make sure you get there early. If there is a tie, there will be a drawing. The contest will take place in front of the recycling bins next to the Main PX Class 6 shoppette.

Other events will take place throughout the week for Fort Benning Schools. Chris Slembarski, Environmental Awareness Trainer, is reading The Adventures of Wally the Water Drop, a coloring book provide by the Environmental Committee of Altrusa International, Inc. Slembarski is reading to third grade classes at Dexter, Stratton and White Elementary Schools to promote literacy as well as environmental awareness.

Col. Joe Torres, garrison commander, will dedicate a tree in honor of National Arbor Day April 26.

DA announces new ID system for Youth Services

Change provides kids safer place

Christina Hayashi
Special to the Bayonet©

The Department of the Army is requiring a new ID system for Child and Youth Services. The new system will allow all Army posts to conduct business the same way.

"This system will provide a safer environment for children," said Linda Laine, director of Youth Services.

The new ID's will inform staff members of any important health information such as food allergies and will also track members for reports to be given to headquarters. Participants will also have to scan their ID to get into the youth center.

With the new system, members will be able to take the card from one post to another without having to buy another one. The new card will feature a picture of the child, a bar code that holds information, and the Children and Youth Services logo. The new ID's affect all children who are currently members of Youth Services, as well as those who want to participate in any school age services and child development services.

Over the next few weeks, Youth Services will start taking photos to be sent to Central Registration where they will process and produce the cards and then be sent back for issuing.

"We are presently getting the computer systems installed and staff trained," Laine said.

> "This system will provide a safer environment for children."
> Linda Laine,
> Director of Youth Services

Pictures will be taken in groups or an appointment can be made by calling Youth Services at 545-3070.

To obtain a membership card, parents must purchase one at Central Registration on Custer Road. The cost is $15 for one child, $30 for two children and $35 for three children.

Infantrymen help at Waddell Elementary's field day

Spring break, block leave start with blast

Staff Sgt. Davis Parker
1st Battalion, 15th Infantry Regiment

The arrival of April 5 was met with much anticipation for both the students at Waddell Elementary School in Columbus, and the soldiers of 1st Battalion, 15th Infantry Regiment, involved in the Partners In Education program.

The day marked not only the beginning of spring break for the students and block leave for the soldiers, but a fun filled day of activities that left both students and soldiers with smiles on their faces. Field day had finally arrived for the Waddell Warriors and the "Can Do" Dragons, and each group was ready to show their stuff.

The weather was perfect as the school's principal opened the days' ceremonies by encouraging the students to have fun and enjoy themselves in the spirit of good sportsmanship. Different classes opened the festivities by performing various skits and routines, much to the enjoyment of fellow students and family members alike.

Staff Sgt. Davis Parker

Soldiers race with children during field day. The kids spent a fun fill day with soldiers from 1st Battalion, 15th Infantry Regiment.

The grounds were prepared for numerous physical activities, and a festive feeling was in the air as teams spread out throughout the field to compete for bragging rights.

The "Can Do" medics had toiled throughout the previous day to set up a challenging obstacle course that would demand the students' concentration and tax their abilities to work as a team. The course started with a 20-meter sprint, followed by a five-pylon negotiation course, leading to a mattocks handle that would be used similarly to that of a 'dizzy bat race.'

Once the students were sufficiently disoriented, they then needed to crawl through a tunnel constructed of camouflage netting. As if all of this was not enough, their teamwork skills were then challenged with a litter relay that would wrap up the course. The winning team was decided by the first class to have every student across the finish line.

The highlight of the day was without a doubt the competition between the third-grade classes. Iverson's Iguanas were ranked as the inside favorites (as they ran through the course on the 4th of April). Frank's Falcons were thought to be the closest competition to the Iguanas, but in the end it was Hall's Hawks with the come from behind, upset victory that left everyone but the Hawks speechless.

In all, the day was a smashing success for both the Waddell Warriors and the "Can Do" Dragons. The spirit of sportsmanship prevailed, and the bonds of friendship between the students and the soldiers were strengthened. At the end of the day, the Warriors and Dragons returned home tired, fulfilled and looking forward to the next Partners In Education event.

McBride students show writing talent

McBride Elementary School

From kindergarten to third grade, the writing process is in full force at McBride Elementary.

The teachers, students and parents are very proud of the wonderful authors that the students from McBride have become.

Below you will find a sample of writings from each grade level.

Kindergartners wrote about animals from McBride's Woodlands:

Mosquitoes

By Keuane Singleton

I like mosquitoes. They don't bite or sting me. They just fly over you.

Snake

By Kayla Baumgartner

The snake can stick people with its spikes. I saw a snake in the water.

Beavers

By Mrs. Ford's Class

There are many kinds of beavers. Beavers eat only plants.

Beavers are good swimmers. They can swim underneath the water for about 15 minutes. Beavers are 4 feet long. They weigh about 60 pounds. The beavers home is called a lodge.

Kindergartners Brianna White, Jalen Reid and Julianna Tice hold up a poem they recited for their parents during a recent program at McBride honoring military parents.

Second-graders wrote about famous women in history:

Beatrix Potter

By Brittany George

Beatrix Potter was born in July 1866. She died in 1943. She had 12 pets. She liked to take care of land. She had 17 farms. She lived in Castle Cottage, Sawyer, England. She is famous for writing children's books. She wrote books about Benjamin Bunny, Peter Rabbit and Squirrel Nutkin. She wrote letters to children telling them stories. These stories were loved so much that they were made into books.

She had a family of storytellers, people who love to tell stories.

Third-graders wrote fairy tales:

Three Little Mice and the Big Bad Cat

By Susan Strickland

Once upon a time there were three little mice. They were going to their home in Mexico. They were cute little mice with these cute little pink noses and tails their fur was as white as could be.

These little mice were going to build the best cat trap ever. They were trying to trap this big bad cat that they have been running from all their lives.

The first cat trap was a mouse trapper with a mouse toy and when the cat pulled the toy it snaps down and holds the cat while the mouse went and got cheese and everything he wanted.

The second mouse cat trap was a piece of string tied in a circle on a pulley so when the cat steps into it the trap would trap him and would hold him while the mouse goes and gets cheese and everything he wanted.

The third mouse cat trap was a bullhorn and when ever the cat went to grab him then the mouse would run to the bullhorn and call the cat like the owner and then the owner would go and find him then the mouse would go and get cheese and everything he wanted.

All of the mouse plans were great but the best one is the third one because the owner of the house caught the cat trying to bite the mouse and got him locked in the cat carrier and was taken to the pet store and then mice never got bothered again and the mice got all the cheese and whatever they wanted and were never left alone again and had the best time of their life.

Marriage: Three-way street of life

Children, important part of marriage

Chaplain (Capt.) Deirdre Stokelin
2/58 Infantry Regiment

Mine, yours, ours! This past weekend I performed a wedding in which the bride requested I write vows for her son to say in the wedding.

I consider myself pretty liberal in these matters, but my first reaction was that I did not want to cheapen the solemn vows of marriage.

Wanting to please the bride and not compromise the occasion, I gave considerable thought to what it means for children to come into a marriage relationship. Having been a step-parent I have years of experience in mine, yours, and ours!

I realized early in the marriage that I did not only marry the man but I also married the children. Matthew 5: 27-32 clearly identifies marriage as a life long commitment of one man and one woman to each other.

However, these days marriage often joins together one or more children to the union.

On that note, I began to write the vows for little Craig. I wrote what I believed to be important to father, mother, and child. So my hands wrote what my heart directed.

"I, Craig, take thee Steve, to be my father. I promise to love, and respect you. I promise to obey you, as you teach me to be a man. I promise to walk with you, as your son.

Stokelin

I, Craig, love you mom. I will respect your marriage, and your husband. I promise to receive him as my father, and to obey you both, to care for you both in sickness and in health, for as long as I live."

Joyfully everyone was pleased with the results. Some thought that the vows were cute and others thought them quaint.

However, I renewed my perception of the importance of bringing children early into a marriage relationship. Marriage that incorporates children into the union is a three way street!

Children are people with feelings and in the middle of our romantic elation we tend to forget how they might feel about this other person who will become a part of their life.

Experience has shown me it is important to love and respect children and in turn they will learn to love and respect you.

Marriage is a dance of relationships and children pull the strings of the heart. If children are not taught to respect and obey the soon to be new parent during the courtship the marriage concert will sound of clashing cymbals.

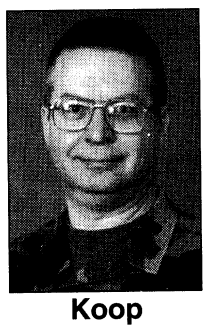
Arguments between husband and wife will be sparked by the tensions of children acting out in anger, frustration, and fear.

"Honor your mother and your father."

Exodus 20:12
New International Version

I applaud this young bride for recognizing that the vows of marriage are not just for the husband and wife to be, the vows of marriage are for the family brought together after God's ordinance in the holy estate of matrimony.

If the marriage is to be healthy and lasting, all parties must vow, to love, honor, keep, and yes, obey!



For all the weddings to come this year, may God eternally bless your unions with love, joy, peace, and prosperity.

Parents need alternatives to corporal punishment

Discipline key in making children obey

Chaplain (Maj.) Raymond Koop
Family Life Ministries Center

Corporal punishment should be used as a last resort in disciplining children. When a parent states, if you (fill in the blank), I'm going to spank you, the parent is limited to only one course of action when the child misbehaves. The parent feels obligated to spank because that was the method of discipline promised to the child.

Koop

Parents should rather say to their child, If you (fill in the blank), I'm going to have to discipline you. This statement allows the parent to choose from a wide range of discipline strategies after a child disobeys. Two common alternatives to spanking include removing privileges and calling a time-out.

Calling a time-out allows your child to settle down and become composed. Praise your child after your child has become calm.

Discuss your child's anger or frustration. Let them know feelings can be channeled into positive action rather than negative behavior. If the rule is unfair, change it. If the rule is fair, stick to it.

Restricting television time, computer inter-net time, and automobile use are examples of removing privileges. Discuss the reason for the privileges being removed with your child before taking the privileges away. Limit the restriction to a week or less. Restrictions that go on for more than a week are difficult to enforce.

Outlaws claim post championship

Team posts third consecutive basketball title

The Los Angeles Lakers are working on their third consecutive championship. In doing so, every team they play will by gunning to dethrone the champs.

For the 1st Battalion, 11th Infantry Regiment, Outlaws, their quest for three consecutive post basketball championships is complete.

"It's a sense of pride," said Outlaws' Adrian Lewis. "Most of the players on the team are over the age of 30. It's nice to know we can hang with the young guys and girls."

The Outlaws posted a 50-45 win over the Raging Bulls of B Company, 1st Battalion, 10th Field Artillery Regiment, April 3 to stake their claim as the best basketball team on post with a reputation for success.

The Outlaws came into every game confident in their abilities to produce a win, Lewis said. And that is exactly what they did.

"It feels wonderful to be known around the basketball community as number one," said Author Davis, first-year player with the Outlaws. "I'm the rookie trying to gel with the team."

The Outlaw veterans had a positive impact on the younger players and have set the example for the younger players, Davis said.

"By winning the championship, it helps the younger players understand working together and focusing on goals can help you achieve anything," Lewis said.

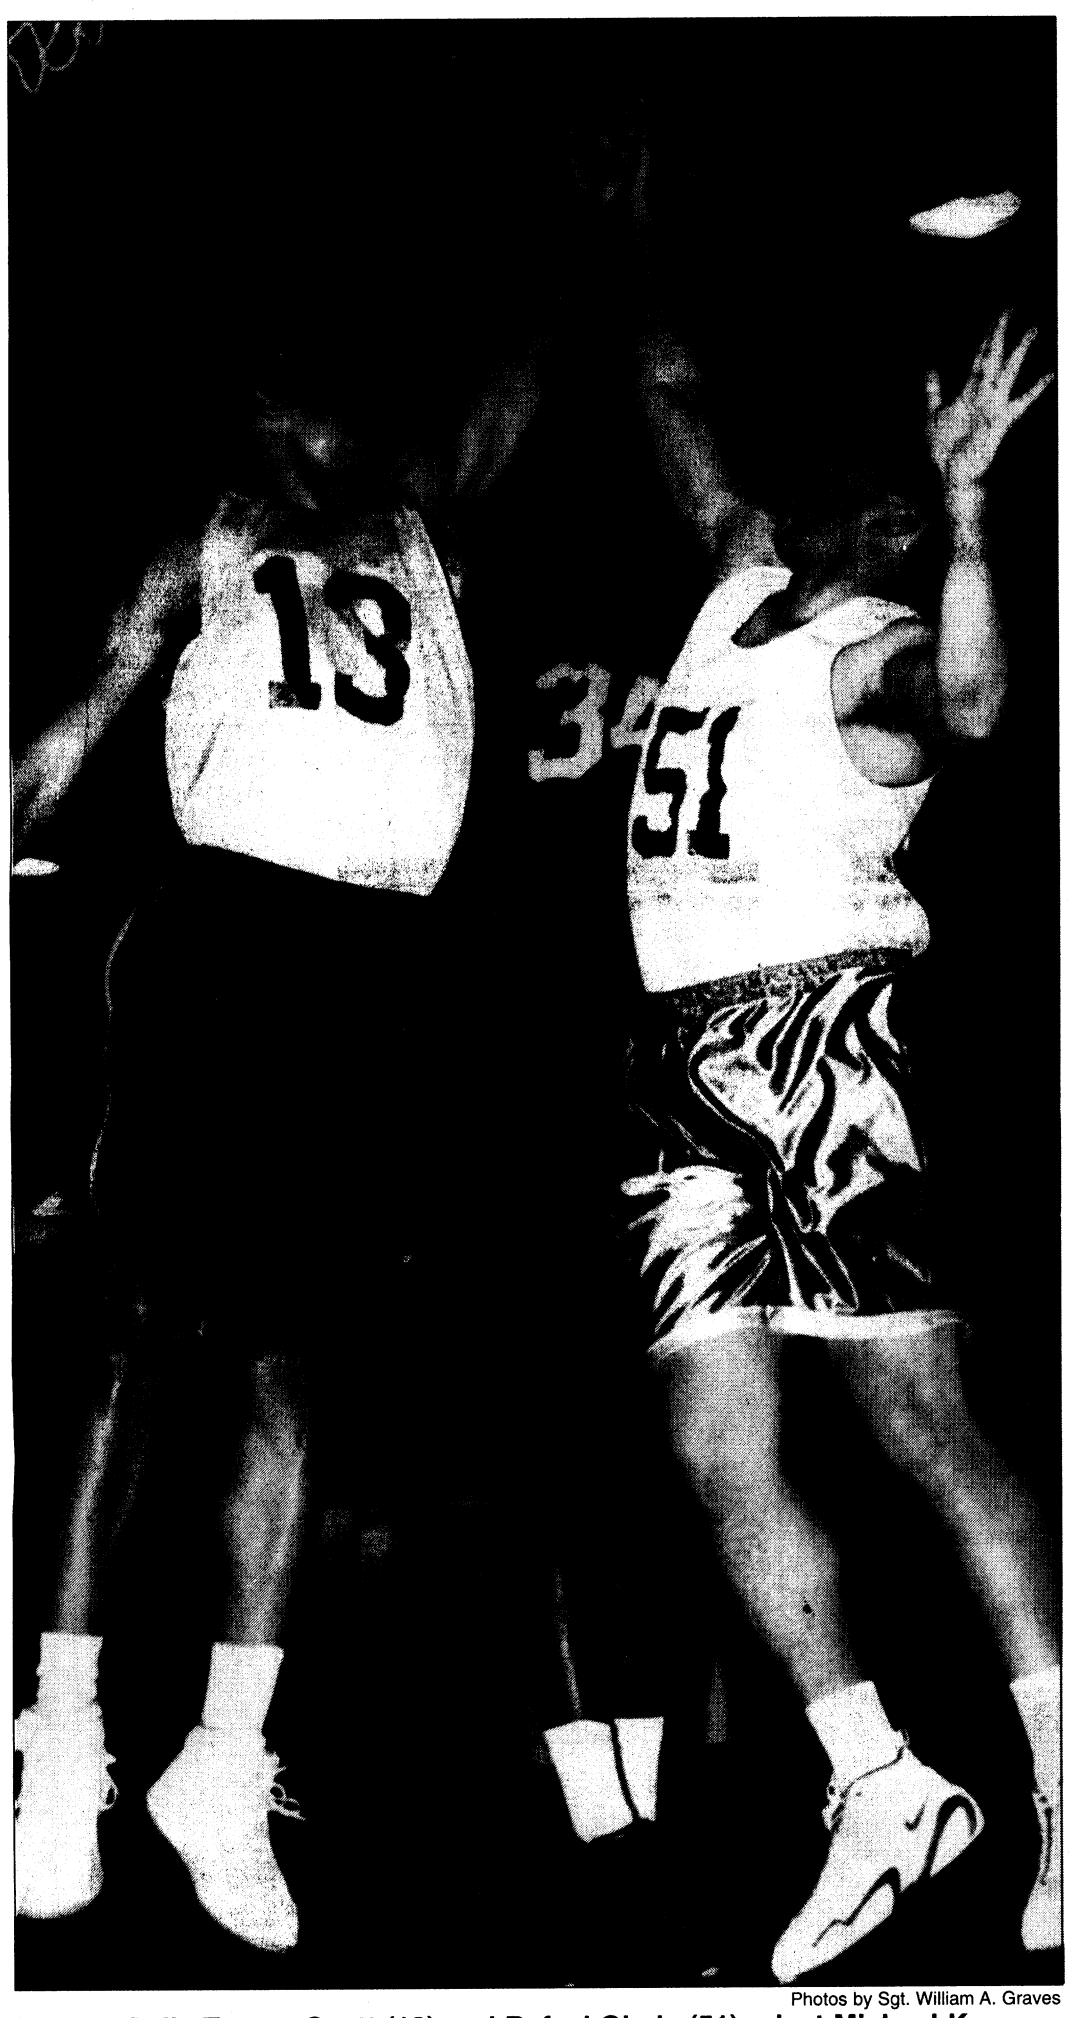
The Outlaws regained their focus during the second half of the championship game to fulfill their goal of a three-peat.

The Outlaws trailed by as many as eight points, but they put together a 14-2 run and never looked back.

"Teamwork is the main ingredient to our success," Davis said. "Our press was paramount to our victory, and someone always steps up for us when we need it."

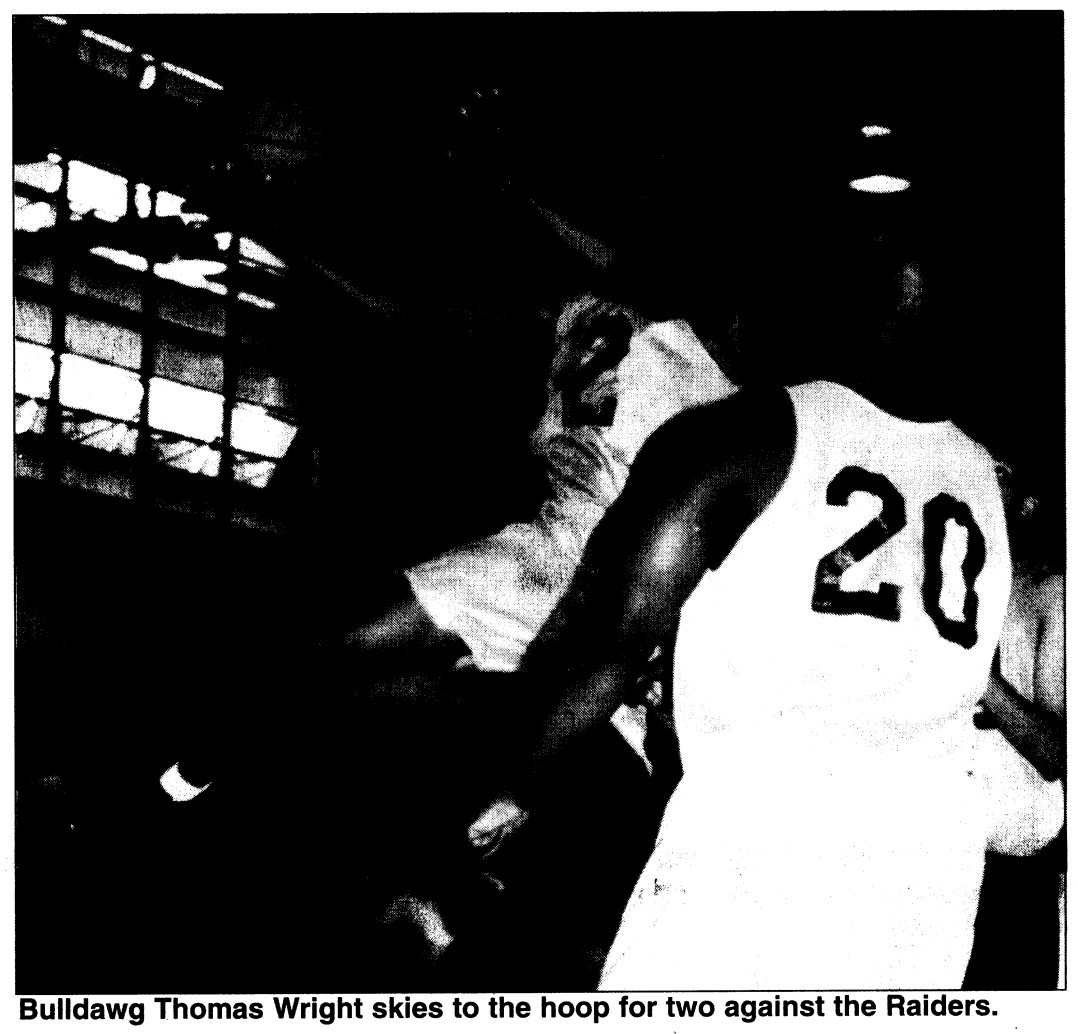
For the Outlaws, that someone was Jerry Sonnier.

"He stepped up big time," Davis said.



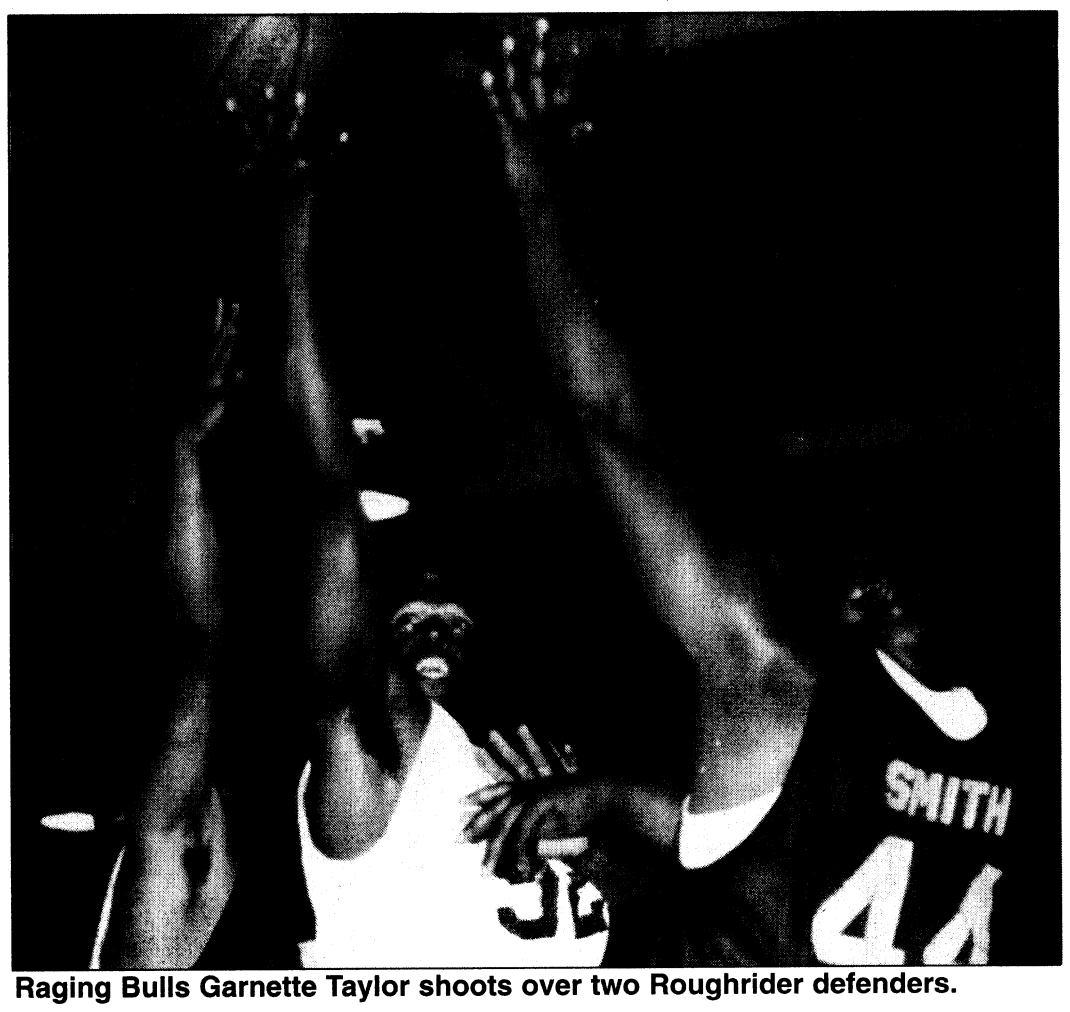
In the last 1:30 of the game, Sonnier came up with two steals, made five of six free throws and scored the team's final seven points to secure the victory.

"I'm a ball player," Sonnier said. "I just do what I have to.



"The defense turned it on, and it gave us more opportunities on the offensive end.

"We used those to our advantage and it worked out in our favor."



The younger players are excited to win their first championship and feel this experience has given them the edge they need to continue the winning streak, they said.

Engineers beat infantrymen to advance

The setting didn't provide as much pomp and circumstance as the recent Final Four in Atlanta, but the Roughriders looked every bit like the ferocious National Champion, Maryland Terrapins at the post's version April 3.

Much like Terrapins' Lonny Baxter and Juan Dixon, the 63rd Engineer Company Roughriders had their inside, outside game hitting on all cylinders, in the form of Michael Keys and Patrick Roublow.

Scores of soldiers and family packed Briant Wells Field House to witness the Roughriders defeat the B Company, 1st Battalion, 29th Infantry Regiment Bulldawgs, 54-50, behind Keys' 11 and Roublow's 17.

"The guys lived up to the engineer creed, 'Essayons,' which means, 'let us try,'" said 1st Sgt. John S. Johnson, 63rd Engineer Company, who came to show his support for his soldiers.

Behind the spark provided by Bulldawg Tereska Wattkins' clutch shooting, crisp passes, quick steals and unbelievable saves, they looked to pull away with 13 minutes left in the game.

However, the Roughriders used tenacious defense to crank up their fastbreak offense, and they pounded the boards and sank shots from downtown to launch a 19-7 run and lead 50-44 with 1:23 remaining.

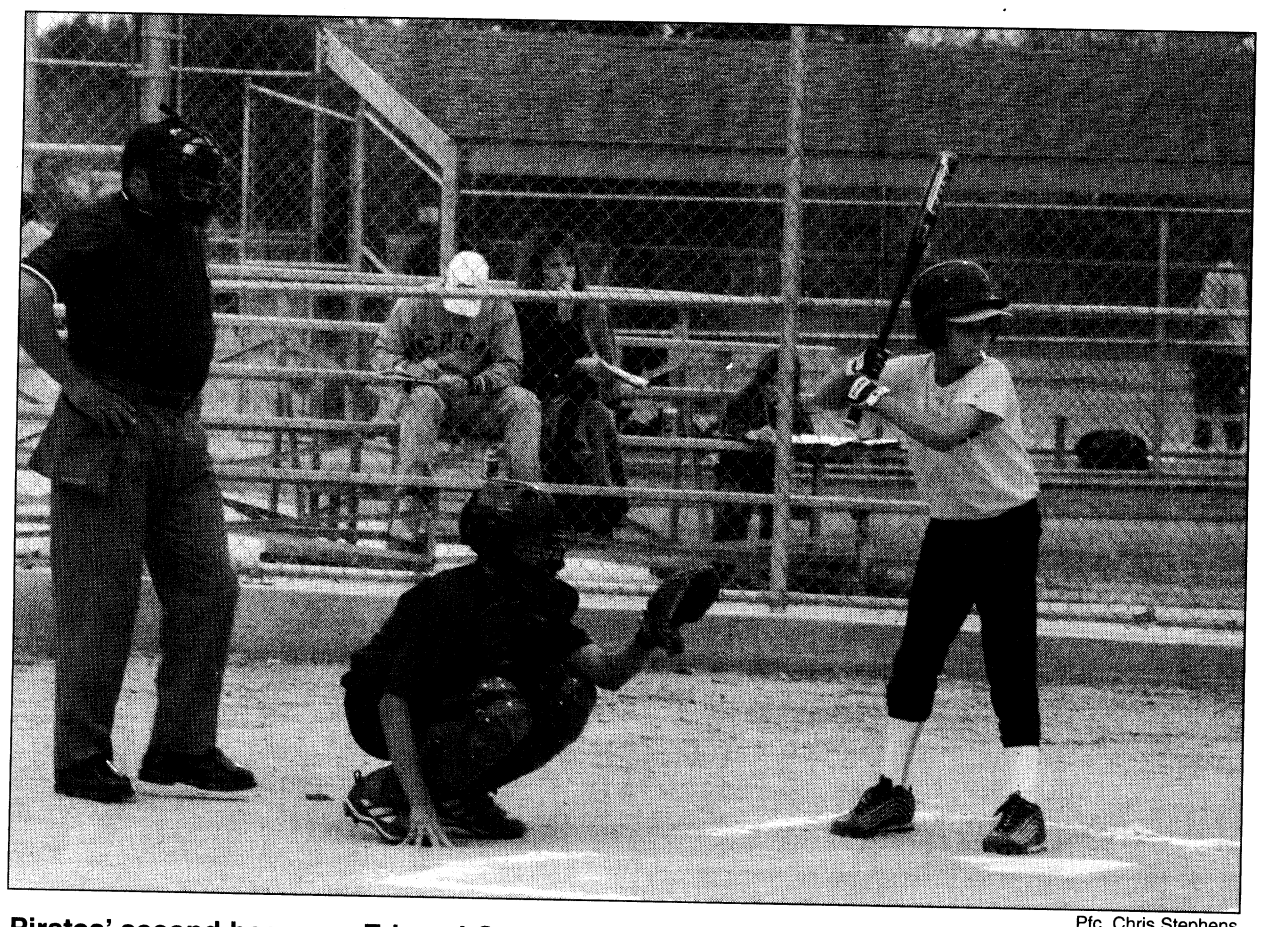
"We turned up the defense in the second half," said Julian Martin. "Our passing improved, too."

The Bulldawgs would not play dead. Two quick steals by Bulldawg Buford Grigley and layups by big-man Desmond Williams cut the Roughrider lead to two, but the Roughriders hit free throws late and came up with a crucial steal of their own to smash the nail in the Bulldawg coffin.

The Roughriders showed a lot of heart, Johnson said. The soldiers have worked long hours the past couple of months, and they continued to give their all on the court.

"I am proud of them and their tenacity on and off the court, which represents the hard work ethic of this company," Johnson said.

Martin finished with 8 and Lincoln Smith scored 10 points for the Roughriders.



Thomas Wright had 10 and Grigley and Williams added 14 each for the fourth-place Bulldawgs.

Both teams played a sloppy first half. Turnovers, fouls and lackadaisical defense plagued both teams, and neither team could break it open. The Bulldawgs were up, 24-22.

Later in the evening, the Roughriders fought valiantly in the second game of the evening but fell to B Company, 1st Battalion, 10th Field Artillery Regiment Raging Bulls, 68-59, to take home the third-place trophy.

"I think we did well," Martin said. "We've come a long way from two seasons ago when we were zero and eight. Now, our team is known on post — we're tough on defense, and we're balanced on offense."

OCS wants win

Joint military competition to be April 20

Spc. Douglas DeMaio
Bayonet staff

Officer candidates will travel to Pensacola, Fla., April 19 for the April 20 Joint Military Athletic Competition. The candidates will compete against Air Force and Navy officer candidates in a variety of sporting events, which range from a 440-yard relay race to a volleyball match, for bragging rights and the "bomb," a 30-pound trophy of a dummy round painted in the victor's colors.

The competition originated in 1991 when an Air Force general suggested a friendly contest between the officer schools of the Air Force and Navy to foster unity among the branches. Since then, the competition has grown into a rivalry between four military branches.

"We are prepared at this time," said Dennis Berry, officer candidate and Army JMAC coach. "We are ready to win the bomb."

In the last nine competitions, the officer candidates of 3rd Battalion, 11th Infantry Regiment, have victoriously won the "bomb" eight times.

The winning streak began in 1998 for the Army's OCS team, said Capt. Luther Miller, company commander of B Company, 3rd Bn., 11th Inf. Regt., and co-director for the Army team.

"We definitely want to uphold the standard," Berry said. "The competition is very intense. We won it so many times, and we don't want to lose."

The candidates have trained hard for six weeks to prepare for the competition, Berry said. Spending time training together has helped the candidates build team cohesion by challenging one another to exceed their limits.

For those who are interested about the outcome of the JMAC, there will be a score board outside the OCS barracks on the day of the event with updates on the leaders of the competition.

Everyone on post is welcome to stop by the barracks and view the score or travel to Pensacola to watch the event first hand.

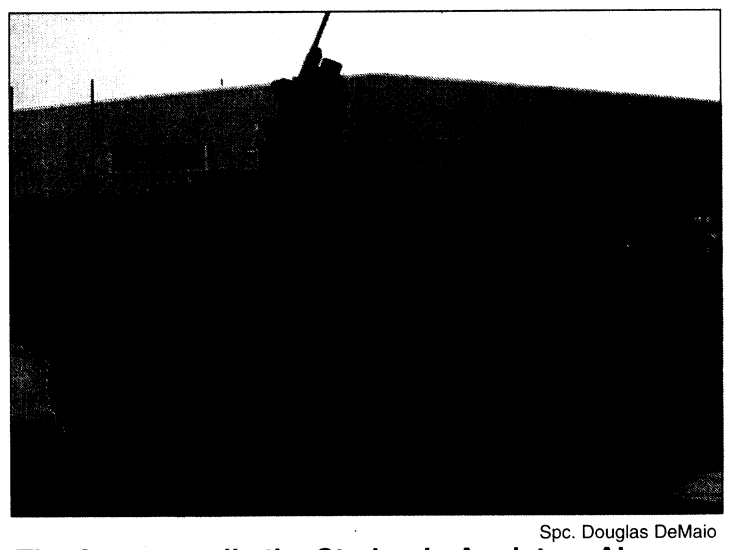
Army unveils new Stryker

Quick-strike capabilities fulfill vision

Spc. Douglas DeMaio
Bayonet staff



The physical transformation of the Army began with the unveiling of the Stryker April 12 at the Anniston Army Depot, Ala.

"The Stryker has ended up being the foundation for the transformation," said Col. Charles Betack, TRADOC System Manager for the Bradley and Stryker vehicles. "It gives us a new way of thinking."

The vehicle gives the Army more options and agility for the planing of missions, Betack said. It gives the Army a quick-strike ability to send in a medium armored vehicle, capable of withstanding a rocket propelled grenade with its additional add-on armor, into the battlefield with light infantry soldiers to give them more lethality and fire power.

In Operation Desert Storm, the Army discovered its short-comings and realized there is a need to be more deployable with greater lethality, said Gen. Eric K. Shinseki, Army chief of staff. This led to the goal of transforming the Army into a more responsive, GUANTANMO BAY, Cuba — When terrorists attacked the United States Sept. 11, Pvt. Hunter Harshbarger was angry and wanted to immediately join the war on terror. But he couldn't because he was in his sixth week of Basic Combat Training at Fort Leonard Wood, Mo.

Four months later, Harshbarger's wish came true. However, he wasn't in Afghanistan as he'd originally hoped, but face to face with Taliban and al-Qaeda fighters detained at Camp X-ray, at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

"I never expected to go to Cuba," he said. "I realize this mission is as important as the mission other soldiers are doing in Afghanistan to support Operation Enduring Freedom."

Harshbarger, from the 988th Military Police Company at Fort Benning, arrived in Cuba in January to support Joint Task Force-160.

Capt. Darrell Sides, commander of the 988th, said JTF-160's mission is to take custody of designated detainees at the aerial point of embarkation in Kandahar, Afghanistan, from Central Command personnel. The detainees are then transported to a temporary detention facility

Soldiers die as result of accident

Army News Service

Four U.S. soldiers were killed and another injured in Afghanistan when a 107 mm rocket exploded April 15 while the troops were destroying captured weapons near Kandahar, according to U.S. Central Command officials.

The soldiers killed were: Staff Sgt. Brian T. Craig of Texas, 27; Staff Sgt. Justin J. Galewski, 28; and Sgt. Jamie O. Maugans, 27, both from Kansas, and Sgt. 1st Class Daniel A. Romero of Colorado, 30. The first three were members of the 710th Explosive Ordnance Detachment from San Diego and Romero was assigned to the 19th Special Forces Group in Pueblo, Colo.

CENTCOM officials said the wounded soldier was evacuated to a medical facility at Kandahar. The soldier's names have not been released.

"This tragic event highlights that even when not actively engaged against enemy forces that our service men and women remain at risk as they perform their mission around the world and particularly in Afghanistan," said Air Force Gen. Richard Myers, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

He underscored this point by describing several incidents from over the weekend in Tenacity.

It's the common trait found in all airborne soldiers. It's the desire to "go the extra mile," to be more than a soldier. Tenacity is what sets paratroopers apart, said retired Command Sgt. Maj. Duke Armendariz, president of the 82nd Airborne Division Association.

"It's the biggest fraternity in the world, this airborne brotherhood. And tenacity is what makes us a part of it," he said.

And it's what brings them back, year after year, by the hundreds, to the Airborne Awards Ceremony on Fort Benning. Tenacity is what drives them, despite their growing frailties and dwindling numbers.

"It used to take several buses to bring them all," said Reiko Butler, as three chartered buses dispatched aging veterans, one right after the other, and their family members, mostly wives, who traveled from all over the country to attend the 25th annual event, April 11.

Volunteers talk the talk, walk the walk to cure cancer

Laura Martinson
Special to the Bayonet©

COMMENTARY

Menopause.

That's something my mom has not yet experienced.

But cancer she has.

I'm sorry, I know words like menopause are somewhat taboo and unappealing to the reader's eye. So what about these? Breast, colon, uterine and skin.

Want to know what those four things have in common? Those are the four types of cancer my 83-year-old grandma has survived.

Did you know that having breast cancer before menopause increases the likelihood that you carry the gene for breast cancer, therefore increasing the likelihood of passing it on to your children?

Bet you can't guess how I feel about all of this. Worried? Scared for my own personal health? Guess again.

Let's backtrack.

When I was asked to write about volunteerism, I initially drew a blank. What do I know about volunteering? As much as I want to, I rarely manage my time well enough to accomplish my own daily tasks.

My editor subtly agreed. Then she reminded me of the things that I do that make a difference. Like the American Cancer Society's Relay for Life next month. No, this is not another plug for a charitable event.

Rather, I feel the need to remind everyone what a constant cancer is for everyone. But instead of shoving more statistics in your face, I'll tell you a little story.

I knew when I volunteered to do the walk I would have no problem raising the minimum $100 contribution for the American Cancer Society. When my daughter decided to join me, I thought we'd better get on the horn.

So I sent out an e-mail to the friends and family members I felt comfortable enough to ask for a donation. I explained to them that while helping out a more than worthy cause, young Kait would hopefully learn a lesson in giving.

What I got back was astounding. Not only did I reach my goal within a mere hour, but I also learned the far-reaching effect this disease has.

Dear Laura,

As you well know, my father had prostate cancer and both of my older brothers are cancer survivors. I'll put my check in the mail tomorrow.

Love, Dad

Dear Laura,

I would love to donate money to such a worthy cause. You know how I feel about it and you know why. My own mom had breast cancer at a very early age and is a survivor. I wish we could do the walk together.

Love, Jen

And so they came, one by one, responses about their own personal experiences and the survivors they know. Out of 15 people I sent the e-mail to, 14 responded with their story. I'd say that's a pretty good response. I'd also say that's a pretty powerful statistic.

So when I say I feel empowered by all of this, you may think me to be crazy. But I say I'm given an opportunity, one that may benefit my own health and my daughters'. Maybe that makes me selfish, but I choose to think it makes me wise enough to see the chance to give a gift to those I love the most.

So come May 17th, you can bet your top dollar you'll find me on the track. Better yet, donate your top dollar to someone who's walking. It just might be a favor you're paying yourself or someone you love.

The American Cancer Society Relay for Life begins at 7 p.m. May 17 to 1 p.m. May 18 at Kinnett Stadium, Columbus.

For more information, call 324-4573.

Help the Earth, clean out your files

Danielle G. Durante
Directorate of Facilities Engineering and Logistics

COMMENTARY

The environment is something people talk about but seldom do anything about.

Earth Week is just around the corner. In fact it is next week, and what better way to celebrate the earth than with a weeklong event of recovering a valuable natural resource — paper?

Fort Benning's Recycling Program, supported by the U.S. Conference of Mayors, is urging companies and the community to join in the "Clean Your Files Week" to recycle used office paper. The Recycling Program kicks-off this event on Earth Day, which is Monday.

The idea is to set aside one day of Earth Week to clean out your files, but with a twist. Don't just discard those old, dated piles of paper — all those memos, unwanted mail, reports and brochures you haven't read in a year and probably can't locate if you wanted to. Recycling instead.

By recovering them, you can turn a useful housekeeping exercise into an environmentally valuable one.

While all that paper stuffed in the file cabinets may have lost value to you, it's still valuable to the recyclers. Old memos can be transformed into useful fiber and eventually new products.

Offices not only contain large quantities of recyclable paper, but the paper industry finds the best quality paper for recycling into new products in the office as well.

Old mail, memos, letters and reports are prize commodities to recyclers. Printing and writing paper usually contain high quality fiber, making our offices rich deposits of raw material, which paper companies can use again after they remove the ink, adhesives and other impurities.

In short everyone benefits from Clean Your Files Day.

We empty our files of out-of-date paper to make room for more recent memos, reports and brochures.

The haulers have a valuable cargo to fill their trucks.

Fort Benning's Recycling Program gets a high-quality raw material to manufacture new products.

And, of course, the local landfill is free of tons of used paper, thus lowering disposal costs to local taxpayers and lengthening the life of landfills.

So join us for some spring-cleaning. You have nothing to lose but your old files.

Remember to separate your whites, it makes the paper more valuable.

For information on recycling pick up or Clean Your Files Day, call Fort Benning Recycling at 544-6142 or Walter Nichols at 544-7187.

COMMENTARY

I thought the branch lying across the bike path looked odd, somehow. But it was on the side Mr. Mileage was riding on, so I didn't pay much attention to it.

By the time I realized what it was and yelled, "SNAKE," it was too late.

He ran over it.

Since I hadn't rolled over the snake, I was reasonably certain that he wouldn't hold being run over against me. Just in case, Mr. Mileage and I didn't waste any time at our halfway point for our usual water break.

We turned around and headed straight back, hydrating on the fly. No point giving him enough time to set up a hasty ambush on the bike path, especially since Ranger Rocha wasn't along for the ride.

I shared the story of this particular close encounter with some Bayonet staffers, which led one of them to tell us about the (dead) snake her husband had recently brought home from a fishing trip. He went on to share some pointers on how to discern between a venomous snake and the nonvenomous variety:

"See his eyes? See the shape of his head? That's how you know he's bad."

I don't have an aversion to snakes, especially when they are in tanks, clearly identified. But I'm not getting close enough to an unidentified snake to examine his eyes and head to figure out if he's venomous or not.

If we're outside, all I really want to see are his back and tail … from a safe distance.

What's that rhyme? Is it "Red touches black, jump back Jack"? Or maybe it's "Red touches yellow is an OK fellow." Or maybe…what is it, anyway?

"It's red touches yellow will kill a fellow, red touches black, venom lack."

"Someone told me 'If his nose is black it means he's bad.' Or maybe 'If his nose is black he's not bad.'"

"You're not being very helpful. Which is it?"

"I don't worry about it. If I can't see his nose, he's going the right way."

The people I work with now are not the only co-workers I've had who have an aversion to snakes.

Take the naval reservist who was scheduled to go to "the field" one early spring weekend.

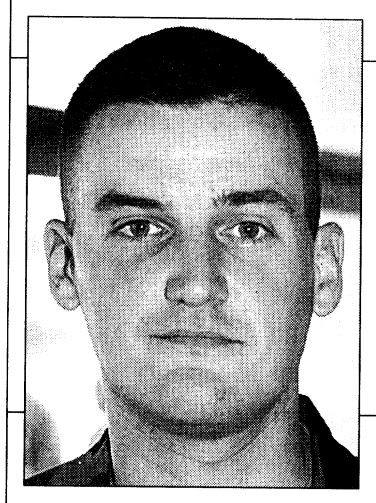
He was quite apprehensive about the whole excursion, especially since it had been unseasonably cool.

I tried to get him to look at the bright side of the lower temperatures.

"No bugs are out yet. That's a good thing. When you wake up in the morning, you'll be alone in your sleeping bag."

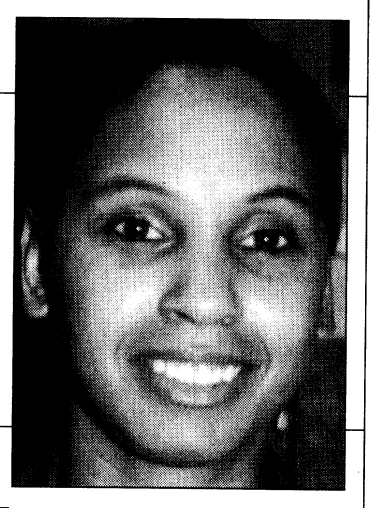
Aghast, he informed me that there were no women in his reserve unit.

"I wasn't talking about women, I was talking about snakes."



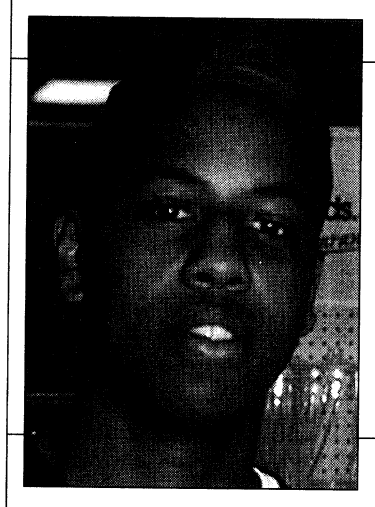
"SNAKES??? There are snakes out in the field?"

"Well, yeah. We have to keep them some place, and they don't like being cooped up in the building."

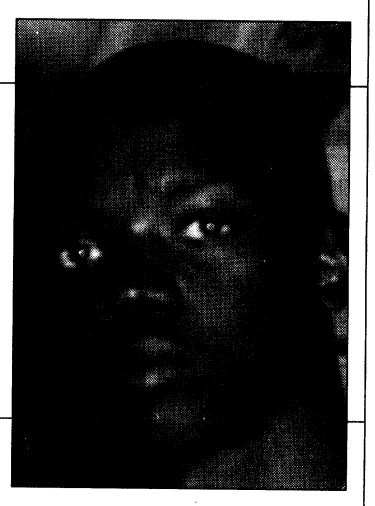


He wasn't the same for almost a week. Even Mr. Mileage recovered quicker than that.

VARIOUS VOICES



How have you responded to the president's call for volunteers?



Capt. Jason E. Lester, 1st Battalion, 19th Infantry Regiment — "I am a reservist, and I got called to active duty for one year to support training base expansion."

Sgt. Chontel Rideaux, 1st Battalion, 11th Infantry Regiment — "I volunteer with the Girl Scouts. We have cookouts, arts and crafts, sleepovers and lots of other fun stuff."

Phillip Thompson, family member — "I'm too young to volunteer, but if I was old enough, I would do it in a heartbeat. Volunteering is cool."

Sgt. Keveius Polite, 608th Ordnance Company — "I am currently looking at organizations I can volunteer in. I think volunteering is a good thing."

Master Sgt. Dottie Vick, 1st Battalion, 11th Infantry Regiment — "I'm still getting settled in on post. I plan on getting involved in the local churches. I think everyone should volunteer."

Peggy Daniels, AAFES employee — "I love to help out at church and do various things around there. I also believe prayer is a big part to answering the presidents call for volunteers."

MPs: Guard Taliban prisoners at Guantanamo Bay

at "Gitmo."

Although his 80 soldiers support JTF-160, Sides said their mission differs from that of other MPs at Camp X-ray.

"Our main mission is supporting JTF-170's Joint Interagency Interrogation Facility," he said.

His soldiers go into Camp X-ray and escort detainees out of the camp one at a time, taking them to one of several interview rooms set-up adjacent to the detention facility.

The MPs remain with the detainee while various law-enforcement agents and military-intelligence representatives from all the military branches conduct detailed interviews with the detainee. Once the interview is completed, the MPs take the detainee back to his cell.

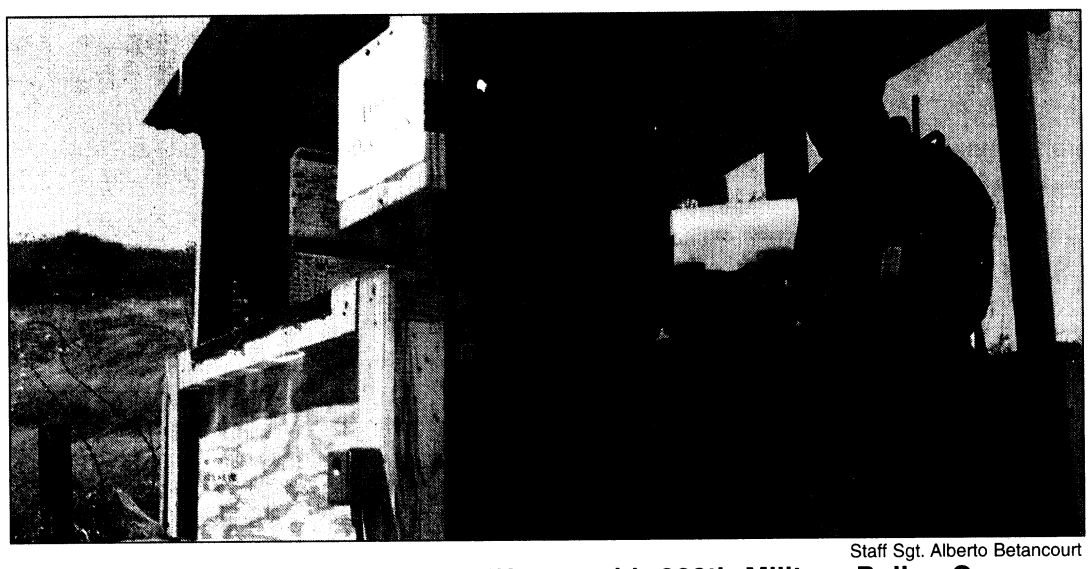
"These detainees require more security than a prisoner sitting on death row," Sides said. "The people on death row generally want to live. Most of the detainees not only want to die, they want to take somebody with them in the process."

To ensure proper security, there are three MPs assigned to escort each detainee. Two MPs are on each side of the detainee while NCO follows closely in the rear serving as a third set of eyes and communication coordinator with other MPs who guard the detainees.

"It takes approximately 10 minutes to get through all the gates inside the detention facility before reaching the interview room," Sides said.

Because of the uniqueness of the mission in Cuba, the 988th soldiers went through additional training, including cross-training with the infantry.

"We trained in various nonlethal tactics before departing Fort Benning," said Staff Sgt. John Barnett. "We've also been developing training here as the mission continues."



Sides said he only has half his company with him in Cuba supporting JTF-160, but all his soldiers have actively supported the nation's war on terrorism by providing security in different locations.

"One of my platoons was deployed to the Army War College at Carlisle Barracks, Pa., in September," he said. "Another platoon went to the Pentagon in December."

The Fort Benning MPs are splitting their tasking between the two platoons. Each platoon works 14 hours a day for two consecutive days, then they're off for two days.

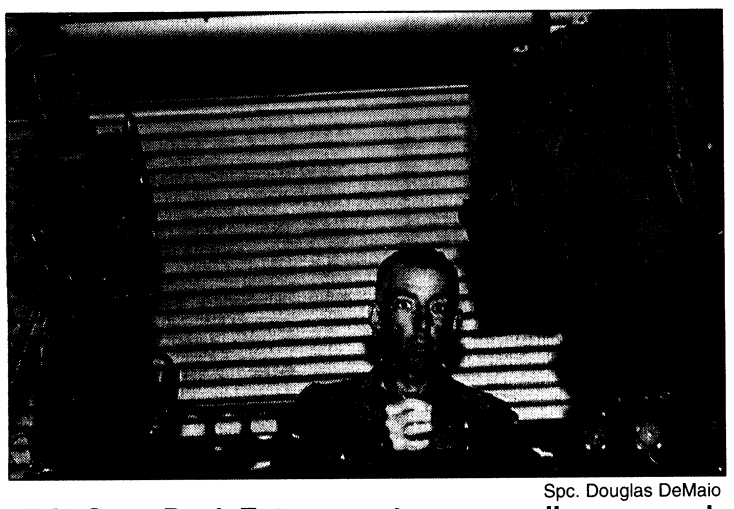
Living in Freedom Heights, a tent city on a small hill overlooking Camp X-ray, the 988th soldiers are in a tactical environment.

When they get time off, they can travel three miles down the road and find themselves in a garrison environment where the aqua waters of the Caribbean Sea and Atlantic Ocean invite them in.

Staff Sgt. Alberto Betancourt

Sgt. Shelton Gore and Spc. Larry Waters with 988th Military Police Company man a guard shack inside the JIIF perimeter located adjacent to Camp X-Ray.

"Gitmo has great morale-support facilities," Barnett said. "Our soldiers have had the opportunity to scuba dive, snorkel, water ski and take part in other water activities."



But when it's time to go back to work, the MPs become focused and are serious about their mission.

"I still remember how I felt on September 11," Harshbarger said. "But we keep our emotions to ourselves. Our company motto is 'Fair, Firm and Professional.' We treat the detainees like humans, but we also use every measure to protect ourselves."

Sides said he's proud of his soldiers and expects to be part of JTF-160 for at least six months.

"We're part of JTF-160 working to support JTF-170," he said. "And JTF-170's mission is to gather information to prevent further terrorist acts against Americans. This is a very serious mission."

deployable, lethal, survivable and sustainable force.

"The vehicle is not as complex as the Bradley," said Thomas McNerney, transformation team chief for the Directorate of Operations and Training.

The Stryker is made by the Joint Venture Team of General Motors and General Dynamics Land Systems Defense Group. It is powered by a 350-horse power diesel engine, has a top speed of 60 mph and can climb a 23-degree incline.

"It's going to be a great improvement for the military," said Bob Sherman, senior technical specialist and driver for the Basic Combat Team. "It's a very stable vehicle.

"It's quick, maneuverable and easy to drive. And, it has a computer system to tell you if anything is wrong with it."

Out of the nine Infantry Carrier Vehicle configurations the Stryker has, Fort Benning will initially see four of them plus the Mobile Gun System fixed with a 105-mm turreted gun, Sherman said. All the vehicles will be for training purposes. The Mortar Carrier, Anti-Tank Guided Missile, Commander's Vehicle and Reconnaissance Vehicle are the vehicle configurations Fort Benning units will use to train.

Interim Brigade Combat Teams will receive more than 80 percent of the thousands of Strykers. Fort Lewis, Wash., will begin receiving their Strykers in May for their two interim brigades. Brigades at Fort Richardson, Alaska; Schofield Barracks, Hawaii; Fort Polk, La.; and the Pennsylvania Army National Guard will receive their Strykers when the Army assembles their interim brigades.

The Stryker is named after two medal of honor recipients, Spc. Robert F. Stryker of C Company, 1st Battalion, 26th Infantry, 1st Infantry Division, for his valorous actions near Loc Ninh, Vietnam, and Pfc. Stuart S. Stryker of E Co., 513th Parachute Inf., 17th Airborne Div., for his unhesitating self-sacrifice near Wesel, Germany, March 24, 1945.

"You understand how we in the Army feel we have the perfect name for the vehicle, the Stryker," Shinseki said.

Troopers: Descend on Airborne Walk by hundreds

World War II guys by 1,000 a day," said Thad Selman, one of our members of the original test platoon honored at the awards ceremony.

"We're thinning out," he said, as he scanned the crowd of more than 200.

Make no mistake, the airborne soldier is not an endangered species, and their fraternity will not disappear. New faces appear every year, veterans of Vietnam, Panama and peacetime. Like retired Sgt. 1st Class Joe Montoya, they come to honor their comrades.

"I come here out of respect for those who went before me," said the 20-year, 300-jump airborne veteran, who retired in 1971 after two tours in Vietnam. "I always thought jumping was just a way to get to work, but compared to these World War II soldiers, I'm just a novice."

The tradition started "many, many years ago," said B.C. Reese, as a reunion for the soldiers of the original test platoon, the Army's first parachute unit, which started in 1940. Only a handful of those paratroop pioneers remain, including Reese, but their reunions grew to include thousands of retired and active-duty airborne soldiers and family members.

Since 1986, they've met at Fort Benning, kicking off their reunion with a memorial service and wreath laying ceremony at the Airborne Walk, which was dedicated to "all American airborne troopers past, present and future."

They come wearing the insignia of more than 30 airborne and special forces units spanning 62 years of airborne history.

The airborne community has had "an extraordinary collective impact on our country and countless others," said Maj. Gen. Paul Eaton, Fort Benning's commanding general, as he welcomed the veterans and visitors, including Maurice Renaud, of Normandy, whose father was the mayor of St. Mere Eglis during World War II, and Alan Boot, who traveled from Leicester, England, to pay homage to his "friends in the 82nd."

"I was just a lad in World War II, when the soldiers encamped around Leicester. I've come to say thank you," said the 74-year-old Boot, who remembers sneaking into the American's camp for cigarettes and candy. "They were good to us, and I've never forgotten them."

Renaud said he, too, attended the reunion to say thank you to the American soldiers who fought alongside his countrymen in France.

"We have a long and rich history with the airborne community, and it's one we wish to continue," he said.

The guest speaker, retired Lt. Gen. Carmen Cavezza, a former Fort Benning commander and master parachutist, said he visited the Airborne Walk just days before the ceremony seeking inspiration for his speech.

"And I found it right here, at this site, where such a good feeling permeates," Cavezza said. "Here I found my message, among these reminders of the great airborne soldiers and units of the past. The airborne is alive and well. It's still indispensable and irreplaceable.

"We're now engaged in another war, perhaps the most challenging ever, but this generation, this nation, will prevail once again. Our time, yours and mine, has come and gone, but these soldiers stand ready, and they need our moral support and encouragement," Cavezza said.

John Schroer was drafted into the Army in 1941, and volunteered for the 13th Airborne Division in 1943. He was late for the airborne reunion because he was attending his grandson's graduation from basic training on Sand Hill.

"That was more important, of course. But aren't we lucky we could be here together for this," he said, standing alongside 19-year-old Pvt. Tommy Schroer, a Kentucky National Guardsman who hopes to be an airborne soldier like his grandfather.

"This makes me feel ... It's hard to describe," the younger Schroer shrugged, as he scanned the crowd of airborne veterans. "It's impressive. Makes you want to be a part of it. Makes me proud to be an American soldier."

Soldiers killed in Afghanistan

Afghanistan. The general described an apparent firefight April 13 in which a convoy of U.S. and Afghan forces was fired upon and called in a U.S. AC-130 gunship for support.

"The aircraft located and fired upon the enemy position, killing several of the enemy," he said.

Myers said U.S. Special Forces soldiers and friendly Afghan forces found several weapons storage sites while searching a suspected enemy complex. The sites contained mines, rockets, explosives and anti-aircraft artillery pieces "that we assess were used for training," he said.

Two incidences of suspected rocket-propelled grenade fire were reported in the vicinity of Khost over the weekend. Myers said two suspected RPGs were fired April 13 near U.S. positions at an airfield in the area, but resulted in no injuries or damage to friendly forces or equipment. Another two suspected RPGs impacted about two kilometers from the same airfield April 14. Myers said it was uncertain that the weapons were even targeting U.S. positions.

"While we've made good progress in restoring stability to Afghanistan, clearly getting a peaceful environment will take a good deal of time," Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said. "The country is fragmented politically. It does not have a strong tradition of democracy, as we all know, and I think any expectation that it will suddenly transform itself into a Western-style democracy ever, let alone instantaneously, is misplaced." However, he said, "the sporadic violence of recent days is nothing compared to the brutal rule of the Taliban and the al Qaeda."

CENTRAL TEXAS COLLEGE

Infantry school welcomes new CSM

Michael Kelso no stranger to community

Pfc. Brian Trapp
Bayonet staff

No one is more professional than I. I am a noncommissioned officer, a leader of soldiers.

Many say these words, but Command Sgt. Maj. Michael Kelso demonstrates these values to the letter, said Col. Chip Cole, commander of Basic Combat Training Brigade.

Kelso took over the command sergeant major of the U.S. Army Infantry School position from retired Command Sgt. Maj. Miles Retherford March 4 and is just starting to settle into the seat.

"I'm not bringing anything unique that makes me different from my predecessors," Kelso said. "All the other sergeants major whom have assumed the position continued making the infantry school the premiere infantry training installation in the U.S. Army."

With such a long line of successful command sergeants major to follow, Kelso hopes to carry on their legacy.

"My goal is for the infantry school is to continue to turn out the finest infantry soldiers, NCOs and officers whom have been a hallmark of the infantry school since General George Marshall was the assistant commandant of the school in 1927."

As a command sergeant major, Kelso is living the NCO creed — All soldiers are entitled to outstanding leadership, and he is providing that leadership, said Cole, life time ranger buddy of Kelso.

Kelso

"His strongest characteristic is his absolute dedication to the mission and the welfare of his soldiers," Cole said. "He has an incredible amount of knowledge and shares it with NCOs and officers."

When Cole was a platoon leader in 1st Battalion, 75th Ranger Regiment, Kelso was one of the squad leaders. He also served as Cole's battalion command sergeant major at Fort Richardson, Ala., Ranger Regiment and the 501st Parachute Infantry Regt.

"I've been sleeping next to Sergeant Major Kelso in the field since 1979, and I've never heard anyone snore as loudly as him," Cole said.

Sleeping habits aside, Kelso loves the military and its long history.

Kelso is a military historian and finds satisfaction in learning the history of units. He collects military hardware, uniforms and equipment.

When Kelso was stationed in Alaska, there was a battalion headquarters there with nothing on the walls, Cole said. Kelso put together a museum of World War II paratrooper uniforms and equipment. It was an incredible inspiration to soldiers and had a positive effect on the morale and welfare of the unit.

Now, he looks to the future of the Army.

"Fort Benning has an important role to play in the transformation of the Army objective-force soldier," Kelso said. "No matter what the eventual look of the objective force is, the infantry soldier trained by Fort Benning will remain the world's premier combat soldier."

Kelso has already served at Fort Benning for several years and knows how important the school and his position are to the Army.

"I'm honored to have been chosen by (Major) General (Paul) Eaton and (Brigadier) General (David) Rodriguez and (Command) Sergeant Major (Gereld) Klein," Kelso said. "I have the tremendous pleasure of looking forward to working with all the personnel of Fort Benning."

His colleagues not only think he will do well, they trust him with their lives.

"Sergeant Major Kelso is the kind of NCO I would follow up a lit gasoline alley under intense fire," Cole said.

Fort Benning CIF receives black berets

Second roll-out to be soon for soldiers

Staff Sgt. Marcia Triggs
Army News Service

WASHINGTON — Fort Benning soldiers and other active-duty and mobilized reserve-component soldiers will get their second black berets.

The Fort Benning Central Issue Facility received the berets, and will soon inform soldiers when they will distribute them, said a post CIF official.

The fielding of initial berets was completed Jan. 25 with distribution to soldiers in 88th Regional Support Command, Fort Snelling, Minn.

The fielding of second berets to reserve-component units that are not mobilized will be complete by September 2003, Dave Geringer said, assistant product manager for Product Manager Soldier Equipment.

When Army and Air Force Exchange Services will stock the berets is still unknown, he said.

"The priority is to provide a sufficient stock to all units, including Reserve and National Guard, and establish a sustained supply," said Martin Fadden, a logistics management specialist for G-4, Department of the Army.

AAFES is given the option to purchase berets directly from the manufacturer instead of having to request supplies from Defense Logistics Agency's Defense Supply Center Philadelphia. That option could put berets on AAFES' shelves sooner than expected, Fadden said. The details are being worked out.

Unlike the first beret-fielding schedule that lasted eight months, the majority of the second shipment of berets will be completed in April, Faden said. Berets are in stock, he said, which is why fielding is going so well.

Last May when berets were scheduled to reach the troops for the Army's 226th birthday, delivery was delayed when three contracts were cancelled with U.S. companies that had beret factories in Romania, South Africa and India due to quality issues and an inability to meet delivery schedules.

In addition to the contract cancellations, Army Chief of Staff Gen. Eric Shinseki announced that U.S. troops would not wear berets made in China or made with Chinese content.

An order for about 618,000 berets had been contracted to Kangol Limited, a British firm that subcontracted to produce the berets at a factory in China.

Currently Bancroft Cap Company in Cabot, Ark., and Dorothea Knitting, Canada, are the only beret manufacturers, according to officials at DLA. Small businesses have been solicited to compete for beret contracts, and two contracts will possibly be awarded in May to domestic small business firms, officials said.

Competition has fantastic feast of foods

Mentorship provides future cycle of leaders

Spc. Douglas DeMaio
Bayonet staff

The 36th Engineer Group food advisor, Master Sgt. Carolyn Lewis, traveled with two of her soldiers, Pfc. Felicia Ware and Pfc. Jeanette Castro, to Fort Lee, Va. March 12–14 to compete in the 27th annual U.S. Army Culinary Arts Competition.

The three combined for one Gold Medal, four Silver Medals and seven Bronze Medals.

"I felt it was a good experience," said Ware, a cook attached to 690th Medical Company, (Ground Ambulance). "I enjoyed the competition."

The competition allowed the soldiers to gain a greater understanding of their profession and grasp new and exciting culinary techniques for recipes, Ware said.

"It was a wonderful experience for me," said Castro, a cook attached to 608th Ordnance Co. "I learned many things I didn't know before."

Soldiers had the chance to learn from all the top cooks, Lewis said. It was a chance for young soldiers to gain a vast amount of experience.

In the field, the limited kinds of food, such as eggs, flour, milk, sugar and bread, can cause meals to be boring. However, if there is a creative culinary-arts student in the field, the meals made by the student will not only appeal to soldiers in the way they taste but also in the way they look.

"We have to come up with new ideas," Lewis said. "We want to make sure all the food tastes great and has good eye appeal."

Making the food eye-catching can intrigue a soldier to try foods they're not normally used to eating, Lewis said. It can also motivate the soldiers preparing the food.

"It's fulfilling to present soldiers with a meal that has taken planning, effort and ones own personal touch," Ware said. "Soldiers require the best.

"I also think Fort Benning should be very proud to have NCOs who put their soldier in to a position to excel."

Junior enlisted soldiers felt their NCOs helped them prepare for the competition.

"Every time we had a question they would be there to help us out," Castro said.

Being straight forward and not sugar coating things is the best approach toward improvement, Lewis said. Judges know what it takes to do things right and correcting mistakes leads to the path of success.

"Anytime a private can learn what's right from wrong and then execute a task without the presence of an NCO, that soldier will have a successful Army career," Lewis said.

Rewarding soldiers for their excellence and encouraging them to mentor their soldiers in the same fashion when they become leaders is a necessary part of team building, she said.

"It takes a team effort to be successful," Lewis said.

Mexican defense minister visits post

WHINSEC, general talk about training

Sgt. Daniel Monroy
WHINSEC Public Affairs

Mexican Defense Minister Gen. Gerardo Vega visited Fort Benning and the Western Hemisphere Institute for Security Cooperation April 10 for a tour of the Department of Defense school that trains students under his command.

Fort Benning was the first stop for Vega in the United States. He is scheduled to visit Fort Bragg, N.C., and Andrews Air Force Base, Md., next.

"For us, it was an honor to receive General Vega and walk him through some of the classes and introduce him to some of the students attending WHINSEC from Mexico," said Lt. Col. Jose Cruz, a Command and General Staff Course guest instructor from the Mexican army.

"I think his visit was especially important to the junior (Mexican) service members attending WHINSEC courses. It's important for soldiers to see their leaders face to face. It lets them know that their leadership knows they're here and that they are progressing professionally," Cruz said.

"We wanted to show him (Mexican Defense Minister) the opportunities available here for professional development and invite more students here from Mexico," said Lee Rials, WHINSEC Public Affairs Officer.

Seven Mexican students are projected for this fiscal year, Rials said.

During his visit, Vega received U.S. Army Infantry Center and WHINSEC briefings and a lunch with Maj. Gen. Paul Eaton, U.S. Infantry Center commanding general and Col. Richard D. Downie, commandant.

Army introduces 'old' recruiting initiative

Civilians now enlisting for special duty

Spc. Kyle Cosner
U.S. Army Special Operations Command

FORT BRAGG, N.C. — A new Army program that allows recruits to enlist directly into Special Forces training here is currently underway and receiving a favorable response from civilians interested in earning the Green Beret, said officials from the U.S. Army Recruiting Command at Fort Knox, Ky.

"Since we restored the program, the results have been extremely positive," said Capt. David P. Connolly, a public information officer at the U.S. Army Recruiting Command. "We anticipate achieving mission success well before the end of the fiscal year."

Revived in mid-January, the Special Forces Recruiting Initiative is a return to the original SF recruitment process, which began in 1952 and allowed both civilians and servicemen to sign up for the nearly two years of training necessary to become a Green Beret.

"I think this program is the best thing to happen to Special Forces in years," said Col. Charles A. King, 1st Special Warfare Training Group (Airborne) commander. "It will allow us to recruit the right kind of guy off the street, train him, prepare him and mold him right from the start."

In 1988, the recruiting process was adjusted to allow only soldiers to become SF qualified.

"The Army at that time had three-quarters of a million people in it, and Special Forces was about 20 percent smaller than," King said. "With the Army being bigger and Special Forces being smaller, we discontinued the (recruiting) program. Now we're down to a 480,000 person Army with significantly larger SF groups."

"We're restoring a program we used to have in order to meet our current operational requirements," King said. "We looked back and studied the (pre-1988) program. We're going to improve on it (with the Special Forces Recruiting Initiative)."

As of March 28, Army recruiters have already filled 140 of the 400 slots allotted for civilians enlisting into the Special Forces Recruiting Initiative, Connolly said.

He said since the pilot program started in January, it has met with much interest among those interested in the military.

According to data provided by the recruiting command, the first 56 SF recruits shipped out during the first week in April to begin nearly two years of training required to earn the beret.

Among the 140 SF hopefuls recruited so far, Connolly said 22 possess undergraduate degrees, three have a master's degree and two have earned a Ph.D.

"We're seeing a great deal of quality in these applicants," Connolly said.

Recruits who begin training under the new program will enter the Army as a private first class, eventually earning the rank of sergeant when they complete training, King said.

"This program is not about putting privates on Special Forces teams. A soldier that comes in under this program will join a team as a noncommissioned officer," he added.

Capt. Joe Martin, a 1st Special Warfare Training Group (Abn.) training detachment commander, said new recruits will have a slightly different initial training process, resulting in a higher success rate than past SF hopefuls going through the process.

Special Forces Assessment and Selection is designed to advance only highly qualified soldiers to the next levels of training.

Martin said traditional in-service recruits go straight to Special Forces Assessment and Selection from their unit when they volunteer. To prepare those recruited under the new recruiting initiative for success, the 1st Special Warfare Training Group (Abn.) has created the Special Operations Preparation and Conditioning course.

> "We're restoring a program we used to have in order to meet our current operational requirements."
> Col. Charles A. King
> Commander, 1st Special Warfare Training Group (Airborne)

"A soldier coming through (the course) will be better prepared for assessment and selection than one who didn't," Martin said.

During the class, veteran SF soldiers conduct intensive training in land navigation, physical training and other soldier skills with recruits.

In just four weeks, a class of soldiers who volunteered for SF training from infantry training at Fort Benning improved their average score on the Army Physical Fitness Test by 30 points at the conditioning course, from 229 to 259, Martin said.

The recently enlisted soldiers were used as training prototypes for the civilians recruited under the new initiative.

King said the initial Special Operations Preparation and Conditioning courses' successes were outstanding — out of 39 soldiers, only 3 didn't meet the assessment and selection standard.

"We typically lose about 50 percent of the class," he said.

King also said another advantage of enlisting civilian volunteers directly into SF training was the fact they would be able to provide more years of service than someone recruited in-service, who typically has about eight years of service when they volunteer.

Chris Crain, a retired SF master sergeant, enlisted directly into Special Forces training in 1969.

He said the return to "off-the-street" recruiting is something he feels will help bring highly qualified individuals into the Green Berets' ranks.

"I think there's going to be a select part of our youth that will see this as an opportunity to do something they might not otherwise have an opportunity to do," Crain said.

German-based soldier gets life for killing her children

Finance clerk drowns kids in bathtub

Army News Service

MANNHEIM, Germany — A military judge found Spc. Lillie Morgan, the finance clerk charged with drowning her two young children, guilty of premeditated murder and sentenced her to life in prison.

Morgan, 22, was a finance clerk for the 39th Finance Battalion in Hanau, Germany, when she killed her 2-month-old daughter, Jazmin, and her 3-year-old son, Joshua.

Morgan and others testified she filled a bathtub with water on the evening of Sept. 18 in her home at Sportsfield Kaserne in Hanua. Then she held her son underwater for at least three minutes before pulling her baby daughter from a crib and dunking her in the tub.

Morgan pleaded not guilty, though, by reason of insanity, in the court-martial that began April 1. Although Army psychiatrists diagnosed Morgan with schizophrenia and psychosis, a psychiatric board determined she was not insane and knew what she was doing.

Prosecution attorneys argued Morgan killed her children to get revenge on her husband. Morgan herself testified she argued with her husband the night before because he wanted to run around with other women.

Her husband, Robert Spencer Morgan, never appeared at the court-martial. He was involuntarily separated from the Army last year.

Lt. Col. Stephen Henley was the presiding judge in Morgan's court-martial at the Army's Mannheim Law Center at Taylor Barracks. Morgan waived her right to be tried by a panel of her peers. After hearing closing arguments April 11, Henley deliberated for about four hours before rendering the guilty verdict of two counts of premeditated murder.

Morgan's sentence also included a reduction to the rank of private (E1), forfeiture of all pay and allowances and a dishonorable discharge from the U.S. Army.

Although sentenced to life in prison, Morgan will be considered for parole in 20 years, according to military regulations.

Morgan served pre-trial confinement at the European Regional Confinement Facility, Coleman Barracks, Mannheim, Germany.

She will now be taken to Fort Leavenworth, Kan., for processing, Army officials said, before serving her life sentence at the Naval Consolidated Brig in Miramar, Calif., the military's only long-term confinement facility for women.

EIB graduates 78 percent

Infantry soldiers meet, defeat many challenges

Pfc. Brian Trapp
Bayonet staff

Weeks before the Expert Infantryman Badge test, 1st Lt. Jason Slutsky said, "I feel confident I can pass," and pass is exactly what he and 105 other soldiers did. Now they wear the EIB with pride.

The challenge of accomplishing a test covering a wide range of physical and mental challenges are measure to an infantry soldier's attention to detail.

"The EIB is a difficult award to get and the mark of a qualified infantry soldier," said Command Sgt. Maj. Michael Kelso, U.S. Army Infantry School command sergeant major.

The skills tested were skills all infantrymen know, but the test required precise sequence, accuracy, time and attention to detail.

"I feel validated as an infantryman," said Slutsky, ammunition support platoon leader with 29th Infantry Regiment. "I'm wearing crossed rifles on my left collar, and now I have the badge to prove I have the knowledge to back it up."

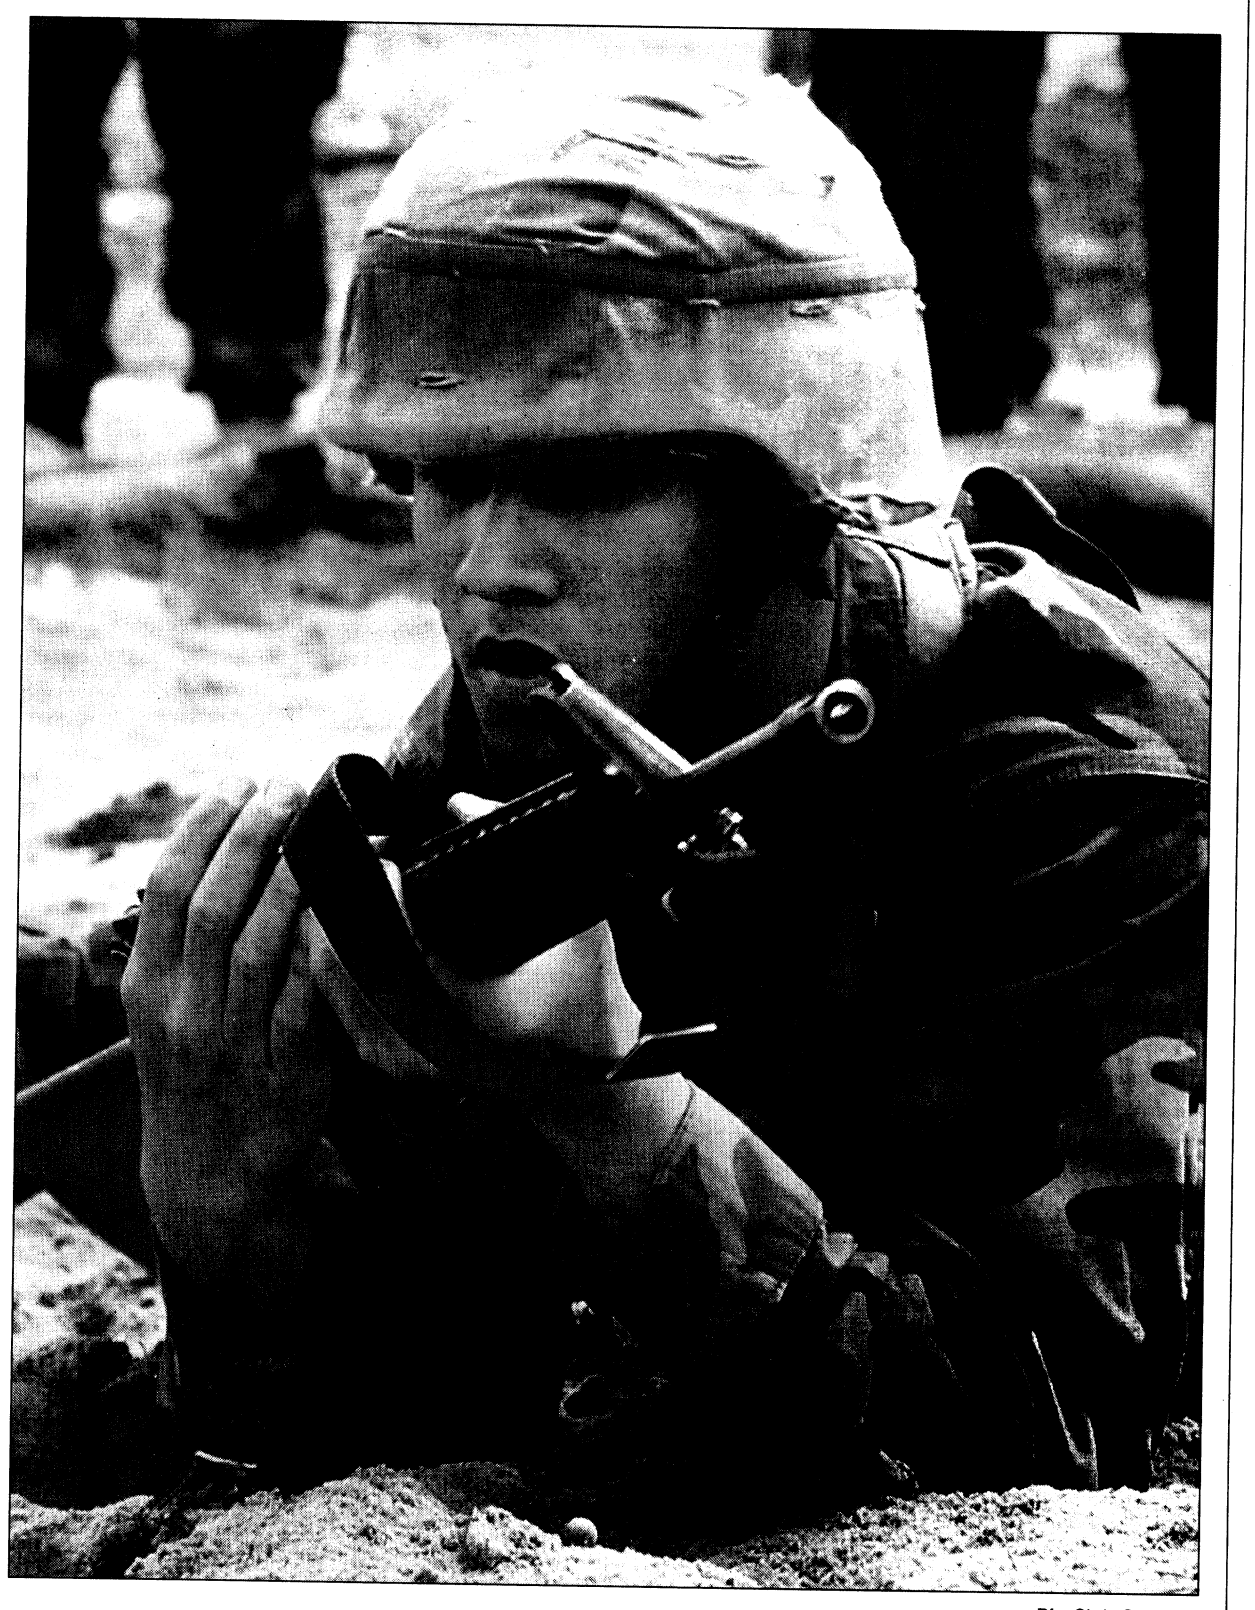
The commander of the U.S. Army Infantry School conducted the postwide EIB test April 9-11 at Burroughs Range.

