"It's all about teamwork. No one, not even the infantry, can go it alone," said Nett, who has remained active on Fort Benning since his retirement in 1973. "Artillery gives support 24 hours a day. The Air Force comes in and puts scrap iron on 'em. The medics stop you from bleeding so you can go out and fight again. You see how it's all about teamwork?"

Thus Nett explained his continued interest in the doings of the 305th Infantry Regiment, the unit he was assigned to in 1944, when as the E Company commander, he fought in Guam and Okinawa and received the Medal of Honor. The 305th is now a training unit, with headquarters in Camp Shelby, Miss., and nearly 40 Soldiers from its 1st Battalion are tasked to train mobilized reservists and guardsmen at Fort Benning.

The mission may have changed, but the end goal remains the same, Nett said.

> "To see what the Soldiers before us sacrificed ... it drives home the point he wanted to make. It's all about the training."
> Sgt. 1st Class William Simmons
> 305th Infantry Regiment personnel NCO

"You can only react in combat the way you've been trained," he said.

"Training is the most important part. Train and train and train — it's the key to winning any war."

Nett, for whom Fort Benning's Nett Hall is named, is the honorary colonel of the 305th. He's travelled once or twice to Camp Shelby to speak to Soldiers. This time, Feb. 16, they came to him.

Nett hosted a class for 305th cadre, giving them a run-down of the unit's history and expounding on the importance of good and thorough training.

"I think he said it 300 times," said Sgt. 1st Class William Simons, the battalion's personnel NCO. "He made it clear, with 40 percent of the Soldiers in Iraq guardsman and reservists, what we're doing here is really important."

And "what they're doing here," said Lt. Col. William Wolfarth, 1st Bn. commander, is providing mobilization assistance by "coaching, teaching and mentoring," particularly in the areas of urban and convoy training.

Reservists and National Guardsmen who are activated, with Fort Benning as their mobilization point, are typically here less than a month. They're trained in the areas of weapons, common tasks and training, land navigation, check-point operations, urban and convoy operations.

The 305th "specializes" in the last two, Wolfarth said. He invited Nett to observe a convoy situational training exercise.

"It was excellent training, superb," Nett said. "I liked what I saw, but it must be repeated. Our training must be proficient to the point that nothing's left undone."

And the Soldiers of the 305th liked what they saw — and heard — Feb. 16 at Nett Hall, when their honorary commander lauded the merits of training and showed historical film footage of the unit's evolution, including interviews with World War II Soldiers.

"It put all (our training) into perspective," Simons said. "To see what the Soldiers before us sacrificed ... it drives home the point he wanted to make. It's all about the training."

Post emphasizes training to prevent terrorism

Attendees gather terror information

More than 40 Soldiers and Department of Defense civilians from the Southeast United States completed the Unit Antiterrorism Advisor Course March 5 at Infantry Hall.

The course trained students on the roles and responsibilities of a unit antiterrorism advisor.

"The training is very important for Fort Benning," said Col. Rick Rierra, garrison commander. "We're fighting the global war on terrorism. However, it all starts here on Fort Benning."

Training includes identifying antiterrorism program requirements, defining terrorism, determining the threat, antiterrorism planning and resourcing, deployment considerations and anti-terrorism awareness training.

"During the course, being aware of your surroundings was stressed," said Staff Sgt. Howard Benjamin, Headquarters and Headquarters Company, 29th Infantry Regiment. "We are to use what we learned in the class and take it back to our units to teach them the same thing, so they can be just as prepared as we are."

Bob Robertson, installation antiterrorism officer, said the overall goal is to start training Soldiers on antiterrorism when they are in basic training and advanced individual training.

"This is something that needs to be looked at earlier on in a Soldier's career," Robertson said. "If we start teaching it to them from the beginning, then they will be better prepared wherever they go to after they finish their training."

Rierra said the intent is to prevent another Sept. 11 from happening.

"This training provides the additional eyes and ears that are needed to keep the awareness up," Rierra said. "Knowledge is the most important thing. The more someone knows about antiterrorism, the better prepared they will be to handle threatening situations."

Three more courses will be offered in the future. Dates for the classes are April 4 to 9 at Fort Sill, Okla.; April 18 to 23 at Fort Leonard Wood, Mo.; and July 18 to 23 at Fort Jackson, S.C.

"We want to make it clear to the unit commanders that the installation will pay for TDY costs," Robertson said. "The unit will not have to pay for anything."

Prerequisites for the course are:

- a secret clearance,
- military personnel must be staff sergeants or higher,
- civilian personnel must be in the grade of GS-05 and above or contract personnel assigned to duties at ATO.

"The idea is that this is a total team effort, and everyone needs to participate," Robertson said.

'Just doing her job' nets award for post chief

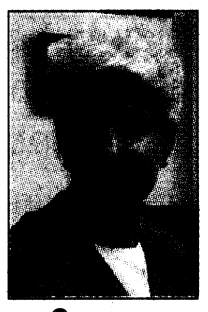
Using CDs saves Army millions in publishing costs

Melissa House
Bayonet staff

She'll tell you she was just doing her job.

But when "just doing her job" meant Lee Capraro was saving the Army millions of dollars, someone was going to take notice.

And the Army did notice. Acting Secretary of the Army Les Brownlee will present Capraro with a special plaque today recognizing her as the person who has done the best job improving an administrative-command publishing program.



Capraro, chief of the Training Management Internal Support Division in the Directorate of Operations and Training, is also no stranger to the award, having received it in 1993 and been a runner-up in 2002. The 36-year Department of the Army civilian had worked in her position on post for the past 15 years.

Capraro said it was amazing to be selected for the award.

"It's wonderful," Capraro said, "but it's not a big deal. I just thought of it first. Someone would have thought of it eventually."

What Capraro thought of was issuing the majority of manuals for resident courses taught at Fort Benning on compact discs instead of in printed form. Capraro said they still have to hand out some books, like those containing practical exercise material. The database for 28 courses worth of manuals takes up three gigabytes.

This year is the third year of compact disc issue, which Capraro said has saved the Army more than $10 million in printing costs.

Capraro

Capraro credits her award to the good group of people with good ideas who work for her. The TMISD umbrella encompasses Classroom XXI, the Training Support Center, all post Web pages, multi-media courseware, and classroom support and renovation.

"I've finally narrowed it down," Capraro said. "(TMISD) is six buildings and it takes three hours to take a tour of all of them."

The 64 TMISD employees are a hard-working group and "slackers are short-lived," she said

"I'm getting this award because of them," she said. "And I'm also getting it because my boss, Bob Jordan (the DOT deputy director), told me to run with it. He allows his people to have initiative and encourages them to run with it."

Jordan said the DOT is proud of Capraro's accomplishment and is glad to see Fort Benning represented at the DA level.

"She's reflective of the great team she leads, with the vision and foresight to make changes to training that are effective and efficient," Jordan said.

Capraro could have retired two years ago, but said she stays on the job by choice, saying she's never loved work anywhere as much as here at Fort Benning. She used to work editing in a medical center where doctors would tell her, in no uncertain terms, they didn't need her to edit anything they wrote. But she said early on in her career here, a captain came to her after she edited something and told her he was glad she was here.

Capraro said it made her day. She and her husband decided to stay in Columbus after he retired from the Army as the last chief of dentistry at the old Harmony Church clinic.

As an undergrad, Capraro studied art at the University of Maryland, then studied English literature at Columbus State University, finally getting a master's of business administration in instructional technology by studying online at the University of Phoenix.

"I went to college during the bra-burning days," she said. "I did OK in college, but I wasn't a great student. I went back to school at 44 and did much better."

The hard-charging Washington, D.C., native said she's not someone who is afraid to "rock the boat" with her ideas either. And when Capraro rocks the boat, Fort Benning and the Army benefit.

"If Edison hadn't rocked the boat, if Ford hadn't rocked the boat, where would we be?" she said

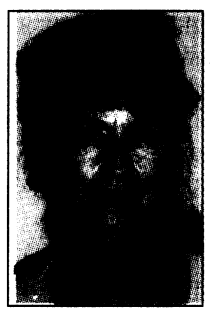
Benning whirlwind for Red Cross manager

Appreciation of military keeps worker on move

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

It's been a busy few months for Lorrie Pierre. Getting settled in at a new place and learning the ropes of a new job is no easy task.

But it's nothing new for Pierre, who's been on the road as an American Red Cross reservist for about six years. She never really knows where she'll end up or how long she'll be there.



For now, though, Pierre is making a home at Fort Benning, where she's taken over as the post's new Red Cross station manager "indefinitely."

With only two months "on the ground," Pierre has been in a non-stop whirlwind of activity since she arrived — running the station means supporting the community's volunteers, conducting orientations, relaying emergency messages and acting as a medium of communication between Soldiers and their families.

On top of all that, there are the numerous classes and events, like blood drives and open houses, to see to.

But it's a worthwhile mission, Pierre said, to "provide services to the military men and women who put their lives on the line."

The daughter of an airman and widow of a Marine, Pierre's

> "It's hard to get into something and not see it finished . . . just as you get settled into a new job . . . you're off to the far ends of the Earth."
> Lorrie Pierre

appreciation of the military is in her blood and keeps her motivated to face the challenges of hopping from place to place on a moment's notice.

"It's always a challenge, because even though the Red Cross is all one Red Cross, every station is different," she said. "Different branches, different commands, different programs — you have to get in and learn it all over again (everywhere you go)."

And just as you're getting into the swing of things, it's time to go again.

"It's hard to get into something and not see it finished," said Pierre, who has been called to destinations all over the United States. "It doesn't stop you from doing it, but just as you get settled into a new job, a new area, you're off to the far ends of the Earth."

Which is fine by Pierre, who loves to travel and enjoys being around the military. Besides, she always has a little help along the way.

"The volunteers are so wonderful — they help every way they can," she said. "They know the office and the community ... It's nice to come in and have someone to guide me and show me the ropes."

With the support of her fellow Red Cross staffers, volunteers and the post's command, Pierre has a few goals in mind while she's at Fort Benning, including recruiting more volunteers to help wherever they're needed across post, getting some new programs going and supporting the command however she can.

Enlisted Soldiers to find out future assignments via e-mail

AKO accounts key for career communications

Sgt. 1st Class Marcia Triggs
Army News Service

WASHINGTON — The Human Resources Command will use the Internet as a means to maintain up-to-date information on enlisted Soldiers to help them choose assignments and manage their careers.

In early March, HRC will begin notifying Soldiers of their next duty assignment within 90 days of their departure by e-mailing the information to their Army Knowledge Online e-mail addresses.

Other Web-based initiatives include:

• Sending e-mails that acknowledge receipt when Soldiers update their assignment preferences on Assignment Satisfaction Key, known as ASK, the Web assignment preference page.

• E-mail reminders will also be sent out to get Soldiers to update their contact information (home address and telephone number) 90 days after arriving at their new duty station. Then, Soldiers will be reminded to update their assignment preferences on ASK after being stationed stateside for 24 months, and 18 months for those overseas.

Out of 407,000 enlisted Soldiers, who have already graduated from initial entry training, 292,660 Soldiers have visited the ASK Web site so far, said HRC officials. Soldiers can be anywhere in the world and update their preferences through the Internet.

"The Army is going through a cultural change. We are giving privates career information before their chain of command finds out," said Brig. Gen. Howard Bromberg, the director of Enlisted Personnel Management Directorate, HRC. "We will continue to change our policies as necessary to support the global war on terror and a joint and expeditionary Army."

Commanders will still find out about Soldier assignments through traditional means, but the HRC-GRAM, formerly known as the PERSGRAM, that is sent to Soldiers through the mail will be phased out. Soldiers will be able to find out about assignments through e-mail notification or by calling an interactive voice response system at 1-800-FYI-EPMD.

ASK was first introduced to Soldiers two years ago. However, this will be the first time Soldiers will have access to view key personnel information that is used by assignment managers when considering a Soldier for assignment, officials said.

"It is important that Soldiers look at their personnel information to ensure it is correct. If it needs to be updated, they need to contact their local personnel office," Bromberg said.

The more accurate information career managers have on a Soldier, the higher the success rate will be in finding an assignment that's right for the Soldier and the Army, Bromberg said. But just because the Army is listening to its young Soldiers, that doesn't mean that they're going to always get what they ask for, Bromberg said. In assigning Soldiers, the focus is combat readiness.

Where Soldiers are assigned is only a piece of the Army's stabilization puzzle. The other parts include the Army's new Manning System, Force Stabilization, which consists of unit-focused stabilization and home-basing.

Home-basing will require initial-term officers and enlisted Soldiers to stay at their first duty station for an extended tour of up to six or seven years.

"These initiatives are about unit over self," Bromberg said. "We're still taking care of Soldiers and getting them the training and care they need. But we're focused on getting units stabilized so they can do the mission at hand."

An example of the needs of the Army coming before assignment preference is: a Soldier serving in Korea who was told that he could go to Fort Hood, Texas, when his tour is over, as part of the program HAAP (home base/advance assignment program). But if during the Soldier's tour, overriding

> "We will continue to change our policies as necessary to support the global war on terror and a joint and expeditionary Army."
> Brig. Gen. Howard Bromberg,
> Director of Enlisted Personnel Management Directorate, Human Resources Command

Army mission requirements determine that the Soldier is needed elsewhere, then their HAAP can be renegotiated. Enlisted personnel assignment managers work with the Soldier, but may, based on the requirements of the Army, assign the Soldier to a new location.

"We're not getting rid of the program, but people think that if we give them an advance assignment, they are guaranteed that assignment," Bromberg said. "What we're saying is that we will try to meet requirements, but we may change, based on the needs of the Army."

Every single Soldier is needed somewhere in the Army, whether it's as an instructor, drill sergeant, recruiter or in a rifle platoon in a deploying unit, Bromberg said. Every skill is important.

In the future, HRC also plans to expand its Web initiatives and get away from using Department of the Army form 4187, Personnel Action Request.

"We still get 4187s up here, signed by the company commander, and after it goes through everybody in the chain of command, it gets here with seven pieces of paper attached to it. We want to eliminate all of that," Bromberg said.

The vision is to have a Soldier volunteer for an assignment electronically. If requests can go up and back down all electronically, the process can be cut from 90 days to 14 days, Bromberg said. The technology is there — and it can be done.

Soldiers from 3rd Battalion, 11th Infantry Regiment (Officer Candidate School) invade McKenna MOUT Site with some of the Army's newest equipment.

OCS candidates take on McKenna with Strykers

Training readies troops for battle

Spc. David Foley

Some of the Army's newest Soldiers had the chance to train with some of the Army's newest equipment Feb. 25 at McKenna MOUT site.

Officer candidates from B Company, 3rd Battalion, 11th Infantry Regiment, had the rare opportunity to use two Strykers and the newest MILES 2,000 combat simulation equipment to conduct an assault on the village while Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter Schoomaker observed the mission via satellite link from Fort Wainwright, Alaska.

The training exercise was a demonstration of the capabilities of the MILES 2,000 instrumentation vests — a GPS-based tactical engagement system whieh enables commanders to see in real time what is taking place on the battlefield from anywhere in the world.

Fort Benning normally uses the GPS vests to identify the locations of Soldiers while they negotiate land navigation courses, but this sort of training really demonstrates the capabilities of the system, said Roger Webber, project director.

Capt. Sterling Sawyer, B Co. commander, said he was impressed with the system because "you can track every single person on the battlefield through the exercise control center."

"It lets you see how the battle unfolds, down to the point of who shot who," he said. "For example, we know the machine gunner (on the opposing force) took out a lot of people. With the regular MILES gear, we wouldn't have been able to do that."

The candidates, most of whom were fresh out of basic combat training, said the experience was some of the best training they've had, and getting to use the new equipment was just the icing on the cake.

Sawyer said the Soldiers had a rough time at first, but they performed well considering that 90 percent of them have been in the Army for less than 90 days.

Even though the exercise required the candidates to perform infantry tasks, the main goal was to test their leadership abilities, said Staff Sgt. Edward Clinton, OCS instructor.

"We use infantry skills because it is an easy way to assess their leadership abilities," he said.

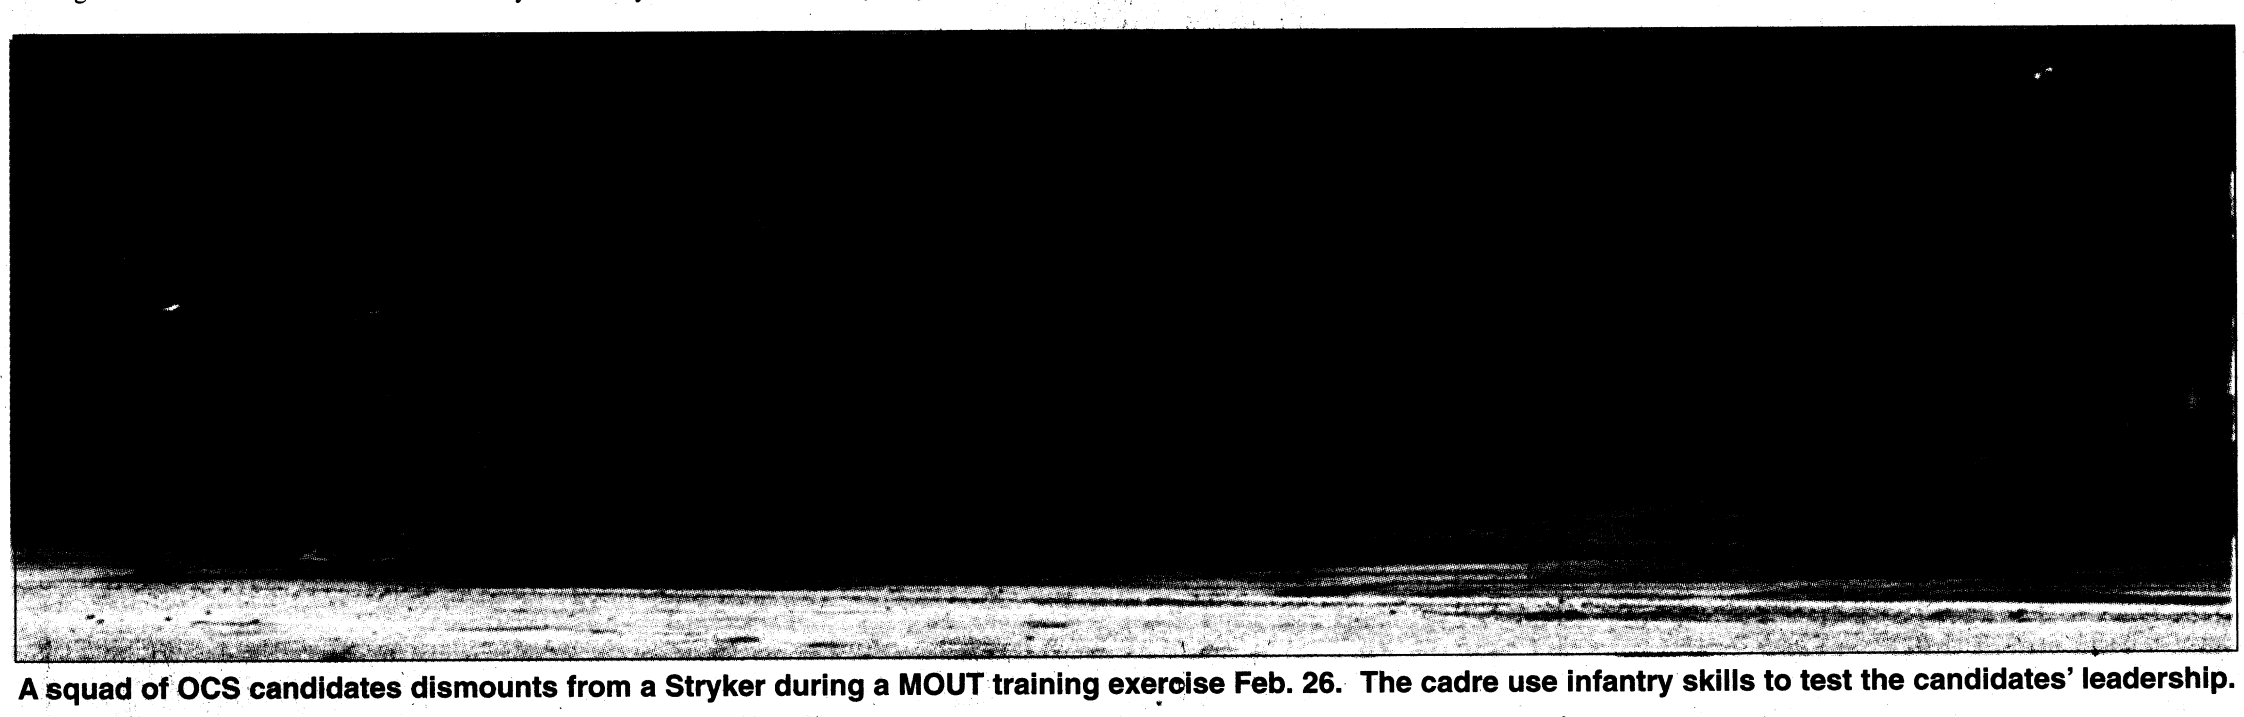
"This is really getting us ready for operations in Iraq," said Officer Candidate Cristopher Dede. "We had good intel, but plans got changed and entryways were blocked, so we had to adapt."

Sawyer said forcing the Soldiers to adapt and overcome is a major part of the training.

"When you throw the worst at them and let them solve the problems themselves, it makes them good leaders," he said. "When they get into combat, they will be able to handle it because they've already faced a lot of stress and challenges."

A Soldier moves into position during a simulated attack on Fort Benning Feb. 26 while Army Chief of Staff Peter Schoomaker observes from Fort Wainwright, Alaska, Via MILES 2000 technology.