This year, participants' companies tested land navigation, weapons qualification, the 12-mile timed foot march and physical fitness test as a prerequisite to entering the test.

By frontloading the sections of the test with the highest attrition rate, it raised the number of soldiers who passed.

Out of the 134 soldiers who started the test, 105 earned the badge which is a passing rate of 78 percent. That blew away the usual 12 to 20 percent.

"Based on the information from the field, we will continue testing for the EIB in this fashion," Kelso said.



While units train soldiers all year on the same tasks tested for the EIB, the test never has or will ever become easier, Kelso said.

"The new method was just as challenging at the test site, the standards didn't change," Kelso said. "It's the same EIB standards we've always had."

The new method had operations tempo advantages too. With the method used in previous years, the train-up and testing period took up to a month, Kelso said. When the units did the prerequisite testing, it took about one and half weeks.

"This way it makes it easier on units because they depend on their NCOs and need them there," Kelso said. "In today's Army, time comes at a premium."

Officers help soldiers, gain experience

Advanced Army program benefits doctors, soldiers

Sgt. William A. Graves
Bayonet assistant editor

Seven Fort Benning officers have been getting to "the root" of countless soldiers' problems.

No, they're not asking Freudian questions about mothers. They are trained dentists who are treating thousands of post soldiers' complete dentistry needs every year.

The officers are a product of the Health Professions' Scholarship Program that pays their dental school tuition in return for a four-year commitment. The first year they take part in the Advanced General Dentistry Program here or at seven other posts worldwide. They spend the remaining term working where the Army needs them.

"I'm glad I did it," said Capt. Rick Ranen, a dentist in the program. "I would recommend it, 100 percent. It's a fantastic experience, especially coming right out of school. We receive advanced training in every specialty area of dentistry. We have mentors in each area — experienced senior officers who help us with everything we need. There are no civilian residencies like that."

In fact, most civilian programs have only two general dentists, said Col. Lee Covington, director of the program.

"The AGDP is one of the top residency programs in the country," Covington said. "It gives them immediate experience and advanced technical knowledge that increases their confidence and efficiency in providing more types of procedures. They can diagnose and manage complicated cases much better than if they had gone into a civilian practice right after school."

Furthermore, the doctors receive, among their plethora of lectures, training on how to manage a practice, expert instruction from visiting doctors and the latest research and development information on new products and procedures.

The advanced training is icing on the proverbial cake.

"They are well trained," Covington said. "The term "resident" is kind of a misnomer. They could leave the military today and go practice outside if they wanted to."

Instead, they stay and fulfill their payment to country, and the post appreciates it, he said.

The dentists work on "Class 4" patients who require examinations and "Class 3" patients who have a dental problem that could become a hindrance to their mission within the next six months. Both classes are non-deployable, and therefore, could slow down Fort Benning's mission.

Besides helping the post's state of readiness, the dentists offer seven additional sets of hands that render more types of specialty care than the post would otherwise receive.

"They provide comprehensive dentistry," Covington said. "They help patients with everything they need without having to send them somewhere else. The residents build more of a relationship with their patients as a result."

Capt. Bernie Manasan works on Staff Sgt. Leroy Hill's, 1st Battalion, 11th Infantry Regiment, crown and bridge with help of Kimberly Bailey, dental assistant.

Dentists perform a root canal on Stephanie Thomas, 203rd Forward Support Battalion.

The dentists also help the Dental Activity's short-suspense cases, such as those that arise with reservists or last-minute deployments.

"(The program) is functioning well," Covington said. "They learn more in one year here than in four years of dental school, easily. In return, Fort Benning soldiers receive faster and better dental care."

Patients seem to agree.

"(The care) is very good," Staff Sgt. Leroy Hill, 1st Battalion, 11th Infantry Regiment. "This is the second time I've seen (Capt. Bernie Manasan), and it makes me feel better because he knows me and my history."

Manasan is very prompt and makes the dental experience tranquil, he said.

"The atmosphere is great," Hill said. "He constantly asks if I feel anything and tells me to let him know if anything is uncomfortable. I can tell he and all of the residents are very concerned about their patients."

A squad of wives and family members from C Company navigate a Zodiac across Victory Pond.

It's 8 a.m., and there's a steady drizzle outside — my favorite kind of Saturday. Gimme a cup of coffee, the newspaper and the lulling taptaptap of raindrops on my window, and I'm a happy woman.

"Awright! Everybody out of bed. It's Jane Wayne Day," cries this maniacal goon standing at the foot of my bed. He looks like my husband.

"It's raining outside. Call it off," I mumble and go back to Dear Abby.

"Get out of bed, Ranger wife!" He's fairly roaring now. "Rangers train in any kind of weather ... hail, sleet, snow ..."

"I thought that was the mailman. And even he's not out yet. Lemme alone."

Jane Wayne Day. A chance for the wives of the 4th Ranger Training Battalion to play ranger for a day, to get a firsthand look at what our husbands put ranger students through every week. A chance to climb tall obstacles and jump off of them. Hooah.

It sounded like a lot of fun when I first heard of it, from a comfortable distance, five weeks ago. Sure I'll do it, I said. How bad can it be?

How bad can it be? I asked myself now, as I slithered out of bed and into a pair of BDU pants and a sniper T-shirt — in retrospect, I'm sure I was subconsciously thumbing my nose at the rangers.

"If I break a leg, it's your fault," I muttered to my husband.

"Just don't break a nail, Mom," my 6-year-old daughter called from the next room.

Now I don't consider myself a high-maintenance kinda gal. If my nail polish just happened to match the sniper tab on my T-shirt, well, it was just a happy coincidence. I'm well past the day when I felt the need to prove myself. I have trophies in the basement that attest to my days as the queen of step aerobics. But these days the only real obstacles I encounter are the ones I vacuum around, and I work up a sweat if I type more than 46 words a minute.

Jane Wayne I'm not, and I'm OK with that. I live a gentle life and it suits me fine, thank you very much.

The rangers planned a host of activities for children, so my kids were far more excited about the day than I was. But their enthusiasm was infectious, and by the time we reached Camp Rogers, I was feeling pretty good about this little adventure.

How bad can it be? I said to myself, with a little more pep to my step, as I joined the 42 other women who braved the elements, such as they were, to participate.

We were divided into companies, according to our husbands' affiliation, then six competing squads. I joined the gals from HHC's third squad, the self-proclaimed "social squad," with absolutely no inclination of competing on any kind of threatening level.

"The objective is to have fun," said Lt. Col. Greg Hager. I took him at his word.

We were issued kevlar and canteens and herded onto trucks which took us to our first challenge, the 34-foot jump towers on Eubanks Field, an exercise designed to simulate the experience of exiting an aircraft. Now don't kid yourself if you've never done this. The tower only measures 34 feet from the ground up. From the top down it multiplies, like dog years, 34 times seven.

One right after another, trussed up with belts and snaplinks and cables, we plodded up four flights of stairs, allowed ourselves to be tethered to a harness, filed to the doorway and plunged into nothingness. Of course it didn't run quite so smoothly. There were those of us who paused in the doorway long enough to recite The Lord's Prayer, the sinner's prayer and John 3:16.

But we all jumped, and we all survived.

We made it to Simpson Range by noon. After a quick safety briefing, we were handed ear plugs, goggles and an M-4 rifle with 20 rounds, pointed down range and given three to five seconds to hit each target at 50 meters.

Remember me, the one in the sniper T-shirt? I hit three. I think that's pretty good, and nobody told me any different since I had a gun in my hand. The way I figure it, 50 meters, minus 20 rounds equals 30 something or another, divided by five seconds equals six, takeaway three seconds leaves three. There were those that actually scored higher, but I don't think they can reconcile the math.

After a quick MRE lunch, we tackled the Water Confidence Course at Victory Pond. It started with a boat race. Pretty strenuous stuff, though I'm not complaining since I didn't man a paddle. I was dead weight, snapping photos as my teammates struggled to row our Zodiac across the pond. We didn't win, but we didn't capsize, and I think that says a lot about something, though I'm not sure what.

The next events took place simultaneously on Hurley Hill — the 60-foot rappel tower, the log-walk-rope-drop and the suspension traverse.

I've rappelled before, so I was up for it. No big deal. The secret is not to look down. I climbed the tower never lowering my eyes, backed up to the good sergeant responsible for getting me down alive and listened closely as he gave instructions.

"Place your left hand on this rope," he said.

"Am I gonna die?"

"No, ma'am. Put your right hand out to your side just so," he said.

"Am I gonna die?"

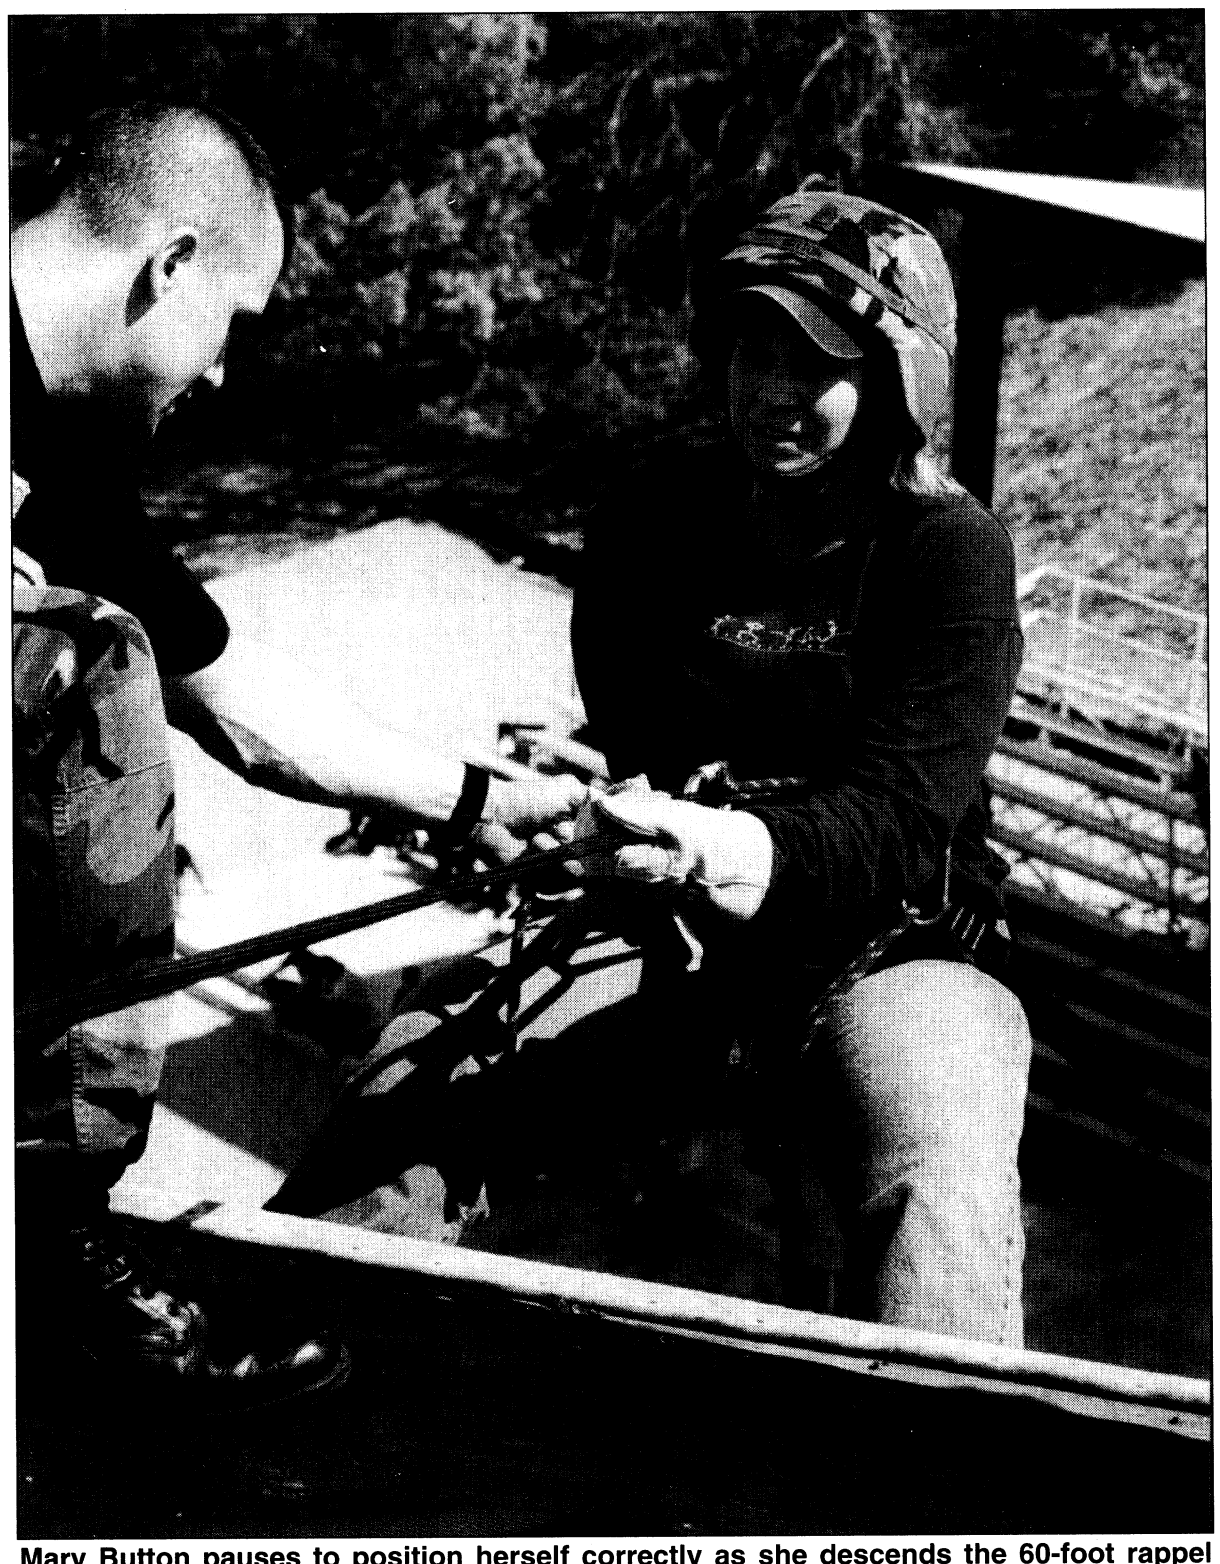
"I don't think so. Now keep your legs straight and lean back," he said.

"Oh, dear Lord, I'm gonna die."

"You can do this. Now back slowly to the edge and lean, lean ... There you go."

And there I went, over the edge from 60 feet up in the air. Over I went, completely, till I hung upside down, dangling like a possum, and giggling.

"OK, I didn't die," I thought to myself, as I braced my legs against the wall, straightened, and inched my way down. This was fun.



Now I'd like to tell you about the log-walk-rope-drop. Really I would. It looked pretty scary from where I sat, along with most of my teammates, who decided then and there that facing our fears wasn't nearly as appealing as it might've been in our younger days. Knowing your limits is a sign of maturity, we said.

But there were hordes of others willing to take the challenge. They climbed 34 feet, teetered across the suspended logs (the whole time trying not to fall into the water), wrapped themselves around the rope (still trying not to fall into the water) and inched their way out over the pond. Then they lowered themselves into a hanging position — let go — and fell into the water.

The final obstacle was the suspension traverse, or "slide for life," yet another long climb — 75 feet —with no way down but a 250-foot cable that spans the water at a declining angle. This time there was no harness, just a life vest and a suspended pulley. The object of the challenge was to hold on to the pulley and slide down the cable at an alarming speed until we were just above the water. Then release.

Needless to say, my team didn't take home any prizes — they weren't awarding trophies for maturity. I'm not complaining, mind you, but I've got bruises in places this paper won't print, and though I didn't break a nail, I did suffer a severe splinter wound to my right pinkie. And I ache all over. Call me a sore loser.

But all in all, I'd say Jane Wayne Day was a big success. I appreciated the opportunity to play ranger for a day, and given the opportunity, I'd do it again. I think. How bad can it be?

Mary Button pauses to position herself correctly as she descends the 60-foot rappel tower on Hurley Hill. Soldiers from the 4th Ranger Training Battalion manned each station during the daylong Jane Wayne activities.

Staff Sgt. Eric Emde helps his daughter, Anna, fire blanks from an M-4 rifle. Kristine Emde gives her daughter extra protection from the loud discharge.

OPERATION APPRECIATION

Soldiers relax, eat pizza

Local church offers basic trainees respite from stress

Lori Egan
Bayonet editor

After five weeks of basic training, 20-year-old Pvt. Chris Olson had forgotten what pizza tasted like.

But he and approximately 40 other soldiers from 3rd Battalion, 47th Infantry Regiment, quickly remembered what food outside the dining facility tasted like when members of St. Luke United Methodist Church served the soldiers 37 pizzas, 6 gallons of ice cream, soda and a cake for 100 people.

"This is a dream come true," Olson said, as he tasted the pepperoni pizza.

The soldiers were at the church for Operation Appreciation, a ministry the church started with Basic Combat Training Brigade a little more than two years ago when the Brigade activated.

Dr. Hal Brady, St. Luke's senior pastor, said the ministry provides the community a way to say thank you to soldiers for their sacrifices in serving the country.

Pvt. Chris Folau from Salt Lake City, Utah, said he joined the Army Reserves to give something back to the country — to contribute.

"After Sept. 11, I just had to do something for the nation," the 19-year-old said. "To give something back."

The ministry is beneficial to both the Army and the community, said Staff Sgt. Donald Robertson, who has been a drill sergeant with 3rd Battalion for almost a year.

"This is great because the soldiers get a chance to relax, away from the stress of basic training," Robertson said. "And it gives the community a chance to hear soldiers' issues."

Talk centered on forbidden food, getting up at 4 a.m. for physical training, teamwork and being in touch with the outside world again.

Pvt. Meredith Purifoy explained to volunteer Libby Housand, that "smoking" wasn't about punishment but instead about building teamwork.

"We had a soldier go AWOL. He jumped a train, but then he came back," Pvt. Thomas Clark, from Spartanburg, S.C., said.

"The drill sergeants smoked us not because he went, but because we didn't talk him out of it — we weren't a team," Purifoy said.

Pvt. Marcus Simpson, from Fayetteville, N.C., told Housand, who teaches middle school and coaches a coed soccer team, that making friends helped ease the homesickness.

Olson, from Little Rock, Ark., admitted to being homesick at first but now he and his battle buddies call the bay "home."

Twenty years ago, Bryan Newman was a basic training commander and he remembers the loneliness and stress soldiers feel, which is why he volunteers today.

He said Operation Appreciation gives the community a chance to get to know soldiers face-to-face.

"This (ministry) has opened the eyes of St. Luke to the caliber of soldiers who serve — to make an attachment," said Newman, who works with the Directorate of Operations and Training.

The next Operation Appreciation is Saturday and A and B Companies, 3rd Bn., 47th Inf. Regt. soldiers will graduate from Basic Combat Training Brigade April 25 at Pomeroy Field.

Post students place in YMCA art contest

Artists receive saving bonds for efforts

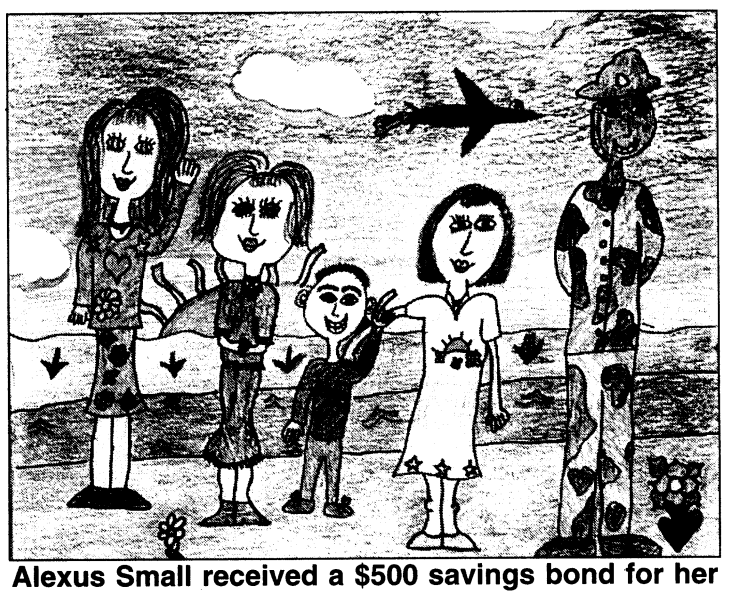
Two Fort Benning students were named finalists in the Armed Services YMCA Military Family Art Contest 2002.

Alexus Small and Brighettia Gibbs, fifth-grade students at Wilson Elementary School were named first- and second-place winners, respectively, in the annual poster contest, which is sponsored by GEICO.

Their artwork will be featured on posters promoting Military Family Week in November.



"I'm very surprised, excited," said Small, who received a $500 savings bond for her colored pencil and marker rendition of her family. Small is the daughter of Staff Sgt. Loren and Regina Small.

Gibbs was awarded a $100 savings bond for her artwork, a colored pencil drawing of her family. Gibbs is the daughter of Sgt. Clarence and Thelma Holley.

The contest awards prizes to one first- and second-place winner from each of the services, including the Army, Navy, Air Force, Marines, Coast Guard and National Guard.

All the winning artwork appears on the Armed Services YMCA Web site, www.asymca.org/art_contest.htm.

The art contest winners page also lists the winners of honorable mention certificates, including Fort Benning first-grader Jacob Mobley, second-graders Alexis Campagne and Taneisha Johnson, third-grader Diana De LaRosa and fourth-grader Jessica Hipolito.

Alexus Small received a $500 savings bond for her artwork.

Brighettia Gibbs received a $100 savings bond for her artwork.

Make appointment for maintenance

Residents can schedule a.m. or p.m. repairs

Laura Martinson

Have you ever experienced the frustration of placing a work order and not being home when the repairman comes to call? Well, relief is in sight.

Post residents can now set up appointments with Directorate of Facilities Engineering and Logistics and BSI to get repairs taken care of at a time that's convenient for them.

Convenience for the customer is, in fact, the sole reason for the change, said Glenn Todd, chief of Work Coordination Branch, DFEL.

"Until now, our program for getting the work orders placed was more on a first-come, first-served basis, and it just wasn't working," said Todd, who added that a four-hour window of availability gives customers a better chance of getting the work they need. "These changes are based upon customer feedback."

Residents are not the only beneficiaries of the change. DFEL and BSI perform maintenance on the barracks, motor pools and administration buildings.

But it is the people who live here who have the most difficult scheduling dilemmas.

"Many families have two parents working outside of the home, so they can't just sit around all day waiting for someone to show up," Todd said. "We found a way to make our families happier and we

Self-help tools on recall

Residents frustrated with shortage

Laura Martinson

If you borrow it, bring it back. Seems simple enough?

The post command elements are doing what they can to assist those who live on Fort Benning, but some angry residents say not everyone lives by the same rules.

"When I go to borrow tools to take care of my lawn, they're not there," said Eva Epting, Fort Benning resident.

The U-Do-It Center, commonly known as the self-help shop, provides tools and supplies to help residents take care of their lots on post. But, for some reason, the tools they loan out are not brought back when they're supposed to. The tools that are returned come back broken or unclean, and sometimes they're not brought back at all.

What this means for the rest is delay. And some residents are getting impatient.

"It's not fair that I can't do what I need to in my yard because other people don't do what they should," Epting said.

There are rules enforced by post housing regarding the care of lawns, and most people do their part to follow those guidelines, said Ken Hankins, chief of housing. But a lack of resources can always hamper those efforts, and that's the end result of this waiting game.

"If residents think the only person they're hurting is their

Post gets new garrison CSM

McCord a man of "worldly" experience

Laura Martinson
Special to the Bayonet©

Look out folks, there's a new guy in town. As of March 18, Command Sgt. Maj. Robert McCord is Fort Benning's newest garrison command sergeant major, and he brings with him, literally, a world of insight.

"Living overseas provides experiences you wouldn't otherwise get," said McCord, who comes to the post from the NCO Academy in Grafenwoehr, Germany. "You become a more well-rounded person because you learn different qualities of life. In each place I've lived, I've found something neat about it that doesn't exist here."

His travels have taken him everywhere from Germany to Italy to Africa, and while he loves some of the qualities other countries have to offer, nothing replaces his homeland.

"Fort Benning is a magnificent place to be, all you have to do is drive on post to recognize it," said McCord, who feels people are the post's best attribute. His experiences lend him to believe that it's the military's diversity that makes it what it is.

"We truly are a melting pot, there's no doubt about it," he said.

The melting pot has its own demands, and the voice of the soldier says he's got a big job ahead of him.

Hospital implements new standards

Organization re-designs system to help patients

Maj. Patrick Barrett
Martin Army Community Hospital

Last year the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Healthcare Organizations safety standards for hospitals visited Martin Army Community Hospital.

JCAHO is the nation's predominant standards-setting organization that evaluates and accredits nearly 18,000 health care organizations and programs in the United States.

The new patient safety standards address a number of significant patient safety issues including the implementation of patient safety programs: the responsibility of organization leadership to create a culture of safety; the prevention of medical errors through the prospective analysis and re-design of vulnerable patient systems; and the hospital's responsibility to tell a patient if he or she suffered harm by the care provided.

JCAHO outlines specific criteria and establishes standards to improve patient safety and reduce risk to patients. Beginning with 2003, JCAHO will annually establish six National Patient Safety Goals as part of its intensive efforts to reduce errors in health care. The hospital is responding to the improvement of patient safety by establishing a Patient Safety Committee, implementing facility upgrades, and instituting policy changes. The MACH Patient Safety Committee is a committee of physicians, nurses and administrators whose purpose is to identify, evaluate and reduce the potential for harm to our beneficiaries and staff, and to improve the quality of care. The MACH pharmacy performs double checks on all prescriptions dispensed and uses an automated system to check for any possible drug interaction or overlaps in drug therapy. The pharmacy also waits to fill the patient's prescription until the patient is at the pharmacy window. This allows for an important dialogue between the patient and pharmacist to ensure the patient receives the maximum health benefit and to avoid any harmful side effects or possible drug interactions.

There are numerous facility upgrades in progress or recently completed at MACH. The Family Practice, Pediatric and Allergy Clinic redesign includes the installation of handicap restrooms with push button doors to allow access for wheelchairs and motorized carts.

Some of the other facility upgrade projects related to patient safety are the installation of tamper resistant receptacles in all pediatric areas, push button type shower faucets on the psychiatric ward, and "patient safe" furniture on the psychiatric ward.

The hospital's outlying buildings are also included in the redesign plans. There is a handicap restroom leading into Building 9204, which houses the Tricare Service Center and Tricare Plus Office.

Concerns over child safety in the hospital led to the revision of the policy on non-patient children in the facility.

Effective immediately only patients can access examination or treatment rooms. The presence of non-patient children is often distracting for the patient and the provider.

In addition, non-patient children are often at risk under these circumstances because of the inability to provide adequate supervision for them. Parents or sponsors need to arrange for childcare for non-patient children. Patients, who have non-urgent scheduled appointments and who arrive with non-patient children must reschedule their appointment.

It is the goal of MACH to ensure the safety of all patients accessing the healthcare facility. MACH continues to strive to improve safety by adhering to JCAHO safety standards, facility improvements and improving policies and procedures.

Tuberculosis not disease of past

Decline in TB makes country vulnerable to complacency

Ely Melendez
Martin Army Community Hospital

Many people think that tuberculosis is a disease of the past — an illness, like smallpox, that no longer threatens us today.

We are currently seeing a decline in TB, and that very success makes us vulnerable to the complacency and neglect that comes with declining numbers of visible persons suffering with TB.

TB is an ancient disease and is also one of the world's deadliest.

An organism called Mycobacterium Tuberculosis causes TB. When a person with active TB disease coughs or sneezes, tiny particles containing M. Tuberculosis may be expelled into the air.

If another person inhales air that contains these particles, transmission from one person to another may occur. Not everyone infected with the TB germ will become sick. Two TB related conditions exist: latent TB infection and active TB disease. Both conditions are treatable and curable.

Each year, 8 million people around the world become sick with TB. One-third of the world's population is infected with the TB bacillus. An estimated 10 to 15 million people in the U.S. are diagnosed with latent TB infection, and about 10 percent of these infected individuals will develop TB disease at some point in their lives.

There are more than 2 million TB-related deaths worldwide.

It is the leading killer of people who are HIV-infected, accounting for one third of AIDS deaths worldwide.

According to the Georgia Public Health Department and the Center for Disease Control, a total of 703 TB cases were reported in Georgia in 2000. This was an increase of 5 percent from 670 cases in 1999.

Georgia ranks fifth in the nation in TB cases. The metro Atlanta area reported 53 percent of TB cases in 2000.

A person with latent TB infection has TB germs in his body but does not feel sick and is not contagious, but he has the potential to one day get sick if the TB germs become active and multiply in his body.

A person with active TB has active TB germs in his body feels sick, and experiences symptoms such as coughing, fever, weight loss and is capable of spreading the disease to others if TB germs are active in the lungs or throat.

HIV and TB Connection:

HIV weakens the immune system, therefore HIV-positive persons with TB infection have a very high risk of progressing to TB disease. Approximately 10 to 15 percent of the national totals of TB cases are reported in people living with HIV.

TB continues to kill more people each year than any other infectious disease. The challenges of TB prevention have evolved over the years, but the fact remains that TB elimination is an achievable goal. By making TB elimination a priority, we can make TB, once and for all, a disease of the past.

For more information about TB, call Community Health Nursing at 545-4041.

Hints for happy kids

Rebecca Welch
Family Advocacy Program

Are you a hurried parent who could benefit from hints on how to enhance communication with your kids, tips on getting along better and guidelines on how to improve your relationship with your children? Please read on.

The parenting tips that follow provide a fresh perspective, an opportunity to build on your own positive parenting skills so that when difficult issues arise, you already have a strong foundation to build on.

BUILD CONFIDENCE

1. Be positive.

• Look for ways to give compliments.

• Remember to laugh with your child.

2. Emphasize your child's strong points.

• Praise special, unique traits in your child.

• Help your child understand that nobody's perfect and that's OK.

• Help your child understand that everyone is good at something and not so good at other things.

3. Give your time.

• As parents, you are all probably short on time and may often feel overwhelmed with all your responsibilities. However, it's important for you to know that the best gift is to give your child regular, undivided attention.

• If you're experiencing guilt, you need to work through that and work on specific times to be with your children. You could begin by scheduling monthly "dates" together.

4. Say "I love you."

• Give this message in different ways. Try nonverbal as well as verbal.

STAY CONNECTED

1. Listen.

• Give your full attention. Keep good eye contact, nod, even touch your child.

• Listen for feelings. There are no wrong feelings. Acknowledge your child's feeling, then reflect those feelings back. (Don't interpret, either repeat their words or use similar words to reflect your child's feelings.)

• Keep your talk to a minimum. Simply saying you understand and care may be enough. Being there for them is the most important.

2. Take time to be with your child.

• Read a book or watch TV together. Talk about the book or program. Use this time to give your full attention to your child.

• If you're a working parent, call your child from work to just say "hello" – not to remind him or her about chores or homework.

• Make time for regular heart-to-heart talks with your child. Keep conversations free and open.

USE POSITIVE DISCIPLINE

1. Set rules.

• Determine what rules are important. Set limits and boundaries. Make sure everybody understands the rules and consequences.

• Apply rules consistently. If you make an exception, make sure your child understands that it's a special treat (i.e., staying out later than usual).

• Rules are flexible in that they're appropriate to the age of the child.

• Physical discipline is almost never effective.

2. Address a problem.

• Respond to the problem as soon as possible.

• Be firm. You're the parent. Do not underestimate your parenting ability.

• Keep calm, use your anger in a positive way. Address the problem, discuss the consequence, follow through. Don't blow up!

3. Criticize the behavior only.

• Choose your words carefully. Address the behavior, not the person. For example, you could say, "I'm upset that you hit your friend," instead of "You're a bad boy for hitting."

HELP IN PROBLEM-SOLVING

1. Define the problem.

• Try to help your child solve the problem, don't solve it for him or her. Teach your child how to problem-solve.

• Ask your child what exactly the problem is. What are their feelings about it?

2. Brainstorm about ways to solve the problem.

• Talk about every possible solution with your child. List them out. Discuss and weigh the outcomes of each potential solution.

3. Pick the best solution.

• Talk about, and role-play if necessary, the way you or your child will implement the solution.

4. Discuss the outcome.

• Did the solution work? Why or why not?

• If not, talk with your child about trying another solution.

For more information, call Rebecca S. Welch, manager, Family Advocacy Program at 545-7517.

ASK THE JUDGE

Capt. Austin J. Goodrich
Office of the Staff Judge Advocate

Q: What is bankruptcy? Is it an option for me? Will it make my financial problems go away?

A: Bankruptcy is a legal proceeding whereby a debtor who is hopelessly behind in paying their bills can legally discharge his or her debts. Its specific design is to assist the honest debtor by giving him or her a fresh start. However, bankruptcy should only be considered as a tool of last resort, because of the severe, and long-term, effects it can have on your credit history. A bankruptcy judgment will be listed on your credit report for a period of 10 years. Furthermore, certain debts may be excluded from discharge no matter what. These debts many times include obligations for alimony or child support, certain taxes and student loans, reaffirmed debts or those debts incurred by false statements or representations.

There are two methods for declaring individual bankruptcy: Chapter 7 and Chapter 13. These two methods and the differences between them are spelled out in detail in Title 11 of the United States Code.

Generally, a Chapter 7 bankruptcy, or a total liquidation, involves the debtor turning over all non-exempt property to a bankruptcy trustee. The trustee then converts this property to cash and distributes it to creditors. By order of the bankruptcy court, the person is then discharged from all debts.

Those individuals who are unemployed, have large medical bills or who have seriously over-extended their credit, usually file for Chapter 7 bankruptcies.

Bankruptcy laws, however, only allow an individual to file a Chapter 7 once every six years.

Under a Chapter 13 bankruptcy, a wage-earner bankruptcy, the debtor pays his creditors back through a monthly repayment plan, which he develops with the assistance of a trustee. This repayment plan, which will generally last from three to five years, must be filed in good faith, must provide for feasible payments in light of the debtors financial situation and must provide payments over time which are equal in value to that which creditors would have received under a Chapter 7 liquidation.

A Chapter 13 is only available to individuals with regular income whose non-contingent, liquated unsecured debts are less than $250,000 and whose secured debts are less than $750,000. Chapter 13s are common for those individuals who are trying to keep real property where payment on the property is in default.

As a general rule, if after taking into account your monthly budget, including all of your reasonable bills, you still have money left over to make a contribution towards your debt, then a Chapter 13 may be the best option. Chapter 13 often allows debtors to keep property they would otherwise lose under a Chapter 7. Conversely, if you do not have any excess income after paying your monthly minimum expense, a debtor may be inclined to file for Chapter 7.

In light of the impact a bankruptcy judgment has on an individual's credit, it is in their interest to seek out all available alternatives before filing. Many non-profit organizations, such as the National Foundation for Consumer Credit and the Debt Counselors of America, are available for counseling related to money management, restoration of good credit ratings, debt counseling and debt repayment plans for both individuals and families. Moreover, the Office of the Staff Judge Advocate Legal Assistance division is available to give general advice regarding any contemplated bankruptcy decisions. While the Legal Assistance division cannot represent you in any court proceedings, they can refer you to qualified attorneys.

Command: Leader views people as promise of post

"The garrison sergeant major should address any issues on the post that affect soldier welfare. That includes morale, housing, and infrastructure improvements. Those should be his primary focus," said Staff Sgt. Ted Chavis, U.S. Army Special Operations Command, who's completed the majority of his infantry training on the installation.

"And since this is the Home of the Infantry, he should also be involved in overseeing the schools on post that produce infantry soldiers."

"We do all of that and a lot more," McCord said. "It's hard to throw it all in a basket and say, 'This is what we do.' But we take care of everything from the busses that take your kids to school to the water in the sink at the main exchange."

That's a hefty load to haul during his expected two-year tour, but McCord is confident. He uses a technique all his own.

"Have you ever heard of the MBWA degree? It's called Management By Wandering Around," he said. "If you want to know what the soldiers are doing, you have to be around them. Leaders can't fix problems they don't know are there."

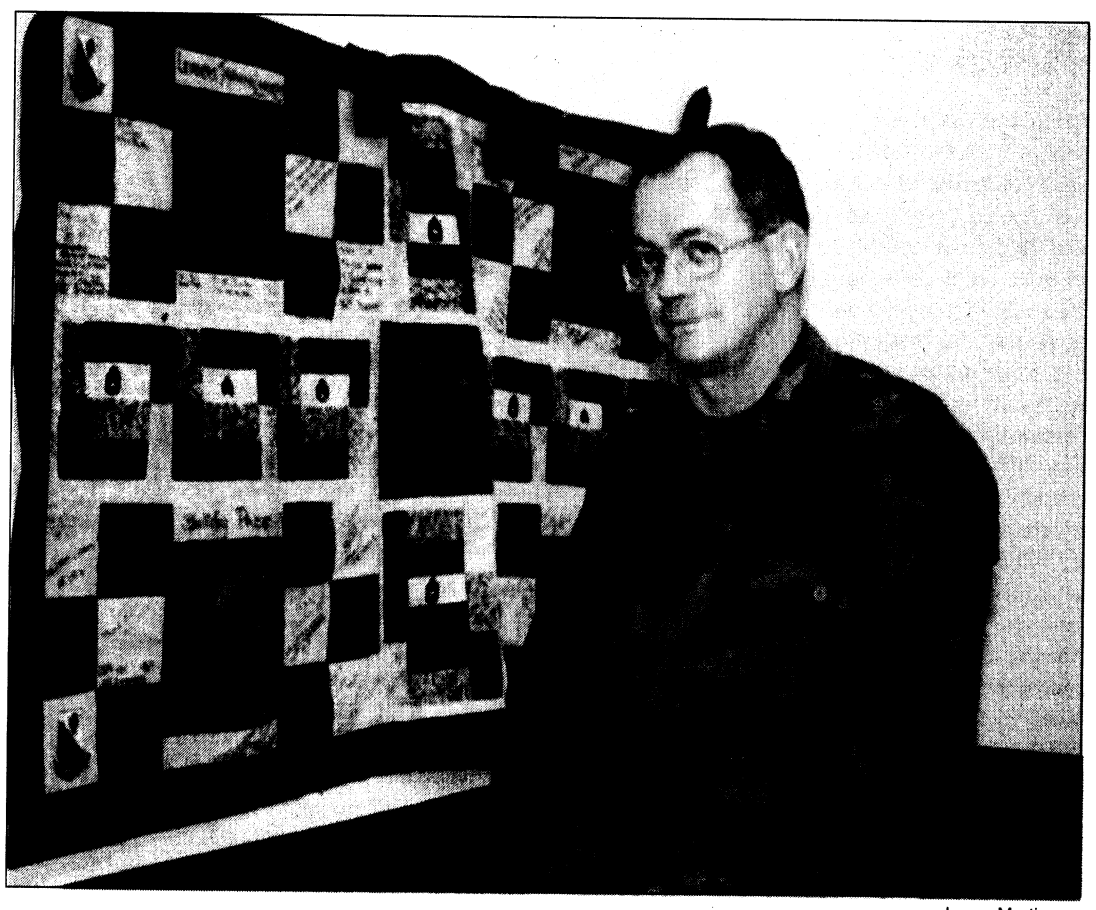
But McCord sees more positives than negatives at the home of the infantry. After all, he said, success at Fort Benning comes as a collaborative effort.

"One person can't do it all, and I certainly won't do it alone," he said. "We are all in charge of this post, and the people working here are all more than competent at what they're doing. That's why we live in a community of excellence year after year."

His long-term goal is to continue that excellence.

But as far as the short of it goes, he's already gotten a jump-start on the tasks at hand, patrolling the post and assessing the work that lies in front of him.

"I've been out in the neighborhoods talking with people. I like to stop and ask them, "What's up?" and find out what they're happy about and what needs to be fixed," said McCord. "I want to be out among soldiers and their families, and find out their strongest concerns to ensure they get voiced and fixed if possible."



McCord reminds people that change is not something that's always recognized immediately.

"In this business, once you apply a fix, it's not obvious to anyone for about 5 years, so improvements people are seeing now are a result of what someone did 5 years ago," he said.

"I hope that in 2007, soldiers and families will benefit from what we do right now."

McCord and his wife, Gisela, plan to retire in Columbus when all is said and done, and they just purchased a new home in the area.

"I'd love to stay here longer," he said, "but the Army won't let me do more than 30 years."

Maintenance: Order now

want them to know we understand their time is valuable, too."

The appointment system is nothing new to BSI, which uses the four-hour window to schedule kitchen appliance repairs for all 4,000 homes on post and full housing maintenance for about half of those.

While there is an adequate staff to meet the post's needs, customers who miss appointments throw a wrench into the plans.

"It's a huge task, and many people don't know what goes into having an appointment scheduled and sending out a technician," said Don Dearing, chief of BSI. "It's frustrating to put forth all of that effort and then not be able to perform the task. It knocks us off track and we have to scramble.

"This system helps eliminate all of that, and allows flexibility to our technicians and customers," he said. "This is an organizational tool, and it works."

There are some tips customers can follow to ensure a work order gets taken care of in a timely manner:

- Orders should be placed 24 hours in advance of when work is desired to allow technicians to plan ahead. However, emergencies will be handled as such, outside the routine maintenance procedures.
- Customers should be home during the four-hour window designated for their appointment.

Self-help: Returns mean less delays neighbor, think again," he said.

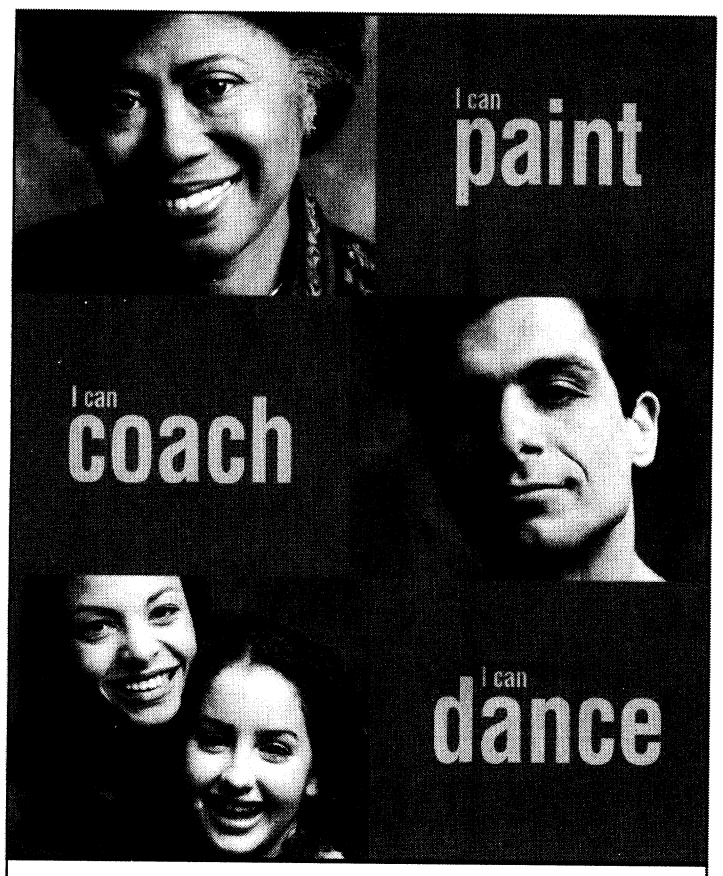
A late return of borrowed goods can result in a suspension of shop privileges, and the cost of the tools can be deducted from a soldier's pay if not returned altogether, Hankins said.

"It's often a surprise to soldiers when it happens," said Hankins, who added that the money deducted goes toward replacing the misplaced item. "We try to put all of this information out at the self-help briefing, but people don't always hear all that you've told them."



A mandatory self-help briefing is required of all new post residents before they're able to use the shop. The briefing is held every Wednesday at 9 a.m. at the facility, and representatives from the fire department, community life office and housing are on hand to give out safety tips and housing rules.

"Everybody just needs to take care of their place and take care of each other," Hankins said.

For information about self-help briefings, call 545-4207.

How to plan a perfectly good wedding

Take time to plan the wedding of a lifetime

Chaplain (Lt. Col.) Dan Taylor
11th Infantry Regiment

REFLECTIONS

"Good morning. This is the Infantry Center Chapel, Chaplain Taylor speaking. How may I help you?"

"Hello. Is this the Benning wedding chapel?"

AAAAGGHHH!

I wanted to reach through the phone and choke the living daylights out of the poor, misguided soul on the other end of the phone! We get a great number of inquiries about weddings here at the chapel.

Many times the well meaning couple will begin their planning for that blessed day only to find themselves frustrated and discouraged.

Planning a wedding is stressful enough, but when people overlook some basic, common sense, things, the planning can turn into a nightmare. Here are a few things to consider:

• Military chapels make a nice setting for a military wedding. The Infantry Center Chapel (TIC) is beautiful and historic. And don't forget the use of the chapel is free to authorized personnel — ID card holders and their immediate families can use the chapel. That does not include your brother, first cousin or grandchildren.

• Don't assume the chapel will be available the date you want it. You should always check the availability of the chapel before you set a date.

• The same is true for the minister who will conduct the wedding. Don't finalize the date until you talk to the chaplain or civilian minister who will conduct the wedding. You may find he's not available the day you need him. How many times have we seen couples get stressed out when they find that the chapel or the minister is not available for the day they have on their printed announcements.

Taylor

• Weddings are not totally free. The chapel and chaplain are available at no charge, but other things do cost: flowers, musicians and coordinators. The chapel staff can help you get started, but we're not wedding planners. It's your responsibility to pull the details together.

• You want a military wedding? You want a military chaplain to perform your wedding? You have a chaplain in your unit — he'll do your wedding, right? Not so fast.

Just because you have a chaplain does not mean he'll do your wedding. Chaplains are ordained clergy representing various religious bodies. Some churches have specific requirements about whom their ministers may perform weddings for. Chaplains themselves may have their own personal requirements as well. So ask questions early. And be sure to be up front about your circumstances.

Whether you have been married before may make a difference to the chaplain. How your previous marriage ended may be the factor that decides whether he can perform the wedding or not. Don't assume the chaplain will perform your wedding just because you ask.

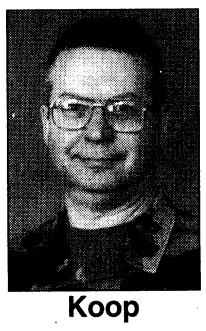
And no, TIC Chapel does not have a chaplain on staff that will perform weddings for anyone who asks.

We want your marriage to succeed. Fort Benning policy requires that couples getting married in a chapel must have pre-marriage counseling. This can be done by the person who will officiate your wedding or by the Family Life Center on post.

You need to plan far enough ahead to make sure you can meet this requirement. It is never a good idea to come into the chapel and tell us you want to get married next weekend.

Marriage is sacred, and we want yours to begin on a happy note. But plan ahead and don't assume anything. Ask questions of us, and don't be upset if we do the same of you.

We're glad to help make sure your wedding doesn't turn stressful.



10 principles of corporal punishment

Chaplain (Maj.) Raymond Koop
Family Life Ministries Center

I do not recommend corporal punishment. There are better forms of discipline than physical punishment. However, some parents spank their children. Spanking should be rarely and sparingly used. Here are ten principles to follow when using corporal punishment.

Both parents should be involved in disciplining their child. They need to agree on the rules, consequences and steadiness of discipline. Children need to know and understand these rules.

Do not threaten to spank. Instead say, "If you (fill in the blank), I will punish you." Always give yourself the option of using an alternate form of discipline.

Koop

Corporal punishment should be used as a last resort. Use alternative forms of discipline first. Explain the reason for the discipline before spanking the child. Let the child know what they should have done to avoid the spanking.

Do no harm. Don't physically abuse the child. Don't resort to slapping, punching, hitting, pushing and shoving, arm twisting, etc. Bruises and raised redness are typical signs of physical abuse. Avoid using a paddle or other object. The goal is not to hurt the child, but to help the child remember not to misbehave. Limit the number of swats administered. Never spank a child when angry. Don't vent your anger or frustration on the child. Parents don't realize how hard they are spanking a child when they are angry.

Swat the child on the buttocks where they have the most padding. Don't have the child remove clothing before spanking. Don't swat the arms, legs, torso or head.

Four-time Olympian marksman retires

Infantry officer, marksman leaves unit

Paula J. Randall Pagán
USAMU Public Affairs

He's held many titles — officer, infantryman, war veteran and Olympian. But after 20 years of service to his country, an international rifle shooter with the U.S. Army Marksmanship Unit has put down his gun and said goodbye to the Army.

Dubis

Capt. Glenn A. Dubis, a Desert Storm veteran and four-time Olympian, retired from the Army in March, after serving for more than 20 years. During his shooting career, Dubis won the World Rifle Championship three times, the World Military Rifle Championship five times and set or tied six world records. He represented the United States in the Conseil International du Sport Militaire — known as CISM or the Military World Games — more than a dozen times. He is a member of the USAMU International Rifle Hall of Fame as well as his hometown's Athletic Hall of Fame.

"I am proud to have served as an Army officer," Dubis said. "I will miss my Army teammates and U.S. Shooting Team colleagues and the friends I have made from around the world. I will also miss the pride and satisfaction that comes with representing the U.S. Army and the United States of America. I have traveled over most of the world and made friends from many places all while doing something I had the fortune to be good at and that I also love.

It has been an honor and a privilege to serve the Army and our nation. It has been a blessing to be able to pursue my goals and dreams in such a way.

"The Army and the U.S. Army Marksmanship Unit were critical to my success," Dubis said. "They provided me with the time, resources and infrastructure to achieve my full potential as a rifle shooter. If it were not for the Army, it is unlikely that I would have succeeded. I would certainly recommend the Army as a career to others."

Dubis thanked the commanders, past and present, of the USAMU who helped him throughout his career, as well as members of his Army Rifle Team.

"I owe the most to Bill Krilling, my coach on the Army Team for 19 of my 20 years of service," Dubis said. "He helped me build my position and monitor my progress; together we made adjustments, then he just let me do the shooting."

"Dubis was the greatest military CISM shooter in the world and a big asset to the Army team," Krilling said. "He was just a special shooter, easy to work with and had a very positive outlook. Although he was a real champion, he was a humble person. He meant a lot to the team and to me.

"He was quite popular in Europe; he'd win a match and his fans would cheer for him,"

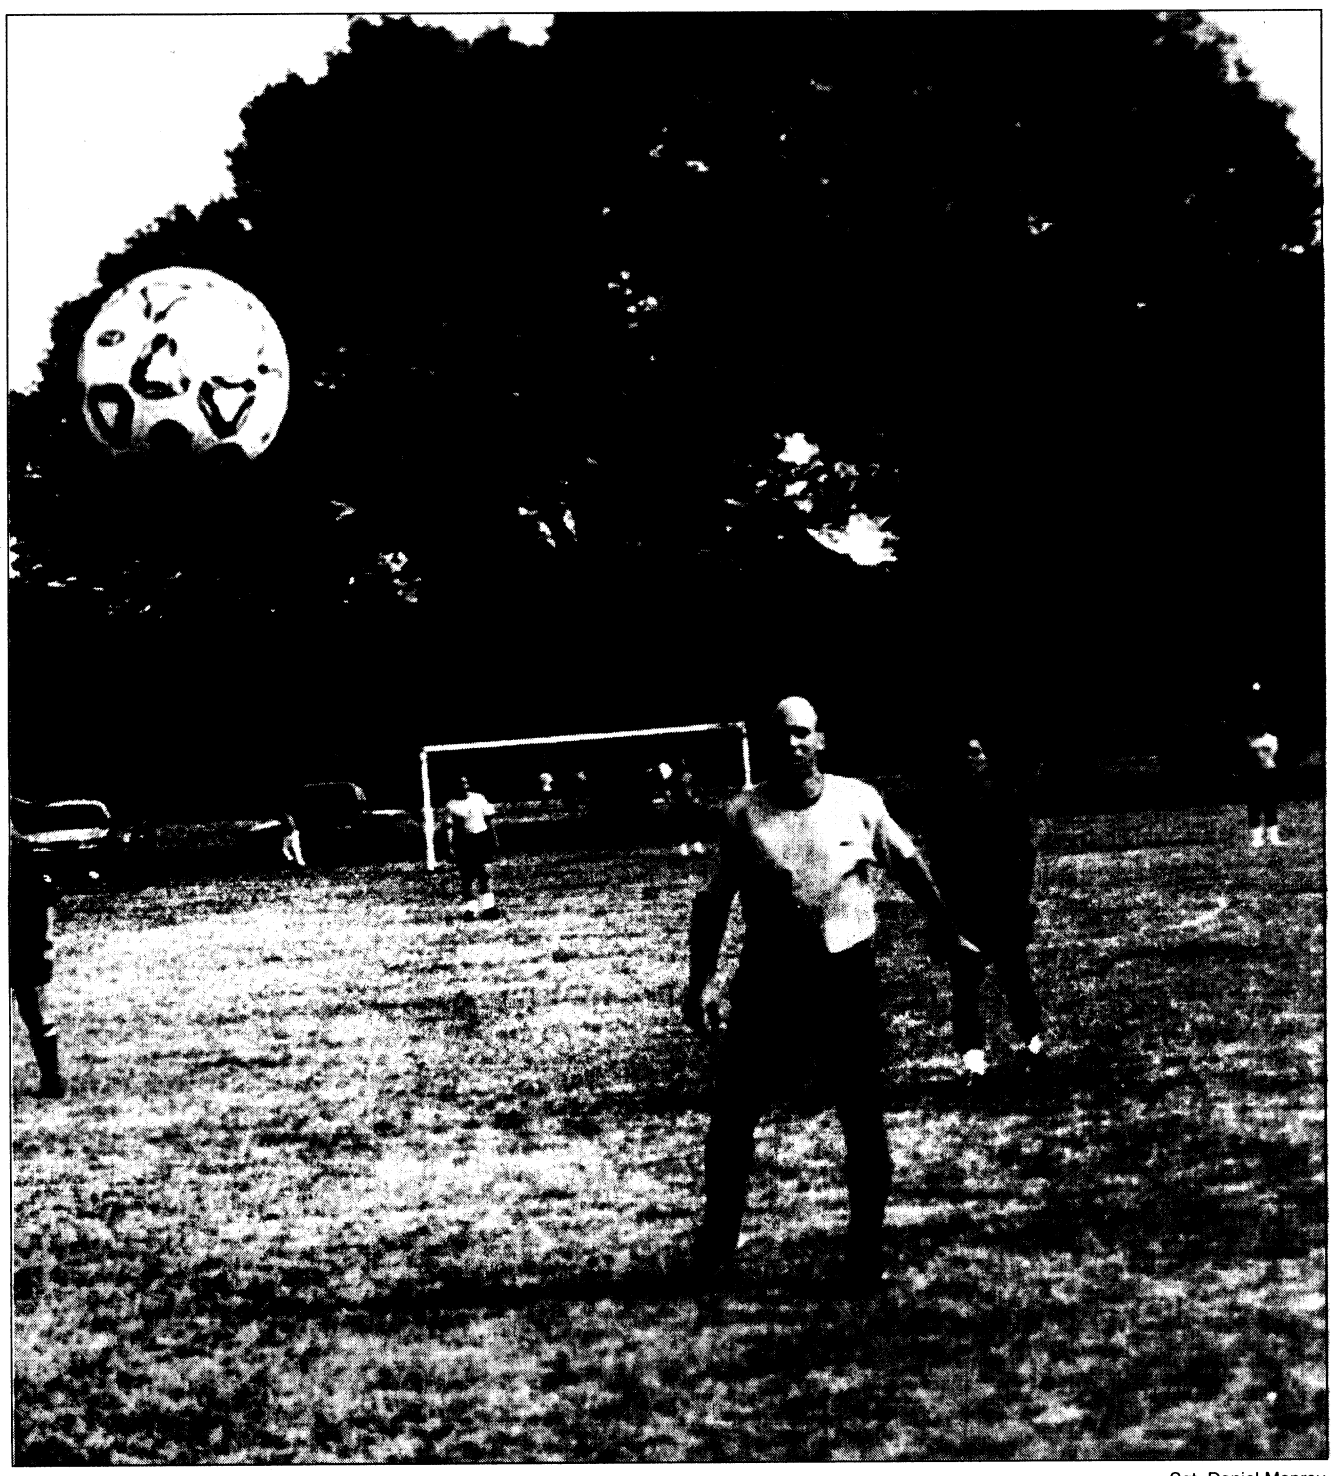
WHINSEC's Commandant's Cup kicks off

Team ties Americans, 2-2, in soccer match

Sgt. Daniel Monroy
WHINSEC Public Affairs

Kicking off a five-game series between Command and General Staff Course students and faculty, the first game of the Western Hemisphere Institute for Security Cooperation's Commandant's Cup — a soccer match — ended in a 2-2 tie April 8 at French Field.

"It was a hard-played game that tested the physical endurance of guys who aren't in their 20s anymore," said Andrew Stewart, dean of Administration and Student Affairs who also participated in the contest.



For many of the Latin American course students, the game of soccer came second-hand, which resulted in many one-on-one battles for the ball that left their U.S. counterparts a step or two behind.

"These guys are really agile and have great ball movement down the field," said Jose Solis, who played the sweeper position for the WHINSEC faculty team.

The last line of defense against an ensuing offense, Solis was charged with covering a substantial amount of turf to prevent a mismatch between the goalie and multiple offensive pressures.

"It's very exhausting. They're coming at you from all angles. So when I can get my foot on the ball, I try to blast it out of the danger area," Solis said.

However, gutting it out, the WHINSEC faculty was able to stave off further assaults to their goal, and they were able to put together several scoring opportunities that panned out for the team. Late in the second half, Kwesi Adinkrah sped by defenders and launched one from about 30 yards away that caught the back of the net and locked the game, two up, for the WHINSEC faculty.

Capt. Jose Solis, Western Hemisphere Institute for Security Cooperation watches his shot sail, in the Commandant's Cup, April 8 at French Field.

Adinkrah, who works in Directorate of Logistics section at WHINSEC, grew up playing soccer in his native Ghana.

"Having played soccer all of my life, it is easy to tell which players are experienced," Adinkrah said. "You look at how they dribble, pass and how they set up a shot."

However, the remainder of games to be played for the Commandant's Cup includes, volleyball, football and America's pastime — baseball.

"The mix of games will help even the score a bit," Stewart said.

Volunteers keep ways fair, green

Couple's pride brings life to golf course

Laura Martinson
Special to the Bayonet©

The sun is shining, the sky is bright and the hanging pansies are in full bloom. The sasanqua tree shades the azaleas and upon initial entry, the golf course smells of freshly cut grass as sprinklers foster new growth.

It's that image that matters most to Mozelle and Al Dunn, because first impressions are lasting.

They are, in fact, the two who toiled at the sasanqua so the shade wouldn't overwhelm the already come and gone azaleas.

"It's time to prune and fertilize for next year," said Mozelle, who's cultivated the Follow Me golf course with her delicate 75-year-old hands. She calls it "cosmetic surgery."

Al is always by her side, his hands less delicate than strong, but 6 years her senior. The 81-year-old retired Army major and WWII and Korea veteran does more of the brawny work, but babies the grounds just the same. And they have reason to love it the way they do — a 48-year history with the course.

"We've played golf here since 1954. Our children were raised on this course," Al said. And there's no doubt they take their stake at Fort Benning seriously.

"If it looks neat and nice, people tend to come back,"

Rangers break out bats, gloves in Columbus' softball league

Team wins big in first game of season

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

Ahhhh, spring time again and time for the big bats to come out.

Young people don't use these bats, though.

A group of soldiers use them in the city of Columbus' softball league.

The Ranger Joe team consists of Fort Benning Rangers, who are out in the city facing some real competion.

"It's great playing on post," said Jimmy Armstrong, Rangers manager. "But, the competition level is not as high as it is out in Columbus."

The Rangers started their season off with a 24-4 victory over the Columbus Power team, Monday. The Rangers capitalized on nine Power errors.

"We stayed alert and realized they were dropping fly balls," said Tom Siter, Rangers' outfielder. "We just used their mistakes to score easy runs."

Siter helped lead the attack with a homerun, three singles, three runs batted in and two runs scored.

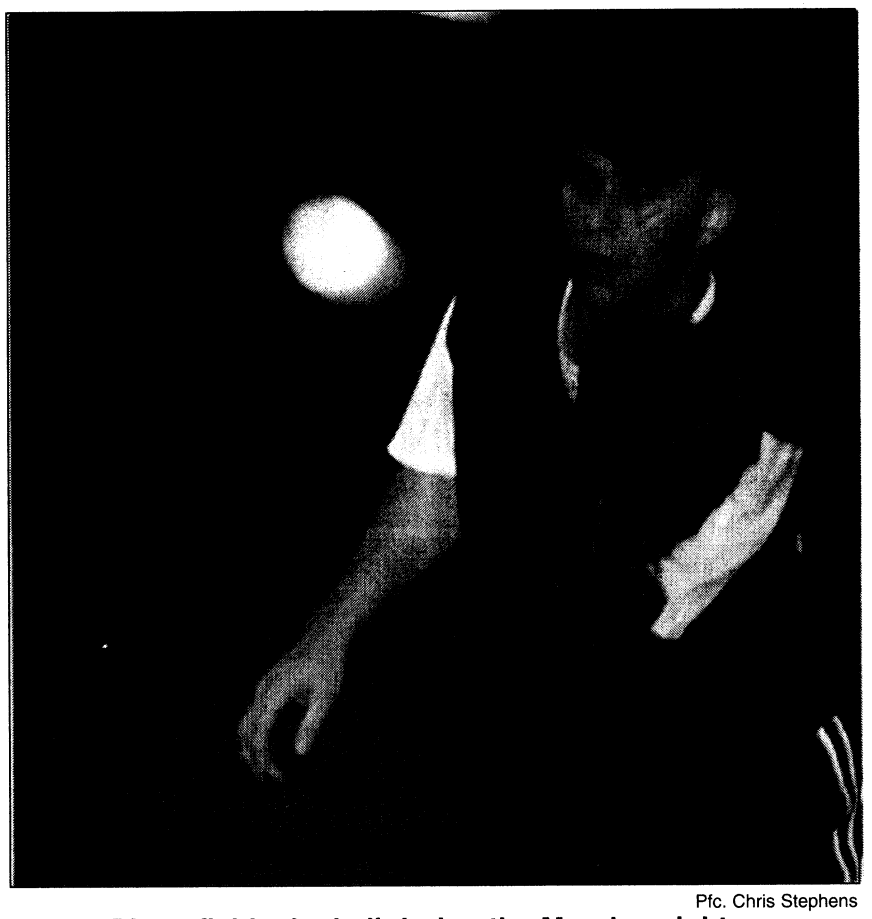
"I just concentrated on getting good swings," Siter said. "When the ball looked like it was in a good spot, I just swung and made great contact with it every time."

Other Rangers leading the charge were James Piette with two doubles, a triple and three runs scored; Will Lendoff with a double, a homer and four runs scored; and Metz Luchey with two singles and three runs scored.

"We're a very competitive team," Armstrong said. "We have good ballplayers, and they're working together as a team. That is the only way we're going to keep winning is by working as one unit."

While the soldiers are out on the field to win, they are also out to have fun.

"It's nice to have time off to do stuff," Siter said. "It gives us great experience. Plus, we get to see some of the other people in the Columbus area."



The Rangers are looking to show the public they are for real.

"Our goal this year is to win the division championship," Armstrong said. "Then as we enter these big tournaments, we want to let people know we're here to play."

The Rangers have the weapons and the maturity to go wherever they want to this season, he said

"The players are competitive and good sports in any situation," Armstrong said. "Those are the two keys to being a successful team."

Couple: Maintains golf course

Mozelle said. "This is a professional sort of game, and I know I wouldn't come back to a messy golf course."

With a recently trimmed maintenance staff, the course relies upon its volunteers for the detailed upkeep. The Dunns and a handful of others take to the tasks of trimming, edging, planting flowers and beds, weedeating around lakes and keeping the course and cart paths clean.

"The main responsibility of the maintenance crew is taking care of the greens, tees, fairways, and roughs," said Ray Meredith, course maintenance supervisor. "If we don't take care of that, people don't play.

"Volunteers see the need and they help."

Al and Mozelle are the sort of volunteers who give proper credit to Meredith for his "true dedication to the course." But it's a game of ping-pong compliments, as Meredith recognized the impact of a nicely decorated course.

"They've done a lot of ornamental planting up around the clubhouse, and that's been very time consuming," he said. "It's great to have those because it's the first thing you see when you enter the course. If that looks good, other things start to look good, too.

"It's not exactly the easiest thing, to be out in the elements performing hard labor," Meredith said. "A lot of people choose a different path when they get older, but the Dunns seem to have a lot of energy to come out and volunteer regularly."

Laura Martinson

Mozelle and Al Dunn trim a sasanqua tree at the post golf course.

Last year they worked on Fridays, but this year they can be found trimming trees and collecting branches and litter on Wednesdays. Both also have a full golf card, and they play three times a week, but only once together.

"Once a week is enough," they said, laughing. But once a week is not enough of Fort Benning. The Dunns settled here in 1960 after Al retired.

"We would have lived near an Army post anyway," Mozelle said. "You just have to see that flag flying when you come on post."

Respect for country and course is something Meredith recognizes in his volunteers.

"The main thing volunteers bring to the table is a lot of pride," he said. "They make this place an attractive place to be and a fun place to play golf."

This year the couple received a bonus in addition to the gratitude of the golfing community.

"We have geese. They're at the lake and that's the first time in 54 years we've had them here," said Mozelle, who also boasts six hatchlings in one of her hanging pansies.

"They want to do their part," said Meredith, "and we would be much worse off without their efforts. That's for sure!"

Dubis: Heads to veteran ranks

Krilling said.

"He so dominated the CISM matches that his scores would intimidate other shooters. When Dubis showed up to a match, his competitors figured the best they could do was take second place."

In Europe, he is quite a celebrity, said Robert W. Aylward, USAMU deputy commander. He's the Michael Jordan of the shooting world and people call the CISM rifle trophy the 'Dubis Trophy' because his name is engraved on it so many times; he's won the CISM more times than everyone else in the world.

Dubis joined the Army Feb. 1, 1982, at which time he started shooting with the Army Marksmanship Unit. From 1984 to 1985, he was a platoon leader on Kelley Hill for 1st Battalion, 58th Infantry Regiment, 197th Infantry Brigade (Separate), which is now the 3rd Brigade, 3rd Infantry Division. In 1990, he moved to brigade level as the officer in charge of the Emergency Operations Center. Dubis deployed with the brigade for Operation Desert Storm and served as the assistant operations officer. In 1991, he returned to USAMU International Rifle Team.

After this year's World Championships, Dubis said he will be hanging up his gun. He said he wants to travel, get a coaching position and marry his long-time sweetheart Melanie Libby of USA Shooting.

"I recently heard it said that the most likely candidate for the title of Man of the Century is the American GI. The American GI has influenced events in more places around the world during the last century than any other person," Dubis said. "I was once an American GI, but now I'm out, happy to join the ranks of the retired veterans. I'm looking forward to the rest of my life."

Scramble tourney today

Show support for soldiers, by playing golf

Spc. Douglas DeMaio

The annual Association of the U.S. Army spring golf tournament will begin at 11 a.m. today.

Today AUSA hosts a four-ball scramble tournament best-ball method to raise funds in support of soldiers' programs on Fort Benning twice a year.

"It's for a worthy cause," said Willie Wells, AUSA president.

AUSA wants to accomplish two things during the tournament, Wells said. They would like for people to come out and enjoy an afternoon of fun, and they would like for people to show their support for soldiers.

"As a professional soldier, I appreciate AUSA in championing our cause for programs needed by the Army for both active and retired," said Command Sgt. Maj. Gereld Klein, post command sergeant major.

AUSA plays an important role in solving issues for the Army, Klein said. They show support by taking issues to congress and the senate to fund the Army's cause.

Players can register prior to tee time. The cost is $35, which includes a cart, green fee and range balls. Food and beverages will be provided so community members should come out and show their support, Klein said.

For more information, call Larry Cruise at 687-1940 or Bud Redfield at 544-8566.

I found buried treasure in my attic.

More than 40 years ago, Grandma gave you some Series E Savings Bonds. So you put them in a safe place and forgot about them—until now. You were looking for old records when you found an unexpected treasure . . . those old Series E Savings Bonds. And even though your old bonds are no longer earning interest, they could still be worth more than 5 times their face value. So why not redeem those old bonds at your local financial institution? To find out more, call 1-800-4US-BOND, or write to Savings Bonds, Parkersburg, WV 26106-1328. Old Savings Bonds. They're a treasure worth digging for.

TRADOC chief briefs locals

Rumors about Benning's future cause concern

Lori Egan
Bayonet editor

In an effort to still rumors about how the Army's Transformation will affect Fort Benning, Gen. John N. Abrams, commander of the Training and Doctrine Command, met with a delegation to discuss future plans.

The delegation, which consisted of Sen. Max Cleland, and Reps. Mac Collins and Sanford Bishop and area representatives with military ties invited by the congressional delegates, met with Abrams in a closed-door meeting Monday at the Fort Benning Officers' Club.

The issue was whether the creation of a Maneuver Battle Lab at Fort Knox, Ky., and TRADOC sending subject matter experts to help stand up the new lab would detract from Fort Benning's mission.

Post Commanding General Maj. Gen. Paul Eaton attended the meeting.

"General Abrams reaffirmed the importance of Fort Benning and the infantry to the Army's and the nation's security," Eaton said. "As we've said many times, the infantry is the force that takes the last 100 yards."

After the meeting, retired Maj. Gen. Jerry White, a former post commander and member of the Civilian Military Council, asked Abrams what Fort Benning would look like in four years and if the chief of infantry would have the tools necessary to do the job.

"I was told all the pieces of the infantry will remain at Fort Benning," White said, "including the schools, the leadership, the ability to write infantry doctrine, the battle labs, land warrior and the objective force. What will change is the technology and some of the distance learning."

Best Ranger starts today

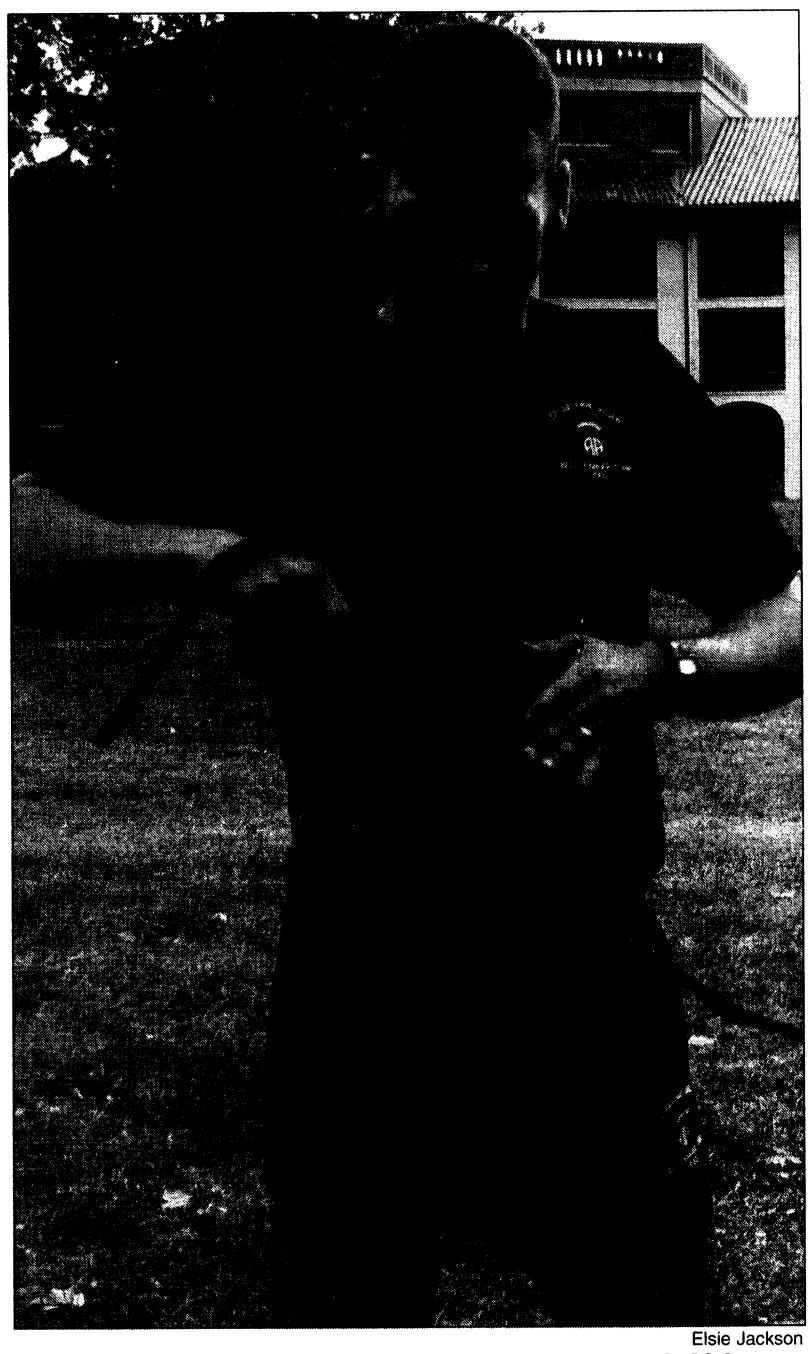
Elsie Jackson
USAIC Public Affairs Office

In what may be a first, an Air Force technical sergeant will be at the starting line for the annual David E. Grange Best Ranger Competition, which kicks off today near Malvesti Field.

Air Force Tech. Sgt. Jim Brown, an 11-year Air Force veteran, is eligible to compete for the "Best Ranger" title because he is ranger qualified. He earned his ranger tab in 2000. He estimates that he is one of less than 50 ranger-qualified Air Force personnel on active duty.

"I'm really in to triathlons, marathons and endurance events," Brown said. "And this competition gives me a chance to represent the Air Force in a different light than most people see us.

Brown's job is to bring in close air support for Army maneuver units.



"I always work on Army posts. Going to Ranger School gave me a better understanding of the Army and how it works." Brown and his partner, Army Sgt. Paul Putney, are one of three teams representing the 2nd Infantry Division. It is their first Best Ranger competition.

The Best Ranger Competition got its start in 1981, when the Chairborne Rangers, a civilian organization, asked the Ranger Department to design and conduct a "Ranger Olympics" to identify the best two-man Ranger team in the Army. A competition was designed to place extreme demands on the teams' physical, mental and technical abilities.

The first competition was held in 1982. It has been conducted every year since then, except for 1991 when it was cancelled because of Operations Desert Shield and Desert Storm.

Benning, Gordon shape future

Objective Force key to Transformation

Jim Caldwell
TRADOC News Service

FORT MONROE, Va. — Two Georgia-based Army posts are showing how to build soldiers who will be capable of fighting on the battlefields of the future.

They're also showing how it will be done more efficiently and with less cost.

Fort Benning and Fort Gordon are vital players in the Army Transformation campaign. The objective of the campaign is to create an Objective Force, powered by a Future Combat System.

The FCS will be a system of systems that will be lighter, more mobile, but more lethal than today's armor forces. It will also have more protection for crews than today's M-1 Abrams tanks. Boeing and Science Application International Corporation have been selected as the coordinators of a team of contractors beginning developing the FCS.

The FCS is scheduled to be completed in time for the first Army units to begin transitioning to the FCS and become the Objective Force about 2008.

A powerful C4ISR (command, control, computer, communications, intelligence, surveillance and reconnaissance) will enhance the Objective Force's situational awareness, increasing effectiveness and precise lethality through the full spectrum of missions, from peacekeeping to major theater of war.

"Who could do the experimentation for the Objective Force Warrior?" asked Gen. John N. Abrams, commander of Training and Doctrine Command. "It's got to be Benning. That's where the expertise is and that's where the warrior tradition is."

Objective Force Warrior will be an integration of man and technology to make individual soldiers more effective, more aware and more lethal than ever before. The capabilities each

Post celebrates spirit of giving

Volunteers save Fort Benning $1.9 million

Fort Benning volunteers saved the installation $1,936,112 last year.

More than 400 soldiers, retirees and family members gathered on the lawn of Riverside, the home of Fort Benning's commanding general, Wednesday, to celebrate volunteers and the spirit that drives them. They represented the 26,000 volunteers who donated 126,000 hours to improve the quality of life for military families last year.

"Our theme is 'Celebrate the American spirit,'" said Deborah Holton, the Installation Volunteer Coordinator. "And in light of what our nation has come through, it's fitting to recognize those who dedicate themselves to making Fort Benning a better place to live for all of us. We couldn't do all that we do without our volunteers."

Indeed, volunteers serve the Fort Benning community in countless areas — the Red Cross, Martin Army Community Hospital, Youth Services, the tax center, Scouting, the officers and enlisted spouses' clubs, the thrift store, golf course, chapels and schools to name a few.

"And knowing the Army's methods of record-keeping, I suspect we'll never know where all our volunteers work and how many hours they give," said Brig. Gen. David Rodriguez, assistant commandant. "I figure these numbers represent only a small percentage of volunteer hours."

One thing is certain, said Col. Joe Torres, garrison commander, Fort Benning could never afford to pay for the work our volunteers do.

"Without you, we wouldn't be able to do the things we do ... to execute many of the tasks we do. You certainly make my job easier, and this is a very small attempt to say thank you, to show our appreciation."

By donating their time, volunteers answered the president's call to action, Torres said.

"You answered the questions, 'If not me, than who? If not now, than when?' And you answered them with action."

Retired Command Sgt. Maj. Frank Plass was named Retiree Volunteer of Excellence for his contributions as president of the 29th Infantry Regimental Association, president of the Pioneer Chapter of the National Infantry Association and honorary command sergeant major of the 29th Infantry Regiment.

"You know, people ask me why, after more than 30 years in the Army, why I keep coming out here. I'm trying to give back what the Army

Tune in to great TV turnoff

Bridgett Siter
Special to the Bayonet©

COMMENTARY

It's TV-Turnoff Week. Everyone all together now, turn it off. Hey, you with the remote behind your back! Put it down and back away slowly with your hands where I can see them.

The eighth annual TV-Turnoff, sponsored by the TV-Turnoff Network of Washington, D.C., is designed to encourage families to find creative alternatives to mindless, marathon television viewing. They want us to think outside the box, you might say.

Let's face it — TV programming isn't what it used to be. Innocent humor and family entertainment has been replaced by violence, vulgar innuendoes and raw sexuality. Once considered a safe electronic babysitter, it's now a time-bomb waiting to spew poison at the minds of immature viewers, those who aren't quite capable of filtering the garbage for themselves. And parents everywhere are allowing it to happen.

Don't believe me? Just look at the statistics:

• 99 percent of the U.S. population own TV sets, and 54 percent have one in their bedroom.

• Children spend an average of three hours each day in front of the tube.

• Adults spend an average of four hours every day watching television.

• And get this — for children older than 7, 95 percent of television viewing is done alone and unsupervised.

I like the way the organization's executive director, Frank Vespe, puts it. "Allowing a set in a child's bedroom is essentially inviting a stranger into your house." Wow, talk about a turnoff!

Now I'm not suggesting we all throw out the television set, though I applaud those who do. TV does have its value, and occasionally, when the stars are perfectly aligned and the moon is blue, you can find really wholesome entertainment, maybe even educational. The Discovery Channel has some amazing programs the whole family will enjoy.

What I am suggesting is that we all accept the challenge — one week without television. That'll give you a pretty good idea what kind of role television really plays in your life.

If you're sweating and trembling by the end of the week, you may want to think about reducing the number of hours you watch on a regular basis.

And to help you in your quest to fill those empty hours, I've compiled a list of possible activities:

• Take a nice long walk with the kids, before the weather gets too hot to enjoy. Explore Fort Benning's forests.

• Visit The Infantry Museum, the library or a playground.

• Wash the car. If it doesn't need it, come wash mine.

• Yard work. Plant some flowers. Better yet, plant a tree and leave a lasting reminder of your presence on Fort Benning.

• Organize your sock drawer, junk drawer or coat closet.

• Read anything — a book, a poem, the newspaper, a cereal box. Just read.

• Volunteer, visit a nursing home or take magazines to the hospital.

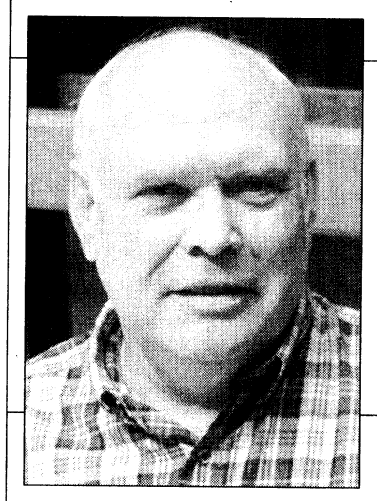
• Riverfest!

• Take the kids to see the Best Ranger Competition and make up a really good story about the year you almost won.

• Play board games, cards, charades or ball.