Clinton said it was a good experience for the Soldiers even though they made a few mistakes, because it taught them a lot of valuable lessons.



"The number-one point is that everybody needs to know everybody else's job," he said as he addressed the troops after the exercise. "Another point you need to take from this is combat patience. A lot of times in combat, you can get caught up in it and that can effect the decision-making process.

"The more rehearsals you do, the better prepared you'll be for battle," Clinton said. "Because Murphy's Law will always be in effect."

"The more sweat you lose in training is directly proportionate to the lack of blood you lose on the battlefield," he said.

Officer Candidate Christopher Thomas agreed whole-heartedly with Clinton.

"It's better to die 1,000 times out here than to die once on the battlefield," he said.

WHAT TO EXPECT WHEN YOU'RE EXPECTING

Pregnant Soldiers should anticipate issues

MOM program here to help mothers

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

Maj. Julie Hudson has no intention of giving up her career. She's come too far, given too much to the Army to just walk away.

So when she discovered she was going to have a baby, she didn't face the dilemma that many pregnant Soldiers do.

"I have a lot invested in the military — what I consider a career," said Hudson, the chief of Nutrition Care at Martin Army Community Hospital. "And I would hate to give away all the benefits."

The same story applies for many women in the Army. Single or married, they just aren't ready to hang up their boots and turn in their dog tags.

Instead, they face an array of new issues. And it can all get a bit confusing, especially for young or single mothers, according to the Army Community Health Nursing Female Readiness Guide.

Every pregnant Soldier should receive counseling from her commander as soon as she discovers the pregnancy, the guide states — counseling that, "if done well, can avert misunderstandings, indecision and later problems."

The counseling should explain the Soldier's choice to separate or remain in the Army and address issues that will arise if she opts to stay in — issues like housing, assignment eligibility, family care plans, medical profiles and physical fitness.

Married Soldiers may not be affected by the housing situation, but single Soldiers are authorized housing allowance or quarters, depending on availability, once they reach the seventh month of pregnancy.

Meanwhile, where the Soldier is able to go is impacted.

"Pregnant Soldiers are generally ineligible for overseas assignments during their pregnancies," reads the guide.

Although this means they can't deploy, "Soldiers will be considered available for worldwide deployment when their newborn is 4 months old."

Toward that end, Soldiers must have a plan in place in case they are called upon to deploy after they give birth.

"Single or dual-military (mothers) must have an approved family care plan on file stating actions to be taken in the event of assignment to an area where dependents are not authorized or upon absence from the home while performing military duty," the guide states.

It's a lot to think about and keep track of, but pregnant Soldiers on Fort Benning can rest easy about staying healthy and fit during their pregnancies.

The post's pregnancy and post-partum PT program is in place not only to guide expectant and new mothers through a safe workout, but also to keep them educated.

Military on the Move, or the "MOM" PT program, is recommended for pregnant Soldiers and mandatory for post-partum Soldiers, said Capt. Mark Killebrew of Preventive Medicine, the program's manager.

When a Soldier discovers she is pregnant, she can no longer perform the same type of physical training as her fellow Soldiers. The MOM program is intended to provide her with guidance for a safe and healthy pregnancy, Killebrew said.

In addition to the PT portion of the program, pregnant Soldiers enrolled in MOM also get a weekly class on a topic related to their pregnancy, he said — issues like physical changes, nutrition and child safety.

"The product we offer is a quality product," Killebrew said of the program. "We offer variety, but also a consistency in our program — the (Soldiers) know what to expect."

Killebrew said the program is a healthy blend of calisthenics, aerobic exercise and muscle-enhancing exercises — all led by "very enthusiastic, high-speed instructors."

Although the program is not presently mandatory for pregnant Soldiers, it is highly recommended, and may become mandatory by the end of this year, Killebrew said.

"I firmly believe this program is better than what the units are doing, because it caters to pregnant women," he said.

The program also addresses the PT needs of post-partum mothers fresh off of convalescent leave.

It is mandatory for these women for anywhere from six weeks to six months, depending on their health and progress.

But by "day 181" after they give birth, Soldiers must be able to pass the APFT.

But that's generally not a problem, Killebrew said.

"If they do the program as we're laying it out for them, they should do well," he said.

Interested Soldiers can enroll in the program by bringing their pregnancy profile, the "blessing" of their health care providers and a copy of their most recent Army physical fitness test results to Community Health Services 10 a.m. Wednesdays to enroll.

For more information, call 545-4041 or 545-8032.

Pregnant Soldiers face many new issues as expectant mothers, especially young or single Soldiers. Housing, assignment eligibility, profiles, physical fitness and family care plans are just a few things these Soldiers will have to deal with.

Strategic communications leverage Army story

Spc. Lorie Jewell
Army News Service

WASHINGTON

A Soldier tucks a plastic card displaying the Soldier's Creed and the Army values into his wallet.

At a school career fair, students pick up a brochure that describes our Army at war, and how it remains relevant and ready while moving from the current to future force. An action-filled video plays on a television screen, showing the Army's new Stryker infantry carriers on the move.

A senior leader tells the Army story to an audience of executives at a corporate function; a young sergeant shares his take on force stabilization at the family dinner table.

A grandmother surfing the Web clicks on the Army's Web site to learn more about her granddaughter's new duty station.

From small, ordinary gestures and everyday conversations to eye-catching promotional materials and tactical speeches, strategic communications is the method by which the Army delivers its messages to those in and out of uniform. It's one of 16 focus areas Army leaders have developed as a means for strengthening efforts to win the Global War on Terrorism.

"It's about communicating to our audience what's going on in the Army, and explaining it in terms or concepts people can understand, so that they can be a part of achieving the goal," said Col. Nelson McCouch, who heads the strategic communications division in Office of the Chief of Public Affairs. "They can't support something if they don't know anything about it."

For example, a Soldier may hear the term "force stabilization" and, having read about it in a post newspaper, may understand it in more simple terms as "my family and I will stay in one place for longer periods of time."

"Expeditionary mindset" could translate into "I'm ready to go anywhere you need me to go, at any time, because I know I am well trained and my family is well-taken care of."

The role of OCPA's strategic communications is to develop and implement plans for getting internal and external media to support the Army's campaign plan with articles that explain what's going on, McCouch said.

There are two other 'legs' that support the effort to disseminate information — the Office of Congressional Legislative Liaison and the Office of Strategic Communications. OCLL's strategic communications team is responsible for making sure the Army's messages are delivered to legislators on the hill in a timely fashion, said Col. Wayne Sauer, who heads that office.

"The Army wants Congress to know what's going on so they can do something about it during the congressional cycle," Sauer said.

That involves working closely with congressional staffers. If legislators have questions on the Army budget, for example, OCLL makes sure they get answers. When newsworthy events happen — the Army's Comanche program being canceled, for instance — OCLL makes sure Congress knows about it before reading it in the newspaper, Sauer said.

"If they read something in the newspaper and the information doesn't match up, they already have our data on it," he said.

In the Office of Strategic Communications, the mission to deliver the Army story is similar to OCPA. Whereas OCPA focuses informing Soldiers, family members and the public at large through the media, STRATCOM's audience is expanded to target senior Army leaders — active and retired — business and social executives, and academic and think-tank representatives.

"We are trying to instill a culture of engagement so that everyone at all levels tells the Army story the same way," said Patti Benner, STRATCOM director.

Benner's department works to develop long-term themes and messages, and how to deliver them over time periods that range from months to five years. OCPA focuses more on getting information out according to daily and weekly news cycles, McCouch said.

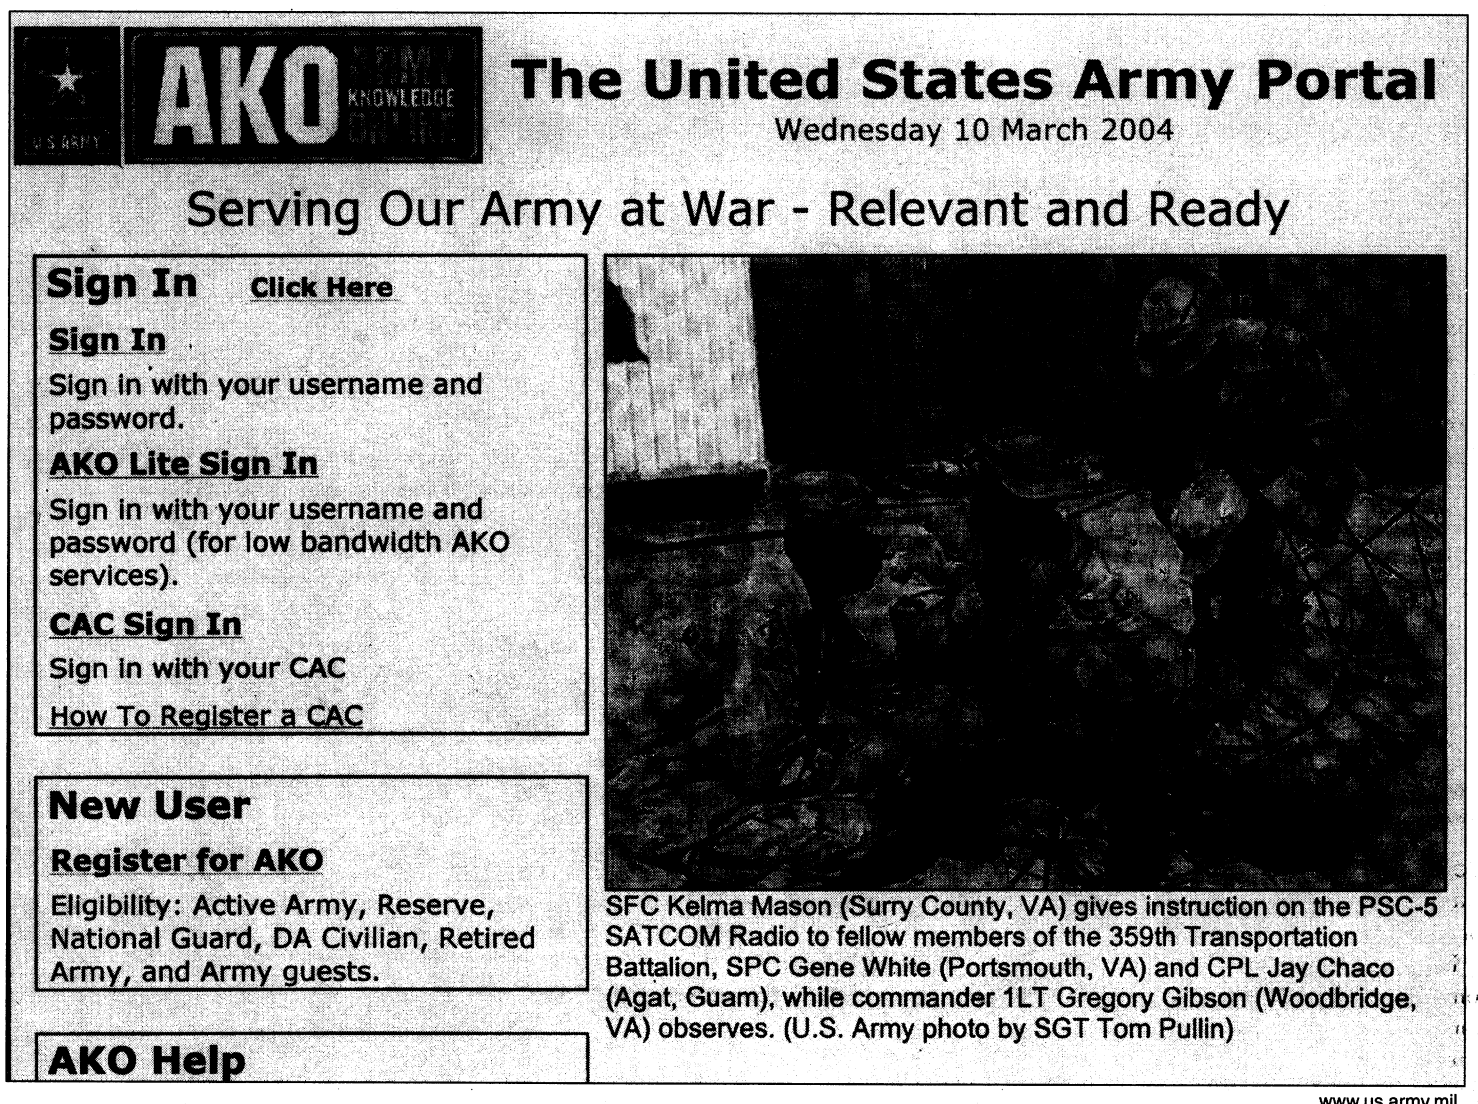
How messages are delivered by OSC falls to its outreach program, headed by Kay Stephenson. The program is tasked with building and strengthening relationships with national security decision makers or those with influence; the private sector and not-for-profit organizations; and academic institutions and communities. Its mission also involves providing information to the Army family.

Anyone who gets the Army message, understands it, supports it and passes it along, Benner and Stephenson said.

The Internet proves to be a reliable tool for giving Soldiers, their families and friends, and the general public anything they could possibly want or need to know about the Army, where it's heading and how it plans on getting there, said Lt. Col. Mark Wiggins, director of the Army's Web page (www.army.mil) and senior leaders' page, accessible to select personnel through Army Knowledge Online. The Web site operates under the STRATCOM umbrella.

"Whatever has been released to the public, it's on the Web site," Wiggins said. "It's the place all of our audiences come to read about the Army."

Careful thought goes into how all of that information is presented. This is a nation at war, so the main stories and photos will reflect that, Wiggins said.



The lead photo will have a Soldier in it. Every effort is made to portray the joint effort of the war. There are links to each of the other service branches on the home page of the Web site.

The Army has had a presence on the Internet since 1995. The site was last overhauled in 2001, around the same time the "Army of One" brand was introduced. It averages just over 4 million hits a month from more than 140 countries, he said.

"We pay close attention to third-party evaluations and we are routinely ranked in the top 1,000 Web sites in the world," Wiggins said. "When you have a global audience, you can't help but be strategic."

The ultimate success of strategic communications relies on all three departments working together to synchronize their efforts, officials said.

"The good news story in all of this is that with strategic communications, we have the methodology and plans to communicate to Army leaders, the Hill and the public what their Army is doing for America," Sauer said. "And that we're doing it in a very succinct and timely fashion."

Soldiers: To move to family housing

up the 80-year-old quartels for some much needed renovations — they'll likely be used afterward to house students from the Airborne School and the Officers' Candidate School — and it will raise the occupancy rate in family housing to a percentage that will reflect a real need for more houses when RCI gets underway in two years.

Fort Benning's nearly 4,000 housing units, suffering from age and neglect, are being rejected by Soldiers with families at an unprecedented rate, officials say. About a third of them stood empty until the single Soldiers began moving in.

The problem, Hankins said, began about four years ago, when the Soldiers' Basic Allowance for Housing was increased more than $200, making it much easier for young enlisted Soldiers to afford off-post housing.

The declining occupancy rate could have a negative impact when RCI officials gauge the need for housing on Fort Benning.

But all that means little to Pfc. Hollie Hamstra, who'll be sharing her Indianhead Terrace home with a former neighbor from the barracks. Hamstra's excited about the extra living space.

"I'll have a kitchen. I'll actually be able to wash dishes. I'll have more space. There's no down side," Hamstra said.

Hankins said there are potential "down sides," but he expects the families and Soldiers to adapt.

"The noise level, of course, that's a concern. These are Soldiers who are used to living with other Soldiers," he said. "But I don't think it'll be a real problem, at least not for long."

The Soldiers will be expected to abide by the same rules as other residents.

Community Life NCOs will instruct them on their responsibilities, such as lawn maintenance, guidelines for parking and such.

For now, the houses will be partially furnished with beds and sofas from the barracks, but more furniture is on order.

Soldiers will be housed in twos and threes, with the master bedroom designated as an "entertainment room," Hankins said.

The senior Soldier will be responsible for oversight, and the unit will be responsible for selecting roommates and correcting discipline problems.

Hankins said the change in policy will not affect the number of houses available for families arriving on post, though no one can say just yet how many houses will be occupied by single Soldiers. Nearly 40 were turned over this week.

"And that's just a start. We think, in the long run, it's a good move for everyone," he said. "It'll certainly be good for morale."

Brigade: Assumes DRB status

conditions in Iraq, for better or for worse.

Because the brigade's command has only received a warning order, they don't have many specifics right now, including where the unit will deploy and what its mission will be, he said.

Regardless of when or where the brigade deploys, it will come as no surprise.

"Since our return from Operation Iraqi Freedom in July of 2003, we have predicted that the Marne Division would ultimately be asked to take its turn back on the front line of freedom in the global war on terrorism," said Col. Steven Salazar, brigade commander, in a Feb. 25 letter to 3rd Brigade Soldiers and family members.

"No one wants to be apart from their loved ones, nor leave their homes or even barracks," he said. "But all are professional Soldiers who have sworn to support and defend our nation."

But the deployment will be about more than Soldiers fulfilling their duties.

"The stakes in this war are high," Salazar said. "At risk is the freedom of 25 million Iraqi people, peace in the region and the security of our nation. Also at stake is the meaning of the sacrifice made by the Soldiers of this brigade combat team who did not return with us and the more than 500 Soldiers and their families who have sacrificed since."

With that in mind, Soldiers will focus on training and preparing for combat in the coming months.

"The brigade will enter into a period of individual training ... and prepare for a mission-ready exercise at the Joint Readiness Training Center (in Fort Polk, La.) in August," Kessler said.

The unit is slated to deploy to JRTC from Aug. 4 to 29, according to Salazar's letter.

Meanwhile, in the midst of all the training and deployment preparation, the brigade will continue to transform as part of the division's reorganization.

Thus far, a tank company from 2nd Battalion, 69th Armor Regiment, has been exchanged for a mechanized infantry company from 1st Bn., 15th Infantry Regt., to create Task Force 2-69 and Task Force 1-15.

The brigade is still uncertain about other changes relating to the reorganization, including what will happen in the 1st Bn., 10th Field Artillery Regt., 317th Engineer Bn. and the 203rd Forward Support Bn.

"Our mission is still to reorganize the division and be prepared to respond to any crisis anywhere in the world when we are called to do so," said Maj. Gen. William Webster in a message to Marne Soldiers. "We remain the 'Army's go-to team.'" program is well-established and on its feet, said the team's NCOIC, Staff Sgt. Tim Santellanes, known as "Sergeant Saint."

Wings: Back in action at Benning

The seven current members of the demonstration team are all Airborne School instructors assigned to 1st Battalion (Airborne), 507th Infantry Regiment.

Participation on the team is voluntary, but applicants must meet strict prerequisites, Santellanes said.

Absolute discipline and expert proficiency are necessary when landing on a target with a one-foot, dead center that must be hit standing up — all while waving to the crowd after taking consideration of any obstacles, like trees, wires, buildings, and crowds, Santellanes said. To even be considered for the team, a candidate must have, at the very least, a U.S. Parachuting Association A license, the 14-year sky-diving veteran said.

Other prerequisites include a minumum weight of 145 pounds with equipment, no UCMJ actions, Blackhat certification and the rank of sergeant through sergeant first class, though that is waiverable, Santellanes said.

Safety has to be the biggest focus when Soldiers are performing at heights of 3,000 to 10,000 feet and are landing amidst crowds, and Santellanes said he demands absolute professionalism and discipline from his team to ensure strict safety guidelines are adhered to.

Training and experience are key to the safe and effective execution of the team's mission, Santellanes stressed.

And experience is something the team is definitely not short on right now.

The Fort Benning Command Exhibition Parachute Team, or the Silver Wings, will take to the skies again April 15 after a nearly four-year hiatus.

Three of the four members who will be performing April 15 are professionally certified by the U.S. Parachuting Association and have more than 4,000 jumps between them. But there is no such thing as too much practice, right?

On top of their duties as instructors to thousands of Airborne School students, the team members spend Saturdays training on the drop zone as a team. Each Saturday, the team will perform up to five jumps in the winter and up to 10 jumps in the summer, if funding permits, to master their demonstrations and constantly reinforce their focus on precision and safety, Santellanes said.

The team's professionalism and military bearing are also critical to the team's primary role as representatives of the post, the infantry and the Army, he said.

The team hopes to positively influence the public's perception of the Army and the post, he said, and will be a valuable asset to the Army's recruiting efforts in the area.

The idea is to put an impressive picture of what a Soldier is in the minds of young men and women through demonstrations of discipline, professionalism, courage and precise expertise, he said.

The biggest satisfaction Santellanes said he gets from this mission isn't the thrill of free falling through thousands of feet of open sky, but the amazed looks he gets from the young people in the crowd. He said there is no greater reward than shaking the hand of a kid who decides he wants to be a Soldier one day because seeing the team in action inspired him so much.

Santellanes said he is "fired up" about the opportunity to be a part of the team's rebirth and looks forward to leading a team that will serve as an ambassador for the 507th Infantry Regt., the U.S. Army Infantry Center, Fort Benning and the Army.

498th: Heads back to Iraq for OIF

from Iraq in November with his unit in Germany. They just arrived at Fort Benning in January.

Despite the unwelcome separation, Yasmin said there are some advantages of this unit's deployment over his previous.

"His last deployment, we weren't married, so there wasn't any information. I only knew what I heard from (word of mouth)," she said.

Adding to the confusion and anxiety, Samuel wasn't able to call home very often on his last deployment, Yasmin said.

"I didn't hear from him for three months," she said. "This time, there will be more information, and he'll be able to call more often."

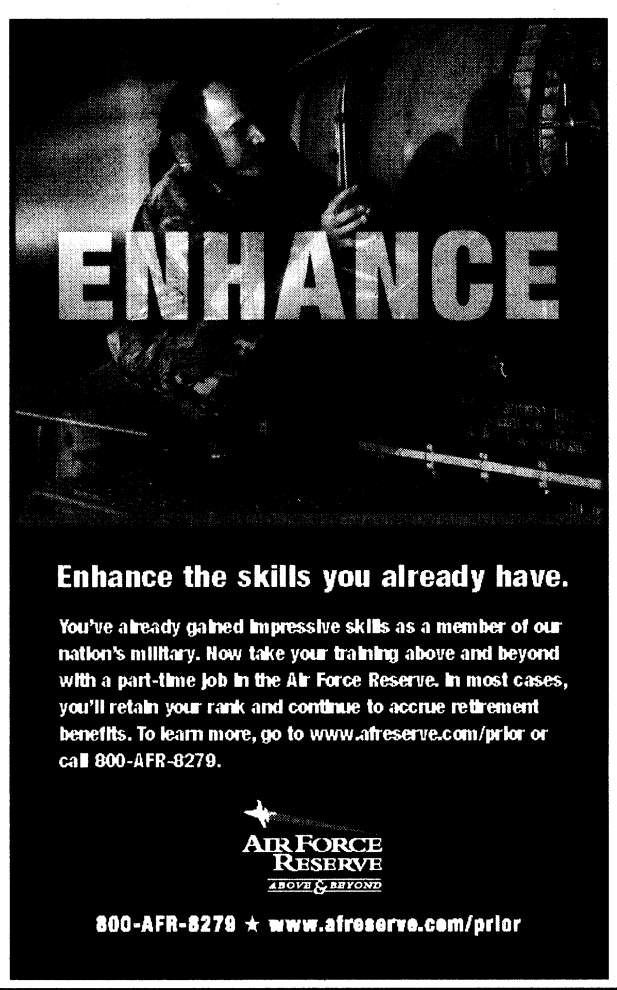
This time, Yasmin will have the support of the unit's family readiness group.

For Cathy Vanbenthuysen, seeing her husband, Staff Sgt. Russell Vanbenthuysen, off for a deployment is nothing new — he's been gone five of the couple's 11 years together.

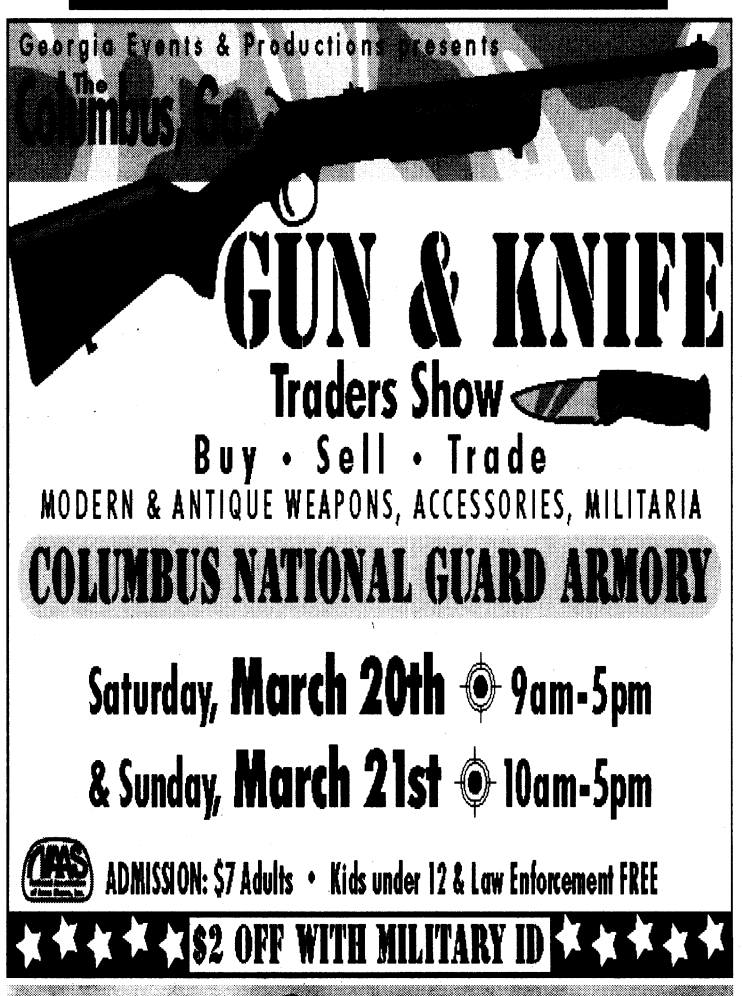
This time, though, the deployment will interrupt Russell's retirement plans. But the family is keeping a stiff upper lip.

"At least this time we know where they're going and how long they'll be gone," Cathy said. "And there will be better communication — when they were gone before, we would hear from him really sporadically."

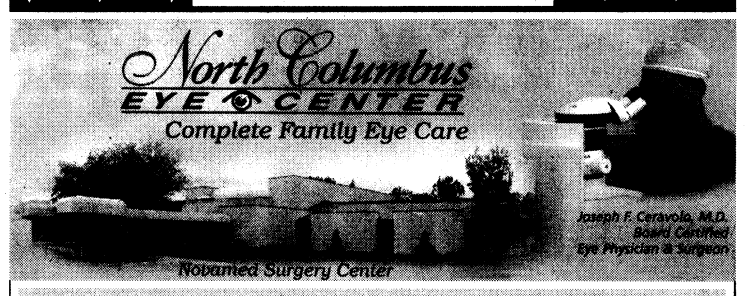
This time, the family also had several months notice, Cathy said, allowing them to take care of the necessities — "shopping for all the batteries and baby wipes we can find and eating out at every restaurant in town."



The Soldiers have also been preparing with plenty of training — marksmanship ranges, convoy operations and equipment maintenance, Dixon said.



And with their OIF deployment experience, the unit has plenty of lessons learned to take with them, including an improved list of necessary equipment, Dixon said.



With everything in place, the Soldiers of the 498th said good-bye to their families and boarded the planes at Lawson Army Air Field.

Despite the hardship, the Soldiers are ready to perform their mission, Dixon said.

"We've been back (nine) months and now we're on our way again," Dixon said. "It's hard leaving our families again, and it's not always pretty, but that's the profession we're in."

How to keep from going nuts when the power gets squirrelly

On Fort Benning's Main Post, there are three things as certain as the sunrise — falling tree limbs, pesky squirrels and frequent power outages, the latter often the direct result of the first two.

No doubt, the tree problem will eventually take care of itself, as one by one, the post's aging oaks give up the fight. And if we're lucky, along the way, they might curb the squirrel problem with a few well-placed limbs.

But the problem with recurring power outages, well, that's another story. The folks at Flint Energies, the company contracted to maintain Fort Benning's electrical system, say the frequency of outages will continue to decline as they update the post's antiquated infrastructure.

Squirrels, however — the nasty little varmints who chew up wires and short circuit the systems that bring you lights and heat and reality TV — those we'll have to deal with for a while. According to the Edison Electric Institute, animals are the second leading cause of power outages nationwide, after weather.

So, like good Boy Scouts on an overnight campout, it pays to be prepared, not scared, of the dark.

Candles are great for ambiance, but flashlights are much more convenient and safer. It's a good idea to keep one in every room, along with a supply of fresh batteries.

But flashlights, like remote controls, tend to hide in the most inconvenient spots. Here's a helpful hint: Turn out the lights after dark and do a "blind" survey of each room. Where should you stow a flashlight? Someplace you can reach without tripping or stubbing a toe. Under a couch cushion where it could keep company with the remote? Beside the telephone? Inside the medicine cabinet?

It's a good idea to keep a handy supply of candles also, the large pillar candles that won't tip. Once you get the kids used to the idea they'll never see the results of tonight's Extreme Makeover, dust off your favorite Laura Ingalls Wilder book and sit a spell with Ma and Pa by candlelight.

When tummies start rumbling, head for the pantry, not the fridge (and definitely not the Commissary, where cashiers quickly check shoppers out and close up shop during an outage). As long as you resist the urge to peek, the food in the fridge will stay safe for several hours. Don't take a chance on foods like eggs and milk. Bacteria can multiply rapidly on perishable foods that have been between 40 and 140 degrees farenheit for longer than two hours. When in doubt, throw it out. (The USDA can answer your questions about food safety. Call their hotline at 301-504-6258.)

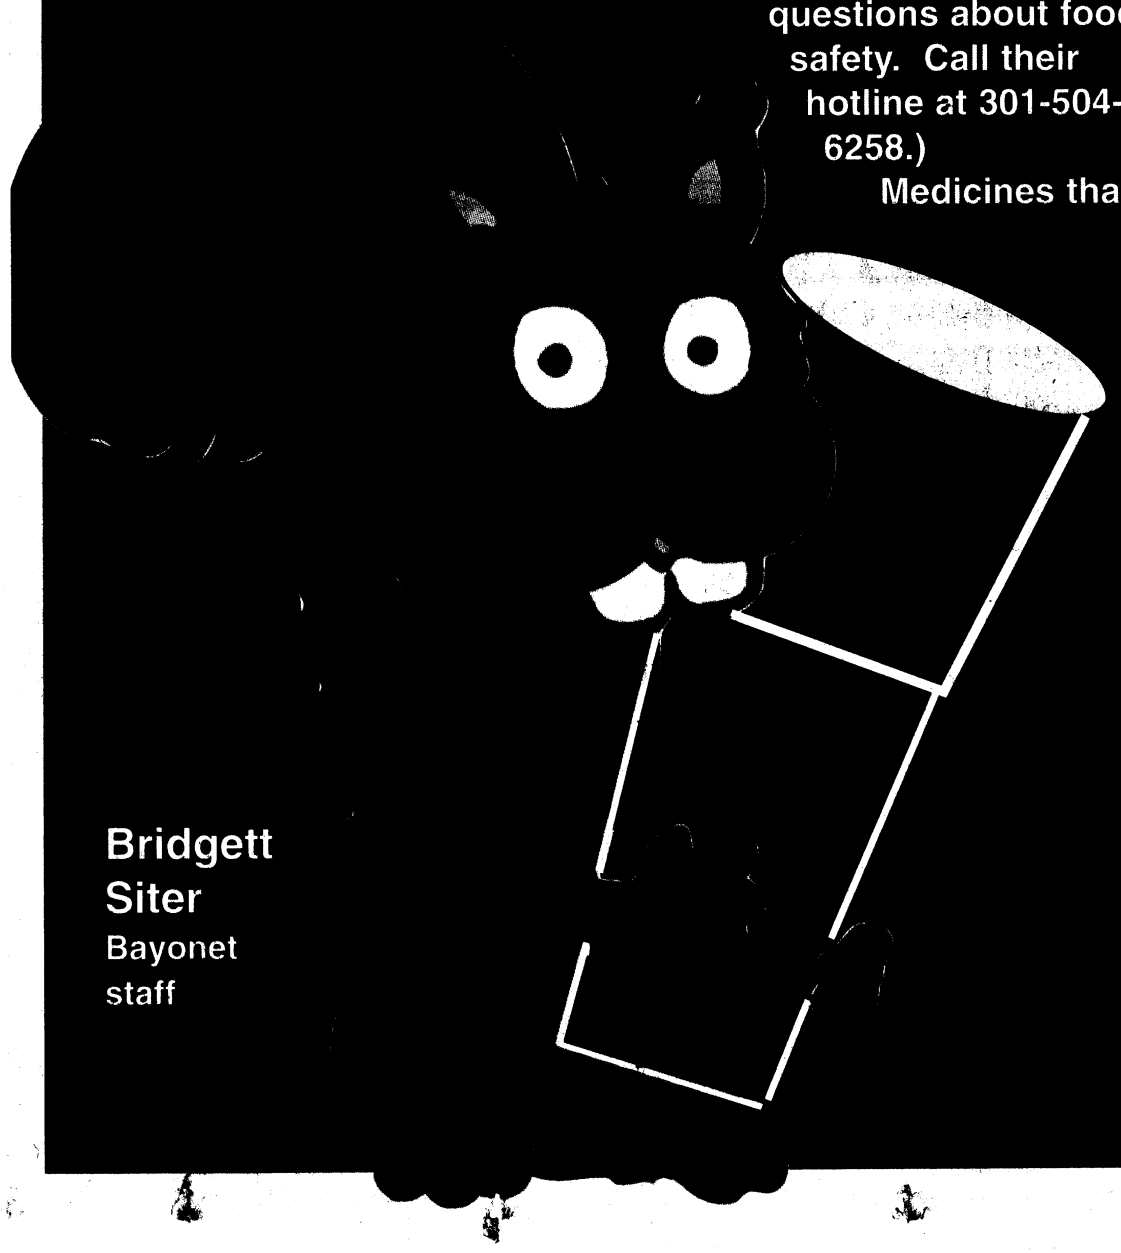
Medicines that require refrigeration will be safe for several hours. If the outage continues, transfer it to the freezer or pack it in ice. When in doubt, don't throw it out. Call your doctor.

The freezer on top of your fridge will keep food safe for about 24 hours. Food in the deep freeze can last twice as long. It's usually safe to refreeze foods that still contain ice crystals, but they may lose quality.

If you typically keep your deep freeze stocked with steak, here's good news: a tightly-packed freezer keeps food frozen much longer than one that's, say, half full. The bad news — if your freezer full off beef sits powerless for more than 48 hours, you might as well chuck it.

Fort Benning's power outages are rarely long enough to require alternative methods of heating, cooling or cooking. Pile on the blankets if need be, but don't leave the candles or the fireplace burning while you sleep.

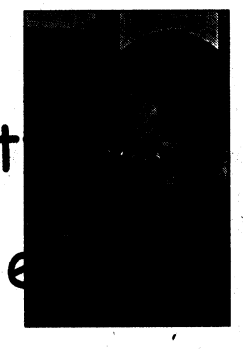
If your electronics aren't equipped with surge protectors, it's a good idea to unplug them until after the power has been restored.



Keep at least one good old-fashion "corded" telephone, sans caller ID and recorder mechanisms that require electricity. Your *cord*less will be *use*less.

It's safe to assume, if every light on the block is out, someone's already alerted the contracter. But then, everybody else is assuming the same, so go ahead and make the call. During regular work hours, call 545-2135. After hours, call 545-4445.

Then sit back and relax. Don't get nuts. Make the most of it.



Now's a good time to tell ghost stories to your older children or sing campfire songs with the younger ones. Dig out the board games or brush up on your flashlight-hand-puppet skills.

A power outage is a great time to forget about the housework and the homework and reconnect with the kids. Go ahead, go out on a limb, be a little silly, have a little fun. They'll forgive you when the lights come on. Everybody gets a little squirrelly when the power goes out.

Get Outta Here

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

Sick of sitting around in that barracks room looking at the walls? Need to get the family out of the house or just take a break? We've got the answer for you. Kim Dooley at 545-3367.*

Once upon a time, I, too believed there were no coffee shops in Columbus.

Sure, there's a Starbucks at Barnes and Noble and a Joe Muggs at Books-a-Million. But as a native Northwesterner, I'm used to your mom and pop variety of coffee shop on practically every street corner, and that's what I like. The personality of a little shop all its own.

But wouldn't you know it, after months of whining about the lack of java huts in town, I found a few places with just that feel — if you're willing to be a little flexible.

My absolute favorite is the Fountain City Coffee Shop on Broadway. Now, I could be biased — it's within walking distance of my house, offers free Internet use with a purchase of $3 or more and serves up my cherished Milky Way espresso with whipped cream just the way I like it.

But more than that, it's a place you actually want to hang out after you get your coffee. A pleasant, you-don't-have-to-whisper-but-you-can-still-hear-yourself-think atmosphere. Complete with a selection of books and magazines, games and a set of comfy sofas and chairs, it's a cornucopia of creature comforts.

Not to mention the outdoor tables that are looking more and more attractive as the weather warms up.

Another recent discovery was Perk Avenue, across from Columbus Park Crossing on Veterans Parkway.

With more of an underground feel, Perk Avenue at first appears to cater to the "alternative" crowd. But I think anyone would feel comfortable there.

It's a neat place to just look around with its ecclectic mix of decorations — including rehashed furniture and cow-print chairs. And my favorite feature is the card container on every table. Whether you luck out and get the Trivial Pursuit cards (good luck!) or the UNO cards or happen upon a table with everyday playing cards, it's a bit of fun flavor to spice up your visit.

Perk Avenue also has a big T.V. (Animal Planet was on the big screen when I visited), so you have a little added entertainment.

And best of all, this coffee shop leads a double life — it's an ice cream shop, too. Something to keep in mind as the summer months creep up.

The last place I found is the Columbus Coffee Company off Bradley Park Drive. This may just become the summer hot spot for my weekends.

Although it's a longer drive and has more of a Starbuck's quality to it, Columbus Coffee Company also has a big outdoor patio area with tables. It's not a great view, but a cool breeze on a summer evening or early in the morning — can't beat that.

And this coffee shop is conveniently located near the Hollywood Connection. What better way to kill an hour before your movie starts or wind up that first date than sipping on a latte just down the road?

And if you're one for mainstream coffee houses but can do without the bookstore, this place has your name all over it.

So next time you're bored sitting around your house, grab a friend or a good book, head out to one of your local coffee shops and sit a while. Enjoy the atmosphere, the weather, the company — whatever's clever.

Post Commissary awarded best superstore

Merchandising award will be presented

Spc. Ellamar Castanon
Bayonet staff

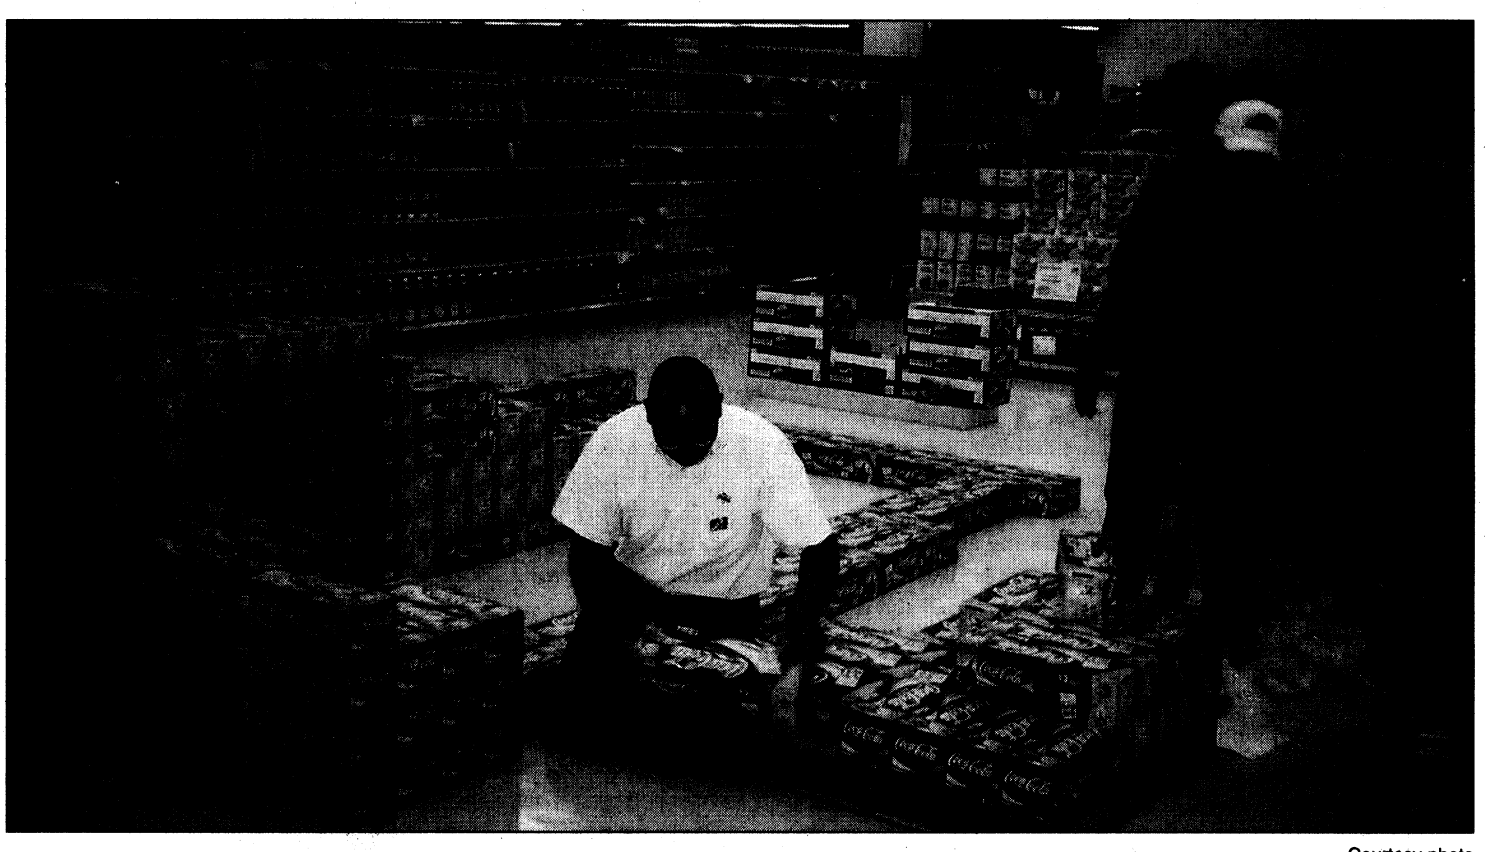
The Fort Benning Commissary takes great pride in taking care of Soldiers and family members every day by providing a friendly environment.

The theme for the ninth annual merchandising contest held by the Defense Commissary Agency was Community involvement and the Fort Benning Commissary won in the U.S. Superstore category out of 30 other Superstores in the states.