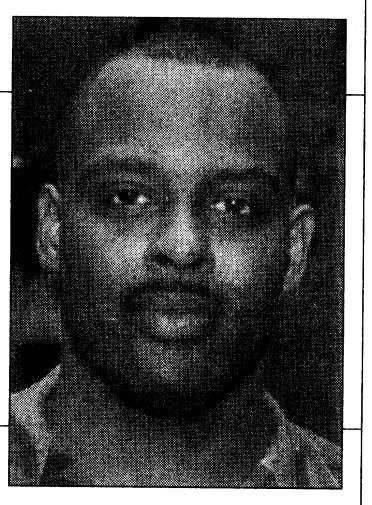
• Go fishing.

• Make dinner together, from scratch.



• Clean out your basement or garage for the upcoming postwide yard sale May 4.

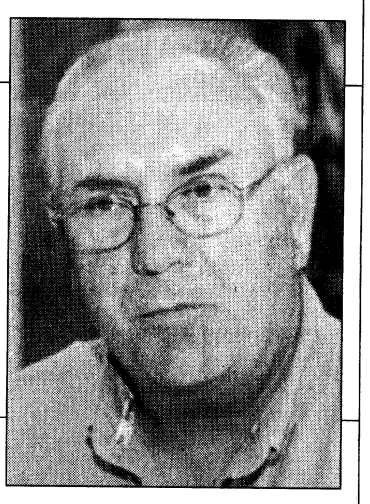
• Go for a bike ride.



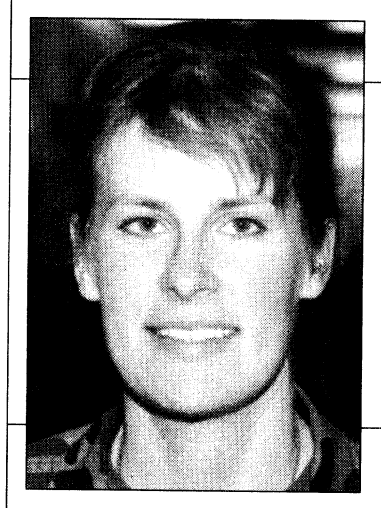
Whatever you decide to do, leave the TV off for a week. I dare you.

VARIOUS VOICES

How much TV do you watch, and do you limit your TV viewing?



Retired Sgt. 1st Class, Donald Quick, Columbus — "I watch seven hours of television a week give or take a few depending on how busy I am. When I do watch television it's just the news."



Sgt. 1st Class Ira Steele, 91st Division, Camp Parks, Calif. — "I watch the news every morning and evening. If I have time I watch a few hours of HBO or the History Channel."

Gayle Campbell, family member — "I have children so we watch a lot of family-oriented channels and learning programs. We never watch any violent or R-rated movies. On average we watch about 12 hours of TV a week."

Retired Sgt. 1st Class Ed Mullins, Columbus — "I watch two to three hours of television a week. Mainly news and information, and sometimes a movie."

Sgt. Zie Lovedy, 302nd MPAD, Bell, Calif. — "I watch one hour of TV on Thursday nights. My job doesn't leave much down time, but watching TV is a nice way to relax."

Spc. Sandra Mercado, 302nd MPAD — "I never have a chance to watch TV, but if I do it's something funny like Drew Carey."

SPELL CHECK

Not all it's cracked up to be

Elsie Jackson
USAIC Public Affairs Office

COMMENTARY

"I have a spelling checker
I disk covered four my PC
It plane lee marks four my revue
Miss steaks aye can knot see."
"Ode to Spell Checkers" by Jerry Zar, Northwestern Illinois University

No doubt about it. Spell check has really changed the way we do business.

I'm not convinced that's a good thing.

In my humble opinion, spell check stinks. It's a crutch that too many people are way too dependent on. I'm not saying that a dependence on Spell Check will lead to the decline and eventual end of civilization as we know it, but surely the lack of attention to detail that lures people to use Spell Check can't be good.

"Each frays come posed up on my screen
Eye trussed too bee a joule.
The checker pours oar every word
To checque sum spelling rule."

I studied journalism in college, I've worked on training manuals from start to finish, worked on two school papers, played editor for more club newsletters than I care to remember and have copy edited everything from term papers to memorandums to articles for The Bayonet and everything in between for a long time.

If you are the author of something, even if it's just a note to your child's teacher or a classified ad, part of the writing process is taking the time to review what you've written. If you don't have enough time to review something you've written, either budget your time better or learn to proof read faster.

"And now bee cause my spelling is checked with such grate flare,
There are know faults in awl this peace,
Of nun eye am a wear."

It never hurts to have other people proof your masterpiece either, especially if more than one person is going to be reading your final product. Typos, spelling errors, poor punctuation and fractured grammar can say more about you and the message you are trying to send than the actual content of your message.

"To rite with care is quite a feet
Of witch won should be proud,
And wee mussed dew the best wee can
Sew flaws are knot aloud."

When it comes to written messages, you can never be two care full.

Saturday, April 20, between 4:30 and 5 p.m., a flight bag, an Army sleeping bag and a black sleeping bag were taken from the Doughboy Stadium parking lot.

The bags belonged to two Girl Scouts and they would like their belongings returned to them.

The stuffed animals were gifts from their grandma who passed away last month.

Please call me at 221-2872 or return the bags to Doughboy Stadium and I will pick them up.

Please return the contents of the flight bag.

Speeding still problem in post housing areas

Speeding in post housing seems to be one of the hottest topics going. This blatant show of disrespect to the rules and regulations as well as to one another is perhaps one of the most dangerous acts a Fort Benning resident can participate in.

Daily, my daughter, as well as hundreds of other children's lives around the installation are put in danger because people are in too big of a hurry to obey the speed limit. (Such as the white, 2001 Ford Mustang, that everyday, like clockwork at 7 a.m., noon, 1 p.m. and 5:30 p.m. comes speeding in front of my house.)

When I first learned to drive, my father told me about a friend of his who, for three years, had refused to get behind the wheel of a car.

While doing the speed limit through his neighborhood one day, his next-door neighbor's 3-year-old ran into the side of his truck on a tricycle and died.

The man not only faced manslaughter charges but also the pain of having to see his neighbor's face every day and knowing he had killed a child.

It took becoming a mother to realize the pain both my father's friend and the child's parents felt and were forced to deal with every day — the man was even doing the speed limit!

Every time I see a neighbor speeding through Custer Terrace, without a care in the world, I think of the possible tragedy.

Officials try to reduce checkpoint congestion

Alternate access points recommended

Bridgett Siter
Special to the Bayonet©

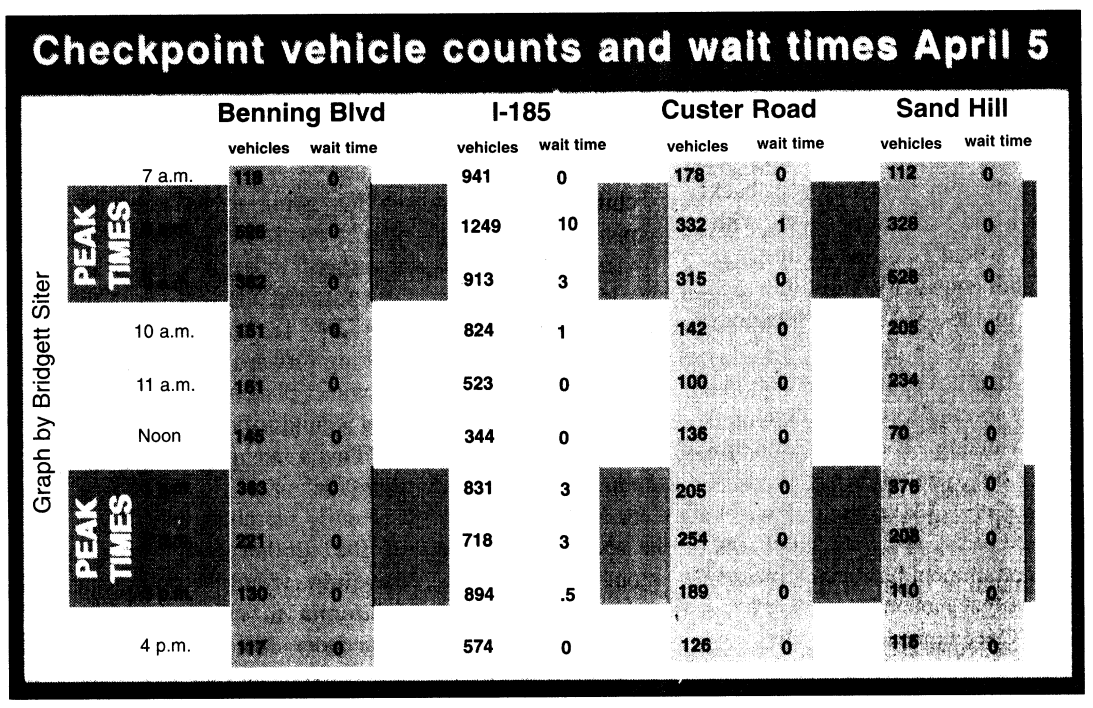
Rising temperatures don't have to mean rising tempers.

That's the message the chief of Law Enforcement Division wants Fort Benning drivers to remember as summer approaches.

"Waiting lines at access points may well get longer as more and more people get out and about," said Lt. Col. Terry Kelley. "People should be a little more patient and remember that there's more than one way to get on post."

Kelley referred to the seven access points, or "checkpoints," around the installation: South Lumpkin Road, Benning Boulevard off Victory Drive, the I-185 entrance, Custer Road, Sand Hill, Eddy Bridge and 1st Division Road near the 4th Ranger Training Battalion.

Kelley said wait times average less than 10 minutes, even during peak traffic times at I-185, the most congested of the checkpoints. But there are ways to decrease the delay.



"Me, I'm the world's worst waiter. I'm too impatient," Kelley said. "I'd rather drive 30 minutes then wait 15. I suggest drivers consider entering post from one of the less congested points. They may drive a little out of the way, but they'll save themselves a little time in the long run."

Capt. Cary Cowan, the training officer in charge of access control, does just that. He lives off I-185, but enters post on Benning Boulevard.

"I just get off an exit early and drive around. There's less traffic and it saves me time," Cowan said.

Kelley said the I-185 checkpoint entrance will be widened to four lanes, at an unspecified date, to speed the process. Speed bumps will also be installed in the next few weeks, a reminder to drivers to enter and exit the checkpoint area with caution. The South Lumpkin access point is now open 12 hours, from 5 a.m. to 5 p.m. each day to help alleviate traffic congestion at other points, Kelley said.

On average, the I-185 entrance experiences the most traffic flow throughout the week, with surges between 7 and 9 a.m. (as many as 1,400 vehicles) and around noon (more than 700 vehicles).

The Benning Boulevard entrance experience the second largest traffic flow with between 300 and 400 vehicles at peak times.

"That's a big difference, worth taking a closer look at if you don't want to wait in those long lines during the summer heat. Try a different route," Kelley said.

Company sets new standard in eArmyU

Achieves 100 percent participation

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet Staff

A Company, 1st Battalion, 29th Infantry Regiment, has just set a new standard in eArmyU.

The company achieved 100 percent participation from all eligible soldiers in the program.

eArmyU is a program designed for enlisted soldiers to earn a college degree online.

Soldiers can choose from earning a certificate in a job field, an associate's, bachelor's or master's degree.

When first hearing about the program, A Company soldiers got started right away on it.

"I felt if the soldiers heard about it, and then saw someone take the lead, then that would get them motivate," said 1st Sgt. Paul Horton.

"So, I took the lead and enrolled myself in the program. I am now studying to get my bachelor of arts in English."

Horton, like many others in the company are starting a road to success.

"This program gives soldiers opportunities to learn various skills," said Capt. Edlyn E. Smith, company commander.

"In today's world, computers run a lot of things. These soldiers are learning how to use these computers that are important to us in battle. So, not only are they helping themselves out, but they are also helping out the mission," he said.

The program was created to allow soldiers who otherwise wouldn't be able to attend classes, to take their required courses over the Internet.

"If eArmyU wasn't available, I would have to wait until I am out of the Army to take classes," said Spc. Silas L. Chapman. "Now, I can take the courses in my free time and earn my associate's degree in criminal justice."

After being enrolled into the program, a soldier is sent a technology package within seven to 10 business days of being put into the system.

The technology package includes a laptop computer, a printer and free Internet access.

The only requirement for the program is soldiers must finish 12 credit hours within two years of receiving the package.

There is another requirement to the program that is an unwritten requirement.

"eArmyU takes a lot of discipline and a lot of motivation," said Elaine Livingston, chief, Staff Education and Training Division. "Soldiers are going to have to discipline themselves to sit down in front of the computer and complete these classes. There won't be someone there to tell them to do their work."

For the soldiers who discipline themselves and stay motivated to complete their degree, the rewards will be endless.

"This program is helping me be successful as a soldier," Chapman said. "Also, when I am out of the Army, it gives me something to look forward to in job field I will be going into."

eArmyU gives soldiers many opportunities to do a program they want and gives them an opportunity to do their work when they have time.

It's like a schedule, once you get used to it, it's easy," Horton said.

"I also believe that every eligible enlisted soldier should get involved in the program. When new soldiers come to our unit, we brief them about it, and encourage them to get involved," he said.

"I think that all chain of commands should push for their soldiers to join the program," said Staff Sgt. Klent L. Plummer. "It's helping me and it will certainly help them."

> "It's like a schedule, once you get used to it, it's easy."

To apply for eArmyU a soldier must be enlisted and have three years of service left in the Army.

If a soldier meets these requirements, they can attend eArmyU briefings given every Wednesday morning at 9:30 a.m. in Infantry Hall, Classroom 32-B.

Benning consolidates recognition ceremonies

Sara Hodges
Quality Management Division

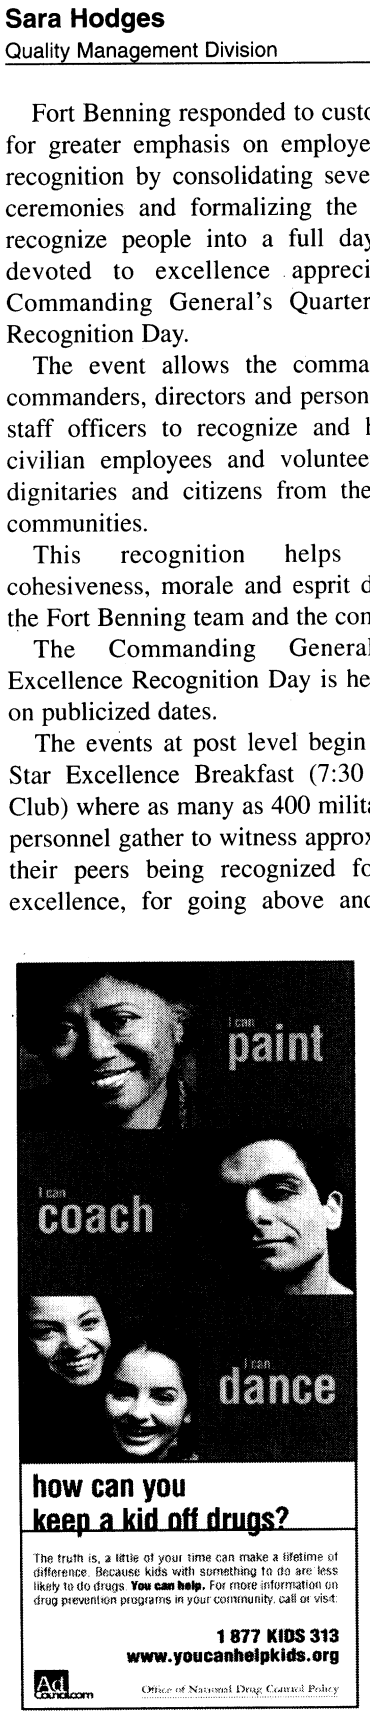
Fort Benning responded to customers' requests for greater emphasis on employee rewards and recognition by consolidating several recognition ceremonies and formalizing the opportunity to recognize people into a full day each quarter devoted to excellence appreciation — the Commanding General's Quarterly Excellence Recognition Day.

The event allows the commanding general, commanders, directors and personnel and special staff officers to recognize and honor soldiers, civilian employees and volunteers, as well as dignitaries and citizens from the local civilian communities.

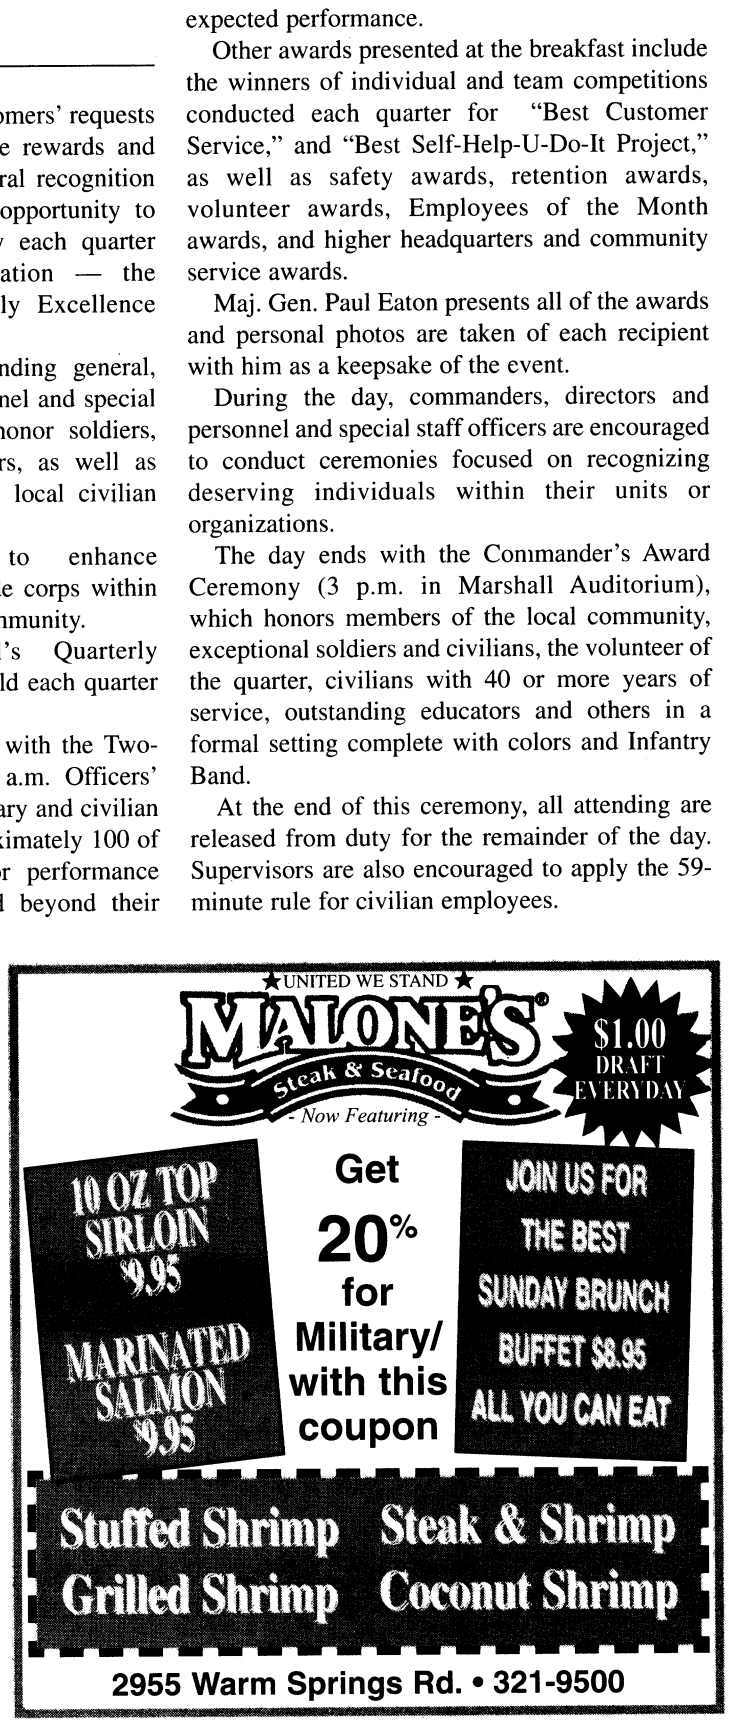
This recognition helps to enhance cohesiveness, morale and esprit de corps within the Fort Benning team and the community.

The Commanding General's Quarterly Excellence Recognition Day is held each quarter on publicized dates.

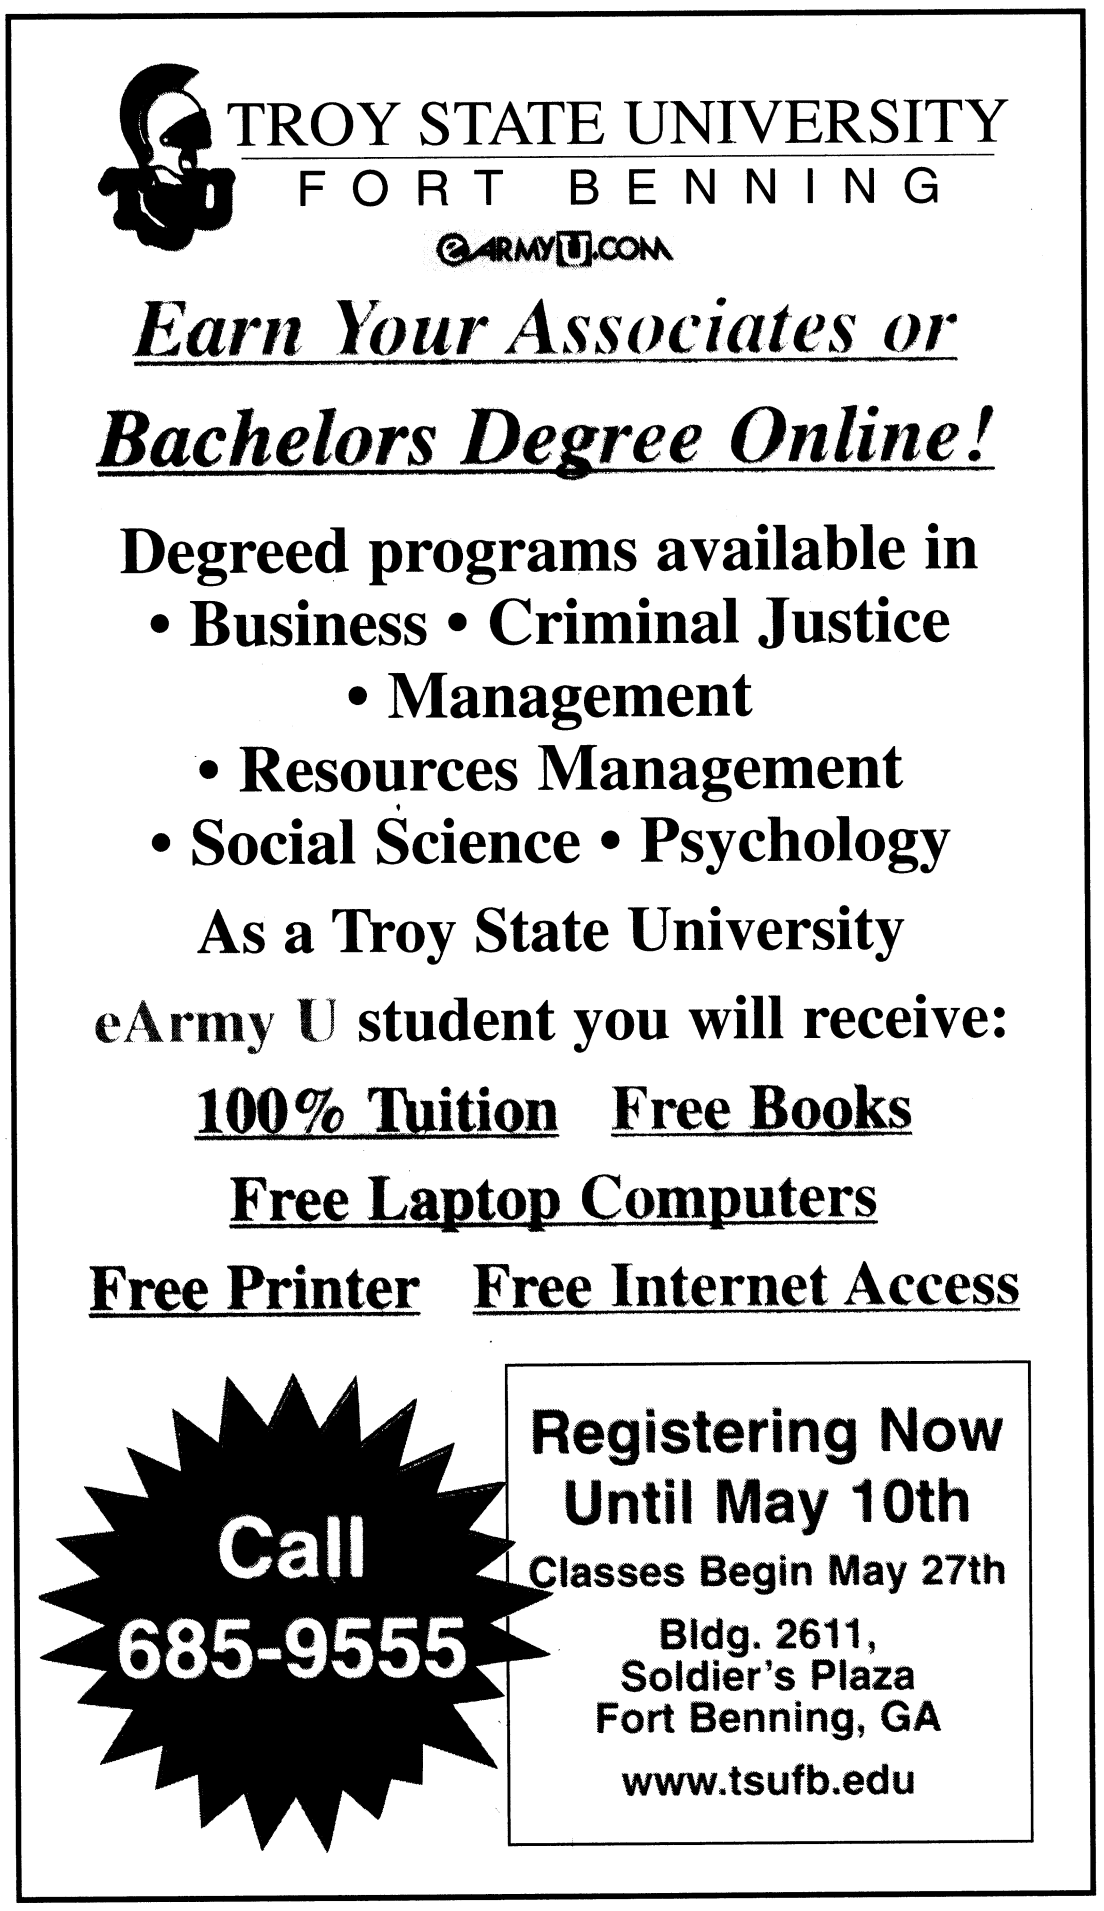
The events at post level begin with the Two-Star Excellence Breakfast (7:30 a.m. Officers' Club) where as many as 400 military and civilian personnel gather to witness approximately 100 of their peers being recognized for performance excellence, for going above and beyond their expected performance.



Other awards presented at the breakfast include the winners of individual and team competitions conducted each quarter for "Best Customer Service," and "Best Self-Help-U-Do-It Project," as well as safety awards, retention awards, volunteer awards, Employees of the Month awards, and higher headquarters and community service awards.



Maj. Gen. Paul Eaton presents all of the awards and personal photos are taken of each recipient with him as a keepsake of the event.



During the day, commanders, directors and personnel and special staff officers are encouraged to conduct ceremonies focused on recognizing deserving individuals within their units or organizations.

The day ends with the Commander's Award Ceremony (3 p.m. in Marshall Auditorium), which honors members of the local community, exceptional soldiers and civilians, the volunteer of the quarter, civilians with 40 or more years of service, outstanding educators and others in a formal setting complete with colors and Infantry Band.

At the end of this ceremony, all attending are released from duty for the remainder of the day. Supervisors are also encouraged to apply the 59-minute rule for civilian employees.

Best Ranger: Keeps competitors busy for 60 hours

first-time competitor whose presence may raise a few eyebrows. Lazenby is an Army lawyer assigned to the 82nd Airborne Division, Fort Bragg, N.C.

"We think he's the first JAG officer to compete," said 82nd coach Sgt. 1st Class Brandon Jenks. "He's in good shape, but technically, it took more for him to train up to get to the same level as the others because he doesn't do a lot of the tasks on a daily basis."

Lazenby, who finished Ranger School in 1995, agreed.

"I had to learn one task, the M-240B machine gun, from scratch."

Lazenby served as an enlisted medic and infantry officer before going to law school. He said he has always wanted to compete for the Best Ranger title, but his only other opportunity before this year conflicted with law school. He and his partner, Cpl. Andrew Fain, make up one of five teams representing the 82nd.

"I think we have a good chance of finishing," he said. "My partner is infantry and he is very strong."

One team that does not lack experience is the Infantry Training Brigade team of 1st Lt. Rick Ahern and Staff Sgt. Philip Savatino. This will be Ahern's sixth Best Ranger competition in seven years, and Savatino's third.

Ahern and his partner Marc Messerschmitt, then second lieutenants and representing the Student Officer Detachment, won the competition in 2000.

"I took a break last year and coached a team, but while I was watching them compete, I knew I was on the wrong side of the engineer tape," said Ahern. "When three guys volunteered to represent ITB this year, nobody had to force me to be the fourth."

A team from Schofield Barracks, Hawaii, also boasts an experienced competitor. 1st Lt. Lucas VanAntwerp and his partner Staff Sgt. Michael McNulty, placed third in last year's competition. VanAntwerp is competing with a different partner this year, his older brother Capt. Jeffrey VanAntwerp.

"Knowing each other really well is going to help us get through the competition," said Capt. VanAntwerp. "I think we've got a pretty good chance."

"It's going to be awesome, just awesome, competing together," said 1st Lt. VanAntwerp, the younger of the two by 18 months. "I'm looking forward to it. Whether we win or place, though, the real goal is to glorify God.

"That's all I'm really out there for."

Family members and friends of the brother team will be traveling from Virginia and California to cheer them on. "Our mom, dad, two sisters and little brother will be here," said Capt. VanAntwerp. The VanAntwerps are one of four teams competing for the 25th Infantry Division.

If awards were presented for "Most Traveled Team" or "Most Determined to Get Here Team," three teams would sweep both categories. Staff Sgts. Robert Ossman and Mark Roland are competing during a hiatus from a deployment in Kosovo. Capts. Matthew Bartlett and Jesse Abreu, and their alternate, 1st Lt. Nat Wilson, have just returned from a deployment in Bosnia.

Both teams are coached by Sgt. 1st Class David Ventura.

Two 3rd Brigade soldiers attached to the 10th Mountain Division in Kosovo, Capts. Tracy Trudell and Ryan Shipley traveled from Camp Monteith, Kosovo.

Shipley credits Command Sgt. Maj. Steven Greer with their presence here.

"Command Sgt. Maj. Greer has been our biggest supporter all along," said Shipley. "Telling us what paperwork we needed to get done, different techniques that have worked for him in the past."

"He's been such a huge asset to us," Trudell agreed. "We've found a fountain of knowledge in him. He's done the BRC four times and trained several teams. I just wish we had more time with him."

"People look at us like we're crazy for wanting to do this," laughed Trudell.

"This is the toughest competition. That's what Lt. Col. Kurt Fuller, the OIC of G-3, was telling me after I told him I wanted to do it. I told him about all the triathlons I've won and he said 'I don't think you are understanding me, captain. These are professional, world-class athletes and only half of them are even finishing. This is the toughest military competition in the world.'"

Trudell and Shipley trained for the competition while fulfilling full-time duties on the Kosovo deployment. They were not sure they would be able to compete until they received authorization in January.

"We are definitely ill-prepared for this competition, and we realize that, but we love being the underdogs," said Trudell. "I think we're ready mentally. It's just like Ranger School, one big challenge, but you have to have the stamina to drive on with the ranger objective and complete the mission."

Families and friends of the competitors will be able to watch in-depth coverage of the Best Ranger Competition on the Outdoor Life Network, which is covering the event for the first time this year. OLN camera crews have already been at work across post for nearly two weeks. Nearly a dozen OLN camera crews will be following the competitors through the weekend.

OLN will broadcast three one-hour episodes of the Best Ranger Competition during prime time on May 13, 20 and 27. All three episodes will be aired back-to-back on Memorial Day, May 27.

Exact air times will be posted on the network's Web site, www.olntv.com.

ESPN is also covering this year's Best Ranger Competition. A one-hour program will premiere July 7 and run throughout the month.

Near real-time coverage will be available online at www.bestranger.com.

OFW: Keeps Benning busy

soldier is given by the OFW developments essentially make them a system of systems, which will make up the future combat system.

OFW is an improvement on the Land Warrior system, which was also developed at Fort Benning's TRADOC System Manager–Soldiers organization.

The Infantry Center has led the Army in consolidating the military occupational skills. Instead of having a different MOS for an infantryman with several more skills than another soldier, MOSs were combined to drastically reduce the maintenance of the numbers of MOSs.

Fort Benning's post commander Maj. Gen. Paul D. Eaton said the Dismounted Battlespace Battle Lab is key to the Army's future and will continue to play a vital role in Army Transformation.

"The Benning battlefield lab is going to work harder than they've probably ever worked before," said William Briscoe, director of TRADOC Transformation. "They're going to have to work across the DTLOMS (doctrine, training, leader development, organizations, materiel and soldiers) to ensure infantry capabilities get blended into a system of systems architecture.

"Battle labs are going to be rechartered so that we start building this cadre of subject matter experts who understand system of systems development in branch capabilities and how those capabilities have got to be present across the tactical and strategic levels of war to support the warfighting CINC (commander in chief)."

The Infantry Center's expertise in small unit leadership training for infantry soldiers and officers is the reason it was selected to conduct pilots for a planned Basic Officer Leadership Course, Briscoe said.

"New officers have already completed their basic training, whether it's at the Officer Candidate School, Reserve Officer Training Corps summer training camps, or at West Point," he said. "BOLC orients that training to ensure they have the basics of small-unit leadership that prepares them for their individual branches."

Briscoe said that a final site or sites for BOLC has not been selected.

A new approach in training soldiers so they're able to begin contributing to their first Army unit of assignment also is in a pilot course at Fort Gordon.

"The assignment-oriented training process takes a hard look at the critical tasks that are currently in our programs of instruction (POI), and makes a determination whether an individual really needs all those skills at that first unit," said Lt. Gen. Dennis Cavin, commander of TRADOC's Army Accessions Command.

"You take those less relevant tasks out of the POI and reduce the training time. That provides a more highly competent soldier to the operational Army in a shorter period of time."

The pilot involves Signal Corps soldiers who will operate and maintain mobile subscriber equipment. Every Army signal unit does not use all the equipment. Soldiers trained only on equipment used by their first unit have shortened class time from 13.6 weeks to 9.6 weeks.

The Signal Center at Fort Gordon leads the "lifelong learning" concept, through the creation of its University of Information Technology.

"When their soldiers graduate from training, the school stays linked with them," Briscoe said. "The school gives each one a CD, and the soldiers stay in communications, linked through a Web site. That gives soldiers updates on tasks and changes to skill tasks to ensure they maintain their proficiency at their skill levels."

Fort Gordon is also the test installation for a new $25 million Guaranteed Fixed Price Remediation contract to clean up 26 hazardous waste sites. The contractor is responsible for all coordination with state and federal environmental officials through ensuring cleanup meets their regulatory approval.

Recently there have been news stories repeating rumors that the Fort Benning battle lab will close, or another training function there will be transferred to another installation.

The Signal School was rumored to be moving from Fort Gordon to Fort Leonard Wood, Mo.

"You just can't do away with the level of expertise and the credibility places like the Signal Center at Fort Gordon and Infantry Center have for the Army," Briscoe said. "There's a fundamental culture and a doctrinal mainstream identification for those two organizations, and for what they do to build our force. You can't lose that."

Meeting: Answers questions

Fort Benning is a vital player in the Army's Transformation, Eaton said. The objective is to create an Objective Force, powered by a Future Combat System. (See article by Jim Caldwell on page A-1.)

Abrams briefed the Congressional delegates and area representatives on the emerging changes of asymmetrical threats, the proliferation of technology and the need for the force to be a forward presence.

The emerging changes drive Army doctrine changes, such as how soldiers are trained, leader development, organizations, materiel, Abrams said in a press release.

The dismounted soldier and small unit leader are crucial to winning our nation's wars and Fort Benning's Dismounted Battlespace Battle Lab is key to the Army's future and will continue to play a vital role in the Army's Transformation, Abrams said.

Working with other TRADOC battle labs will integrate battle functions and enhance the Objective Force's Land Warrior System, he said.

"The Benning battle lab is going to work harder than they've probably ever worked before," Abrams said. "They're going to have to work across the DTLOMS (doctrine, training, leader development, organizations materiel and soldiers) to ensure infantry capabilities get blended into a system of systems architecture.

"Battle labs are going to be rechartered so that we start building this cadre of subject matter experts who understand system of systems development in branch capabilities and how those capabilities have got to be present across the tactical and strategic levels of war to support the warfighting commander in chief."

Senator visits post

Max Cleland speaks at luncheon

Spc. Douglas DeMaio
Bayonet staff

Fort Benning celebrated Law Day with a luncheon Monday at the Fort Benning Officers' Club.

Among those in attendance were U.S. Sen. Max Cleland, D-Ga., and Columbus Mayor Bobby G. Peters.

The purpose of Law Day is to reflect on the role and rule of law in the United States and celebrate personal freedoms.

"The ceremony draws attention to the importance of law in a civil society," said Ron Mulling, a lawyer and member of the Columbus Bar Association. "The lawyers I know try to do the right thing."

In Columbus, the bar association emphasizes their Pro Bono Project, geared toward volunteering legal services for community members.

"Lawyers donate their time to those who have disputes," said Capt. Josh Shuey, Office of the Staff Judge Advocate. "Columbus fosters the spirt of giving and expects lawyers to donate their time."

Though attorneys tend to get a bad rap, it's only the few celebrated cases that make lawyers look bad, Shuey said.

"Lawyers do a lot for people," he said, especially sustaining the laws and the system established.

When people blame lawyers for raising criminal activity by freeing criminals, they are under cutting the law, Cleland said.

"People vilify lawyers rather than chant them," Cleland said.

The government and the system are in place to hold people accountable, the senator said. Each generation must recommit to justice. The system is vulnerable and may not be perfect. But Law Day will guide the system to achieve its goal to provide equal justice under the law.

AER exceeds goal

Benning contributes more than $180,000 to campaign

Pfc. Brian Trapp
Bayonet staff

The post AER campaign ended April 19. The campaign surpassed the goal of $170,000 producing $180,658, as of press time, and residual donations are still coming into the AER office.

Army Emergency Relief is a private nonprofit organization incorporated in 1942. AER's mission is to provide emergency financial assistance to soldiers.

"We're grateful we were able to achieve and exceed the goal, said Al Deane, installation AER officer. "It started out slow, and then it began to pick up after the fourth week."

During 2001, the AER office assisted 978 clients — family members, retirees and active duty soldiers — with $848,846.73 in grants, loans and scholarships.

The money that the Fort Benning area contributes is funneled into a central bank, consolidated, and made available worldwide.

The AER office asked the major subordinate commands and the directorates to assist them during the campaign.

"It's very important to go to all the soldiers and explain how it helps support fellow soldiers," said Command Sgt. Maj. Joe L. Bradley, 29th Infantry Regiment command sergeant major. "We gave 100 percent of the soldiers the opportunity to contribute to AER, and I think we did very well."

The contributions will also go towards the Maj. Gen. James Ursano program, providing scholarships to children of active duty or retired soldiers. Each organization or directorate that donated will receive a certificate of appreciation for their contributions.

For more information about AER, call 545-2536 or 545-7517.

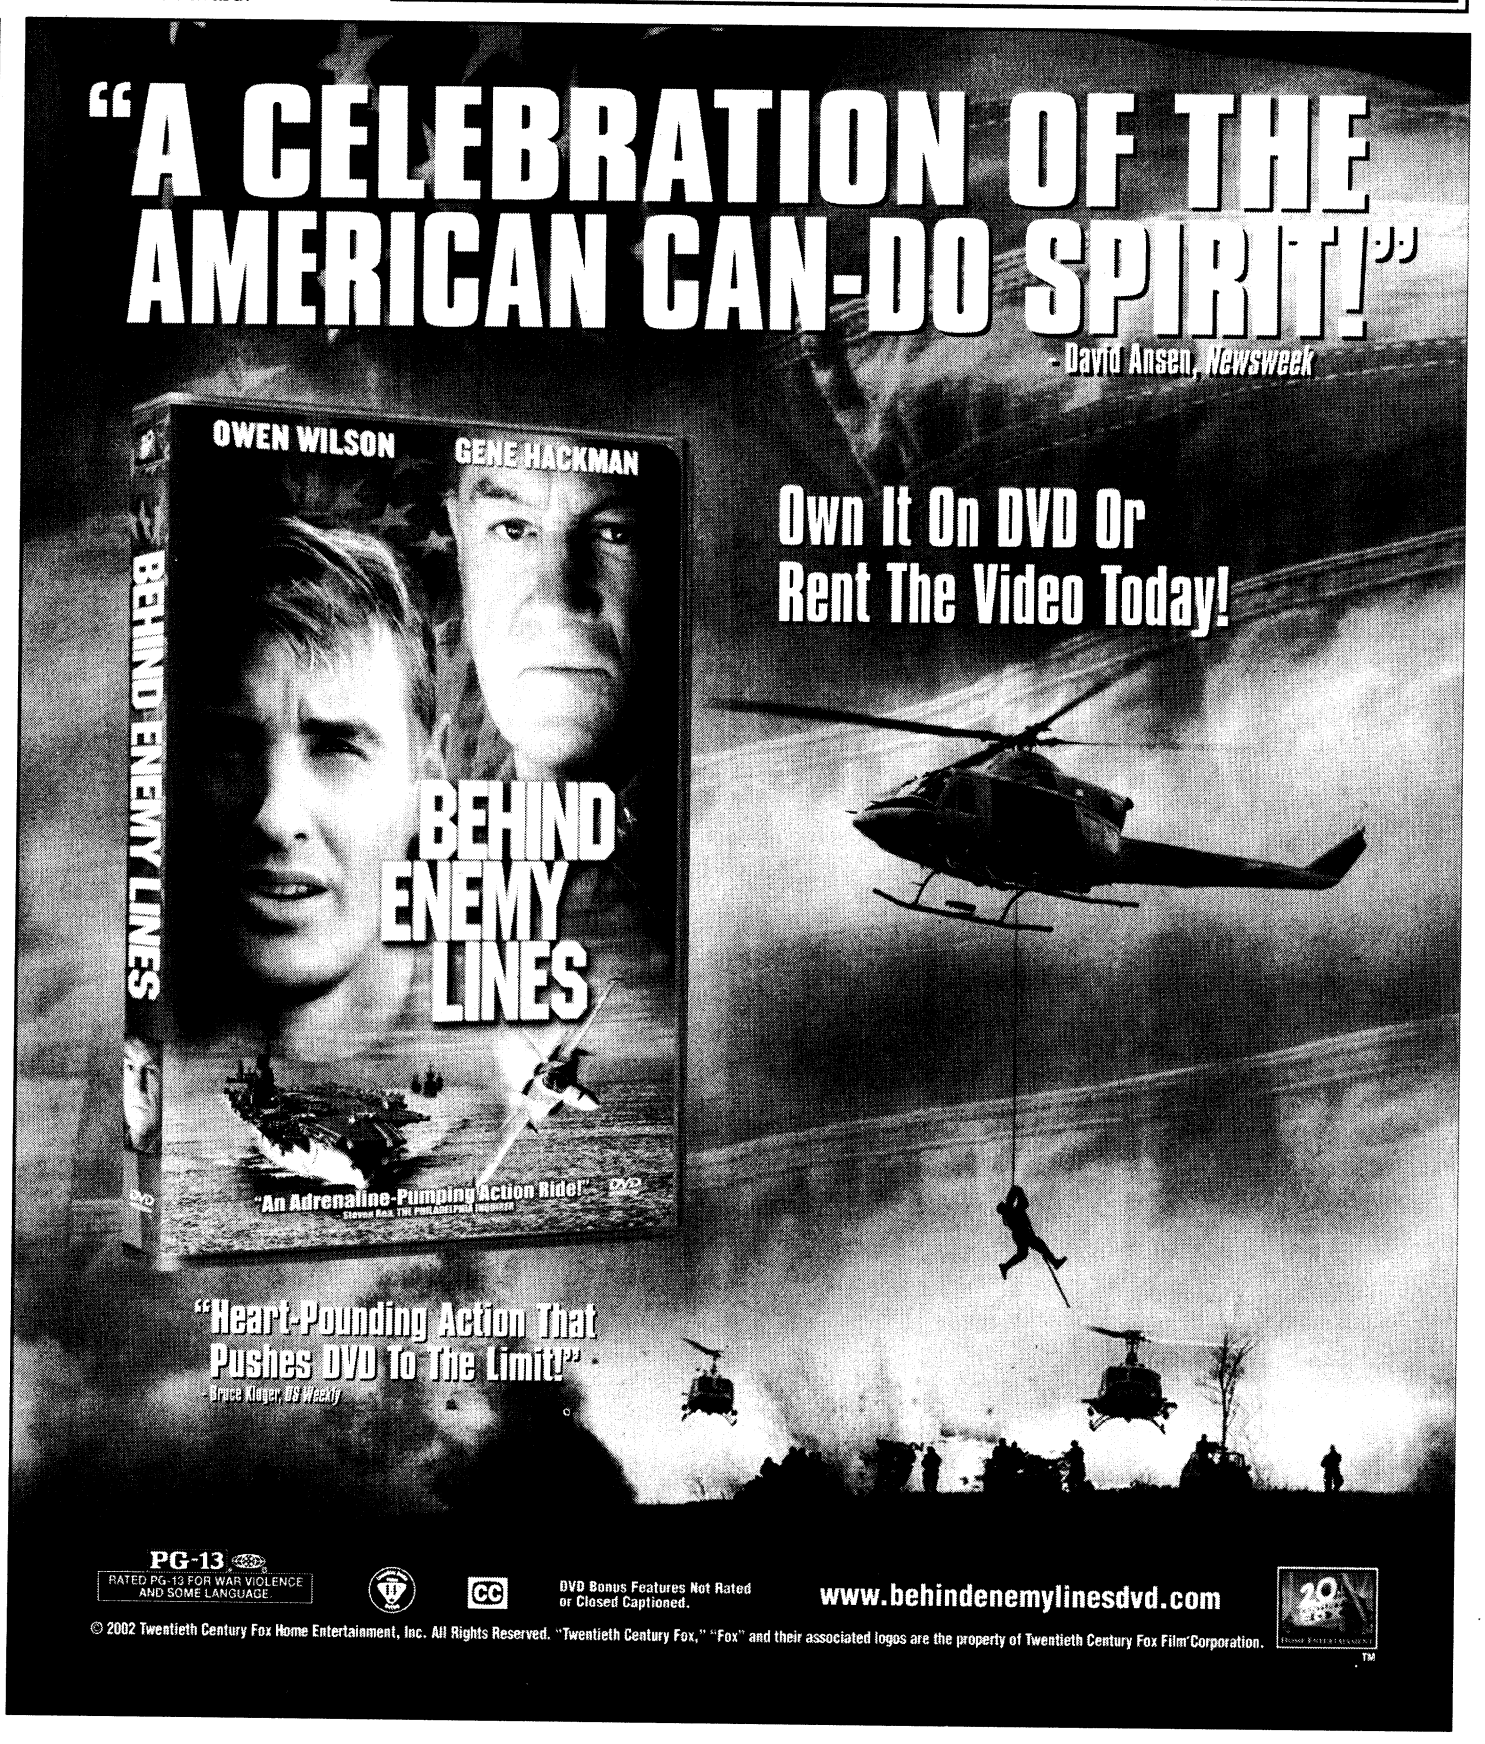
PUBLIC NOTIFICATION MONITORING/REPORTING REQUIREMENTS NOT MET

Water System Name:USA-Fort Benning Water System
County: Muscogee Date of Release: January 1, 2002 to February 26, 2002
Contact Person: Joseph Wilkins
Phone: (706)545-2400
Mailing Address: US Army Infantry Center, DFEL-Environmental Management Division, Building 6 (Meloy Hall)
City: Fort Benning State: Georgia Zip: 31905
Violation: The USA-Fort Benning Water System failed to complete the monitoring and reporting requirements for chlorite (a disinfection byproduct) for compliance period 1/1/02 to 2/28/02

Fort Benning's drinking water is produced totally from water treated from the Upatoi Creek. As you can imagine, there are numerous quality checks that we run through before we release the water into the distribution system so as to insure that all of our users are provided with safe drinking water. At the beginning of this year, a brand new requirement was levied to test for chlorite, a by-product of the purification process. It took us a period of time to get ramped up to accomplish this test and find suitable laboratories to conduct the off-site test. Unfortunately, this process took longer than we anticipated.



We are therefore required to advise you of this lack of testing. This is the notice we are required by the State to publish:

We are required to monitor your drinking water for specific contaminants on a regular basis. Results of regular monitoring are an indicator of whether or not our drinking water meets health standards. During compliance period 1/1/02 to 1/31/02 and 2/1/02 to 2/28/02, we did not complete all monitoring or testing for chlorite and therefore cannot be sure of the quality of our drinking water during that time.

What does this mean? In February and March, when the proper tests were completed, our results averaged only trace elements of chlorite in the amount of 0.421 parts per million. These are well below the tolerances for safe drinking water. The absence of the test poses no threat to the quality of the water supplied. Fort Benning's users should not be alarmed nor do they need to seek alternate water sources. As of 27 February 2002, Fort Benning has assembled the proper equipment and began the daily checking of the water for chlorite in accordance with newly established testing protocols.

For more information, please contact the Fort Benning Water system manager, Mr. Don Parsons at 545-2916 or Mr. Joseph Wilkins, at the DFEL Environmental Management Division, 545-2400.

Please share this information with all the other people who drink this water, especially those who may not have received this notice directly (for example, people in apartments, nursing homes, schools, and businesses). You can do this by posting this notice in a public place or distributing copies by hand or mail.

Army to boot out microfiche

Soldiers will access official military files online by June 1

Kevin Larson
Army News Service

WASHINGTON — The Army is saying good-bye to an old mainstay.

After years of service, the microfiche system used by personnel units and soldiers to keep tabs on their careers is going the way of the dinosaur and dodo bird.

The online Official Military Personnel File will completely replace the old microfiche system by next year.

Over the coming months, the Total Army Personnel Command plans on pulling microfiche in phases, said Theresa McGuire, branch chief of Officers' Records.

The first phase will be to stop sending microfiche to soldiers in the field, McGuire said, followed by eliminating the readers and associated accessories from PERSCOM.

Phase one should be completed by this summer, McGuire said. She said the personnel system should be completely electronic by next year.

The OMPF for every soldier is currently online on a test-run basis.

By June 1, those records will be available to access, said McGuire.

Previously, only majors, captains, sergeants first class and staff sergeants being considered for promotion had access to their online files.

Currently, the OMPFs for soldiers eligible for promotion to lieutenant colonel or master sergeant are available online.

The old microfiche readers will become turn-in equipment, McGuire said.

"What we're trading-in is a horse-and-buggy and we're not getting a Model A, we're getting a brand new Chevy," said Col. Howard Olsen, the Enlisted Records and Evaluation Center commander.

Replacing the old microfiche system with an online system is "monumental," Olsen said.

"We're empowering the soldier to have greater participation in career management," he said.

Under the old system, soldiers had to write letters requesting a microfiche copy of their records, said McGuire. Soldiers then had to wait four to six weeks for the microfiche to come in the mail.

"Then you had to find a microfiche reader, and those are hard to find," McGuire said.

With the online system, soldiers will be able to log onto their Army Knowledge Online account and view their records to make sure everything is correct and complete.

If a document is missing, all the soldier needs to do is take a copy of the document to one of 30 digital centers and have the document verified and scanned in for addition to the record, Olsen said.

"It's going to allow people to update records in a day or two," McGuire said.

Promotion boards will also access soldiers' files via the online system.

When soldiers pull up their records, they're only looking at a mirror image of the actual files, Olsen said. The actual file is tucked away safely behind several computer firewalls in a database.

Off-site backups of the files are kept, too, Olsen said.

By putting personnel files on the Web, the Army will not only make updating and viewing personnel files easier, it will also save money, Olsen said.

Every six months McGuire's branch spends $50,000 on film and developing materials, mailing costs and other microfiche-related expenses, she said. It also takes a four-person staff to mail the "fiches."

The price tag for providing microfiche records to enlisted soldiers was about $350,000 a year, Olsen said.

Former black hat pins on son's wings

Son follows father's footsteps to airborne school

Pfc. Brian Trapp
Bayonet staff

Trying to parallel what Dad does is no easy task, but one man is following in his father's footsteps while still taking his own path.

Marine Sgt. Duke Duplessis, 2nd Recon Battalion, Camp Lejeune, N.C., graduated Airborne school April 19 with C Company, Class 21-02. His father, a former pathfinder instructor and retired airborne black hat, pinned on Duke's wings at the ceremony.

"I'm proud of him just like any dad would be, pinning the wings on his son," said retired Sgt. 1st Class Aaron Duplessis.

While his father was stationed here, Duke spent most of his childhood years growing up in the Fort Benning and Columbus area.

"When I was little I watched all of the training from Faith (Middle School), but I never expected that one day I would end up graduating the course," Duke said. "Now kids watching me train may eventually end up here too."

But having a father who is a retired black hat does lead to a little teasing.

"I told Duke if I was his black hat, he would do a lot of push-ups, but it's all just for fun," Aaron said.

After Duke made his first jump he called home. His father still called him a "nasty, dirty leg,"

"All the teasing is just in good fun," Aaron said. "I'm very proud of him."

Airborne school was Duke's first experience training with the Army.

"It was enjoyable, the instructors were professional," Duke said. "I wish I would have gone through A Company, because that's where my father was the instructor."

Aaron sent his son off to jump school with a bit of helpful advice.

"I told him think positive and keep his head up because they don't just give the wings away," Aaron said.

Military wife shares Citadel memories

First female grad teaches on post

Bridgett Siter
Special to the Bayonet©

Three years after becoming The Citadel's first female graduate, Nancy Mace still believes the most important lessons she learned were not academic.

"In the long run, adversity doesn't have to have a negative impact on your life. It can make you stronger," said Mace, who lives on Fort Benning with her husband, 1st Lt. Chris Niemiec.

Mace said the challenges she faced when she bucked The Citadel's 160-year-old "male only" policy made her a stronger person. She recounted the public criticism and the pressures she endured during her first year as a cadet at the South Carolina military academy in her book In the Company of Men, published by Simon & Schuster in November.

The book is based on journals she kept during her three years at the institute, beginning in 1996.

"Journaling was an outlet for me, a way to let out both the angst and the happiness. The Citadel is a place you love one minute, hate the next. Journaling helped me get it off my chest," she said.

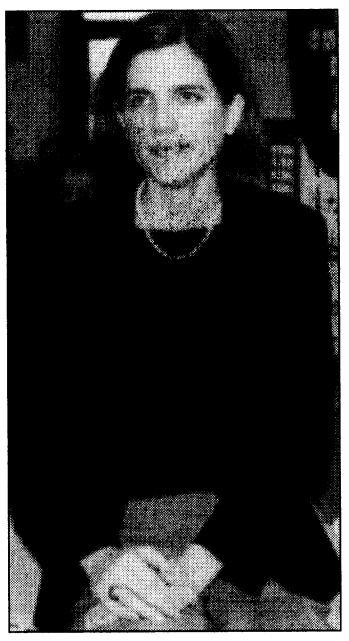
Indeed, the book reads much like a teen-ager's diary, focusing on incidents and anecdotes rather than the politics of assimilation. Mace said she wrote it for a young audience, but believes the book reaches across generation and gender lines.

"It's a great book, a short read. You can read it from cover to cover in just a few hours," she said. "But I believe it will appeal to anyone and everyone, whether they agree with allowing women there or not."

The book describes the college's practice of hazing and the freshmens' induction into the school's notorious Fourth Class System, something all cadets endure. But it also recounts the many times Mace was singled out, ostracized or abused.

She recalls one Citadel alumnus who repeatedly taunted her at football games. Reeking of alcohol, he wiped his muddy soles on her spit-shined shoes and whispered obscenities in her ear.

"I would sit at attention while he whispered, my cheeks burning, my eyes smarting with tears, as nausea rose and nearly overpowered me," she wrote.



But the uproar she and three female classmates caused when they enrolled in The Citadel has "died down to some extent," Mace said, and she rarely encounters that kind of vicious animosity anymore, though she occasionally meets disgruntled alumni at book-signings.

"I've learned to ignore it. I can't carry around that kind of negative baggage," she said. "Anybody who wants to waste their time talking about me must live a very boring life."

Mace entered The Citadel with several college credits under her belt, enabling her to graduate a year ahead of her classmates. She opted to pursue a career with a management consulting firm instead of the military.

But the long hours and constant travel kept her away from her husband, so Mace switched gears last fall, accepting a position as substitute teacher at a Fort Benning elementary school.

"I was a military brat, then I went to a military college and now I'm a military spouse. This is a new hat for me, one I've not had much time to enjoy because

Bridgett Siter

Nancy Mace works at Dexter Elementary School.

I've been on the road so much," said Mace, the daughter of retired Brig. Gen. James Mace, who served as The Citadel's commandant of cadets when Mace was a cadet.

A self-described workaholic, Mace will continue to travel when she's not teaching. She tours the Southeast promoting her book and acting as a consultant for the upcoming TV movie by the same name, which is due to air sometime this fall.

She plans to return to school next year to pursue a master's degree in journalism or mass communications.

"There are so many things in my life right now ... being an author at such a young age. And now the movie. I try to be humble," Mace said. "But I wouldn't be here at all if it wasn't for The Citadel. My life is so full, so rich because of my experience there.

"I want to give something back because I've been given so much. If it helps recruit for the school, or inspires another young lady, so much the better," she said.

Hospital conducts casualty exercise

Hospital trains to experience real situation

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet Staff

Scrubbing is essential to decontaminating.

In any type of hostile situation, there is the likelihood of injuries.

When there are injured soldiers, there needs to be a hospital.

The 14th Field Hospital is there to take in the injured and provide the soldiers the proper medical treatment.

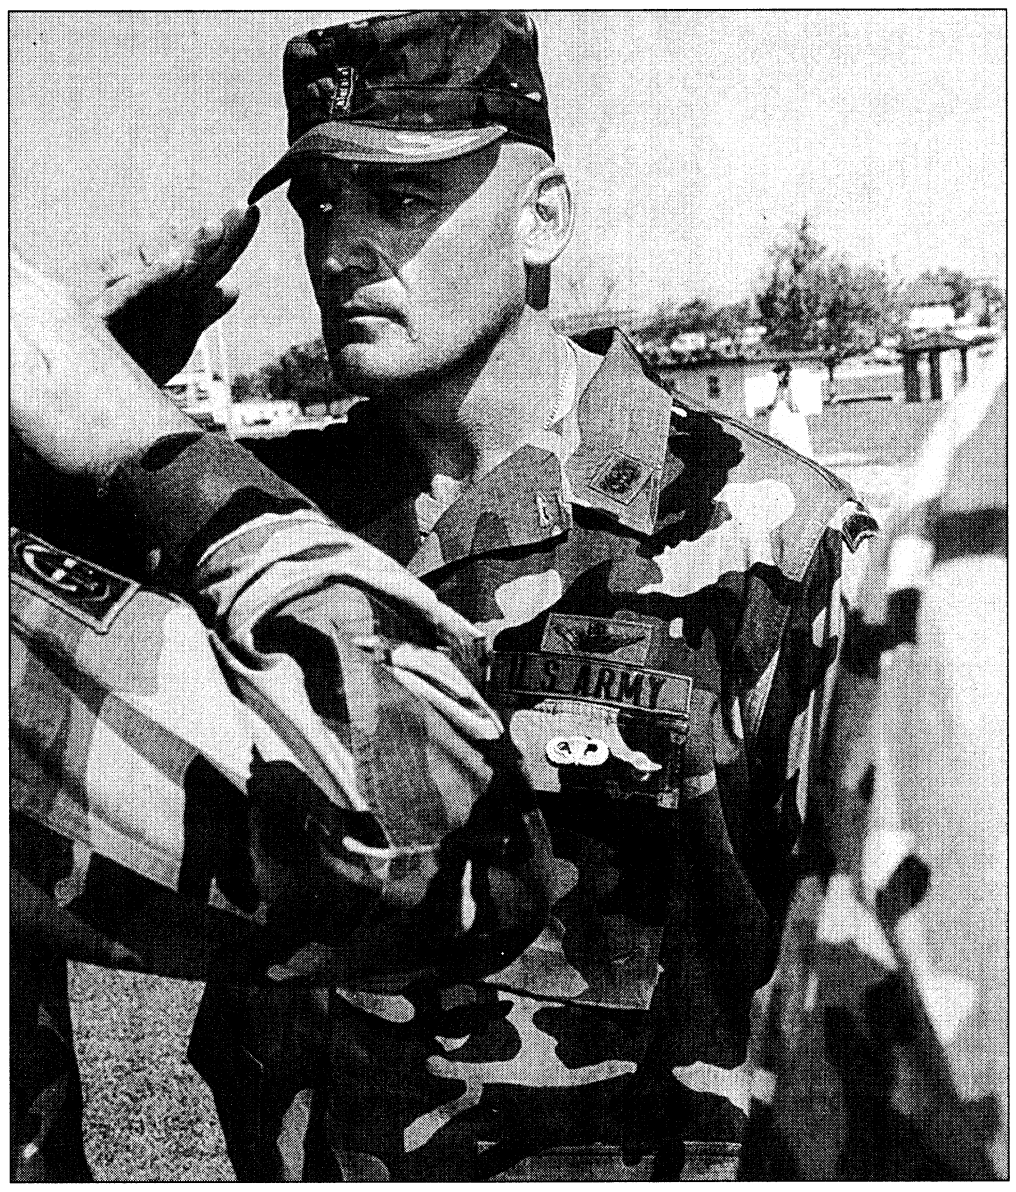
So, how does the hospital get ready for a wartime situation? By conducting a two-week mass-casualty exercise in the field.

"The purpose of the exercise is to test the soldiers to see if they can react in the way needed to in a hostile situation," said Lt. Col. Judith Lee, hospital battalion commander. "We also wanted the soldiers to get familiar with the equipment they would be using out in the field."

There are many types of equipment used in the field hospital, because there are many different jobs, including nutritionists, dieticians, dental services, X-ray, lab, operating room, emergency medical technicians, intensive care units, physical therapy and intermediate care units.

"All units are important to the completion of the field hospital," said Sgt. 1st. Class Yvonne Hicks, chief wardmaster. "Without each of these units, the hospital would not be successful."

The hospital spent two weeks out in the field mocking a wartime situation. The operation depicted situations where many casualties were being brought to the hospital by ground and air, and each casualty had to be placed in the correct area and treated properly.



As the exercise was going on, there were supervisors there making sure they were doing the right thing.

"For the 413 soldiers assigned to the field hospital, they have to get used to working with soldiers they're not used to working with," Lee said. "We have soldiers here from Fort Gordon, Ga., Fort Stewart, Ga., Fort Jackson, S.C., and Fort Huachua, Ariz."

The soldiers used the two weeks to learn how to work together as a team.

"The requirements of this training mission were brought about due to 9-11," Lee said. "We realized how unprepared we were and now we are fixing the situation and preparing ourselves for whatever may be thrown at us in the future."

Soldiers develop teamwork skills on course

Squads tackle obstacles for training

Pfc. Brian Trapp
Bayonet staff

The only one-station unit training infantry cycle in the Basic Combat Training Brigade navigated the team development course April 15.

There were few changes for A Company, 2nd Battalion, 47th Infantry Regiment, to make. The adjustment to train infantry soldiers were the addition of two drill sergeants from the Infantry Training Brigade and training the company's drill sergeants to teach the infantry classes, before they picked up their cycle April 12.

"It doesn't matter the MOS you're training, you want to produce a strong, disciplined soldier," said Capt. John McLaughlin, A Company commander. "The training has to be as good as it can be, you owe that to the soldiers."

Fort Benning has to train more infantrymen, said Lt. Col. Chip Lewis, 2nd Bn., 47 Inf. Regt., commander. To be able to do that there is a need for more cycles. "But, we have reorganized and adapted ourselves, and we will execute the mission we are assigned and do it to standard."

The soldiers ran the course during their fourth day of training enhancing their leadership and teamwork skills while having to problem solve their way through the obstacles.

"The soldiers don't know each other very well yet, so this training will build bonds for success," said Staff. Sgt. Jermal Dubose, drill sergeant. "Doing this now helps to enhance and sharpen a soldier's skills so they work better in more critical times."

For the "broken bridge" obstacle, the soldiers had to move the squad and a barrel across a gap using three boards and stumps in the ground to navigate across.

"I love doing stuff like that, it helps me build leadership skills," said Pvt. Chase Whitham.

Teaching both basic training and infantry training adds a lot of variety to the drill sergeants' tour, Lewis said. It will also help them maintain proficiency on infantry skills.

"Being infantry myself, I might be in the same unit with these guys somewhere down the line," Dubose said.

Foreign officers train on Benning

Three German officers are spending three weeks at Fort Benning for training in U.S. Army weapons and tactics.

German 2nd Lts. Ralph Schwarzfischer, Michael Hadicke and Johannes Schweizer, will be firing weapons like the M-16 A2 rifle and the M-24 sniper rifle, and will also go through portions of airborne training and ranger training to include swamp training.

The officers are here because they were the best in their class at German officer school, and were selected to go through foreign training, said Capt Mark Trott, commander of C Company 1st Battalion 29th Infantry Regiment.

"The choice was obvious when we found out we would do foreign training," Schwarzfischer said. "We wanted to see how the Americans train and go through some of the things they do. "We've always been interested in the training, and now we are getting to experience it firsthand."

The officers fired two types of weapons April 19. They fired the M-82 A1 rifle, which uses .50 caliber rounds, and the M-24 sniper rifle.

"The object of the exercise is to allow the soldiers to familiarize themselves with the types of weapons we use," Trott said. "It also allowed them to have some fun."

The German officers will be here through the first week in May.

Two of the officers will be going through parts of Ranger school, while the other officer will be going through Airborne school.

After airborne training and the mountain phase of ranger training, the officers will finish up with one week of the swamp phase of ranger training with the Ranger Training Brigade at Eglin Air Force Base in Florida.

"I'm looking forward to it," Schwarzfinger said. "It will broaden my horizon and give me the chance to do something I've never done before."

Field Artillery arrives at Camp Doha

1-10th FA joins Operation Desert spring

1st Lt. Christopher D. Pike
1st Battalion, 10th Field Artillery

RSOI. Another acronym in the Army's endless effort to shorten communication. For the soldiers of 1st Battalion 10th Field Artillery Regiment deploying to Kuwait for Operation Desert Spring, it's a fast paced drill of moving parts pushing soldiers to perform at their best.

RSOI is an acronym for reception, staging, onward movement, integration.

After 24 hours of travel, arriving in Kuwait was a welcome opportunity for the soldiers to stretch their legs and begin the first step of the RSOI process, reception.

The seriousness of the deployment is evident when an armed military police escort meets them with weapons drawn. Any doubts in a soldier's mind of the importance of this deployment fades fast.

Soldiers file onto buses for transport to Camp Doha, a military compound on the edge of Kuwait City that houses all of the U.S. soldiers and equipment in country.

An hour later, the soldiers arrive at the camp and move onto the core of the RSOI process, staging.

Here, a complete battery will be drawn, inventoried, loaded and signed for in less than six hours.

This process is eased with the help of the Army Central Command personnel who keep the equipment in top-notch condition; lay everything out for the soldiers, and have individuals standing by to assist in anyway possible.

This event is run by the unit's NCOs and managed under the supervision of the battalion Command Sgt. Maj. James Mclaurin.

Once the vehicles are ready to move out, all the tracked vehicles are loaded onto heavy equipment transports.

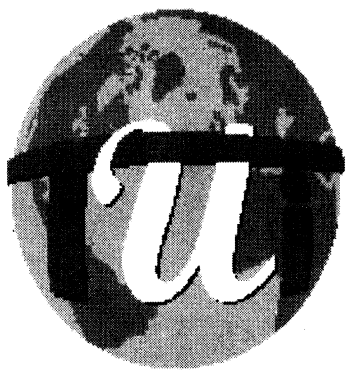
The wheeled vehicles are lined up for the convoy and the start of onward movement.

The units make their way to a release point where tracked vehicles download and combine with the units wheeled vehicles into new convoys under the watchful eye of ARCENT safety personnel and an armed MP escort. When the vehicles are ready, the convoys depart for their respective Kabals.

For most of 1st Bn., 10th Field Artillery Regt. soldiers, Virginia Kabal is their final stop.

An hour later, the guard towers and berms of Virginia Kabal come into view, and for the soldiers, the last step, integration.

An abandoned camp, the tents are empty, and soldiers go to work to turn into the Force Field Artillery Headquarters in Kuwait under the command of the 1st Bn., 10th FA Regt. commander Lt. Col. John D. Harding, Jr.



"The tents being emplaced prior to arriving helped speed the process and keep them from worrying about sleeping arrangements," said Staff Sgt. Eugene Broadus, a Charlie Battery gun chief.

Soldiers built structures, put up more tents, set up command and control systems, and pushed to get operation orders in place. To an outsider, it would look like organized mass confusion.

Regardless of rank or position, it is truly a team effort.

Animal killer on loose

Highly contagious parvo claims unprotected pets

Laura Martinson
Special to the Bayonet©

Three dogs are dead on a single street in Upatoi Terrace, and neighbors say the killer could have been stopped.

"I just don't want to see any more dogs die the horrible death mine did," said Sharon Cusson, whose 2-year-old, 7-pound dog, Belle, died last week from a confirmed case of parvovirus.

Canine parvovirus disrupts the gastrointestinal tract of dogs, causing the lining of the small intestine to slough off. The lining serves as a barrier between bacteria, so when it's lost, the bacteria moves to other parts of the body. The secondary effects, bloody diarrhea, vomiting and septic shock, are most often the causes of death, said Capt. Louis Huzella, post veterinarian.

"The dog can either survive it, based upon its resistance, or succumb to it," Huzella said. "Dogs that get so sick they die are the ones not vaccinated against the virus. Parvo is very preventable with timely and complete vaccinations."

"I should have had her shots up to date. Maybe she'd still be with us today," said Cusson, who now believes it's her responsibility to increase awareness.

Although the three cases were not seen at the post vet clinic, the clinic has averaged about four cases per week for the past two months. Getting timely care for a sick dog is equally important in preventing a worse fate.

"Are all cases of diarrhea parvo? Probably not, but it's very important for pet owners to take care of animals who are sick," Huzella said. "It's out there, in the environment, and highly contagious. Owners should take great care to prevent it, including keeping pets away from animals of unknown health status."

Transmission of the virus is limited to fecal-oral contact. It is specific to dogs, which can get it from sniffing or licking the ground, or stepping in feces of an infected animal and then licking its paws. What makes it even more difficult to control is that the virus can live a full season in a yard, and often makes a resurgence in spring because the weather is more conducive to the virus' growth.

Once a yard or other area is infected, all feces should be removed and the area disinfected using a solution of one cup of bleach per gallon of water. Never put bleach on your dog.

The most common misconception about parvo is that it's not treatable, Huzella said.

"That's just not true. Most will survive the virus," Huzella said, "but owners should be knowledgeable of the vaccination status of their pets."

A puppy can get its first vaccination as early as 6-weeks-old, and boostered every three weeks until they're four months old. Treatment of parvo can be expensive, costing from $200 to $400, and that could be supportive care alone, Huzella said, which does not ensure that the dog will live.

The vet clinic is in the process of hiring additional staff and expanding office hours to meet the vaccination needs of a growing animal population. The parvo vaccine costs $6.50, so call the vet clinic at 545-4444.

look CLOSER look look look look look

What to look for

The American Veterinary Medical Association suggests you consult your vet if your pet shows any of the following signs:

- Abnormal discharges from the nose, eyes or other body openings.
- Loss of appetite, marked weight losses or gains or excessive water consumption.
- Difficult, abnormal or uncontrolled waste elimination.
- Abnormal behavior, sudden viciousness or lethargy.
- The first signs of canine parvovirus are often depression, loss of appetite, vomiting and severe diarrhea.
- Initial signs often appear five to seven days after the dog is exposed to the virus.
- Most deaths occur within 48-72 hours of the onset of symptoms, so the sooner the animal is seen by a vet, the better its chances.

What to do

- Owners should not allow a dog to come in contact with fecal waste of other dogs at parks, playgrounds or along streets, especially before the dog is 6-months-old.
- Dispose of waste promptly and properly.
- Check lawns, sidewalks and street gutters for fecal waste from neighborhood dogs, and urge neighbors to do the same.

A little girl with a big heart received a very special gift from Lions Club International.

Tara Thomas, a 10-year-old Fort Benning resident, is used to sharing with others. Twice she's donated nearly a foot of her lush red hair to Locks Of Love, an organization that collects hair to create wigs for cancer victims. And she's making plans to one day open an animal shelter for abused and abandoned pets.

So when members of the local chapter of the Lions Club learned that Tara needed a braille writing machine, they anted up the money to surprise her.

Diagnosed with coloboma of the retina when she was 2 months old, Tara is functionally blind.

The fourth-grader, who attends Edgewood Elementary School in Columbus because Fort Benning doesn't have a sight teacher on staff, used a powerful magnifying lens and large print until the beginning of the school year, when she was introduced to a braillewriter.

The machine, which looks like a typewriter with six keys, opened new doors for Tara, her mother said.

"It made her so much more confident," said Tina Raby. "With the large print, she could never keep up with her classmates. It inhibited her schoolwork, slowed her down a lot. Some of the kids even teased her.

"With the machine, she can be more involved in classroom activities, and she's no longer treated differently. The other kids even want to see it and find out how it works. The biggest thing it's done for her is give her back her confidence," Raby said.

Church honors public safety workers

MPs, veterans among those recognized

"Oh beautiful for heroes proved in liberating strife. Who more than self their country loved and mercy more than life."

— Third verse of America the Beautiful.

"We've always known what our servicemen do for us, but Sept. 11 was a somber reminder of the price they pay to serve," said Dr. Hal Brady to the congregation of St. Luke United Methodist Church. The church held a breakfast and special service Sunday at the Columbus Iron Works to "honor those who serve."

Law enforcement officials and firefighters from Columbus, Phenix City and Fort Benning were the guests of honor, and were thankful for the notice.

"It's nice the community is doing this for us, especially since September," said Spc. Brandon Visner, 988th Military Police Company. "Since then, we've all been working hard, especially the MPs."

"It's a small token of appreciation, really," said Paul Kirkpatrick, St. Luke member and Army veteran. "It all splinters from Sept. 11. We always knew it, but I think we're all more cognizant of the importance of law enforcement and the military."

Mayor Bobby Peters said area police officers and firefighters have responded to hundreds more calls than normal since the terrorist attacks.

"They doze but they never close," Peters said. "They never know if they'll be home tonight, so you'll never know how much this means to them."

"You can tell we're all working toward one goal," said Col. GT Meyers, Fort Benning provost marshal. "It's events like this that make people want to serve.

The message, "Claim your mountain," reminded guests that nothing, including freedom, comes without hard work and sacrifice.

"Dreams should be great enough to include God, and long enough to include eternity," Brady said. "If the dream is big enough, the facts don't make a difference. So keep dreaming."

Fort Benning after school group on mission to clean up play areas

Angela Sachitano
Bayonet correspondent

If you're a parent, chances are you've been to one of the many playgrounds on Fort Benning. After all, what better chance is there to let the kids work off some energy while you take a rest?

"The children are cooped up inside of a classroom all day," said Diana Austin, a home child care worker on Fort Benning. "Playground time is a valuable part of my kids' day."

For some time now, Austin said, the playgrounds on Fort Benning have been cluttered with trash.

"The kids are in danger with all that trash around. Last week, we found a lighter and a knife near the swing set at one playground. I'm fed up with it," Austin said.

Instead of just complaining, Austin has decided to do something about the littered play areas.

"I told the children that if they want to play outside they have to pick up the trash first," Austin said. "At first they complained because they were afraid they wouldn't have enough play time. But I bought some trash bags and we made a pact to clean for 20 minutes. The rest of the hour could be their free time."

"I don't want to play on a trashy playground," 5-year-old Chase Guill said. "I pick up all the stinky stuff."

"We found pizza boxes, broken glass, cigarettes, matches and even a mattress," said 5-year-old Ja'Male Morrow.

Austin and the children she watches after school started cleaning the playgrounds last month. They've already cleaned dozens of playgrounds on Fort Benning, and they don't intend to stop.

"Tuesday is our clean up day," said Austin. "We try to target a different playground every week. The kids are really learning the importance of keeping their neighborhood clean."

Evelyn Livermore, the mayor of the Bouton Heights Housing Area, is also working on a plan to straighten up the playgrounds.

"The trash issue has plagued our kid's play areas for too long," said Livermore. "It's all of our responsibility to keep these areas clean."

Cleaner playgrounds have been a topic of concern at the monthly garrison meeting for some time now, Livermore said.

Livermore has begun knocking on the doors of residents in her area to ask for their support in cleaning the playgrounds.

"If we can get the community's support, it's a start," Livermore said.

In the meantime, Diana Austin's crew of kindergarten and first-graders will be spending Tuesday afternoons with trash bags in their tiny hands.

"I tell my friends at school what we are doing," said 5-year-old Chase Guill. " I tell them not to be dirty because the playgrounds are for fun."

"It's heartwarming to see these kids out there, " said Austin. " They have a sense of accomplishment when they're done cleaning the playground. I wish more parents would get their kids out there to help out. They'd be surprised what a difference it would make."

loan from the school, would have to be returned at the end of the school year, and Tara dreaded the prospect of spending the summer without a writer.

The machines are hard to find and expensive, beyond the family's budget, Tina said. So she mentioned their plight to Tara's teacher, Marlene Culpepper, who is a member of the Lions Club of Columbus, an international nonprofit organization with more than 44,800 clubs worldwide, recognized for their service to the blind and visually impaired.

Within weeks Tara received her embosser. Now the A-B student is "doing excellent, reading better and writing well," her mother said.

"I like school. My favorite is social studies, but I'm real good at fractions," said Tara, who hopes to one day teach Braille to other children.

In the meantime, she's looking forward to attending a summer camp for the visually impaired in Forsyth, Ga., courtesy of her friends at the Lions Club.

Since 1917, Lions Club International has been raising funds to help the world's poor and needy, with a definitive focus on serving the blind and visually impaired.

Now, with more than 1.4 million members in 188 countries, Lions Club is the largest service club organization in the world.

The World Health Organization estimates one-fourth of the world's population needs some type of corrective eyewear. Unfortunately, for many people in underdeveloped countries, the cost of corrective lenses is exorbitant. In some places, an eye exam costs as much as a month's wages.

For 70 years, the Lions Club has collected unwanted eyeglasses for redistribution to the needy all over the world, including the U.S. In 1996, they launched a sight recycling program and designated each May "Recycle for Sight Month."

The public is encouraged to donate eyeglasses and sunglasses to the local chapter of the Lions Club, or they can be dropped off at offices of members of the American Optometric association, Goodwill Industries or LensCrafters stores.

McBride students get down to earth in learning lessons

Laura Martinson
Special to the Bayonet©

"Tell me and I will forget.
Show me and I may remember.
Involve me and I will learn."
—Confucius

For McBride Elementary school, hands-on involvement is a way of life, and their Woodlands ecosystem is where students go to look, touch and smell their way through the learning process.

I went to McBride Monday to cover an Earth Day presentation given by Sally Joyce at the Nature Conservancy. Joyce gave two shows to the students on conservation and ecology, which not only ties into the Earth Day celebration, but also to the outdoor curriculum the school calls "McBride Pride." Joyce does all of this, by the way, as a volunteer.

But as I was invited to go for a walk through the woodlands nature trail, I was reminded that interviews often end up being something other than the expected.

Dressed for success (in interviewing, that is!), wearing a sleeveless sweater, white capri pants, and black slip-on sandals, I was nowhere near ready to go hiking with a bunch of second-graders. No bug spray, ankles and arms exposed and nothing but a camera, pen and notepad to separate me from the elements.

Marie Hand, gifted education and enrichment teacher, handed out clipboards to the students, who were to find 26 items in the woods — one for each letter of the alphabet.

I was asked to join in the hunt, and in a matter of minutes, I was being led by the hand by my 3-foot-tall hosts with the most.

"Did you know if you count the rings on the stump, you can tell how old the tree is?"

Well, of course I knew that. But those second-graders one-upped me with a vast knowledge of the great outdoors. The frequent mini field trips to the woods behind the school gave them the edge as we trucked and trodded up hills and down again, reading some 30 labels on a variety of trees and plants, most of which, they could identify without the labels.

All was well, until that dreaded screech was heard.

"SPIDER!!!!"

Before I could utter the words, "Step on it!" I rethought my instinctive decision to smash the little critter. Mrs. Hand assured us — well, me mostly — that bugs are good. They all serve a purpose. I'm sure she would understand if I explained my overwhelming fear of the tiny creatures, that the only purpose they serve for me is a good Halloween fright. When she herself got tangled in a cobweb spun across the trail, I knew I wasn't the only one with an aversion for arachnids.

Nonetheless, we walked on, and the kids pointed out dead trees that would soon be one with the earth. We admired the majesty of the tall, tall trees, the loblolly pine, the southern red oak and the canopy they formed over the habitat. They showed me the prickly devil's walking stick and the largest poison ivy leaves I'd ever seen. Leaves of three, we left them be.

"I'm getting itchy," said one sandal-wearing student, and I empathized. There's just something about walking past a poison ivy plant that makes me want to scratch, though I'm sure you can't catch it by taking a picture of it, right?

The ecosystem, which is just a short walk from the back door of the school, is separated into several regions, including three walking (and exploring) trails, a wetland area, inhabited by beavers and their lodge, which is fully equipped with a slide for the beavers to travel back and forth from the lodge with more wood for building. The Upatoi creek runs through the habitat all the way to the Chattahoochee, changing the topography of the land with its currents. An island sits in the middle of it all, giving the beavers a good place to take a load off.

It's inhabitants include the white heron, the red-cockaded woodpecker and the white-tail deer. Contrary to what some may have been told, there are absolutely not giraffes that live in the woods eating the leaves from trees. I mean, who would believe that?

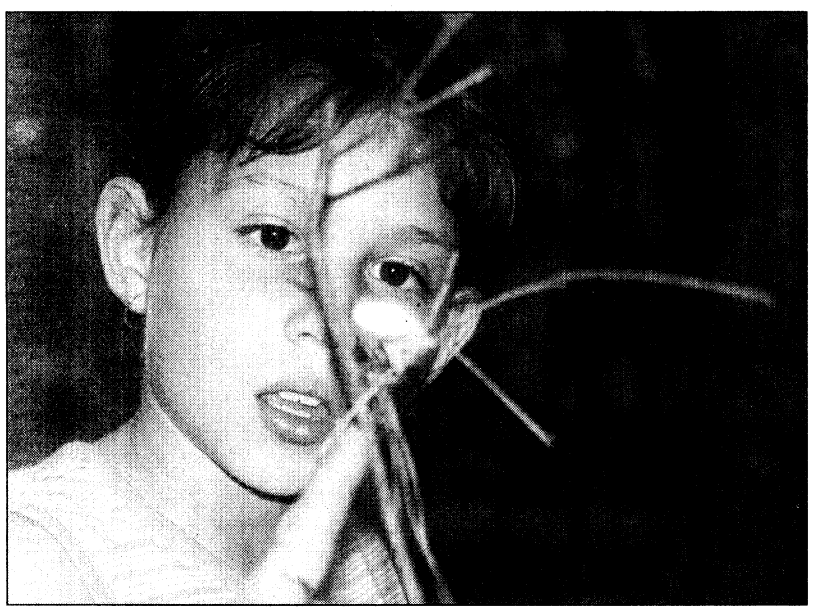
"BEAR!!!!"

I really wished they'd stop doing that.

"Mrs. Hand, I heard a bear!"

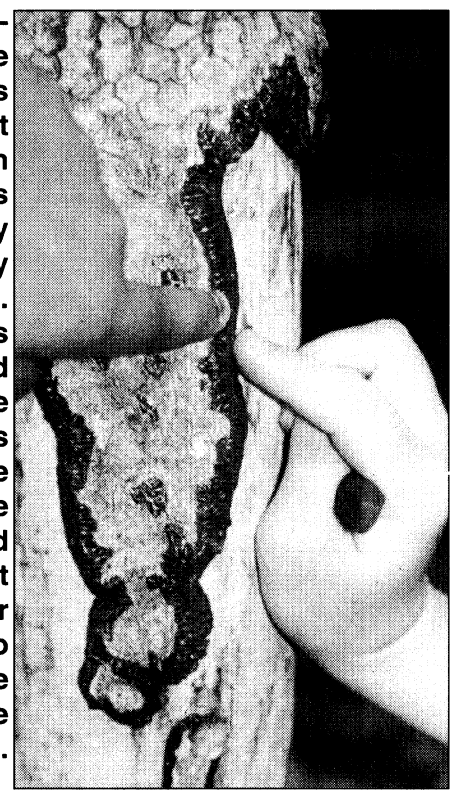
"Now, there aren't any bears out here, dear, but listen to the sounds and tell me what you hear."

Ooh, I could answer that one. Frogs croaking, birds chirping and bugs, well, creeping me out, but not one single bear was heard. Thank goodness!



When all was said and done, my young tour guides had gotten every letter except for X, and I was missing a few more than that. They were, after all, the subject matter experts, who enjoy their learning adventures so much, they often coerce their parents to join them there after school hours.

"Mrs. Hand, do you know your way back?"



I was relieved to hear that of course, she did. She gives the tour on a regular basis to her students, and they're all the wiser because of it. I was all the wiser for having gone on the trip, as biology and zoology lessons I thought were long lost suddenly came rushing back to me. I actually do remember some of the things I learned in college.

And I'm pretty sure the students lucky enough to have this real-life learning experience will remember the feel of a cocoon and the smell of the honeysuckle.

Since the woodlands are open to the general public, I think I'll go back and play the alphabet game again soon. Next time, I'll be bring my own little learner, and leave the pen and camera at home. But I'll be sure to wear some good walking shoes and pack the pest repellent. Do you think it scares bears away, too?

Ashley Frye is fascinated by a cocoon found on her tour through the woods. Among other finds were an abandoned bird's nest, translucent, bubble- like insect eggs (inhabitants unknown), and from a distance, broad-leaved poison ivy on Miracle Gro.

Second-grade fingers point out tooth marks made by nearby beavers. Students explained the beavers chew the bark off the trees and carry it down their "slide" to their lodge in the wetlands.

Students build tepee

Constructing tepee gives students math experience

White Elementary School

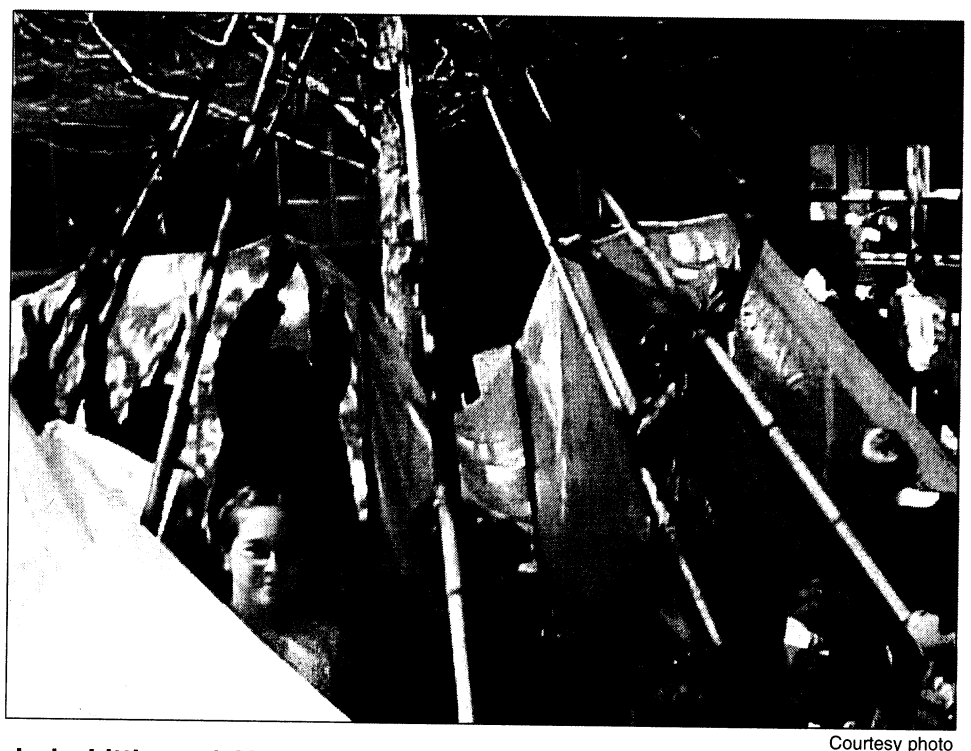
Can you imagine having all your possessions and those of your family contained within a 15-foot tepee?

This was the question posed to a group of fifth-grade students during their cross-curricular study of The Native American Cultures of The Plains.

To find out what life was like for the nomadic warriors of the Plains, the fifth-grade classes decided to construct a tepee.

The students used 15-foot bamboo poles and recycled white bed sheets rather than animal hides. The students calculated the circumference, measured for ridgepole placement and calculated the area inside the smallest traditional tepee using the formula pi times radius square.

The actual area was a surprising 176.63 square feet. The circumference, which students calculated using the formula circumference is equal to pi times diameter, yielding a total of 47.1 feet.



After setting the ridgepoles, students attached "skin" covering, and painted authentic Native American symbols along the lower third of the tepee.

The students really enjoyed getting the opportunity to construct this tepee, said Judy Little.

In addition to this on-going activity, students learned about plains area insects, and studied indigenous plants used for dyes. Each student selected an insect to draw and created a model using clay. After drying, the insects were fired in the kiln, painted, and displayed.

Students also conducted tours of the tepee that enabled other classes to benefit from their accumulated knowledge of tepee etiquette and Native American myths.

Special guests included Dr. Tommy Lee, the school's principal, Dr. Dell McMullen, superintendent of Fort Benning Schools, Richard. Skinner, assistant superintendent of Fort Benning Schools, and Dr. Elaine Hinman, DDESS Superintendent from Washington, D.C.

Kindergartners learn map skills

White Elementary School

Students in Carolyn Phillips' class think it is exciting to receive mail at school.

She asked parents to contact relatives and friends that live in various states to mail picture postcards to their child at school.

The picture postcards show the countryside or something of interest in the state. The postcards are used to compare how states are alike and different.

The children are also learning the names of the 50 states and to locate the states on a map. The class has received between 150-200 postcards and they are still coming in!

"It feels good to get a lot of postcards from different states," Hannah Watkins said. "It helps me learn the United States. I like to see how different states look."

Hannah Watkins shows her classmates the many postcards she's received from her friends and relatives.

Hannah has already received 40 postcards from 25 different states.

"One of my favorites shows the fishing boats in Massachusetts," Hannah said. "It is from my Nana. I love her."

Pray without ceasing through entire day

Prayer is vital in everyday walk with the almighty

Chaplain (Capt.) Randall E. Bowen
1st Battalion, 30th Infantry Regiment

Pray without ceasing. Many people believe prayer is to take place in a church on holy days and special occasions.

Is this the only time to pray? Some people only pray when bad or tragic events occur. I have found when people lose their jobs, when a relationship sours, or when someone dies, that is when people come to the Lord in prayer.

But is this the only time we should pray? Or is there another time when we should pray? It is my conviction that we should pray all the time. Pray during the good times as well as the bad times.

As spiritual beings, we would be much more fulfilled if we bring God into our complete lives on an everyday basis.

Before you go to work pray for the Lord to bless your day — pray without ceasing. Before you are about to take a PT test or even going to the gym — pray without ceasing.

As you are walking around in your every day activities — pray without ceasing. As you are about to talk with your boss who is difficult to work with, pray without ceasing.

When you go to the movies pray — without ceasing. Pray in all your deliberations.

Pray for everyone and see what the Lord will do. Ask God to lead you in all your life. See if the Lord won't bless you as you begin to lift up all your needs before God.

Why does God want you to pray? Our Lord is a personal God, and he wants to talk to you. If you want to continue to have a strong relationship with your wife, you talk with her.

What would happen if you just talked with her once a month? Do you think you would foster an intimate relationship with her? If you are unsure of the answer, let me tell you, you will not have a good, intimate relationship with her if you don't talk with your spouse.

The same applies in your relationship with God. The Lord desires a deep relationship with his people. So you must spend quality time in prayer with the Lord.

If you feel far from God, come back to him through prayer and friends. I have a group that gets together at least two times a week to go through the Westminster Shorter Catechism.

The purpose is to help us cultivate a deeper spiritual life. One soldier, a specialist, so desires to learn about the Lord that he frequently asks me to get together for Catechism.

A few soldiers from the Catechism group meet with me on a daily basis for fellowship and prayer.

We get together in order to facilitate a much more fervent walk with God. Of course, we frequent the cappuccino bar for a more stimulating discussion and a spirited game of Risk!

I have another friend, a captain, with whom I meet about four times a week for morning prayer. We get together to pray for family, friends and for our mission. We also read the Scriptures together.

Meeting with all these soldiers has helped keep my life fervent for the Lord, and has helped others to have a much more dynamic walk with God.

If you would like a more dynamic spiritual life, I would encourage you to find at least one person to be a prayer partner with. Get with your friend at least once a week to pray to the Lord. See what God will do when you begin to pray to him.

Watch and see how prayer helps your entire life. Pray without ceasing. Godspeed.

Drinking causes many problems

Chaplain (Maj.) Raymond Koop
Family Life Ministries Center

According to health experts, alcohol is the most widely used substance in the U.S. Approximately 14 million Americans or 7.4 percent of the population meet the diagnostic criteria for alcohol abuse or alcoholism. About half of all U.S. adults have or have had a close relative with a drinking problem.

The National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism reports that in 1998, alcohol abuse cost this country an estimated $185 billion, including health care costs, productivity losses, traffic crashes and alcohol-related crime. Unfortunately, only about one in 10 receive the help they need.

Koop

For most adults, a drink a day causes few if any problems. (One drink equals one 12-ounce bottle of beer or wine cooler, one 5-ounce glass of wine, or 1.5 ounces of 80-proof distilled spirits.) But if you have a family history of alcohol abuse, are taking certain over-the-counter drugs or prescription medications, are pregnant or trying to become pregnant or have medical conditions that can be made worse by drinking, then, even moderate alcohol use may lead to significant health problems

Alcohol problems do not discriminate. Any possible benefit of alcohol use is not a reason to start drinking. Get the facts.

"Alcohol problems do not discriminate."

Chaplain (Maj.) Raymond Koop
Family Life Ministries Center

Now is the time for all of us to reconsider our own habits, risk factors and knowledge so that we can decide where we each need to limit the amount of alcohol we drink.

Rather than judging, pointing fingers or renewing Prohibition, let's acknowledge that alcohol affects health and can cause serious difficulties. Let's understand the risks and make healthy decisions.

Do you desire more information? Do you feel you need to drink less? Call the Army Substance Abuse Program at 545-4415 for help.

Stowers Stampede builds family ties

Spc. Douglas DeMaio

Jennifer Hadley runs toward the finish line on her way to placing first overall in the one mile fun run at the Stowers Stampede. Hadley finished with a time of seven minutes, two seconds.

Running teaches students not to give up dreams

Spc. Douglas DeMaio

Her dreams are inspired by opportunities available to her and by the amount of support she receives from her parents.

For Faith Middle School seventh-grader Jennifer Hadley, winning the Stowers Stampede one-mile fun run is a step toward achieving her dream of becoming an Olympic runner.

"It felt good to win," Hadley said, who posted a time of seven-minutes, two seconds in the race. "It makes me proud and encourages me to run."

Practice and mental preparation have helped her improve her running, she said. Hadley's best time in the mile is 5:50.

"I think she did a good job on the mile," said Adam Weinbaum, her physical education instructor. "She's a great runner and she's built for speed."

Weinbaum directed the race along with Stowers Elementary physical education instructor, Becky Archilla.

"The run is for fun," Archilla said. "It's to get everybody out running, but it's mostly for the enjoyment of running."

Not only did the run inspire some young athletes, but it also allowed families to come together and build relationships through sports.

Families who are active together are close, Archilla said. They are able to bond and learn valuable lessons from one another.

Cody Camilo, a fifth-grader at Stowers, learned from his father how important it is not give up on himself.

"Running teaches me that it doesn't matter how much speed you have, just keep running," Camilo said. "I know if I let myself walk and give up on myself, I'll lose."

In the long run, Camilo understands that running shows determination and it's something he can do to help him stay fit for the rest of his life., he said.

"We stress these type of activities," Archilla said. "Running is one of the best life-long sports."

Hadley said, running is similar to life. Even though the goal isn't within sight and the path has its ups and downs, it's important to remain steadfast and not give up on the dreams and objectives that lie ahead.

Flights give more players chance to win

Spc. Douglas DeMaio
Bayonet staff

The annual Association of the U.S. Army spring golf tournament was played April 19 at the Follow Me Golf Course.

In all, there were nine teams that placed in three flights of a four-ball scramble 18-hole tournament, best-ball method.

In the first flight, the Bustamante team scored a 54 to place first, the Directorate of Operations and Training team shot a 63 to place first in the second flight and 317th Engineer Battalion's team took first in the third flight with a 71.

The tournament is like having three tournaments in one, said Kathy Burns, tournament official.

Each flight had a first-, second- and third-place winner.

"I think it was an excellent idea to have three flights," said Bruce Cleveland, a member of the DOT team. "There are a lot of good golfers on Fort Benning and this allows new golfers a chance to win."

The tournament was very relaxing, Cleveland said. There was ample opportunity for the teams to take their time and the money raised was for an excellent cause.

"Most of us in Infantry Hall enjoy doing things that benefit soldiers," he said.

Funds raised from the tournament support soldiers' programs on Fort Benning.

Besides the registration fee to play, teams were allowed to buy three mulligans at $5 a piece, which gave the team makeup strokes for a misplaced shot.

"We were able to minimize our mistakes with the mulligans," Cleveland said.

His team used the mulligans to save par on a few holes, which kept them in championship contention, he said.

Winning wasn't the only thing everyone had on their mind. For the person who hit a hole-in-one on the par three, the team would be awarded a 2003 Chevy Blazer.

"We would have given it to the person who hit it in," Cleveland said. "Hole seven is always a tough hole to put a good prize on and it always plays long.

"It's probably one of the toughest par threes on the course."

Ruggers to play in upcoming championship tournament

Rugby players come to compete for national honors

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet Staff

Rugby is a sport of pride. Players don't get paid to play. They play for fun. The fun has its costs though. Rugby is a sport where injuries can easily occur. There is no equipment used by the players. They wear the standard uniform, which is a shirt, shorts, socks and cleats.

The fun is still there for the players.

According to a story by Lisa Gartner called, The Rookie Primer, rugby is the only sport where after a match is played, teams lay all differences aside and have a party.

There is a passion for the game despite all rivalries, according to the primer. The passion is shared by everyone who plays it.

Fort Benning will experience the passion May 10-12.

The USA Rugby National Military Club Championship Tournament will play its annual tournament to see who the best military rugby team is in the nation.

"We're expecting a little more than 20 teams to be coming in," said Gary Kent, Fort Benning Cruise-a-matics treasurer. Most of the teams will be from the continental U.S., but we are also expecting teams from U.S. Forces Europe."

The tournament will be run just like World Cup Soccer.

Teams will be put into pools and play each team in their pool once. Then, depending on the number of teams and number of pools, the top teams will go onto a single-elimination tournament, with the championship game slated for the afternoon of May 12.

For more information on the tournament, call Gary Kent at (706) 324-4924, or go to USA Rugby's website at www.usarugbysouth.com.

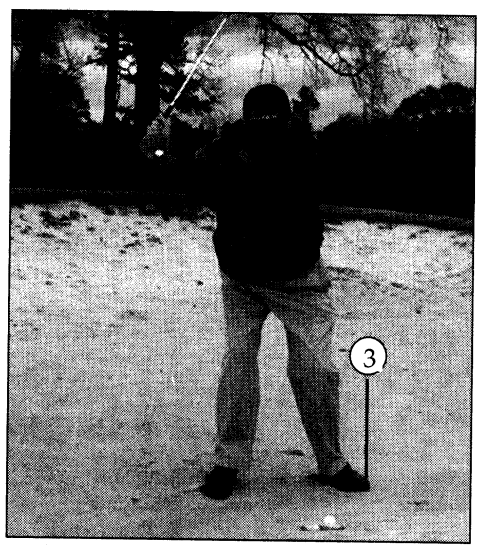
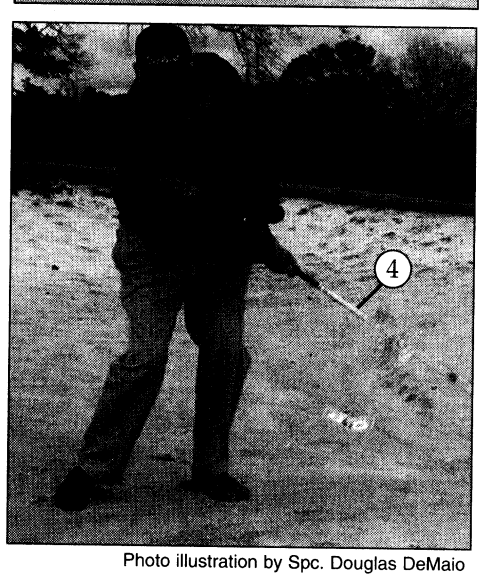
Sand shots

Golf tips by the post golf pro, Larry Cruise



Here are some tips for sand shots:

"Use a dollar bill to help you understand the correct swing from the sand."



(1)– Place a ball on the middle of a dollar bill. Open up the face of the club and place it two inches behind the ball.

(2)– Move the forward foot back and angle it so that it's pointing more toward the ball than the target. Place your weight on the forward foot. This position will open up the hips and allow for a fluid, well-balanced swing.

(3)– Keep the weight on the front foot during the back swing and rotate at the hips.

"The most common mistakes people make with their bunker shots are they close their club face and don't follow through on their swing."

(4)– Hit the ball with a relaxed downward stroke and keep the hands moving throughout the swing. The open face club should push the sand and the ball out of the bunkers.The follow through will allow for the sand to displace the ball.

"Notice the dollar bill float through the air. The swing should go into the sand and lift the ball from underneath the sand."

For more information, call Fort Benning Golf Club at 687-1940.

Adjutant General to keep providing soldiers' services

Lori Egan
Bayonet editor

There were cheers, tears and high fives when the garrison commander told the work force of the Adjutant General, Directorate of Military Personnel, the results of a three-year study that looked at whether or not the work should be done in-house or contracted out to private industry.

"The work will stay in-house," Col. Joe Torres, garrison commander, said April 26 as soon as the results were known.

The study, known as the A-76 or the commercial activities study, analyzed the most efficient provider of the service and determined that Fort Benning's bid would save the government $5.8 million over a 60-month period, Torres said.

Training and Doctrine Command compared the AG's bid with one submitted by Cirrus Technology, located in Huntsville, Ala. Cirrus Technology provides the same type of services the AG performs.

Their bid was $29.12 million to provide the services, and the AG bid was $23.23 million, Torres said.

Program turns soldiers into teachers

Funding available for qualifiers

Laura Martinson

If ever the thought of being an educator came to mind, now couldn't be a better time, said Bill Kirkland, Georgia Troops to Teachers program manager. For those interested in becoming a teacher after retiring from the military, the Troops to Teachers program can — and will — help get you there.

Troops to Teachers is a joint initiative of the Departments of Defense and Education to assist transitioning military personnel who wish to teach. Those qualified may be eligible to receive up to $5,000 in federal funding to use toward teacher certification, and up to $10,000 in funding if willing to work for three years in a "high needs" school.

"It's exciting because it's something you can do after the military that really makes a difference," Kirkland said. "I think military experience and savvy really benefits the program."

Academic requirements for the Troops to Teachers program are a four-year degree in any subject from an accredited institution or one year of college and six years of experience in a vocational skill, such as an auto mechanic.

Joseph Miles is a prime example of a Troops to Teacher success story, Kirkland said. The former "hard and charged" Army soldier now teaches math, reading and computer science to kindergarten through fifth grade at Johnson Elementary. After retirement, the decision to become an educator was easy.

"When I got in the Army, I had nothing," said Miles of college experience. "When I retired, I had a bachelor's in human resources. I was blessed to be in the position to get so much schooling."

But it was his time as an ROTC instructor at Auburn University that convinced him that teachers really do make a difference.

"Being a mentor to all those cadets and teaching military structure, well that's just a really decent feeling. When you see all those people graduate, you

Mail carriers to collect for families

Postcards will be delivered next week as reminder

Bridgett Siter
Special to the Bayonet©

The letter carriers employed by the U.S. Postal Service to deliver your mail will be looking for a handout May 11.

They'll be collecting canned goods and nonperishable foods, and every bit — or bite — collected on Fort Benning goes directly to the Army Community Services food locker to benefit soldiers and their families.

It takes a lot of groceries to feed Fort Benning's hungry, said Al Deane, the Army Emergency Relief officer in charge of the emergency food locker, and much of the funding for the food locker comes from an ACS support fund. But the food locker gets a little help once a year from an unlikely source — the postman.

Sometime next week, Fort Benning residents will find postcards in their mailboxes reminding them that next Saturday marks the 10th annual food drive, the largest one-day effort of its kind in the country.

Sponsored by the National Association of Letter Carriers, in conjunction with the U.S. Postal Service, Campbell's Soup, United Way and Saturn, last year's drive netted more than 60,000 pounds of nonperishable foods for local food banks, including more than 2,000 pounds collected on Fort Benning, a significant increase over previous years, said Jerry Hooks, the 75-year-old retired letter carrier from Columbus who helps coordinate the local "Stamp Out Hunger" drive each year.

POSTWIDE YARD SALE

Loveseat not for sale

Laura Martinson
Special to the Bayonet©

COMMENTARY

"Hello, thank you for calling the classifieds. This is June. How may I help you?"

"Yes, I'd like to place an ad for a multi-family yard sale Saturday."

"OK, dear, what types of items will you be selling? You have up to six lines for a very cost effective $40."

"Uh, well, I have this great set of Korean candelabras, no, wait, those were a gift from the husband. Um, oh yeah, I have a ton of maternity clothes. You see, I went kind of wild with my second! Anyway, I won't be needing them anymore, or will I? Oh, I know, we have one of those Sony Playstations — what honey? No, I said don't drive through the weigh station. Yeah, you can put that on there, and ... "

"Ma'am, I don't mean to be rude, but when I asked what kinds of things you'd be selling I was hoping you could break it into categories like household goods or furniture."

"Oh, no, we don't want to get rid of any furniture, but we are looking for a nice loveseat. Are there any ads for one of those?"

"Ma'am?"

"OK, I'm sorry. Look, I have a little of this and a little of that. Some crazy lady is going to come to my house and buy all the socks anyway — she does it every time — so you don't need to list those. And do you know she bought my breadbox to store them in? Says she has breadboxes all over her house that she paints funky colors and stores, well, socks in them. Anyway, I do have a wonderful assortment of McDonald's Happy Meal toys, all the Dalmatians, in fact! Lots of junk, I guess, but I don't know if that would be such a good marketing ploy, huh?"

"No, ma'am, why don't you call back when you know what you'll be selling, OK? Good-bye and thank you for calling the classifieds."

Come on now. I mean what is a yard sale anyway? An auction for the items in your house that don't quite qualify as trash, but for some reason, you don't feel comfortable giving to a friend. Can it really be that complicated if it's in your front yard?

Now, don't get me wrong. There are some high quality finds at yard sales, for example, the baby swing I used for both of my children, although it did get a little tired and slow on our second, and we replaced the batteries weekly. But some people just don't need or use a baby swing anymore. So that sale would be in the spirit of practicality.

What is not practical is having a yard sale with friends and walking away having traded with that very friend more than was sold. Was that a good investment of $40 for advertising? My husband would not think so, as I talk him out of his prized holey T-shirt and his permanently stained hat, which by the way teen-agers pay top dollar for at Abercrombie & Fitch, all in the name of "getting rid of things we don't need." I can understand his frustration when I come home with Amy's crystal serving dish and Denise's eucalyptus basket. But they really were a steal, so he can't stay mad for long, can he? Only if he finds out about the Playstation.

Now, I have to ask myself, do we like yard sale items because they are someone else's? Is there something great and mysterious about seeing the contents of one's house spilled on their front lawn? Makes me feel kind of vulnerable.

But the most vulnerable I've felt during a yard sale was the one time we forgot to add the "no early bird" rule to our ad, and I found neighbors I'd never met foraging through my house at 7 a.m. because I did not yet have my yard set up. Do these people sleep? They certainly don't have small children.

Another fond memory was the muggy spring morning in Savannah when all the sand gnats on the east coast swarmed my front yard, and, as always, I was the primary bug target. Must be that sweet blood of mine. In an effort to keep them away, I doused myself in a good, thick layer of bug spray, and quickly came to the conclusion that those softball-size welts forming on my arms and legs were an allergic reaction to the spray. After showering it all off, and nearly itching the skin off my arms, I picked the lesser of three evils and dressed in pants and long sleeves and sweated a cesspool by the time the sale was over. But I made $82 dollars and lost three pounds.

Now, I will tell you I never spent $40 on advertising. For that much I could hang signs on every corner of Fort Benning promoting the postwide yard sale, and that's what this is really all about anyway. That's right. Saturday, from 8 a.m. to 2 p.m., Fort Benning's finest will find their way to another man's junk, or another man's treasure that will eventually become their junk, all in the name of practicality. So put on your walking shoes and Camelbak, but let's keep it clean. No hair pulling or eye scratching over those Korean candelabras. But if you happen upon a comfy but not too worn loveseat, just keep on walking, because it's mine!

Hey buddy, can you spare a can?

Bridgett Siter
Special to the Bayonet©

COMMENTARY

Sorry Fort Benning, when it comes to stamping out hunger, we're running a distant second.

For the past 10 years, mail carriers (postmen I used to call them before I was one) all across the country have been collecting food for the needy the second Saturday in May.

And for the past few years, the local chapter of the National Association of Letter Carriers has been including Fort Benning in the effort. They collect food for our own food bank. Imagine that.

Statistically speaking, we're not doing a lot to help ourselves.

While Columbus area residents donated nearly 60,000 pounds of groceries last year, Fort Benning folks sacrificed a paltry 2,000.

Now no one expects us to meet or beat everyone else in the county, but per capita, we're way behind the power curve.

So I propose a challenge. Let's all do a little spring cleaning. As we busy ourselves about the house getting ready for tomorrow's postwide yard sale, buzz through the pantry and the kitchen cabinets and bag a dozen cans of vegetables, a couple boxes of cereal and pasta and a plastic bottle or can of juice.

It's that easy.

The mail carriers do the hard part.

They'll lug our donations — no matter how many trips it takes — down to the Custer Road Fire Station, and "they'll be pleased as punch to do it," said Jerry Hook, the retired mail carrier and former soldier responsible for spearheading the Fort Benning Stamp Out Hunger campaign.

And when they get all the goods to the station, they'll weigh them before turning them over to the Army Community Services food locker, where folks like you and me who find themselves in an occasional monetary emergency can get a little help feeding the kids.

And I'll be sure to let you know how well we do this year. Unless I'm too ashamed to print it. Please don't let me down. Let's stamp out hunger on Fort Benning.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Vietnam Veterans Memorial Park needs flags

The Vietnam Veterans Memorial Park Committee has held and enjoyed many functions throughout its history.

We are planning a pre-Memorial Day program at 10:30 a.m. May 18.

There are 119 deceased veterans honored with their name on the wall at the park, and a flag is flown for each name listed on the wall.

Also, the installation of the sculpture that represents three Vietnam veterans of diverse backgrounds makes the Vietnam Veterans Wall complete.

The Vietnam Veterans Memorial Park was completed and continues to thrive solely through donations of time, labor, materials and money. We are requesting the help of the tri-community to help continue with the upkeep efforts at the Vietnam Veterans Memorial Park.

Inasmuch that the memorial flags are worn out and damaged, and to implement the park to the level our fallen comrades deserve, we need 119 flags.

The replacement flag needed is a 3-by-5 foot nylon flag. Lowe's Department Store has pre-ordered the 3-by-5 foot flags, which cost $22.95, and have made them available for this community project.

We are asking that you buy the flag(s) needed and present them to the Memorial Park or send your financial donation to the First Union Downtown Branch, account number 2000001852718 for the Vietnam Veterans Memorial Park Fund.

The flags or money donated to help defray the cost of this project will be greatly appreciated.

If you have any questions, call 687-5357. Thank you for your consideration regarding this matter.

Sneaky snake strikes sleeping soldier

Copperhead takes bite out of trainee

Angela Sachitano
Special to the Bayonet©

Fort Benning soldiers train their entire careers to defend themselves from the enemy.

But when the enemy is a 3-foot-long copperhead snake, all of the defense tactics in the world may not be enough.

"I was sleeping and the sneaky thing must have crept up on me when I least expected it," said Pvt. Tyrel Zamora, 2nd Battalion, 19th Infantry Regiment.

Zamora has only been in the Army for a few short months and he's already had a taste of real danger.

Danger has also had its taste of him.

"It was early in the morning and still dark out," said Zamora. "I woke up to see two blood streams shooting down my hand."

It was during a rest from a field training exercise April 23, when a copperhead snake punched its venomous fangs into Zamora's thumb.

"I couldn't believe it," said Staff Sgt. Robert Hill, drill sergeant. "I knew the bite could potentially be fatal if we didn't get him to a hospital immediately."

Zamora was quickly taken to Martin Army Community Hospital, almost 35 minutes away. By the time he reached the emergency room, his arm was swollen up to his shoulder.

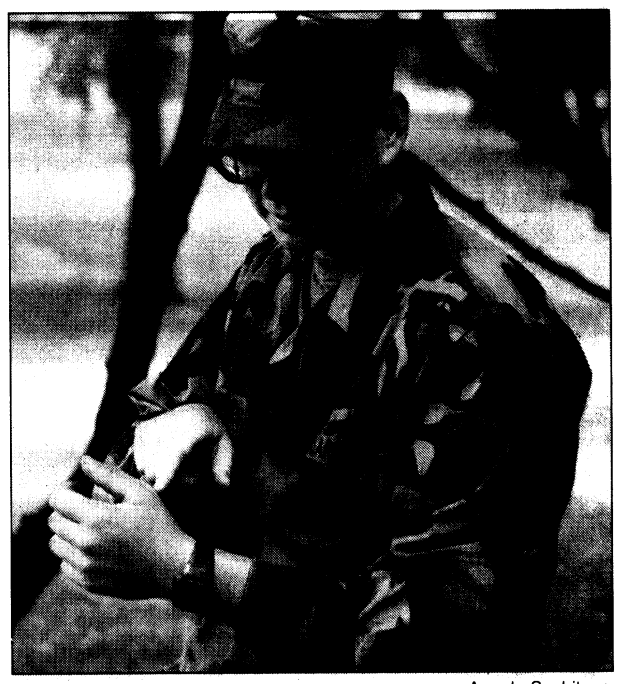
"The doctors gave me painkillers and nine vials of antivenin," said Zamora. "My fingers were so swollen I couldn't close my fist or feel anything on my left arm."

Doctors also gave Zamora a blood transfusion in an attempt to flush out the poison in his blood and for the next 48 hours, watched over him very closely.

Doctors said the chances of Zamora having an allergic reaction to the poison were high.

"If it wouldn't have been for the fast thinking of our men and everyone at the hospital, things could have been a lot worse," Hill said.

In nine years of service, Hill said he's only seen three soldiers with snake wounds.



Hill hopes other soldiers will learn from this incident and be overly cautious when it comes to snakes, especially in swampy areas during the hot months.

"Soldiers don't need to try and be the ultimate snake killer if they see one," said Hill. "It's best to get away as soon as possible and notify other members of the unit."

In the meantime, Zamora has been released from the hospital and has healed quickly. The swelling is gone and the wound has almost disappeared.

"I've tried to stay as calm as possible," Zamora said.

"The doctors assured me I would heal. But all I kept thinking about was that I was supposed to graduate from Advanced Infantry Training Saturday. Nothing was going to keep me from that."

Mule surprises family expecting colt

Family wants community help for name

Pvt. Andrea Candlish
USAIC Public Affairs Office

A Fort Benning family found an unusual visitor waiting for them Thursday afternoon.

Tracy and 13-year-old Katie Vaughn went to feed their horse, Rosie, they found their mare had had its baby.

They expected a foal, but discovered instead a fuzzy brown baby girl with really long ears.

The long awaited foal turned out to be a "molly" (a mule that is a hybrid cross between a donkey and a horse.)

"We weren't expecting this, but she is really cute," Tracy said.

Tracy bought Rosie in mid-February, after her husband Chaplain (Capt.) Tommy Vaughn was assigned to Sand Hill.

The man who sold the mare told the Vaughns Rosie was pregnant only after Tracy had fallen in love with her.

"She wasn't that great looking, but she had a smooth gait and was very spirited," Tracy said. The man told Tracy Rosie's due date was sometime before May, and the father was a black and white paint.

"Well, he was right about Rosie's due date," Tracy said with a laugh." She plans to keep her for right now and see how things go.

"The baby is really independent, so we have to have to start training her right away," Katie said.

The Vaughns are asking the Fort Benning community for their help in finding a name worthy of Rosie's mule.

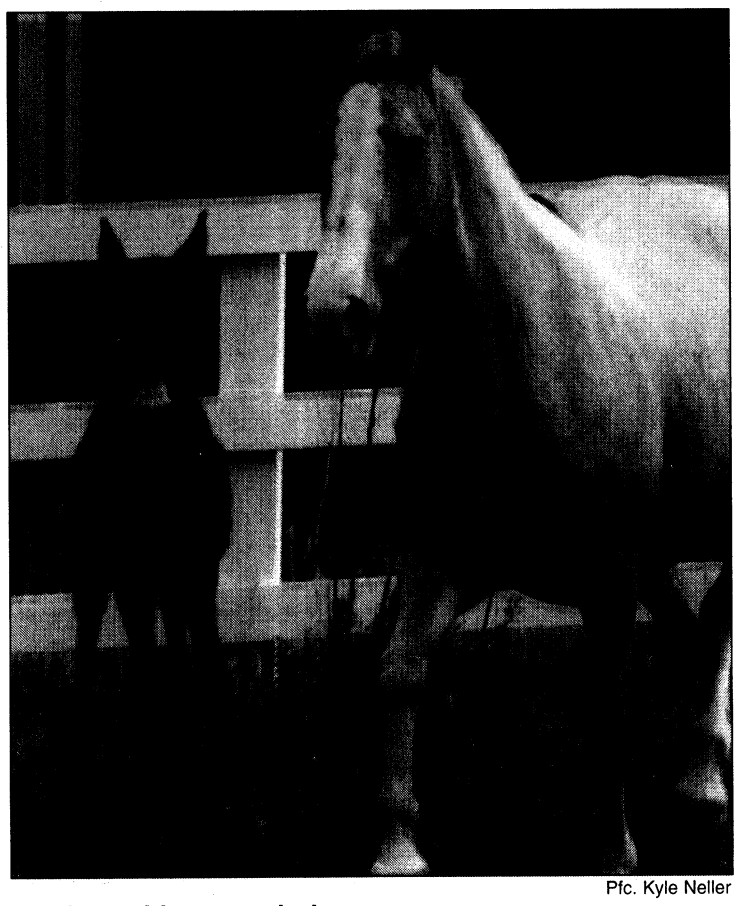
After all, the mule is the Army's animal and has played an important role in Army operations, hauling weapons, ammunition and supplies.

In 1899 the mule made its debut at the Army vs. Navy game.

West Point legend says when the Navy goat and the Army mule were introduced at the end of the game, the mule whirled around and hoisted the goat towards the Navy stands.

Needless to say the crowd got a good laugh from the incident.

Since 1899 mules like Mr. Jackson, Buckshot, and Spartacus have represented the Army at the Army vs. Navy Games.



The current reigning senior mule mascot is Traveller.

The Fort Benning Hunt Club is sponsoring a pick a name contest for Rosie's mule. The winner of the contest will be announced at the Hunt Club's Open House June 22. The winner will receive a free pony ride.

Contest entries can be sent to "Pick a name contest" C/O Fort Benning Hunt Club, Marne Road, P.O. Box 51924, Fort Benning, GA 31905.

Hunt Club manager Andrea Pitts said this is the first mule born at the Hunt Club.

Rosie's mule, along with Rosie, will be in the Parade of Breeds, which features different breeds of the equine species, planned for the open house.

Fort Benning 'owns the night'

Night vision series donated to Infantry Museum

Laura Martinson
Special to the Bayonet©

The history of military equipment is told through its transformation, and as of 2 p.m. today, Fort Benning will chronicle yet another legacy.

A series of night vision equipment dating from the 1960s to present day will be donated to the National Infantry Museum to become a part of its permanent collection.

"The devices will show the progression and evolution of night vision equipment over the years from original devices to what the services use today," said retired Lt. Col. John Spencer, Northrop Grumman, who witnessed the changes in technology firsthand and has been working towards getting the display to the museum for several years.

Northrop Grumman Corporation's electro-optical systems business unit will present several image intensified devices for a night observation device display. This display represents a chronological cross-section of the night vision products designed and produced by several premier companies now integrated under EOS, Spencer said. Together, these companies represent a major portion in the U. S. that were involved in the development and growth of image intensified night vision devices since the early 1960s. Currently EOS remains a major supplier of NODs to the U. S. military, as well as many friendly foreign countries around the world.

Fort Benning is the logical location for such a display, said Frank Hanner, National Infantry Museum director.

"Throughout history, nighttime battles were the most difficult, and during Vietnam, it was said that the 'enemy owned the night' because they knew the terrain better than our soldiers," Hanner said. "Since then, the Army's been the major proponent in finding a solution for fighting at night, and to make our soldiers the 'owners of the night.'"

Spencer said the post should be the home of the display since the Electronics and Special Developments Division of the Infantry Center's Combat Developments has been the lead on most of the requirements documents for night vision devices that have evolved over the past several decades.

"Although all TRADOC schools have participated in the process, Fort Benning has been the leader and motivator for most of the devices used by U.S. ground forces today," Spencer said.

"Benning has been known as the User Center of Excellence for Night Vision for a number of years based on its development of the requirements documents, testing of these devices, formulation of methods of usage and determination for the fielding of the devices."

Included in this unique display are sights spanning almost 40 years of image intensified night vision development, Spencer said. First-, second- and third-generation devices are featured to include goggles, rifle sights and observation devices.

Some of the first generation devices are the AN/PVS-3A, AN/PVS-2A, AN/TVS-2, and the AN/TVS-4, which are all weapons sights and observation devices developed in the late 1950s and early 1960s.

In the 1970s, second generation devices were introduced and include the AN/PVS-5 Goggle, the AN/PVS-4 Rifle Sight, and the AN/VVS-2 Driver's Viewer. Third generation devices came into use in the 1980s, such as the AN/PVS-7 A & B goggles, AN/PVS-10 Sniper Night Sight in use by U. S. military Snipers today, and the AN/AVS-6 Aviators Night Vision Goggle which was the second ANVIS ever made, and whose predecessor was the AN/PVS-5 Infantry Night Vision Goggle.

> "Throughout history, nighttime battles were the most difficult, and during Vietnam, it was said that the 'enemy owned the night' because they knew the terrain better than our soldiers. Since then, the Army's been the major proponent in finding a solution for fighting at night, and to make our soldiers the 'owners of the night.'"

> National Infantry Museum director

"The NODs will be a living display as new devices will be added as they become available," Spencer said.

"It is hoped that other companies will participate in providing night vision equipment unique to them."

The display will be open to the general public Monday.

Army study identifies NCO concerns

NCOs want feedback on how they rate

Joe Burlas
Army News service

WASHINGTON — NCOs want better information as to how they stack up technically, tactically and leadership-wise with their peers, according to the latest round of the Army Training and Leader Development Panel study.

Based upon written surveys, focus groups and one-on-one interviews with more than 30,000 active-duty, Reserve and National Guard soldiers and spouses, the panel's NCO study results were released May 2.

"The NCO study is another example of the extraordinary integrity and credible authority of the chief of staff of the Army's Training and Leader Development Panel," said Brig. Gen. David Huntoon, executive agent for Army Leadership at Fort Leavenworth, Kan. "This report is about the U.S. Army taking a bold and forthright look at itself — expressed in the clear and courageous voice of its soldiers. It's about the human dimension leading transformation. And, it is about making a great, professional noncommissioned officer corps even better."

The NCO ATLDP results raised many of the same issues of an officer ATLDP study conducted in 2000. The officer study results were released last May.

Both studies agreed that Army practices are out of balance with soldier beliefs, the Noncommissioned Officer Education System needs improvement, there is a need for more trust and less micromanagement between seniors and subordinates, training resources need to be maintained, improved and provided as required and that pay and benefits could be better.

Combined Arms Center Command Sgt. Maj. Cynthia Pritchett, who purposely chose not to review the officer study findings in order not to be prejudiced when evaluating the NCO data, said she wasn't surprised that the two outcomes were so similar.

"The NCO study just validates the earlier officer study — there are some real issues here that must be examined," Pritchett said. "It also shows the Army's commitment to its people — that the Army is not afraid and needs to take a close look at itself."

There was one comment from an NCO that did surprise many of the panel members, Pritchett said. The NCO wrote that he did not feel responsible when one of his soldiers failed to perform or meet standards.

That comment reinforced many survey participants' views that top-down training management leaves little, if any, time for NCOs to conduct their own sergeant's time training, she said.

The study found that there is a need for more consistent standards and better enforcement of those standards. Part of this issue reflects back to the perceived need to improve NCOES, because many Mission Training Plans are outdated or nonexistent. The MTP is a formal document that lays out the individual, leader and collective tasks, conditions and standards that each type of Army unit can expect to perform in carrying out its mission.

> "Let's face it, people in the Army are competitive by nature. They want to know how they're doing compared to their peers. The NCOER just isn't doing that."
> Command Sgt. Maj. Cynthia Pritchett
> Combined Arms Center, Fort Leavenworth, Kansas

"There was a time that everyone in the Army trained to published tasks, conditions and standards," said retired Sgt. Maj. of the Army Robert Hall, who served as a senior mentor to NCO ATLDP members. "For many reasons — top-down management, OPTEMPO, 9-11, lack of current MTPs — the Army has slipped from training that way. There is a real need to ground the new generation (of NCOs) with current MTPs."

While survey participants did not fault the NCO Evaluation Report per se, they said it was not being used effectively to provide the feedback they need to improve, said Pritchett.

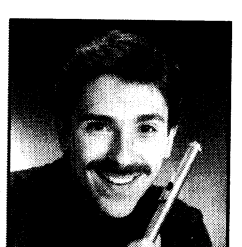
"Let's face it, people in the Army are competitive by nature," she said. "They want to know how they're doing compared to their peers. The NCOER just isn't doing that."

Many of the respondents, especially among the younger NCOs, said they would like to see something like the old military occupational specialty tests that were given annually more than 20 years ago, Pritchett said.

About one-third of NCOs surveyed do not believe NCOs maintain MOS skill proficiency, while more than half said unit mission essential tasks are not being trained to standard, stated the study's final report.

"Don't look for any fixes coming out of this study because the NCO corps isn't broken," Hall said. "The NCO corps isn't like a rusty old heap sitting in the driveway; it is like a Mercedes just needing a wash and a wax. This study will help arm Army leadership with the facts it needs to make decisions that will ensure the NCO corps' and the Army's successes of the past 226 years will keep pace with transformation."

The final report on the NCO ATLDP study should be posted on the Web by today at www.army.mil/features/ATLDNCO.htm. The earlier officer report is located at www.army.mil/features/ATLD/ATLD.htm.



Two additional ATLDP studies are underway: one surveying warrant officers, and another reviewing the attitudes and opinions of Department of the Army civilians.

"Knowing that their contribution stays right there on post, I'm hoping Fort Benning residents catch on and make this the biggest drive ever."

The eight mail carriers that serve Fort Benning will deposit donations at the fire station on Custer Road, where Hooks will get an accurate weight before it goes to the food locker.

Hooks and Mack Toole, president of the local NALC, said Columbus carriers are hoping to top last year's total. With that goal in mind, nearly 30 retired carriers, many military veterans, will be joining the effort.

Fort Benning residents are asked to leave nonperishable foods, such as canned meats, tuna, fruits and vegetables, dried milk, cereals, juices, pastas, boxed food mixes and juices by their mail boxes, where it will be picked up when the mail is delivered. No glass containers please.

CALL team learning lessons from Afghan front

Idea behind center is learning from mistakes

Spc. Greg Heath
Army News Service

FORT LEAVENWORTH, Kan. — A team from the Center for Army Lessons Learned just returned from Afghanistan and is analyzing data collected from soldiers fighting in Operation Enduring Freedom.

The CALL team arrived in Kuwait in late March, upon the request of Lt. Gen. Paul T. Mikolashek, commander, Combined Forces Land Component Command.

CALL, based out of Fort Leavenworth, Kan., has a full-time staff of mostly civilians. The 17-member team sent to Kuwait, though, was hand-picked from various Training and Doctrine Command installations based on individuals' expertise in their field, officials said.

The team members went into Afghanistan with a collection plan consisting of a list of predetermined questions that served as a loose guide for information gathering, but allowed for a free exchange with unit representatives, said a CALL team member.

"Often (the interviewed units) are the first ones in and nobody else had done some of the stuff they were doing," said Maj. Dennis McNulty, S-3, 5th Engineer Battalion. "They're normally quite proud of their accomplishments."

These "unsolicited observations" are often the most important ones to the CALL observers, McNulty said.

"We capture them so next time, when a similar situation occurs, soldiers will have references and tips on how to handle the problem," McNulty said.

Initially founded in 1985, CALL was created to capture relevant lessons learned at the National Training Center at Fort Irwin, Ca., because rotating units consistently made similar mistakes. In late 1989, as a result of Operation Just Cause in Panama, CALL expanded its mission, capturing and disseminating wartime lessons learned.

"The test for CALL and the entire lessons learned system is whether it can help soldiers and units perform their missions right the first time, regardless of the mission," said Maj. Leonel Nascimento, CALL operations officer.

"The test for CALL and the entire lessons learned system is whether it can help soldiers and units perform their missions right the first time, regardless of the mission. Sometimes mistakes not only result in lost time and effort, but sometimes they result in people being injured or even lives being lost."

Maj. Leonel Nascimento
Center for Army Lessons Learned operations officer

CALL also draws from many resources, Nascimento said.

"CALL collects and analyzes data from a variety of current and historical sources," Nascimento said, "including Army operations and training events, to produce lessons for military commanders, staff and students."

"Sometimes mistakes not only result in lost time and effort, but sometimes they result in people being injured or even lives being lost."

"Our job is to be as unobtrusive and objective as possible," said Maj. Norman Emery, defense language instructor, 229th Military Intelligence Battalion, about the team's information gathering techniques. "We're here because we were invited; we're not the Inspector General or evaluators."

The information gathered not only aids soldiers in current operations, but can also be incorporated into Army training and doctrine.

"What we learn can help improve training at all different schools," Emery said. "What we bring back can be included in the Army schools' curriculum and improve the soldiers that they turn out."

Nascimento said he is often amazed by the number of lessons learned the team collects.

"U.S. soldiers are just so ingenious in the way they do things," he said. "No unit does the same thing all the time. Every unit finds a different way of overcoming a challenge. That's what makes us special — because we are so unpredictable."

Once the lessons learned are complete, they are distributed throughout the Army in various print and electronic publications. Some of the most popular publications are the bi-monthly News From The Front and various Combat Training Center bulletins, newsletters and articles.

All of the publications and reports can be accessed via CALL's Web page at http://call.army.mil. The Web site also contains an extensive archive of past lessons learned which can be specifically looked up with its high-powered keyword search option.

Soldiers are also encouraged to submit their own lessons learned on the Web site.

Editor's note: Spc. Greg Heath is a member of the Fort Leavenworth public affairs team.

Teachers: Recruiting retirees

really get to see the fruits of your labor," said Miles, who added that military life and teaching really aren't that different. "You always know you can find someone in the schools who's faced the same challenges as you, and they can help you find a solution. The camaraderie and esprit de corps exists within the schools just like in the Army."

Retired Sgt. 1st Class Al Parham, assistant principal of Spencer High School, couldn't agree more.

"The cultures that exist are so similar. Soldiers enjoy the camaraderie of a platoon or a company, and teachers enjoy the camaraderie of the classroom," he said. "You can get into a position and become an expert in the area, and you don't have to worry about moving, but you can still get promoted.

"Most military people who end up teaching fit in very comfortably in the school."

Parham retired from the Army in 1995, and because of a 10 percent disability, qualified for financial Veterans Affairs assistance to complete his teaching certificate.

"Part of what makes teaching attractive to retirees is the structure and regimen. There's still a definite chain of command, and we all follow codes of behavior," said Parham, who added that the pay and health benefits for teachers are comparable to that of the military, and that adds appeal to the occupation as well.

Military service requirements are as follows: Active duty members should be within one year of retirement before applying.

Those retired after Oct. 1, 1999 have up to four years after retirement to be eligible for the program.

For added convenience, the Troops to Teachers Web site provides a referral service, where interested candidates can submit a resume and communicate with schools nationwide. There are 25 contacts across the country ready to assist in placing candidates in desired schools. Additional requirements and conditions are listed on the site.

For more information, call Kirkland at (800) 745-0709 or visit www.troopstoteachers.org.

AG: Jobs stay

Fort Benning's bid streamlines the now 100 civilian and 70 military positions to just 104 civilian positions starting at the end of January 2003.

Jim Brinson, AG director, said a lot of hard work went into the bid process.

"Our work force reviewed the jobs and is doing the work with less manpower," he said.

Brinson credited process improvements as the reason for the directorate's success. Although the AG is losing 70 military positions, not all of those positions were filled, he said. Soldiers not currently on PCS orders will be reassigned to other positions on post.

Civilians affected by AG's downsizing will be eligible for job placement assistance through the Army Career and Alumni Program and for registration in the Priority Placement Program.

Torres said employees will receive information on separation incentives as they become available, including severance packages, retirement options and other transition programs.

Candidates help Habitat for Humanity

Soldiers give hand to community

Senior officer candidates of Class 03-02 helped the Columbus community Tuesday with Habitat for Humanity in downtown Columbus.

In Officer Candidate School, there is a requirement to volunteer in the community in some way.

So, the SOCs put their heads together and decided to help with Habitat for Humanity.

"This was something we all wanted to do," said Senior Officer Candidate Dennis Berry. "It's something we enjoy doing."

The SOCs worked on 12 houses Tuesday.

They did various jobs such as landscaping, painting walls and putting up drywall.

"By starting early, we will get things done," Berry said. "We will be helping out the community a lot more."

For the SOCs, Habitat for Humanity was more than something they wanted to do.

"It was more than a job," Berry said.

"We wanted to touch the hearts of not only ourselves, but the people we're helping."

The SOCs were satisfied with all the help they gave the community.

"I'm glad to be out here helping," said Senior Officer Candidate Keeley Brown.

"It shows our appreciation to the community for the support they have given us."

"The Columbus community has supported Fort Benning in many aspects," Berry said.

Fort Benning has helped the Columbus community with Habitat for Humanity projects.

"The Fort Benning community is still the largest supporter of Habitat for Humanity in this area," said Cathy Walker, coordinator. "They continually come through and help provide volunteers, when volunteers are needed."

Habitat for Humanity is a nonprofit, non-denominational Christian housing organization.

Aviation unit supports Fort Benning

A Blackhawk UH-60 flies out for the helocast event during the Best Ranger Competition Sunday.

UH-60's ready for support

Pfc. Chris Stephens

The mission is to support the Rangers on their training operations, but for some pilots it's more than that.

The pilots and crew chiefs of the Directorate of Operations and Training Aviation enjoy the thrill of flying the Blackhawk UH-60's.

"We love to fly," said Sgt. Thomas Lilly, crew chief. "We perform maintenance of these helicopters and make sure they're in great shape. Then, when they are taken in the air, it's cool to see how well they run from the work we did on them."

The crew chiefs perform various types of maintenance on the helicopters to ensure the helicopter is in good working condition.

"We check the bearings, panels, tires, rotor-blades regularly," Lilly said. "We also check to see if anything is broken, and if it is, then we replace it. We've signed for these aircrafts and it is our job to take care of them. They are our babies."

There aren't many soldiers assigned to the unit, so the soldiers perform many duties, he said.

"Besides the maintenance, we also fly on the helicopters to support the missions for the Rangers," Lilly said.

The Blackhawk helicopters require two pilots and two crew chiefs.

"Before taking off, I check to make sure everything in the helicopter is correct," said Chief Warrant Officer Richard Wilken, pilot. "When up in the air, I do everything possible to assist units in getting the most out of training."

In addition to the Rangers, the pilots support other units including the Airborne, and Sniper schools.

The helicopters log in about 25 hours each month individually," said Capt. Michael Bentley, flight detachment commander. "That is over 1,200 hours combined each year. Compared to other bases and the size of our detachment, that is a lot.

"Those hours are credited to our crew chiefs. Without the extra hours they gladly put in, the mission would not be able to be complete."

So, next time you see a Blackhawk over Fort Benning, remember there is a Blackhawk unit ready to support the post and its various efforts, said Bentley.

Firefighters team-up for rescue training

SORT practices extractions

Pfc. Brian Trapp

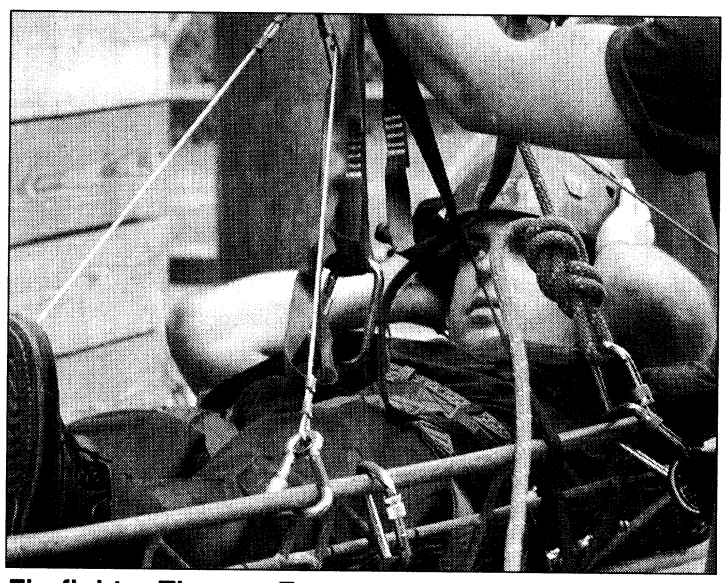
The Special Operations Response Team with the Fort Benning Fire Department trained for high-angle extractions at the Eagle Tower April 25 on Sand Hill.

The team was formed 10 weeks ago combining all of the specialized rescue teams, bringing them together to make a team where the members are experts in all areas of special response rescues.

"I saw the need for a rescue team like this for a long time," said Arthur Simmons, Fort Benning fire chief. "As soldiers are busy fighting wars, the fire department loses manpower, so we have to work smarter."

The firefighters won't be able to just use sheer numbers if they have a lowered work force due to deployments, so they depend on mechanical aid.

The team can use a rope system to rescue people off the side of a bridge, cliff or even to pull someone out of a manhole or well.



"Anyone can pull a rope, but we need to train guys on how to set up the system and tie the knots," said Rick Pagels, firefighter with Main Post Fire Station.

The team used a Stokes rescue basket and a 3-to-1 pulley system to haul a firefighter and an "accident victim" up the rappel wall of Eagle Tower to simulate a victim who had fallen off a bridge and needed to be brought back up to be cared for.

The pulley system helps three firefighters to move 400 pounds up the wall, due to mechanical advantage. In a real situation any number of people could help quicken the process.

"It's good to be prepared, but to do that we need to practice routinely," Pagels said. The skills SORT has to specialize in need to be done often, otherwise they may forget a step.

"I'm proud of what these guys have accomplished," Simmons said. "If the soldiers are risking their lives for us, the least we can do is keep their families safe."

Firefighter Thomas Eyre prepares to be lifted.

SPECIAL OLYMPICS

Sgts. Tashana Menzie and Heather Orland, 2nd Battalion, 47th Infantry Regiment, carry Caroline Whiddon to a victory in the assisted 50-meter dash. Six soldiers from the unit traveled to Russell County High School April 26 to assist more than 300 children with disabilities.

Troops race to finish line to lend a helping hand to students

After years of working at a chemical plant, Morris Oliver decided it was time to use his work to make a difference.

"I got tired of working for a paycheck. I wanted to do something more," said Oliver, who's now a special education teacher for Russell County Schools, and for the first time, coordinator for Russell County Special Olympics.

"Special Olympics gives the kids the chance to compete against others at their level instead of those who have an advantage."

Students with one or more of 13 exceptionalities such as learning and behavior disorders, mental retardation and autism competed in events from the 100 meter dash to wheelchair races, and some of Fort Benning's own were there to help.

Sgt. Heather Orland and six other soldiers from 2nd Battalion, 47th Infantry Regiment, were on the high school football field to lend a helping hand to 300 exceptional children from the Russell County school district, but Orland has personal reasons for volunteering.

When a standard test given during pregnancy revealed that her unborn baby would be born with Down's syndrome, she made it her personal goal to educate herself, her husband and 9-year-old daughter, Amanda, about the condition.

"We wanted and needed to know everything we could about what our baby would be like and what special needs he'd have," said Orland, who later found out the alpha-fetoprotein test often has false positives, and an amniocentesis revealed such was the case for her unborn son, Jacob, who's now 7-months-old.

"We've learned we're very blessed. In volunteering we can show the kids how special they are," Ogden said. "This has taught me that every child, no matter what the situation, can be anything they want to be."

Tiffany Parker, 10, firmly believes in that very ideal, and though she is confined to a wheelchair, she sets no limits for herself.

"I want to be a lawyer when I grow up," she said. When someone suggested her professional goals come naturally due to a love to argue, she shot back an emphatic, "Uh-uh!"

Tiffany was excited to announce her "momma, daddy, poppa and nanny" were all in the crowd to cheer her on to a win in the girl's wheelchair race.

But the day's events weren't all about competition.

"Every child here today will win something," said Sharon Ogden, instructional assistant to 7-year-old Preston Floyd, who has autism. Ogden spends eight hours a day, five days a week with Preston, so she felt it was only appropriate that she be on the sidelines to cheer him on. "You get very attached to the children when you spend that much time with them, and I've certainly become attached to Preston."

Ogden's husband, 1st Sgt. Patrick Ogden, 2nd Battalion, 19th Infantry Regiment, though completing a 25-mile road march just hours before the Special Olympics, wasn't going to let blistered feet and a tired body keep him away.

"This is our last year here, and we've connected with so many children," Ogden said. He and his wife will be PCSing to Fort Polk May 29.

"I have very mixed feelings," Sharon said of leaving her students. "But I'm just going to move on and see what good I can do wherever I go."

Survivor reaches out to cancer victims

Kelleys join victors in Relay for Life

Bridgett Siter
Special to the Bayonet©

Lynda Kelley is a survivor, not a victim. The wife of Fort Benning's chief of law enforcement, she knows a thing or two about fighting back.

Lynda is one of many survivors who'll take to the track at Kinnett Stadium next week in a show of solidarity and strength against the nation's number one killer — cancer. She'll walk side-by-side with her husband, Lt. Col. Terry Kelley, and their 23-year-old daughter, Heather.

"I have a difficult time walking, so she'll walk on one side, and he'll walk on the other. That'll make it easier," said Lynda, who suffers the lingering affects of three brain surgeries, the result of a blood vessel disease, and breast cancer.

"They walked me through the cancer and held my hand. We came through it together, so we'll walk the survivor lap together," she said.

The survivor lap will kick off the American Cancer Society's annual Relay For Life May 17 and 18. It's the biggest single fund-raiser for cancer research and treatment nationwide.

And it's an "incredible, awesome" experience, Lynda said.

"Last year was my first time. I didn't know what to expect. The doctors and nurses and families lined the track, applauding and crying as we circled ... It was just incredible," she said.

Lynda's story of cancer and recovery is incredible, too. And she's anxious to share the lessons she learned with those who may one day walk in her shoes.

Lynda said it was no surprise when she discovered a lump in her breast two years ago.

"My mother died of cancer. I always knew I'd get it one day. I just knew it. But it didn't show up on a mammogram, and it wasn't a hard lump like cancer's supposed to be," she said.

"Cancer doesn't behave the way we expect it to. It doesn't follow any rules. That's why it's so important for women to know their bodies, to do self-exams. Even very young women."

A malignant lump was removed from Lynda's breast two weeks after her diagnosis. Twelve weeks later she underwent a series of blood transfusions and radiation treatments, a procedure she feels is critical for recovering cancer patients.

"The moment I learned about (the cancer) I called my friend JoAnn. She fought cancer for years. She was an old pro at it. We were long-distance cancer sisters," said Lynda, who attended her friend's funeral in Kansas two weeks ago.

"She was such a sweet person, so trusting. She trusted her doctors — didn't question them. Didn't educate herself and demand radiation or chemotherapy.

Lt. Col. Terry and Lynda Kelley celebrated their 31st wedding anniversary Thursday.

"I believe she'd be alive today if she had one of those procedures. You can't just let someone else do all the thinking for you," said Lynda, and her husband echoed her message.

"In the Army we say 'No one will manage your career the way you will.' So we tell women 'No one will manage your health the way you will," Terry said.

"Educate yourself now. Don't wait till it happens to you or someone you love."

And if it does happen to someone you love, reach out, the Kelleys said.

"It's better to reach out and be wrong than not to reach out at all," Lynda said. "Just call, bake cookies, send flowers. Say 'I know this is terrible. What can I do?' You may not be able to do a thing, but be willing to reach out anyway."

"And if you're going through this know, you're not in this alone," said Terry. "Cancer hits the whole family. Find a support group or someone who can tell you what to expect. Not knowing what will happen is the worst of it."

Fear of the unknown was, indeed, difficult to deal with, Lynda said.

"I knew I'd get it. The question was where and when. When the doctor told me ... well it was kind of a relief. Like 'OK, this is the way it's going to be. I can handle it,'" Lynda said.

"It's like going to a ballet. You don't understand any of it until they give you a program. Then you say 'Now I understand. Now I know what to expect.'"

The Kelleys, who celebrated their 31st wedding anniversary Thursday, said they found strength in their faith during the darkest hours of Lynda's battle.

"I used to say I could handle anything if I understood why. There was a time or two I said 'God, what is it you're trying to teach me here?' I wanted to know why. Why me?

"Well, why not me? Why should I be exempt?" Lynda said.

"God said to trust him in the big things just like we trust him with the small things. Why isn't really so important anymore, but if there's a lesson, it's to trust God, keep the faith."

Lynda's been given a clean bill of health. The cancer is gone, and she believes it won't come back.

"Just like I always felt I'd get it, now I feel like I'll never get it again. I'm healed. There's no fear," she said.

And to prove it, she'll join hands with her own relay 'team,' Terry and Heather, and walk the victor's lap at Kinnett Stadium.

Daisies planting flowers

Minnie Kinard, a 4-year-old Daisy from Fort Benning's Girl Scout Troop 20, is earning her gardening patch April 26 at the Thrift Store. Troop 20 Daisies planted flowers and shrubs around the front of the store to replace those that had decayed and cleaned leaves and debris from the parking lot. A light rain watered the garden just as the girls finished their work.

Students sing at graduation

Wilson Elementary School

> "All the soldiers were marching at the same time. That takes a lot of practice."

> Fourth-grader choir member

The lyrics of the Army Song have been echoing through the halls of Wilson School for the past several weeks.

Students from the Wilson School Chorus had the honor of singing the opening song for the graduation ceremonies for 3rd Battalion, 47th Infantry Regiment, April 25. The chorus, under the direction of music teacher Jo Ann Yates, worked for several weeks on their rendition of the Army Song.

Students traveled to Pomeroy Field on Sand Hill to participate in the event. Being asked to sing at the graduation is just the latest partnership between the school and the Basic Combat Training Brigade.

For many of the chorus members, this was their first time attending a graduation of this type. Fourth-grader Travis Torgerson was very impressed with the event.

"I liked the singing and watching the soldiers march. All the soldiers were marching at the same time. That takes a lot of practice."

Laura Brunnelson was equally impressed.

"The soldiers did as they were told and did everything at the same time. I think we sang well too. We sang loudly, and we were able to keep up with the band."

The 22-member chorus plans to sing at future graduations.

Wilson students celebrate art

Wilson Elementary School

If you remember elementary art class as nothing more than crayons, scissors and paste, then you haven't visited Audrey Leanza's class at Wilson School. From making paper mache' and seed mosaic masks to repousse, the art of tooling metal by pushing in on it from both sides, students at Wilson School are immersed in multiple artistic mediums.The success of this type of diverse teaching is evident in Leanza's art program. In her 12-year tenure as an art teacher with the Fort Benning Schools, her students have entered various competitions and have had their work selected. Winners have been selected from the local, state, national and international levels. In the recent Armed Services YMCA Art Contest, an international contest with thousands of entries, Wilson students placed first and second in the world, and six students were recognized with honorable mention. The students enter an average of five contests per year.

Leanza is very modest about her successes and is careful to give all the credit to her students.

"I don't know how I do it. I just tell them to look and observe what's there. But most importantly, I tell them to have fun."

Students take her advice to heart. Even the most reluctant students love art class.

"Mrs. Leanza has taught us about symmetry and how to use it in art. She's always telling us to blend, blend, blend, and it really helps," believes fourth grader Brittany Bullock.

Zack Arabinko is equally complimentary about the art program.

"We've learned about the seven types of lines. We created an abstract picture using this technique. Mrs. Leanza has a great sense of humor, and she's a great art teacher."

This type of enthusiasm prompted the school to designate the weeks of April 22-25 as Mrs. Leanza Week at the school. Each day, different classes showed their appreciation by surprising the teacher with cards and homemade gifts.

MTV's The Osbournes teaches lessons

Music Television follows family of Ozzy Osbourne

Chuck Colson

Here is an interesting lesson in being a parent from a most unusual source.

The past few weeks, more than 6 million Americans have tuned in to MTV to watch the latest example of so-called "reality television." This is the largest audience in that network's history.

Part of the "reality" they're seeing is a lesson in the personal and cultural consequences of the 1960s spirit of personal liberation.

The Osbournes tells the story of singer Ozzy Osbourne, his wife, Sharon, and their two children, Kelly and Jack. Osbourne is the father of "heavy metal" rock music and is nicknamed the "Prince of Darkness." His best-known antic is biting the heads off live bats during his concerts. MTV cameras followed the Osbourne clan through their daily lives for six months.

The show's entertainment value lies in the juxtaposition between Osbourne, the outrageous rock icon whose career was built on pushing the boundaries of acceptable behavior, and Osbourne now, the overwhelmed family man.

Thus, the audience is treated to a sight of a tattoo-covered man fulminating against his daughter for getting a very small one.

Then there's drugs. Osbourne was legendary for his heavy drinking and drug use, which makes it hard for him to say anything about his son's marijuana use. It's clear that

REFLECTIONS

Osbourne and his wife adore their kids, and their kids adore them, but there's more to being a parent than affection. There's a need to teach right from wrong, to be a good role model, and to instill a sense of moral limits. These are problems for The Osbournes.

It is almost impossible for them to assert any moral authority over their children at all because their well-publicized lifestyles and values disqualify them as moral teachers.

But the Osbournes try. He and his wife lecture their kids, but Kelly, the daughter, fires back: "What you and Dad have to understand is that me and Jack have been brought up very differently from everyone else" in other words, a libertine lifestyle. That's why the Christian Science Monitor said, "Osbourne is a poster boy for 'don't do what I did, honey.'" But it's more than just parental hypocrisy or inconsistency. Osbourne and his antics are the extreme embodiment of the 60's world view that has shaped many of today's parents.

This world view values such ideas as self-expression and individual autonomy above everything. It believes that the church, government and family have led us astray. So salvation lies in liberation from the constraints imposed by these institutions, and nowhere is this world view more dominant than in the music world Osbourne inhabits.

And as audiences are learning every Tuesday night, what works for a rock star onstage fails him offstage. That's because before you can expect someone to exercise self-control and respect authority, you have to provide them with a belief system that treats those virtues as important and be a role model. Parents who aren't notorious rock stars shouldn't feel smug about the Osbournes' dilemma. Most American parents, and our educational system, subscribe to the same values we see on display at Ozzy's house.

The results may not be as extreme — or as lucrative — but their impact is just as real on the lives of the kids who aren't going to embrace good values they have seen their parents reject.

In the end, the real lesson of The Osbournes isn't about fame or fortune. It's about how what we believe shapes not only our lives, but the lives of those we love most.

Story time gives children imagination

Chaplain (Maj.) Raymond Koop
Family Life Ministries Center

Bedtime stories should do more than put children to sleep. Reading a story to children forms strong bonds between parent and child and creates lasting memories.

Storytelling is a wonderful opportunity to snuggle and savor together the beauty of a story and its illustrations. Whether your children are preschoolers or teen-agers, reading stories aloud together creates opportunities to know and understand your child.

The best books possess great literature and quality illustrations. From picture books and nursery rhymes to biographies, novels, mysteries and science-fiction, good books become friends to share together and pass on to the next generation.

Koop

Adventure books such as Swiss Family Robinson, Treasure Island and Robinson Crusoe help develop a child's imagination and sense of wonder. Wholesome stories like Little Women depict how families handle separation and grief and accurately depict the consequences of making life choices. Books by Dr. Seuss provide humor and fantasy. Bible stories teach spiritual truths and exhort us to godly living.

The Hobbit and The Lord of the Rings trilogy enthrall us with the conflict between good and evil and warns us of the corrupting effect of power. The Chronicles of Narnia by C. S. Lewis does the same for younger listeners.

Elements in the story serve as metaphors for real life. Dragons no longer exist, but there are powerful people who walk the earth. We may not meet an ogre, but we may battle against poverty and oppression.

The time spent together in reading aloud to your child forges lasting relationships and cherished memories.

Are you seeking to form lasting memories with your children? Call the Chaplain Family Life Center at 545-1760 for help or visit the center at 2606 Dixie Road, Soldiers Plaza.

BEST RANGER

Twelve teams finish ranger competition

Team in lead after road march never looked back

Descending from a helicopter 1,500 feet above the drop zone, a competitor in the 20th annual Best Ranger Competition had a gust of wind carry him into the trees. Physical harm quickly came upon as he hit the sharply pointed branches. Spectators gasped, as they grasped a sense of the dangers involved with the competition.

Physical dangers exist throughout the competition and each year injuries to competitors are as common as a May thunderstorm in Georgia. The 60-hour event puts stress on the mind, joints, muscles and bones, and the injuries could impede a competitor's will to continue, but many tolerate their injuries and continue forward.

Staff Sgt. Shane Jernigan of the 6th Ranger Training Battalion continued on his quest to finish the competition and did so with a broken ankle.

"You know it's going to hurt coming into it," said 1st. Lt. Scott Wence, 1st Battalion, 75th Ranger Regiment.

The competition is tough, said Gunnery Sgt. Keith Oakes, winner of last year's competition with partner Sgt. 1st. Class William Patterson. It demands more than some can give.

"All these guys have had major lifestyle changes," Oakes said. "All your free time goes toward training.

"Your mindset starts to change. You watch what you eat. Your sleeping patterns change.

"It very demanding on these guys."

The competitors are disciplined, said Capt. John Serafini, 11th Infantry Regiment. They endure many hardships during the competition.

"This is the most physically demanding thing I've ever done," Serafini said.

The challenges are just as tough mentally as they are physically, said Lt. Col. David Pound, Ranger Training Brigade executive officer. Each year the competition is changed to challenge the mental toughness of the competitors.

"A lot of this competition is psychological," Pound said. "We want to throw in enough twists to even the playing field. We try to take these guys out of their comfort zone."

Experienced competitors may have an advantage during the competition, so extending an event, like the road march or adding an additional event, tries to equal out the advantages an experienced competitor may have over a first-time competitor, he said.

"Experience was the biggest thing I've found in helping me succeed," Oakes said, who competed three times prior to winning the title. "Experience leads to success."

On the other hand every year is different and this year was no exception.

This year the fitness test required the competitors do sit-ups immediately following their pushups, which didn't allow the participants any time to catch their breath and took them by surprise, Pound said.

The road march was also changed. Instead of marching 20 miles, a mark many of the competitors thought was the finish of the march, the march was extended an additional three miles.

"It threw the dynamics off the guys who thought they would stick with the pack," said Sgt. Anthony Mayne, competitor from 3rd Battalion, 75th Ranger Regiment. "When the pack didn't make it, it hurt a lot of the competitors."

competition becomes a family affair

Story and photos by Bridgett Siter

Billing themselves "the people's team" for no other reason than it looked good on paper, Staff Sgt. Justin Trenary and 1st Lt. Scott Gilpatrick proved to be just that. Black T-shirts dotted the crowd of spectators at every event of the Best Ranger Competition, proclaiming 2002 the year of "the people's team."

Trenary designed the T-shirts, which featured caricatures of the duo, and nearly 30 family members and fans donned them every day as they tracked their team's success at every event.

"There were plenty of times I would've liked to call it quits, but knowing they were there waiting for me to make it kept me going," Trenary said. "That's motivation. They pushed us to do our best."

Family support is crucial to the success of any team, Trenary said. Competitors typically begin training several months before the competition, and the long, grueling hours of PT sometimes infringe upon family time.

"We don't fight, but let me tell you, when he missed my birthday last year, it was a big one," said Lori Gilpatrick, whose husband, Scott, finished fourth, along with Trenary. "I had never even seen a competition, and I had no idea how big it was. I really resented the time he spent away. I just thought it was a major inconvenience.

"Then I went to it to watch him, and it was incredible. I was never more proud of him. I wanted him to win more than anything," said Lori, who has two children, 5-year-old Conner and 19-month-old Hadley. "The day it was over, we both said 'Next year.'"

Lori, who calls herself "only a mediocre military wife," because she "hates it when he's gone," was much more supportive this time around. She stocked the kitchen with healthy foods — lots of carbohydrates, lean meats, peanut butter and fruit — and took care of the lawn work so her husband could train.

"I hate mowing," she laughed. "But whatever it takes. This year I was all about the competition."

> "She sacrificed so much so I could do it. For so long it was my whole focus. The next couple of months are all about her."
> Capt. Chip Colbert
> Best Ranger competitor

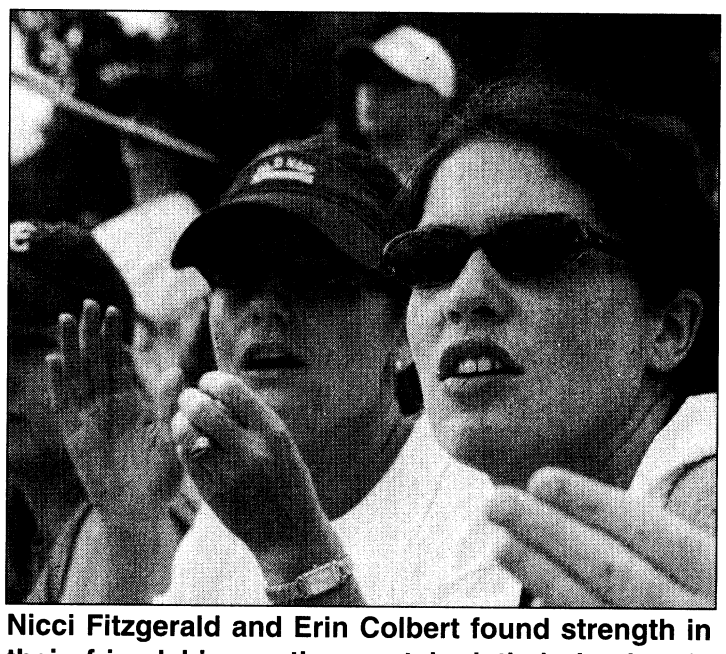
Capts. Chip Colbert and Shawn Fitzgerald trained incessantly for three months prior to last weekend's event. Colbert said he trained with a mental image of his wife and parents waiting at the finish line.

"And when it was time for the buddy run, we knew we'd have to win to take third. Shawn said 'This is it. They're waiting at the line.' That was my motivation," said Colbert.

Colbert said his wife's support was "unbelievable."

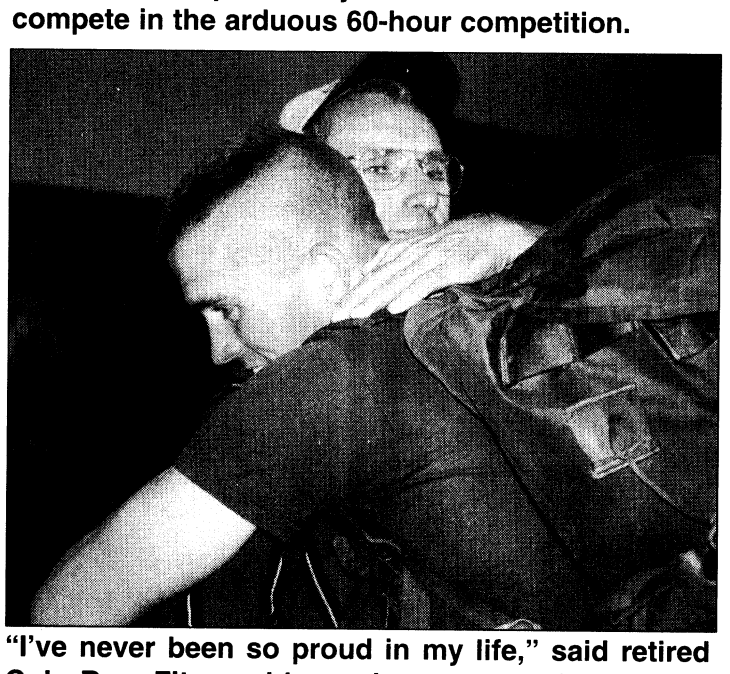
"She sacrificed so much so I could do it. For so long it was my whole focus," he said. "The next couple of months are all about her — anything she wants to do, even shopping. And I hate shopping."

Erin Colbert said the Best Ranger Competition was "a lot of fun, but torture at the same time."



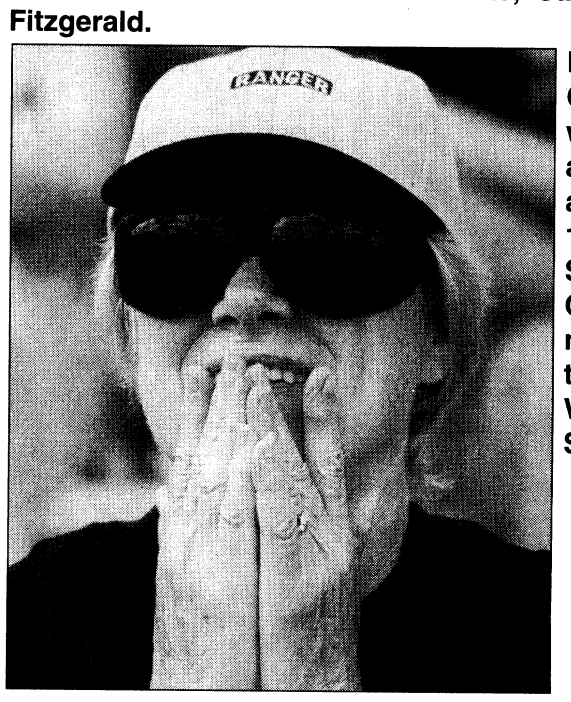
"I'm such a wreck," she said as she watched her husband compete in Saturday's Ranger Stakes. "I didn't know it would be this bad. I can't eat. I can't sleep. This is agony."