The month-long contest which took place last May coincided with Commissary Awareness Month.

In choosing the winners, judges considered attractiveness and creativity of product displays and outreach activities such as magic shows and carnivals.

"As we began the DeCA ninth annual merchandising contest last year, the theme of community awareness was an on time concept," said Gary Hensley, Commissary manager. "Since many of our Soldiers were deployed, the importance of DeCA commissaries as a support agency for our families was brought to a top of mind awareness."



The Commissary took the time to invite many key organizations to visit the commissary and to let the community know all the benefits and services available.

Hensley said the chaplain's office provided free care packages for dependents of deployed Soldiers. Other post organizations that visited the commissary were Army Community Service and the Public Safety Office. The nutritional staff from Martin Army Community Hospital was on hand to provide counseling to the patrons.

The Commissary staff provided tours for schools like Stowers Elementary, for single Soldiers and the post new commers briefing.

The Commissary also hosted it's first ever baby shower for expectant mothers, a pet show and a Cinco de Mayo celebration for all Commissary shoppers..

"We have a lot of fun working here every day and we try to make it fun for our shoppers as well as for our employees," Hensley said.

Shawn Brazil and Eddie Cotton, Coca-Cola Company representatives, built a humvee using 900 12-packs of soda last year at the Fort Benning Commissary.

"This Commissary is open for business 91 hours a week, that's the longest any Commissary is open in DeCA," Hensley said.

"All the employees work a lot more hours than what they are paid for, they take pride in their work and are very dedicated," he said.

Vendors and employees help create attractive displays throughout the year that helped the commissary during last years competition.

The Coca-Cola company vendors built a tank with 1,500 12-packs and a humvee using 900 12-packs, Hensley said.

Various vendors, including Kraft and Coca-Cola sponsor the events the commissary had for the community. The USO also participated in some of the bar-be-cues and tours by providing snacks for the guests.

"Our vendors love the Soldiers and are very helpful in all of our events," Hensley said.

"Everybody works together all year long to make sure the Commissary looks good for Soldiers because they work hard for us," he said.

The awards for the ninth annual merchandising competition will be presented May 4 in Anaheim, Calif.

The commissary will also receive $1,000, which they will use to offer a nice Christmas party for its more than 200 employees.

Local agencies provide job training opportunities

Goodwill, Cols. Tech. partnership good for post

Melissa House
Bayonet staff

Need a job? Want to get training to help get that job? Goodwill Industries may have what you're looking for.

Goodwill works closely with post agencies, placing graduates of their training programs in jobs with AAFES and in Fort Benning Non-Appropriated Fund positions.

This semester, a number of military spouses are taking a course at Columbus Technical College that is offered in partnership with Goodwill. It's for Hospitality Industry Associates — an eight-week program running Monday through Friday at Columbus Tech. The course, limited to 20 students, meets only four hours daily.

Tuition is paid using HOPE scholarship funds, available to spouses whose Soldier is assigned to Fort Benning and who reside in Georgia.

"This is an educational opportunity for folks who might not have had that opportunity otherwise," said Maura Keenan-Gondek, Goodwill grants and programs manager. "If we can reach those folks without education, we can help them. There are a lot of jobs out there."

All course work is done at the CTC campus followed by a 30 hour internship over three weeks that may turn into permanent employment, Gondek said. The hospitality industry is one of the fastest-growing industries in Columbus.

Loucious Hires, manager of Columbus Tech's Innovative Work Solutions and Hospitality Associate programs, said the industry is a good fit for military spouses.

"There's lateral movement and also upward movement," he said. "It's not a dead-end career field."

Fort Benning spouse Kary Clark is taking the hospitality course while her husband attends the Infantry Officer Basic Course. Once he graduates, the family is off to Fort Bragg, a place Clark said has great potential employment for her.

"We'll be around championship golf courses and hotels," said Clark, who believes the hospitality industry is a good area for her, since she's fluent in English and Spanish.

Clark learned about the course while participating in Even Start, a family literacy program that offers parenting, English as a Second Language, and General Education Diploma classes. Her children are enrolled in Even Start child care while she is attending CTC.

The Hospitality Program curriculum is as varied as the industry. Students spend 22 hours at the beginning of the course in a block called Personal Effectiveness, which covers everything from a positive attitude to stress management. Thirty-two hours are devoted to the hospitality industry environment, teamwork and good work ethics. Instructor Lucille Ferrell said the initial course work is part psychology, part attitude and values.

> "ACOE, customer service, it all ties into a quality of life assessment. And Fort Benning has some great training opportunities sitting at its back door."
> Loucious Hires
> Manager, Columbus Tech's Innovative Work Solutions and Hospitality Associate programs

"But it's all interesting," Ferrell said. "We draw out even the shyest people through role-playing."

Student Christinia Franklin said the students were learning about themselves, and by doing that, they learn about others as well.

"It's effective," Franklin said. "We're learning that everyone is important, and we can convey messages with our words and our body language. When you come in, you're one person, you leave another."

Keenan-Gondek said anyone working behind a desk needs to take the hospitality class.

"It's all about better customer service," she said. She and the students said they find themselves critiquing other people's customer service when they visit businesses or restaurants.

Instruction on customer service covers food and beverage service, guestroom attendant, waitperson and sales. Eight hours are dedicated to handling difficult customers.

"With the strong emphasis on customer service," Keenan-Gondek said, "no matter what the environment, the students will have a strong foundation." She said Goodwill would like to try to do more with Fort Benning.

"We can teach you the skills you need to get a job and keep it." She said Goodwill has a lot to offer Soldiers and spouses in the way of certification programs.

Hires said the courses prepare the students for work immediately by training them to be successful. As a retired Soldier, Hires said he wished he had known about what Columbus Tech had to offer as he was going through the Army Career and Alumni Program.

He also wished someone had told him about Goodwill. He said the programs are good for someone who wants to stay in the Columbus area. Soldiers wouldn't have to pay for the courses; they just to have to make time to attend.

CTC offers a variety of computer courses, and many of them do not take a full semester to complete.

"Why not take a course so you can learn to put together a PowerPoint presentation several hours faster," Hires said. For units who might like some training, Hires said the college has portable labs. "You don't have to come to us, we can come to you."

Hires said other courses in the college's Service Industry Academy, like Customer Interaction Skills and Telephone Service Skills, could be good for agencies on Fort Benning. The recent Army Family Action Program Symposium identified the quality of customer service on post as one of its concerns.

Hires mentioned the Army Community of Excellence award that posts compete for every year.

"ACOE, customer service, it all ties into a quality of life assessment," he said. "And Fort Benning has some great training opportunities sitting at its back door."

Stowers' students get literal ... literally

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

Naidaniel Nelper may be a quiet little boy, but he has plenty to say.

The Stowers Elementary School student has written and illustrated about 30 books this school year, with more in the works.

Nelper labored away on his latest masterpiece Tuesday morning, a book about playing basketball with his father.

This is a daily ritual in Jackie Mumpower's first-grade class, where her students participate in a reading and writing workshop for about an hour every morning — a "free choice" time to work on creative writing and reading fluency.

"This is a risk-free environment," she said. "The students know that I want to know what they have to say rather than wanting their work to be perfect."

The workshop gives the children a chance to express themselves freely and exercise their budding language arts skills, and it gives Mumpower the chance to work one-on-one with the students.

"I get to work individually with each student this way," she said. "And their work (in this workshop) is based on their needs."

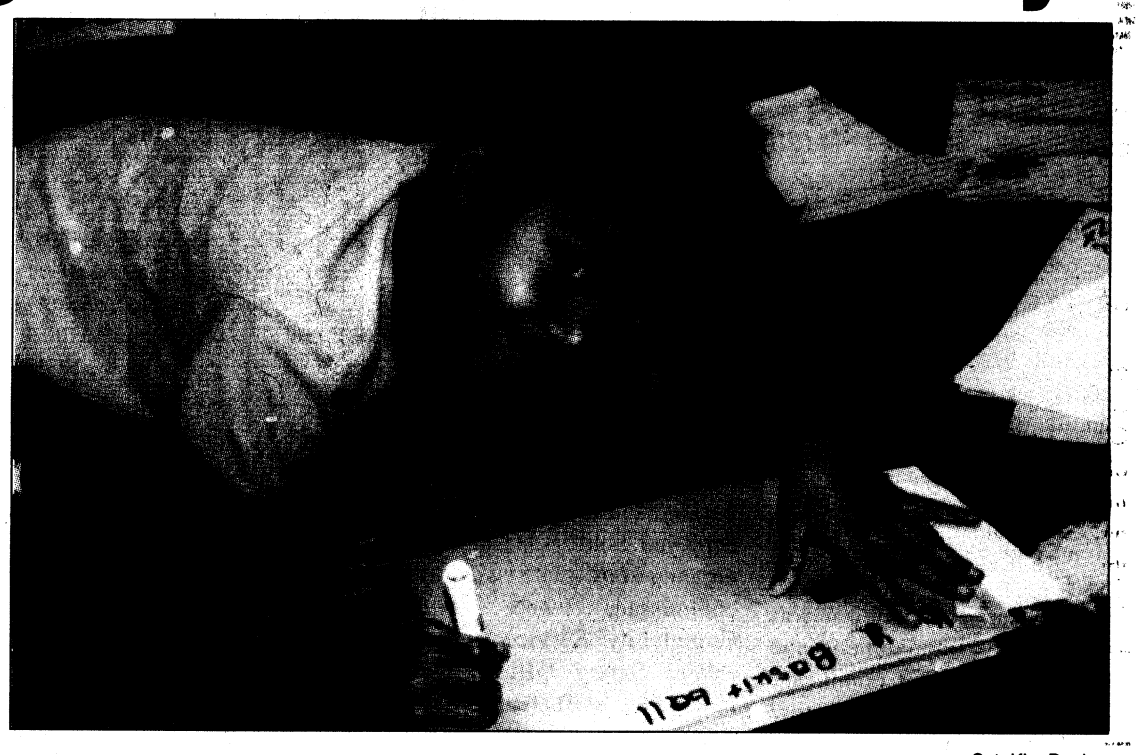
Each day, the students rotate to a new station, whether it be reading a book together, illustrating and reading a song and poem book, or penning their own stories and drawings.

"They love it," Mumpower said. "It allows them to become authors and illustrators; it gives them a sense of ownership."

The students' handiwork is kept in a portfolio so they can see their progress over the year, which is phenomenal, Mumpower said.

"At the beginning of the year, a lot of the students couldn't even put letters on a page to (say what they wanted to say)," she said.

That's not the case anymore. Mumpower's class has become quite the young authors club.



First-grader Brianna Holmes honed her writing abilities with a book about "two gingerbread girls who want a pet."

Meanwhile, Julian Johnson handcrafted a book about a gingerbread man for his mother for her birthday.

"(The workshops) are fun, and they help me learn about writing and drawing," Johnson said.

Nicci Holton has fun in the workshops, but she see the more practical advantage of getting the basics down.

"If you write books, you can write better ... That way, when I go to the grocery store, I can write lists so I don't forget what I need to buy," she said, putting the finishing touches on her "squirrel book."

Sgt. Kim Dooley

Naidaniel Nelper, a Stowers Elementary School first-grader, illustrates his newest book in a reading and writing workshop Tuesday morning.

Of course, that may not be all Mumpower has in mind for her students' writing and reading skills, but either way, the intensive workshops will benefit her students.

"This is real reading and real writing — not worksheets," she said. "This is a lot harder, and it takes a lot more direction to keep the kids focused, but it's worth it in the long run."

Stowers' kindergartners tour globe

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

Stowers Elementary School kindergartners took off on a whirlwind adventure recently. They packed their bags, boarded the plane and touched down for an exotic tour of the jungle, a spirited camp-out in the forest and a relaxing day at the beach — all this without ever leaving the school.

The students were taking part in a special "transportation day" to wrap up their studies on different modes of travel. With hand-crafted luggage and an imaginary plane, the students traveled around the three classrooms, which were decorated lavishly with vines hanging in the jungle, a hand-made "campfire" in the woods and beach garb for the beach.

The kindergartners practiced sequencing and writing and were treated to a S'mores feast in the forest-themed classroom.

All in all, it gave the kids and the teachers a fun change of pace.

"We try to do something like this every month or so," said Dorothy Young, kindergarten teacher. "It's a nice way to wrap up a unit. It's interactive, and the kids get really excited."

God's help needed to have mind of Christ

Chaplain (Maj.) Joel C. Funk
2145th Garrison Support Unit

"Have this mind among yourselves, which you have in Christ Jesus" (Philippians 2:5).

In this passage, and in other places of the New Testament, the Apostle Paul speaks about having the "mind of Christ." The human mind is made up of thinking, feeling and willing (i.e., intellect, emotions and intentions). To have the mind of Christ, then, is to think his thoughts, to feel his emotions and to purpose his will. Yet, no one can actually do these things, let alone fully understand the mind of God without his help. Neither the brilliant scientific brain of Einstein nor the talented graces of Shakespeare could do these things without God's help in revelation.

Corinthians 2:10 states: "God has revealed it to us through the Spirit. For the Spirit searches everything, even the depths of God.

For what person knows a man's thoughts except the spirit of the man which is in him? So also no one comprehends the thoughts of God except the Spirit of God. Now we have received not the spirit of the world, but the Spirit which is from God, that we might understand the gifts bestowed on us by God. And we impart this in words not taught by human wisdom but taught by the Spirit, interpreting spiritual truths to those who possess the spirit."

Here the Apostle Paul tells us that the Holy Spirit has communicated the very Spirit of God to man through the inspiration given to the Apostles. And Jesus promised that the Holy Spirit would testify of him through the guidance he would give to those upon whom the Spirit came in a miraculous way.

The thought of having the mind of Christ is the theme of the book of Philippians. Chapter one shows us that the mind of Christ rejoices suffering; chapter two, that the mind of Christ is humble; chapter three, the mind of Christ seeks perfection; chapter four, that it brings peace.

When we think as he thought we realize the sufferings of this world are inevitable, are valuable, and will be compensated.

When we grasp his mind we know that the road of humility is the way of true greatness, for it's the path of righteousness and service. When we make his will our own we know that the constant struggle to reach perfection in him is the only true goal and purpose of life. When his heart becomes ours we have peace, for we are reconciled to God, to mankind, and to self.

We too can see Christ by walking with him through the pages of the Bible and then having him as our companion in our daily lives until his mind becomes ours in life.

How to talk so children will listen

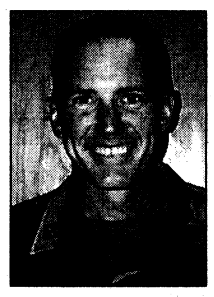
Chaplain (Maj.) Jeffrey Hawkins
Chaplain Family Life Center

Teen-ager: "That TV show was boring."

Parent: "No it wasn't. It was very interesting."

Teen-ager: "It was dumb."

Parent: "Don't call it dumb; it was educational."



Teen-ager: "It was so not educational! It was totally stupid."

Parent: "Don't talk that way!"

Ever feel like you're caught in a verbal and emotional tug-of-war with your child? Do you ever wonder if any of the words and wisdom you share are getting past their headphones into anything that remotely resembles a brain? If you do, you're not alone.

In fact, one of the requests from parents that I hear most often is, "Can you help me talk so that my child will listen?" Fortunately, the answer to that question is "yes"!

Adele Faber and Elaine Mazlish have written a very practical little book by the same title, How To Talk So Kids Will Listen, and How To Listen So Kids Will Talk.

Hawkins

In their book, they talk about how to listen, really listen, and understand the needs and concerns of your child.

They also tackle how to live in a "nag-free" home. Faber says that if we're not careful as parents, we can step on one of eight relationship land mines in our response to our children and their actions:

No. 1 — The Great Deny-er. "There's no reason to be so upset — it's silly to feel that way!"

No. 2 — Mrs. Philosophy. "Look, that's how life is! Things don't always turn out like we want them to."

No. 3 — Mr. More Advice. "You know what I think you should do? I think you should (ramble, ramble, ramble ...)"

No. 4 — The Interrogator. "What were you thinking? When was the last time you stopped and thought before you acted? What am I to do with you?"

No. 5 — The Great Defender. "Well I can see why she treated you that way — I can understand her reaction. You're lucky she doesn't treat you any worse than she does!"

No. 6 — Pitiful Pearl. "Oh, you poor thing. That's horrible. I feel so sorry for you."

No. 7 — Dr. Psychoanalysis. "Has it ever occurred to you that this really isn't about the bike at all? The real reason you are so upset is ..."

The better path is to use a special tool I call the "Relationship Triple-Play," three ways to help you "win" with your kids are:

- to listen with full attention, eyes and ears,
- give a verbal clue that you are "zeroed in" on what they are saying and
- name what they are feeling back to them

Power of the press

Pfc. Chris Stephens

Sgt. 1st Class Marvin Broadwater warms up with 315 lbs. on the bench press Tuesday at Briant Wells Fitness Center. Broadwater competed in the Southern States Power Lifting Championships, where he took first place in his weight class.

Soldier hopes to revive post's powerlifting program

Weightlifting champion eyes spot at nationals

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

Sgt. 1st Class Marvin Broadwater has enjoyed powerlifting since early in his military career, when he made up his mind he'd get better, stronger, each time he set foot in the weight room.

"It's something I've always loved, and I feel great after each workout," he said.

After lifting a career-high 507 lbs. in 1992, Broadwater went on a string of deployments and overseas tours and couldn't continue the sport until his return to Fort Benning last year.

Now the 42-year-old tasking NCOIC of the Medical Department Activity wants to revive the post's powerlifting program, which all but died off in the mid-1990s.

"I know there are people interested in the sport," he said. "But many don't know what they need to do to get started."

Broadwater is once again competing in bench press meets and hopes other Soldiers will gain interest in competing as well.

He competed in the Southern States Powerlifting Championships March 6 in Duluth, Ga., finishing first in his weight class.

"It felt good, after being out of the loop for so long, to get back in there and do so well," he said. "I never thought I would do as well as I did."

Next up for Broadwater is the Southeastern Regional Bench Press and Dead Lift Championships. If he places in the top three of his weight class, he will go on to Nationals later this year in Denver.

Now he hopes to start a team on Fort Benning.

"I believe that if we get enough Soldiers interested in competing, we can get a team started," he said. "Fort Hood (Texas) has a powerlifting team that finished fifth at Nationals last year.

"To me, that is great. Most of the teams they competed against were civilians, whose main focus was powerlifting, whereas the Soldiers have another job to do, so power lifting is a hobby for them."

As in all sports, however, there are risks.

"Many times, people try to start lifting more than they can handle," said Sherman Ledford, president of Quest Nutrition. "Sometimes they don't understand that they have to build up to it.

"You can't go into the sport thinking you're going to lift more than 500 lbs. on the first day, because it isn't going to happen. Patience is key in this sport, and if you stick with it, you'll get there one day."

Broadwater said the easiest way to stay safe when lifting is to have a spotter.

"Having a spotter at all times is important," he said. "It's a safety precaution that I take every time I get ready to lift."

For more information about joining Fort Benning's powerlifting group, call Broadwater at 544-2660.

Fort Rucker — 'Calling all Triathletes'

Race to benefit participants, Fort Rucker AER

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

Fort Rucker, Ala., will host the Tinman Triathlon and Duathlon at 8 a.m. May 1, on the west beach of Lake Tholocco.

The event is sponsored by 1st Battalion, 210th Aviation Regiment. All proceeds will benefit Army Emergency Relief, a nonprofit organization that supports Soldiers and their families during times of crisis.

"This is going to be a great event for all those involved," said Chief Warrant Officer Don Randol, volunteer. "Not only are all those who participate going to be helping AER, but they're also going to go through a course that will challenge them both physically and mentally."

The triathlon consists of a 1,000 meter swim, an 18.6 mile bike ride and a 6.2 mile run. The duathlon consists of a two-mile run, an 18.6 mile bike ride and another run of 6.2 miles.

The bike course will cover rolling hills and smooth roads with several long "in the saddle" climbs.

The run route is a gentle, rolling course, which includes a little bit of gravel road, Randol said.

"And the scenery around the lake is great," he said. "It's something I believe everyone should see."

Bicycle helmets, appropriate footwear and swimwear are required. Wet suits are authorized, since water temperatures are expected to be in the high 60s or low 70s.

"As always, safety is stressed," Randol said. "We want to make sure we taken precautionary steps."

According to ustriathlon.com, people are most at risk to injury when they are not paying attention to what they're doing.

"I've seen many people go down with an injury in the middle of races, because they weren't aware of all of the variables around them," said U.S. Triathlon National Champion Hunter Kemper, in an interview with Triathlon Times. "It could be holes in the road, a shoe not tied tight or other athletes around them. You just never know, if you're not aware.

"People also go into events not having trained for the triathlon," Kemper said. "They feel like they can walk in anything without proper training and do well. My advice to everyone is to train before you race, and you will be better prepared for what you see out on the race course."

The opening ceremony and prerace briefing begin at 7:15 a.m. and the race starts at 8 a.m.

Preregistration entry fees are $30 for individuals and $60 for teams. On race day, the registration fees are $35 for individuals and $70 for teams.

The first 100 race entrants will receive a free T-shirt.

Awards will be presented to the top three males and females as well as the top finishers in the following age groups: under 20, 20-29, 30-39, 40-49, 50-59 and 60 and older.

Randol said this is "the race to do" to prepare for the Gulf Coast Triathlon, the annual Southeastern US Championship Race.

Although the Tinman is not sanctioned by USA Triathlon, all USAT rules will be in effect. Draft marshals will be out in force.

Packet pickup begins at 6 a.m. near the transition area.

For more information on the race or to register, call (334) 255-9133 or e-mail curtis.harper@rucker.army.mil.

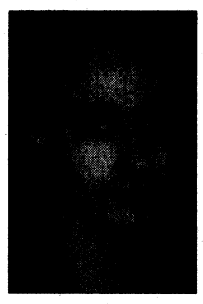
Who's going to make a difference this year?



Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

Ah, it's March again and you know what that means — March Madness. The time when dreams come true and others are tossed aside until next year.

Is everyone ready to fill out their brackets Monday morning when you get to work? I know I am. I'm ready to show all of my critics who the true king of the tournament is.

Maybe then, my colleagues can stop giving me a hard time about the Georgia Bulldogs not having a great year — although, they were the only team to beat Kentucky twice this year.

However, I'm curious to see what matchups there will be in the tournament. Every year, there are games in which I think its obvious who's going to win, and it doesn't turn out like that. So, it's time to rethink my strategy.

This year, before filling out my bracket, I'm going to pay attention to the lesser known conference tournaments and some of the teams who rank in the middle of the major conferences. Those are the teams that will make the biggest difference.

I also have this curiosity where the Selection Committee is going to place teams like Gonzaga, Princeton, Georgia Tech and Louisville.

Gonzaga is an interesting team. They're from the West Coast Conference, which is considered a mid-major conference. However, can you even consider the 'Zags a mid-major team?

Coach Mark Few continues to have outstanding recruits come in, and the 'Zags will continue to be a power in the years to come. If they're on their game, I don't think anybody can beat them.

The Princeton Tigers are an always dangerous team in the NCAA tournament. Ever since I started following their progress in 1995, I've noticed that they seem to always get a seed between 12 and 14.

Generally, that's bad. However, the Tigers have somehow won most of those games. I don't get it. It doesn't matter where they are, they're going to change the tournament. They might not win it, but they'll sure make some noise.

As a die-hard Bulldogs fan, it pains me to say, "The Georgia Tech Yellow Jackets are championship contenders." Whew! that was hard. Excuse me while I go wash my mouth out with soap.

But it's true. The Jackets are a very dangerous team. They're without a doubt, the deepest team in the country. If one player is off during the game, others will pick up the slack.

A great example of that was when the Jackets played the Florida State Seminoles March 6 in Atlanta.

Tech's leading scorer, guard B.J. Elder, was having an off night, but on Senior Night, senior guard Marvin Lewis hit four 3-pointers in the second half to help Tech come from behind and beat the Seminoles.

My advice to teams in the tournament playing Georgia Tech, "Be careful."

Louisville is an akward team. They started the season 16-1, but fell by the wayside, only winning three more games the rest of the way.

The Cardinals are still a dangerous team, but I wonder if they've lost that luster and pizzazz they had at the beginning of the season.

Maybe Rick Pitino can have his team going by the time tournament time comes around. They need to get back to what was working for them at the beginning of the season, and I think they will do well in the tournament.

Well, there it is, four teams who will be in different positions come tournament time.

And they all have one thing in common — this is a tournament, and on any given night, any team can win.

Now the question is, which teams will take advantage of its opponents' mistakes and expose them of their weaknesses? I guess we'll have to wait and see.

"I invite you to compare the Mazda6 to the Honda Accord, Toyota Camry, or Nissan Altima. We believe the 6 outperform them all." Thomas Colbert

MILITARY RECEIVE $1000 DISCOUNT WITH THIS AD

Here's a small taste of what to expect when you go for a test drive around Columbus.
Start it up. Hear that? It's the compelling call of the available 220hp MZI 3.0 liter V6 engine eagerly waiting to be put to much better use. Drive out of Jay Mazda. Negotiate a quick turn or two. Experience how agile a true sports sedan gifted with an advanced 4-wheel independent suspension can be. Note the precise control and instant feedback of its rack-and-pinion steering. Feel how swiftly and surely the 4-wheel disc brakes respond to any situation. Marvel at how deftly the Mazda6 is capable of turning the roads you've driven before into your own private fun zone.

'04 MITSUBISHI GALANT

MILITARY RECEIVE $1000 DISCOUNT WITH THIS AD

Looking at its purpose-cut precision lines and its bold stance you get the feeling the designers had something in mind when they created this year's Galant. The 4-bulb halogen projector-style headlights, the 17" alloy wheels, the clear-and-chrome oval inset tail lamps, the aggressive center grille pillar and the integrated spoiler seem to lend evidence to this theory. So did Mitsubishi have anything in mind when they developed this distinctive sedan? Yes. You!

WELCOME HOME!

988th MP Company returns from year overseas

Hundreds of friends and family members greeted 126 Soldiers of the 988th Military Police Company Saturday at Lawson Army Air Field upon their return from a nearly one-year deployment in support of Operation Iraqi Freedom.

The unit deployed last April and has spent the last year supporting Marines of the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force in locations such as Nasiriya and Najaf, Iraq.

The unit's mission included performing area security, stability and support operations and military police intelligence tasks.

The unit returned with all its Soldiers, citing only two injuries.

Pfc. Matthew Narez said unit cohesion was tight while the Soldiers were deployed and morale was high, but said thinking about coming back to see his family is what kept him going throughout the 11-month deployment.

After 18 hours of travel, Narez said the first thing he would do once he was assigned a barracks room is take a shower.

A shower and a home-cooked meal seemed to be on most Soldiers' minds.

A favorite dinner of butter chicken, mashed potatoes and sweet tea was on the menu for Spec. Alex Miller.

Miller said it felt great to be home and be back with his wife and two young sons.

Katrina Banks, wife of Sgt. Keith Banks, said

104th Transportation Co. ends yearlong deployment

About 100 Soldiers of the 104th Transportation Company, 13th Corps Support Battalion, returned home from a one-year deployment to Iraq Wednesday morning.

After turning in their sensitive items, the troops were greeted by an excited crowd at Audie Murphy Gym.

Family members and friends packed the bleachers of the gym's basketball court in anticipation of the unit's arrival.

Upon the Soldiers' dismissal from formation, they were welcomed by their loved ones with tears, hugs and long-awaited kisses.

The reunions were a relief for both the troops and their families. The unit was originally deployed with the expectation it would return home after a short operation in theater. That expectation was changed when, four months into the mission, they were notified they would be gone for the full year.

"When we first deployed, we had no idea how long we'd be gone," Sgt. Khevin Smith said.

His wife, Lashawnda, gave birth to their son, Khevin Jr., while the unit was deployed and said it was wonderful to finally have him home.

"I thought (the deployment) was going to be harder, but the baby kept me busy," she said.

Lashawnda said the unit's family readiness group support also helped significantly.

The couple had been married only a month and a half when the unit departed.

Khevin Sr. said thinking of his wife and son was the source of his

Low-carb diets could pose health threat

Meal plans deprive dieters of fiber, nutrients

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

It sounds simple enough. Just cut the carbohydrates, gorge on all the tasty, fatty foods your heart desires and you'll lose weight. Sounds too good to be true, right?

That's because it is, said 1st Lt. Paula Wedel of Martin Army Community Hospital's Nutrition Care Clinic.

Every year, Americans spend $33 billion on the diet industry, and yet, according to the Journal of the American Medical Association, there are 50 percent more obese people in America today than there were a decade ago — even with a rash of low-carb diets and products promising fast, easy weight loss.

Low-carb diets either severely restrict or altogether eliminate carbohydrates from the diet, igniting a bodily process called ketosis, according to the Complete Wellness Center Web site.

"Ketosis occurs when carbohydrates are not available for the body for energy," the site explains. "When the body doesn't get enough carbohydrates, it starts to reduce the blood sugar (glycogen) reserves in the liver. The body then starts to extract glycogen from muscle tissue, thus breaking it down and depleting water from the muscles at the same time."

Once the body has depleted the reserves of blood sugar in the muscles, it starts to expand its production of ketone bodies, which many cells ultimately use for energy in lieu of glucose. That, indeed is fat burning.

But while this process achieves fat loss, it comes at a price.

"The Dietary Reference Intake is what we use as professionals to determine the recommended dietary allowances for healthy populations," Wedel said. "The DRI for carbohydrates is 130 grams a day — the minimum amount of

CUSTOMER SERVICE

Would you like fries with that?

Bridgett Siter
Bayonet staff

Wilhelmenia is one of my favorite people. I don't know her last name, if she prefers to be called Willie, how she votes, her age or her shoe size. For that matter, I don't even know if she wears shoes, because I've never seen Wilhelmenia's feet.

I've only seen Wilhelmenia from the other side of the cash register at the Main Post Burger King, where she greets me once or twice (or five times) a week with a smile. Once, after a brief and futile attempt at reforming my diet, I returned like the prodigal to BK, and Wilhelmenia said, "Where have you been? We thought you'd moved away."

You could've knocked me over with a sesame seed. What kind of place is this? They actually noticed my absence. Don't hold me to it, but I'd say it's a safe bet that restaurant serves a couple thousand customers a week on a slow week. And they noticed my absence?

That got me thinking about this thing we call customer service. Why is it I drive out of my way to eat at one place instead of another? Why don't I mind standing in line here and refuse to wait five minutes there? Why do some people treat their customers royally, while others treat them like a royal pain in the keester?

Bad customer service gets a lot of press these days, and well it should. There seems to be a common perception among those who haven't developed the knack for it, that customer service — courtesy and efficiency — is tantamount to subservience. That's not the case at all.

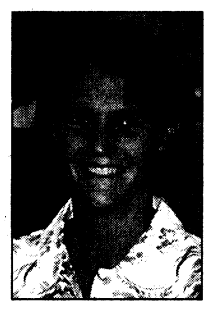
There's absolutely nothing subservient about Wilhemena. She's got Attitude, with a capital A. It fairly oozes. ("Could I get a clean-up at the register please? Willie's oozing attitude on the French fries again.) But her attitude, it would seem, stems from a healthy sense of self-worth. A purpose.

One of my favorite scriptures is Ecclesiastes 9:10, which says, "Whatsoever your hand finds to do, do it with all your might." I keep that verse in mind when I'm cleaning toilets, cooking for an unappreciative audience or writing an article I absolutely do not want to write. And if someday I find myself flipping burgers or mopping floors at Burger King, I hope I'll be the best flipper or mopper in the world, bar none.

Customer service means valuing what you do even when you don't like what you do.

It means understanding the importance of getting it right, whatever it is, even if you're doing it for the hundredth time today.

It means treating a private like a general and treating every customer like he or she is responsible for your next OER.



I can give you example after example of bad customer service. We've all seen it, and we're pretty quick to complain.

I've recently taken to filling out comment cards when I'm treated like a king, not just a customer, by people like Wilhelmenia, who believe good service comes with a smile and a side order of fries.

Here at The Bayonet, we'd like to hear from you. Drop us a line and let us know who's excelling in the service department. Send your letters to the editor to fbbayonet @mindspring.com.

Won't you clean up, my neighbor?

Melissa House
Bayonet staff

Yes, I know the post Spring Clean-Up is just a little shy of a month away. But I'm not going to be shy about asking folks to put it on their calendars. Don't pencil it in, because it isn't going to change.

If you live in housing, grab a big fat red marker and make a commitment for either April 10 or April 17. They're both Saturdays, and once the morning soccer and baseball games are over, there will be plenty of time to spruce things up around the neighborhood.

I know Robert Frost wrote "good fences make good neighbors." But when all you can fence amounts to half-a-yard, and you and your neighbor are still too close for comfort, you'll have to find other ways of keeping the peace.

We all have our pet peeves — those things about neighbors, either past or present, or just our neighborhood in general, that drive us crazy. I hear them all the time, and I have a few of my own, of course.

For some, it's the teen-agers who don't scoop the poop when their dog loads someone else's lawn. For others, it's the delivery men or the garbage men who don't seem to understand that 15 mph means you can only do 15 mph.

Like the sergeants major say, "Do the right thing."

Let's put our trash at the curb in a container, not a plastic bag for animals to tear into overnight. Then, follow up by not leaving the empty, overturned can by the curb day after day after day.

Let's make a conscious effort to drive the speed limit — or even a little bit slower — through the housing areas.

Our yards are indeed our footprint on post. They're like the cover of a book. If the cover looks good, the book must be good. Now that it's spring, let's get cracking.

And if you're on a corner, like I am, your footprint might actually extend a bit farther than the 150 feet the Housing Office says you are responsible for.

Think outside the footprint. Make yours a Sasquatch-sized print. Add an extra "toe" and mow and edge that little bit. It will make a difference.

And get your children involved. Have them grab the five weeks of newspapers piled up outside that empty set of quarters a few doors down. Chances are, they won't mind a few minutes of helping out.

I measured my footprint recently, and discovered that it covers a good bit of the "sandy park" outside my back door. The same park that needs a good leaf-raking and a little sand-rearranging to make it better for the kids. Yes, my kids will grumble, but chances are, they've left a good bit of the trash out there themselves

And taking pride in your neighborhood may mean getting those who come through on a regular basis to do their part in keeping things looking good.

Speak up if you need to, but speak up nicely. You'll catch more flies with sugar than you will with vinegar.

Don't be bashful about calling the leaf guys — who picked up your leaves but left the plastic bags on the ground to blow away — to do something else with the trash.

Yup, we're all in this together.

Living in post housing is not a right, but a privilege. And just like any landlord, the Army has the right to boot us out if we're not good tenants.

So grab your rake, pull PMCS on your mower, and I'll see you out there.

Low carbs, no carbs — give me a break

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

This is war. The battle of the bulge. A full-scale counterattack on the fat that suddenly appeared on my hips and thighs when I hit 21. That unsightly "pooch" that somehow erupted at my midsection. The extra "skin" on the backs of my arms. (It has to be skin — how can you possible gain weight on the backs of your arms?!)

Whatever it is, this new pudgy stuff is definitely not welcome. And it's definitely not going to stick around — at least, that's what I said when I looked in the mirror after returning from Christmas leave (a moment of complete panic).

Now, I'm no stranger to dieting. I, too, was a teen-age girl once. You know the type — always on a new diet, never hungry, always "already ate."

But then again, that whole bagel-and-yogurt-a-day, drink-two-pots-of-coffee-and-eat-ice-chips-to-kill-the-hunger diet doesn't go over as well when you've got PT five days a week and are actually expected to function.

So I thought I'd try something "healthy." Yes, yes ... I was suckered in by the "low-carb diet." The one that promises you'll lose that belly, all the while stuffing yourself full with all the fat and flavor you could dream of.

Oh, and not just one diet — two. Two low-carb diets! And have I lost anything? Well, I'll let you do the math.

First, let's review the plan of attack. The Atkins Diet lasted all of a week. This "revolutionary" diet calls for only 20 grams of carbs a day for the first two weeks and not more than 90 grams a day once you've hit your goal weight.

Then there was the South Beach Diet, which comes complete with a menu plan, so I didn't bother to count carbs. But let me just say, my stomach revolted — there was definitely not enough food on this plan for me.

I know, I know — dieting success takes a little extra will and discipline. But when you're active (think PT five days a week, sports two days a week and aerobics when you can fit it in), this whole 1,500-calorie-a-day, low-carb thing just doesn't work out.

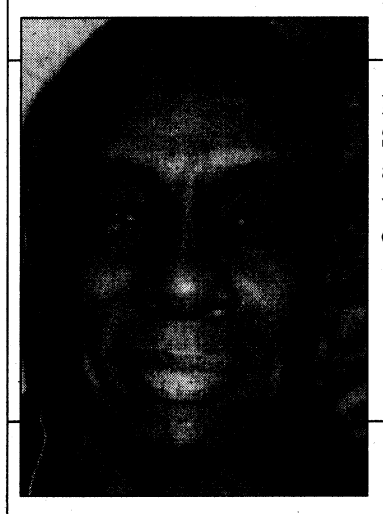
I was barely dragging myself out of bed in the morning by the third day of both diets — these are not exactly performance-enhancing meal plans.

Needless to say, I didn't last long on either diet — not because I couldn't hack it, but because it's just not a healthy diet for a person with my activity level.

With zero energy to spare, nagging hunger and carb cravings one is likely to suffer only in the confines of purgatory, I wasn't exactly feeling up to taking that jog to burn some extra calories. Even Winsor Pilates felt like running a marathon.

Now did I really need to reach complete physical exhaustion and endure dizzy spells, dehydration and all the other nasty side effects that they don't talk about in the books?

Probably not.



I just as easily could have made an appointment at the Nutrition Care Clinic to get some solid dieting advice as read an whole book about the benefit of starving my body of an entire food group ... OK, two whole books.

So if I were you — assuming you are a person seriously considering dropping a few pounds and leaning toward the low-carb train of thought — I would seek expert advice from people who are there to help you stay healthy, not to make money off your potentially dangerous diet.

The phone number is 544-CARE.

Program brings combat leaders to Benning

Spc. Eliamar Castanon
Bayonet staff

Fort Benning will host the first Combat Leadership Speaker Program at 2 p.m. and at 7 p.m. Tuesday at Marshall Auditorium in Infantry Hall.

To kick off the program, the Combined Arms and Tactics Directorate has invited retired Gen. Barry R. McCaffrey to give the first lecture.

"A man like General McCaffrey is a great example of a leader," said Maj. Brent Cummings, CATD tactics team deputy. "He was a very highly decorated young combat leader in Vietnam, a division commander in the first Gulf War and the Drug Czar from 1996 to 2001.

"McCaffrey is now with a speaking firm, the Washington Speakers Bureau, and charges at least $10,000 to speak at private forums but has waived that fee to come and speak at Fort Benning," Cummings said.

The program will allow officers and NCOs attending courses at Fort Benning, as well as the staff and cadre, to benefit from the experiences of the the nation's greatest warriors as they prepare to face challenges of the future while serving a nation at war, Cummings said..

"It is a tremendous benefit for these young leaders to hear firsthand accounts of leadership in combat since most of them will go out to units preparing to deploy," said Lt. Col. John D. Harding, CATD deputy director.

Because of the current war on terrorism, the Army demands an intense study of combat leadership.

The focus of these lectures will be placed on small unit combat leadership, Cummings said.

McCaffrey will first speak at 2 p.m. to the Infantry Captains' Career Course, Infantry Officer Basic Course and Officer Candidate School students without cadre present so the students may feel free to ask questions, Cummings said.

At 7 p.m., McCaffrey will give a lecture to all post commanders, first sergeants and higher, Cummings said.

NCOs are the backbone of the Army and are welcome to attend since they, too, have leadership positions in combat zones, Harding said.

A future speaker includes the Honorable James Webb, former secretary of the Navy and best-selling author.

Carbs: Necessary ingredient for healthy weight loss carbohydrates needed to produce enough glucose for the brain to function. This is only the brain; the body needs more to allow the muscles and cells to function properly."

Most low-carb diets encourage dieters to reduce their carb intake to as little as 20 grams per day. And even in their maintenance phases, these diets still allow less than the 250 to 300 grams of carbs per day that the American Heart Institute and the National Institute of Health both recommend.

For instance, on the Atkins diet, Wedel said, once you reach your goal weight, you're allowed up to 90 grams per day — "less than your brain needs to function."

These diets can have negative effects on your health, whether you're planning to use them short- or long-term.

"Mainly low energy is noted," Wedel said. "I have heard of civilian patients visiting the ER because they didn't have enough energy to continue their daily activities. And Soldiers train all day and need adequate carbohydrates for energy to support the rigorous activities of Army training. The short-term side effects (impact) military training and PT performance."

Aside from dehydration, mineral depletion and energy loss, low-carb diets are also generally low in fiber and high in fat, according to the Wellness Center Web site.

Low-fiber diets have been linked to constipation, diverticulosis and cancers of the colon, breast and prostate. High saturated fat intakes have been linked conclusively to heart disease and cancers of the breast, prostate and lung.

"Studies really haven't been done to show the specific long-term effects of low-carbohydrate diets at this time," Wedel said. "But what we do know about healthy eating indicates that low-carbohydrate diets may cause colon cancer (due to low fiber and lack of antioxidants) and increase the chances of heart disease."

But if this diet is so unhealthy, why does it seem to work?

"The first seven to 14 days, people see rapid weight loss on these diets," Wedel said. "The reason — carbohydrates are stored as glycogen in muscle. Where carbohydrates go, water follows.

"If you are not taking carbohydrates in by mouth, your body will use the carbohydrates stored in your muscles," she said. "Therefore, you are losing muscle rather than the fat mass you should actually lose."

Dieters may also lose weight because, regardless of the appeal of their menu options — high-fat foods most diets outlaw — low-carb diets restrict many foods, resulting in eating less than usual, according to www.fitwoman.com.

And as with most "fad diets," the results may be fast, but that doesn't mean they're long-lasting.

"Many people use low-carbohydrate diets short-term to reach a weight they set as a goal," Wedel said. "Once they reach the weight, they go back to their old eating habits and gain the weight, plus more, back again."

According to the Wellness Center, "Recent studies seem to bear this out, with one estimating the weight regain from the Atkins' diet to be 96 percent."

So what is the answer to weight-loss woes?

Ultimately, she said, "lifestyle change is the key to successful, long-term weight loss."

For more information about healthy weight loss, call 544-2273.

their three sons were thrilled to see their dad. "Oh, my God, we're so relieved he's home," said Banks.

Relief was written on most of the Soldiers' faces as they stood in formation before being released to greet loved ones. Many of them were overcome with emotion as the garrison commander, Col. Rick Riera and the provost marshal, Lt. Col. Sean Finnegan, gave short remarks applauding the unit's performance.

The post command sergeant major, Command Sgt. Maj. Mike Kelso, welcomed the unit as well. "It's outstanding," Kelso said. "By all accounts, they've done a magnificent job."

Members of the Association of the U.S. Army were present with snacks and drinks for the Soldiers and the crowd.

strength through the past year.