Darcey Trenary said following her husband from event to event took its toll on her nerves also.



"I had nightmares last night, something crazy about running all over the place," she said Saturday, as she watched her husband head out on the land navigation course.

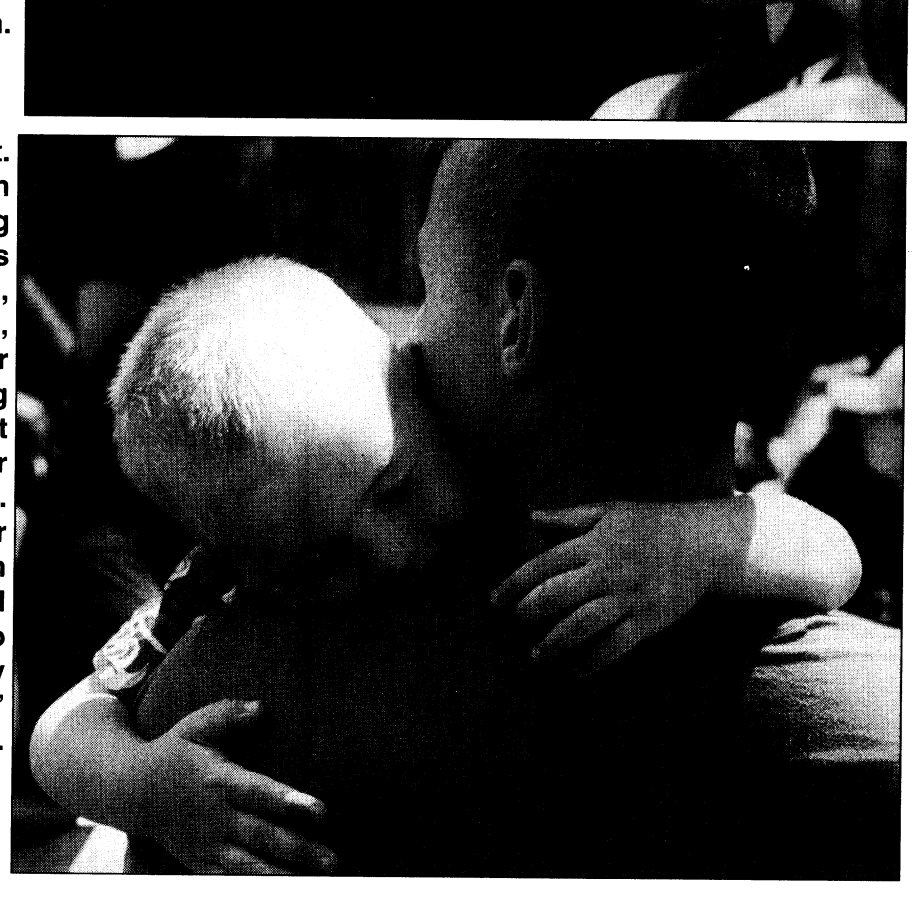
"Yeah, we didn't expect to be running around like this," said Bob Gilpatrick, who travelled from Daytona Beach, Fla., to watch his son compete. "But that's OK. It's worth it. I don't believe I've ever seen him so dedicated to anything in his life.



"I'm proud of him. I'm proud of him. Never been prouder. That pretty much sums it up."

Nicci Fitzgerald and Erin Colbert found strength in their friendship as they watched their husbands compete in the arduous 60-hour competition.

"I've never been so proud in my life," said retired Col. Ray Fitzgerald, as he greeted Capt. Chip Colbert at the end of the the buddy run. Fitzgerald is the father of Colbert's teammate, Capt. Shawn Fitzgerald.



Dianne Gilpatrick watches anxiously as her son, 1st Lt. Scott Gilpatrick, navigates the Log Walk Sunday.

"She's great," said Lori Gilpatrick, of Darcey Trenary, left. The two women forged a friendship when their husbands teamed for the competition.

Day One

Begining the 20th annual Best Ranger Competition, competitors started out with an Army Physical Fitness Test. They ran the Malvesti Run, which is about a five-mile run with a swim. The competitiors ran three miles, swam 300 meters and ran another two miles. When they reached their destination, they cleared a room using close quarters combat techniques. From there, the teams were airlifted to a drop zone and jumped from 1,500 feet. Following that, they shot weapons at targets and began a road march that finished on the second day.

Capt. Christopher Shipley, 3rd Infantry Division, finishes the swim during the Malvesti Run. The swim was a little more than 300 meters or six laps in an Olympic size pool.

participants were knocked out of the competition during the road march event. Only 15 teams remained out of the original 47.

So strategies paid off for a few teams who used the march to move up in the standings, Mayne said.

"We moved up in the standings and ran our race," he said. "We were not concerned about what the other teams were doing and continued with what we were doing."

After completing the event many of the teams were worn down and not fully recovered by the second day.

"You can recover from the first day of events," Oakes said. "The road march is where it really starts. It will settle everything."

After the road march, the leaders were Capt. Duane Patin and Staff Sgt. Daniel Jenkins from the 5th Ranger Training Battalion.

The team held the lead throughout the remainder of events and never looked back. On the final day, 12 teams were anxious to finish, Mayne said. Although Jenkins and Patin had pretty much sealed the deal to be dubbed the 2002 Best Ranger, the rest of the ranger competitors lived by their creed and fought on to complete their mission.

"It feels like we accomplished something," Mayne said. "It's a personal achievement, but the experience is the biggest factor."

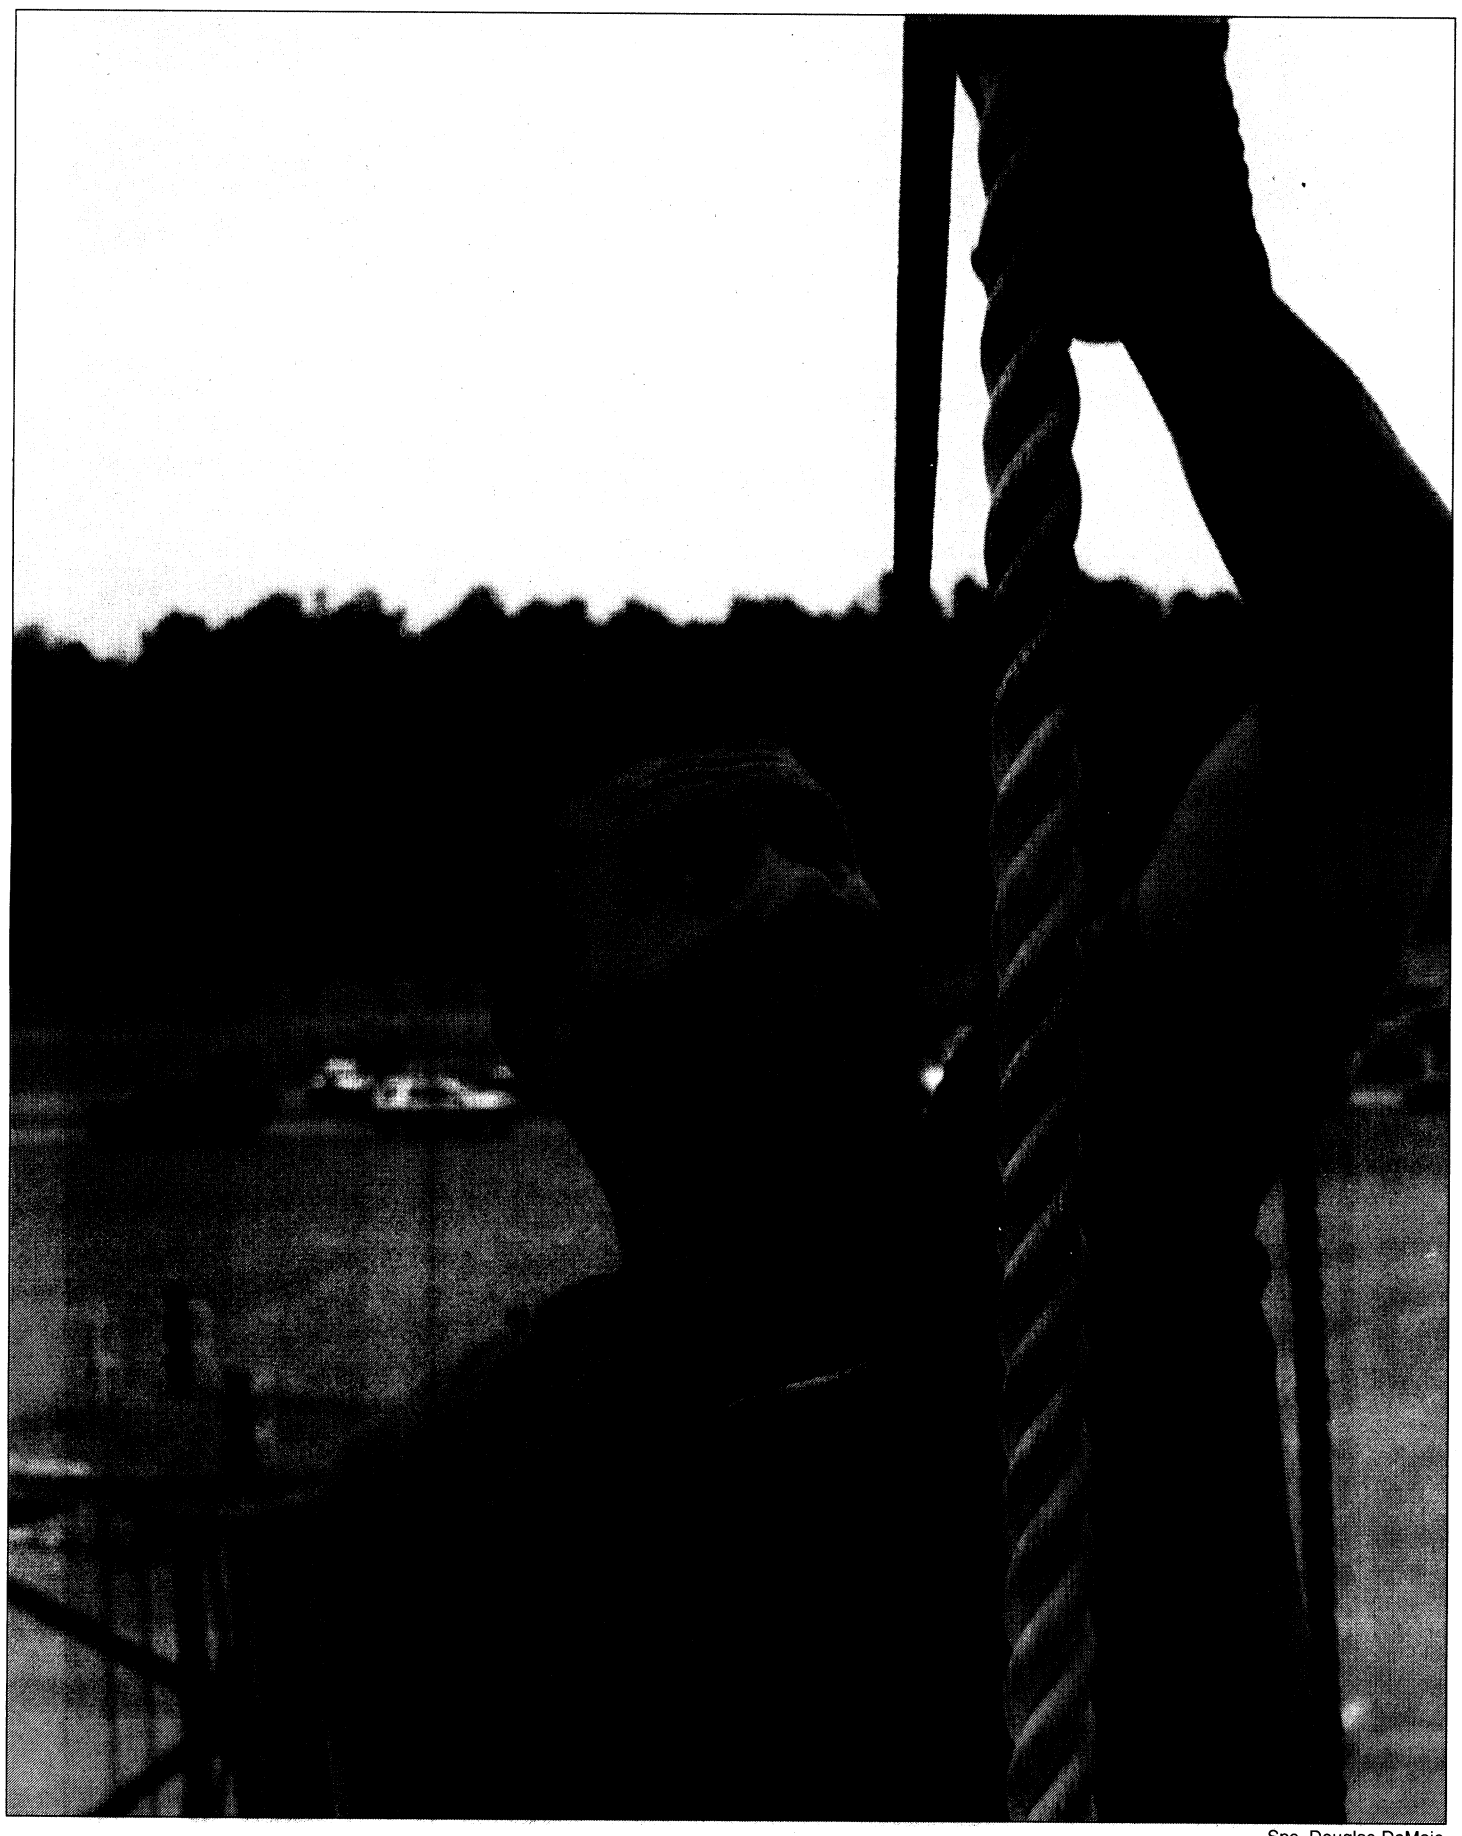
The Army's goal for the competition is to display some of the finest tactical and technical soldiers in the world and to allow the ranger participants to incorporate what they have learned in the competition and teach their platoons the knowledge they've gained, Pound said.

"It highlights the best two-man-buddy team," Pound said. "In their own right, they are world-class athletes.

"They are the best of the best."

Gen. Eric K. Shinseki, Army chief of staff, felt the same way, as he spoke at the award ceremony.

"It is a test of will," Shinseki said of the competition. "Trust and teamwork are demands of the Ranger Creed and you will all take these lessons learned back to your units."



In a way, sharing their knowledge with their units is like contributing to a big family, said Maj. Gen. Paul Eaton, post commanding general, who has known the second-place winners, Capt. Jeffrey VanAntwerp and 1st Lt. Lucas VanAntwerp, since they were kids.

"This competition is part of a great, big family," Eaton said. "The family is part of the U.S. Army. Mothers, daughters, dads, wives, sons and girlfriends are all celebrating in this incredible competition."

Day Three

The third day began with land navigation. After that, the teams moved to Victory Pond where they compete in a water obstacle course. Then they were air lifted to the middle of Victory pond for the Helocast. They dropped from the helicopter and swam 150 meters to the shore line. They finished the competition with the three-mile buddy run and the day was celebrated with family and friends at the "super supper."

Marksmen teach women gun safety

AMU teaches handgun fundamentals

Bridgett Siter
Special to the Bayonet©

Nine times out of 10, women shoot better than men their first time out — a bit of trivia brought to you by Sgt. 1st Class Roger Jacobson, of Fort Benning's Army Marksmanship Unit.

The reason women make better shooters, Jacobson said, is that women make better students.

"He tends to think he knows it already. She's willing to listen and learn," Jacobson said.

Listen and learn they did. Twenty-six women from Fort Benning and Atlanta learned the basics of handgun safety from Jacobson and his AMU cohorts Saturday at English Range, during a daylong gun safety course.

The class is conducted annually and sponsored by Fort Benning's Rifle and Pistol Club. But this was the first time the course was instructed by soldiers from the marksmanship unit.

"Not everybody is aware that we teach," said Sgt. 1st Class Charles Gibbs, of the AMU's service pistol unit. "We travel and shoot and compete, but we also teach the fundamentals of marksmanship and safety to soldiers, civilians, law enforcement officers and, like this one, classes geared toward women in particular."

The first lesson women need to learn about handling firearms is this — don't learn to shoot from your husband or boyfriend, said Jim Graham, of the club.

"Typically husbands don't make good teachers, even if they're qualified to teach. It's the dynamics of the relationship," he said. "I certainly don't recommend it."

But husbands are the ones bringing home the guns, and more and more Fort Benning families have some form of firearm in their quarters, Graham said.

"September 11 was a watershed for the firearms industry. There's been an infinite number of guns sold in this area. And husbands tend to buy handguns for their wives before they deploy.

"For whatever reason, there are a lot of pistols out there in these quarters. If they're going to have them, they need to handle them safely," Graham said.

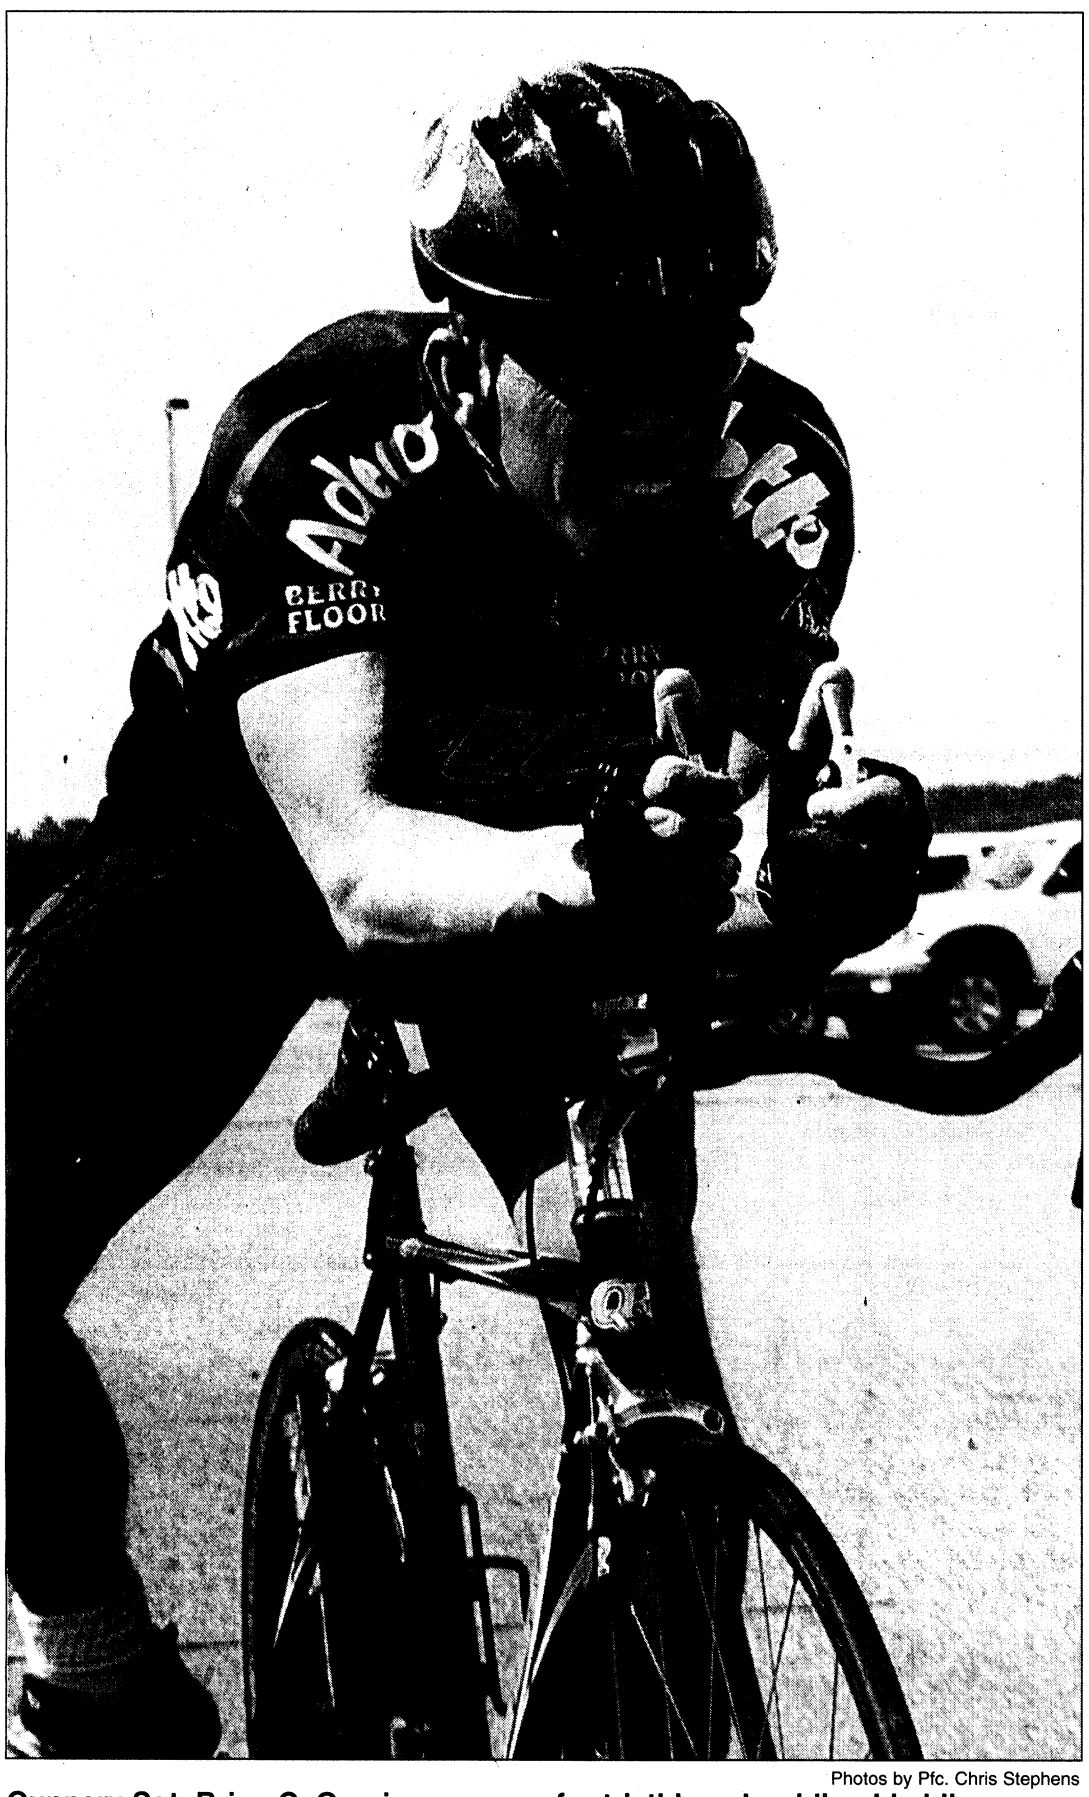
Gun safety means handling the firearm safely and comfortably, said Ray Arrendondo, coach for the AMU's service pistol unit.

"It doesn't do any good to have a gun in the house if you're afraid of it," said Arrendondo, who taught the women how to recognize different types of guns and ammunitions, how to load and unload handguns, how to grip the gun and how to stand, kneel or lie while firing.

The students, most of whom had very limited exposure to firearms, took turns shooting targets at 15 yards.

They practiced slow firing, double taps (firing twice rapidly), antiarmor shots (hitting body parts not covered by a bullet-proof vest), right- and left-handed shooting, shooting from the waist and firing from various positions.

Nancy Lin was once a competitive shooter. She was on her high school's pistol and rifle team in China.



"But that was many years ago. I haven't picked a gun up since," said Lin, who learned of the class from a coworker in Atlanta.

"Apparently I haven't forgotten how to do it," she said, pointing down range to her bullet-riddled target. "Maybe I'll check into this. I might like to compete again."

'Gunny' prepares for triathlon Nationals

Single parent works hard to achieve

Pfc. Chris Stephens

Gunnery Sgt. Brian C. Grenier is not afraid of a good challenge.

The 1st of the 507th soldier handles the challenges of single parenthood, while juggling his military job and his favorite pasttime — triathlons.

"They're a great way to enjoy the open air and get a workout and get in shape," he said.

Grenier is using his "workouts" to prepare for the Nationals in Cour d' Alene, Idaho.

"I've been training for a long time for the Nationals, and I know I am ready for it. I'm going there to do my best, but win or lose, I know my children will still be proud of me," said Grenier, of his children, Steven and Sarah.

The children "put up with a lot," while their father trains, "but they encourage me and always tell me they're proud of me," said Grenier,

Grenier said his children are his number one priority, but he has to concentrate on his technique during each event.

"Technique is key in the triathlon, especially during training, because if you do it in training, then you'll do it in the race."

"Everything is a mind game," he said. "If you tell yourself you can do it, then you will do it. I've told myself many times I will make Nationals and now look, I'm doing it.

"I'm achieving a goal I have worked hard for, but I couldn't have done it all on my own," he said, crediting his children for their support and encouragement.

Grenier needs donations to help him get to Nationals.

For more information on triathlons, triathlon races or to help Grenier go to Nationals, e-mail him at thegreniergroup@cs.com.

Post to have archery tournament

Charlie Dove stays on his game by practicing at the archery range Monday.

Fort Benning Archery club reopens

Pfc. Brian Trapp
Bayonet staff

The Fort Benning Archery Club has reopened and is scheduled to sponsor a public archery tournament.

The Fort Benning Archery Championship tournament will begin at 9 a.m. and run through 3:30 p.m. Sunday and participants can sign up on site.

There will be shooting divisions for all skill levels and ages, from children to professionals.

Children younger than 12 compete for free and will receive a medallion.

"It's a good sport for kids to get into," said Charlie Dove, club member. "Archery is a sport for young and old."

The course will be a walking trail with 3-D targets; 20 targets will be at unknown distances and 10 at known distances.

"We put on an entertaining tournament, we try to make it so it's challenging but not too difficult for people competing," said Brian Dansby, Fort Benning Archery Club president.

The membership and entry fees go toward targets and maintaining the archery range.

"We're not out here to make a profit, we're here to have fun and be part of the club," Dansby said.

Dove started bow hunting deer with some friends for a couple of seasons, then they invited him to a 3-D archery course.

"I used to fish before I started archery, and I haven't been bass fishing for about three years now," Dove said.

"It's an individual sport, but you make such good friends from doing it you would barely notice."

"The fellowship from shooting with other people is one of the biggest reasons to join an archery club," Dove said. "It's a real family-oriented sport."

One of the reasons for joining is the availability of the same type of 3-D targets used in national tournaments, which can cost hundreds of dollars, but the members get them for the price of membership.

The archery club also is planning on putting on clinics for hunters, children and lady archers, Dansby said.

The tournament entry fee is $10 for youth and novice classes, $20 for the Big Money competition and $15 for all other classes.

Family memberships cost $45 and individual memberships cost $35. There are military and Archery Shooters Association members.

Archery Range is located on Aldrich Road in the Harmony Church area of Fort Benning.

Darby's Rangers prepare for season

Softball team smacks down opposition

Spc. Douglas DeMaio
Bayonet staff

Darby's Rangers, 4th Ranger Training Battalion, defeated the Free Agents, B Company, 2nd Battalion, 29th Infantry Regiment, 15-11, in the U.S. Army Infantry Center annual Spring Softball Tournament at Gowdy Field April 20.

The tournament prepared the defending post champs for the season ahead of them, said Darby's Rangers' coach Tom Siter. It helped the team settle into their positions and gave the coach a chance to determine the skill level of this year's players.

"We have almost the same team as we did last year," Siter said. "There's a lot of veterans on our team who have played in competitive leagues."

Throughout the tournament, the team averaged 16 runs per game and batted a .600 average.

The Free Agents were offensively productive even though they had two days of practice before the tournament, said Free Agents' left centerfield, David Gray.

"The tournament helped us understand what we need to work on and how we were batting," Gray said. "Not knowing the players all to well and not having practiced hindered our performance on the field."

> "I wasn't going to expect anything less of them than winning the tournament."
> Tom Siter
> Coach

While the Free Agents were trying to find their identity, Darby's Rangers' offense was rolling and the coach was pleased with the production on the offensive end, he said.

"We wanted to concentrate on our offense," Siter said. "If you don't score the runs, you're not going to win the game.

"I wasn't going to expect anything less of them than winning the tournament."

Greg Hager, Darby's Rangers' second baseman, felt the team was confident in its ability to win, but was relieved to win the title, he said.

"All the teams were really good and everybody wants to win," Hager said.

The athleticism of the team contributed to the success on the field, Hager said.

The team is deep in many of the positions on the field, but feel they are well backed with their pitching, Siter said.

"We have one of the best pitchers on post," he said. "He puts it across the plate every time."

"These players know what is expected and are ready to play every time."

Continuing their dominance this season in all aspects of the game is part of the plan, Hager said.

"Everyone has a lot of pride and wants to continue the trend," he said.

However, their path to success this season will travel through the Free Agents, who will avenge their loss, Gray said.

Soldiers from 1st Battalion, 30th Infantry Regiment, returned from Kosovo Tuesday evening to a cheering crowd of mothers, wives, daughters and sons.

Family members attended a ceremony at Kefurt Gym to welcome the soldiers back and recognize them for a superb job in their peace-keeping mission.

"They feel like they were serving a purpose there," said Brig. Gen. Lloyd Austin, assistant division commander of maneuver for 3rd Infantry Division. "I think they did, and we're glad to have them back."

So are the families and girlfriends of the soldiers, said Tandra Smith. Life can be very demanding when a spouse is deployed.

"If you take care of the whole house by yourself, it's hard." Smith said. "I'm in desperate need of a vacation."

Smith's children are involved in sports, Girl Scouts and school activities, so having help is a relief, she said.

The soldiers were in Kosovo for six months.

"It's a little lonely," said Pfc. Mathew Casterline. "It would be nice to have someone here waiting for me.

A reserve unit based in Florida is deploying only 500 miles from home, but a world away, to Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

The 160th MP Battalion, Headquarters Company (Enemy Prisoner of War-Civilian Internee) advance party will leave post soon, followed by the remainder the company for an undetermined amount of time.

The Tallahassee, Fla., based unit was alerted on Christmas Day they were going to be activated for a year starting Jan. 7. They were originally deploying for a mission in Afghanistan, but the

New security measures behind changes

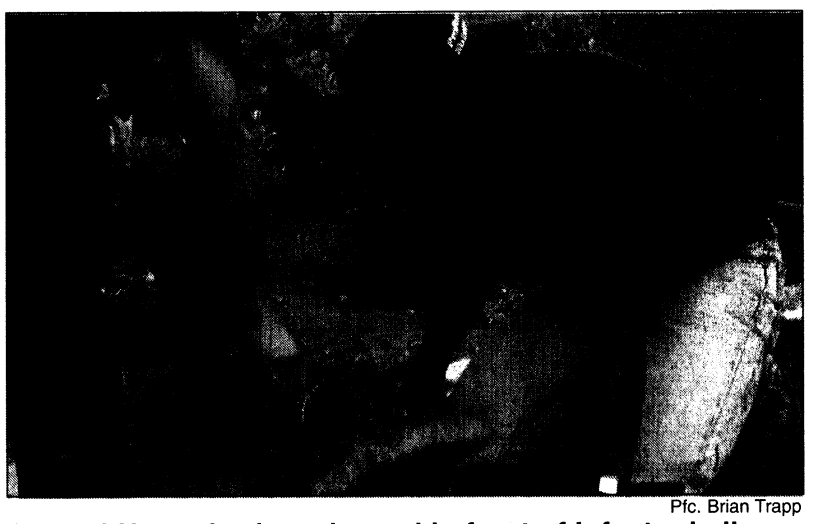
If you've walked by the outside of Infantry Hall lately, you may have wondered what all the buzz is about.



Buzzing is literally what you will hear as the sounds of tree trimmers and trucks full of sod modernize the landscape around Infantry Hall.

"You never get a second chance to make a first impression," said Don Campbell, landscape architect with French and Associates. "This is the Home of the Infantry, and it's often the first place visitors ask to see when they come to Fort Benning."

When the post placed protection barriers around Infantry Hall shortly after Sept. 11, Campbell said the plants and trees around the building were destroyed.

That's when engineers from Fort Benning decided it was time to give Infantry Hall a new look that would express the pride of the post.

Super spouses spotted here

Laura Martinson

COMMENTARY

Military personnel may very well be the least appreciated workers in the universe. And running a close second, always by the side of the ones they hold dearest, is the military spouse.

So, for all the military spouses do in support of a husband, wife, and country, one week in May is set aside each year to honor their contributions.

Which leads me to ponder, why exactly our spouses, the steadfast soldiers, appreciate us.

Is it because we can readily identify terms and acronyms unheard of to the average civilian? Is it because we can spit shine boots and iron enough starch into a uniform to make it stand on its own two legs?

Perhaps it's our delicate appreciation for the finer things in life. Take my next door neighbor. She'd rather slap a rucksack on her back and push her stroller alongside her husband in a little heated competition as opposed to trading it all in for an exclusive ladies' gym. Now that's what I call a real woman.

My husband might suggest he "appreciates" my ability to multitask. Now I can't speak for all military families, but my husband can and will do everything to complete the mission down to the last detail. Let's face it, military spouses have a different mission entirely, and we have little choice but to succeed. After all, if we don't multitask, the kids and dogs will starve, the bill collectors will start calling, the PT shorts won't get washed and the grass will grow to cover the windows. So when my husband suggested the other day I'm Superwoman, I had to laugh to myself. He only says that because I know where all the children's clothes go.

But I'd say I'm surrounded by military spouses who raise the bar for all who follow. They, in fact, are Superwomen in their own rite.

My friend Ce, an accountant by education and trade, has to be the most resourceful woman I've ever met. She is a one-stop shop for everything from screws for a swing set to chicken broth. And if she doesn't have it or know how to make it, she knows where to find it for next to nothing. Ce can also make a delicious meal out of just about anything, so if all you have left in your cupboards is peanut butter, mustard and olives, just give her a call. She'll know just what to do with it. And if your lawn mower won't start, well, she's your gal.

Laura, besides having my favorite name, has more talents than I think she's aware. She can make a ball gown in 24 hours, bake a 10-layer cake in less than that, and give a fabulous cut, highlights and up-do in an hour. She juggles all of this along with the everyday tasks involved in being a ranger wife and mother while pursuing a degree in art history. Let's just say, multitasking is her specialty.

Candace has not only won the heart of my baby girl, but just about everyone she meets. An accomplished pianist, gardening wiz and avid bird watcher, she has an amazing warmth that endears her to children, birds and any stray cat that walks by. She juggles three children, two in soccer and her own piano lesson clientele and again, the day to day tasks that never seem to end around the schedule of her drill sergeant husband, whose hours are long and relentless. Now, she's heard the rumor that the drill sergeant tour is known as "divorce duty" because of all the hours spent apart. But she doesn't worry about that a bit. Never has. Superwomen just don't have time to worry about things like that.

Yes, it's the "job" of the military spouse to do many things at many times all the time. And the further along a career develops and the more kids, dogs, cats, birds, fish, iguanas you throw into the mix, well, the more there is to do. So, to all of those who do it and do it well, I salute you.

For the newcomers, don't worry, you'll be in over your head soon enough. And for the rest, I suggest a time management course and a couple pots of coffee. We've got our work cut out for us.

Bike rodeo to give free helmets

Elsie Jackson
USAIC Public Affairs Office

COMMENTARY

I've decided to quit harping on adults who bike without helmets. I've come to the conclusion that I'm wasting my breath. Besides, there's a need for organ donors and helmetless riders have great potential to fill that need.

If you're an adult and you want to bike without a helmet, completely disregarding post regulations, not to mention your personal safety, I say "Ride on." And in the event I am ever a transplant patient, let me take this opportunity now to say "thank you" from the bottom of your heart (or kidney or liver).

Children, though, are a different matter. Aside from post regulations that say everyone riding a bicycle needs to wear a helmet, Georgia and Alabama law requires helmets for children, age 16 and younger riding bikes.

If a bicyclist wearing a helmet properly is involved in an accident, their risk of a head injury is reduced by 85 percent and the risk of brain injury is reduced by as much as 88 percent. Helmets also provide protection to foreheads and faces.

Do you need more incentive to slap a properly fitted helmet on your child?

How about this?

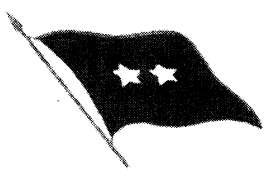
Your children, 15 years old and younger, can get a NEW HELMET for FREE between noon and 2 p.m. Saturday at the annual Safe Kids Bike Rodeo.

This year's rodeo will be held at the Hughston Sports Medicine Center, 6262 Veterans Parkway.

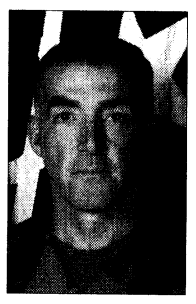
All you have to do to get a NEW HELMET for FREE is show up.

Not only can children get a NEW HELMET for FREE, the event sponsors will make sure that it is a good fit. They'll show you and your child how the NEW HELMET they will give you FREE should be worn.

Bring the bikes and trikes, too, for a free safety inspection. After their wheels get checked, your kids can wear the NEW HELMET they got for FREE as they weave their way through a safe biking course.



If you ride without a helmet, pay close attention when the people from the Safe Kids Coalition drop a cantaloupe on the pavement to show why you should.



If it changes your opinion about helmets and you start wearing one, you'll be setting a great example for your children.

Then they'll come away from the afternoon with more than just a NEW HELMET that they got for FREE.

For more information about the Safe Kids Bike Rodeo, and the FREE HELMETS, call the Safe Kids, Columbus Coalition at 321-6183.

Post recognizes spouses's help

President Ronald Reagan proclaimed May 23, 1984, the first Military Spouse Day. The following year, the Secretary of Defense standardized Military Spouse Day as the Friday preceding Mother's Day. In keeping with that important tradition, this year we will recognize and honor our military spouses today.

Since the earliest days of this nation's history, spouses of those who serve have made their own unique sacrifices. Their contributions to the ideals of patriotism, service, family and freedom are immeasurable and enduring.

This special occasion allows us to recognize the commitment of the Army's spouses and celebrate their critical role in the vitality of our nation and the well-being of our people — soldiers, civilians, retirees, veterans and their families.

Army spouses bring qualities of strength, of resilience and of leadership to the home, to businesses and to their communities around the world. When our families must endure times of separation, they act as both mother and father, and they compassionately mentor and care for others in need. Now, as our soldiers fight the war on terrorism, our spouses provide support, encouragement and a sense of stability with the same courage and profound dedication that has become their legacy, reminding us that sometimes courage resides outside our ranks, as well as within.

So everyday, and especially today — Military Spouse Day — do not forget the devotion and pride that the Army spouse represents and take time to demonstrate your gratitude. Everywhere there is an Army family — whether active, guard or reserve — there is a community made stronger by the example and contributions of the Army spouse.

Fort Benning to remember war dogs

To recognize military working dogs, also known as war dogs that have served in combat operations with their handlers in World War II, the Korean conflict and the Vietnam War; and are wartime heroes, I designate May 11 as War Dog Day at Fort Benning.

The dogs were trained to save lives by alerting on snipers, booby traps, mines, tunnels and weapons caches, by following enemy trails, by warning troops about ambushes and other enemy troop movements, and by guarding military installations.

Although most of their handlers returned home, many of these canine soldiers were declared "surplus armaments" and were either euthanized or left to unknown fates.

We welcome the handlers and their families and friends as they gather at 1 p.m. Saturday at the War Dog Memorial on Sacrifice Field.

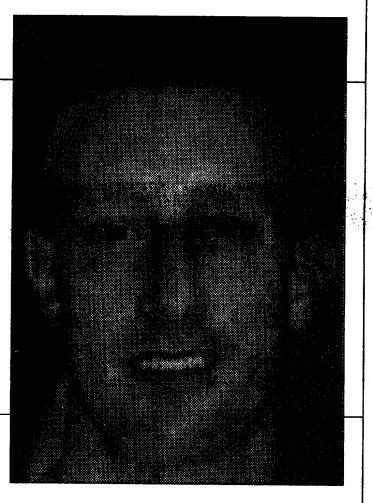
VARIOUS VOICES

Why do you appreciate your military spouse?



Cpl. Kendra Bannach, 1st Battalion, 11th Infantry Regiment — "Because my husband is in the military, he understands the demands and long hours of the job, even though his job is more demanding."

Sgt. 1st Class Frederick Harris, 3rd Brigade — "My wife's been supporting me for 16 years. She always makes sure everything's taken care of and does all she can to improve our life, all while having her own job."

Sgt. Jennifer Marquez, 1st Battalion, 29th Infantry Regiment — "My husband pushes me to strive, and go to the board and get promoted. When we had our son, he was very supportive of me staying in the Army, because I just didn't want to get out."

Spc. Travis West, 3rd Ranger Battalion, 75th Ranger Regiment — "She's very tolerant of the lifestyle the military brings, like when I went to Ranger School, being separated and being 18 hours away from home."

Laurie Glemser, family member — "I appreciate his understanding the things I go through, especially the traveling and being separated from my family. He takes time out for me when I need it."

Naomi Jackson, family member — "My husband's retired and he's home now — I appreciate that. I understood when he signed the contract he belonged to Uncle Sam. I knew about all his training. Now he gets to help with the things that I've done when he was in the Army."

Soldiers: Patrol Macedonia, Serbia borders, come home guys come back to see their family and girlfriends."

Jennifer O'Dell drove 15 hours from Waco, Texas, to see her boyfriend.

"We've been dating ever since he went to basic training," O'Dell said. "Talking to him every other day really helped our relationship.

"It's funny. While they're here, you can talk for hours about nothing, but when they're gone and you only have a half hour to talk once every four days, it makes you think about what is important to the both of you."

What was important for many of the soldiers was coming back to their children, said Staff Sgt. Shawn Crane. Seeing children in Kosovo surely reminded soldiers of their own families back home.

"Kids would always hang around our post, and they would know your name," Casterline said.

Some soldiers spent time in Kosovo teaching kids English, and the citizens appreciated all the support and protection from the American soldiers, he said.

"You would drive through the streets, and they made you feel like the most important person around," Casterline said.

Soldiers patrolled the boarders of Macedonia and Serbia to protect ethnic Albanians in Kosovo against the smuggling of weapons and drugs and immigration into the Balkans country, Casterline said. The soldiers received intense training to prepare them for their mission, but the situation in Kosovo never escalated to the level for which soldiers prepared.

"The training helped," said Sgt. Felix Ceja. "Everything was subject to change, and it did."

During the training, eight to 10 soldiers guarded a check point. While in Kosovo, they had only four per check point.

"The deployment was very squad- and team-oriented," Ceja said. "I worked with my team exclusively."

These sort of situations helped soldiers understand how their fellow soldiers think and will benefit the battalion in war time situations, Crane said. As a result, the esprit de corps within the unit is at an all-time high.

The soldiers did a great job, Austin said.

"We went there and did what we had to do. Now we're done," Ceja said. "Hopefully we can get some rest and relaxation while we're back."

MPs: Prepare for deployment to Guantanamo Bay mission changed.

The reservists have been training and working on Fort Benning for four months while waiting to deploy to Guantanamo Bay.

The company specializes in handling prisoners and refugees, said Capt. Scott McGaha, personnel officer with the company, and a U.S. marshal in North Florida. "There's no active-duty unit like us."

Many of the MPs in the company are police officers or corrections officers in their civilian lives and deal with prisoners more often.

"I think this is a better mission for reservists," McGaha said. "We are more experienced with handling prisoners than some MPs."

As reservists, there's always a possibility of being deployed, but we're ready for it when it happens," said Spc. Kim Metzger, an engineer with the company, who will be maintaining the camp and assessing it for possible security breeches. The unit has trained for prisoner transport, prisoner restraint and riot control in the last four months to help prepare for the deployment.

"I feel confident about the mission because of the people I'm going with," said Spc. Nicholas Leone. "I'm excited to get to go do something to help the effort against terrorism."

During their time on Fort Benning, soldiers worked with the Directorate of Public Safety performing security details and vehicle registration.

"Fort Benning has done a really good job of putting us up and taking care of our needs," McGaha said.

Even with the holdover, spirits seem high in anticipation of the deployment.

"It's a once in a lifetime experience," McGaha said. "You don't get a long-term detainee camp like that set up every day."

Dogs: Save more than 10,000 lives in Vietnam

Handler Recognition Day. The proclamation honors American military working dogs and their handlers.

One of the monuments unveiled will be that of Robert Willard Hartsock, a wardog handler with the 44th Infantry Platoon (Scout Dog), 3rd Brigade, 25th Infantry Division, and the only Medal of Honor recipient from a Scout Dog unit, said Frank Hanner, director National Infantry Museum.

Hartsock earned a Medal of Honor for his actions in Hau Nghia Province, Republic of Vietnam, where he fought off enemy soldiers to protect the lives of his fellow soldiers.

Also added to the memorial will be five pedestals representing the various war dog units, which are infantry-platoon scout dogs, combat-tracker teams, sentry-dog teams, patrol-dog teams, and mine, booby-trap and tunnel-dog teams.

"Military dogs are a huge part in the war on drugs, fighting domestic and international terrorism and homeland security," according to the book, Dogtags of Courage, by retired Master Sgt. John C. Burnam.

"In Vietnam, war dogs saved lives by alerting American soldiers of snipers, booby traps, mines, tunnels and weapon caches. More than 10,000 American lives were saved in Vietnam because of the war dogs."

The war dogs also served the country during World War II and the Korean War.

The National Infantry Museum will open at 10 a.m. in time for the dedication of the pedestals and monument which will take place in a public ceremony on Sacrifice Field at 1 p.m.

The exhibit is open to the public. For more information, call the museum at 545-2958.

Grass: Landscape beautification part of modern Infantry

"About two dozen trees and a variety of beautiful flowers will align the sidewalk of the building," Campbell said. "We're going to put in a colored deck around the Follow Me statue and some cherry trees around the flag poles. It will be a formal, uniform look that fits the image of the Infantry."

Campbell will also plant yellow and orange day lilies, red and white annuals, and crepe myrtles during the next few weeks.

Campbell should finish the project just in time for many of the change of command ceremonies that are planned for this month.

"Many of the traditional ceremonies of the are held right outside this building," said Craig Taylor, Chief of Engineering with the Directorate of Facilities Engineering and Logistics. "The new look is going to enhance the beauty of the statue and the importance of Infantry Hall."

The changes to Infantry Hall are just a start in a string of landscape changes to be seen around post.

"As the security around our buildings becomes better so will the landscaping," Taylor said. "This is all in step with modernizing the look of Fort Benning."

"You want to be proud you're in the Infantry so the landscaping around our buildings should reflect that," Campbell said. "And I assure you, it definitely will."

Career fair opens doors for soldiers

AUSA brings employers to Benning

Angela Sachitano
Special to the Bayonet©

Every few years, the same question arises for many soldiers.

Many men and women want to know what the civilian world can offer them if they decide to get out of the Army.

The annual Association of the U.S. Army Career Fair brings close to a hundred employers to Fort Benning from around the country to answer that very question.

"These employers are not coming here unless they have job openings," said Bruce Tait, the local Georgia Veterans Employment representative. "They are looking for a variety of skill levels, ranks and education."

The AUSA Job Fair is unique among other job fairs on post because it doesn't only deal with employers in the local community.

Dozens of companies from cities around the nation will be on hand looking for former military personnel.

"Only 20 percent of our military stay in Columbus after they get out of the Army," Tait said. "That's why it's extremely important we give our soldiers the opportunity to see what is out there for them, wherever they decide to go."

Employers will be interviewing men and women from 9 a.m to 2 p.m. May 23 in Infantry Hall.

All soldiers interested must bring at least 20 copies of their resume.

"Dress is also extremely important," Tait said. "Wear duty uniform or other appropriate clothing that emphasizes your professionalism."

Spouses are also a target of many employers. Tait said there are several businesses, local and national, of which working spouses can take advantage.

"These companies know the quality of our military families," Tait said. "They know these me, and women are willing to sacrifice and work hard for the better of the team. "

Last year, the AUSA Career Fair put more than 2,300 soldiers and spouses in touch with employers.

"The changes in the economy have made things a little more competitive out there," Tait said. "But the employers at this career fair have positions to fill. These companies may be the jumpstart into the civilian world."

Spouses can get help with their resumes from Mark Mills, Employee Readiness Manager at 545-2836.

Hometown recruiting boosts enlistment numbers

Initiative sends soldiers home for 2 weeks

Staff Sgt. Marcia Triggs
Army News Service

WASHINGTON — A recruiting initiative that sends Advanced Individual Training graduates back home to tell the Army's story continues to boost enlistment numbers.

"The Hometown Recruiter Assistance Program remains effective because new recruits can give their peers an up-to-date perspective on what Army life is like," said Sgt. 1st Class Jason Schenkel, a recruiting station commander in Holland, Mich.

More than 30,000 soldiers participated in the program in fiscal 2001, and the Army credits 1,687 enlistments to HRAP, said Army recruiting officials. This fiscal year, more than 14,000 soldiers have participated in HRAP, and 571 enlistments have been made so far, officials said.

Schenkel credits two enlistment contracts this fiscal year to HRAP at his station, but he said there's no way to quantify the rapport the 22-year-old program helps build among the recruiters and the community.

"When the community — schools, churches, neighbors — see that the young soldier is happy with the decision to become a soldier, the community starts to trust us more," Schenkel said. "They start to associate the Army with the soldier's success."

Selected soldiers can return home for up to 14 days, at no cost to the government, to assist recruiters.

The recruits bring friends and relatives to the station to learn about Army opportunities, or they escort recruiters to their former school for presentations.

Learning a skill that can be used in the civilian workforce is one of the most important benefits the Army offers, said Pvt. Benjamin Martinez, an HRAP participant, which is why Martinez said he pitches that the hardest when discussing Army benefits.

"When I talk to my friends, I tell them about the skills the Army gives you, the college benefits and the discipline and focus the Army helps you gain," Martinez said.

The 20-year-old recruit graduated from AIT at Fort Eustis, Va., as an OH-58 Kiowa Warrior repairer. He's participating in HRAP to help the recruiters that assisted him in paving the path for his future, he said.

Martinez enlisted in the Army in the GED Plus program, an initiative that requires non-high-school graduates to complete an attendance-based General Educational Development program, while serving in the Army's Delayed Entry Program.

Applicants who want to participate in the GED Plus program must score in the top half of the nation on the Armed Forces Qualification Tests, which measures the applicants' academic skills.

They must also score in the top 75 percent on the Assessment of Individual Motivation test, which measures dependability, adjustment, dominance, achievement orientation and agreeableness.

AIM is used as an attrition tool, officials said.

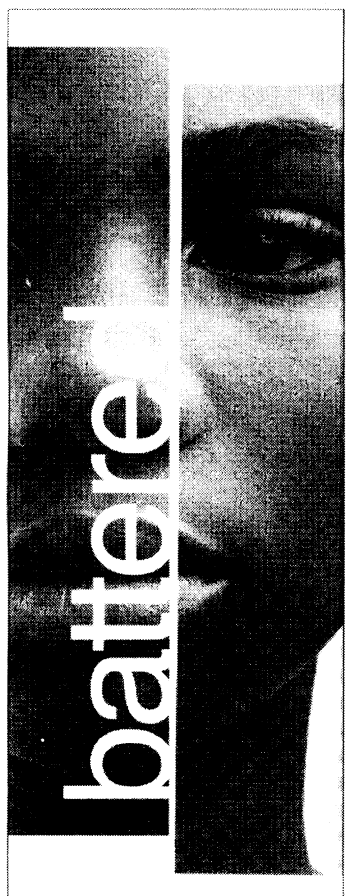
The test shows promise for improving the Army's capability to select applicants who are more likely to complete their obligated term of enlistment, officials said.

"The Army has a lot of programs to help young people get started in life," Schenkel said. "There are some people who would give up on a person without a degree or a GED, but the Army is here to give them an opportunity.

"HRAP gives us a chance to let a living example talk for us because my early experiences in the Army happened 10 years ago," Schenkel said.

After being back home a week, Martinez has already given recruiters seven possible leads.

Unlike some of his friends who are unsure about the Army right now, Martinez said he knew he wanted to join the Army, and he knew what he wanted to do.



"I just walked into the station, and when I saw that I could work in aviation, I just did what I had to do to become eligible and join," Martinez said. "I'm happy with my decision. I've learned a lot of discipline and focus, and that's what I tell my friends when I see them just hanging out on the streets."

Martinez's first duty station will be at Fort Carson, Colo., and he said he's looking forward to learning how to be a leader.

Just three years ago, the Army fell about 6,300 soldiers short of its recruiting goal of 74,500, and the Army Reserve was 10,300 below its goal of 52,084, Army Chief of Staff Gen. Eric K. Shinseki said to members of the House Committee on Armed Services. Reporting to the House on the Army's readiness, Shinseki said new recruiting initiatives sparked a year-end upturn in the number of enlistments.

In fiscal 2001, the Army met its goal of 75,800 recruits almost a month early. This fiscal year the active Army's mission is 79,500 of which 43,265 has been achieved, and the Army Reserve's mission is 28,825, and 19,325 has been achieved, according to USAREC officials.

Summer turnover affects hospital access

Hospital plans on hiring additional staff

Maj. Patrick Barrett
Martin Army Community Hospital

Every summer Martin Army Community Hospital, like all military organizations, experiences the summer turnover of soldiers.

For health-care providers and support staff, this creates a challenge due to an underlap of replacement personnel and the reassignment of enrolled patients to a new primary care manager.

The expected underlap is two months because of providers departing in late May and early June with their replacements not arriving until late July and early August.

Military deployments will further exacerbate the summer turnover of providers and support staff this year, said Col. Gale Pollock, Martin Army Community Hospital commander.

"We are actively recruiting civilian physicians and physician assistants to fill the void," said Lt. Col. Thomas P. Garigan, chief, Family Practice Community Care Services. "Physician assistants will treat the active-duty soldiers, freeing up appointments for family members. Work shifts are being implemented to provide evening hours for our patients."

> "We want our beneficiaries to know about our staffing issues and to know that we are doing everything possible to ensure their continued access to care."
> Col. Gale Pollock
> Martin Army Community Hospital commander.

The Aviation Family Practice Clinic is currently experiencing a 66 percent reduction in physician staffing.

Winder Family Practice Clinic, Aviation Family Practice Clinic, Pediatrics and Internal Medicine are all experiencing the effects of deployments.

The Pediatric Clinic is experiencing a 33 percent reduction in physician staffing and will reach an expected 50 percent reduction in July.

Two new providers will arrive in August, said Capt. Erin Leopold, Pediatric Services chief.

To meet the Tricare access standards, Martin Army Community Hospital is actively responding to these shortages through several means.

The hospital is hiring additional civilian and contract providers, nurses and support staff; however, it will take several months to recruit and hire new providers and staff.

In the interim, the Central Appointments Office is appointing patients to other primary care clinics that have open appointments that day. Additionally, MACH will authorize acute care downtown on a case-by-case basis, depending on the medical necessity.

As in the past, summer rotations and deployments will also cause MACH to change patients' PCMs and clinic assignments to ensure continuance to meet the Tricare access standards for enrolled beneficiaries.

"We want our beneficiaries to know about our staffing issues and to know that we are doing everything possible to ensure their continued access to care," Pollock said. "Most importantly, I want our beneficiaries to know my entire staff greatly appreciates their patience during this time."

Longtime post employee wins dream home

Donating to charity pays off for woman

Angela Sachitano
Special to the Bayonet©

Flashback 15 years ago. Columbus resident Mary Gist is working at the Fort Benning Commissary trying her best to make ends meet.

Fast forward to May 2002, and Gist is moving her belongings into a brand new home worth more than $200,000.

"It's truly a blessing from God," Gist said. "I had a feeling something special may happen when I donated to charity this month. I just didn't know it was going to happen to me."

Gist has worked on Fort Benning for more than 20 years. First, as a cashier at the commissary and now as a teller with the finance division of military payroll. She said she's always given a portion of her paychecks to the needy.

But it was a $100 donation to the St. Jude Hospital last month that has changed her life forever.

"I don't know what to say. I've never expected anything back from giving," Gist said. "I can't believe all this is mine."

The St. Jude Dream Home contest covered several states in the south, including Georgia. For every $100 a person donated to the hospital, their name was put into a drawing.

The prize was a $225,000 new home in the Garrett Creek subdivision near Midland. The home is decked out with a jacuzzi, expensive chandeliers and matching patterns of wallpaper throughout the rooms. A porch runs along the entire back of the house, overlooking a huge private back yard with dozens of shady trees.

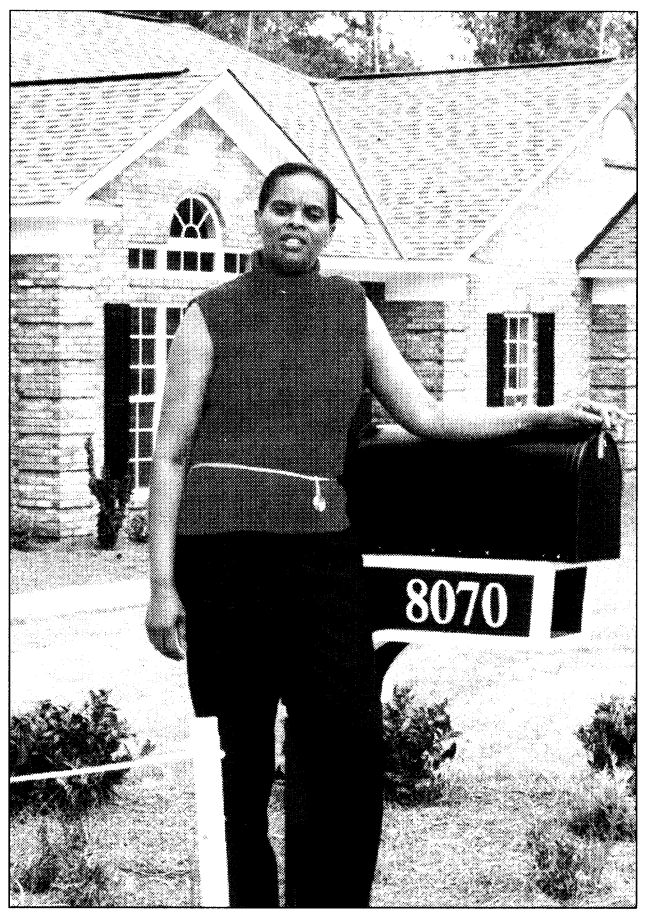
"To be honest, I wrote the check to St. Jude and didn't think about the contest at all. I never thought a poor person could win something like this," Gist said. "Never in my life."

Gist's name was drawn on local television April 21 as she was busy taking care of her sick mother. She did not see the telecast, but within minutes her phone was ringing and her daughter told her she had won.

"I've always been the giver in my family. I've taken care of my mother and other family members for sometime now," Gist said. "Winning the home will not change who I am."

But it will change where she lives.

Gist has lived in the same home on St. Mary's Road for more than 20 years. She does not consider herself materialistic and said she can't even remember the last time she had a credit card debt.



"My daughter wants me to buy all new furniture for the home," Gist said. "I'm in no rush to decorate. I think I'll check out some yard sales first."

Gist does have to pay a gift tax on the house, which is close to a third of what the home is worth.

She said she may use the money she makes from selling her current home and then finance the rest.

"I know God wants me in this house, and I will live there and give praise to him everyday," Gist said.

Gist will receive the keys to her new home May 22.

Jazz artist makes waves in black and white

Soldier sets fears aside, eyes on talent

Laura Martinson
Special to the Bayonet©

At first glance, the BDU clad infantry soldier appears to the average Joe — G.I., that is — as just another "squared away" comrade. But that's only if Joe judged the book by its cover.

Staff Sgt. Timmie Glover, 1st Battalion, 29th Infantry Regiment, is one soldier who views "being squared" as a means to an end — an artistic end. Glover, who's polishing off a 20-year Army career, uses oil, canvas and sometimes a little tape, to make squares, circles and musical instruments into a blend of Picasso's cubism and Pollack's expressionism.

"They're my two favorite artists because people can understand what they're looking at," said Glover, a self-taught artist who believes art is more appealing to the viewer if they can make the title of the piece agree with what they see.

"I just love to paint and let people enjoy it. I don't try to be so outrageous that they can't understand it," he said. "There are a lot of people who see the title but don't really see the work. So I put myself in my viewer's shoes when I work."

His down to earth approach may be why his black-and-white Jazz Series was chosen to accompany the opening for the Columbus RiverCenter.

"I chose black and white because I wanted to show those two colors can be just as colorful as red and yellow," he said.

The five-piece set, depicting a jazz musician on five different instruments, was used to set a French Parisian cafe theme to an opera concert by Jessye Norman.

"It was so neat because the quartet set up in the corner mirrored the paintings on the wall," said Glover, who finds most of his inspiration in music, "mainly jazz, but some classical, too."

Among his faves are Miles Davis and Bob James, but Glover's love of music comes more of an appreciation than personal talent.

"I couldn't carry a tune in a bucket," he said laughing.

But experts in the field recognize Glover's strengths, and describe his set of silhouettes as "crisp and very accessible."

"He's very enthusiastic about his art, and that's refreshing," said James Baudoin, director of the Rivercenter. "His nature makes him appealing to young people."

His enthusiasm comes from a love of art and family support. His first dabble in art came only 16 years ago, when in 1994, his wife gave him an unexpected gift.

"I always talked about painting. I always said I wanted to do it. But I never did anything about it," he said. "But that all changed when my wife bought me an art set for Christmas. I guess she just got tired of hearing me talk about it.

"The truth is I was scared to actually go for it, and I was safe as long as I just kept talking about it," he said. "She's my inspiration. I'd still be procrastinating if it weren't for her. A lot of people are just afraid of art and messing up."

But when Glover accidentally dripped a dot of black paint on the Piano Man, the first in his black and white series, he decided to just "go with it."

"I said, 'Man, that looks good,' and just splattered black and white paint over what I thought was a finished portrait," said Glover, who could think of five other paintings he'd "messed up" that turned into "something great."

"My wife reminds me a mistake can always be turned into an opportunity," said Glover, who relies on his wife's artistic opinion. "She's my biggest critic and my biggest fan."

The original Piano Man, which was completed in one night and inspired by Bob James' Winchester Lady, hangs in a radio station in Norfolk, Va., where James was later interviewed and complimented Glover's work.

> "The truth is I was scared to actually go for it, and I was safe as long as I just kept talking about it. A lot of people are just afraid of art and messing up."

"I didn't get to hear it because I was out fishing," Glover said with a laugh. "But I did get to meet him after the fact. I'll never forget that."

Though he didn't pick up a paintbrush until 1994, he credits his older brother with first showing him how to draw when he was 10.

"Our house looks like a museum," Glover laughed, "and every time he comes to visit, I point to all the paintings in my house and say, 'This is because of you.'"

Glover's work has been on display by the Columbus Arts and Crafts League, Riverfest and Columbus State University.

And while Glover might be found in his off time fishing or perusing local art galleries by day, by night he burns the midnight oil at home.

"I love painting and listening to jazz, so when everyone in the house goes to bed, I paint. It's how I detach myself from everything," he said. "I express myself by putting it all down with oil on canvas."

Though Glover is a self-described abstract artist, Baudoin said his work appeals to everybody.

"Artists can have a very realistic or a very abstract approach to art," Baudoin said. "His is a blending of the two. It can be appreciated by anyone, regardless of their taste."

He's now working on a piece inspired by Miles Davis and a commemorative piece dedicated to September 11, which depicts the Statue of Liberty waving an American flag instead of the torch and surrounded by firefighters, policeman, and military personnel, as well as debris from the World Trade Center. The portrait is based on a famous French painting that shows Lady Liberty carrying a flag and leading people into battle.

"I want people to enjoy my paintings the way I enjoy others," Glover said. "I'm not looking for fame or getting rich. I'm just an easy-going person, and I love life.

"After you do something for 20 years, when you leave, you're going to miss it," Glover said of his military career. "I've had the chance to do something I always wanted to do as a boy growing up, and that's being a soldier. Now I'm looking forward to a new career."

Aviator to speak

An Army aviator who was flying the first helicopter shot down in Mogadishu in 1993 will speak about his experiences in Somalia at 1 p.m. Tuesday in Marshall Auditorium.

Chief Warrant Officer Perry Allman, his co-pilot and their crew of three were on board a UH-60A Blackhawk when the aircraft was hit by an antitank round and crashed in the streets of Mogadishu 10 days before the now infamous "Blackhawk Down" incident.

Despite the aircraft's ballistic floor protection, three crew members were killed and both pilots injured. Initial reports by another aircraft indicated that there were no survivors in the crash. Somalis armed with rifles and grenades routed a Pakistani ground rescue expedition and the pilots had expended all of their ammunition before they were rescued, under heavy fire, by a United Arab Emirate search party investigating the crash.

Allman underwent five surgeries and spent six weeks recovering from injuries he sustained in Mogadishu. He was awarded a Purple Heart.

He is stationed at Fort Rucker, Ala., where he is an instructor for the Aviation Warrant Officer Advanced Course.

Maj. Chad Sullivan works his way across the rope bar during the team obstacle course May 3 during the 11th Regiment's team triathlon. Sullivan was a member of Team 2, which placed second in the event.

Team 2 runs together on the 3.7-mile run portion of the team triathlon.

Team 3 members work together to get a faster time on the bike.

Work as one

11th Infantry Regiment officers competed in a team triathlon May 3.

Six teams, consisting of seven or eight officers each, participated in the event, which included a 3.7-mile run around Friar Drop Zone and an 11-mile bike race from the drop zone to the 11th Regiment's obstacle course. There the competitors negotiated 11 obstacles.

Col. Steven Sifers said the triathlon was designed to be a team-building exercise and encourage camaraderie. Each team had to stay together and compete as one throughout each event.

Team 5 won, led by Lt. Col. John K. Carothers, with a time of 1 hour, 45 minutes and 47 seconds.

Soldiers lob live grenades

Basic trainees face fears, earn badge

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet Staff

A soldier lays on the ground as he waits for his signal to throw a grenade.

When he gets the signal, he uses the twist, pull pin method, then takes a peek and counts one one-thousand, two one-thousand and throws the grenade to his target and takes cover.

Soldiers of D Company, 1st Battalion, 38th Infantry Regiment, practiced the same exercise May 2.

The purpose of the exercise was to give soldiers experience in throwing grenades from the prone and standing positions, help calm their nerves and build their confidence about grenades.

"All soldiers threw the grenades," said Staff Sgt. Harold Green, drill sergeant. "Nobody backed out of it, and they all completed a requirement to graduate basic training, which is to throw two live grenades."

Still, some soldiers had reservations.

"When I first found out I would have to throw live grenades, I was nervous," said Pvt. Wade McCumber. "But, when I learned what to do with the grenade, I relaxed and did what I had to do to meet the requirement."

The drill sergeants of D Company were pleased when all the soldiers passed the live-grenade throwing.

"The soldiers had nerve, confidence and courage to push through their fears," Green said. "There's always a few in every cycle who don't want to go through it. This time they all threw the live grenades on the first time."

Besides throwing the live grenades, soldiers also went through a grenade assault course where they had the chance to earn another marksmanship badge to wear on their Class "A" and "B" uniforms.

All of the stations of the course required the soldiers to keep a low profile while throwing a dummy grenade toward a targeted position.

The soldiers also had to identify grenades, whether they were smoke, signal, concealment, riot control or fragmentation grenades.

If the soldiers completed all seven stations correctly, they earned an expert grenade badge.

If they missed one station, they earned a first class grenade badge, and if they missed two stations, they earned the second class grenade badge.

"Earning the grenade badge is not a requirement of basic training, but it is still nice to say you earned it," McCumber said.

Drill sergeants stressed one thing to the soldiers.

"The key is to just relax and throw the grenades," Green said. "If a soldier doesn't relax and drops the grenade at his feet, then he is about to have a bad day."

"Every person needs to understand if you see something suspicious, you may be the only one, and you need to report it."

Felipe Mojica
Directorate of Intelligence and Security

In America's war against terrorism, it's important not only to protect your country and community but also to protect yourself with Level 1 Anti-Terrorism and Force Protection Training Guidance classes.

The briefings are mandatory for soldiers, Department of the Army civilians, family members and children older than 14 who go outside the U.S. for a permanent change of duty station, temporary duty or a vacation.

"We integrate current intelligence in the briefings," said Al Harvey, director of the Directorate of Intelligence and Security. "It's more than just to protect yourself against terrorists. It provides you the tools to protect yourself, family members and your home."

The installation intelligence fusion cell has been around since 1997, but the mission has increased since Sept. 11. Cell members include DIS, Directorate of Public Safety, 902nd Military Intelligence Group and others to ensure thorough analysis is conducted on raw information.

The cell has both a training and operational mission, taking raw data to reach analysis, whether or not there's a threat.

"Our mission is extremely critical," Harvey said. "We assist the eyes and ears of the installation.

"A threat could appear from anywhere, and anything could be an indicator."

If people see something suspicious, hopefully, it will get back to the cell, where they have thousands of bits of information to pour through to build the big picture, Harvey said.

"Every person needs to understand if you see something suspicious, you may be the only one, and you need to report it," said Felipe Mojica, DIS project officer. "We all have a responsibility to bear. Thinking it's not your problem may cause people to die. If you see something that isn't right, go with your gut instinct and report it."

The only way DIS can find out some things is if it is reported to the MPs. They are the first line of defense.

"We receive information from numerous law enforcement agencies — state and federal," said Sgt. 1st Class Matthew Bonham, Directorate of Intelligence and Security project officer, and a member of the Middle Georgia anti-terrorist task force.

People have to change their mindset and awareness about terrorist attacks. We're all in this together, Mojica said.

In light of recent events with the mailbox bombings in the midwest, domestic terrorists pose as much of a threat as international terrorist groups.

"A lot of intelligence groups think domestic terrorists would use this as an opportunity," Bonham said. "Or, they may link up with international terrorist groups and strike. It's important we don't lose focus of the threat domestic terrorists pose."

"I think a lot of people are realizing and opening up to the idea that Americans have been targets for years," Mojica said. "And, it needs to be taken very seriously."

The content of Level 1 training changes daily based on worldwide and local situations. When people have the in-depth view of the new look of terrorism, they see changes, he said.

Suicide bombers aren't always middle-eastern men anymore, Bonham said. They can be young women of a different descent.

There are pens that can fire a 22 caliber bullet. Technology has changed the way a lot of groups operate.

Terrorism is a global issue that is being addressed more and more, Mojica said.

"A lot of people don't believe we are at war," Mojica said. "We are in a global war to stop terrorist groups from operating or moving."

The Level 1 Anti-Terrorism Force Protection Training Guidance briefing, Individual awareness training, and a country briefing update is 2 to 3 p.m. Wednesdays in Building 2605 at Soldiers' Plaza.

For emergency or official last minute travel notifications, individual awareness training is conducted on a case-by-case basis. For more information, call 545-4519.

Sgt. William A. Graves

A 2nd Battalion, 58th Infantry Regiment, soldier spots an enemy Tuesday at Sand Hill's Area of Operation-Yellow during a squad attack.

Soldiers train to fight war on evil

Infantrymen perform squad drills

Sgt. William A. Graves
Bayonet assistant editor

There was one overriding theme during squad tactical training on Sand Hill's Area of Operation-Yellow Tuesday.

"I could be doing this for real next month in the Philippines or Afghanistan, and I better take it seriously," said Sgt. Adam Zigelhofer, an Oakland, Calif., native who reclassed from field artillery.

The squad attack, break contact and fire-team movement drills the soldiers performed set F Company, 2nd Battalion, 58th Infantry Regiment, up for success, he said.

"I'm confident I will know how to react if I receive fire while leading a team," Zigelhofer said. "Among many other infantry-essential tasks, our drill sergeants and STT trainer did an outstanding job teaching us how to react to direct fire and how to return fire properly."

Consequently, less experienced soldiers soaked up loads of knowledge, he said.

"With any training they receive, they hit it real hard — 110 percent, and it's encouraging to see everyone helping each other out," he said. "A machine is only as strong as its weakest link, and we've been spotting and tutoring them.

"I'm proud to be training with these men."

The men did what they were supposed to do — learn from their mistakes, said Staff Sgt. Torriano Allen, an instructor with 2nd Battalion, 29th Infantry Regiment.

"At first, many of them were being unsafe — not firing down their lanes, from behind their buddies and laying down in the open when a tree was within one-arm's length from them," Allen said. "But, by the end of the day, they were communicating well, seeking cover and paying attention to their other team members."

As a result, the soldiers have more confidence in their abilities to operate as a cohesive unit, he said.

One basic skill Allen emphasized was the individual movement technique.

"Instead of giving the enemy a whole man silhouette at which to fire, you give less of a target by using proper methods," he said.

While the Army has maintained the same standard for the technique and all other skills soldiers learn, America's new war has made training more vital, he said.

"The soldiers don't want to miss anything," Allen said. "They want to be prepared if they get the call, so they have no problem asking questions."

The extensive training soldiers received was the basic foundation for understanding platoon movements and will, ultimately, pay dividends in the war on terror, said Sgt. 1st Class James Holbrook, a senior drill sergeant with the battalion.

For instance, Tuesday was the first time soldiers had the chance to direct other elements of their assigned fire teams. As the day progressed, soldiers began developing the leadership qualities needed to complete missions to standard, he said.

"Battle drills such as react to contact are the bread and butter of an infantrymen," Holbrook said. "That's how we fight, and these are the soldiers who will do it."

The new war has made one aspect of drill sergeant life easier.

"In one way or the other, the Army is going to put everyone here in harm's way," Holbrook said. "They know they are each important to our country's security."

Partners meet lofty goals

Thirty-five nominations, 72,000 hours, and $143,000 spent, and all in the name of education. Sometimes numbers say it best, and in this case, they explain why the Fort Benning and Columbus area's Partners in Educations are known throughout Georgia as the best in the state.

"Some call us lucky, but we're not. We're making our luck," said Michael Gaymon, president and CEO of the Greater Columbus Chamber of Commerce.

Gaymon gave high praise to government leaders, educators, business owners and military personnel at the PIE Appreciation Luncheon Monday. He said it's their selfless service that earned the highest awards ever for PIE. Local schools were, in fact, visited during the past year by representatives from Tennessee, South Carolina and Alabama schools, all wishing to emulate what area schools are doing right.

"We've set lofty ideals and high standards, and we've met them all," said Helen Johnson, chairperson, Partners in Education board of directors.

"We've formed over 7500 partnerships. And they said it would never happened. Well, it's happened," Gaymon said. "But people also said no one would ever be able to run a four-minute mile, and people are beating that record everyday."

Harris, Talbot, and Muscogee county, Fort Benning, and private, independent and church schools recognized their partners for their diligent work throughout the previous school year.

"Partners are those who put the interests of others before their own," Gaymon said. "And they're the ones out there making a difference in the lives of our children."

Fort Benning units recognized were 29th Infantry Regiment; Basic Combat Training Brigade; 1st Battalion, 10th Infantry Regiment; and Martin Army Community Hospital.

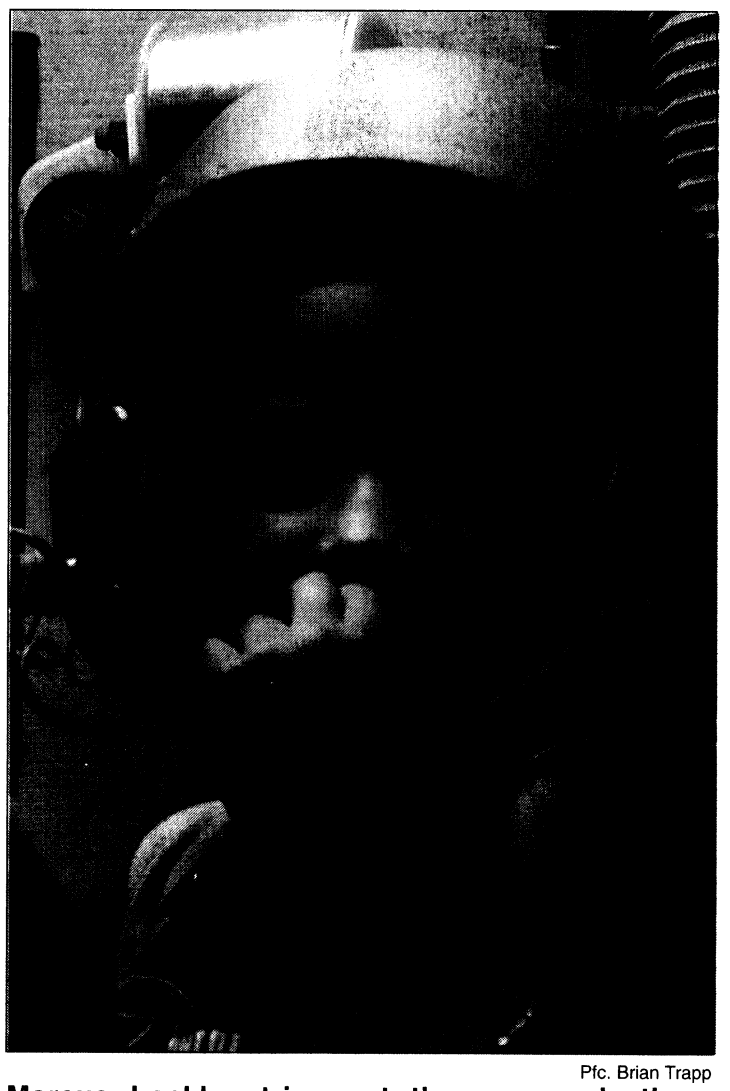
Gold level awards were given to the 29th Infantry Regiment and MACH.

2nd Lt. Levias Lewis has a personal reason for partnering with Dexter Elementary — his 8-year-old daughter, Alexis.

"As a parent, it makes me happy to know people are taking an interest in what our children are doing," Lewis said. "Besides, it's nice for the kids to learn about what we do. Maybe we can help them figure out what they want to do in the future."

Gaymon was especially thankful to those who take the time out of busy schedules to make a difference.

"We know as jobs get more complicated, those who work find it difficult getting time off," he said. "The key to the process is the leaders in businesses, units and schools communicating to make the partnership great on both sides."



Lewis agreed that the key to success for Dexter and his soldiers is communication.

"It's all about the choices you make," said Randy Jones, 2002 Winter Olympic Silver Medal Winner and guest speaker. "It took me 10 years to win a silver medal. I learned you can chase your dreams, but it only takes one person to back you up to make all the difference."

Partners regularly visit the schools to give tutorials, career development courses and just spend quality time.

"This is a wonderful reminder of why we do what we do," he said. "We need to continue to ensure all we do focuses on the growth of children in our community.

"A partnership is something you work at every day," he said. "It's a two-way street, so if it's not what it needs to be, work it out. Make it become even better and stronger, and who knows what next year will bring."

The battalion returned this week from a six-month deployment to Kosovo. "My mom's really really happy my dad's coming home," Beyers said.

Families prepare for deployment

Family picnic on Kelley Hill bonds battalion

Fort Benning families searched to find the right words to say goodbye to their loved ones as soldiers prepared to deploy in one of the most dangerous times in the nation's history.

"A part of me is so afraid I will show too much sadness," said Debbie Cranston, the wife of Sgt. Carl Cranston. "This is my husband's first real-world deployment. I know he needs my support."

Families of the 1st Battalion, 15th Infantry Regiment, are trying to stay strong, as soldiers begin deploying this month to Kuwait for the start of a six-month tour, she said.

Families gathered at the Kelley Hill Recreation Center Friday for one final day of food, fellowship and encouragement before the deployment.

"Our battalion is really new at this," said Michelle Ossa, Family Readiness Group leader. "All of the company commander's wives are fairly new, too. The most important thing right now is keeping the wives unified and setting the rank issue aside."

Dozens of activities and sports, music and barbecue kept families entertained for hours at the Family Day Celebration.

Spiritual reflection also played an important role during the day's events.

"I held a prayer breakfast with the battalion this morning," said Chaplain (Capt.) Raymond Folson, battalion chaplain. "The reaction was overwhelming. I'm here for the men and their wives. It's time to renew our faith."

A renewed faith in God and the Army's mission is exactly what many wives said will keep them strong over the next six months.

"The Army needs them. The world needs them," said Audrea Folson, wife of the chaplain. "I told our soldiers to give the enemies of the United States exactly what they deserve."

"Our women are stronger than they've ever been right now," Ossa said. "We have spent the past month in and out of pre-deployment meetings. We are well connected with the Red Cross, the Army Community Service and especially each other."

Families had a chance to talk with the Red Cross firsthand at the Family Day event. Volunteers set up booths inside of the recreation center for last minute questions soldiers and their wives had.

"I got the chance to meet the people who I could potentially be leaning on for help," Cranston said. "It adds to my peace of mind."

Some of the wives of the battalion are pregnant and will have their babies while their husbands are deployed. The Red Cross assured the women it would notify their husbands should an emergency occur.

"I'm going to drive to Michigan to have the baby. That's where my husband's parents live, and they will help me out while he is gone," said Karey Nell, wife of Staff Sgt. Chris Nell. "I'm thankful for days like today. I'm cherishing our time together now."

Retired Command Sgt. Maj. Thomas Twomey was inducted into the regiment as an honorary sergeant major during family day.

"I've been to war before. It was many years ago and these guys want to know what it was like," Twomey said. "These soldiers are motivated, and they are well trained. I'm completely confident in their mission."

Perhaps the greatest confidence comes from the soldiers themselves. As the day wound down, soldiers publicly recognized each other for their commitment to the battalion and to their country.

"I've been impressed with the dedication of these men and especially the dedication of their wives," said Command Sgt. Maj. Gabriel Ossa, battalion command sergeant major.

"All of the families are here today to show their support for one another. We are all in this together."

Students remember 9-11 with garden

Wilson Elementary School

Seventeen students in the Environmental Protection Club have decided to honor those affected by the Sept. 11 tragedy.

When the disaster struck, many of the Sept. 11 victims, such as individuals at the World Trade Center and Pentagon, were demonstrating the value of duty, going about their daily work routines in an effort to provide for their families. Others, such as the courageous passengers of Flight 93, demonstrated selfless sacrifice in refusing to allow terrorists to destroy more innocent lives. Still others, such as the firefighters and members of the police department, demonstrated personal courage as they sought to aid the injured.

The students in EPC have determined that a memorial garden is a means by which they can honor these individuals and say to their loved ones, "We remember."

A memorial garden will be designed, planted and managed by students to honor the victims, their families and all others affected by the Sept. 11 tragedies. It will also serve as an outdoor classroom for grades pre-K through five.

Rain gauges, a thermometer, a sundial, birdhouses and other appropriate materials and equipment will be available in the garden for classroom use.

The students of the Wilson EPC, along with their club sponsors, Jennifer Sherrill and Beth Young, will design, plant and manage a memorial garden that will benefit directly the 450 students plus parents, faculty, staff and frequent visitors to the school.

The EPC is applying for the National Garden Association Grant in order to obtain garden tools and educational resources for use in the garden, and Wilson's Partners In Education, the Basic Combat Training Brigade, have already volunteered their time to help break up the soil and prepare the land for our students to garden.

Wilson students have learned how important loyalty, duty, respect, selfless service, honor, integrity and personal courage are to the development of character. They have gained an increased desire to honor those who demonstrate these values.

There is a great sense of pride in the Wilson students for their school and community. While the EPC is involved in on-going litter patrols of the school grounds and throughout the Indianhead Terrace housing area, members of the club would like to promote environmental awareness through more dynamic action.

The September 11th Memorial Garden will be just one small way the Wilson students can express their sorrow over the events of that tragic day and their pride in being a part of our military community.

'I was given an incredible gift'

Moms share thoughts on coping with stress, surviving loss

Bridgett Siter
Special to the Bayonet©

I recently talked with two moms who made Bayonet headlines this past year. Moms whose lives were drastically changed, suddenly and forever, by events or circumstances beyond their control.

Moms who celebrated the last Mothers Day with no inkling of what an incredible turn their lives would take in one year.

I asked them the same questions, and from their two very different perspectives, I discovered certain shared truths in one's loss and one's gain.

Pfc. Kris Stonesifer was killed in a helicopter crash in Pakistan Oct. 19, one of the first casualties of Operation Enduring Freedom.

The 28-year-old 75th Ranger Regiment soldier died before receiving the news he had a new nephew, 2-day-old Kristofor Stonesifer, his namesake.

Ruth Stonesifer now finds solace in her 6-month-old grandson's "warmth and sweetness."

Here's what Ruth has to say about life without Kris:

How are you coping?

"Surprisingly well, I think. Kris actually helped me. He was such a strong, bright spirit that I believe it would be a dishonor to his memory to set around at home and not live my life. He's my inspiration every day."

Where do you find joy?

"Well, I can look at it as if something was ripped from my life, which is correct, or I can look at it like this: I was given an incredible gift for 28 years. That's a positive thing, a joyous thing.

"I think about Kris and I smile all the time. He was such a great friend."

Who do you turn to for inspiration?

"Friends and family. And my new grandson. How can I be sad with this bundle of joy?"

What do you say to someone who finds themselves in your situation?

"About a month after Kris died, I got a call from a lady whose son was killed in Grenada 20 years ago. I asked her if it gets any better.

"She said some days are better than others. She gave me a gift — permission to be sad, even 20 years from now.

"I wondered 'How do I face a lifetime of this?' And she gave me permission to be sad, to go on and to function, but to be sad. That's what I tell others."

How has this shaped your view of your duty as a mother?

"I was so confused at first. I'd always been grateful that I'd been handed my mission in life, to be a mother, and I took it very seriously.

"Now, through Kris's death and the birth of Kristofor, I feel a renewal of my mission — to be the best grandma I can be."

Spc. Steve and Amber Brown had tried to conceive for nearly nine years.

Then one dose of a "fertility cocktail" did the trick.

Last summer, while Steve was stationed on Kelley Hill, the couple discovered Amber was carrying a baby ... and another ... and another ... and — five in all.

Gabriel, Gavin, Crystal, Garrett and Cheyenne were born Sept. 26 in Palo Alto, Calif., a few weeks premature, but remarkably healthy.

In fact, all five babies were released from the hospital within a couple of weeks.

Steve and Amber now live at the Fort Ord Military Housing Community, and Steve works as a chaplain's assistant at the Defense Language Institute in Monterey.

When I spoke with Amber she was hoping to catch a 30-minute "power nap" before the quints awoke from their afternoon nap.

Rest is hard to come by in a day that starts before sun up and ends around 9 p.m., when the last baby falls off to sleep.

How are you coping?

"Really well. I have a great family support system. This is where both our families are, so we're really lucky to be able to live here.

"My mother-in-law and Steve's grandma come over to help a lot, and my mom comes over in the evenings. They help a lot.

"And the babies are on a schedule. We're pretty regimented right now, but they seem to like that. They're very happy."

Where do you find joy?

"When they wake up each morning and smile at me. That's amazing."

Who do you turn to for inspiration?

"My mom. If I can be half as good a mother as mine was, I'll be doing great. She's my encouragement and my support."

What do you say to someone who finds themselves in your situation?

"Don't be surprised by the number of diapers you go through. Get them on a schedule. Have a family support system.

"And have an outlet. I have my dog. I play with him, or go out back and water my flowers. I try to go out with friends at least once a week, even if it's just coffee. That kind of stuff. It helps."

How has this shaped your view of your duty as a mother?

"We waited nearly 10 years for this. It took so long to get them, and life has changed drastically, but it's worth every bit of it. We're going in a different direction, but it's a wonderful direction. I wouldn't change a thing."

There you have it. Two moms who refuse to wallow in the sadness or the chaos of the moment.

One finds joy in remembering the past and celebrating the future with a new generation.

One counts her blessings and multiplies by five, preferring to focus on the joys instead of the challenges.

Both strong, dedicated mothers.

Both with a shared message for others, like themselves, who may one day face drastic change:

"One day at a time. That's all you can do. Take it one day at a time," Amber said.

"And know that some days are better than others," said Ruth. "And there's joy and happiness still."

Mum's the word

Bridgett Siter
Special to the Bayonet©

When the good Queen Mother died last month, at 101, she was eulogized for her dignity.

The headlines, the reporters, even her children and grandchildren lauded her for her dignity. Mainly, I suppose, because she kept a stiff English upper lip while her offspring made royal fools of themselves.

"Dignified" is a fine and admirable adjective, but it's not exactly how I want to be remembered when I join the Queen Mum, by and by, for a spot of tea.

And it's not how I'll remember my own dear mom, though thankfully it's nowhere near her tea time either.

Mom was and is the quintessential 60s mom — heels and skirts and home-cooked meals everyday. She's faithful, passionate, funny and wise. But dignified? Pulease!

When we, my six siblings and I, were children, Mom would gather her skirt around her legs and hunch down on the ground to play marbles with us. Very undignified.

She'd get up extra early to make a hot breakfast, bundle us up in coats and mittens, and walk us to the bus stop with her hair still in rollers.

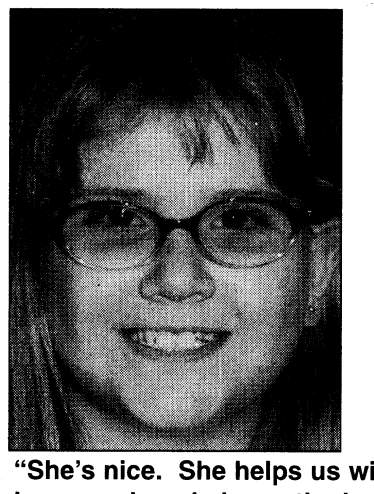
And she laid out a fine spread at suppertime, but the meal itself was rowdy and jovial and, well, not exactly proper like I imagine suppertime to be at the palace. Mom held court over seven lively jesters, interrupting our revelry only occasionally with "Eat before it gets cold."

And she lost her dignity over many an episode of Andy Griffith and I Love Lucy, cackling like a schoolgirl as we all gathered round to watch a drunken Lucy pitch Vitavitavegemin.

Mom was quick to chastise in public if we needed it. She was also free with the hugs and kisses and hand holding no matter who was watching. Undignified I tell you.

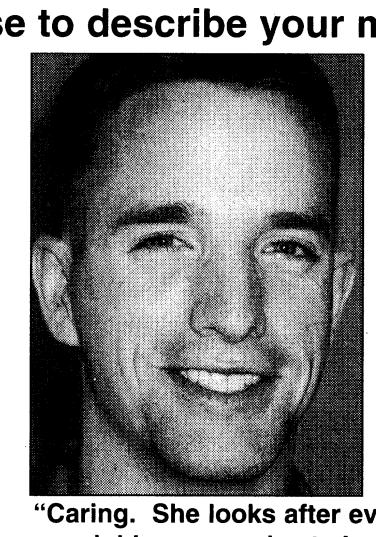
And she was always as honest as the day is long.

One time, when I was a teen-ager easily prone to bouts of mortification, Mom made an undignified scene in an upscale department store, insisting the sales clerk had cheated herself out of a few bucks.



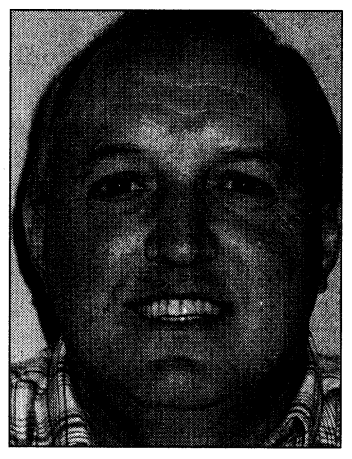
The clerk denied it, Mom demanded she take the money, and I cowered by the front door, ready to make a quick exit if any of my friends came in. I couldn't risk losing my dignity.

And Mom could never keep a stiff upper lip. She wept openly in church every Sunday as the choir sang about God's amazing grace or glorious mansions in heaven.

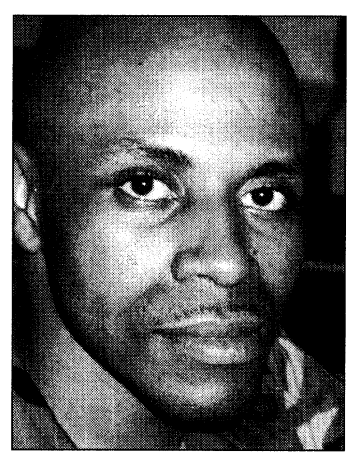


No, Mom'll never be eulogized for her dignity. For that I'm truly glad. I'd be hard pressed to think of a single word that would adequately describe Mom.

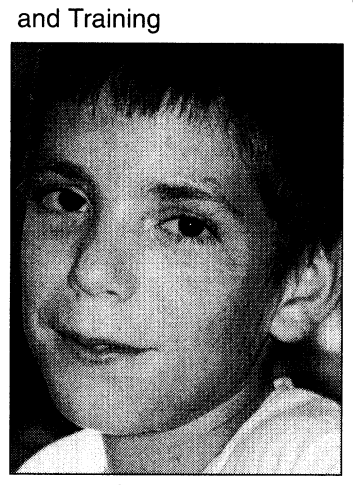
This Mother's Day I'm thankful for a mother who realized that real love — real life — is sometimes worth losing your dignity over.



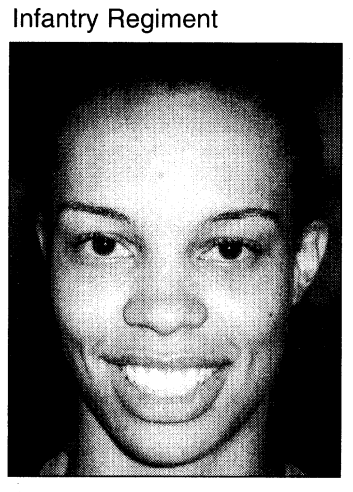
What word would you use to describe your mom?



"She's nice. She helps us with our homework and cleans the house and makes jambalaya." Brandi Anthony, family member



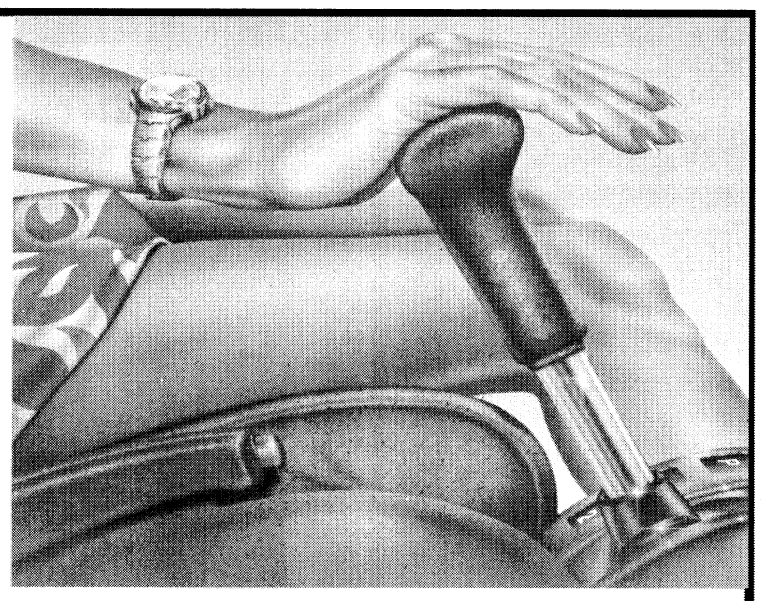
"Caring. She looks after everybody ... neighbors, people at church, everybody." Capt. Tim Ferber, 1st Battalion, 11th Infantry Regiment



"Selfless. She raised seven children and sacrificed a lot for our sake."
Bob Jordan, Directorate of Operations and Training

"My stepmom is my mom. There's not one word that could sum up how I feel about her." Sgt. 1st Class Dennis Williams, 2nd Battalion, 47th Infantry Regiment

"Busy. She does everything. She works, she goes to school and comes home to cook every night." Michael Gatien, family member



"Loving. I can still call home and cry on her shoulder if I need to. She's always there for me." Spc. Jocelyn Stokes, 608 Ordnance Company

Field Day

Soldiers help children

Dexter Elementary School's field days, May 2-3, were put on with the help of soldiers from 1st Battalion, 10th Field Artillery Regiment and Officer Candidate School.

The children enjoyed their favorite games from gym class, said Pam Koon, physical education instructor. "The soldiers were wonderful, they made the whole show," she said. "It couldn't have done it without them.

Senior Officer Candidate Chris Splichal, 3rd Battalion, 11th Infantry Regiment, takes a break from field day fun with students Hannah Vigil-Shuck, left, and Christian Sullivan.

Sixth-grader shares art knowledge

Vicki Rogers
Dexter Elementary School

Inspired by sixth-grader Emily Toon, students in Susie Reynolds' fourth-grade are putting the brush to the palette as they create their own versions of a Monet watercolor.

"The interest in Monet grew out of an interdisciplinary study of the novel The Secret Garden," Reynolds said.

"Knowing that, Emily, a former Dexter student, was a fan of Monet's, I invited her to share with our class what she had learned about this fascinating painter of the 19th century."

Toon chose to use powerpoint slides to present some of the highlights of Monet's life. As she talked about paintings such as Water Lilies, the Garden at Giverny and the Japanese Bridge, she pointed out the unique brush strokes and the pastel colors that were typical of impressionist paintings.

"He had a way of making dark things light up by using different colors and short little brush strokes," Toon said, as she pointed this out on her personal copy of the Lady with the Umbrella.

Toon shared that she first became interested in Monet in third grade when she saw his paintings at a museum in Canada. "I liked preparing this presentation because Monet is one of my favorite artists, and this gave me the opportunity to learn even more about him," she said.

And that's exactly what happened with these fourth-graders — they didn't encounter Monet in a museum, but instead were inspired to learn more because of the enthusiasm of this sixth-grader. Fourth-grader Sierra Wilken, whose chalk reflection appears in this article, learned that Monet's short strokes are better seen from a distance.

"The colors blend better," she said. "Making a reflection is a bit harder because you have to use a lot of chalk."

Reynolds agreed, noting that these students "found it odd to make short brush strokes instead of continuous lines."

Students wanted to produce very neat pieces instead of experimenting with messy chalk and a sketchy appearance. However, when they related Monet's weakened eyesight due to cataracts to his style of painting, they began to understand his unique talent.

"Students were able to further apply what they learned from the novel The Secret Garden to their study of plants and gardening in science and social studies," Reynolds said.

And that's exactly what they did. Students have designed their own Monet-like notecards, and then, after studying several of Monet's prints, such as the Japanese Bridge and Water Lilies, they are now creating their own chalk drawings of Dexter School as seen on Dexter Elementary School's website (http://benning-w1.odedodea.edu/Dexter/default.htm).

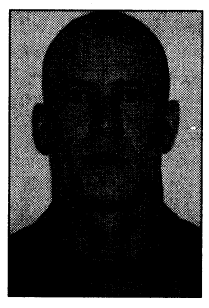
Apostle tells us to excel in marriage

Bless and be blessed, Peter said



Chaplain (Capt.) Raymond E. Folsom
1st Battalion, 15 Infantry Regiment

"To sum it up, let all be harmonious, sympathetic, brotherly, kindhearted and humble in spirit, not returning evil for evil, or insult for insult but giving a blessing instead; for you are called for that very purpose that you might inherit a blessing."

1 Peter 3:8-9

These two verses might make you think about someone you worked with or a person who has been on your less than favorable side for some time now.

You might have a myriad of people in mind, but whom is Peter specifically addressing? What was Peter writing before "summing it all up?" If you open your Bible and read 1 Peter 3:1-7, you will discover that Peter is talking about the relationship between a husband and wife. Take time and read 1 Peter 3:8-9 again.

Folsom

This time, think of you and your spouse and the intended readers of his words. How did your marriage stand up to the counsel?

Everyone knows Peter's counsel is easier said than done. Where do you start? Well, the starting point must be with you. As the song says, "It must start with the man in the mirror." You are the master of your universe, that is to say, the universe of your thoughts and reactions. To break it down more, it is a matter of handling one insult and evil act at a time.

That will start at home. How you respond to your spouse when your spouse is angry and says things that rip your heart out? How do you respond when your spouse does something evil? We all know what normally occurs. The old favorite, fire for fire, stone for stone, right? Peter wants us to understand that God's people are above reacting to insults and evil with primal ungodly instincts.

We are to bless instead of curse — to walk the second mile. This new way to react to insults and evil is a life style. Simply put, if you can bring yourself to treat your spouse with blessing, you'll be blessed.

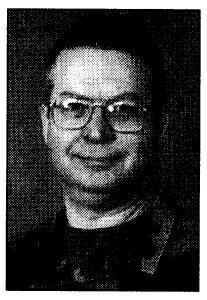
The Army has manuals describing standards for everything. It is that line everyone must cross to achieve success. Success meets the standard, but excellence exceeds the standard.

Peter in the following verses 10-22 describes for us our need to excel. We should excel in marriage, the treatment of others, caring for the helpless and loving one another. I agree, some people take more effort to love, but Jesus exceeded the standard, and we are asked to do no less.

Parents help kids learn work ethic

Chaplain (Maj.) Raymond Koop
Family Life Ministries Center

Through playing house, children depict their early work ethic. The activities of playing house, such as cooking, cleaning, mowing the lawn and raking, help prepare our children for adult roles and responsibilities. Their play often mimics the work ethic of their parents.



Parents help young children learn to do a task well when they work with their children in doing household chores and doing homework.

By working together, the parent instills into their youngster the right attitudes toward work and the high standards needed for doing a job well done.

As children grow older, kids can do more with less help and supervision from their parents.

Rewarding children for their work helps instill positive self-esteem and confidence. Rewards may include praise, tasty treats, special privileges, awards and money.

To help my daughter manage money, I would pay her for doing an extra task or for earning good grades. I did not give her a weekly allowance. With this money, she would set aside 10 percent for her savings account, 10 percent for charity (tithe), and the rest could be used to buy the things she wanted.

Koop

From the money that I budget monthly for her clothing, I have her purchase what she needs. If I think the item is unnecessary, I tell her that she can buy it with her money if she really wants it.

I'm amused to see how many things she doesn't want, when it is her money that she is spending.

Would you like more ideas on establishing a work ethic and money management in your children? Call the Chaplain Family Life Center at 545-1760 for help. Visit the Center at 2606 Dixie Road, Soldiers' Plaza; or e-mail me at koopr@benning.army.mil.

Mass will begin at 11 a.m. followed by a picnic lunch, volunteer and CCD recognitions and certificates, games and an opportunity to farewell Chaplain (Capt.) Joe Angotti. Each family is asked to bring a salad or covered dish, and a dessert. Hamburgers, hotdogs and drinks will be provided.

There will be no 9 a.m. mass, noon Spanish Mass or religious education classes that day.

"Whoever would love life and see good days must keep his tongue from evil and his lips from deceitful speech. He must turn from evil and do good; he must seek peace and pursue it. For the eyes of the Lord are on the righteous and his ears are attentive to their prayer, but the face of the Lord is against those who do evil."

Yellow Monkies win tournament in Ala.

Teamwork pays dividends during games

A youth soccer team from Fort Benning won a tournament at Maxwell Air Force Base in Alabama Saturday.

The team, which is called the Yellow Monkies, went undefeated in matches on post and did the same at the tournament.

"We've worked together great as a team, and that has helped us win," said Daniel Dillon, coach.

The Monkies used their teamwork and defense to win all three matches in the tournament.

In the first game, the Monkies beat the team from Maxwell Air Force Base, 5-1. Chandler Anderson had four goals and one assist, while Josh Biering added one goal and four assists.

In the second game, the Monkies beat another team from Fort Benning, 3-1. Anderson added two goals along with a goal by Stephanie Holder.

In the third game, the Monkies won in a shootout over a team from Pratville, Ala., 4-3. Brian Dillon stopped a shot on goal and then, his brother, Mike, kicked in the game-winning goal.

The Monkies are a team with players of different skill levels.

"We have players out here who have been playing soccer their whole life, and other players out here for their first time," Dillon said. "That's why I love coaching so much. The kids all bring something different to the table."

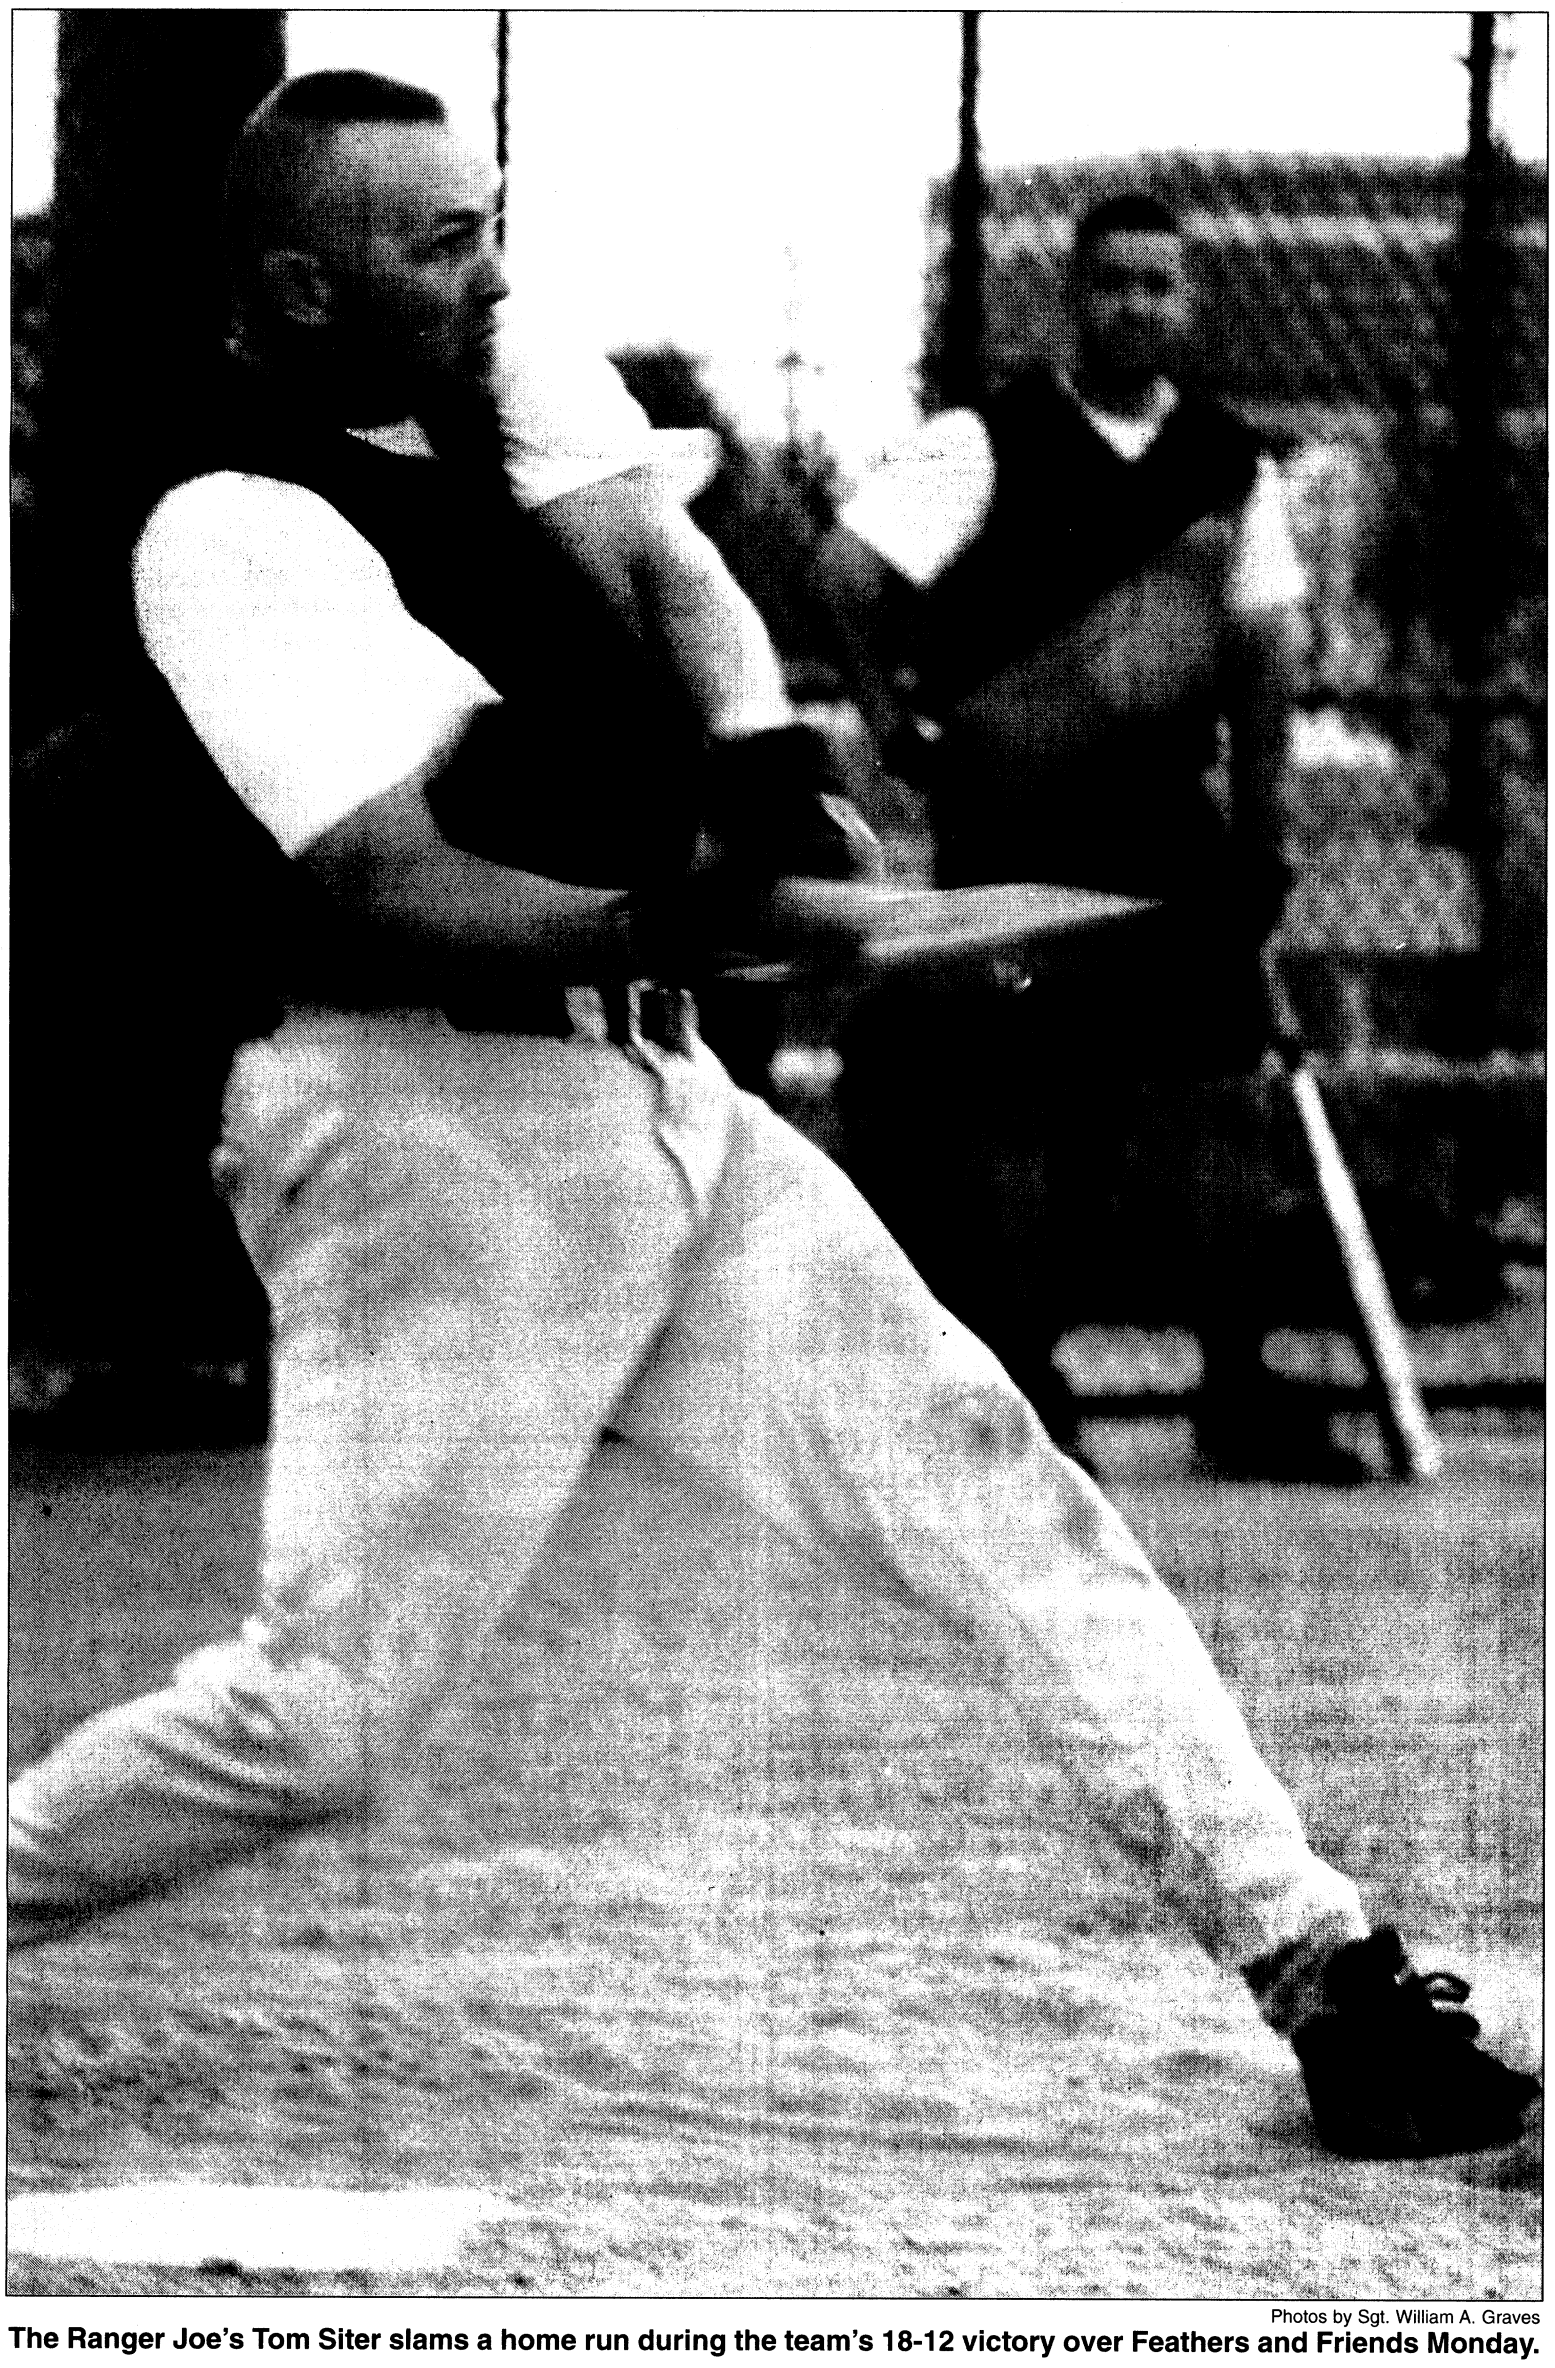
Some players have spent years playing the game, and they still have fun with it.

Anderson, right mid-fielder, has been playing the sport for eight years, and enjoys it simply for the chance to kick something and the camaraderie.

"There is nothing like kicking a ball hard to relieve stress," Anderson said. "You can relieve all of your stress in one kick."

During the tournament, the Monkies showed not only their talent, but also their personalities.

"I get to have fun out there," Biering said, a center mid-fielder. "I can go out and be my wild self while playing a team sport."



The players credit their success to the help of their coaches, Dillon and Lisa Wells.

"They're out here giving up their time to help us become better," Anderson said. "Without them, we would be in a world of hurt."

The Yellow Monkies pleased Wells with their enthusiasm and dedication to teamwork and she was honored to be their coach, she said.

"I give up my time because I enjoy the kids," Wells said. "They always look for the positive in every situation and make coaching fun."

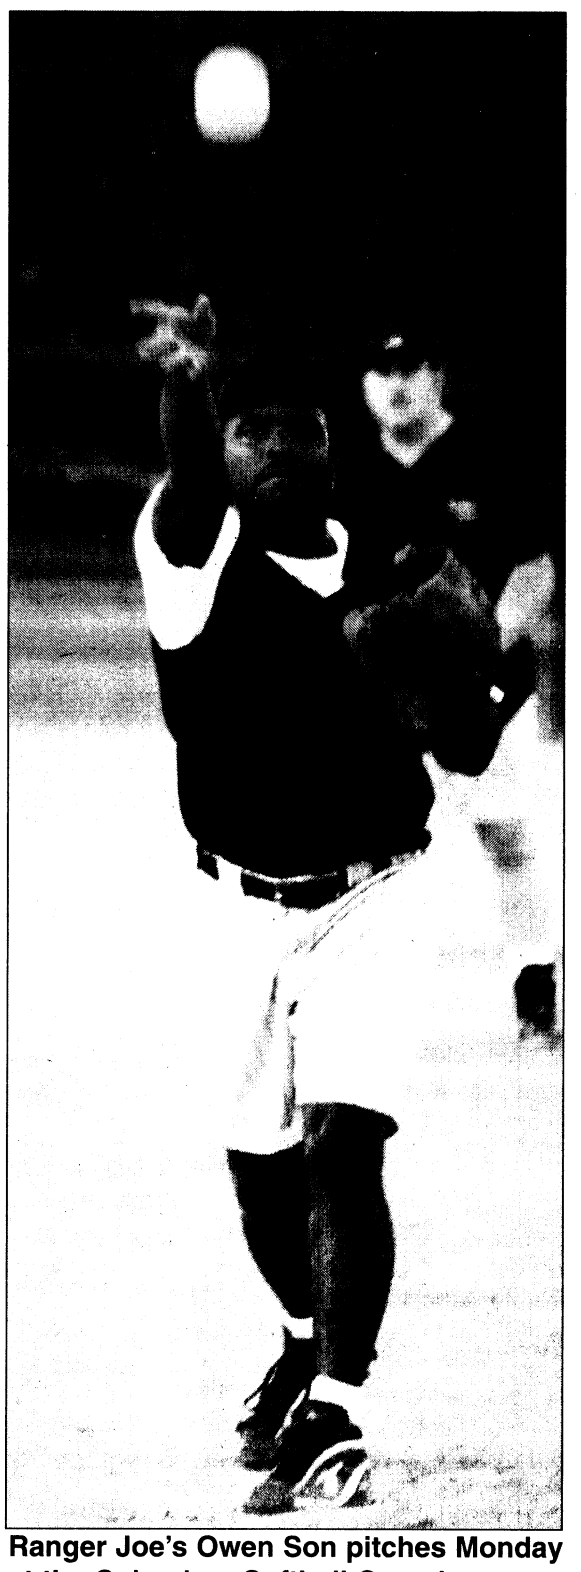
The Ranger Joe's Tom Siter slams a home run during the team's 18-12 victory over Feathers and Friends Monday.

Ranger Joe's stay undefeated

Ranger Joe's defeated Feathers and Friends, 18-12, in Industrial Men's Softball League action Monday night at the Columbus Softball Complex.



The Ranger's Tom Siter led his team with a home run and a single. Chad Parker added three singles and William Lendof belted a home run for the 10-0 Rangers.

Pitcher Owen Son pitched well for six innings before Lendof entered to pitch a scoreless last inning.

Feathers and Friends came out hot and held the Rangers scoreless and scored 3 runs in the first inning. The Rangers then broke out the bats and scored 5 runs in the second.

Down 18-6 in the middle of the sixth inning, the Feathers mounted a strong comeback but fell short.

Rangers Joes play Monday and Wednesday nights at the complex near the Columbus Arena on Victory Drive. For more information, call 566-2015.

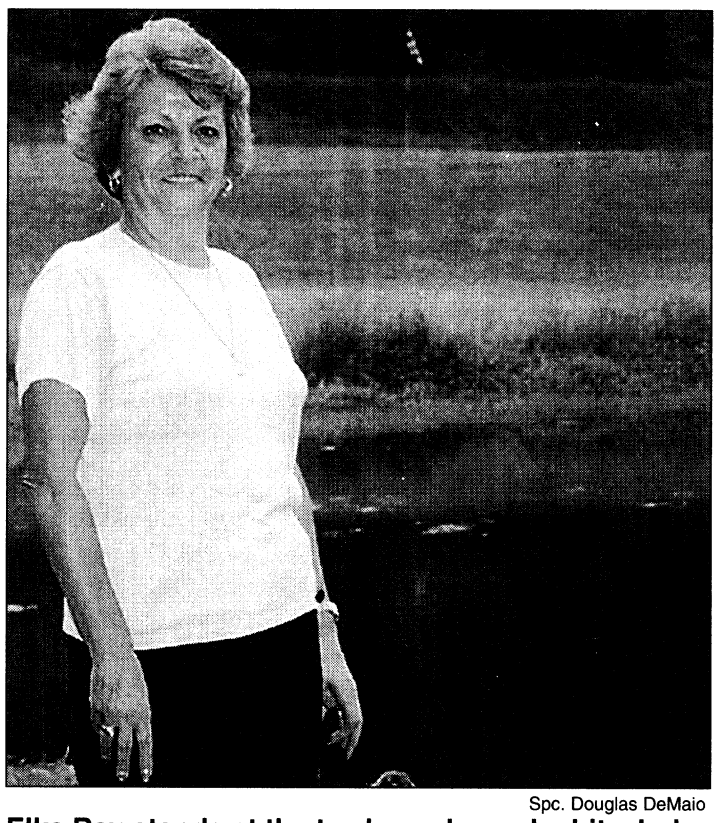
Sunday golfer beats odds

Woman hits perfect shot on 6th hole

Spc. Douglas DeMaio
Bayonet staff

After 10 years of playing golf, Elke Ray hit her first hole-in-one at the Follow Me Golf Course on Lakeside's 113 yard, par-three, 6th hole, April 28.

"The moment the ball hit the green I knew it was going to go in the cup," said Sue Ikner, witness to the shot.



Ray seemed numb to the excitement of the perfect shot, she said. Nevertheless, it was cause for celebration.

"I wasn't excited as much as the people I was playing with were," Ray said.

Shock set in later when she was at home thinking about what she had done, Ray said.

"The odds of hitting a hole-in-one are slim, and we are just Sunday golfers," she said.

According to an article published by the U.S. Golf Register, the odds of hitting a hole-in-one are 30,000 to one, which makes her shot even more amazing considering she plays in a couples tournament just once a week.

Spc. Douglas DeMaio

Elke Ray stands at the tee box where she hit a hole-in-one on Lakeside's 113 yard, par-three, 6th hole.

With those odds, Ray would have to play two rounds of golf a day, every Sunday for 72 years to hit another one.

However, Ray is optimistic and believes she may be able to hit another one over the next 10 years, she said.

"Golf is so unpredictable," Ray said. "If you're really bad, you want to quit.

"Then, you get that one good shot, and it gets you coming back for more."

Ray hit the shot using her 9-iron over part of the lake. It bounced onto the green where it rolled to the cup and fell in the hole.

TSP open season begins

Time to invest in retirement upon soldiers

Sgt. William A. Graves
Bayonet assistant editor

Buy low. Sell high.
Supply and demand.
Interest and exchange rates.
The Rule of 72.

The list goes on and on. The technical jargon renders many confused and intimidated by investing.

Fortunately, the military has helped make it easier with the Thrift Saving Plan.

The TSP open season runs through July 31.

"Soldiers frequently say they have to spend every penny they earn to live and they have no money to save," said Ann Pratcher, manager, Financial Readiness Program. "It will be a big mistake to miss out on the Uniserv Thrift Savings Plan."

More than 220,000 active and reserve component service members did not make the mistake during the first open season, which ran from Nov. 15 through Jan. 31, according to an Army News Service release by Jim Garamone.

"We thought maybe 10 percent of the active component would sign up in the first year — we had more than 10 percent sign up in just the first open season," said Army Lt. Col. Thomas Emswiler, the executive director of the Armed Forces Tax Council.

In the release, Emswiler said officers and mid- to upper-level enlisted grades in particular signed up.

"I'd like to see more junior members consider using the program," he said. "When you're

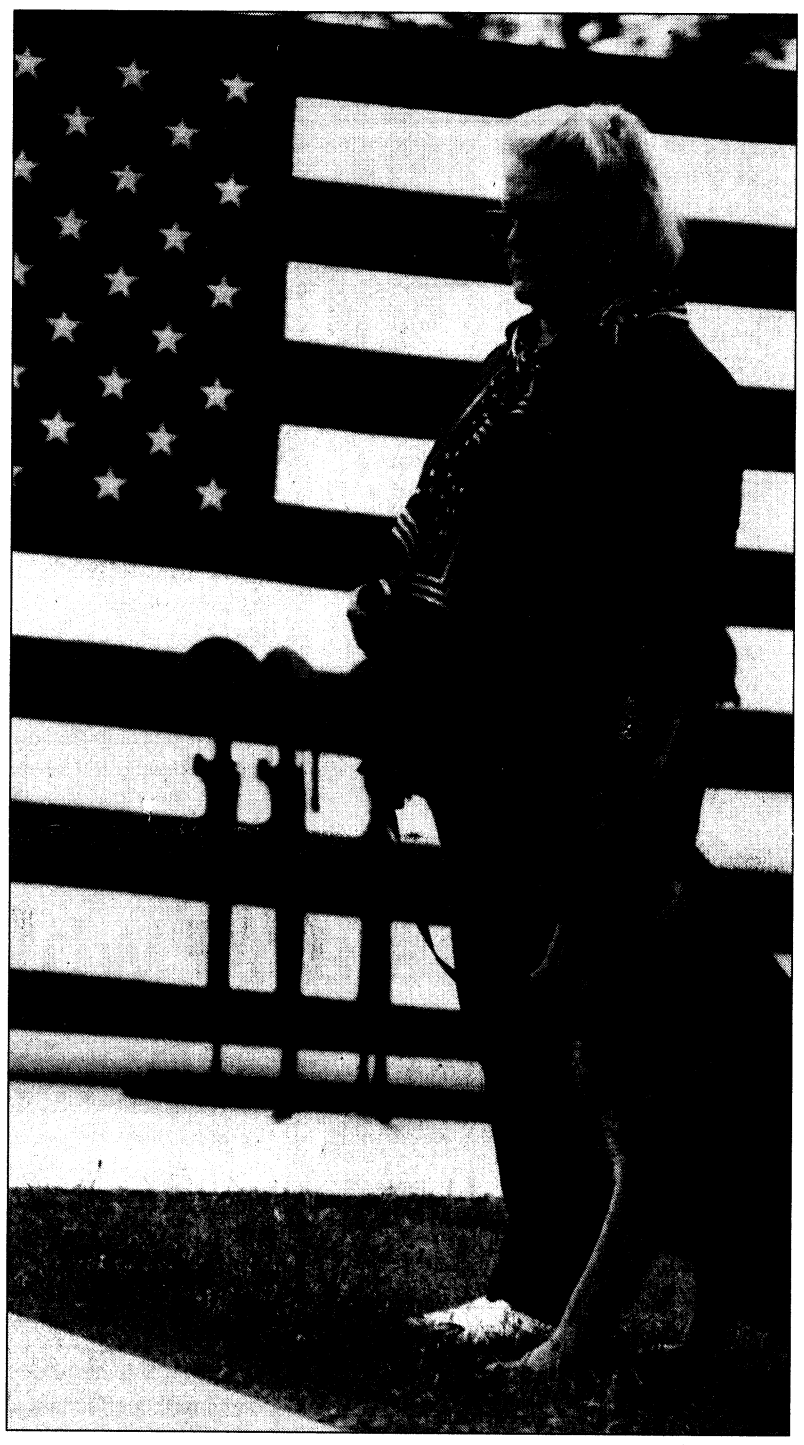
Post remembers war dogs

Memorial honors canines, comrades

Bridgett Siter
Special to the Bayonet©

Every war dog had its day Saturday.

More than 250 veterans and their families endured scorching temperatures at Fort Benning's Sacrifice Field as they gathered to pay a tearful tribute to the scout dogs and their handlers who served in combat since World War II.



Small wonder. Scout dogs prevented more than 10,000 deaths in Vietnam alone, and many of those present credited their lives to their canine companions and fellow handlers.

"I owe them that much," said Kenneth Goss, choking back tears as he watched his fellow veterans file slowly past five pedestals honoring dog teams from World War II, Korea and Vietnam.

The new pedestals encircle a large central statue of a handler and his dog. The statue was dedicated in October 2000. Jesse Mendez called it "a thing of magnificent beauty."

"I remember I came back here just to gaze at it that evening, after it was unveiled," said Mendez, the former handler who designed Fort Benning's U.S. Army Scout Dog Training Program. "I came back again and again, thinking 'Something more needs to be done — something to tell the whole story.'"

Mendez spearheaded the campaign to erect memorial pedestals around the monument. With the help of members of the Vietnam Dog Handlers Club, veterans of the 47th Infantry Scout Dog Platoon and private donations, Mendez saw his dream realized at Saturday's ceremony.

Bridgett Siter

Vivian Holler, of the German Shepherd Club of Atlanta, and Sirius, paid tribute to war dogs and their handlers Saturday on Fort Benning's Sacrifice Field.

The pedestals were unveiled by former handlers, the widow of a World War II handler and the father of Staff Sgt. Robert Hartsock, the only dog handler to be awarded a Medal of Honor during Vietnam. Hartsock, for whom Fort Benning's Hartsock Loop is named, was killed Feb. 23, 1969, when he threw himself on a hand grenade to save his fellow 25th Infantry Divison

Progress made in war on terror

Campaign achieved objectives

Gerry J. Gilmore
Armed Forces Press Service

WASHINGTON — The U.S. military campaign against terrorists in Afghanistan has achieved many of its objectives, Deputy Defense Secretary Paul Wolfowitz said.

"I think we've made terrific progress. It's quite impressive," Wolfowitz observed at a news conference in the National Press Club Wednesday. American and coalition military operations in Afghanistan — Operation Enduring Freedom — began last October. Wolfowitz praised the commander of U.S. forces in Afghanistan, Army Gen. Tommy Franks, and his staff, noting they "put together a plan out of nothing" in a few weeks. Following that plan, U.S. and coalition troops liberated the city of Mazar-e Sharif in northern Afghanistan in five or six weeks, Wolfowitz said. "It's testimony to what our men and women in uniform can do — it's incredible," the deputy defense secretary said.

The Taliban have been removed from power and Afghanistan has been essentially eliminated as an operating base for terrorists, he noted.

While terrorists are still in and around Afghanistan, Wolfowitz pointed out, "they're

New soldier keeps family tradition alive

Basic training graduate keeps family tradition

Angela Sachitano

Any soldier who serves in the military can tell you the Army family is like no other. But Pvt. Jeff Gritz's real life family has already proven that to him.

"For many years, my uncles would ask me if I was going to follow in their footsteps and serve," Gritz said. "No one could influence me. It was something I had to figure out for myself."

At 33, Gritz was one of the oldest members to graduate from Basic and Advance Infantry Training May 10.

You might say it was destiny.

Family members of Pvt. Gritz have served a combined total of close to 100 years in the Army.

Retired Special Forces Col. John Gritz said he "gave his life to the Army on that same field" 36 years ago.

"I am so proud my nephew has decided to serve. It is an honor to keep the family tradition alive."

Col. Gritz, along with four of his brothers, attended their nephew's graduation, many in uniform. Col. Gritz wears a Combat Infantryman's Badge, a Bronze Star for Valor, and a Purple Heart.

Gritz's father, retired Chief Warrant Officer Paul Gritz, and four of Pvt. Gritz's uncles are former Fort Benning Airborne School graduates. Friday's graduation was the first time the family had seen each other in years.

"With everyone in the family being deployed over the world for so many years, it was tough getting all of us together," said Lt. Col. Tom Mackenzie, Pvt. Gritz's uncle.

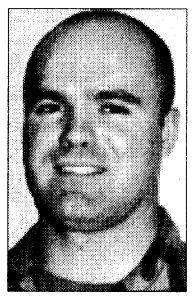
Belligerent, drunk friend needs caring, sober pal

Spc. Douglas DeMaio
Bayonet staff

COMMENTARY



When I think of alcohol or drinking, having had a few drinks before, I feel I'm aware of the effects of alcohol.

However, a recent event shook my sense of understanding about what I thought I knew about the effects of alcohol.

Not only was my friend so drunk he was belligerent, be was also a danger to himself.

But I've seen this before. I had a friend fall from a five-story building because he was too drunk to make a smart decision. And I had a friend who fought a group of eight because he thought he was Superman.

I've seen plenty of poor decisions by drunk people. I've even made a few myself, but my friends have helped me stay out of trouble during my state of drunken decisions. They took care of me to the best of their abilities.

At times, I'm sure they felt anger and frustration because of my actions, words and foul language. But no matter what they felt, they were loyal and thoughtful of my needs.

They understood I was in no condition to care for myself and felt it was their duty to take care me.

I recall the day after my drunken mess that I couldn't convince myself that my behavior the night before was acceptable.

My friends gave me the silent treatment for a day or two, and I never really understood why, but I think they gave me the time to reflect on how poorly I treated them while I was intoxicated.

After looking back at mine and the situation I recently encountered, I believe there is a reasonable answer of what to do when a friend is so drunk he's belligerent.

Take care of him.

There is no clear cut answer on how to take care of him, but your actions will speak louder than your words, especially during the point when he's well beyond inebriation.

You may take the brunt of his actions, but for the most part, it is well worth the effort and sacrifice.

When he realizes how poorly he treated me, a close friend, hopefully he will understand his shortcomings and improve upon them.

None of us are perfect and he might not respond to his vague recollection of the night before or the silent lesson I gave him the day after, but as a friend, he needed and depended on my support.

Those who survive the tough times will bond and become greater friends than those who turn the other cheek to satisfy their own needs.

Snake sends strollers searching

COMMENTARY

I was out riding solo on the Riverwalk the other day, trying to put some distance between myself and me, when two women walking their dogs flagged me down. They didn't fit my profile of a serial killer, so I stopped.

"Do you have a cell phone on you? My friend just got bitten by a snake."

Like every good neurotic mediocre recreational cyclist with a touch of paranoia, I keep a cell phone under my saddle, and pulled it out.

"We want to call Oxbow Meadows. They should know if it was poisonous or not."

I can pull a lot of things from my saddle pack, my jersey pockets and my Camelbak, but a phone book has never been one of them. I opted for the basic "911" and handed the phone to the victim's friend.

I've watched all those doctor shows on TV. I looked down at the victim's ankles and asked her where she had been bitten.

She drew my attention away from her snake-level ankles by holding up her hand.

Her friend was giving directions to our location to the 911 dispatcher. "We're on the access road to the water treatment plant."

Trying to help them narrow down a location, I pointed out that we were at the junction of the bike path and the access road.

Meanwhile, the bite victim kept insisting the snake couldn't have been poisonous, because her (bleeding) hand wasn't getting swollen. I'm not sure who she was trying to convince.

As I packed up the cell phone, I had to ask. "How did it bite your hand?"

"I was petting it."

A better person than me would have quit there. I should have been a better person. "You were petting it?"

Her friend chimed in. "I picked it up, and I was showing her how calm it was, and then when she started touching it, it just bit her. We'll just wait here."

In one split second I went from talking to two people who had an unfortunate chance encounter with the local wildlife to two adults who lacked the good sense God gave little green apples.

I had to cut my ride short that day so I passed them again about 15 minutes later, a quarter of a mile from where I'd left them. They said they were tired of waiting and were leaving.

By my calculations, that made two poor decisions, each, in the span of just a few minutes.

As fate would have it, about a mile down the bike path a snake slithered across my lane and into the grass. It was a good snake. I could tell because it was moving, quickly, in a direction completely different from mine.

But I still didn't stop to pick it up.

Who are our heroes and why?

Pfc. Chris Stephens

COMMENTARY

With the death of TLC singer, Lisa "Left Eye" Lopez, I hear people say how Left Eye was their hero.

I don't know how many times when a famous person has died, I heard about this person being everyone's hero.

How are they our heroes? Is it because they can make musical hits or they can do a tomahawk jam? Why are young people today looking up to the people they see on TV?

As former NBA great Charles Barkley so eloquently said, "I'm not supposed to be your hero, your parents are."

Barkley couldn't be more right.

It is our parents who brought us into this world. It is our parents who love and care for us. It is our parents who provide food, clothing and shelter. If you ask me, they are more of a hero than someone who can throw a football 60 yards.

Now, I'll admit I did look up to athletes and singers throughout my life. I even wanted to be like a lot of them. But let's face it, not everyone has the same skill as a Kobe Bryant, Derek Jeter, Lisa Leslie, Kurt Warner, P Diddy, Britney Spears or U2.

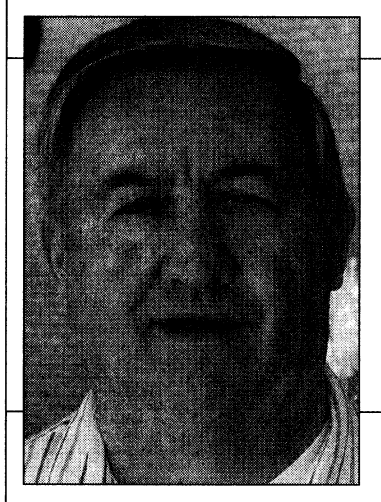
We all have special talents. It is our parents who bring out those talents in us.

Most parents help their children despite the problems going on in their lives. They are willing to sit down and help with homework and help them grow as a person.

I remember times when I would sit down with my mom and dad and just talk about anything. The conversation didn't have to go anywhere. I just wanted to talk to them. And that was OK with them.

Parents make the sacrifices for their children with the hopes that one day their children will have it better than they did. A little extra work in their life usually makes a huge difference in their child's life.

Can an athlete or recording artist sit down with a child and spend quality time with him? Can they teach them how to play catch?



Maybe, but it is hard to spend quality time with all of their fans.

Young people should remember what their parents do for them.

They may not agree with or like some of the things their parents do, but in the end, their parents will always be there to love them.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Note causes grief

My wife went shopping at the commissary May 1, and as she has done for years, parked in the CW4/5 space.

Upon returning, she found a nasty, unsigned note saying family members could not park in their husbands' spaces.

BULL! I'll bet when the CG's wife or a colonel's wife parks in the appropriate spaces, no one leaves a note on their windshield saying "You're only a wife and cannot park here."

Why didn't the individual have the decency to approach my wife and voice his complaint to her in person? Why didn't he sign the note?

I'll tell you why. He is a petty, gutless whiner with nothing better to do than leave nasty, anonymous letters on windshields. What a man!

To you, Gutless Wonder, I say "get a life." I am ashamed you are a fellow senior warrant officer.

Chief of staff primes for retirement

Vona hangs up hat after 30 years as infantry officer

Laura Martinson
Special to the Bayonet©

After 30 years as an infantry officer, Col. Lonnie Vona, Fort Benning's chief of staff, is packing up an office and career's worth of awards, plaques and flags — many gifts from those met along the way -– and heading down South.

"Tampa is my home, and Kathy's parents retired there, so we're going there to be close to them," said Vona, who served in the city at the Special Operations Command for three years.

With all of his awards, Vona hasn't forgotten the little people — literally.

"I paint as a hobby, and I got into painting military figures because of a love of military history," Vona said. "I was in junior high school in the 60s, and that's when we celebrated the centennial of the Civil War. It was widely publicized and I got hooked."

But with a military career comes increasingly greater demands, and his hobby of painting tiny soldiers laid dormant for nearly 25 years.

"I started up again in 1998 because I wanted to teach my sons to appreciate something a little different," said Vona, who traveled with his boys to Gettysburg to study the terrain and battle. They then built a historically accurate diorama of the battlefield, and he picked up the paintbrush once again to recreate Confederate and Union soldiers. "I apply my hobby more to the history than the painting."

Vona lived a historian's dream when he taught military history to ROTC cadets at Furman University, Greenville, S.C., where he also got his master's in education. But ROTC was very different then than when he was a cadet at the University of South Florida.

"If you wore your uniform on campus then, you were considered a pariah or a plague," he said, recalling Vietnam protests that claimed the ROTC building when it was burned to the ground the year before he started.

"Education is definitely a service line to the community," Vona said. "I always considered myself a teacher being an infantry officer. It really goes hand in hand. You're either a collective classroom type teacher to your soldiers, or you're teaching them in the field."

Col. Lonnie Vona, Fort Benning chief of staff, displays Confederate soldiers, including Maj. Gen. Henry Benning, the post's namesake, in his office in Infantry Hall. His two hobbies — military history and painting — mesh into one in his "little soldiers," which he uses as personal gifts for friends and family.

"To be in the infantry, you have to be a people person," he said. "You have to be able to deal with people, because they're your weapon."

Vona's daughters, Tina, 27 and Kara, 23, both followed in the footsteps of a "teaching" father, Tina teaches high school English, and Kara works with troubled teens.

But Vona himself comes from a shrimping family.

"I'm the only man in my family — dad, grandfathers, brothers —who didn't become a shrimper. But they did name a boat after me," he said. "My parents have always been very supportive of my career. They're probably going to need me soon, and I want to be there for them now."

He and Kathy have no immediate plans for a post-career career, but he says they'll deal with that when the time comes.

"We'll figure out our jobs when we get there," said Vona, who ultimately wants to teach some sort of history at the college level, maybe even his alma mater.

Vona and his wife have two boys, Eric, 15 and Sam, 10, both still at home.

"We definitely don't have empty nest syndrome. By the time we do, we'll probably have grandchildren," he said laughing. "We're not nearly as active as we were with the girls, but we're smarter now. We compensate in other ways.

"We made a family decision to stay at Fort Dix until retirement. But that was until he called," Vona said of former post commander, Lt. Gen. John LeMoyne. "He kept asking me to come here and work for him, but he never told me what the job was. When he said it was the chief of staff, I jumped on it.

"But truly there were so many reasons to come here. We were close to home and this is my Army home," he said. "And I'm glad he thought I could make a contribution. He was the kind of guy you wanted to work for."

"I think it's impossible to do all the things you want to do, but I'm very pleased with what I've accomplished," he said.

And apparently others are pleased. At least one person from every previous duty station will attend Vona's retirement ceremony today, and he thinks that's "pretty cool."

Cool, calm and collected is exactly how his friends describe him.

"He's very quiet. Very thoughtful. Very calming," said LeMoyne, now the U.S. Army deputy chief of staff for personnel. "What's that old saying? Still waters run deep. That's how he is. He has great strength and courage. You can always depend on him to do the right thing, no matter how difficult. I have absolute trust and confidence in him.

"I've known him for 30 years," LeMoyne said. "I was his company commander, and I've never forgotten that time together."

And Vona, then seated within the four walls that tell his military story, hasn't forgotten either.

"Leaving will be bittersweet. I like being a soldier, and I'd stay if they'd let me," said Vona. "I hate to go, but I'm happy we're going home."

Afghanistan success doesn't help Crusader

DoD cancels artillery system Crusader

Gerry J. Gilmore
American Forces Press Service

WASHINGTON — The successful use of precision munitions in Afghanistan reinforced DoD's decision to scratch the Army's Crusader artillery system, Deputy Defense Secretary Paul Wolfowitz said here today.

Wolfowitz took part in a Brookings Institution news conference moderated by Stephen Hess of Brookings and former television reporter Marvin Kalb, now affiliated with the Harvard University Kennedy School of Government.

Laser-guided aerial bombs, such as the Joint Direct Attack Munition, have been used to good effect against the Taliban and al Qaeda in Afghanistan, Wolfowitz said. That success "reinforced" DoD's decision to pass on the Crusader, he said.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld is slated to appear May 16 before the Senate Armed Services Committee to discuss his decision to ax the Crusader during talks about the fiscal 2003 DoD budget, Wolfowitz said.

Development work on the Crusader began around 1994, but a lot has happened before and since. For example, the U.S. military has increased its use of precision air-delivered weapons — from 3 percent in Desert Storm to 30 percent in Kosovo to 60 percent so far in Afghanistan.

The American military today is facing similar challenges to transform or modernize itself as it did during the 1920s and 1930s between the world wars, Wolfowitz said. Much of today's military was designed to fight a Cold War opponent in a major land battle. The $11 billion self-propelled Crusader — which is still on the drawing board with no serviceable prototypes built — is designed to rapidly shoot 155 mm shells at enemy troops as much as 30 miles away.

Envisioned as a replacement for the aging M-109 Paladin self-propelled howitzer series, Wolfowitz called the 40-ton Crusader and its 30-ton support vehicle "a good system — it's definitely an advance over our current artillery."

However, he continued, the U.S. military is now developing a rapid-deployable force that will rely on airlift capability to quickly deliver troops and equipment to hot spots around the globe.

For example, the Army's transformational 19-ton Stryker multiwheeled armored vehicle can be airlifted. The 70-ton Abrams tank, a Cold-War "legacy" piece of equipment, must be deployed by ship, a much slower process.

In that context, Crusader, weighing in at a total of more than 70 tons, is not the kind of transformational leap in technology the U.S. forces need for the 21st century, Wolfowitz said.

He noted that Excalibur precision-guided artillery munitions and an upgraded Multiple Launch Rocket System could fill the void left by canceling the Crusader. He also suggested that the Future Combat System family of vehicles being developed by the Army might provide a lighter-weight, Crusader-like variant.

In answer to those resistant to military change, Wolfowitz pointed out that some Navy officials 25 years ago were against placing Tomahawk cruise missiles aboard submarines at the expense of torpedoes. Sub-launched Tomahawks have since proved their worth, the deputy defense secretary said.

"In the case of the Crusader (cancellation) we're looking at accelerating precision artillery which would deliver 10-meter accuracy," he said.

That, in conjunction with an improved rocket delivery system or other transformational weaponry would be "revolutionary," he said.

Soldier learns life lessons on Somalia's streets

Aviator remembers fiery crash, fight in Mogadishu

Laura Martinson
Special to the Bayonet©

Chief Warrant Officer Perry Alliman was flying over Mogadishu, Somalia, in a Blackhawk helicopter Sept. 25, 1993, when the aircraft's belly was struck by a rocket-propelled grenade fired by a "skinny" on a rooftop.

Alliman, now a small group leader for the Aviation Warrant Officer Advanced Course at Fort Rucker, Ala., remembers the crash and fire vividly, and walked Fort Benning aircrew and soldiers through the weeks leading up to both incidents Wednesday, explaining each day brought mounting tensions and violence.

"Every day got a little more violent, a little more dangerous and a little more hot," Alliman said.

So hot that he and his pilot in command, Chief Warrant Officer Dale Shrader, were the only survivors of a five-man crew to make it out of the chopper, which was quickly engulfed in flames. He remembers it as the "second Blackhawk Down," although the crash and inadvertent abandonment at the site happened 10 days prior to the now infamous event.

Alliman and Shrader were left on the ground in an alley in Mogadishu when overhead aircraft made the assumption there were no survivors, but only because Shrader hid his strobe light in the dirt because of approaching Somalis.

"They were standing right in front of me," said Alliman, who waited on the ground for hours, burned, bleeding and facing certain death. "They went away for awhile, but when they returned, they saw Dale's leg and started throwing grenades at us. I don't know how we lived through it, other than by the grace of God. I really shouldn't be here, if you lay all the odds on the table."

The first grenade, which landed just inches from Alliman, never exploded.

"Dale started reciting John 3:16 to me, and saying to God, 'I wish I'd told more people about you, Lord, but I'm ready to go now. I know it must be our time.'"

But Alliman thinks God had different plans for the two aviators, as minutes after their prayer, a man emerged from the alley and seemed to

> "I don't know how we lived through it, other than by the grace of God. I really shouldn't be here, if you lay all the odds on the table."
> Chief Warrant Officer
> Somalia veteran

"show them the way."

"I have to go to him," Shrader told Alliman, and moments later, the man helped them to a vehicle that ultimately carried them to safety and medical attention. "We don't know who he was. All we know is he was a Somali, and to me, an angel," said Alliman, who after leaving the alley, never heard another word about the man.

"Everybody thinks they want to go out and get some action. And they all think, 'We have the coolest stuff and the best equipment. We're invincible.' It's what we're all trained for everyday," Alliman said. "But to actually do it is a pretty sobering experience."

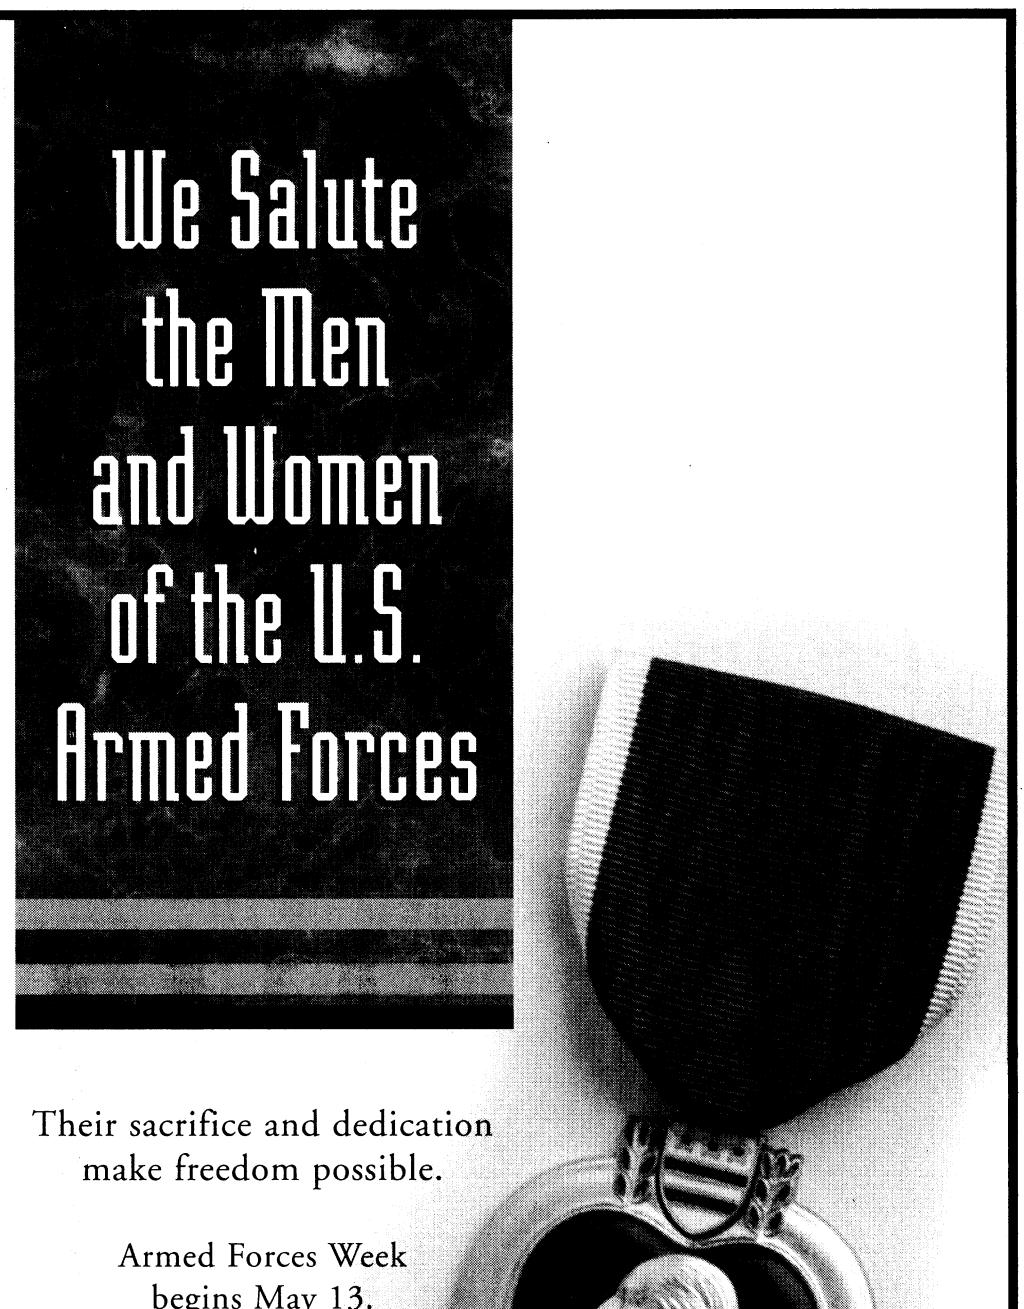
And talking about it is sobering indeed, Alliman said. Inspirational maybe. Therapeutic — definitely.

"It wasn't always that way," Alliman said. "I still get choked up, depending upon the audience, especially if my wife is there."

"I never wanted all of this Somalia stuff to be a defining part of my life, and now it is," said Alliman, who now uses his story to reach others with his battlefield — and personal — lessons. "I've been able to reach a lot of people with this story, and I get to tell it to every warrant officer that comes through here. They need to know they're training as aviators for war, and not as airline pilots."

"He's a prime example of someone who can paint the big picture and draw it down to the individual that never thought he'd be in that position, but he was," said Chief Warrant Felix Rodriguez, Aviation Department, Directorate of Operations and Training.

"The event was a life changer, and miracles do happen," said Alliman, who was back on flight status within five months, despite third degree burns on 33 percent of his body. "But the biggest lesson learned was a better appreciation for my family and friends. You just can't waste your days."



At Logan's, we've been fixing food and drinks pretty much the same way since the day we opened our doors. That means hand-cutting every USDA Choice steak. Grilling up only fresh chicken breasts. Not skimping on portions. And always keeping a basket of fresh-baked rolls on the table. Some people call this value. We just call it dinner.

VA benefits guide available online

Free service to help thousands

Sgt. 1st Class Kathleen T. Rhem
Army News Service

The Department of Veterans Affairs has made its comprehensive benefits guide available for free on the Internet.

Federal Benefits for Veterans and Dependents is a 100-page handbook describing benefits provided by the VA and an overview of programs and services for veterans provided by other federal agencies.

VA officials estimate most of America's 25 million veterans qualify for at least some VA benefits, but many are unaware of their entitlements. This handbook includes a listing of toll-free numbers, World Wide Web information resources, and VA facilities.

Most veterans are eligible for healthcare and burial benefits. Many are also eligible for home loan guarantees, educational assistance, vocational rehabilitation, life insurance, and compensation for service-connected disabilities.

This guide explains how to access many of these benefits online. For instance, it provides a Web address and instructions for enrolling via the Internet into the VA healthcare system. The book describes in detail the priority for care and services available. Separate sections describe specialized services available to Gulf War veterans and those exposed to Agent Orange or radiation.

The Montgomery GI Bill and other education benefits are explained in depth. Burial benefits and employment service are also covered, as are rate charts for the various forms of compensation VA provides.

The book can be purchased through the Government Printing Office for $5 for U.S.-based customers and $6.25 for those overseas by calling toll-free (866) 512-1800. By providing it online at www.va.gov/opa/feature/, the VA hopes to make the information available to more veterans.

Post to celebrate Memorial Day

Fort Benning to honor fallen soldiers

Angela Sachitano
Special to the Bayonet©

As Memorial Day draws near, Americans everywhere will look for avenues to honor the thousands of men and women who have given their lives for freedom.

And Fort Benning residents won't have far to go to pay tribute to fallen soldiers.

The post and surrounding community have planned several events that are open and free to the public.

"People come from all over the country to see what we have to offer here," said Frank Hanner, director of the Fort Benning Infantry Museum. "Our community does a great job at paying respect to our fallen comrades."

Residents flock to the Infantry Museum every Memorial Day to view the exhibits of past and this year, present battles.

"We will have a special exhibit this Memorial Day," Hanner said. "The exhibit will honor the rangers who were killed in the helicopter crash during Operation Enduring Freedom last October."

The Enduring Freedom Exhibit, along with other tributes from past wars will be open at the Infantry Museum from 10 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. on Memorial Day.

There are also several monuments located outside across from the museum that residents can view.

The monuments reflect on the War Dog, World War II, and the Leopoldville, a ship that went down in 1944, Hanner said.

There will also be a Memorial Day ceremony at 9 a.m. May 27 at the Main Post Cemetery. Along with patriotic music, a wreath will be placed on the grave of the unknown soldier.

For those people who wish to venture off post, a special memorial service honoring Vietnam veterans will be at the Vietnam Veterans Memorial Park on Buena Vista Road in Columbus.

"There are 119 deceased veterans being honored with their name on the wall at the park," said Lonnie Jackson, co-founder of the Vietnam Veterans Memorial Park. "A flag is flown for each name listed on the wall."

But many of the memorial flags are worn and damaged.

"The replacement size is a 3-by-5 nylon flag," Jackson said. "We have ordered the flags from Lowe's Department Store, and we are asking residents to buy one and bring it to the ceremony. It's a small donation, but the result will be a wonderful tribute to our vets."

The ceremony will start at 10:30 a.m Saturday. Food will be served.

For more information and directions to the ceremony, call Jackson at 653-5357.

Concert field to open on Sand Hill

Post to model programs, events after Jackson's

Spc. Douglas DeMaio
Bayonet staff

Construction is underway on an entertainment park for basic training soldiers.

Morale, Welfare and Recreation decided Weatherby Field is an appropriate area to aid in their efforts to increase morale for Sand Hill soldiers.

The park will feature local and regional bands for soldiers who are not in the total control phase of basic training, said Brian Smith, marketing director for the Directorate of Community Activities.

"We're modeling the idea after Fort Jackson," said James Shoemaker, program manager for the concert project. "They have had great success with their concert program to improve morale."

In 1994, Fort Benning had a similar program with concerts at Doughboy Stadium, but the cost, logistical problems and traffic congestion on post hindered the efforts of the program, Smith said. Later, MWR worked on a solution to meet the needs of soldiers and to further increase the efforts to fulfill public interests. The current location serves this purpose.

There are many reasons why MWR picked Weatherby Field as a reasonable location, Smith said.

The first reason is good access for large events, which won't congest Fort Benning. It also addresses the needs of Sand Hill soldiers.

"We needed to bring the entertainment to the soldiers," Shoemaker said. "The farthest battalion is 1.8 miles away from the field, so it's within walking distance for all the soldiers."

The first concert for the soldiers will be mid-June.

However, the basic training soldiers aren't the only ones who will enjoy the entertainment of Weatherby Field.

MWR is toying with the idea of having an Oktoberfest at the field in the fall, Smith said.

"Right now, the activities are just for basic training soldiers, but there is a tentative plan for a post event in the fall," Smith said.

By next summer, it is possible the whole post will be able to attend certain events, such as the All-Army Concert Series.

"We're really excited about it," Smith said. "It really opens up a lot of options."

Producing such a dynamic concert field took a tremendous amount of planning and problem solving, but it is all worth it for the soldiers, he said.

"There is a lot of work involved, but this is the part of our job we enjoy, anything to help our soldiers," Smith said.

An electrical system is being installed on the field that could power more than 13 homes, Shoemaker said. The power will allow for the area to be well lit and will give the performers ample power to produce quality entertainment for the soldiers, Shoemaker said.

young, start putting away $100 a month into the Thrift Savings Plan and it really can add up quite quickly."

The TSP allows soldiers to invest 1 to 7 percent of their income on a pre-tax basis, which grows tax-deferred. Soldiers can allot 100 percent of bonus, incentive and special pay up to the IRS maximum ($11,000 for 2002).

"The important thing to remember is that you must contribute from base pay in order to contribute from a bonus," Pratcher said.

The TSP funds are:

- G Fund, the government securities
- C Fund, the Standard and Poor's 500 common stock index
- F Fund, the government and corporate bond index
- I Fund, the international stock index
- Wilshire 4500 "small business" stock index S Fund.

Only G Fund accounts are guaranteed by the government; all others are subject to market forces.

In the past year, the Dow Jones' Industrial Average has declined approximately 6.5 percent. The technology-rich NASDAQ has dropped approximately 21.5 percent for the same period. This shouldn't concern soldiers who invest in the C, I and S equity funds, Pratcher said.

Besides the tax advantages, dollar cost averaging will benefit soldiers at retirement — the very reason they invest in the TSP, she said.

That is, when soldiers sign up for the TSP, they allot a fixed percentage of their pay check every month. When the market is lower, soldiers buy more shares of the mutual funds. When the market is higher, they buy less shares of funds. The result is a lower average cost per share and an increased profit in the long run.

"What happens is the miracle of mathematics," said Jason Dickinson, registered representative and agent, First Command Financial Planning. "It helps an investor beat the market without even trying."

For example, if investors bought $2,000 worth of shares at $6 per share, they would own only 333.33 shares. (See above graph.) If they dollar-cost averaged into the fund, given the hypothetical monthly prices, they would own 456.6 shares. More shares equal more money over time.

There will be classes on the TSP at the Family Unit Network Center, Building 359. The two-hour classes are at 9 a.m. May 30, 1:30 p.m. June 21, 6:30 p.m. June 25, and 9 a.m. July 9.

Soldiers can also attend the Financial Counseling Intake at 8:15 a.m. on Mondays in Building 2624, Soldiers' Plaza.

soldiers.

Gov. Roy Barnes proclaimed Saturday Working Dog Memorial Day in Georgia, and Stanley Stockdale said it was a great opportunity to educate the public about dog handlers, like Hartsock, who served on the front line daily.

"It's best not to be first or last in battle," said Stockdale, who served with the 47th Scout Dog Platoon in Vietnam. "But war dogs and their handlers were asked to be first over and over again. They were always on the front line."

War dogs have served in many capacities since World War II, Stackdale said, including scouting, tracking, sentry, patrolling, mine and drug detection and homeland security.

Though dog handlers were often unable to carry a weapon during combat, they and their canine companions were considered one of the Army's greatest assets in Vietnam. The Viet Cong issued a special bounty on scout dogs and raised trip wires so dogs would walk under them.

"And they remained steadfast under impossible conditions. They did the job they were trained to do, and all they asked in return was food, water, praise, a pat, a hug, a scratch behind the ear. They gave so much," said Jonathan Wahl, who also served with the 47th.

Mendez said the governor's proclamation and Saturday's ceremony shows efforts to educate the public about war dogs have been successful.

More and more handlers are "coming out of the woodwork," he said, and educating a generation that's had little exposure to canine combatants.

Even the Hasbro toy company has joined the war dog effort. It recently honored dog teams by introducing a dog handler to its G.I. Joe series.

That's how Caleb Ardoin first learned about war dogs. The 11-year-old from Lake Charles, La., spotted the G.I. Joe in a toy store and decided to base his fifth-grade social studies project on war dogs.

The project placed fourth in a Louisiana state competition and garnered Ardoin an invitation to the ceremony at Fort Benning from members of the the Vietnam Dog Handlers Association, whom he met online during his research.

"I've learned a lot and heard a lot of great stories. And I've made a lot of friends," said Ardoin, who's planning a career in the Army.

Mendez said he hopes to see more pedestals added to the memorial to honor U.S. Marine Corps, Coast Guard and Navy Sentry and Security dogs, the U.S. Army Vietnam Veterinarian Corps, KIA handlers and dogs and war dog teams from Panama, Libya, Bolivia, Peru, Colombia and the Philippines.

Individuals or organizations interested in contributing to the War Dog Pedestal Fund should send a check to the Columbus Monument Company for the "War Dog Memorial," care of Jesse Mendez, 1205 Bismark Dr., Columbus GA, 31907-4013.

life to the United States Army."

For Pvt. Gritz, serving his country was not always a priority. He spent his 20s surfing in California and said basic training was a distant thought. It wasn't until Sept. 11 that Gritz said he wanted to be part of his family's commitment to the Army.