The 104th's first sergeant, Lavon Christen, said the unit dealt with the rigors of deployment and the unexpected extension well.

"It was rough at first, but for our guys being very young, they did well," said Christen. "They did everything that was asked of them. The training they received was reflected in the outstanding job they did."

The unit's mission in Operation Iraqi Freedom was to provide transportation support from the rear to forward warehouses.

During the redeployment ceremony, the family readiness group distributed packets to family members that included information regarding relationship changes because of the redeployment, behavior change in children, resource phone numbers and info regarding a marriage retreat the unit has planned in June.

'Mother of all field trips' tests leadership

Visit helps U.S. State Dept. learn about military

Spc. David Foley
Bayonet staff

Some of America's top leaders visited Fort Benning March 9 to 12 as part of the most advanced professional development program available to senior foreign policy and national security officials in the U.S. government.

The 41-week program teaches students both strategy and leadership, to prepare them for executive-level leadership positions in the government.

Described as the "mother of all field trips," students of the Foreign Service Institute have been traveling throughout the country, "learning about leadership and getting to know the people," said Ambassador Laura Kennedy, FSI dean.

"The main focus of the class is to teach America's leaders about national security issues, and also to learn what the characteristics of truly great leaders are — something that can be found throughout the military," said Steve Taylor, seminar coordinator.

In addition to visiting installations of all five military branches, the students visited farm families in Indiana, rode with police officers on the streets of Chicago, and met with Henry Kissinger for a couple of hours, Kennedy said.

As the U.S. Department of State prepares to build the world's largest embassy in the heart of Iraq, the visit to Fort Benning was a key point in the program, she said.

"It's good to see how a huge military installation like Fort Benning deals with training the troops, protecting the environment and keeping a balance with the civilians in the community," Kennedy said.

"It is a good example of leadership challenges."

Kennedy said she was impressed by the way Fort Benning has used lessons learned in Iraq and Afghanistan to modify the training mission.

Another aspect of Fort Benning Kennedy admired was the way the post tears down barriers through its schools, such as the Western Hemisphere Institute for Security Cooperation and the International Student Training Detachment.

"People from countries that have a long history of conflict (such as India and Pakistan) are learning side by side," she said.

"It's a very valuable thing Fort Benning is doing to develop relationships that will pay off for years to come."

While the goal of the visit was to study the post's leadership, the students also had an opportunity to join Soldiers in some of their training exercises and learn about their weapons and equipment.

They watched an Infantry Training Brigade graduation, strapped on parachute harnesses and jumped out of the 34-foot Airborne towers and suited up in multiple integrated laser engagement system equipment to get a taste of ground training.

Then they joined the Soldiers from B Company, 2nd Battalion, 54th Infantry Regiment, for lunch in the field, where they were able to talk with some of the Army's newest Soldiers about their training and other topics.

Kennedy said it was hard to pinpoint the highlight of the visit, but there was one event that really got their blood pumping.

"Jumping out of the tower was a fascinating experience for everybody," she said.

Paul Reid, one of the students, said jumping from the tower was an exciting experience, but using the MILES gear was the icing on the cake for him.

Pvt. Michael Fairburn, B Company, 2nd Battalion, 54th Infantry Regiment demonstrates MILES gear for State Department visitors.

"Because let's face it," he said. "We don't get many opportunities to shoot at each other, and to know you would walk away unscathed made it even better."

Even though the group said the visit was a success, there was one thing that disappointed them.

Secretary of State Colin Powell speaks with the students regularly and has mentioned the Follow Me Statue several times when referring to his training on Fort Benning, Kennedy said.

"I was hoping to see the statue, but it's gone, so that was kind of a let-down," Kennedy said. "But I'll tell him it's being taken care of."

WHINSEC changes command for first time

Spc. Adrian Lugo
WHINSEC Public Affairs Office

In time-honored military tradition, the colors of the Western Hemisphere Institute for Security Cooperation changed hands March 11.

Military officials, community leaders, family members and WHINSEC supporters gathered in front of Ridgway Hall as command of the institute passed from Col. Richard Downie to Col. Gilberto Perez.

Downie assumed the title of commandant in 2001, when WHINSEC was established. He retires with 28 years of service and will become director of the Center for Hemispheric Defense Studies at the National Defense University in Washington, D.C.

Downie reflected on the progress the institute has made in helping secure cooperation throughout the western hemisphere. He highlighted the institute's successes, including an expansive democracy and human rights program; the assignment of college level credit to every course by the American Council on Education; and the recognition of excellence by the Department of Defense Board of Visitors.

"The changes WHINSEC has made over the years have been absolutely remarkable ... because of the impeccable and dedicated support of the staff and faculty to accomplish our goals set forth by Congress and the Department of Defense," Downie said. "It has truly been tremendous honor and privilege to lead such a talented group of people, and I know Colonel Pérez feels the same."

Pérez comes to WHINSEC after serving as Chief of Staff for U.S. Army South, the Army component of U.S. Southern Command. He served several assignments in South and Central America and twice served as an instructor at the U.S. Army School of the Americas.

Perez vowed to continue the efforts of the institute.

"We are living in a challenging time in history," he said referencing the war on terrorism. "Although the world may seem more focused on other parts of the world, we cannot afford to lose sight of our objective, to see the expansion of true democracies throughout the world.

"With the support of the staff and faculty here at (WHINSEC), I am sure that we will be one step closer to that objective," he said.

Golden Knight comes home

Spencer grad now 'Army ambassador'

Spc. Nikki St. Amant
Bayonet staff

One of Fort Benning's own will return to post as part of the Golden Knights, who will perform at the Thunder in the Valley Airshow Saturday and Sunday.

Capt. Bo Stuart says Fort Benning is "like home." His father, an Army officer, met and married his mother while serving as a "blackhat" at Airborne School in 1969.

Stuart attended Faith Middle School for two years, and later spent his freshman and sophomore years at Spencer High School. He attended Airborne School as an ROTC cadet in 1990 and was commissioned in 1993. He was stationed here in 1993, 1994, 1997 and 1998.

Stuart said he remembers watching the Silver Wings Command Parachute Demonstration Team, which was recently reactivated, perform here, and his interest for skydiving was born.

After static-line jumping for 10 years and harboring an interest in high-altitude, low-opening skydiving, Stuart "jumped" at the opportunity to join the Golden Knights as the operations officer last year. The Golden Knights serve as the Army's goodwill ambassadors, he said.

"We perform, on average, 150 performances at 60 sites throughout the year," Stuart said. "The coverage we generate reaches places that don't get exposure to Soldiers very often. I think it is extremely important for the public to see our Soldiers up close and personal."

Coming back to Fort Benning holds special meaning for him.

"Fort Benning will always be my home. I grew up here, my children were born here and it's where I developed my desire to be a Soldier," he said. "To come back here as a part of the Knights is a dream come true."

Stuart offered words of wisdom for Soldiers going through Airborne School.

"Keep your feet and knees together," he said.

The air show kicks off Saturday at 10 a.m. at the Columbus Regional Airport. Soldiers and their families can obtain tickets in advance for $5.50 at Omega Travel in the Main PX. Tickets at the gate are $10. For more information call 327-3264.

Top NCOs talk tough on trash

Soldiers, civilians urged to do their part in cleanup

Melissa House
Bayonet staff

The temperatures are rising, the birds are chirping and the trees and flowers are blooming. Spring is in the air.

And with spring, comes the postwide spring cleanup.

Although the cleanup doesn't officially start until April 12, the sergeants major on post want to get the word out.

Command Sgt. Maj. Michael Kelso, post command sergeant major, wants those who live and work on post to know why it's important that Fort Benning look like the home of the infantry.

"We know we train more than 60,000 Soldiers here every year," Kelso said. "But in many ways, our image does not live up to our reputation."

On March 5, Kelso and garrison Command Sgt. Maj. Donald Fortson, garrison command sergeant major, rode along with Commanding General Brig. Gen. Benjamin Freakley on a post inspection, of sorts, with Freakley behind the wheel.

Kelso said they all agreed there were areas not up to standard and needing attention. Some of those areas are addressed during semi-annual cleanup efforts, he said, but other areas need attention all of the time, and not just family housing areas. They then met with commanders and command sergeants major of the major units on post and the heads of all the directorates to discuss a plan of action.

"The brigades do a good job of taking care of their areas," Kelso said. "It's the areas without Soldiers that we need to direct some attention to.

Both Kelso and Fortson are of one mind when it comes to deciding who is responsible for cleanup.

"If you have a footprint here on post, you have to take care of it," Fortson said. "It takes all of us."

And whether Soldier or civilian, Kelso said everyone should take pride in their surroundings.

Daily details are already out making a difference in the way the post looks.

Kelso declined to identify specific areas the group had targeted, but admitted one of his personal pet peeves are rusty, chain-link, fenced-in areas with nothing inside them.

He spotted several that will likely disappear before long, and some "structures that have seen better days."

He said improving the way Fort Benning looks is just a case of putting in some serious effort.

"We're not a big post in terms of having a combat division where one-third of the troops are on support cycle," Kelso said. "We just have to put on our thinking caps (to figure out how to get the work done)."

On the garrison side, Fortson said residents will see a renewed emphasis on policies and procedures laid out in Fort Benning's Housing Regulation 210-5.

"There are a lot of major construction projects coming," Fortson said, "clinics, gyms and housing — all within the next five to 10 years. Fort Benning will be a beautiful place. But until then, we need to take care of what's here."

Fortson and Kelso said they are bringing back written citations for those not complying with the housing regulation. Residents will be given three warnings.

"Three strikes, you're out," Fortson said. "Do the right thing. The CG stressed that. If not, you'll be moved off post."

The final warning goes through the Soldier's chain of command and the garrison commander.

Whether the problem is an unauthorized recreational vehicle, fence, or repeated domestic disturbances or failure to maintain a yard, the regulation will be enforced for all ranks.

"We're all part of this," Fortson said. "(Single) Soldiers moving into housing — everyone's concerned. But they were living in substandard barracks and we had to do something.

"We're all Americans. Give them a chance to do what's right."

Fortson said the community life NCOs, led by Sgt. Maj. Ronnie Porter and Master Sgt. Edmond Hackett, will be out in the housing areas. The NCOs, one per housing area, are there to help residents with problems. Issues addressed to mayors or area coordinators work their way through the community life channels, a Soldier's chain of command, and eventually to Freakley. And Fortson encourages anyone with an issue to contact their Community Life NCO to help get it resolved.

Fortson and Kelso said they want to get the message across that Soldiers and civilians on Fort Benning are all one team taking care of each other whether in the housing areas or at the office.

"We want to not only say we're the best," Fortson said, "but also show some action and make it look that way."

The Soldiers of the 598th Maintenance Company conducted a three-day field problem on Fort Benning this week to prepare for deployments to Iraq.

The Soldiers arrived at Lae Field Monday, secured the perimeter and started setting up tents. By Tuesday afternoon, the field was a self-contained tent city, complete with concertina wire and armed guards.

Once everything was in place, the Soldiers used the field as a projection platform to deploy two convoys into enemy territory, knowing where ambush was inevitable.

The exercise was part of the unit's quarterly training but has been adapted to include scenarios similar to those Soldiers have faced in Iraq and Afghanistan, said Sgt. Donald Jones, training NCO.

Each of the unit's convoys were attacked three times during their movement.

During the ambush, Capt. Tonya Prevo, company commander, and other leaders watched to see if the Soldiers reacted properly.

After each ambush, they conducted an after action review to pinpoint what the Soldiers did right and what they need to improve on.

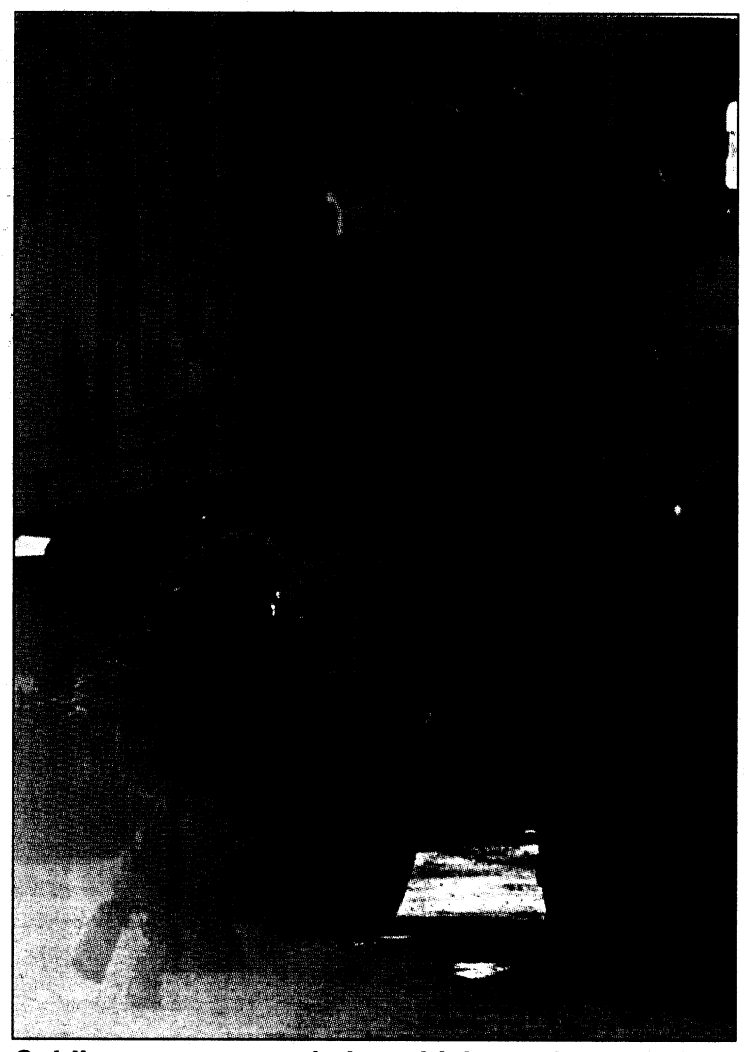
Things they looked for were whether or not the Soldiers exited the vehicles on the least vulnerable side and whether they were able to secure their own flanks when necessary, Jones said.

Convoy training is a vital concern for the unit because terrorists tend to attack weaker elements rather than ones who look prepared, he said.

"The main weakness with a maintenance unit is that we never thought we'd be on the front lines," Jones said. "But now we are realizing we are out there, too."

Sgt. Charles Dyling deployed to Afghanistan with the unit and has seen firsthand how important it is for Soldiers to conduct this sort of training.

When Soldiers deploy, he said, they are ready for anything, and they keep their guard up, but after a while, they begin to get comfortable, which makes them a softer target.



"The more drills you go through, the easier it is to react instead of wondering what to do," he said.

Dyling said training exercises like this one teach Soldiers to keep their guard up instead of getting comfortable.

1st Sgt. Van Boyd, company first sergeant, said the Soldiers did an excellent job considering most of their training for the event was done in a classroom.

He said they reacted well, but they are still in the walk phase of a crawl, walk, run training schedule.

Boyd said the unit will conduct a convoy live fire exercise in June, which will reenforce their training and prepare them for a deployment to the National Training Center in August.

Soldiers evacuate their vehicle and move into fighting positions after their convoy was ambushed.

Members of the opposing force move into position to attack as the convoy approaches.

Engineers tackle tough training

63rd Eng. Co. takes road less traveled

Melissa House
Bayonet staff

The point man signaled for the squad to move forward toward its first objective.

Although a squad out on patrol might be the norm for some units, these Soldiers weren't infantry, rather engineers from the 13th Corps Support Battalion's 63rd Engineer Company.

The 63rd Soldiers went to the field for a four-day training exercise last week. One day was devoted to reviewing tasks the squad might need to accomplish and situations the Soldiers might encounter as they went through the lanes.

"The squads received a mission brief to conduct reconnaissance in the area," said 1st Sgt. George Joseph, company first sergeant, and had markers they needed to hit as they went.

Although the 63rd Engineer Co. is a construction company made up of platoons with squads of general engineer equipment operators and truck drivers, platoon sergeant Sgt. 1st Class Carlos Sanchez said the engineers needed the infantry training.

"As engineers, we have to do recon," Sanchez said. "We are subject to being ambushed and we have to be ready."

Sanchez walked the lane with the squad from 2nd Platoon as they navigated with their Global Positioning System, compass and map.

The first event the squad encountered required them to call in a report to the company headquarters after finding an enemy map and book lying by a tree, before heading out on a new azimuth.

The second event involved civilians on the battlefield — three confrontational land-owners insisting the Soldiers leave their property immediately.

Although the squad members felt they lost their composure somewhat when they encountered the civilians, Sanchez said they handled the situation well.

"Civilians are one of the biggest threats you'll face," Sanchez said, drawing on his experience in Iraq.

Spc. Thomas Byers said it was important to take what they saw in Iraq and use it during the training.

"We always had civilians coming up to the project sites," Byers said. "Although they don't have weapons, you need to learn how to get people away from your area.

"You don't want to scare them, but you want them to understand what you are there for."

Sanchez praised the squad for not getting physical with the civilians, one of whom was played by Spc. Mary Powers. Powers said she had been "tossed a few times" by overzealous Soldiers.

After bypassing the civilians, the squad found an area marked as a chemical hazard, quickly donned their protective masks and called in a report. They also encountered unexploded ordnance and a booby-trapped road.

Sgt. Kenneth Wright soldiered through problems with the radio and tried to keep his squad in a wedge formation on the mile-long lane.

The squad was ambushed at the end of the lane, forcing it to react quickly to get out of harm's way. But company commander Capt. Holli Bennett told Wright his point man, Pfc. Dariusz Sadkowski, was seriously injured, "shot" through the lower leg.

Squad members quickly assessed his injuries, applied a pressure dressing, splinted his broken leg, then carried Sadkowski to the final point.

At the end of the lane, Sanchez held an after-action review with the squad.

"You worked well as a team," Sanchez said. "You didn't get upset with each other.

"This is a learning experience. We're now at the crawl, but by the end of the next field problem, we'll be at a walk," he said.

Sadkowski and Pfc. Jennifer Bourbon said the level of training was neither too easy nor too complicated.

"But if we do this again," Bourbon said, "we'll need more stuff."

Sanchez emphasized the need for squads to conduct thorough pre-combat checks and inspections and told the squad to practice for the next day's mission.

"Team cohesion will be here if you practice," Sanchez said.

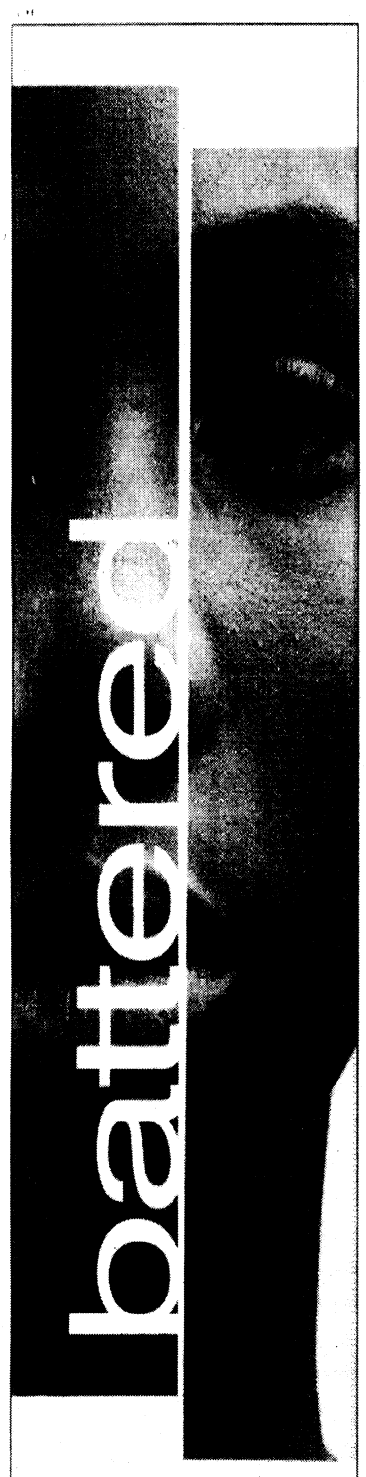
Command Sgt. Maj. Rickey Talley, command sergeant major for the 13th CSB, sat in on the squad's AAR.

He said the training was a great way for the Soldiers to perfect the things that would help them survive.



"Every Soldier will be a rifleman first," Talley said. "We've heard it. You have to be able to suppress the enemy. Unless you know basic soldiering skills, you won't be able to do that."

Talley encouraged the Soldiers to get better at their "soldiering craft," because the better they become as individuals, the better the unit would be.

Soldiering is an outdoor sport," Talley said. "You can't do it at the motor pool, the PX or the snack bar. You have to get out here and put boots on the ground."

Bennett said she was happy with the results of the training exercise.

"Overall, it was very productive," she said. "All the squads had lessons learned and identified different strengths and weaknesses."

MOVIN' ON UP
Single Soldiers settle into family housing

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

Smack dab in the middle of packing up, picking up and moving up, single Soldiers making the move to family housing may not have had a chance to consider the details in the fine print.

More than 100 single Soldiers, private through staff sergeant, from the 29th Infantry Regiment, 11th Infantry Regiment, 988th Military Police Company and various other units said good-bye to their digs in Buildings 17 and 27 this week, leaving behind 80-year-old rooms in dire need of renovation for housing units in McGraw Manor and Indianhead Terrace.

After life in the barracks, a housing unit complete with kitchen, tub, yard and some level of privacy may feel like the jackpot. But this lottery ticket comes with a price tag.

Soldiers moving into housing have a few things to keep in mind as they get settled in, said Pat Burns, chief of Family Housing.