"I was sitting on my mother's couch looking at the atlas and pointing out Afghanistan," Gritz said. "I wanted to go there. I knew right then I would be joining the Army, and my life would never be the same."

Six months later, Gritz marched down Kanell Field for graduation. At 33, he's just two years short of the basic training age limit of 35.

"You'd be surprised how many men in my platoon were enlisting in their late 20s and early 30s," Pvt. Gritz said. "At least half of us are joining the Army purely to fight terrorism, not to get college money."

As Col. Gritz watched his nephew salute the flag for the first time as a graduate, he recalled the day back in 1967 when his own unit was waiting to be deployed.

"If I could give my nephew any advice, it would be to fight hard," Col. Gritz said. "When I was in Vietnam, we didn't have the love and the respect from the public that these soldiers have. It touches my heart that America supports our soldiers."

The Gritz family knows firsthand the risk their nephew is taking by joining the military at this unsettling time. One of their own family members, Marine 1st Lt. Toby Gritz died during Vietnam.

"Toby was our hero," said Capt. Rock Mackenzie, Gritz's uncle. "He gave up his young life while serving his country.

"Jeff has seen that sacrifice," Capt. Mackenzie said. "The only reason we, as former soldiers, are standing here today is by the grace of God. And the grace of God is what will keep Jeff safe."

not able to plan or organize or do very much."

In addition, he said, Afghanistan has been made more hospitable for a better government to take root.

More work needs to be accomplished, Wolfowitz said, noting that pockets of hard-core Taliban and al Qaeda remain in the region. He emphasized that U.S. government officials are working to ensure that America doesn't end up leaving only to have the Taliban regain power in Afghanistan.

Assisting the Afghans in establishing a democratic government "is a big challenge," Wolfowitz said. The "pretty wild" country has never had a strong, centralized government, he said.

Methods used to establish and maintain peace and stability in Bosnia or Kosovo, he added, most likely wouldn't work in Afghanistan.

Although he thinks U.S. forces will be in Afghanistan "for a while," Wolfowitz is heartened by the progress made so far.

"I think we've accomplished a lot already," he said.

Field exercise tests pathfinders

Field problem challenges students

Pfc. Brian Trapp
Bayonet staff

At 5:15 a.m. Tuesday morning, soldiers sit in a small room as the news comes in, terrorists have taken control of "Pavilion" and the pathfinder students of Class 08-02 need to return its president to power. With that begins mission one of six, for the pathfinder field training exercise. The students' mission is to conduct an air assault on Pavilion.

During exercises like these students use the tactical knowledge gained from the classroom to solve the field problem, said Sgt. Adam Berg, pathfinder student, Massachusetts National Guard.

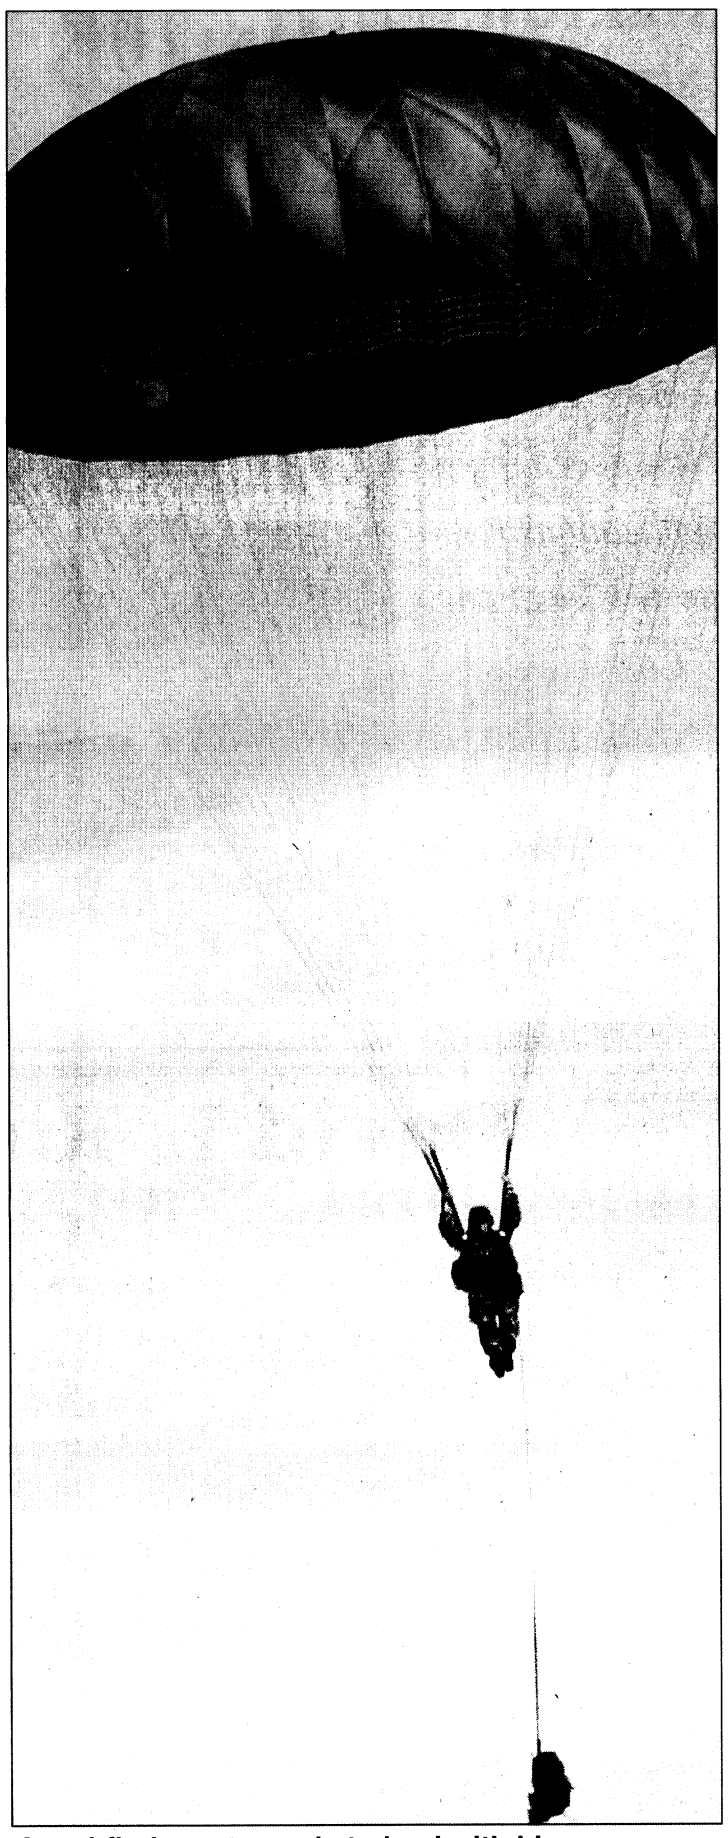
The pathfinder students had three hours to set up and execute a parachute entry onto the Arkman Drop Zone to begin their hands-on ground operations.

When the students hit the ground, they had to assess the area and setup a ground mark release system.

The system allows aircraft to make a drop using ground markers to communicate to the pilot where the drop zone will be. The students also simulated radioing in medical evacuation for an injured soldier.

In these operations, teamwork plays a big part, especially with a grade on the line.

"Overall, we have a really good group," said 1st Lt. Robert Murphy, 82nd Airborne Division, Fort Bragg, N.C. "Any school like this it's essential to work well together."



The experience the students receive from executing the mission helps some people who learn better by doing something firsthand," said Staff Sgt. Wade Breaud, pathfinder instructor.

Pathfinders are very important to the Army, said Sgt. 1st Class Robert Harris, pathfinder school section sergeant. "Without pathfinders, insertions and extractions would be impossible, because you need the subject matter expert on the ground for those operations. Having a Pathfinder in the unit is a great asset for the ground-unit commanders."

"It's a great class," Berg said. "It's great to see the whole concept, the instructors show you in class then so it's a real crawl-walk-run program." During the duration of the exercise the students set up verbal initiated release systems, computed air release points and helicopter landing sites.

The students were not the only ones learning during the exercise. Eight soldiers from the 101st Air Assault School, Fort Campbell, Ky., shadowed the pathfinder instructors to start up their own pilot program.

"We learn firsthand how to instruct with the guidance of the experienced instructors," said Sgt. 1st Class Fredrick Arrington, pilot program NCOIC. "Looking at it from the instructor side of the class, things make more sense than when you were going through the class.

Captains to be promoted at 38 months

Accelerated pin-on to end shortage

Gary Sheftick
Army News Service

The Army will promote officers earlier to the grade of captain, beginning in October.

The accelerated pin-on of bars should help alleviate a shortage of 1,900 captains, according to Army personnel officials. They said many lieutenants are now filling captain jobs. The Army also has 2,200 more lieutenants than it is authorized and the early promotions will help level that out, officials said.

The early promotions will help align the company-grade "inventory" with available positions, said Maj. John Thurman, an operations research analyst in the Directorate of Military Personnel Policy, G1.

The new policy will take effect in October with a gradual implementation, Thurman said. Officers promoted to captain in November will have 40 months of service, instead of the current 42 months. Those promoted in December will have 39 months. A new captain's board is scheduled to meet in November. Those promoted in the spring will have 39-40 months of service, Thurman said, and by June the new policy should be fully implemented with all promotions at 38 months.

The Fiscal Year 2002 Defense Authorization Act authorized the Army to promote officers to captain after just 36 months of service, but Army leaders determined that 38 months would help solve the shortage and still allow lieutenants developmental time as platoon leaders.

"It will require management at the battalion-commander level to make sure lieutenants get trained," one officer said.

Before 2000, captains were not promoted until they had 48 months of service, except during wartime, officials said. During the Vietnam War, some of today's generals were promoted to captain with just two years of service.

Army Chief of Staff Gen. Eric K. Shinseki was promoted to captain in 1967 after 29 months of service. Many officers in Vietnam were promoted to captain after 24 months of service — including Gen. Montgomery Meigs, now head of U.S. Army Europe; Gen. John N. Abrams at Training and Doctrine Command; and Gen. Thomas A. Schwartz, commander of U.S. Forces Korea.

The congressional authorization for early promotions to captain has a sunset clause and expires Oct. 1, 2005. At that time, Thurman said leaders will need to reassess whether early promotions to captain would still be beneficial.

The accelerated promotions may substantially bring down the shortage of captains by that time, Thurman said, but added that it won't be a fast fix.

"Our deficit was a decade in the making," Thurman said, explaining that it will take some time to reverse it.

> "We don't think this policy will have any affect on an officer's decision to stay or leave."
> Maj. John Thurman
> operations research analyst,
> Directorate of Military Personnel Policy

The captain shortage was caused by an under-accession of lieutenants in the early 1990s, Thurman said. Then it was compounded by attrition during the booming economy of the late 1990s, he said, when job offers were plentiful from the private sector.

Thurman said there was never any intent for the new policy to have an affect on retention of captains.

"We don't think this policy will have any affect on an officer's decision to stay or leave," Thurman said. "Getting promoted to captain four months early is not going to change your world."

Army personnel officials said that captain attrition rates have "stabilized, at or about normal levels." Last year, about 60 fewer captains left active duty than in fiscal 2000.

Development program goes through HOTEX

Students learn about soldiers jobs

Tomorrow's leaders met today's Army in a Hands-On Tactical Exercise May 10 with the 29th Infantry Regiment.

Participants in the Department of Defense Executive Leadership Development Program visited Fort Benning last week to get a close look at the Army's weapons and war-fighting systems.

Demonstrations included riding in a Bradley tank, a check fire demo, displays on antitank and Bradley systems, which included the Javelin and the M2A3, and small arms and sight systems.

"We wanted them to see the weapon systems we use on a day-to-day basis," said Maj. Gary Linhart, executive officer, 29th Infantry Regiment.

The ELDP provides training and education to a select group of upwardly mobile DoD civilian employees and soldiers. In order to give participants a greater overview of America's warfighters, the 10-month program provides field experience at military installations around the world, said Tom Koslawski, ELDP director.

"It gives them a hands-on experience instead of sitting in a classroom and learning about the soldiers' jobs.

"We want them to get tired, dirty and sweaty."

During the program, the group goes through various types of training in all four of the services.

They deploy to a lot of stations to learn the various types of training through which the military goes.

Pfc. Chris Stephens

Sgt. Pierre Williams takes Susan Sherrell on a ride in the Bradley tank during the May 10 HOTEX program.

"The group is deployed around the country and around the world seven to nine days a month," Koslawski said.

The group is also briefed on intelligence operations, and defense and international news.

"About 75 percent of the group has no military experience," Koslawski said. "This gives them a better understanding of the soldiers' needs."

For more information on the program, go to the ELDP Web site at www.cpms.osd.mil/eldp, or contact the DoD ELDP office at (703) 696-9613.

Soldiers compete in combatives tournament

Soldiers fight to be called 'the best'

1st Lt. Stacy A. Picard and 1st Lt. Alexander Vindman
11th Infantry Regiment

More than 100 competitors from 13 units met May 1 for the Fort Benning Combatives Tournament.

"The purpose of the tournament is to encourage good training through friendly competition," said Sgt. 1st Class Matthew Larsen, a master combatives trainer with 1st Battalion, 11th Infantry Regiment. "The defining characteristic of a warrior is the willingness to close with the enemy. Combatives training allows participants to practice this idea. It's an ideal way to train two opponents each working their hardest to win the match."

The program has grown immensely during the past nine months, said Maj. Michael Dugan, operations officer, 11th Inf. Regt. And the regiment plans to have a tournament every three months to continue the rapid growth and expansion of participants in the combatives program.

"Those who participated had a chance to actually work the stuff they've been learning in class and see that it works. It's a fun event and it's a great program. We want to share it with more people," Dugan said.

The regiment holds combatives tournaments to correspond with the schedules of the Infantry Captain's Career Course and Infantry Officer's Basic Course.

It has become a crucial part of training and provided the opportunity to train one another on ground fighting tactics, while preparing them for future endeavors, said Capt. Chris Barkocy, Co. B, 1st Bn., 11th Inf. Regt.

As participants in the tournament, Officer Candidates John Spencer and Richard Eaton, 3rd Bn., 11th Inf. Regt., each placed first in their weight classes.

"The tournament was a healthy competition," Spencer said. "It helped our class as a whole see how combatives works outside of the step-by-step training we receive. It proves that our training paid off."

"I wanted to show my support for (the battalion)," Eaton said. "It's a great program and the instructors helped us learn a lot. The tournament gave us experience so we'll know what to expect for next time. Hopefully, those who are hesitant or afraid to compete will next time."

This double-elimination tournament placed as much emphasis on the individual effort as it did on the team effort.

Combatants competed by weight classes, which were broken up into clusters of eight competitors.

Winners earned more points than their opponents, based on the different tactics and gaining a dominant body position.

They guaranteed victory when they forced their opponent to submit.

"It's important to build the warrior ethos in all soldiers. Combatives training does this while safely building the competitive edge and fighting spirit in soldiers," Barkocy said.

The Infantry Officer Basic Course, 2nd Bn., 11th Inf. Regt., team placed first in this tournament. Participants from the 75th Ranger Regiment placed second, followed by B Co., 1st Bn., 11th Inf. Regt. A team trophy was awarded to the team with the most points at the conclusion of the tournament, which lasted approximately 4 hours.

"I have seen several different formats for the showcasing of the Army combatives program, but Fort Benning's combatives program seems to be the most professionally run and best organized," said 1st Lt. Alexander Vindman, Tactical Officer, 3rd Bn., 11th Inf. Regt.

"As the coach and member of the (battalion) team, I am excited to see that the command has chosen to actively support such events and direct more focus toward combatives training in general."

Memories of taunting still haunting

Bridgett Siter
Special to the Bayonet©

Most of my memories of high school are wonderful. I had a great time.

Unfortunately, that's not the case for many students, and I'm well aware that some of my classmates don't share my enthusiasm for revisiting those days.

In fact, one of my few bad memories involves a young lady whose recollections of high school must surely be painful. I don't even know her name, don't remember if I even knew it then. It was a very big school.

She was a rather plump, plain girl with stringy brown hair. She was also a special ed student, and therefore the butt of many jokes, though I'd like to think she wasn't always aware of it.

At our senior dance, one of the coolest guys in school asked her to dance. I still cringe at the memory.

She was so excited.

He was so cruel.

She was all smiles.

He was taunting her behind her back, while other dancers stepped back to watch and point and laugh.

I'm ashamed to say no one tried to stop it. I looked away, embarrassed for the girl, sorry I'd ever considered him a friend.

Kids can be so cruel.

So I was terrified the day my son's teacher suggested he might have a learning disability. Perhaps we should consider special ed?

My world went still. I could feel the blood drain from my head.

No.

That's all I said. No.

No, my son won't be in special ed. No, no one will ever point and snicker and whisper behind his back. No, he won't wear that label. No, no, no.

To make a long story short, it never came to that. Jake took a battery of tests to determine what was retarding his ability to read. He was diagnosed with a visual perception deficiency, which is a technical way of saying his eyes see one thing, his brain interprets it differently.

I tell people, 'It's like dyslexia, but it's not.' That's a definition most people are comfortable with.

Along the way we also discovered Jake has an exceptional IQ. The psychologist explained it to him this way — "Jacob, your IQ is two points less than Einstein, and guess what? Einstein had a reading disability just like you. You're going to do great things with your life."

God bless that woman.

My little boy went from being stressed and depressed — "I'm so dumb," he'd say — to a confident little learner who tutored his second-grade classmates in math and science.

We decided early on that Jake would not use his disability as an excuse to fail.

What's so special about Ed?

Bridgett Siter
Special to the Bayonet©

Due to the sensitive nature of this material, the soldier's name has been changed.

Edward was a struggling fourth-grader reading at a second-grade level the year his parents divorced. Angry and frustrated, Edward rebelled, became belligerent in class, and his grades plummeted.

"I was a wild child. They didn't know what to do with me," he said. "I was kicked out of two different schools. Finally they put me in a special education class."

There he languished for seven years, unchallenged and unmotivated — "held to a lower standard," he said.

"I didn't have to take a foreign language, didn't have to take certain standardized tests. I was bored, and I didn't think I belonged there. I basically just fell through the cracks."

As he got older, other students began to ostracize him and his special ed classmates, Edward said.

"Especially in junior high. That's when they got cruel. I remember there was this one girl I liked who wouldn't talk to me. You couldn't be one of the 'in crowd' in special ed."

But Edward excelled as an athlete, and his success on the field boosted his confidence. Though he occasionally used drugs during high school, he believes his athletic prowess kept him from dropping out of school and "getting into the drug scene big time."

"Sports were the great equalizer," he said. "I was always the first to be picked for anything. I was lucky. Most of the special ed kids didn't have that advantage."

Edward was "mainstreamed" into a regular classroom his senior year and graduated in 1992. After a year of real-world experience — washing dishes to pay bills and rent, he decided to go give college a try.

"I still loved sports, and my PE teachers always looked like they were having fun. So I sold my car to pay for school," said Edward, who graduated from the University of North Colorado with a 3.4 GPA and a degree in physical education.

Edward taught high school PE and subbed in various academic classrooms, including a seventh-grade English class where he met a young student who reminded him of himself.

"Her name was Alyssa, and she was very bright. But English was her second language, so she couldn't read very well. They put her in a special education class," he said.

> "I know I'm a stronger person for what I went through. But when I was a kid, life didn't make much sense."
> Edward
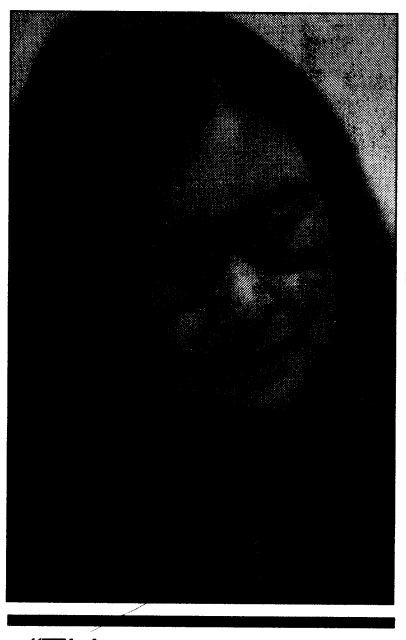
> Former special education student

Day after day, Alyssa refused to read with her classmates, despite Edward's encouragement. Finally he decided to share his own experience with his students.

"I told the whole class when I was their age I was reading at a second-grade level. That got their attention. They needed to understand that some kids have a harder time than others, and she needed to see that she wasn't doomed to fail," he said.

Alyssa still struggled, but she seemed more confident. She opened up more," he said. "I don't know where she's at now, but I always hoped I gave her something to help."



Edward believes his experience in special education made him a better teacher, more sensitive to the needs of his students and more aware of intolerance and bigotry.

"Labels are stigmas. They divide people. Phys ed is all about teamwork and camaraderie," he said. "So I used my experience to encourage understanding and respect through sports and physical activities. If there was a problem, we stopped everything and sat down together to talk about it."

Edward joined the Army last year "to pay off student loans in three years instead of 10." He's now stationed at Fort Benning and planning to pursue a master's degree in sports marketing.

But wherever he goes, whatever he does with his life, Edward said he'll always speak candidly about his experience as a special education student, struggling to find his identity in the face of apathy and ostracism.

"I know I'm a stronger person for what I went through," he said. "But when I was a kid, life didn't make much sense. I thought I was at a dead end, but I didn't give up. And I rejected their labels. That made all the difference."

Round table: Educators dispel misconceptions about special education

Bridgett Siter
Special to the Bayonet©

The right to a free and public education for all children is still a relatively young concept. The federal government didn't guarantee education to mentally, physically and learning disabled children until 1975.

Though many school systems already had special education programs in place, the new law heralded an influx of students previously unschooled or schooled in private institutions.

School systems around the country struggled to meet the demands of the increased work load. With limited resources, many if not most, special ed programs consisted of self-contained classrooms where special needs children were assigned without regard to the severity, degree or nature of the disability.

Students with mild reading disabilities shared a classroom with severely handicapped students who required more individual, physical assistance.

Students with mild disabilities who might have flourished with temporary or minimum one-on-one assistance often fell through the cracks, languishing in a classroom unchallenged as teachers struggled to accommodate all their students' needs.

"Special ed" became synonymous with mental retardation and other terms considered insensitive and politically incorrect in today's progressive school systems. A stigma was born.

Fort Benning Schools director of student services said post schools have been working hard for many years to dispel stereotypes about disabled children.

"The truth is all children come with special needs, whether its a physical disability or adjustment problems because they move to a new school. That's the nature of a school system on a military institution," said Tommye Woods.

"But it's also in our nature — it's kind of an institutional expectation — that whether or not that child has a label, we'll meet them where they are and take them as far as they'll go."

> "This generation is proof that things are changing. We don't see the stigma, the cruelty children with disabilities once faced."

To that end, Fort Benning schools developed a program that integrates children with disabilities into regular ed classrooms. They leave their classmates periodically to attend resource classrooms where they receive the individualized assistance they require, be it speech therapy or tutoring.

Fort Benning Schools serve 319 students with documented disabilities. That's 10 percent of the student population of 3,060, which mirrors the national average.

Those with more profound disabilities who need constant one-on-one assistance and require basic life skills training are taught in a self-contained classroom. Preschoolers attend Stowers Elementary and first- through fifth-graders attend Loyd Elementary. Faith Middle School also has a self-contained special education classroom.

I recently met with Loyd Elementary School principal, Angie McPherson, a former special education teacher, Mable Wilson and Jean Anderson, special ed teachers, Sheree McNabb, resource teacher for children with learning disabilities, and Woods, to discuss the nature and philosophy of Fort Benning's special education programs.

Could you explain the difference between a self-contained special education classroom and resource classrooms?

McNabb: "All students who can be served in a regular ed classroom will be. Self-contained classrooms are for those who need help with basic skills, like tying their shoes, brushing their teeth, how to cross the street safely. They may have an emotional or physical disability."

Children see snipers up close

Snipers, K-9 unit make Wilson's field day successful

Now you see him, now you don't. Wilson Elementary School students were wide-eyed and open-mouthed May 10, as the Fort Benning Sniper Unit demonstrated how easily a soldier can disguise himself.

"At night, you think they are a bush," said Samuel Newman, a fourth-grader at Wilson Elementary. "They're camouflaged and no one can see them."

"They looked like monsters," said fourth-grader Brandon Jones.

Ghillies, weapons, the whole works.

The snipers gave the children a full lesson on Sniper School at Wilson Elementary's annual field day.

"We teamed up with the snipers to teach kids a little more about the post around them," said Michael Campos, Wilson Elementary Physical Education Teacher.

Campos is in charge of the school's Field Day Celebration and worked with the Partners in Education, Basic Training Brigade, to make sure the event was a success.

Children put down their pencils and closed the books for the entire day.

Instead, they were outside learning about Fort Benning, competing in games, and participating in the annual school parade.

"A lot of the children's parents are deployed right now," Campos said. "This is a great day for the children."

Part of the Sniper presentation allowed children the chance to see the sniper rifles up close and even try on a ghillie suit for themselves.

"It was kind of scary because you couldn't see the people at all," said fourth-grader Brittany Bulock.

Tanks were also a big hit at the event. Children crawled inside and all over them, acting as if they themselves were in combat.

"We got to see the motor of the tanks and sit on the big wheels," Bulock said. "I want to drive one."

Teachers and parents weren't about to let that happen.

"These kids know these machines aren't toys," Campos said. "They all have a good idea of what the military does because they see it firsthand."

Another big surprise for the children came when the Fort Benning K-9 unit showed up with police dogs. At one point, the dogs followed orders from their trainers and viciously attacked the protected arm of an officer.

Some children were startled, but most knew the act was all part of training.

"The trainers work real hard with the dogs, " Jones said. "It was neat to see them attack like that. I guess that's what they would do to the bad guy."

At the end of the day, Wilson Elementary School students admitted they had a day they would never forget.

"This is the best day of the year," Newman said. "My friends and I love our school. I don't ever want to leave here."

Environmental group honors principal

Walking trail one reason for recognition

McBride Elementary School Principal Del Hicks has always been passionate about the environment.

But it was his ability to convey that passion to his students that has won the principal community recognition.

"What Principal Hicks has done for the students at McBride Elementary surpasses all expectations," said Gloria Weston-Smart, executive director of Keep Columbus Beautiful.

Surpassing expectations is exactly what Smart said the Keep Columbus Beautiful Commission looks for when choosing a winner for the Gateways Educator of the Year Award.

This year, the commission picked Hicks from all other nominations from private and public schools in Columbus and Fort Benning.

It is the first time in 10 years that a Fort Benning principal won the award.

"I had no idea my staff had even nominated me," Hicks said. "I am so proud of our school and our teachers. This award is really for all of them."

Keep Columbus Beautiful first noticed Hicks when his vision for an educational nature trail behind the school became a reality.

That was more than two years ago. Now the trail is a weekly spot for classes to explore and learn about the ecosystem around them.

"The kids learn how to identify plants, trees, birds and other mammals," Hicks said. "It's a hands on experience that has really taught them what a beautiful planet we have."

It's something Keep Columbus Beautiful has tried to teach residents for years.

"The amazing thing about the McBride Elementary School trail is that children see up close how fragile our environment is," Smart said. "That's something adults sometimes have a hard time seeing."

Hicks first thought of the idea for the walking trail about four years ago while walking back in the woods behind his school.

"We have so much to offer by being located on Fort Benning, Hicks said. "Many other schools off post don't have access to an untouched environment like we do."

And not too many schools have had the honor of having their own principal recognized by the entire community.

"We had some pretty stiff competition this year," Smart said. "What was impressive is that normally teachers nominate other teachers. The fact that Hicks' staff nominated him is something very special."

Special is exactly how Hicks said he feels. And not just because of the award.

"We have something great here at McBride," Hicks said. "The teachers are to thank for this."

First lady focuses on children's ability to succeed

Eaton shares message of triumph

Bridgett Siter
Special to the Bayonet©

Eaton

"I have a learning disability. It's part of me, but it's not who I am."

Fort Benning's first lady, P.J. Eaton, delivers a message of inspiration and encouragement wherever she goes.

Eaton, who's been diagnosed with attention deficit disorder and dyslexia, speaks candidly and often about the challenges disabled children face academically and socially.

"I was not identified until I was much older. I was simply a 'troubled child,'" Eaton said. "I didn't learn to read until I was in high school. I'd do anything to avoid reading out loud — be sick or be disruptive — whatever."

But an intuitive teacher recruited Eaton for a summer program, to work in an occupational therapy clinic, and Eaton experienced what she called her "aha moment."

"I knew this was what I wanted to do, and I was willing to work hard for it," she said.

But with a D average in high school, Eaton had to convince college administrators to admit her on a probationary status.

There, at the Medical School of Virginia, she learned techniques to compensate for her disability, like recopying notes to commit them to memory.

Eaton earned a bachelor's degree in occupational therapy, and after a four-year stint in the Army, earned a graduate degree in substance abuse and counseling.

"When you find your calling, you work hard at it. That's my message to parents. Children need to be exposed to a wide, wide variety of activities," she said. "Not everyone can be an A or B student, but everyone can be successful at something.

It's a matter of finding what that is.

"Children, particularly children with learning disabilities, need to be exposed to all kinds of interests and hobbies and activities. It's very important for their self-esteem."

Once something "clicks," Eaton said, children develop a "can-do" attitude.

"We need to look at how to empower children. Children with disabilities can be empowered, feel more in control, if they know how to deal with it — how to compensate," she said.

Parents should educate themselves about their child's limitations and capabilities, Eaton said. They should be willing to meet with teachers and professionals to develop strategies, depending on the disability. The end result is a more confident child.

"One who rejects labels. Because labels can be so frustrating," she said.

Labels can be detrimental to a child's self-esteem, and they should be encouraged to share their disabilities only when they feel comfortable.

"Not everyone needs to know," she said. "Sometimes it's even embarrassing for me to talk about it. I do it because I want people to understand you can be very successful, you can lead a productive, happy life, in spite of challenges. They can make you stronger."

Schools: Teach sensitivity to peers

He learned, with the help of several incredible teachers, to compensate. He developed various techniques to help him concentrate, focus and "make the words behave." It still takes him a lot longer than other kids to read, but that's OK.

I've learned a thing or two along the way, also. I've learned that disabilities are really just challenges. I've learned to help Jake focus on what he needs to do to succeed, instead of fixating on what it is that hinders him.

I've learned to focus on his gift, and not the package it's wrapped in. Underneath, he's an exceptional young man, extremely intelligent, witty beyond his years, and sensitive. Cute, too.

As for reading, well, he's doing fine thank you very much. He'll probably not choose a career that involves a great deal of reading, but he'll succeed at whatever he chooses, because he's developed the tools to overcome any obstacle that comes along.

Isn't that what education — special or otherwise — is all about?

The folks at Fort Benning's schools seem to think so.

They're doing a great job of treating each child like he's special, but when it comes to teaching children with disabilities, their focus is more on tailoring than tutoring. They tailor the curriculum to the needs of the individual child, encouraging him to use the learning methods that work best for him, giving him the resources to overcome whatever obstacles he faces, physically, academically and socially.

They also do a swell job of integrating all children. Special needs students, like "enrichment" students, leave their regular classrooms periodically to visit resource rooms, like speech therapy or reading recovery. Their classmates need never know where they're going or why.

Of course they often do. But teasing is not tolerated. Our children are taught to be sensitive to the feelings of their peers. That's a beautiful thing. I wish it had been so 20 years ago.

I can't change my memories, but I can rest assured my children won't share them, because our schools are doing their utmost to make every child's school career a pleasant one.

I think it's working.

Educators: Tackle special ed issues

So the majority of special needs children are in a regular classroom? Does that overburden the teacher? Is it fair to the other students?

Woods: "Our job is not to make each child look equal or give them equal treatment. Our job is to treat each one with equity, to give each one what he or she needs to succeed.

"It won't be the same for every child. Every child is different. Why should we expect them to all learn the same way?

"Certainly, I believe the biggest challenge a teacher faces is meeting each child's individual needs.

"But every teacher must accommodate every student. If he 'can't do,' we have to find out what we can do to help him."

Look for his weaknesses?

Woods: "We don't focus on weaknesses. We use a three-tiered process. Yes, we determine their weaknesses. Then we look at their strengths, and use them as a stepping stone.

"Ultimately we marry the two, and teach the child to use his strengths to overcome his weaknesses.

I remember the sigma attached to being labeled "special ed" when I was in school. Is it the same now?

Anderson: "Here it's not. I can't speak for public schools, but we don't have that problem here at all. Probably because we have a very accepting, very supportive community.

"The teachers also set the tone in the classroom. They model the kind of behavior they expect from their students, and that's acceptance, kindness, understanding, sensitivity ...

"The students are the same, very giving, very concerned about their classmates. There's no stigma here."

McNabb: "And keep in mind, that the other students don't even realize their classmates are going to resource classrooms. They simply leave for a short time and come back."

"As for the children in self-contained classrooms, they're not just hidden away. They need to interact with their peers. They learn important life skills just watching and interacting.

"And the regular ed students love to help them. They fight over whose turn it is.

"This generation is proof that things are changing. We don't see the stigma, the cruelty children with disabilities once faced."

How is it you foster that kind of environment?

McPherson: "Like Ms. McNabb said, we include all our students in school activities.

"And we work hard to educate all the students and their families. With increased awareness we do more to boost the children's sensitivity and self esteem."

"What it boils down to is this, children with special needs are more normal than not, and when other students associate with them outside of a regular classroom setting, say in the lunchroom or on the playground, they see that for themselves."

Woods: "It's my armchair philosophy that these military kids are so much more sensitive to one another's feelings, because they move so often and they know what it feels like to be the new kid — to worry about fitting in again and again.

"Their experiences at such an early age have made them so much more accepting of other children's differences and much more concerned about others' feelings."

How do you determine if a child has a specific learning disability?

Woods: "Well obviously there are a lot of students who come to us with the paperwork in hand.

"We look at the whole child. You say he's not achieving where everyone else is? Well every child is individual and unique. Is there an emotional or physical problem interfering?

"Has he moved? Was there a disruption in his life or a constant change of curriculum? Cultural or economic factor?

"If we rule these out, we look for a disruption in the learning process, whether it be auditory or visual or whatever. We call it an 'information processing deficit.'"

And once you find a processing deficit, do you correct it?

Woods: "We can't change the brain. Special education is not about finding a cure. It's about overcoming.

"We teach children the strategies and techniques they need to compensate. The goal is to help them learn to use these strategies till they eventually don't need extra help."

McPherson: "We've gotten so good at identification now. Early intervention is the best prevention.

"We do what we need to do early on to meet their needs so they can be dismissed from the program.

"That's the goal of special eduction – to get them out of it. Special education is no longer a life-time sentence."

What about older students in special education or older students with learning disabilities?

Woods: "The special needs child should understand to the best of their ability what their disability is and what they can do to correct it.

"They need to be taught to take ownership of it. By middle school, they should be involved in meetings between teachers and parents and have some input into what's working and what's not.

Advice for parents of children with special needs?

Wilson: "It really does take a village to raise these children. Parents, teachers, doctors — everyone should be involved for the good of the child."

McNabb: "Parents should educate themselves. They should be their child's biggest advocate.

"They should be willing to ask for help, explore new avenues, demand help from the school system wherever they go."

Woods: "And hand-carry copies of pertinent files from one post to the next. Don't pack it.

"Take it straight to the new school, so they have the necessary paperwork to get the ball rolling."

And for the child?

Woods: "It's only a label in a file. With it comes special services and hopefully a solution to your problem. But never think it s all that you are."

"Certainly, I believe the greatest challenge teachers face is meeting each child's individual needs. But every teacher must accommodate every child. If he 'can't do,' we have to find out what we can do to help him."

Julie Miller

a fourth-grade teacher at Wilson Elementary.

History: A West Union, Iowa native, and daughter of a Presbyterian minister, Miller graduated from Coe College in Cedar Rapids with a bachelor's degree in English and elementary education. She taught for one year at Hoover Elementary in Cedar Rapids before moving to Columbus. When her brother-in-law left for Vietnam, her sister, who taught at White Elementary School, invited her to stay until he returned, and the rest is history. She later got her master's in elementary education. Four principals and thousands of students later, she's been at the school for 33 years and remembers when each teacher came on board.

On becoming a teacher: Miller said there was never a time in her life when she didn't want to be a teacher.

"The question was never, 'Are you going to college?' It was, 'What college are you going to? I don't know what it was. I just always knew it was what I'd do," she said. "I did have two teachers I completely adored, so they probably cemented it for me. One of them asked me to draw a picture of myself as an adult, and when I held it up to her, I was standing up with a book open — teaching. I just always knew."

On owning her business: Miller is one of few, if any, teachers who actually "owns" her own business — a little red schoolhouse. Her grandmother, an avid auction shopper, bought four schoolhouses — one for each grandchild — and moved them all to Twin Lakes, Iowa.

"It was her idea to keep the family together," said Miller, who now uses the schoolhouse as a summer home. "I've added a kitchen, a bathroom, and all I need now are some antique desks."

On small towns and the military child: "I loved it. It was a great place to grow up," said Miller, who unlike the military children she teaches, went from kindergarten to high school with the same small group of children.

"It took me a while to adjust to their adjusting," Miller said. "It's a completely different life they lead, but it's an exciting life. The way they make friends is so remarkable, I often forget that my new students are new."

Philosophy: "We can never stop learning, and my students teach me," said Miller, who laughed when recalling how her students helped her become proficient with the PC. "I'm a Mac lady myself.

"I came from a family where there was a simple set of rules, and as long as you followed those rules, everything was okay," Miller said. "It seems to work in the classroom. Simple rules. Plus, my bark is worse than my bite.

"You have to view children as fun, and they need to know it's okay to make a mistake, as long as they try to fix it. What's fun for me is seeing that light in their eyes — I call it the 'Aha, I've got it' light. That's when I go home happy."

Hobbies and interests: Miller is a stamp collector and traveler, who uses every summer and spring break to travel the nation. So far, she's visited all but two U.S. states — Hawaii and Texas.

"I'm not quite sure how I missed Texas," Miller said laughing. "I love visiting national parks, and I've lost track of how many I've been to. I integrate my travels into my lessons. It blows the kids' minds that I can show them a postcard of a park and talk about it in detail."

After teaching: Miller intends to travel to Europe and Holland when she etires, but not any time soon, "maybe in a couple of years."

"I could retire now, but I had a friend who once said, 'When it's time to retire, you'll know.' Nothing's told me yet."

5th-graders visit 'White House'

Little inquiring minds want to know a lot

Laura Martinson
Special to the Bayonet©

When three little boys, basketballs in hand, showed up on the doorstep of Riverside, P.J. Eaton knew it was time.

"They knocked on the door and said, 'We walk by your house every day. Could we please come in?'" and she graciously obliged. "That's how this whole thing got started."

"This whole thing" being an open invitation to local fifth-grade students to tour the home of the commanding general — a first for a first lady of Fort Benning.

"It turns out that the children are the ones most in awe of the house," Eaton said. "Those three who came to the porch were just thirsty for knowledge."

Nearly 300 post fifth-graders were the most recent youngsters to ring her bell, but the invitation was also extended to public and private schools in Columbus and Alabama as well as home-schoolers. The grade was chosen because it's the first in which students study American history.

To quench their thirst for knowledge, the National Infantry Museum, Columbus Historical Society and post environmentalists set up three interactive stations for the children to learn the nature of the post's plants, the history of the infantry and the home itself.

"We want to connect the children with the historical traditions of the post, but also its plants and trees. The more children have to read, see, and touch, the better," Eaton said.

"I liked hearing about all the trees and Fort Benning and how it was built," said Derrel Mason, a fifth-grader at Loyd Elementary, who found it especially intriguing that the post's first soldiers lived in tents just across the street from Riverside.

Laura Martinson

Derrell Mason, fifth-grader at Loyd Elementary, laughs with P.J. Eaton on the front porch of Riverside.

Laura Martinson

Jean Herron, local historian, explains to fifth-graders the history of what the children call the 'White House.'

"The age and history of our post and its plants is remarkable," Eaton agreed.

But even more remarkable, Eaton said, are the children themselves.

"This is in honor of them," she said. "They make a lot of sacrifices in the military, but they can also gain a lot from this life."

"The children seem to be more interested in the personal side of things," said Glenn Hughes, Fort Benning Schools director of technology, who said the children were especially interested in the cupboards filled with crystal and china the Eatons and past generals, use for entertainment.

"Being in the house makes them feel important," Hughes said, laughing as he recalled how many children refer to Riverside as the "White House." "This makes them feel part of it."

DRIVE A LITTLE - SAVE A LOT!!

Stand up for right thing

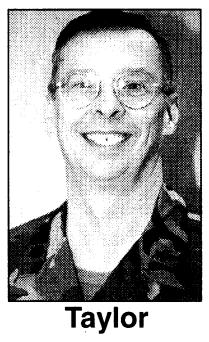
Don't back down from anything you believe in

Chaplain (Lt. Col.) Dan Taylor
Infantry Center Chapel

Isaac Asimov once told a story about a rabbi who was having trouble with his congregation. They could not agree on anything. The president of the congregation said, "Rabbi, this can't continue. There has to be a conference, and we have to settle all areas of dispute once and for all." The rabbi agreed.

At the appointed time, the rabbi and 11 elders gathered around a magnificent table in the conference room.

One by one, the issues were debated with no resolution. The president suggested they vote and allow the majority to rule. The votes were counted.



"You may examine them, rabbi. It is 11 to one against you. We have the majority."

Frustrated and offended, the rabbi rose to his feet. "So because of a vote you think that you are right and I am wrong.

"Well, it is just not so. Here I stand."

He then lifted up his hands to pray and asked God to show by a miraculous sign that he was right and they were wrong.

As soon as he finished praying, there was a loud clap of thunder and a flash of lightning entered the room and split the great table in two. Smoke filled the room and the elders were scattered around on the floor. The rabbi stood tall, untouched, smiling in victory.

Taylor

The president stood up, dusted himself off, and brushed aside his singed hair. Finally he said. "Okay, eleven to two, but we still have the majority."

REFLECTIONS

It is hard these days to stand up for what you believe when the majority says it is not so.

It is not the politically correct position to stand firm on what you believe when all around you hold a contrary opinion. Going against the current is not only strenuous, it is not seen as a tolerant or acceptable thing to do.

When it comes to holding to truths about right and wrong and being firm in your convictions, if you want to do the right thing, you will find yourself in the minority most of the time.

But we need people of such conviction. Our nation, our churches, our Army need people who are willing to take the unpopular position simply because it is the right thing to do. There won't be much reward or recognition.

It is hard to muster up the strength and courage to take such a position. I think we have to rely on the grace and strength of the almighty God to develop that kind of courage in us. A Bible teacher once said, "It is never right to do wrong even to get a chance to do right.

That simple saying removes a lot of the doubt from some decision-making."

Don't look to the majority to find the answers to the tough questions. Don't count on the majority to guide you in the right path. Real success comes in finding what is right, then doing it.

And where do I find what is right? Maybe a good place to start is with the one who is true and right himself. Better to be standing with him than with the majority.

Broad is the way that leads to destruction and many are walking in it. But narrow is the way that leads to life.

Music soothes soul, makes heart glad

Singing songs makes life's work much easier

Chaplain (Maj.) Raymond Koop
Family Life Ministries Center

Music makes us feel better. Even the most tormented soul can find relief through the soothing sounds of music (I Samuel 16:14-23).

In the past, slaves eased their burdens through the singing of spiritual and gospel music. The work and toil of sailors were made easier and lighter when they sang sea chantys together. The hard labor of chain gangs became bearable through singing. Today, rhythm and blues gives voice to those who are discouraged.

Koop

In the military, cadence songs make long road marches easier. Music infuses changes of command with patriotism, festivity and grandeur. The Star-Spangled Banner, America, the Beautiful, and My Country 'Tis of Thee stir our hearts with their words and instrumental accompaniment.

Music lets our souls worship. Congregations encourage one another through psalms, hymns and spiritual songs. Scripture exhorts believers to "Sing and make music in your heart to the Lord, always giving thanks to God the Father for everything" (Ephesians 5:19-20).

For centuries, the book of Psalms has given voice to believers going through the joys and sorrows of life. Sadness, grief and pain can be eased through music and singing. Even the caged bird can sing, and in singing bring joy and happiness to all who hear its song.

Do you need a new song in your heart? Call the Chaplain Family Life Center at 545-1760 for help. Visit the Center at 2606 Dixie Road, Soldiers' Plaza.

Cruise-A-Matics fall short of championship

Local team loses playoff, 31-3, to Marauders

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

The Columbus/Fort Benning Cruise-A-Matics, fell short of the US Rugby National Championship game, with a 31-3 loss to a team from all over the United States called the Marauders, on Blue Field May 11.

This is the first time the national championships were played on post and Benning expects them to return next year.

"We played a tough team in the last game," said Sterling Brothers, 8-man. "But, even when we got behind, we didn't give up. We kept on fighting till the very end."

The team took an early 3-0 lead on a

The Orioles took a victory over the Rangers, 17-15, in the second to last game of the 6- to 8-years-old Youth Services baseball season May 9.

The Rangers came out and took a 4-1 lead in the first inning.

From there, the three-run gap remained until the fourth inning when the Orioles smashed in six runs and held the Rangers scoreless in the bottom half of the fourth inning.

Games are played for an hour, instead of by innings.

"We started out the game pretty slow," said Bryan Wilson, Orioles' assistant coach. "But I gave them a pep talk and told them to keep their heads up and concentrate. We came out with a victory."

With 6- to 8-year-olds, the team coach pitches to the batters.

Inning changes are determined by five strikes, three outs, six runs or nine batters.

The well-played defense and ball control kept it together for the Orioles, for the remainder of the game.

The Orioles lost their first game of the season, 22-2, but they made improvements.

"We had a lot of players we thought were outfielders, but they turned out to be our best infielders over the course of the season."

Some of those infielders made pivotal plays in the games.

"I did good today," said 6-year-old Reno Kincy, Orioles second baseman. "I made the final out in the game, I like to play second base because I can get people out."

But the games are mostly just about having fun, Wilson said.

"My favorite part of baseball is when we get to run and slide," said 7-year-old Corven Alexander, Orioles third baseman.

Alexander scored three runs for his team.

"I like watching the kids improve and the enjoyment they get out of playing," Wilson said. "We're out here to have fun and let the winning take care of itself.

The children are already looking forward to next season.

"This is my first season playing, but I'm coming back next year," said Devin Collins, 8, Orioles short stop and third baseman. "I like baseball because I'm good at it."

"They're a great bunch of kids, and they played well today," Wilson said.

Marksman shooters named to World Shoot Team

Paula J. Randall
USAMU Public Affairs

Of the 16 people who will represent the United States at the 2002 IPSC World Championships, two of them are from Fort Benning. Both of the U.S. Army Marksmanship Unit's two action pistol shooters Spc. Maxient J. Michel Jr. and Sgt. Julie A. Goloski have been selected to the 2002 U.S. World Shoot Team and will compete in September at the World Shoot XIII in South Africa. Michel is one of four men named to the Open Team and Goloski is one of the four women named to the Women's Team. Michel, now 20 years old, is the youngest person to ever make the U.S. Men's Open Team.

Besides the Open Team, there are eight additional slots for the Standard Team and Junior Team. The U.S. Practical Shooting Association, the organizing body for the sport of practical shooting in the United States, selected this year's U.S. Team members based on the shooters' national ranking received at the 2000 and 2001 National Championships. More than 20,000 American action shooters compete in the United States and in over 60 countries around the world.

The U.S. Team will compete against teams from more than 50 other countries Sept. 15-21 in Pietersburg, South Africa, at the World Shoot, run by the International Practical Shooting Confederation, which is the governing body for practical shooting worldwide. The championship will consist of 32 to 35 stages shot over five days.

According to the IPSC, Action Shooting is the fastest growing shooting sport in the world and originated in the United States. Back in the in the 1970s, law enforcement and security personnel wanted a competition that focused on practicality with their designated duty pistols. In 1976, the Columbia Conference in Columbia, Mo., set up the rules and parameters for the International

Four weeks to fitness for summer, life

New habits aren't just for New Year's

Laura Martinson
Special to the Bayonet©

Let's face it folks, summer is here, June 21 or not. And as I was out walking through my neighborhood yesterday, I noticed all the pools set up full of children splashing and having a great time — completely uninhibited. Oh, to have that same freedom. Instead, I got the usual late spring rush of panic brought on by a certifiable fear of one thing — my bathing suit.

Nothing brings me more stress throughout the year than attempting to stay fit, and I know there are others out there. But my concern has changed. I'm not worried about a temporary fix. I want it to last.

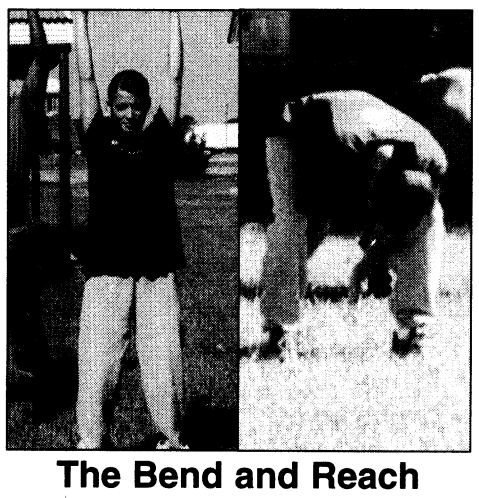
My initial instinct was to tailor this to the needs of women, but I was quickly reminded that men, too, struggle with weight, body fat and keeping with the Army standards of staying fit. We all have the same triggers for eating a little too much than our fair share — screaming children, harping bosses or disgruntled spouses are just a few. I know I've had a few, or a few hundred, Golden Girls moments where an entire cheesecake or two felt like the answer to my stresses. Those are the moments when rationalization — not sensibility — are at the reins.

On the flip-side, we all have the same motivators for sticking with a workout plan — improved health, more energy and yes, looking darn good in that bathing suit. But I'm convinced for those who find it a bit more challenging to stay on the workout wagon, there is one thing that keeps us hanging on, and that's measurable results.

I'm speaking from experience here. I went from 115 to 130 my freshmen year of college, and 130 to 173 in the nine months it takes to make a baby. I never quite lost all of that baby weight before the second nine months, which landed me at a whopping 192. That was my all time high, and my all time low.

Now I don't normally go around telling my weight, present or past. But I feel it's time to put pride, and plump, aside, and move forward toward my goals. Between that day two years ago when my babe was born and about eight weeks ago, I finally found something that works, and works well, for me.

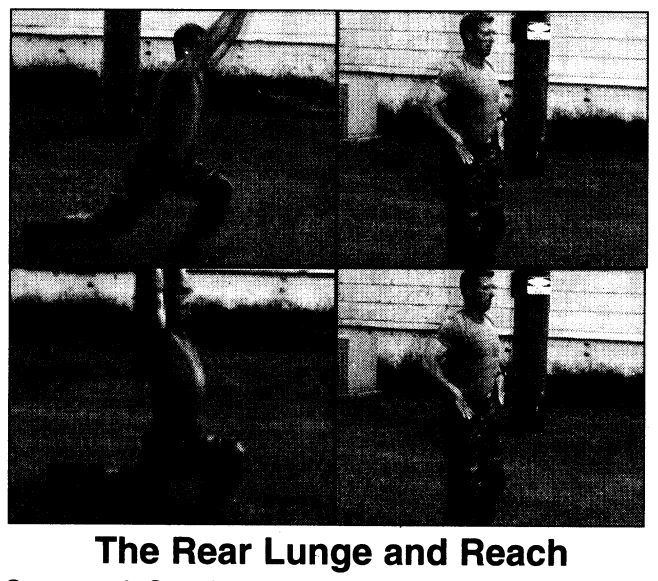
Now, not everyone responds the same way, but I seem to have found the almost perfect balance between strength and resistance training and cardiovascular exercise — and the results are amazing.



Fifteen pounds and two dress sizes later, I've come to terms with a need for immediate gratification, and the terms are this — nothing worth working for is ever immediate.

But it is easy. We're going to tell you about the resources around you, right here at Fort Benning, so you too can get motivated and feel great. If you're already there, grab a friend who needs a boost and let's go.

Grab your scissors, cut out the workouts and paste them to your fridge, right by the handle.



The time is now. The change is forever. It IS as simple as it sounds.

Post trainers earn new certification

Total fitness becomes goal for fitness center

Spc. Douglas DeMaio
Bayonet staff

Civilian employees from Fort Benning's post fitness centers and the U.S. Army Physical Fitness School earned an exercise leader certification from the American College of Sports Medicine May 10 to increase their knowledge in fitness and health performance.

The college is the premier sports and fitness educational body in the U.S., said Andrew Snoddy, post sports director. The course required the fitness specialists to pass a three-hour exam to earn the certification.

The certification course will help people who use fitness centers on post achieve physical goals they wish to attain, Snoddy said. If a family member wants to lose weight, the certified employee can explain a fitness program to help him or her lose weight.

Certification will be very useful to the post and to those who choose to use the services, said Fred Woods, sports specialist for Kelley Hill fitness centers. The specialists coach people along, but, ultimately, the person decides if they will continue the fitness program.

The certification gives the customer an opportunity to talk with an individual who is knowledgeable and skilled in constructing fitness programs to support life-style changes, Snoddy said. Americans need to make life-style changes not just for cosmetic reasons, but because it is the right thing for people to do. Fitness specialists learned to teach people to strive for total fitness, which will help them enjoy the optimal quality of life, Snoddy said. Physical, mental and social well being, the total fitness concept, can be attained through eating properly and exercise.

These programs will set people up for long-term physical and mental health, Woods said. The health benefits will reduce the risk of injury, increase a person's life span and strengthen the immune system.

However, if people only use the resources of the fitness centers just to get that body ready for the summer, then the benefits of the certification is not fully utilized the customers, Snoddy said. That is why it is time to be proactive and take the first step toward making a life change.

"Forget about the beach this summer. We are talking about a life-style change," Snoddy said. "Get right and ready for life — not just for summer.

"Every journey begins with the first step. Being proactive and getting into shape requires that first step."

Golf professional teaches students fundamentals

Enthusiasm builds dreams into reality

Spc. Douglas DeMaio
Bayonet staff

Spc. Douglas DeMaio

Douglas Seamore works on making contact with the ball during the second day of golf practice.

Faith Middle School is taking the initiative to help students learn a lifelong sport from one of the best instructors on post.

In the first season of golf, golf pro Larry Cruise will coach the intramural boys and girls golf team for Faith.

"He has a lot more experience than we do," said Justin Hutto, a team member who has been playing the sport for more than five years. "He can teach things I don't know to improve my game."

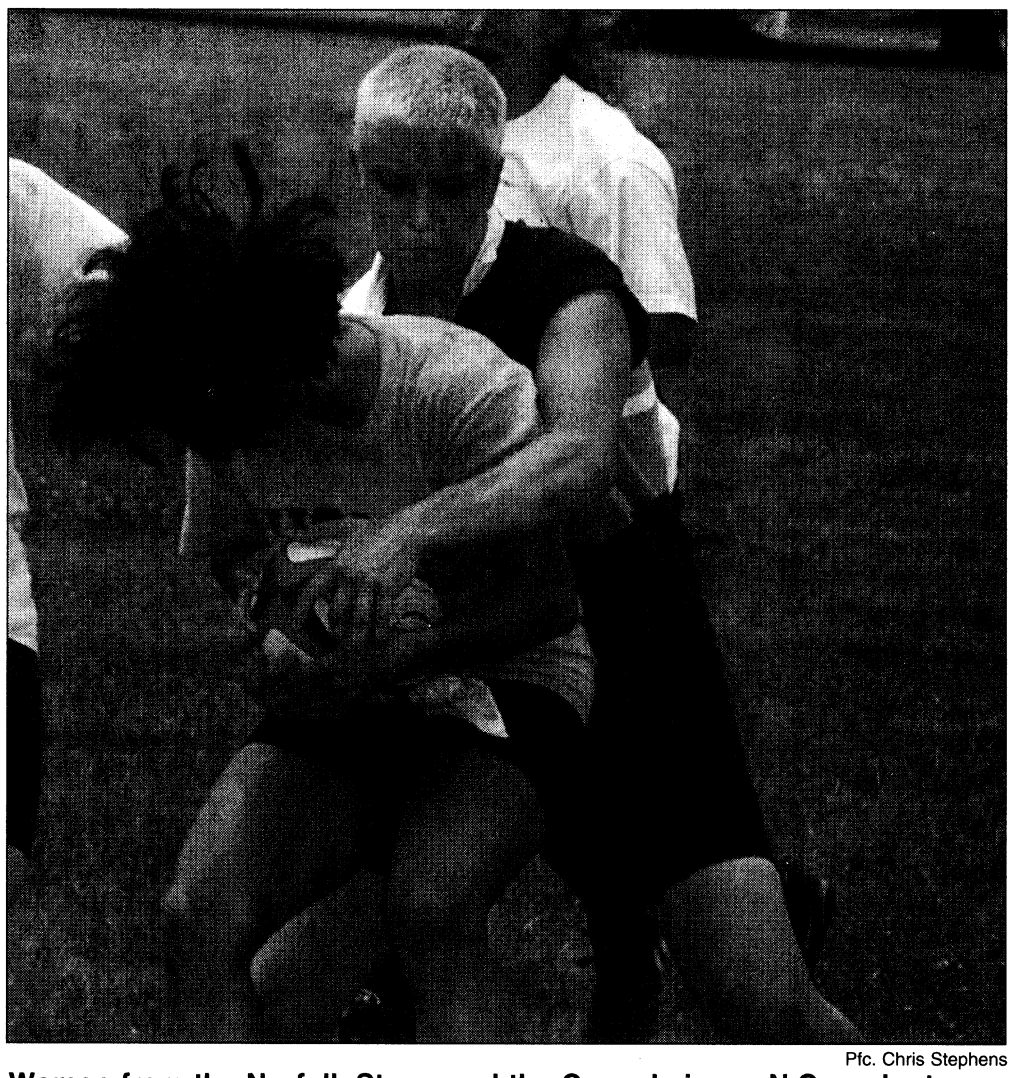
Just last week, Cruise taught Hutto how to improve his grip, which gave Hutto more consistency with his swing and placement of the ball, Hutto said.

Cruise volunteered his time to coach, said Faith's principal Dr. Gregg Mowen. Fundamentals are important to the game, and Cruise knows how to teach them.

The long-term vision is to have the team represent the school and the post in competitions with other posts' teams, Mowen said. There is a possibility Fort Bragg's middle school will meet Faith halfway between the two posts to compete in a tournament against each other.

"This gives kids a chance to try a new sport," Hutto said. "Because older people play golf, some don't think the game is cool, but it's a lot of fun."

The opportunity provides the students a chance to improve their game and their social skills, Hutto said.



Currently there are 14 students on the team, Mowen said. However, none of the females who showed interest in the golf team have decided to participate.

Hopefully that will change, Hutto said. Golf is a game everyone can enjoy if people give it a chance.

The initiative to start the team came after many of the students showed interest in the fall.

"Everyday, the students said, 'When are we going to start the golf team,'" Mowen said. "They're enthusiastic."

Rugby!

Pfc. Chris Stephens

Women from the Norfolk Storm and the Camp Lejeune N.C. rugby teams participated in a rugby clinic May 10. The women practiced different skills in preparation for their tournament May 11.

penalty kick.

The Marauders rebounded and kept coming at them with an explosive offense to score 31 unanswered points.

"No matter how far behind we got, we kept on fighting for points. It wasn't only this game we fought hard, it was every game throughout the season we fought," Brothers said.

The team worked hard in practice so they could be better in the games.

"We took practice more seriously and put as much effort into each session as we could," Brothers said. "We were committed this season."

The Cruise-A-Matics were motivated by a new coach this year.

"What helped the team this year was we got a new coach," said Gary Kent, team treasurer. "Australian Sgt. Maj. Dave Hatton came to Fort Benning and took the reins of the team."

Hatton brought in his coaching philosophy and turned the team around, Kent said. He had them practicing and playing better than last year.

"Last year, the team was practicing in a non-strategical way," Kent said. "When Hatton came in, he showed the team how to practice the right way and taught them a lot about strategy. It really helped because he grew up around the game, and he knew what he was talking about."

The Cruise-A-Matics will be looking for a strong comeback next year, and a chance at the national championship, he said.

Practical Shooting Confederation

Since then, the sport has grown from the local club level to the world level with more 60 countries participating. The USPSA is the national governing body for action shooting and runs IPSC matches in the United States.

Action Shooting involves shooting numerous steel and paper targets shot from various positions with multiple shots. Courses of fire incorporate drawing the gun from the holster, making magazine changes and requiring the shooter to manage a variety of props in a safe manner. The time it takes shooters to manipulate a course of fire or stage is recorded along with their scored hits. The time is then divided into the hits scored. The fastest, most accurate shooter wins. IPSC competitions vary; each match is unique.

At World Shoot XII in Cebu, Philippines, in 1999, there were over 600 competitors. The match's 35 stages included battling everything from monster crabs and sharks to UFOs and giants. Michel took the Silver Medal in the Junior Division and Goloski finished seventh in the Women's Division.

"It feels great to make the team; it's a dream come true," Michel said. "I've been on the Junior Team before, but now I'm a member of the U.S. Men's team. I'm now on the same team with the guys I used to look up to when I was a new shooter."

"I am very excited about making the women's team,' Goloski said. "It is such an honor to be able to wear the U.S. colors at such a prestigious match with the best shooters from around the world. I want to represent the country and the Army well in every aspect."

Last year, Michel won all five of the Area Championships he attended as well as taking the Alabama, North Carolina, Louisiana, Mississippi and South Carolina State Champion titles. He was also the 2001 Junior Champion at Pan-American Games as well as an overall Pan-Am Bronze Medalist.

At the American Handgunner World Shoot Off he took top military honors and was the IPSC Interservice Champion. Michel additionally finished in third place overall at the National Championships in 2000 and 2001 as well as taking second in the 2001 European International Championship.

Goloski, the 1999 U.S. Army Athlete of the Year, was the 1999 Women's World Speed Shooting Champion, as well as the 1999 Open and Limited U.S. Practical Shooting Association Women's National Champion. At only 22 years old, Goloski became the first woman ever to win seven out of eight of the USPSA Area Championships in the United States, breaking the record she previously set when she became the first woman to win the majority of the area championships.

RCI to improve family housing

Post scheduled to privatize housing in 2005

Pfc. Brian Trapp
Bayonet staff

There is a $6 billion backlog in renovation and maintenance for family housing in the Army, and Fort Benning has 4,103 housing units, all of them more than 25 years old with the majority needing renovation.

Since renovating or replacing all of those homes could take more than a quarter century, the Army's answer to the housing problem is the Residential Communities Initiative.

The RCI is to privatize the housing and partner with an experienced developer through a 50-year contract, said Ron Smith, RCI program manager. They would then provide the maintenance, construction, demolition and operations for housing on post.

The developer will receive basic allowance for housing from all the soldiers assigned to these units, and will apply that to paying off his debt and to the continual up-keep of the quarters, said Col. Keith Stelzer, director of Facilities Engineering and Logistics.

"The advantage for the soldiers is renovated quarters to today's living standards with neighborhood amenities," Smith said.

The "partner" (developer) will also contribute to the communities, providing other projects like playgrounds, tot lots and community buildings with meeting rooms for community conferences, Smith said.

"RCI will be a tremendous opportunity to leverage the dollars and experience of a major private developer in providing our soldiers and their families with state-of-the-art housing that is equivalent to the standards of this region," Stelzer said. "Our housing at Fort Benning is old and reflects the layout and functionality of a bygone era. Many homes are part of an eight-plex complex without driveways, utility or laundry rooms and so forth.

Soldiers deploy to Kuwait

Middle East mission to deter Iraqi aggression

Spc. Douglas DeMaio
Bayonet staff

Soldiers from both 1st Battalion, 10th Field Artillery Regiment, and 1st Battalion, 15th Infantry Regiment, deployed to Kuwait as part of Operation Desert Spring May 17 through Wednesday.

Soldiers joined elements of their battalions that are already training in the Persian Gulf region.

The primary objective for the mission is to deter Iraqi aggression, said 1st Lt. Greg Burch, executive officer for Headquarters and Headquarters Company, 1st Bn., 15th Inf. Regt.

"The soldiers understand the intent of the mission," Burch said "They have been preparing a long time for this mission, so there won't be any surprises."

Soldiers could train for up to six months in the region, said Capt. Jeffrey Long, commander of A Co. 1st Bn., 10th Field Artillery.

For some soldiers, the deployment is a step into the reality of duty and service, said Spc. Steven Bullie, driver and gunner with A Company.

"This will be my first deployment and chance to visit another country." Bullie said. "I've been with this unit for three years.

"I would rather be with these guys than anyone else. We are close like a family."

And it shows. Long's wife, Tshaka, will take care of their 19-month-old daughter and serve as Family Readiness Group leader for her husband's company.

"It helps me to keep myself busy with the group," She said. "It won't be as stressful if we stick together."

This isn't the first time the captain has been deployed, but it is a challenge, Tshaka said.

"I'm comfortable with it, but I'm not, nor will I ever be, used to it," she said.

The commander sees the unit and his family as contributing to a team effort, he said. Both are prepared for the long haul.

Spc. Douglas DeMaio

Spc. Donnell Pugh and family spend last minutes together.

DoD plans military school study

Review to look at transfer feasibility

Lori Egan
Bayonet editor

The Department of Defense plans to study the feasibility of transferring the schools it operates to local education agencies this summer.

The study will include Fort Benning's schools along with a school-by-school look at all the Domestic Dependent Elementary and Secondary School's 58 schools in Georgia, Alabama, North Carolina, South Carolina, New York and Virginia.

There have been enough changes in the military communities where DDESS operates schools for Congress and DoD leaders to question the feasibility of continuing to operate the state-based schools, said Dr. Elaine Hinman, director of DDESS, in a recent press release.

The study will focus on the ability and willingness of local education agencies to assume the educational responsibilities

Fort Benning restricts water use

Continued drought causes water restrictions on post

Lori Egan
Bayonet editor

After seven years, Georgia's drought continues.

Despite nearly an inch of rain Saturday, this month's precipitation totals are more than an inch below normal and close to six inches for the year.

This means Fort Benning remains under the water conservation restrictions in accordance with the post's drought contingency plan.

Joe Wilkins, an environmental specialist with the Directorate of Facilities Engineering and Logistics, said the water restrictions saved approximately 1.2 million gallons a day for 2001 compared to the post's usage in 1999 when there were no restrictions.

With the restrictions, Fort Benning's normal usage is between nine and 10 million gallons a day, he said.

The voluntary restrictions mean there is no outside watering between noon and 7 p.m., and residents who live in odd-numbered addresses can water their yards only on odd-numbered days, and those who live in even addresses can water only on even days. But without significant rain, the voluntary restrictions will soon be mandatory, post officials said.

"Everyone needs to help conserve water," Col. Keith Stelzer, director of Facilities Engineering and Logistics, said.

Fort Benning's water comes from the Upatoi Creek watershed and the historical average flow is around 319 million gallons a day. During this drought, the flow has dropped to below 50 million gallons a day.

This doesn't leave a lot of water for fighting fires or ensuring soldiers have adequate water for training, Wilkins said.

Residents are reminded the restrictions include: odd and even lawn watering, swimming pool refilling and vehicle wash days. The restrictions also control wash rack use and prohibit nonessential water uses such as washing down sidewalks, walkways and buildings except in the case of fire control.

MEMORIAL DAY

Who will you remember?

Laura Martinson
Special to the Bayonet©

Who do you remember? It's Memorial Day, and this year will be the first that my generation will mourn the loss of its peers, those my own age and not too terribly different from myself.

The holiday is one that those younger and untouched by war probably looked forward to as a school holiday and not the day of remembrance it truly is. I know that's how I remember it.

Now, don't get me wrong. I remember hearing stories about my grandpa, who was at Pearl Harbor, Dec. 7, 1941. But those were just faraway stories from a faraway place, something that could never happen in my lifetime. And I fully admit I took it all for granted.

My husband was a little different. I'd say he's lived the privileged life — that of a military child. He comes from a family of service, two grandfathers in WWII, and a father retired with 30 years as an Air Force pilot.

But his privilege wasn't the life he led, but more the appreciation of it. Somehow he knew all along that serving — and dying — for our country is the highest honor. So he chose the noble profession he came to appreciate. Not to be noble, but to do something that matters.

This year, at age 26, I finally see just how much it matters. And it took some stellar soldiers of my generation to help me "get it."

This year, they will remember some of their own, and their memories say it all.

Specs. Jonn Edmunds and Kristofor Stonesifer

COMMENTARY

"This is the first year that the holiday will touch me personally. It's the first time I knew someone who died fighting. I found out about their deaths when I was in ranger school, and it made it tougher for me to get through, but it motivated me, too. Finishing was a way to honor their memories. But I think the biggest tribute to my peers this holiday is to remember they were doing what they wanted to do. Their job wasn't something just thrust upon them. They chose to be rangers and to stand up for what they believe in, and they made the ultimate sacrifice."

— Spc. Travis West, 3rd Ranger Battalion

Spc. Kristofor Stonesifer

"This Memorial Day will definitely be on a different level than others. Stonesifer was one of my best friends here, kind of like a big brother to me, so that makes the meaning different. More realistic. But Memorial Day is for everyone who's lost his life serving his country, not just our guys. I'll definitely be thinking about him on Monday, but this is just another day for us, because we deal with his memory all the time. He was just a real cool guy."

— Sgt. Joshua Kinney, 3rd Ranger Battalion

Spc. Mark Anderson

"He was a big teddy bear, and he had a lot of heart. But he was very strong willed about accomplishing the mission no matter what, and that's obvious to everybody now. He was in my squad in 1st Battalion. In fact, if I'd stayed there, I would have been there with him the night he died. That's kind of weird to think about. I'll remember him on Monday, but not just on Monday. I think about it all the time."

— Staff Sgt. Jimmy Ubernosky, 75th Ranger Regiment

In light of the year's events, I think it's safe to say no one has gone — or will go — untouched. There will be someone for everybody in my generation and those to come to remember, whether a father, husband, brother, sister, squad leader or best friend. It may even be a hero on TV we've never met, but somehow can relate to.

Now when I find myself in the same room as one of Fort Benning's many selfless, decorated retirees, I feel an awesome sense of gratitude, indebtedness and sheer awe. I also feel deep remorse that I didn't come to these conclusions sooner.

So, thanks guys, for putting it all in perspective for me, for us. You do, in fact, serve a grateful nation. And I think there are many, who'll never know what you know or see what you've seen, but finally get what remembering is all about.

Those who've lost a comrade, in this war or past, don't need a holiday to remember their friends — they live it daily. Maybe the holiday is for people like me, who need the reminder.

But this isn't about me, remember? This is about our heroes, past, present and future. And all I can say on behalf of everyone is a humble thank you.

It's Memorial Day. Who will you remember?

Be grateful, thoughtful Monday

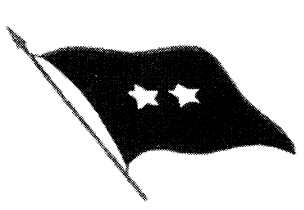
Across our great land, thousands of American flags, proudly waving, mark the final resting place of soldiers, sailors, airmen, Marines, coastguardsmen and merchant mariners who had their lives cut short so that we may live freely and enjoy the blessings of liberty. Memorial Day is the one day of the year that we set aside to remember and honor our country's patriots, yet we owe them a debt of gratitude, every day of every year.

This Memorial Day finds our nation at war. A war we did not seek, but one we will decisively win. However, our victory will not come without its costs. Once again, we are witnesses to America's sons and daughters being brought home, solemnly and respectfully, in flag-draped coffins.

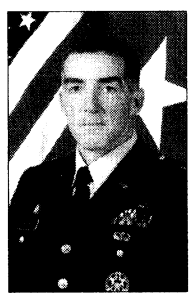
They join those who lost their lives in the attacks of Sept. 11. We are deeply saddened by their deaths, but eternally grateful for their sacrifice.

It remains our challenge to do our very best to remain true to the principles and beliefs in which they so fervently believed and which they so valiantly fought to preserve. Their loved ones who carry on remain in our thoughts and prayers.

The joint chiefs of staff and I join every American this Memorial Day, to pause and reflect upon the sacrifices made by so many of our fellow citizens in times of war and conflict throughout our nation's history. We also salute the dedicated men and women of today's armed forces, whether defending our homeland or serving around the world. They are preserving and adding to this noble legacy.



— Gen. Richard B. Myers
Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff



Take minute to remember at 3 p.m.

Memorial Day has been officially celebrated in this country since May 1868 as a way of honoring and remembering the sacrifices of those brave service men and women who gave their lives in defense of their country.

Unfortunately, in our hectic modern lifestyle, we often don't take the time to remember those who fought and died for our country.

To make Memorial Day more relevant to both present and future generations of Americans, Congress established the National Moment of Remembrance on Memorial Day to reclaim the holiday for its original purpose — honoring fellow citizens who died in service to the United States. To that end, Congress encourages all Americans, whether alone or with others, to participate in the Moment of Remembrance by taking one minute of silence to honor those who have gone before.

Accordingly, I proclaim Memorial Day, May 27, 2002 as a day for all to observe a Moment of Remembrance and I designate 3 p.m. as a time to simultaneously pause in an act of national unity, to honor those Americans who gave their lives in securing the blessings of our liberty.

I call on all of our units to promote and participate in this nationwide tribute to "one Nation, One Moment."

— Maj. Gen. Paul Eaton
Commanding General

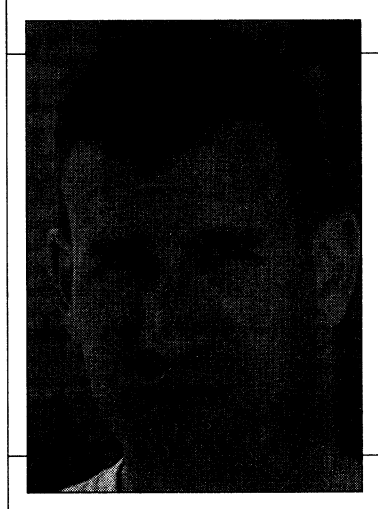
Joe Harvey, Columbus — "My Memorial Day will be different than last year's because I will have a chance to be a part of the Veterans' Administration."



Sgt. Matt Carpenter, 1st Battalion, 30th Infantry Regiment — "Yes this Memorial Day will be different. Last year I was doing charge of quarters duty, this year I will be spending time with my family."

Erma Williams, family member — "This Memorial Day seems to be more special than the last one, because so many of my friends and family members are military, and since September 11, I have placed more emphasis on spending time with them."

Christina Brown, family member — "This year I will be spending more time with my family then last year. Sometimes we don't understand the importance of family until something tragic happens. We should never let it come to that."

Capt. David McGuire, 1st Battalion, 293rd Infantry Regiment — "Yes, my holiday will be different this year, because I just started Ranger School, but the thought of the veterans who died for our freedom and the policemen and firemen who gave their lives September 11 will help me through it."

Bonnie Hogue, family member — "Yes this Memorial Day will be different. I have a new grandson, and I will be spending time in southern Georgia with him and the rest of my family."

NCO commandant advocate for education

CSM Monk prepares to move to ITB

Pfc. Brian Trapp
Bayonet staff

The commandant of the Henry Caro NCO Academy and Drill Sergeant School will change positions to become the command sergeant major of Infantry Training Brigade May 30.

The transition comes after 28 years in the Army for Command Sgt. Maj. George R. Monk.

"I'm going to miss having control over all the aspects of the NCO Academy," Monk said. "This has been the best assignment of my life. Being commandant solidified everything I did up to this point."

Monk has led the NCOA for more than four years and still has a challenging time describing the evolution of the NCOA.

"The NCO Academy is a living breathing institution, constantly updating and changing to the soldiers of today and strengthening their abilities," Monk said.

Education is one of Monk's key focuses as a command sergeant major. While Monk has been in his position, a number of people have earned their bachelor's and some even their masters.

Some people have jokingly called the NCO Academy "Monk University" for the amount of time he spent promoting education, said 1st Sgt. Darrell Sullivan, former NCO assistant commandant.

"He is a big advocate for education," Sullivan said. "Numerous people have earned a variety of degrees since they have been at the NCO Academy, including myself. He encouraged people to get a degree. It was the reason for my success."

Monk also had the opportunity to brief a number of foreign nationals and dignitaries about NCOs and their abilities.

"They would always be impressed with how much NCOs handle," he said. "They'd leave saying they wanted to take that information back to their country."

As the 16th commandant of the NCOA, Monk saw it through the consolidation of the 11-series military occupational specialties, with which he will deal firsthand at his new assignment.

"As ITB command sergeant major, it really will be bringing me full circle," Monk said.

Pfc. Brian Trapp

Command Sgt. Maj. Monk stands next to a bust of Command Sgt. Maj. Henry Caro in Infantry Hall. Monk helped move the NCO Academy to Infantry Hall.

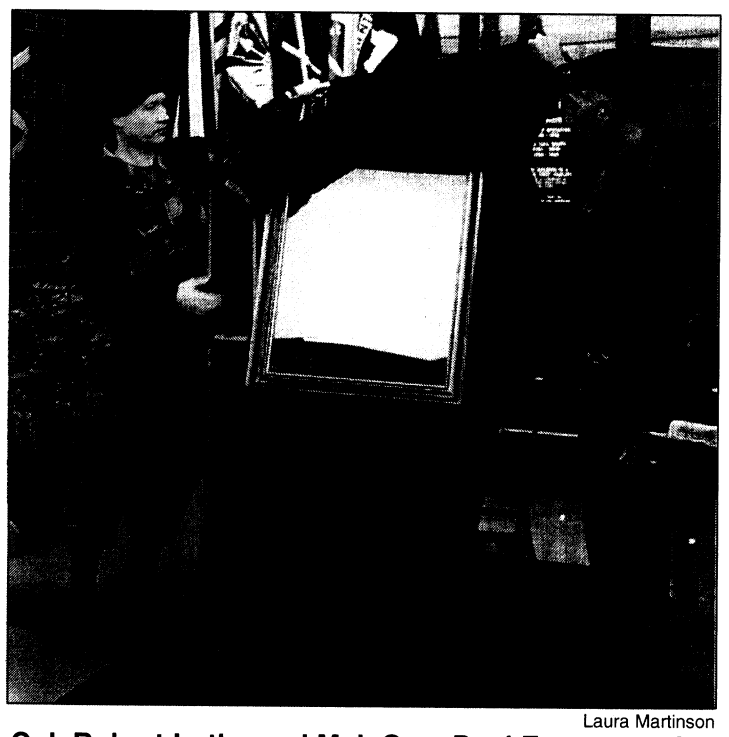
"From when I started in basic training to when I was a drill sergeant, then as a chief instructor at the Drill Sergeant School and being Drill Sergeant of the Year for Fort Jackson, (S.C.), this will be a great experience."

Monk also will take some learning experience with him from the NCOA.

"I've learned so much as the commandant, for that I am a better person and a better soldier," Monk said.

Dental Corps shows appreciation

Salomon Clinic rededicated, medal awarded



Laura Martinson
Special to The Bayonet©

"A grievous mistake corrected," said Maj. Gen. Paul Eaton to a crowd of dental corps officers and their families May 17. The gathering was to rededicate the Salomon Dental Clinic to Capt. Ben Salomon, a dental corps officer killed in the Marianas Islands in July 1944. The mistake was a 54-year delay in Salomon's receipt of the Medal of Honor, which was awarded May 1 in a White House Rose Garden ceremony.

Salomon, a prior enlisted infantryman, was killed in action while serving as the regimental dental officer for the 105th Infantry Regiment. But on that particular day, he was using his medic skills to treat sick and wounded soldiers, and his training as an infantry soldier served him and the wounded well wh his aid station came under attack by thousands of Japanese soldiers.

"I don't think he ever fully understood or comprehended the importance of his training before that day," Eaton said.

When enemy soldiers began to creep under the walls of the aid station, Salomon killed those approaching and ordered his comrades to leave and carry the wounded away with them. He was last seen manning a machine gun after its gunner was killed, and was last heard shouting, "I'll hold them off until you get them to safety. See you later."

Laura Martinson

Col. Robert Lutka and Maj. Gen. Paul Eaton unveil a portrait of Capt. Ben Salomon May 17.

But he never did. Instead, he killed 98 enemy soldiers and allowed the escape of many of his own. He was shot 24 times before he fell, and more than 50 times after that. When they found his body, he was slumped over the machine gun he had moved four different times to gain a new line of fire.

He was posthumously nominated for the Medal of Honor but denied on a technicality. His medal was only recently approved, when a legal review ruled that the 1929 Geneva Convention allowed medical personnel to bear arms in self-defense of the sick and wounded.

Since Salomon has no remaining family, the award was presented to the Dental Corps chief, Maj. Gen. Patrick Sculley.

The award and rededication are reminders that no soldier, regardless of job title, is totally exempt from the ravages of war.

"Once an Army uniform is worn, duties don't discriminate," said Col. Robert Lutka, commander, U.S. Army Dental Activity. "It's not always going to be some other soldier at some other time."

Local veterans receive free home repairs

House of Heroes project gives back

Angela Sachitano

House of Heroes volunteers work to reach their goal of 50 houses in five days.

Volunteers put finishing touches on the house.

Retired Sgt. 1st Class Floyd Jackson and his wife, Dinah, moved into their home in the Oakland Park subdivision shortly after retirement in 1991.

The house off Victory Drive was a modest one, small and in need of many repairs, but it was affordable.

"We wanted to stay in Columbus," Dinah Jackson said. "We wanted a stable life for our little girl."

Like many Army families, the Jacksons moved dozens of times during Floyd's 20 years of service.

It was a sacrifice the family made, and they expected nothing in return.

"Floyd was over in Germany when the Berlin Wall came down. I missed him so much," Jackson said. "I wondered then if anyone cared what soldiers and their families go through."

It wasn't until the summer of 2001 that the Jacksons realized how much their community cared for them.