In addition to the barracks rules they should already know (which still apply in housing), the Soldiers will be expected to get familiar with housing's rules.

"The single Soldiers have to follow all the same rules as the family occupants," Burns said.

Although it will be largely up to the units to ensure compliance among their Soldiers, Burns said the Soldiers will all receive housing and Self-Help briefings as they go. Each set of quarters will also come with a Family Housing Handbook.

But there are a few issues these new housing residents should keep in mind as they get set up:

• Reimbursements. As they move from the barracks to family housing, most of the Soldiers are going to run into a few expenses. Transferring phone lines, cable and other optional utilities comes with a fee.

Not to worry, though — they will be reimbursed, Burns said. Initially, it will be an out-of-pocket expense, but once Soldiers have paid the transfer fees, they can bring their proof of payment to Room 121, Building 6, to file for reimbursement.

Because the pay-back will come from DFAS, it will be a direct-deposit and could take up to 30 days, Burns said.

• Pets. One thing Soldiers may be looking forward to as they move into housing is the chance to own a pet. But that might not be such a good idea, Burns said.

The Soldiers were moved to housing for two reasons, Burns said — to boost occupancy rates in housing and to clear out the quarters they previously occupied to allow for renovation.

However, plans are already underway to construct new barracks near Infantry Hall for Soldiers of the 29th Infantry Regt. and the 11th Infantry Regt., Burns said.

"This is a long-term but temporary solution," she said.

So, while the temptation to get a cat or dog may be hard to resist, Soldiers need to keep in mind the possibility that they may not be in housing for the duration of their stay at Benning.

"If they're going to get anything, I would say get a fish or something small they can contain in a room — pocket pets," Burns said.

• Noise policy. Soldiers may be used to an environment where a little noise here and there isn't such a big deal. But in housing, the noise policy is concrete and inflexible.

Residents must keep the noise in their quarters to a level acceptable to their neighbors at all times.

Passersby outside of the house should not be able to hear stereos, TVs or voices from inside, according to the Family Housing Handbook.

Quiet hours are from 10 p.m. to 6:30 a.m.

• Overnight guests. Some Soldiers may be excited at the notion of escaping the visiting hours enforced in the barracks. But that's not exactly the case.

The same rules that applied in the barracks apply in housing, Burns said — that means visiting hours, too. Overnight guests are not allowed.

• Absences of 30 days or more. According to the Family Housing Handbook, Soldiers planning to go on a temporary duty assignment or take off on an adventure that will extend more than 30-days must seek approval from Housing to ensure proper

Get Outta Here

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

Sick of sitting around in the barracks looking at the walls? Need to get the family out of the house or just take a break? We've got the answer for you. 'Get Outta Here' will appear in The Bayonet each week to highlight recreation and leisure venues right here in the tricommunity. If you would like to suggest a hot spot for the column, call Sgt. Kim Dooley at 545-3367.

It's not for the faint of heart, and it's definitely not for the thin-skinned, but The Loft's weekly Comedy Night is as close to the Apollo as you're going to get in Columbus.

Comedy Night features every comic style from animated rants on social issues like racism, stereotypes and, of course, the evils of the opposite sex, to a random but still entertaining motley of jokes covering the gamut.

The comics are amateurs, usually of the Chris Rock variety — loud, slightly vulgar and eager to hit that nerve just to keep you on your toes. But it will get you laughing, and it will keep you interested.

Probably the best part of the act is the comic-crowd interaction (although, God help you if you're sitting directly in front of the stage). Just being in the room, you or someone in your party are fair game to be picked on.

It's a 21 and older show — which makes sense, for those of you who are new to the area, because it is a bar. And being a bar, the crowd can be pretty rowdy, and it can get a little cloudy from the cigarette smoke. But all things considered, those are minor drawbacks.

I've been three or four times in the past year or so, and every time I've been, the line-up has been entertaining. Now, of course, you're going to have your doozies here and there, but I think the risk is worth the $5 cover charge.

There are two shows every Thursday night — a 9 p.m. and an 11 p.m. show — and each show lasts about two hours.

I know, I know — it's a school night, you've got to get up before the crack of dawn for PT the next morning. But if you can't hold out for a four-day weekend, then be aware that the 9 p.m. show requires reservations, and I would make them well in advance. That show always draws a full crowd.

Meanwhile, the 11 p.m. show doesn't require reservations, but I would recommend them. That, or get there at least 45 minutes to an hour early and hang around in the main bar until your name is called.

Let me reiterate that Comedy Night is not a place I would recommend for those of you who are easily offended by foul language, vulgar jokes or stereotypes put to work. It's all part of the act and in good fun, but it can also be in pretty poor taste.

That said, if that stuff doesn't bother you and you're looking for some up-close-and-personal stand-up comedy, this is your cup of tea ... or whatever else you're drinking. (Ooh ... and don't forget your designated driver.)

Mad science gets kids screaming for more

Lori Egan
Bayonet editor

Photos by Lori Egan

Kindergartners Brent McDowell and Kyle Geiser react to Dr. J's "methanol demonstration." The audience gasped as the liquid changed to a gas and a blue flame shot into the air.

Although the students at Dexter Elementary School initially mistook Jason Raines as "the Germanator," by the end of the assembly he was known as Dr. J and the students wanted more science.

Raines, a chemical engineer by vocation but a mad scientist by avocation, demonstrated his passion for science with "Jurassic Snark," a hovercraft and a program called "Up, Up and Away " during an assembly to celebrate the end of the school's annual Terra Nova testing March 12.

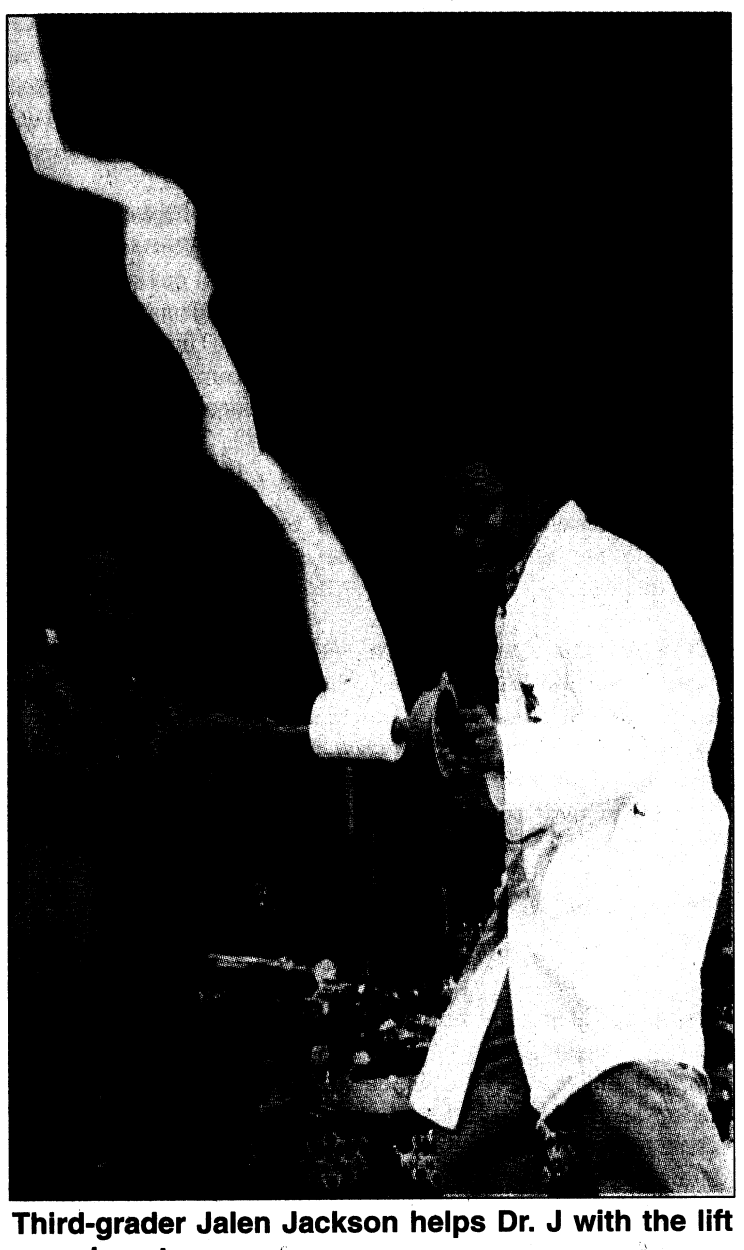
Mad Science, an organization out of Atlanta where Raines is the director of operations, was a perfect follow-up for the school's hands-on science fair because it meshes with the school's science standards while entertaining the students, said Vicki Rogers, Dexter principal.

Typical scientific terms like "hypothesis," "observation" and "experiment" were interspersed with "awesome" and "I wish I could do that!" when Dr. J showed how one's lungs work to propel air with a hair dryer and ping pong balls or how fast moving air causes lift. (This was proved with a plunger, toilet paper and a leaf blower.)

The transformation from chemical engineer to mad scientist didn't involve an experiment gone awry but boredom and four years as a middle school science teacher.

The administration wasn't exactly happy with Raines' teaching techniques.

"I kept getting notes ... 'please don't stand on the tables' or 'you shouldn't use colored Karo syrup for hemoglobin'."



But a mad scientist using a wooden disk, plastic and a leaf blower to make a hovercraft is OK, Raines said. And talking about how a dinosaur would sneeze is just gross enough to keep kids interested, which explains Jurassic Snark.

"This is a neat way to get kids riled up and screaming about science," he said.

Which is just what the kids did.

Although the volunteers were preselected, every time Dr. J asked for a volunteer to help with the next experiment, hundreds of hands shot into the air.

At the end of the assembly, kindergartner Kyle Geiser kept screaming, "Do another experiment!"

Third-grader Jalen Jackson helps Dr. J with the lift experiment.

ASK THE JUDGE

Capt. Steven J. Collins
Office of the Staff Judge Advocate

Q: My husband and I filed a joint tax return, but I do not think I should be responsible for paying all the tax we owe. Is there anything I can do to avoid paying these taxes?

A: The answer to your question depends upon your circumstances. Filing a joint tax return is a decision many taxpayers make because of the tax advantages and benefits connected with a joint return. However, the decision to file a joint return also means that both taxpayers are jointly and individually responsible for the tax and any interest or penalty due on the joint return even if they later divorce. This means that one spouse could be held responsible for all the tax due both this year and any owed in the past.

One way to prevent yourself from paying more than your "fair share" of the tax burden is to apply for injured spouse relief. This relief is appropriate when a joint return is filed and all or part of the refund is (or will be) used to pay one spouse's past-due debts.

These debts include child and spousal support, federal debt and past-due state income tax. The non-injured spouse can claim his or her share of the refund by filling out Form 8379 Injured Spouse Claim and Allocation.

In order to qualify, the injured spouse must have:

No. 1. Filed a joint return

No. 2. Received income

No. 3. Made tax payments

No. 4. Reported the income and tax payments on the joint return

No. 5. All or part of the refund was paid (or will be) to satisfy past due debts of the other spouse.

In addition to claiming injured spouse relief, there are other ways to dissolve joint and several liability.

Innocent Spouse Relief is one method and it must be documented by filing IRS Form 8857 Request for Innocent Spouse Relief (And Separation of Liability and Equitable Relief). Innocent Spouse Relief should be used when one spouse fraudulently or intentionally makes erroneous claims on the joint tax return.

To qualify for innocent spouse relief, you must have:

No. 1. Filed a joint return with an intentional understatement of tax. The total tax that should have been shown minus the tax that was actually shown on the return is the understatement of tax.

No. 2. The understatement of tax must be due to erroneous claims by your spouse. Erroneous claims include any deductions, credits, or bases that are incorrectly stated and any income that is not reported on the return.

No. 3. You must establish that you did not know, and had no reason to know, that there was an understatement of tax when you signed the return. You also have to show that it would be unfair to hold you liable for the understatement of the tax.

No. 4. You must request relief within two years of the date the IRS began collection action against you.

Another method for relief is separation of liability, which calculates the total understatement of tax, interest, and penalties on your joint return and divides it between you and your spouse.

Your division of the understatement of tax is usually the amount of income and deductions attributable from your earnings. To qualify for separation of liability relief, you must have filed a joint return. At the time of your request, you must no longer be married or you must be legally separated from your spouse. You must also have lived apart from your spouse for at least a 12-month period ending on the day you file Form 8857.

Equitable relief is also available if you do not qualify for innocent spouse or separation of liability. The IRS must still determine that it would be unfair to hold you liable for the understatement of tax. The following factors are:

No. 1. Current marital status

No. 2. Any abuse experienced during the marriage

No. 3. If you had any reason to believe that the particular amount of tax was going to be owed at the time you signed the return

No. 4. Your current financial situation

No. 5. Underpayment or understatement attributable to the non-requesting spouse

No. 6. The lack of significant benefits that the requesting spouse will receive.

If you apply for innocent spouse relief first, and are denied relief, you do not need to reapply for the other two categories. The IRS will automatically consider whether any of the other provisions apply.

Both spouses can request liability relief with Form 8857. If only one spouse requests relief, the IRS is required to notify the non-requesting spouse about the request for relief to allow him or her to participate. He or she will also be notified of the determination of the requested relief. However, if the non-requesting spouse chooses not to participate, he or she has no right to appeal the decision. Only if relief is denied and the requesting spouse petitions the U.S. Tax Court, will the non-requesting spouse be given the opportunity to be a party in the proceeding.

Other information about innocent spouse relief can be found in Publication 971, Innocent Spouse Relief (and other relief for joint filers. This publication, forms, and more information can be found on the Internet at www.irs.gov. If you would like to consult with someone regarding your taxes, come by the Fort Benning Installation Tax Center and speak to a tax advisor. The Tax Center is open now through April 15. E-filing is free.

Normal hours of operation are 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Friday, and 10:30 a.m. to 6:30 p.m. Thursday. The tax center will also be open 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. March 27 and April 3 and 10. Call at 545-4267.

WHEN YOU'RE WAITING FOR A TRANSPLANT, WHAT'S MORE IMPORTANT: YOUR MEDICAL STATUS OR YOUR FINANCIAL STATUS?

Contrary to rumors you may have heard, the transplant waiting list is completely blind to wealth or celebrity status. Once you're on the list for a donor organ, what really counts is the severity of your illness, time spent waiting, blood type and other important medical information. Call 1-800-355-SHARE or visit www.shareyourlife.org for honest information on organ donation. And remember, if you want to be a donor, you must tell your family or it may not happen.

Give blood, save lives

Benning blood drive needs donors

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

How many times have you driven past a terrible car accident on the highway? Or seen the story of a child hit by a car or otherwise seriously injured on the news? And how many times have you stopped to ask yourself if there will be enough blood at the hospital to help those people survive?

Lane Brown, a donor recruiter for the Columbus Blood Service, is more than familiar with how much blood it takes to save Georgians' lives.

"We need to collect 1,200 pints of blood a day to keep hospitals at a safe level," she said, adding that, most days, that goal isn't reached.

And in a country where someone needs a blood product every two seconds, meeting the goal is crucial.

"Nine out of 10 people who live to be 72 or older will need at least one blood product in their lives," Brown said. "And what people forget is that the product expires — it's only good for about three days. That's why we need people to keep giving on a regular basis."

To that end, the CBS will conduct a blood drive at Fort Benning Thursday from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m. in Building 359, the Family Unit Network Center on Ingersoll Avenue.

The goal is to collect 36 good pints, Brown said, which means at least 42 to 44 people need to come through and give blood.

On an installation this size, that should be easy, right? Not necessarily.

With stringent blood donor safety restrictions, military personnel, Department of Defense civilians and even some family members are often banned from giving.

DoD restrictions bar DoD-affiliated personnel from donating:

• If, at any time from 1980 through the end of 1996, he or she traveled or resided in the United Kingdom for a cumulative total of three months or more; or if, at any time from 1980 to the present, he or she received a blood transfusion in the U.K.

• If, at any time from 1980 through the end of 1996, he or she traveled or resided anywhere in Europe for a cumulative total of six months or more.

• If, at any time from Jan. 1, 1997, to present, he or she traveled or resided anywhere in Europe for a cumulative total of five years or more.

The restrictions are in place to reduce the theoretical risk of spreading mad-cow disease by way of contaminated blood transfusions.

The precautionary deferrals are indefinite, Brown said, until a test is developed to detect the disease in the blood.

In the meantime, however, anyone 17 or older who weighs at least 110 pounds and is not precluded from donating by these restrictions is direly needed at the blood drive — especially Type O blood donors.

"Type O blood is the universal blood," Brown said. "O positive blood is the most common type of blood, and O negative blood can be transfused to anyone in emergencies when there is not time to find out a patient's blood type."

> "It's hard to get over (the fear of needles). But you have to remember you're helping to save lives."
> Lane Brown
> Donor recruiter,
> Columbus Blood Service

But no matter what your blood type, you are needed, Brown said. Still, many people don't give.

The number one reason — they're scared of needles, Brown said.

"It's hard to get over that fear," she said. "But you have to remember you're helping to save lives."

Three lives, that is — every good pint of blood can save up to three lives.

"That's pretty dramatic," Brown said. "And one day, that blood could save someone in your family."

Transition: Presents new issues

action will be taken in case of emergencies.

This is something to keep in mind for Soldiers going on extended leave or attending military schools — especially if they are between "housemates."

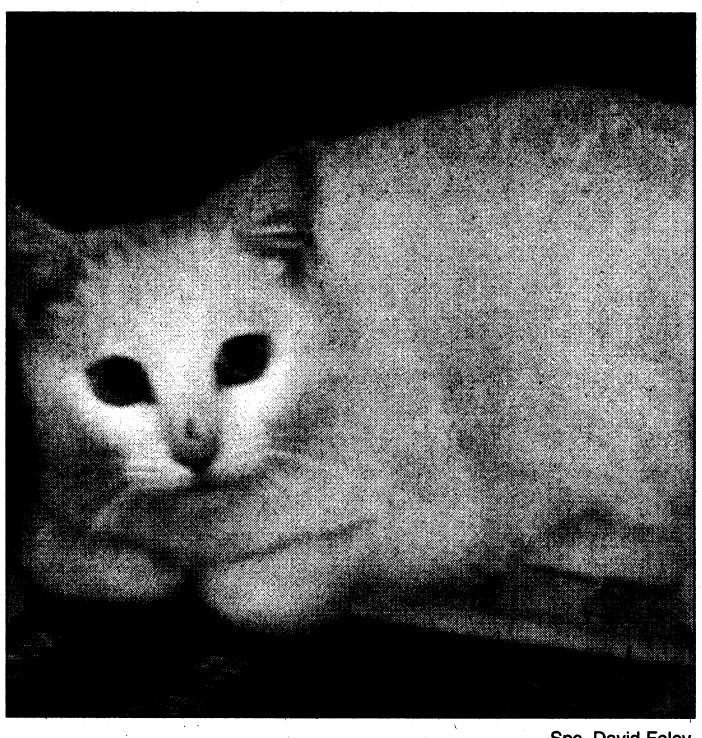
"Absence does not relieve occupants of their responsibilities for their quarters," the handbook states. "The lawn must still be moved, sidewalks shoveled, pets cared for, etc."

Soldiers must arrange for a personal "housewatcher" to make daily inspections of the quarters and report any facility problems. Soldiers should be 100 percent sure their housewatcher is dependable, because the occupant will be held responsible for any unreported problems or damage.

• Lock-outs. The comfort of a short jaunt down to staff duty to pick up keys when you've locked yourself out of your room is a little more complicated in housing.

Housing residents must go to the Housing Office to check out a key during duty hours, and the key must be returned within four hours. Meanwhile, afterhours lock-outs will require military police assistance.

• Satellite dishes. Soldiers must receive approval for satellite dishes through the Family Housing Office. Unless an exception has been approved through the Housing Office, satellite dishes can only be installed in the backyards, according to the handbook.



They cannot be attached to government property, nor can siding be penetrated to run wiring.

Flat coaxial cable must be used to extend satellite wiring through a window or door opening.

• Inoperative vehicles. Much as you love that rusty old junker you've been fixing up in the barracks parking lot, don't anticipate dragging it into post housing.

"Inoperative vehicles will not be parked in housing areas for more than seven consecutive days," the handbook reads. "major repair or maintenance of vehicles is not authorized in the housing area." This includes: removal or changing of engines or transmissions, brake work, body work (painting or sanding), and replacement of the exhaust system. Soldiers can take these projects to the Automotive Self-Help Shop.

Benning students master technology

Hone computer skills with fun, games

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

Hannah Herberlig's feet don't even come close to touching the floor when she sits at the computer desk. But nonetheless, this White Elementary School preK student — along with the rest of the school's youngsters — is becoming quite the computer expert.

Every week, Hannah and her classmates trek over to the school computer lab, where they add a little technological spice to their classroom lessons.

This week, in celebration of National Excellence in Science, Technology and Math Week, students from all grade levels were joined by their parents during their computer lab visit, said Kris Tuten, the school's education technologist.

The visit gives parents a chance to see how the students integrate technology into their daily lessons, Tuten said.

"I coordinate with the teachers to tie in with what they're teaching in their classrooms," Tuten said. "That way, what they do here reinforces and correlates with what they're already learning."

In a day and age when simply pumping your gas requires the use of a computer, familiarizing the children with technology — even at such a young age — is important, Tuten said.

"Most of the children are already using computers at home," she said. "But their (work here) is interesting, challenging and self-paced so they will have success."

That "work" includes lessons that help the students learn the various parts of the computers, work on their reading skills, numbers and comprehension. And it's up to Tuten to make it interesting, which she does by introducing animation, graphics and games to the lesson plan.

"For instance, we'll play Simon Says," Tuten said. "Simon says put your hand on the keyboard, Simon says find the mouse — they have a wonderful time, but they're learning the parts of the computer while they're playing the game."