That's when Columbus House of Heroes volunteers called and asked if they could make any repairs to the home.

"Volunteers called and said they were coming over to see what needed fixing up in our home," Dinah Jackson said. "Before I knew it, there were about 15 people I had never seen before painting, fixing my plumbing and putting in lighting. "

The Columbus House of Heroes is dedicated to giving back to retired military and public safety workers.

In its first year, HOH repaired the homes of 13 families. This year, the organization has a greater goal, 50 houses in five days.

"We have volunteers set to work the week of September 13," said Carol Dudley, House of Heroes board member.

"We'll be repairing and revitalizing 10 homes a day."

Local companies like W.C. Bradley, Synovous and Coca-Cola have all volunteered money and employees for the project.

Home Depot is also donating materials.

"This project is phenomenal because it shows veterans we are not a cold, forgetful community," said Chuck Walls, garrison manager.

Since its development last year, House of Heroes has been gaining state and national recognition.

Representatives from other communities around the country have contacted HOH to find out more about the project.

"As far as we know, it's the only organization of its kind," Dudley said. "Community leaders from Alabama and Texas have expressed interest."

House of Heroes is trying its best to get the word out about the need to help veterans who have had hard times.

Volunteers hope the project in September will bring even more awareness.

"We have targeted homes in the Oakland Park and Benning Hills Community," Dudley said. "We already have a list of more than 50 homes. But we are still in need of volunteers."

Volunteers that Dinah Jackson said were a blessing from God.

"We had prayed about the house for a long time," Jackson said. "We didn't have the money for the repairs. The House of Heroes really brought a sense of pride to our family."

That pride will also be shown when the repairs are finished and each family receives a special gift from the White House.

"On the last day of our project, all of our veterans will receive a flag that has flown over the White House," Dudley said. "It's a special gift. President Bush is even aware of our project."

Anyone interested in volunteering for the House of Heroes or submitting a request for repairs, call 689-6226.

Army refines OER system

Change allows senior rates to do best

Joe Burlas
Amy News Service

WASHINGTON — Though the latest version of the officer evaluation report is working the way it is supposed to, according to personnel managers, refinements to the OER system are already on the way.

Approved refinements include: revising the rater portion of the report to separate performance and potential remarks; "masking" all lieutenant OERs upon promotion to captain; reviewing the possibility of masking chief warrant officer 2 OERs upon promotion to chief warrant officer 3; emphasizing current counseling and mentoring obligations; and conducting an annual assessment of the system.

The refinements are based on the recommendations of an eight-month review of the OER system that ended in April.

"The officer evaluation report is doing the job it was designed to do — that is, to assess the performance and potential of officers in a manner that provides an effective tool to identify, assign and select the best qualified officers for promotion, education and command," said George Piccirilli, Total Army Personnel Command officer evaluation system chief. "We know the OER is providing selection boards the information they need to select the leaders the Army needs."

Piccirilli should know how well the OER system is doing the job it was designed to do as he briefs each officer board on the OER and reviews selections results and board surveys when the board concludes.

He said he has gotten a lot of feedback in the last year that board members find it difficult to separate the rater performance remarks from potential ones as both are entered in the same section of the OER.

To alleviate that confusion, PERSCOM will soon put out a message to double space between performance and potential comments until the actual OER form can be revised and fielded.

The OER review was prompted in part by the officer Army Training and Leader Development Panel, released last May.

It reported that a perception in the field that Army culture expected a zero-defects performance of its leaders.

The officer ATLDP also found a perception that a "center-of-mass" check on the OER by the senior rater meant no possibility of promotion beyond captain.

Center-of mass-ratings are not a killer, Piccirilli said, and promotion board results bear that out.

Statistics from fiscal year 2001 boards show that the majority of officers selected for promotion to major, lieutenant colonel and colonel had a mix of center-of-mass and above-center-of-mass reports.

Only about 10 percent of the officers considered for major, lieutenant colonel and colonel had all above-center-of-mass OERs when their boards met. In fact, 11 percent of those selected for promotion to major and 17 percent of those picked up for lieutenant colonel had nothing but center-of-mass ratings on their OERs.

A senior raters' ability to give above-center-of-mass ratings is limited by regulation to no more than 49 percent of the reports rendered in a particular grade, thus ensuring reports do not get inflated, Piccirilli said.

"It allows senior rates the opportunity to advance their best, with the confidence others can't inflate," he said.

As part of the OER review, senior leaders and surveyed junior officers were offered alternatives to the senior rater portion of current OER.

Almost all chose to remain with the current system, Piccirilli said.

Piccirilli further stated feedback from selection boards clearly indicates that board members weigh an officers' entire file during deliberations factoring in the officers' assignment history, career progression and evaluation reports.

System moves from top to bottom

Improvements on device help training

Ten soldiers from the 101st Airborne Division (Air Assault) are performing various tasks with the aiming device bracket of the Multiple Integrated Laser Engagement System for Dismounted Battlespace Battlelab research.

The research is to improve the performance of the system because currently the system's design interferes with other combat optics and aiming devices soldiers use during training, which is why the Directorate of Combat Development—Small Arms Division, Training and Doctrine Systems Manager-Soldier, the Directorate of Operations and Training and DBBL are working together to find a resolution.

The system needs to be changed, said Staff Sgt. Ronnie Montgomery, squad leader for the soldiers from 101st.

"We want soldiers to train as they fight," said Maj. Roy Manauis, assistant Training and Doctrine Command System Manager for lethality. "You don't want to have negative training feedback."

The redesign of the brackets for the MILES system are being mounted to the sides or possibly the bottom of the M-16A2, M-4 rifle and M-203 grenade launcher to eliminate the interference of the system with other combat optics such as the PAQ-4 laser aiming device, said Mike Kennedy, project officer for DBBL.

Spc. Douglas DeMaio

The new Multiple Integrated Laser Engagement System design won't interfere with other optics.

The stability of the system is also a factor, Kennedy said. Soldiers put equipment through a lot of punishment while performing missions, so it's important the system stays secure to get accurate data.

"We can use the MILES system as a good training aid, but if it interferes with our other equipment or doesn't give us accurate feedback, it could hinder our training more than help us with it," said Spc. Mark Leiker, one of the soldiers testing the equipment from the 101st.

U.S. Army Europe changes drivers' license policy

Move clarifies safety, security initiatives

Army News Service

HEIDELBERG, Germany — Soldiers and civilians arriving in Germany can no longer use a military driver's license as the basis for obtaining a license to drive a privately owned vehicle.

Drivers must now possess a valid U.S. state drivers license or country license in order to obtain a U.S. Forces POV Certificate of License and operate a private auto off post, according to officials at the U.S. Army Europe Office of the Provost Marshal.

The rules for registering and driving private vehicles in Germany were updated for the second time this year April 17, said Tom Lorenzini, registrar at the U.S. Forces Vehicle Registry.

"The changes became necessary to clarify certain procedures and implement safety and security initiatives," Lorenzini said.

Lorenzini described the three major changes affecting U.S. vehicle owners and drivers in USAREUR:

1. Individuals will no longer be permitted to use a military license (OF 346) in lieu of a valid state or country license to obtain a U.S. Forces Privately Owned Vehicle Certificate of License for any class. Lorenzini said this procedure was cancelled on the recommendation of the USAREUR Safety Targeting Board in order to reduce accidents caused by drivers who are too inexperienced to master driving in Germany.

> "The changes became necessary to clarify certain procedures and implement safety and security initiatives"
> Tom Lorenzini
> U.S. Forces Vehicle Registry

The USAREUR policy is now in line with the other DoD components, who also require service members to have either a stateside or host nation civilian license to operate POVs outside U.S. installations.

2. The Alcohol and Drug Abuse Prevention and Control Program has been renamed by the Army and Air Force.

The Army's new name is Army Substance Abuse Program and the Air Forces' new name is Alcohol Drug Abuse Prevention and Treatment. Individuals who commit an alcohol-related driving offense must complete one of these programs to get their U.S. Forces Privately Owned Vehicle Certificate of License returned.

3. Individuals with a record of three alcohol-related driving offenses will be prohibited from ever obtaining a U.S. Forces Privately Owned Vehicle Certificate of License. USAREUR Regulation 190-1, USNAVEUR Instruction 11240.6L or USAFE Instruction 31-202, Registering and Operating Privately Owned Motor Vehicles in Germany, prescribes policy and procedures for licensing POV drivers and registering POVs in Germany under the Supplementary Agreement to the NATO Status of Forces Agreement. Service members, civilian employees and family members in Germany who are authorized a U.S. Forces Certificate of License and POV registration are covered by this regulation.

More information can be obtained from the USAREUR Vehicle Registration hotline on DSN 386-7271 or online at http://rmv.hqusareur.army.mil.

Study: To look at transfer feasibility of military schools for military children enrolled in post schools, Hinman said. And it will also focus on whether or not DDESS is managing a fiscally sound and managerially effective school system.

"This means the study will address not only the cost effectiveness of our schools but also our ability to service the military child," said Dr. Dell McMullen, superintendent of Fort Benning Schools.

This study is different from the ones done in the past, McMullen said, because this time they are not looking only at DDESS as a whole but also focusing on the individual school systems.

For example, Columbia, S.C., may decline the transfer of educational responsibilities from Fort Jackson Schools while Fayetteville, N.C., accepts the responsibility for educating Fort Bragg's military children. But the study will look at each location separately to determine the best option, Hinman said.

> "We believe the schools located on post are uniquely designed to best serve military children."
> Dr. Dell McMullen
> Fort Benning Schools superintendent

"We believe the schools located on post are uniquely designed to best serve military children," McMullen said.

Some of the changes driving this summer's study include community growth around installations, state focus on school standards and quality, post demographics, aging school facilities and the costs associated with quality education.

"You can't equate everything in dollars and cents," said Richard Skinner, assistant superintendent for Fort Benning Schools.

All interested parties, including the parents, teachers and staff, commanders, school board and parent-teacher organizations, and the outside school systems, will have an opportunity to voice their opinions regarding this study.

The results of the study will be released in spring 2003.

replace through traditional funding sources and programs."

The relatively new program was first tested at Fort Carson, Colo. Their "partner" was awarded the contract Sept. 30, 1999.

The project included the operation maintenance and revitalization of 1,823 existing homes and construction of 840 additional homes.

The partner is delivering, on average, 20 new and 40 renovated homes per month. The contract calls for the developer to operate and maintain the total inventory for the 50-year term of the contract.

The project has also been tested in Fort Hood, Texas, Fort Lewis, Wash. and Fort Meade, Md.

Late in 2004, Fort Benning is scheduled to select a developer, and months of collaborations and negotiations will follow. Once the Community Development Master Plan is developed, the proposal has to be approved by the Department of the Army and Congress. After that, the contract will be awarded and the partnership will begin.

"I am concerned that we do the job right in the crafting of the deal because this will represent literally millions of dollars each year, and the period of the partnership is 50 years," Stelzer said. "So the stakes are high, but to help us along the way, we will have experienced consultants on our team."

The change will be seamless and soldiers will see many improvements, Smith said.

"I am very excited about this, Stelzer said. "The Army has long known that you recruit soldiers, but you retain families. This will allow our families to live in much better homes."

Cadets build confidence, teamwork

Nearly 70 Columbus High School students tackled the Fort Benning Leaders' Reactionary Course May 17.

The students, JROTC cadets and their guests, spent the day with soldiers from the 1st Battalion, 29th Infantry Regiment, who guided them through 14 LRC stations.

The LRC is typically used to test soldiers' "reactionary skills," both physical and mental, said Staff Sgt. Michael Westbrook, one of the A Company soldiers tasked to monitor the cadets' progress throughout the course.

"And that's basically what they'll get out of it today," he said. "When its over, they'll each have a pretty good idea how they react under pressure, what their strengths are and what they need to work on to be effective leaders."

And those are lessons that can't be learned in the classroom, said Theresa Clay, a senior.

"We can talk about it all we want, but it's different in a mission in the field, under pressure," the third-year cadet said. "This kind of exercise allows us to evaluate ourselves, to see if we can think fast under pressure and remember the things we've been trained to do."

It also tested the cadets' ability to work together, said Maj. Newt Kellett, Columbus High's senior JROTC instructor.

"It's all about teamwork and leadership," Kellett said. "The key to success in JROTC, just like any organization — just like life — is teamwork and leadership. Someone's got to rise to the top and take charge, but everyone needs to know how to work together to accomplish the mission for everyone's benefit."

The cadets were assigned to eight squads, and each squad was given 15 minutes to complete the assigned mission at each station. Each cadet had to assume the role of squad leader at least once.

As the students rotated between stations, they were briefed on the mission and given prescribed equipment to use while negotiating obstacles, such as water or simulated explosives. After 15 minutes, pass or fail, the squad conducted an after-action review before progressing.

Alana Miller, a freshman cadet, struggles to balance a board on two pipes without touching the ground.

"It's fun, but very challenging. A lot of quick-thinking and common sense, but it's tough," said Daniel Asber, a first-year cadet.

The tougher the better, said Sgt. 1st Class Clarence Lovick, A Company. The more difficult the mission, the "more confident (the cadets) become, and the more they learn to work together as a team.

"We don't want them to breeze through every mission. We don't even want them to complete every mission," Lovick said. "Sometimes you learn more from failure."

Many prepare for Balkan missions

Theater-specific training helps people stay alert

Sgt. William A. Graves
Bayonet assistant editor

Long before the war on terrorism, a battle raged against more than 1 million silent soldiers in the Balkans. They were ultimate warriors — not requiring sleep, food, water and shelter.

However, they pledged allegiance to no flag and were indiscriminate killers. Whoever crossed their path, women, children, friend or foe, paid the highest price — death.

The battle continues today in more than 4,400 mine fields in Bosnia and Kosovo, which means there are 140 mines per square mile, said Sgt. 1st Class Perez Carter, NCOIC of Theater Specific Individual Readiness Training.

This makes the course's mine-related material some of the most important, said Staff Sgt. G.W. Whitley, mine awareness instructor, 1st Bn., 29th Inf. Regt.

"You can't get into the relax mode," Whitley said. "You always have to remind yourself, 'If I get lazy or lose focus, I might step on a mine or find myself in a mine field.'"

Mine fields are serious business, he said.

To clear a 1-meter footpath through a minefield, it requires a 16-person team a total of 22 hours per 100 meters, given average visibility, moderate enemy activity and under normal U.S. countermeasures.

This renders the self and unit extraction portion of the class pivotal, Carter said. Students learn proper probing techniques, the different types of probes and how to mark mines when they find them.

Students learn many other skills during the three-day TSIRT course.

They are in the classroom for the first day learning the rules of engagement and media awareness. They also receive a country brief and anti-terrorism brief.

Day two consists of classes on such things as mine awareness, driving hazards, force protection skills and countermine operations.

Day three finds students going through situational training and force protection lanes.

The biggest focus of the course, which students take after four days at the Continental U.S. Replacement Center, is force protection.

"Some of them are not familiar with what we teach them, but, once they are aware of what they may face, the training becomes more serious," Carter said. "If they put into practice what we teach them, they should go perform the mission and come back safe."

It seems to work.

There have been 21,545 people and 352 units that have gone through the training since March of 1997. None of the course' students of the course have died in the Balkans.

"It's a tribute to the professionalism of our instructors, our realistic training aids and strict guidelines we enforce, Carter said.

Students agree.

"The course makes a lot of sense," said Capt. Karen Monday, 1186th Terminal Transportation Brigade, Jacksonville, Fla. "It equips us with the knowledge we need to survive if we end up in a situation that we're not used to."

As a result, the course sets its students up for success, said Sgt. 1st Class Reginald Underwood, 50th Signal Battalion, Fort Bragg, N.C.

"I've never been (to Bosnia) before," Underwood said. "Everyone is little scared walking into something they know nothing about. However, I'm excited. The instructors did an excellent job teaching us. It was a very productive time."

Course offers soldiers first challenge

Pfc. Chris Stephens

The soldiers of C Company, 1st Battalion, 38th Infantry Regiment, learned the art of a quick thrust with the bayonet during the Bayonet Assault Course Tuesday.

"When in a situation where you have no ammo, the bayonet is of great importance," said Sgt. 1st Class Gregory Lewis. "This teaches the soldiers survival without live rounds."

The assault course not only consists of obstacles on which the soldiers demonstrated their bayonet skills, such as thrusts, parries and butt-strokes, but also obstacles the soldiers had to negotiate as a team.

Some of the obstacles the soldiers negotiated were crawling over a log wall while staying low, the tunnel crawl, the log balance and horizontal ladder.

"This is the only chance these soldiers will have to strike something with a real-world feel during basic training," Lewis said. "The tasks required for basic training just don't allow for more real-world action like that of the assault course.

"These soldiers were getting antsy to hit something," Lewis said. "All the soldiers have done so far is sit in the classroom. This allows them to do something together as a team and start the team-building process early."

"It was excellent training," said Pvt. Ryan Connelly. "This training is a real eye-opener of war-time situations."

Not only did going through the bayonet assault course teach the soldiers how to defend their lives, but it also encouraged many of them to work harder and to give it all they have.

"Before going through the course, some soldiers were ready to quit," Lewis said. "They said they didn't like the Army and how things were done. The excitement of the assault course gave them an extra boost of motivation to continue on with their training and to finish it out."

Families clear quarters quicker

Post has exclusive cleaning crew

Angela Sachitano

Most families agree clearing post is stressful enough without the added pressure of cleaning quarters.

"We have so much going on at once," said Capt. Bart Hensler, who attended the Infantry Captains' Career Course. "Any responsibility the post could help with would be appreciated."

When Hensler and his wife, Suzanne, cleared their Norton Court quarters last year, they spent hours on top of hours searching for a cleaning crew that could get the place in order.

"Before soldiers could leave they would have to wait for a crew to come out there, inspect the place and give them an estimate," said Ken Henkins, Chief of Housing. "Then

No matter what entrance soldiers use to access Fort Benning, the procedure is always the same.

ID, proof of post registration, and at times, insurance papers.

No excuses, no exceptions.

In the eight months since Sept. 11, Fort Benning has gone from having zero access control points to a fully operating seven.

"We have been ordered to maintain a secure environment," said Maj. Milton Busby, Operations officer for Military Police Activity. "The access control points are crucial to post security. "

But the access points aren't secure without the manpower to guard them.

Beginning Monday, motorists saw an influx of police officers at those checkpoints.

The officers are part of the Department of Army civilian police force. Their mission is to patrol access points and closely guard the Fort Benning community.

"We will have a more secure environment with these officers around," Busby said. "They will have a core knowledge of our post."

The DA police will replace the National Guard and U.S. Reservists called up several months ago to help patrol post. Those soldiers will return

Relay raises $209,000 for cancer research

Bridgett Siter

Thousands of people from Columbus and Fort Benning joined the race to find a cure for cancer Friday and Saturday at Kinnett Stadium.

An estimated 3,000 walkers participated in the 10th annual Relay for Life, raising more than $209,000 for the American Cancer Society.

The 18-hour overnight event, which took place in hundreds of cities across the country, is the ACS's single largest fund raiser.

Called "the best event to date," by Steve Phillips, a member of the local ACS chapter, the relay surpassed previous events in the amount of money raised, the number of teams involved — 106 — and the number of survivors who participated in the "Survivors Walk" — more than 450, twice as many as last year.

Relay teams crowded the Kinnett track to kick-off the relay at 6 p.m. Friday. After cancer survivors released hundreds of pink balloons into the air, relay officials lighted luminaries around the track, each dedicated to a cancer victim or survivor.

Glynn Tomblin, secretary to Fort Benning's chief of staff, saw her name on several luminaries.

"It was wonderful, very touching," she said. "It was exciting to see so many people and to think they all want to pull together to put an end to this."

"This" being the cancer that claimed Tomblin's husband's life in 1973 and threatened her's last year.

"I'm a breast cancer survivor," said Tomblin, who underwent surgery, radiation and chemotherapy less than a year ago. "Because of events like this research has come so far. Because of advances in medicine and treatment, I didn't experience the sickness my husband went through. We've come a long way."

Though occasionally somber and emotional, the Relay for Life was "mostly festive and enthusiastic," Tomblin said. Tents dotted the stadium. Children lined up for pony rides, while others waited their turn at the karaoke, hula hoop and limbo contests. Venders sold T-shirts, popcorn, candy and hats, with proceeds going to the ACS.

Team members walked all through the night and Saturday, despite a steady rain that curtailed many of the events scheduled for Saturday morning. And though the crowd began to disperse shortly after sun-up, hundreds continued to walk or lingered under umbrellas and awnings to watch "Brutie" contestants vie for the title of "M? Relay for Life 2002." Men donned their best heels and jewelry and preened for the crowd.

"It was a little weird to be dressed as a woman, but all in all, it's for a good cause," said Staff Sgt. Adam Nash, who bested seven other contestants for the title. "I'd do it again. Who knows, maybe I'll retain the title next year."

Little letter people learn lessons in phonics

School play teaches kids alphabet

Angela Sachitano
Special to the Bayonet©

Try to imagine being 4 years old again when learning the alphabet seemed oh so impossible.

It's not always easy for little minds to remember all 26 letters, their shapes and sounds.

But Dexter Elementary pre-K students made it look easy on the evening of May 20.

"K stands for kites," said Katarina Tenorio. "I am a K!"

Katarina played her first starring role as the letter K on the Dexter Elementary cafeteria stage. Her mother has never been more proud.

"She's a natural on stage," said Magdalena Tenorio, Katarina's mother. "My older son didn't do this sort of thing in pre-K. He didn't learn the alphabet nearly as quick as she did."

Dexter Elementary pre-K teacher Peggy Gindville has been working with her students for weeks. She assigned each child a letter, a poem, and a starring role in the Letter People Performance.

Courtesy photo

Aspen Wilken bottom left, Jacob Sides, Will Anti and Elise Melhado are letter people.

"They're learning letter recognition, rhyming, and proper pronunciation of the alphabet," Gindville said. "All of the things that teach them to read."

They're also learning a thing or two about the pressures of performing.

One by one, sometimes in pairs, and even in threes, children took to the stage, dressed in creative letter costumes, reciting catchy poems filled with alliterative phrases about their letter.

Blaine Zigler walked energetically to the middle of the stage when it was his turn.

"S stands for silly skittles," Zigler said. "Skittles and socks." He was dressed in a homemade costume of colorful paper skittles and Ss.

"We've had rehearsals all week," Gindville said. "They know each other's parts. This is really a good age. They're young enough that they don't have a lot of self-doubt yet."

Parents also had a big role, perhaps more behind the scenes, though.

"We worked with Katarina and her lines for sometime now," Tenorio said. "We went over them every night and she wanted to get it down perfect."

Not one of the 26 letters stumbled on their words on opening night.

You could tell parents were impressed, as cameras flashed and camcorders rolled throughout the performance.

"The letter people have been around for at least 20 years," Gindville said. "The idea has really helped kids learn letters and they usually don't forget."

Parents won't forget the accomplishments their children made that night either.

"It's a beginning for her," Tenorio said. "The feeling is wonderful."

Traumatic events can hit anyone

Tricare will help in time of need

Tricare

It is normal for individuals to experience stress reactions to emotionally or physically traumatic events.

In some cases, people who have had traumatic experiences develop lasting psychological impairments, such as post traumatic stress disorder. The most frequently experienced traumas include: witnessing someone being badly injured or killed, being involved in a fire or natural disaster, being involved in a life-threatening accident, combat exposure, or physical or sexual abuse or assault.

Many people experience stressful reactions for days, weeks or even months after the trauma. Usually these reactions become less severe over time, but, in some cases, the post-traumatic stress may be persistent and psychologically impair a person.

There are several signs that indicate a person is suffering from PTSD. These include, but are not limited to, re-experiencing the trauma of the event through dreams or flashbacks, recollections of a disturbing event, feelings of emotional numbness, sleep disturbances, and difficulty concentrating, remembering or making decisions.

The family is profoundly affected when any member experiences psychological trauma and suffers PTSD. Some traumas are directly experienced by only one family member, but other family members may experience shock, fear, anger and pain in their own unique ways simply because they care about and are connected to the survivor.

Family members may feel hurt, alienated, frustrated or discouraged and may have a tendency to feel angry or distant toward the survivor.

They may find it difficult to discuss personal or family problems because the survivor becomes controlling, overprotective, or unreasonably anxious and fearful.

Recognizing the signs of PTSD, identifying current ways of coping with severe, traumatic stress, and getting help from mental health professionals can help the survivor and family members manage PTSD more effectively.

If you are a Tricare beneficiary and would like additional information on PTSD, call Choice Behavioral Health Partnership at (800) 700-8646 and ask for your local prevention and wellness specialist.

Accessing the Mental Health and Substance Abuse benefits:

Although Tricare beneficiaries are entitled to eight outpatient mental health appointments without an authorization, it's always a good idea to call Choice Behavioral Health at the above number.

By calling Choice you can make sure that the provider you have chosen to see is part of the Tricare network and that payment is authorized for the services you are seeking.When you call Choice the beneficiary services representative or health care finder can assist you with your choice of provider and advise you of your benefits under the Tricare program.

If you are a Prime enrollee and you elect to see a provider outside of the Tricare network or seek services without prior authorization, you may incur a point of service deductible and cost shares.

Members coordinate health care properly

Deductibles, cost shares available

Tricare

To receive the full benefit under Tricare Prime and to ensure continuity of care, Prime members must have their non-emergency health needs directed by their primary care manager and approved by the health care finder.

This includes all referrals to specialists, hospitalization or any care they may require while traveling away from home.

When Prime members do not coordinate their health care through their primary care manager, they make a choice to exercise the Tricare point of service option.

By making that choice, Tricare Prime members are subject to higher deductibles and cost shares.

Please see the following chart for Point of Service deductibles and cost shares:

Annual deductible (applies to all covered services):

Individual	$300
Family	$600

Cost share is 50 percent of the Tricare maximum allowable charge.

Tricare Prime beneficiaries who are treated for an emergency should notify their primary care manager within 24 hours of their emergency treatment in order to receive the full benefits of the Prime package.

families were required to give us a money order along with their keys. We'd do the final inspection. It could get very confusing."

But as of May 15, a smoother, less confusing system is in place.

Fort Benning now has an exclusive contract with a nearby contractor, Thomas Brand Siding.

The company has agreed to clean and paint quarters in a timely manner for pre-determined fees.

No waiting around for estimates, no hassles.

"Soldiers will simply have to notify the company 30-45 days before clearing," Henkins said. "It's a one shot deal. They won't have to bicker with other groups."

Families saying farewell will have a one-stop shop when the housing and transportation divisions move to their new location in Meloy Hall this summer.

Conveniently, the new cleaning division will be located on the same floor.

"Families can stop in and schedule a cleaning time when they schedule a pick-up time for their belongings," Henkins said.

"It can't get much easier than that."

Prices are set at $112 for a two-bedroom home and $125 dollars for a three-bedroom home.

For the Hensler family, the new concept is a weight lifted off of their shoulders.

"If Benning is willing to do the work for us, we can't complain," Capt. Hensler said.

And if all goes as planned, families moving into the quarters won't be complaining either.

"The turn-around time is going to be much quicker now," Henkins said. "Families will be in their new homes at least a week sooner."

home to assist in other missions.

"I've been advertising, looking to find potential officers that will meet our standards," Busby said. "We are looking at retired MPs and those with a law enforcement background, but it is not required because we will train them."

Nearly 150 civilian officers will be hired during the next few months. Right now, 25 men and women are already on board working the access control points.

"I used to work in corrections with Muscogee County and I have wanted to be a part of federal law enforcement for a long time," said McGregor Glasgow, Officer with the DA police. "This is a great start for me."

Like all other DA hires, Glasglow completed a month of vigorous training, including two weeks of checkpoint assists. Monday he is on his own, pulling over suspicious vehicles, and closely screening all motorists.

"I'm getting paid to protect this post and that's what I will do, Glasglow said."

DA police officers are assigned eight-hour shifts and the salary ranges from $22,000 to $29,000 a year. They come in as a GS-5 and will eventually patrol the roads as well.

"The benefit of having them here is we won't have to worry about them deploying or transferring to another duty station," Busby said. "DA officers are here to stay."

Summer jobs can earn huge payoff if earnings invested in Roth IRA

Contribution limits $3,000 per year

Anthony R. Tempesta
Office of the Staff Judge Advocate

If your child has a job this summer, a small gift now could have a huge payoff for the child in the future.

Parents should consider making a contribution to a Roth IRA for the child. The payment into the IRA may be based on the income earned from a summer job or after-school work.

The contribution limits for an IRA is the lesser of two amounts: the amount actually earned, or $3,000. So, if the child earned $3,000 or more, a $3,000 contribution may be made.

If the child earned less, $1,000 for example, then only $1,000 may be contributed.

The money deposited into the IRA does not have to be the child's money. The money may be given to the child to make the contribution, and any money given is considered a "gift" under the current tax laws. Gifts under $10,000 do not have to be reported.

However, the IRA contribution still may not exceed the amount the child earned or $3,000, whichever is less.

The Roth IRA could become a very nice nest egg for the child. A 15-year old who has $3,000 in a Roth that grows an average of eight percent a year will have $140,700 at age 65.

If $3,000 contributions are made for three years when a child is 15, 16, and 17, the IRA will grow to more than $390,000 by age 65.

Parents do not have to make the decision now. Contributions to an IRA may be made as late as April 15 of the following year.

Loyd Elementary School proves science is fun

Loyd Elementary School

With anticipation and curiosity, the Loyd School Science Night started with a hot dog dinner. After the dinner, the world of science was waiting.

The primary grades were hosted by Lynn Larsen from the Chattahoochee-Flint GYSTC.

The Science Night primary activities were:

• Butterfly prints — you make prints of the butterfly to further investigate the various features of a butterfly;

• Flying copters — with a paper copter you drop through the air. The air pushes against and around the paper propeller blades which makes the copter spin;

• Lucky Charms — take a cup of Lucky Charms and graph its contents;

• Puff the stuff — this activity is about prediction. A student or parent predicts the number of puffs it will take to blow an object. With this activity, you can see if the shape or weight of an object affects the number of puffs taken;

• Secret message — using candles, write a secret message, then paint over the message with watercolor paint — the message will be revealed. This shows the relationship between oil and water;

• Yabba dabba you — simply make your fingerprint and discover what type of print you have. Traits are the many different things that make you different from everyone else. Traits come from special chemicals that make up genes given to us from our mothers and fathers.

Are you a square?

Some of the students and parents of Loyd School are. For the third, fourth and fifth grades, one of the many activities of the evening is measuring height and arm span to determine if you are square. (That means your height and arm span are equal in length.)

Other events of the evening include identifying parts of crayfish, investigating the movement of sound through solids, liquids and gages.

The fifth-grade Science Fair winners were also announced during Science Night. First place went to Tamara Phifer for her study of ways to clean up oil spills. Bethany Ray came in second place with her investigation of how different soils affect plant growth. In third place was John Urrutia whose study focused on friction.

Science Night was a fun, exciting and educational event for students, parents and teachers. It gave parents and students an opportunity to learn together, as well as have lots of fun together as a family. The enthusiasm was at an all time high, and the world of science was seen through different eyes!

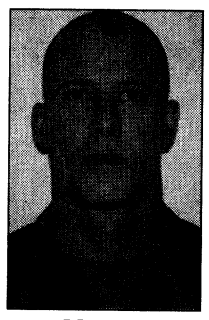
Bad things happen in everyone's life

Give thanks for the things going well in life

Chaplain (Capt.) Raymond Moore
Martin Army Community Hospital

Have you ever had something bad happen in your life? Have you ever thought about why Scripture comes to mind or someone quotes you a verse, such as I Thessalonians 5:18, "In everything give thanks."



As a chaplain, I have said and quoted this very verse to myself as well as others. Over the years, numerous books have been written on the subject, two of which are From Prison to Praise by Merlin Carothers and When God Doesn't Make Sense by Dr. Jim Dobson.

In good times or bad times this passage intends for us to be thankful in all circumstances at all times. This does not mean things will always be great or that you would even enjoy it. Just give thanks that God is in control.

When you and I choose to give thanks to God in all circumstances, there is a powerful impact in every area of our lives. Giving thanks keeps us alert to the true presence of God. When we praise him despite the stumbling blocks and obstacles we face, we have comfort knowing we are never alone. He assures us through Scripture our problems are his problems. He is always there.

By thanking God in our tough times, we enhance our sense of his redemptive involvement in our trials. His word tells us that, he will never leave us nor forsake us.

REFLECTIONS

Moore

Basically, we have his help and his presence. As believers, we can take our troubles to him, share our burdens with him and draw on his strength. God is there. He is always there to listen, comfort and strengthen us in his power. I can do all things through Christ who strengthens me.

When we give thanks to God, we can be motivated to discover God's purpose in our problems and his true desire for our lives. When we give thanks, the most rewarding thing is that you can know God can work out his plan regardless of the evil intention or actions of others. What others intend for bad God can intend for good.

The bottom line is God has a meaning and a purpose for your life, and nothing can change God's purpose for you.

Whenever you give thanks it positions you to receive the fullest extent of his blessings for your life, the good, the bad and the different. We are to give thanks in all things. When we do this, our will is bent to his. We then learn to submit our expectation to God's almighty plan. Giving thanks is God's will for our lives. This demonstrates our faith in God's word and our confidence in his goodness and wisdom for our lives.

You and I are dependent on God for every breath and step we take. He is Lord, the creator, and we are his creatures, made in the very image and likeness of God himself.

When we give thanks, it recognizes and affirms his sovereignty over every single area of our lives. He truly holds all we are or ever hope to be in his hands. He is the potter and we are the clay.

When we give thanks to God in all things, our trust is strengthened. Still trusting God is most difficult when we do not understand the reasons for the affliction or pain. Even though we do not have all the answers we still must trust in him. Giving thanks is truly the highest expression of trust we can and must display. In Proverbs 3:5-6, we are told to trust in the Lord with all our heart, lean not on our own understanding, in all thy ways acknowledge him, and he will direct thy paths.

Giving thanks is never easy in tough times but he is holy, true, and pure. Let us in everything give thanks to the Lord.

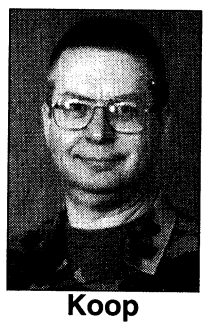
Vision encompasses more than eyesight



Only God knows what the future holds for us

Chaplain (Maj.) Raymond Koop
Family Life Ministries Center

Every household and organization needs to have vision. Where there is no vision, the people perish, warns the writer of the book of Proverbs 29:18.

A parent's vision is the campfire around which the family gathers. Vision provides focus, direction, power and unity.

The tyranny of the urgent is a form of nearsightedness that causes us to live from day to day in the present. We can't imagine what the future may bring.

Koop

Blinders limit our perspective of the world and others. The blinders of negative emotions, such as jealousy and hate, keep us from seeing the good in others.

The fog of doubt produces spiritual glaucoma that clouds our vision and limits us from seeing clearly and being confident in our actions (James 1:6).

Self-centeredness is a type of presbyopia that prevents us from seeing ourselves as others see us. The reading lenses of scripture provide a positive correction to this malady.

If our vision is too farsighted, we may fail to see how to get from where we are now to where we want to be. If it is too broad or frequently changing, we lose our sense of direction and focus.

According to scripture, God gives dreams to the old and visions to the young (Joel 2:28). God grants sight to the blind (Psalm 146:8). Only God knows the future for sure.

Would you like help in clearing up your vision by establishing goals and direction in life? Free counseling and support are available. Contact the Chaplain Family Life Ministries Center at 2606 Dixie Road, Soldiers Plaza, 545-1760.

Darby's Rangers, from 4th Ranger Training Battalion, shut out the Comanches, of 598th Maintenance Company, 14-0, at Knappenberger Field on Kelly Hill in intramural softball action May 16.

Darby's Rangers laid the wood down on the Comanches in the bottom of the fifth by scoring nine runs, which included two inside the park homeruns.

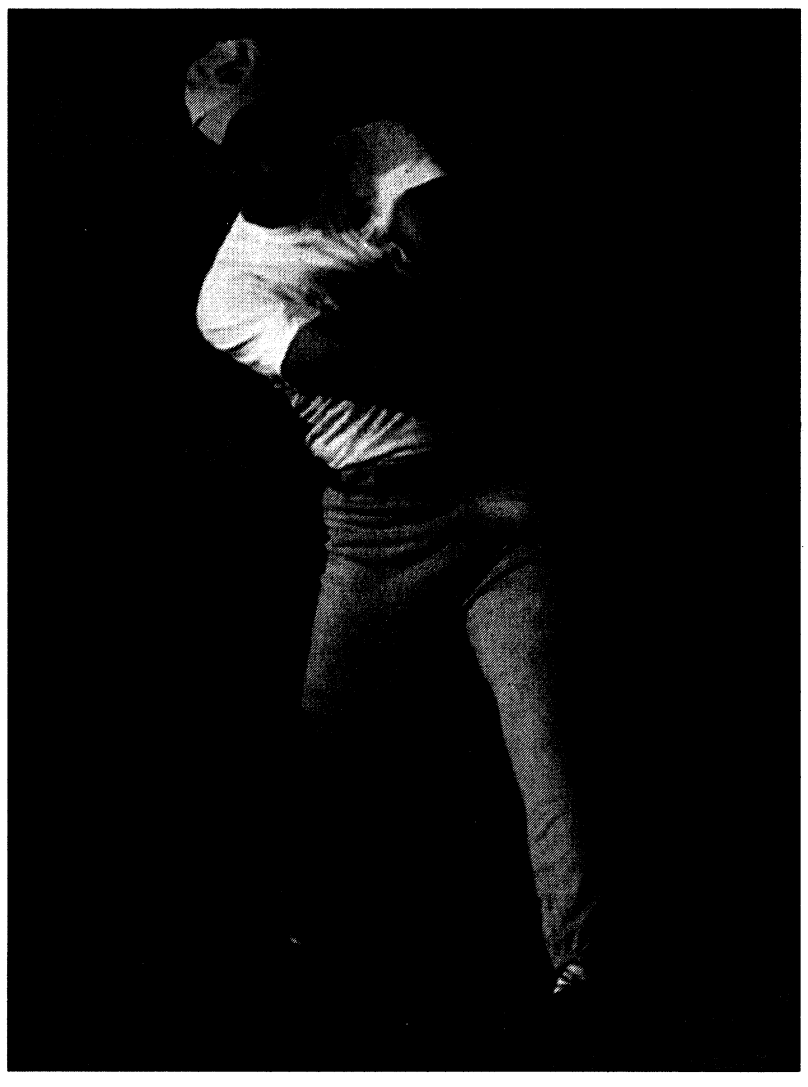
"Once we open the flood gates, it's hard for us to be stopped," said Kevin Brill, Ranger left-centerfielder, who hit the first of the inside-the-park homeruns.

This was the first game of the season for Darby's Rangers, who won the U.S. Army Infantry Center tournament, April 20, said Dave Perry, catcher, who hit the second inside homerun. The win provided the Rangers with an understanding of how they might stand fair during the season, but teams will by gunning to dethrone the post defending champs.

"We want the challenge," Brill said. "We like the pressure."

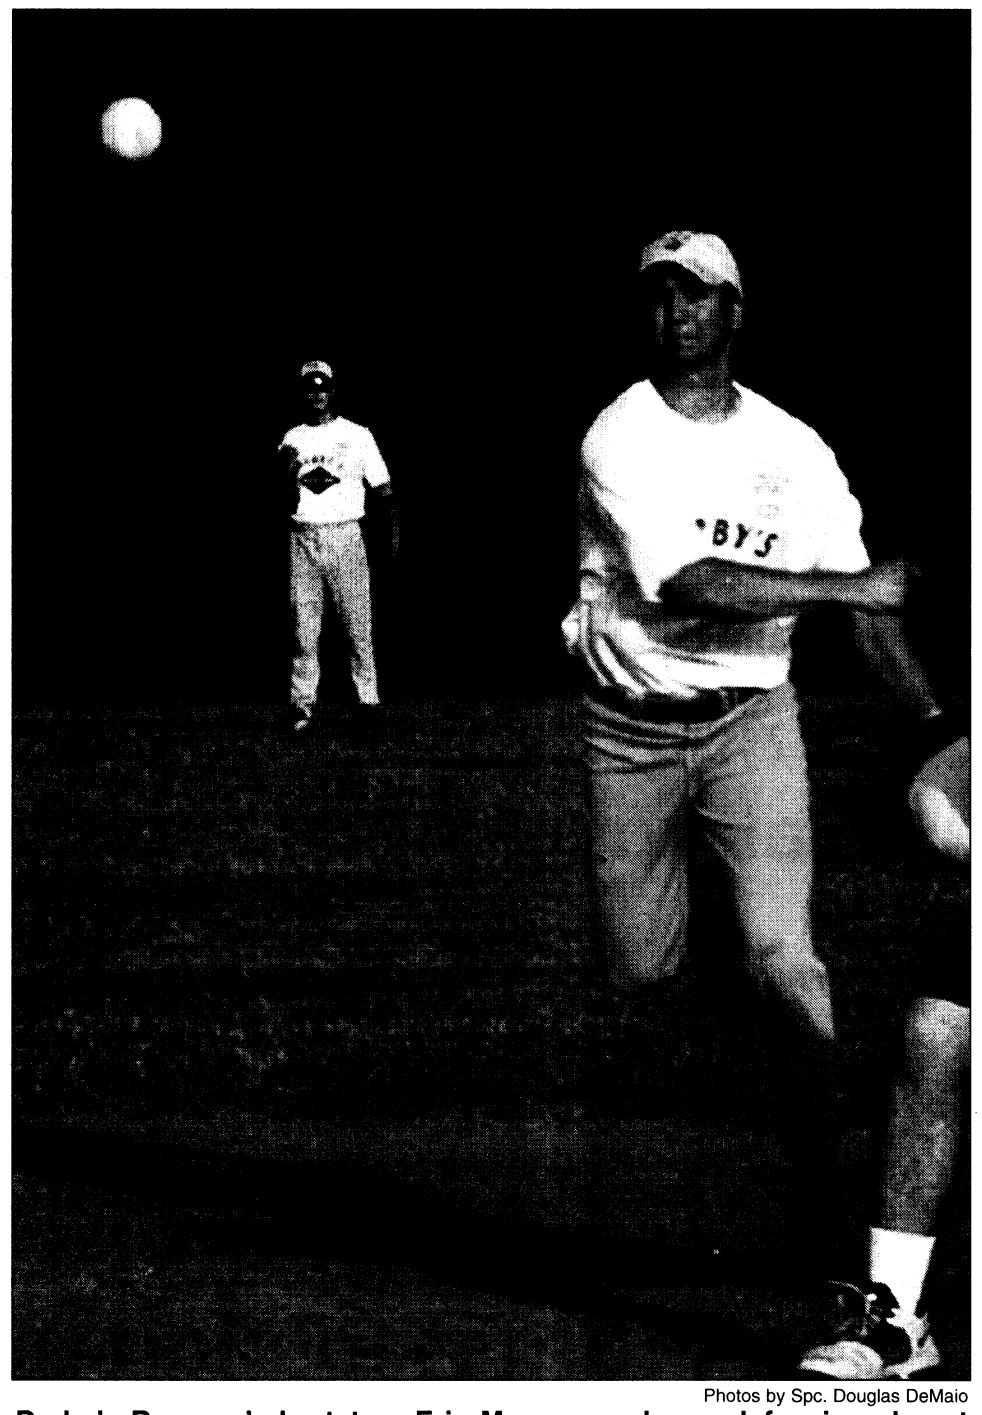
The game started slowly but picked up gradually throughout the game.

"We weren't hitting to well," Brill said of the first four innings.



Darby's Rangers didn't score in two of the five innings, but their defense forced the Comanches twice to go three up and three down.

In the bottom of the third, the Comanches shot themselves in the foot with an error, which gave Darby's Rangers the momentum to score three runs.



For the most part, Darby's Rangers placed a lot of emphasis on fundamental defense during the game, but coach Tom Siter has his team focused on putting the ball into play to increase their on based percentage, Perry said.

"We have the right focus, and our intention is to hit stronger," he said. "Coach has us moving in the right direction."

The motivation for the team starts with Coach Siter, Brill said. He leads with knowledgeable decisions and emotions, and the rest of the team follows by his example.

Exercise routine mirrors daily activities

Average Joe can train like professional

Sgt. Matthew Billet
U.S. Army Physical Fitness School

It's a major challenge for personal trainers to train individuals who once were athletes and now wish to regain skills and abilities of bygone days.

Most clients seen by a personal trainer are either completely untrained or recreational athletes.

The common approach to such a group seems to be core muscle group exercises using machines with a volume of three to four sets of 10 to 12 repetitions with one to two minutes between sets.

While this is a safe way to start, once a client has made reasonable progress in strength and control, is it within reason to introduce more advanced motor skill activities?

Rationale for the introduction of more advanced training for the non-athlete may have intangible benefits in regard to cross-over effects on everyday life.

The fact is, for some, everyday activities of life can be just as strenuous as athletic competition. While the playing field may not be the same, the risks are just as great. Evidence of this is the growing number of non-athletes making use of physical therapy and rehabilitation facilities.

So why not encourage clients who are ready and willing to take on a more serious approach to training?

As a selling point, creative marketing by the fitness professional can sell selected exercises that demonstrate a dramatic effect on everyday activities.

They not only provide variety to a fitness program but perhaps encourage potential fitness involvement by those who are currently sedentary.

What principles must be considered to assess whether a client is ready?

Adequate trunk and hip strength, as well as good balance, are key prerequisites for success in advanced training as is ensuring that the client has adequate flexibility to achieve the positions needed for these types of advanced activities.

A recommendation is to start by teaching the proper mechanics with a bar or a very light weight.

The body responds to the stresses it's subjected to.

Life is very dynamic, so the fitness routine that relies solely on resistance machines may be incomplete.

Injuries in daily life are caused by unexpected movements, so a fitness program that incorporates functional movement and strength associated activities may be a very practical way to control injury.

In addition to the transfer of skills, it could be a lot more fun.

Best of all, it may even get more people interested and motivated toward healthy lifestyle activities.

look CLOSER look look look

The following are examples of exercises which mirror everyday activities:

- Stiff-legged deadlifts — picking up groceries or luggage from the trunk of the car.
- Deadlifts — lifting and propelling a loaded garden wheelbarrow.
- Military press — placing objects overhead around the house or in an airplane luggage compartment.
- Lateral movement drills — navigating crowds at a mall or running to answer the phone.
- Medicine ball throws — torso strength for tennis or golf.
- Plyometrics — bounding over an object or running up two stairs at a time.
- Front squats or lunges — bending to pick up a child and then standing.

Ranger Joe's destroys Columbus Power

Game ends with 23-3 blow-out

Pfc. Brian Trapp
Bayonet staff

The undefeated Ranger Joe's turned out the lights on Columbus Power with a 23-3 victory Monday night at Benning Field in Columbus.

The Columbus Power knew their fate even before they were on the field against Ranger Joe's, who have taken one of the top three spots in the league for the last 10 years.

"We played (and lost to) Ranger Joe's before. It's like the Fort Benning all-star team, and they are all athletes and in great shape," said Nick Saben, Columbus Power coach.

Ranger Joe's held Columbus Power scoreless in the first inning.

Then, Ranger Joe's proceeded to put in five easy runs in the bottom of the first.

"We played pretty well, but we could have done better," said Chad Gesell, Ranger Joe's outfielder.

In the top of the second inning, Columbus Power came out and put in one run early in the inning.

Then it fell apart, as they lay victim to Ranger Joe's skills of fielding the ball and infield throwing.

"Our skills are pretty even across the board," said Tom Siter, Ranger Joe's left fielder. "We have a good defense and offense.

In the bottom of the second, the flood gates opened and Ranger Joe's put in run after run.

Siter hit a solo and three-run homer, and once the dust finally settled on the second, inning the score was 17-1.

"The important thing about playing downtown is that everyone is a team player," said Jim Armstrong, Ranger Joe's manager. "We are soldiers first, but we are also athletes, and we let people know we are good athletes, too."

In the top of the fourth, Columbus Power came to the plate and put in two more runs. That was answered with another barrage of runs by Ranger Joe's, which ultimately brought the score to 23-3.

Then it was three up, three down in the top of the fifth for the Power, and the game was called.

"Everyone hit pretty well, we hit 23 runs in five innings, and that's not a bad game," Armstrong said. "We will win the league and probably go undefeated this season."

That hasn't happened for Ranger Joe's since 1996.

Rollin', rollin', rollin'

Sgt. William Graves

Mario Castillo, a contractor with Benson Construction, lays sod with the company's new $18,000 WMI installer machine May 17 at Pineside golf course. Holes 1 through 9 on Pineside should be playable by the second week of July. The new sod roller has saved the company time because workers can control it easier than the tractor they used to use. Also, the roller will pay for itself with the money the company saves in labor hours and equipment repair that resulted from riding the clutch of the tractor.

Conference attacks issues

Distance learning could change training, retention

Spc. Douglas DeMaio

"The state of the infantry has not been better than it is right now," said Maj. Gen. Paul Eaton, post commander.

The post commanding general addressed commanders, Department of Defense civilians and vendors at the Infantry Conference Wednesday afternoon on the state of the infantry.

The world is changing, and the Army is changing with it, Eaton said. The infantry is dynamic, and the transformation provides the U.S. Army Infantry School with new and exciting challenges for the soldier of the future.

Eaton spoke briefly about different weapon systems that will aid the transformation process and how small arms weapons are reaching a point of maximizing their platform.

"When you look at the stuff we are putting on weapons, it taps out the capacity of the platform, which places the need to start looking at a new weapons systems," Eaton said.

The Stryker is new but still possesses its own issues, he said.

"If you become dehydrated, you're going to get sick and fall out," Johnson said. "You don't want to do that here — two times and you're out."

DOIM positions to remain in house

Keeping jobs saves post $6.2 million

Sgt. William A. Graves
Bayonet assistant editor

Numbers don't lie, and they made Fort Benning's tentative decision to keep Directorate of Information Management positions in house very easy.

Fort Benning's garrison commander revealed the cost comparison results of the A-76 study for the DOIM function June 7 at Infantry Hall. DOIM beat Lesco, a contractor based in Huntsville, Ala., by more than $6.2 million during the upcoming five years.

"DOIM won!" said Col. Joe Torres.

"This is a very good announcement for the DOIM family," Torres said as the classroom exploded with cheers.

"I thought it was very satisfying that we won," said Larry Lalka, chief, Architecture, Plans and Policy at DOIM. "The chiefs and employees worked hard to compile a year's worth of work-load data."

The chiefs used that data to come up with a most-efficient organization.

"(The MEO) proves we can compete one-on-one with the private sector," Lalka said. "We worked as a team and won."

In fact, workers were professional, had a positive attitude and kept their chins up, despite the ramifications of a possible loss, Torres said.

Paul Yates, director of Information Management, said he was elated for his employees.

"Our major goal was to provide the best (information technology and information management) available, and we did that," Yates said.

Still, there will be shifts, he said. The directorate will make structural changes to become more efficient. For instance, there will be a reduction in force, and some workers will change locations.

DOIM won the contract for this reason, Yates said. The directorate showed the post that its "creative organizational design" made more sense. Doing the same job more efficiently by shifting functions is more logical than giving it to a different group of people who don't know Fort Benning and how it operates.

In other words, civilian employees can accept available positions for which they qualify within the DOIM MEO, or if no position is available, qualified employees will be considered for other available federal vacancies or registered in the Priority Placement Program for possible placement at other Department of Defense activities. Job training and the Army Career and Alumni Program will be available for their use.

Early retirement will also be an option.

"We're just going to have to wait and see," said Hazel Starling, management assistant with DOIM. "We don't know the specific changes yet."

The DOIM will start to inform its workers of the specifics after a 20-day public review period, which began Monday.

AFGE Local 54 will be an advocate for civilian employees during that time.

"The union will be there to help out if there are any problems," said Joyce DeKay, union representative.

As for the three military employees, they will be reassigned to other positions on post or PCS to other assignments.

"I'm happy the civilians won the contract, but the military folks' future is unknown at this time," said Staff Sgt. Julia Lowthorpe, NCOIC, DOIM.

She hopes to receive more information on the future of her duty status soon, she said.

Army made up of volunteers

Laura Martinson
Bayonet correspondent

COMMENTARY

What does it mean to be a volunteer? Ask any person you see with a giant white "T" on his chest and dressed from head to toe in bright orange garb, and we'll be sure to tell you "Go Vols!" with a thick Tennessee accent.

The University of Tennessee's Volunteers sports fanaticism traces its roots back to October 1780, when some of the state's residents volunteered for the Revolutionary War. They were heroes remembered as key factors in the battle of King's Mountain, where they earned their conglomerate title the "overmountain men."

How the name for the "Volunteer State" evolved comes from the media, then primarily newspapers, which began referring to "the volunteers from Tennessee" and "the Tennessee Volunteers." In May 1846, Governor Aaron Brown put forth a call requesting 2,800 volunteers for military service — 30,000 responded and the name stuck.

I looked up the word.

A volunteer is a person who chooses freely to do or offer something with no promise of compensation. Synonyms … extend, offer, sacrifice. Hmm … sacrifice.

And then it occurred to me. How could I have missed it? You all live smack dab in the middle of volunteer central.

I mean, what makes up our armed forces, anyway? I'll tell you what: people who have made a certain amount of sacrifice in the way they live, and sometimes in the way they die.

Now you won't be seeing anyone around here waving the orange and white (unless you're a Tennessee resident and it's game day). But there are three colors the Army's volunteers are more than proud of, in fact, willing to die for.

My entire life revolves around the military community. All of my friends are in the Army or married to it, and if I had a nickel for every time our families were separated, well, I'd have time to volunteer.

Over the past several months, my friends and family have said good-bye to many loved ones — some temporary deployments and others permanent good-byes to fellow soldiers and friends.

As the U.S. expands its efforts to exterminate global terrorism, there will surely be more farewells and trying times.

So why do it?

I guess some would say a soldier's pay might suggest they do their duty simply out of the spirit of giving. It really is that selfless spirit that makes our soldiers tick, certainly not the money. I know my husband does his duty out of a love for the Army and pride in his country, and now even more for those who've gone before him.

And it's as simple as that. Commitment. Duty. Loyalty. Discipline. Sacrifice. Love.

Perhaps in recent months these terms have become cliché, but only to those who don't really believe in them. Those elements and people do exist.

Case in point. My sister and her husband went to see We Were Soldiers, and she said she cried like a baby through the entire movie. Her tears were for the families portrayed in the movie, and what those left at home went through.

It didn't calm her any when the people behind her tapped my brother-in-law on the shoulder.

"Are you in the Army?"

"Yes, I am."

"Well, we just want to say thank you."

Gratitude. How refreshing. And how rare.

Everyone feels less than appreciated in his or her job at times, but let's face it, the military has to be the most taken-for-granted volunteer organization of all. But only it is called upon to defend those liberties we hold dear.

So here's to all the world's greatest volunteers and defenders of my freedom! There are people out there who appreciate all you do and all you sacrifice. And for those who haven't done so lately, tap a soldier on the shoulder and say thank you.

Go volunteers!

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Readers respond to housing commentary

Bravo to Bridgett Siter, she should win a humanitarian of the year award. Her perception is so on the ball. I think the better housing should not be rated by 7, 8, 9, officer, but by selfless accomplishments for our Army.

Military housing should be based on years of service and selfless accomplishments. Example: What military schools have you attended? Pathfinder, Jumpmaster? Jungle training? Are you a ranger?

In my opinion every officer should be required to wear a ranger tab before he or she gets commended for their mere existence.

Susan Holt
Fort Benning

I would like to respond to "Housing Policy Needs Renovation" from May 31. In her commentary, Mrs. Siter makes it sound as if all company grade officers live in Austin Loop. The fact is that only a small number of company grade officers live in Austin Loop. Austin Loop has a very long waiting list and most families are not willing to wait for a house in that neighborhood.

Some company grade officers live in the White Elephants. The White Elephants are beautiful historic homes, but they are four-plexes and the equivalent to living in an apartment. The yard is shared and there are problems between some neighbors over yard maintenance or lack of maintenance. There is plenty of storage, but the living space is very small.

My friends who live in the White Elephants say that they can clearly hear the neighbors that live either above or below them and can even smell what their neighbors are cooking or if they are smoking.

Most company grade officers and some majors live in Perkins Place. This is where I live.

Houses in Perkins Place do not have dishwashers, basements or enough storage for bikes and mowers. Some of my neighbors with three, four and more kids have to buy sheds or rent storage units off post to store items that do not fit in the house.

It could be worse.

I used to live in a different type of company grade housing that was also in Perkins Place, on Zuckerman Avenue. It had one bathroom, no dishwasher, no garbage disposal, no icemaker and no central air. There were two window units, but that only kept the living room and master bedroom cool. There were 20 of these houses with window units.

There are more than 4,000 houses on post and 20 did not have central air. Housing has since installed central air in these houses, and last summer was their first for central air.

My husband has 13 years of service and my neighbor has 14. I would guess that have of the officers living in Perkins Place have 12 or more years of service. Some warrant officers that live in company grade housing have 15 years in the Army.

As for those who do not intend to make the military a career, the Army does not expect all company grade officers to stay in the military just as not all junior enlisted soldiers are expected to stay. An E-3 deserves the chance to live in military housing as does an O-2 regardless of how long they stay in the Army.

There are many different houses on Fort Benning and they all have good and bad features. Much of it is a matter of opinion.

Not all officers live in big houses. I do not feel housing is in need of an overhaul just because my friends and I do not all live in Austin Loop. I do not think that enlisted families should move out of Austin Loop just because my husband has 13 years of service and my Perkins Place house is not as big as an Austin Loop house.

We are grateful for what we have and I know the families in the houses on Perkins Street and Zuckerman Avenue are grateful they now have central air.

Name withheld

I was alarmed to read Ms. Bridgett Siter's commentary in the May 31st edition of The Bayonet.

I will tell you my husband is a captain in the Army. It doesn't matter what job my husband has, or how long he has been in the military.

As I see it, all members of the armed service are committed to serving and protecting our country, and in the direst of circumstances, will end up fighting for and with each other in a time of war.

We know many folks who have left the military in search of a more stable life.

In addition to the military on their resume, they have added FBI, State Department, Secret Service and many other government organizations. While they may not be wearing a uniform, they are still serving our country.

I am currently living in Norton Court. The day we moved it, our neighbors told us our house had been condemned.

My neighbors and I have taken baths in orange water, turned dishwashers on with pliers, guarded children from electrical surges in lights, searched out the unidentifiable smell, consistently kicked on circuit breakers and caulked the odd spaces between the floor at the beginning of the wall.

This may be considered temporary officer housing, but most of us have been or will be here for about a year.

The officers have a place called "the projects" too. But we have made the best of our quarters, and the Army would be proud of the fix-up jobs taking place in our neighborhood.

I dare say many of our houses have unimaginable charm from many days of hard work. Cramped living rooms and yards always have room for one more family during impromptu weekend gatherings.

I have heard rumors that Perkins Place, permanent officer housing, is without dishwashers as well.

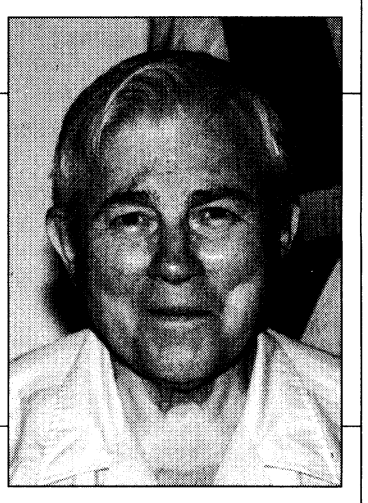
Last I checked, I was number 14 on the Austin Loop waiting list. My husband and I, like the couple mentioned in the article, also do not have enough furniture to fill up a house on Austin Loop.

I am working nearly 60 hours a week in order to help us pay off our school loan. We have college loans with five years of payments behind us and about three more to go.

When my husband wasn't at a summer Army training camp, he worked double shifts in a concrete pipe plant. While my husband was assisted with his tuition payments by the military, he still needed a place to live and food to eat, hence student loans in the thousands.

A recent article in The Bayonet discussed the recent decision to contract on-post housing to a private firm to handle refurbishment and renovation.

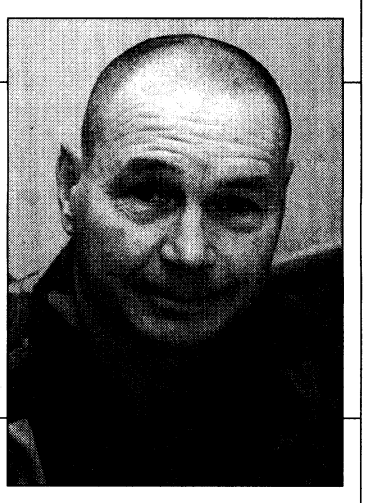
I think the Army is heading in exactly the right direction in taking care of all their soldiers, whether officer or enlisted. Until then, our housing is exactly what we make of it.



Danielle Benson

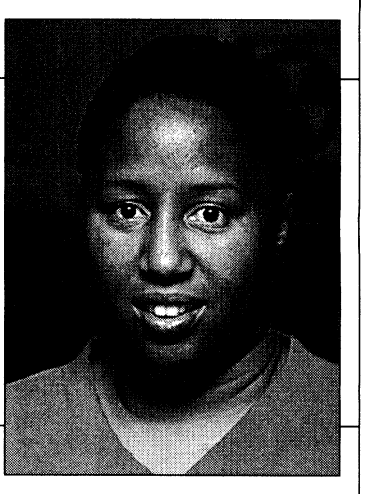
VARIOUS VOICES

What is your favorite military film or book and why?



Pvt. Marlon Williams, 1st Battalion, 47 Infantry Regiment — "My favorite book is Red Badge of Courage by Stephen Crane. The theme of the book is very good. It passes along the ideals of what honor and integrity truly mean in war."

Retired Lt. Col. Lawrence Corser, Columbus — "Patton was a great film. He shows leadership, and that's what I liked about it. He had a job to go do, and they accomplished it."



Genoa Stanford, Combined Arms and Tactics Directorate — "My favorite movie is Blackhawk Down because I was able to see what the soldiers went through. I have even more respect for them now and what they do."

Command Sgt. Maj. Jim Pickering, 1st Battalion (Airborne), 507th Infantry, Regiment — "Wilderness War by Allan Eckert — It really defines the beginning of American military history and Rogers' Rangers. It tells of the mental and physical toughness soldiers need."

Kunna Santos, AAFES employee — "Glory is my favorite film. It shows the struggle of men fighting for their freedom and the harsh realities of the will to survive on the battlefield."

Cassandra Caruthers, family member — "Crimson Tide — I liked both the actors. It was a story about mutiny, and Denzel Washington and Gene Hackman played good roles against each other."

Post gates to close during work

Overhead shelters to be built at gates

Pfc. Brian Trapp
Bayonet staff

Work on access control points in the weeks ahead will mean changes to the way people get on post.

The tentative dates of the road construction are June 24-28 for Benning Boulevard and Custer Road; July 1-6 for Sand Hill and 1st Division Road; July 8-15 for South Lumpkin Road and Eddy Bridge; and July 15-20 for Interstate 185.

The 36th Engineer Group will construct the overhead shelter emplacements over the in-bound access control points to take both the guards and motorists out of the elements.

During construction of the sprung shelters, the inbound lanes will be closed. To alleviate the impact, motorists will be rerouted to the following areas:

Effective today, the Sand Hill access will move from 11th Airborne Road to the next access road, 2nd Division Road.

Starting Monday the 1st Division Road will change to 8th Division Road on both sides of Hwy. 27.

The Eddy Bridge and Sightseeing Road will be rerouted through 82nd Airborne Road around Lawson Army Airfield. Physical training will not be authorized on this road until further notice.

All Uchee Creek and 165 traffic must take Dixie Road or Indianhead Road to 82nd Airborne.

The approximately $800,000 project will build lighted overhead structures, grade, improve and pave entrance roads and turn points, paint traffic lanes and safety lines and emplace protective bollards around the soldiers' positions.

"These structures will provide the guards at the gate protection from the elements and help prevent a heat injury during the summer months," said Sgt. 1st Class Michael Snapp, training NCO with Directorate of Public Safety. "It gets so hot on that asphalt that it will melt the polish off your boots."

Wearing BDUs out in the sun all day gets really hot, said Pvt. Megan Fisher, 988th Military Police Detachment.

It will be better when the structures are built, said Pfc. Larry Philyaw, 988th MP Detachment. It will provide the guards shelter and get them out of the elements.

"The bottom line is it will keep us cool," he said.

The shelters' clearance will be at least 18-feet for large trucks. They are also protected with a 30-year warranty.

The structures are very durable, said Chris Flowers, mechanical engineer with Directorate of Facilities Engineering and Logistics. The structures can take 80 mile per hour winds, and 100 m.p.h. 3 second gusts.

"The structures are good for motorists, too," Flowers said. "It will keep them out of the rain while they are going through. The structures are good for everyone."

WWII antitank battalion tours, remembers

Liberators of Dachau visit for reunion

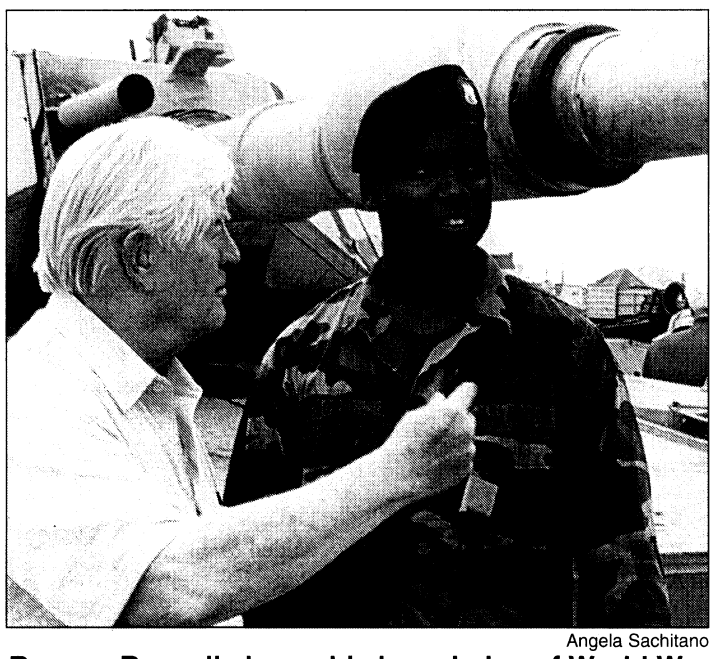
Angela Sachitano
Special to the Bayonet©

The year is 1942.

Pvts. George Owens and Oscar Kay are part of the first antitank battalion the U.S. Army has ever seen.

The teen-agers enlisted in the Army shortly after World War II broke out and were ready to learn the latest fighting equipment the Army had to offer.

Owens and Kay were assigned to B Company, 4th Antitank Battalion at Fort Benning. They, and 75 other men, were about to begin a journey that would linger in their hearts for the rest of their lives.



Little did they know, the friendships they were about to make would also endure a lifetime.

"We've been reuniting every year at about this time for quite awhile now," Owens said June 7 at a reunion with his buddies at Fort Benning. "I'm 80 years old now, and I'm proud to have had these men in my life."

A lot has changed since Owens and his World War II buddies fought battles in Europe. The antitank equipment they operated back in the 40s are like dinosaurs to the Army of 2002.

"When we fought back in North Africa in '42, I can still remember our vehicles clearly," Kay said. "We had mounted a 37 mm gun on top of a pick-up truck. That was our most proud tank destroyer."

It's been a dream for the men of the first Army antitank battalion to see the new fighting equipment and meet some of the current Army's proudest soldiers in person, Owens said.

Angela Sachitano

Roscoe Russell shares his knowledge of World War II era antitank equipment with a young soldier.

"My father and his old war buddies meet every year and exchange old stories," said Beverly Rutland, Owens' daughter. "Many of those guys took a bullet for each other during some of the harshest battles of World War II. They wanted to have this experience together."

Rutland helped her father plan the special reunion trip to Fort Benning.

Veterans couldn't wait to get a good look at the new fighting machinery of the 21st century.

The gang, some of whom helped liberate the Dachau concentration camp at the end of the war, gathered at the tank field on Kelley Hill with tears in their eyes as the vehicles were rolled out.

James Long, a sergeant who's back was blown apart during battle in WWII slowly climbed into the M1 A1 tank.

"This brings back a lot of memories," Long said. "I can't believe we are here."

One of the tanks the veterans viewed was a top-of-the-line vehicle that had proven itself in Dessert Storm.

Long and the others climbed in, looking inside and outside of the tank, asking questions about every detail.

"When we used the antitank equipment, we had to manually move the gun from side to side to aim," Kay said. "It's amazing to see those guns move so efficiently on the tanks."

"There have been a lot of technological advances that allow soldiers to shoot effectively on the move," said Capt. John Whyte, deputy training officer for 3rd Brigade. "For instance, the tank includes a gun stabilization system and an integrated sight unit."

"I wish all of the men from B Company could be here to see how far our military has come," Long said.

At one time, there were close to 75 soldiers in B Company of the Army's first antitank battalion, now only a handful remain living.

"Every year when our reunion rolls around, there are less and less of us," Owens said. "I don't know what next year will hold, but this reunion has meant the world to us."

It don't mean nothin'

One man's struggle to find peace long after the Vietnam War

We can never fathom the soldier's grief if we do not know the human attachment which battle nourishes and then amputates."

— Dr. Jonathan Shay, Achilles in Vietnam, Combat Trauma and the Undoing of Character

I met Kenneth Goss at a restaurant halfway between Fort Benning and his home in Skipperville, Ala. I found him sitting in a corner booth with his back to the wall. He told me later it was a habit he acquired in Vietnam.

We'd been trying to meet for some time now, but something always came up. I finally faced the fact that I was avoiding this interview, dreading what I knew to be certain since the first time I met him eight months ago. This would be difficult. I was here to dredge up painful memories.

As for Goss, he looked a little ill at ease, too, but I was used to that. I'd seen him twice before, at memorial ceremonies on Fort Benning, and each time he bore the look of a man burdened with the weight of the world. Twice I'd heard him speak, and I knew from the poignant tribute he paid his combat brothers that his was a tale those of us who've never known combat cannot comprehend. But I wanted to.

Now here we sat, Kenneth Goss and I, face to face, and I was reluctant to probe.

Mercifully, he made it easy. In a soft-spoken southern drawl, he began by telling me about a country boy from Alabama with a strong sense of duty to God and country.

A sophomore at Auburn University and a licensed Baptist preacher, Goss was not yet 21 when he volunteered for the draft in 1967. He was an outdoorsman who loved to hunt and fish and fancied himself an amateur herpetologist, quite skilled at catching water moccasin in the lakes and streams near his Phenix City home.

First a Boy Scout, then an Eagle Scout, Goss grew up knowing he'd serve if there were a need. And he saw a need in the Vietnam War.

"My dad was in World War II. My brother was in the Air Force. I came from a family of strong patriots. I never doubted it was my duty," Goss said.

But after basic training at Fort Benning and AIT at Fort Lewis, Wash., Goss was shipped to a tactical nuclear weapons unit in Hawaii. He immediately requested reassignment.

"I told the CO there was a mistake. I was supposed to be in Vietnam," he said. "He thought I was crazy. He'd been there. He tried to talk me out of it. But when I insisted he just said 'Keep your head down, kid.'"

Less than a month after arriving in country, Goss volunteered for special duty as a member of a combat tracker team, a relatively new concept to the American Army, but one that intrigued the country boy from Alabama who felt "at home in the woods." He was assigned to the 65th Infantry Platoon Combat Trackers, 9th Infantry Division, a canine unit comprised of a team leader, visual tracker, radio operator, cover man, dog handler and Labrador retriever.

Goss was the cover man, and it was his job to detect booby traps or snipers. His experience in the woods and streams back home gave him a keen ability to concentrate on the minute details of his surroundings.

"I was just looking out for a different kind of wildlife," he said. "It wasn't a job anybody really wanted. If you were ambushed or someone was hit by a sniper, it was because you didn't do your job. You felt responsible."

Responsibility weighed heavy on the Goss, known as "Preach" to the other soldiers who turned to him for encouragement. He was the unit's unofficial chaplain, and became adept at masking his own fears and frustrations as he counseled others.

"We had this saying — 'It don't mean nothin'.' It was a survival mode. We just shut off our emotions so we could carry on. I learned real quick to distance myself for my own sanity," he said.

Goss' hold on sanity became tenuous at best after a particularly gruesome firefight. His team was assigned to support a mechanized armored unit, and he became friendly with some of the soldiers, including a young medic named Phillip Rogers.

"Here he was, a black man from New York, and here I was, a white boy from Alabama — in the 60s. But none of that mattered out there. We were friends," Goss said. "We were on a mission, looking for VC, and he was talking about this big party his family had planned for him. He was going home in 30 days.

"Then all hell broke loose all around us. They had us penned down. Someone yelled for a medic and Phil went to help."

A short time later Goss was called on to retrieve three American soldiers, wounded and trapped 50 yards away. He crawled through the mud and water till he found an injured soldier and dragged him back to safety.

Then he found his friend slumped over the body of another soldier.

"It was Phil. He was dead, I could tell that right off. I pulled him on a stretcher and pulled it up over me, over my back. When I did that his blood ran down on me. I still see that everyday," said Goss, wiping tears from his eyes. "I froze, I mean right there. I started thinking about his family in New York getting ready for a big celebration. They don't know he's dead. And that just stopped me in my tracks."

A grenade exploded close by, jarring Goss back to his senses. He carried his friend back and returned once more to retrieve the body of the third soldier.

> "There's a brotherhood among combat veterans that's stronger than any other bond. Stronger even than marriage, I guess. It destroyed a lot of marriages, but it created an incredible bond between those who went through it."

Goss was awarded a Bronze Star with V Device for actions beyond the call of duty.

"I never really understood that. I thought it was my duty," he said. "They would've done it for me."

Somewhere along the way Goss came to believe he was destined, like his friend, to die in Vietnam.

"See, when we first got there, it was always the 'other person.' But when the other person kept getting killed, we realized we were running out of other persons," he said. "It wasn't a matter of 'if,' but 'when.'"

But nearly a year later his replacement arrived, and Goss trained young Pfc. Andy Kiefhaber to keep his head low and his eyes on his surroundings, just as he'd been taught. Scheduled to leave Vietnam two weeks early to get back to college, Goss was packing his bags when he got the news. Kiefhaber had been killed on his first mission.

"I never felt so much guilt in my life. It was supposed to be me," Goss said. "As that aircraft lifted off coming home, the guilt was overwhelming. Fifteen of my buddies came home in bags. Why me?

"When my dad met me at the airport, I asked him how long till you forget. He said 'You never do, son.'"

"It don't mean nothin'," Goss told himself year after year, for nearly 30 years.

When he and his Vietnam brothers were treated with disdain, he told himself it didn't mean a thing. When nightmares kept him up nights, away from his wife, he told himself it would go away.

"I kept my demons to myself. Nobody knew but me. I had church members who never even knew I was in Vietnam," said Goss, who continued to minister for more than 20 years. "We were treated like the plague, so we learned to keep it in. If one of us went to a therapist, we were labeled 'crazy' or 'dangerous.'"

But the anger and guilt and feelings of betrayal continued to eat away at Goss, wreaking havoc on his family. He became "horrendous," he said. His wife left. His children disowned him. He was certain even God had turned his back on him.

Then one day he found himself filled with uncontrollable rage when he spotted a Jane Fonda video at Walmart.

"If you'd seen me then, you would've thought I was crazy. That was the darkest time in my life. I couldn't ignore it anymore," he said.

Goss began seeing a therapist who gave his pain a name – Post Traumatic Stress Syndrome. He became familiar with terms like 'survivor's guilt' and 'disassociation.' He began attending reunions of combat trackers, where he talked with others vets.

"There's a brotherhood among combat veterans that's stronger than any other bond," Goss said. "Stronger even than marriage, I guess. A wife can feel threatened by it. I know only two Vietnam vets still married to the same wife. It destroyed a lot of marriages, but it created an incredible bond between those who went through it."

Goss lives near Fort Rucker, and the sounds of live fire still trigger flashbacks of Vietnam. His wife attends counseling with him occasionally, though they still live apart.

Just last week he reconciled with his son, after more than two years. He still hopes to make amends with his daughter.

And he's looking forward to meeting Andy Kiefhaber's sister at a tracker reunion later this month.

Goss anticipates many more years of therapy, and he spends a good deal of time reading the works of noted doctors and historians, like Jonathan Shay, who continue to shed light on the plight of Vietnam veterans.

And Goss — still "Preach" to his friends — continues to attend reunions around the country, where he conducts memorial services for the trackers, dog handlers and dogs who died in Vietnam.

"We were never given the chance to mourn. We had to carry on. So we have to deal with it now. We can't pretend it didn't mean nothin' anymore," Goss said. "I want to come to grips with it all, but I don't ever want to forget. I owe it to them — Andy and Phillip and all the others."

Conference: Offers infantry leaders information

"It is not a perfect system," Eaton said. "It is a good vehicle, and we will solve the ongoing developmental issues."

Certain needs on weapons systems must be met, Eaton said. An issue like the Improved Target Acquisition System can fix on a target from 7,000 meters away, but it can only put ammunition on the target about half that distance from the system, which touches on the issue of lethality.

"How do you get greater lethality to a squad?" Eaton asked.

The answer lies within technologies, training and the future of combat systems, he said.

It also lies within artillery in military operations in urban terrain and dismounted light forces working together.

There has been a lot of debate over Fort Knox, Ky., and Fort Benning, Eaton said. It's positive because both posts have issues to address, and, as a combined arms Army, it's something that needs to be hammered out.

Gen. John Abrams, Training and Doctrine commander, addressed the audience about the direction TRADOC plans to take with Army transformation. He placed an emphasis on recruiting and retention issues.

The process of recruiting and transferring people from citizens to soldiers is constantly being evaluated, Abrams said. There are benchmarks in place for the Army to meet.

Recruiters are doing well, and education levels for enlisted soldiers are high, he said.

However, the true concern of the Army lies in the very heart of Army commanders — with the retention of captains, Abrams said. The Infantry Captains' Career Course places many demands on soldiers and their family members. They receive such a broad range of training that it conflicts with the importance of family, therefore hindering retention.

"The retention levels between 1996 and 2000 were unprecedented," Abrams said.

"You can't go back to the well if it's not there. This is something we need to reconcile."

The important part for increasing retention is to keep the core standards, while rooting out the separation from family, which is an issue that can be partially solved through experience in the school house and time spent with units, he said.

Distance learning is a possibility for these issues, Eaton said. Some things cannot be met through this medium, but knowledge and skills can be acquired through distance learning.

"The subject matter expert is just on the horizon," Eaton said.

Infantry: Gives Doughboy Award to two veterans

Inouye said. "I am overwhelmed and humbled to know that the selection was made by men who have or are serving in the Army infantry.'

Inouye received a Distinguished Service Cross for meritorious actions in World War II. The award was upgraded June 21, 2000, to the Medal of Honor. He served Americans for more than 60 years, more than 40 in the House of Representatives and Senate.

Inouye served his country honorably in the military as well. According to his biography, at age 17, Inouye was on scene tending to civilian casualties during the bombing of Pearl Harbor — Dec. 7, 1941. Inouye enlisted into the U.S. Army's 442nd Regimental Combat Team, the largest nisei unit or Japanese-American volunteer unit created in the Army.

The "Go For Broke" regiment, as it was known, fought in eight major campaigns in Italy, Southern France and Central Europe from 1943 to 1945. Inouye's brave and courageous acts during battle earned him a battlefield commission in 1944.

Gallantly fighting fascists Italians, who fought for the Germans, Inouye took out three machine gun positions, which had his men pinned down. It proved costly. Inouye was shot twice and lost his right arm when he displayed personal courage during the effort, April 21, 1945.

"When I was privileged to lead my platoon in combat, I was 19, and when I received my commission, I was just 20. At that age, and I am certain I speak for all infantry platoon leaders, I was not looking for glory or recognition," he said. "I felt that it was my duty to do what had to be done," he said.

Inouye was promoted to captain, released from the hospital months later and honorably discharged. Years later, Inouye became the 50th state's first congressman when he was elected to the House of Representatives in 1959. He gained national recognitions as a member of the Senate investigating Watergate and chaired the Senate committee for the Iran-Contra affair.

Pearce is a veteran with 35 years of experience. He was a command sergeant major from 1964 to 1979, serving as an adviser in 12 units, including the 82nd Airborne Division and 18th Airborne Corps. He spent 28 of his 32 years of airborne status with the 82nd.

According to an article written in the Fayetteville Observer in January 1979, Pearce is a straight forward man who placed the needs of soldiers above his own. He reported problems of morale and deterioration of benefits for soldiers and was a catalyst for improving both. He served in World War II, Korea and Vietnam. During his career, he earned the Silver Star, three Bronze Stars, four Purple Hearts and the Meritorious Service Medal.

Soldiers: Depart for Guantanamo Bay to guard enemy

Eaton spoke of his experiences with MPs and expressed his gratitude for the job they have done on post.

The 178th soldiers with the Georgia National Guard have guarded the access points since February.

"They are always out there smiling and being very helpful to those who come on post," Eaton said. "They are giving a great impression of Fort Benning. They are especially leaving a good impression with the families who are coming to see their soldiers graduate basic training on Sand Hill. They are very helpful in getting the families to where they need to be."

The 178th is now moving onto a different challenge.

"Guantanamo Bay is a different place than Fort Benning," said Spc. John Bailey. "Our job now becomes not keeping people out of the gates, but keeping them inside the gates."

The duty of guarding al Qaeda prisoners will not come easy for the MPs.

"It will be a different experience down in Cuba," said Sgt. Kevin Neal, team leader. "We're going down there not really knowing what to expect."

Once the MPs get to Cuba, they will go through more training on how to deal with the prisoners.

"We will learn proper methods to handle the prisoners and learn about their religion," Bailey said.

"The main thing we're going to do is to accomplish our mission, which is to fight terrorism," Neal said.