But it's not all fun and games for Tuten, who is responsible for more than teaching the children how to use the computer.

"The Internet is a big concern for many parents," she said.

To that end, Tuten has set up special icons that lead to specifically designated Web pages she's give the OK. Some of the pages are even her own handiwork — like the page where students get to write a letter to the Easter Bunny by filling in the blanks with their own words.

All of this is good fun for Herberlig, who said she uses the computer at school because "that's how you learn. And it helps you to know how (to use a computer) because there's so many of them."

Herberlig puts her skills to good use at home, playing computer games like Monopoly Jr. and Scooby Dooby Doo with her sister. But it's in the computer lab, "making cats in a row" — an assignment that requires her to count, read letters on the keyboard and learn control functions — where she really becomes a computer whiz.

The students get together monthly for a special reading event like this one, which was followed by lime sherbet floats. Fifth-grade teacher Shelia Brown said her students learn how to be mentors as they help the younger students with their reading skills.

Faith helps us during times of separation

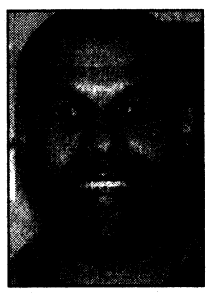
Many people feel a sense of emptiness in their lives during a period of separation from family. The empty feeling can easily be turned into something positive.

In the first place, nothing can fill the gap when we are away from those we love. We must commend our loved ones wholly and unreservedly to God and leave them in his hands, transforming anxiety for them into prayers on their behalf.



The emptiness can be a reminder to pray for them. It is during a time of separation that we should think more deeply about our spiritual lives, on the individual family level.

What can you do each morning? You may find it helpful to begin the day asking God for guidance and strength. The military lifestyle gives us a unique opportunity to experience the peace and grace of God during hard times.

We can work at learning and implementing productive responses that will honor the Lord.

Carol Vandersteeg mentions in his book, When Duty Calls, "that we should pray as if everything depended on God; work as if everything depended on you."

REFLECTIONS

Stover

Vandersteeg quoted Adm. Grady Jackson as saying, "In many ways I've never been closer spiritually to my family than when I've been away from them for extended periods, because those are the times I fully put them into the Lord's hands."

If you are a believer but are not doing anything to nurture your faith, you may find that a daily personal devotional time will help keep you positive and spiritually strong.

Remember that God is with you everywhere you go, even in the most isolated place the military may send you. It is because God is with us that we should never worry, because "All things are possible with God, who strengthens us." You should use time wisely to deepen your relationship with God. Find others who share your faith for friendship and prayer. Maintain a godly lifestyle. It is essential that we communicate with loved ones.

With the support of others and your sense of God's strength within, you will be hard-pressed on every side, yet not crushed; we are perplexed, but not in despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; struck down, but not destroyed... in addition to the strength you may draw from your personal faith, your chapel or place of worship will also be a source of encouragement. God is ready to meet your needs.

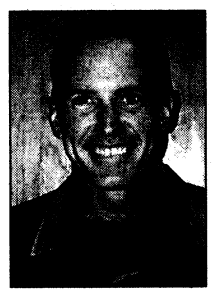
Praise can take different forms

Chaplain (Maj.) Jeffrey Hawkins
Chaplain Family Life Center



"There is no more influential assessment people make, than the judgment they pass on themselves."

That's a fancy way of saying the most important assessment you'll ever make is what you believe to be true about yourself!

I used to think that building self-esteem in my kids was all about "praising" them. Praise them for making their bed, tying their shoes, getting an A, coming in on time, etc. You know the deal. However, I've come to realize that although praising them sure beats criticizing them, it doesn't necessarily build self-esteem. Praise can be a tricky thing — in fact praise can sometimes have unintended effects. Faber and Mazlish in their book, How to Talk So Kids Will Listen, and Listen So Kids Will Talk, give five unintended consequences of simply "praising":

1) Praise can make you doubt the praiser ("she's lying or doesn't know what she's talking about").

2) Praise can lead to immediate denial ("Smart! Hey, you obviously don't know what I did yesterday ...")

Hawkins

3) Praise can cause one to focus on his or her weakness. (I didn't talk well, I never do— I know I can't.)

4) Praise can actually raise anxiety. ("Great hit? Hey, I got lucky. Next time I get up he's going to expect me to hit it again like that.")

5) Praise can be experienced as manipulation ("Sure he's praising me — what does he want?)

Instead of praise as the primary tool for building self-esteem, let's do a cheetah-flip in our heads and think of specifically describing what we've seen or experienced. Here's an example. Let's say your 6-year old brings you a picture and asks, "Is it good?" You might be tempted, as I would be, to say, "Sure, it's beautiful!" However, many times the child will say, "Do you really think so ... you're just saying that ... you don't like it, do you?" If we evaluate it, they tend to question or reject our evaluation. However, if we describe it, they tend to reinforce themselves. Instead we might say, "Well, I see you drew these circles here, and then you made bunch of dots over here, along with some really bold slashes up top." "Yeah," the child says enthusiastically. You can then add, "How'd you ever think to do that?" "Because I'm an artist," he'll say! Mission accomplished.

Bottom line, try using descriptive praise this week ("Andy, I really appreciate the way you took that complicated phone message. It was written so clearly, I knew exactly when to show up for formation and in what uniform ... thanks!) verses Evaluative Praise (Andy, you're great!)

Want some more tips on talking so that your kids will listen? Then come see us at The Chaplain Family Life Center, Building 2606 Soldier's Plaza or call at 545-1760 — we look forward to serving you!

Competition calls turkey talkers

Wild turkey callers perform wild turkey dance

Bridgett Siter
Bayonet staff

If turkey calling isn't the strangest sight you'll ever see, it surely holds a respectable spot in the top 10.

The concept of turkey calling, like turkey hunting, requires the caller to lure the tom with calls similar to those females, or hens, make during the spring mating season. It's actually a natural contradiction, since hens typically chase toms. But, hey, unnatural behavior seems to be the norm, if that's possible, at turkey calling competitions.

Callers are an uninhibited lot, boldly performing their bizarre song and dance for an audience that seldom includes turkeys. They preen and strut and sway. They bob and weave and lurch. They cackle and gobble and coax from their hand-held instruments of seduction a medley of strange skin-curling screeches, not unlike that of a fingernail on a chalkboard. All in an attempt to woo an imaginary bird, or at least convince a panel of judges that — in the event there actually was a wild turkey nearby — theirs is the serenade most likely to succeed.

"It's a blast, and it is humorous. We like to cut up," said Lamar Fussell, the 1984 turkey calling world champion, and Fort Benning's district fire chief.

"We like to show the audience what goes on out there in the woods. It's fun to watch, but it can give you a headache."

Fussell was one of 17 professional turkey talkers to compete in the March 11 calling contest sponsored by the local Rivercity Gobbler's Chapter of the National Wild Turkey Federation. The event, which took place at the firemen's hall at Bull Creek in Columbus, drew callers of all ages and expertise from across the Southeast, more than 50 in all.

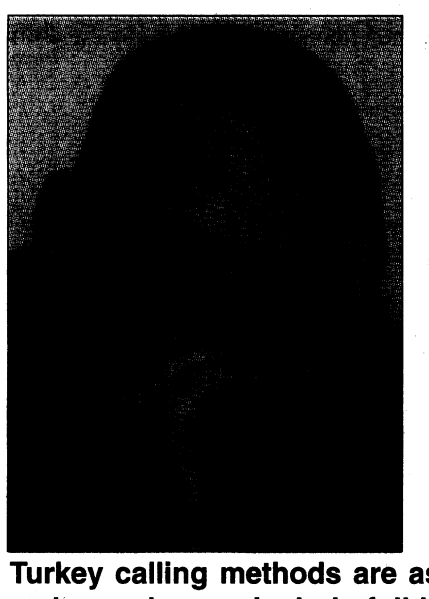
They used various contraptions — tools of the trade — including a diaphragm inserted in the mouth, hand-held boxes that emit noise when the lid is twisted back and forth, and "scrapes," rubbing devices which rely on friction.

And they were judged in five classes; Poult (baby turkey), for children 7 and younger; Juniors, 15 and younger; Hunters, amateur callers; Friction, which relies solely on hand-held devices; and Open, the professionals like Fussell, men who once simply considered turkey calling a means to an end.

The "calling of the turkeys," like the running of the bulls, has evolved into a sport in and of itself and is often more lucrative than that which spawned it. Champion callers can bag thousands of dollars in regional competitions, though the winner of last week's contest, Tom Drake, a Fort Benning fireman, netted merely $800.

Drake, a second generation national champ, bested the Open competition in four areas; the Tree Call, which simulates the sound a turkey might make from its roost on a tree limb; the Fly-down Cackle, which simulates the sounds said turkey might make as it swoops from said tree limb; the Yelp of an Excited Hen, which needs no further explanation; and the Caller's Best, a free-style option.

The wild movements of the wild turkey caller serves a purpose other than entertainment, Fussell said. Serious callers quickly overcome stagefright, and most tend to embellish for the audience's sake.



"The judges sit on the other side of that curtain, maybe with their eyes closed, listening to your call and trying to picture a turkey," he said. "You've got to make it as realistic as possible, and the more you can improve on the movement and the call and the rhythm, the better.

"Turkeys move, so if you want to simulate the sound of a turkey, you better make the sound move."

> "You've got to make it as realistic as possible, and the more you can improve on the movement and the call and the rhythm, the better.
> Turkey's move, so if you want to simulate the sound of a turkey, you better make the sound move."

Jeff Murphy practices turkey calling using a slate and striker between rounds of the Rivercity Gobbler's annual turkey calling competition March 11. Proceeds from the contest benefit the local firefighters' association.

Turkey calling methods are as varied as the sounds they make, and many include full-body turkey struts. Pictured here, callers practice the conservative "cup" as they wait their turn on stage.

Columbus lacrosse begins season with high hopes

One up, three down for Blue Devils

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

Widely regarded as a rough and tough man's sport, lacrosse is a sport where even some of the best players get injured.

But don't tell that to the players of the Columbus High School's women's lacrosse team, who are currently in their first year of varsity competition and are hungry for some action.

"We did well last year, but we want more this year," said senior right attack wing Carisa Huggins. "We want to continue to develop our game and go further than we ever dreamed of."

Last year, the Lady Blue Devils competed, but only as a club team. They finished second in their region and made the playoffs.

This year, the team is part of the second division, and they'll compete against the likes of Woodward Academy, in Cherokee County, Rockdale County High School and lacrosse powerhouse St. Pius X, in Atlanta.

"These girls want to show these teams that they can compete with them," said head coach Shepherd Chuites. "And I know they can, because they have the will and desire to do well in this game."

Katie Graydon, who played for the team last year and is now helping coach the team, said the girls have shown how much they want to win and are willing to work for it on the field.

"I've never seen them not try their hardest," Graydon said. "They continue to show me the heart that it takes to be successful in this sport, and I'm proud of their work ethic."

The Lady Blue Devils began the season with a win over Rockdale County, 13-11, March 3.

Some of the players said winning that game showed them that, by sticking together and playing through the tough times, they can get through anything.

"Rockdale came back on us and tied the game with not much time left," said senior Carson Chuites, left attack wing.

"After they tied the score, we called a timeout and regained our composure. Once we came out of the huddle, we knew what we had to do to win the game. All we had to do was execute."

And execute they did.

The Lady Blue Devils scored two quick goals and won the game.

But the victory was short lived. Columbus dropped their next three games.

And the players said they won't let the defeats get them down.

"We have to remember that this is our first year playing on the varsity level," said junior Shannon Yelverton, defensive wing.

"We know that we are going to take our bumps and bruises in the first few games, but as the season goes on, we'll get better and I believe we will achieve the goals we want to achieve throughout the season."

Huggins said what will help them throughout the rest of the season, is for them to continue to get to know each other.

"We use the time that we travel up to Atlanta as a time to get to know each other," Huggins said. "The more we know about each other, the better our confidence will be in our teammates. Plus, not to mention, it's a long trip up there, so what better thing to do than to continue to build our bonds of friendship."

> "All we have to do is believe in ourselves, then everyone else will catch on and start to believe in us as well."

> Right attack wing

Huggins said everyone can expect good things out of the team this year.

"We'll show everyone that we belong in lacrosse," she said. "All we have to do is believe in ourselves, then everyone else will catch on and start to believe in us as well."

Youth soccer season to kick off

Jonathan Payton, 11, right, moves the ball upfield during practice Tuesday night. Post soccer season starts with games Saturday on French Field.

After months and months of waiting, more than 250 post youths can finally lace up their cleats and get out on the soccer field.

The Youth Services soccer season kicks off Saturday with many children excited about the beginning of the season.

"I'm ready to get out there and play some games," said Emmanuel Payne, 10. "Practicing is fun and all, but I love to compete."

This year the league is comprised of five coed age groups, and games will run until the end of May.

During practice the players have worked on the fundamentals of soccer, including dribbling, passing and shooting.

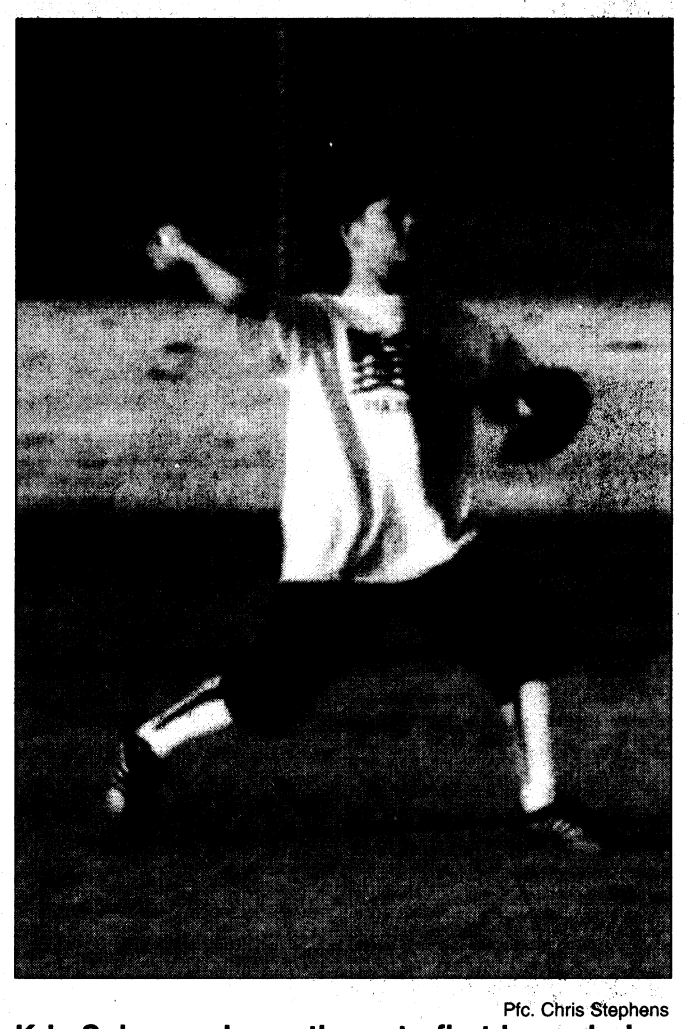
Coach Alan Neyland said playing sports can help teach children vital skills.

"Learning the skills of the game are important," he said. "But, the most important aspect of the game is teamwork. Once they learn that, then they can be successful."

Linda Laine, director of Youth Services, said the coaches play a vital role in determining how successful the season will be.

"The coaches are role-models to these players," Laine said. "They look to them for guidance.

"Also, when the players are out and about on post and they see their coaches, they still call them 'coach,'" she said. "That shows the respect the players have for their coaches and how much their coaches mean to them."



Neyland said what he loves about coaching is encouraging the children.

"Sometimes all the players need is a little encouragement," Neyland said. "They could be having a bad day, and when you encourage them, their day suddenly gets better. That means a lot to them."

All Youth Services soccer games will be held on French Field.

Athletes — Standards compromised?

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

I don't know what it is with all these famous athletes, but somehow they figure because they are rich, they are above the law.

And, to make matters worse, the leagues they're in give them a slap on the wrist for doing wrong and a few games later, they're back on the field making more money.

Take for instance the Vancouver Canucks' Todd Bertuzzi.

Last week, he sucker punched the Colorado Avalanche's Steve Moore from behind, and then slammed his head on the ice and continue to punch him, resulting in a fractured neck.

Bertuzzi did it because a month prior, Moore put a clean hit on the Canucks' star player Markus Nasland that put Nasland out for a few games.

The National Hockey League suspended Bertuzzi for the rest of the season, which is 13 games, and the playoffs.

Now to me, there seems to be a different standard for athletes. Sure, Bertuzzi can get tearful and say he is sorry, but that doesn't change what he did.

If I did the same thing, could I say I'm sorry and just get suspended from work for 15 days? Because I sure could use the vacation.

But, I don't think that would fly with the authorities. If I did the same thing on the street, I would be facing an aggravated battery charge, which carries a 15- to 20-year sentence.

Now take into account the Kobe Bryant rape trial. He's a high-profile athlete with a lot of money.

At the beginning, he said he never had sex with the girl. Then, after evidence was found that he did, he changed his story. He did, but it was consensual.

Hmm . . . sounds a little fishy to me.

I'm sure when he's convicted of the crime, all he'll get is a slap on the wrist. They'll probably sentence him to a couple of months in jail, which will be during the off-season, so he doesn't miss any playing time.

If it were you or me, we would be punished 10 to 20 years at a minimum.

Now, what about all of these athletes who get caught doing drugs? I know they get fined, but why don't they get jail time like the rest of us would?

Yeah, they might be put on probation, but when they break their probation, they just get another fine and probation starts all over.

They usually don't serve jail time until the third or fourth offense. I guarantee by the second time, I wouldn't see any daylight except through bars in a jail cell.

So, why is it that athletes are held to a different standard? Are they really that special? Should we baby them in society because they have money? Why should they be treated any differently than the "average Joe?"

I believe we should send a message to all athletes. If they break the law, they'll be treated like everyone else.

They should serve jail time, regardless of how long it is, because they broke the law. Who cares if they have a lot of money? They were wrong, and I think it is time they started living up to the same standard every other citizen does.

Fort Benning CID is requesting the assistance in locating Night Vision Goggles lost March 15 in the vicinity of the Recycle Center on Cusseta Road. Anybody with information, should call the CID office at 545-5238 or the MP desk at 545-5222.

Prescribed burn near goal

Melissa House

A burn site smolders along Dixie Road, near Dianda Range, Tuesday.

Melissa House
Bayonet staff

Nearly one-third of Fort Benning's longleaf pine acreage has already gone up in smoke. And that's a good thing.

Every year since 1985, the Land Management Branch has steadily increased the number of acres being maintained on a two- to four-year prescribed burn cycle.

The goal for this prescribed burn season, which began Dec. 1, was to burn about 35,000 acres.

"We're almost done," said Bob Larimore, chief of the LMB. "With three good weeks of weather in a row, we can cover a lot of ground."

Most areas are managed on a three-year cycle, he said, but some areas were bumped up to two years because of the longleaf pine density. Other areas, like research sites, can go four years between burnings.

When scheduling the burns, Larimore said the first priority goes to military training. After training, the weather conditions, presence of endangered species or any construction projects, or timber harvests are also considered.

The prescribed burning, Larimore said, eliminates fire fuels like grasses and pine straw from the areas, thereby lessening the impact of wildfires. In 1985, there were almost 600 wildfires on Fort Benning, when less than 10,000 acres were managed by controlled burning. Last year, with the help of a wet spring, there were only 14 wildfires.

"This whole area was maintained by fire through history," Larimore said. "But by reducing the fuels, it's less catastrophic, and there's less smoke impact under our conditions and it perpetuates the ecosystem."

Larimore said the number of wildfires includes those started by military training, but said they now only need to suppress a few of the fires and allow many of them to burn themselves out.

This year, Larimore believes there were at least 10 arson fires set along roads in the northeastern section of post on March 8. The LMB reported the fires to the military police

"We know they were arson because they were set along the roads and there was no training going on," Larimore said.

One fire might have gone unreported, he said, but the 10 fires were unusual.

Waste site found on post

Spc. Nikki St. Amant
Bayonet staff

A ravine on Main Post and the area surrounding it was recently identified as an orphan waste site.

An orphan waste site is an illegal landfill or dump site which cannot be tied to an individual or organization.

The ravine, which serves as a natural collection point for runoff water from adjacent paved areas, feeds a tributary of the Chattahoochee River when it rains.

Two Soldiers stumbled upon the site while walking in the woods and reported it.

The post sergeant major, Command Sgt. Maj. Mike Kelso, the garrison sergeant major, Command Sgt. Maj. Donald Fortson, and the garrison commander, Col. Rick Riera, all surveyed the site the day it was reported.

The ravine is littered with a myriad of refuse, including vehicle parts, fuel cans, scrap metal and hundreds of tires.

The forested area surrounding the water-course is spotted with large discarded water blister bags, hundreds of kevlar helmet liners, parachutes, more tires and vehicle parts, 55-gallon drums, storage containers and other unidentifiable refuse.

John Brent, chief of the Environmental Division of the Directorate of Public Works, said the discovery of the site comes as no surprise. He said the division is currently managing more than a dozen similar sites around post.

Decaying vehicle parts at an orphan waste site leak contaminants into a tributary that feeds the Chattahoochee.

Brent said units, residents and directorates dug countless landfills or used natural depressions in the landscape, such as the ravine, for waste disposal areas for years before environmental regulations were established. Many were filled in with no plan to manage the settling of the contents or the potential environmental hazards.

In some cases, the sites can cost taxpayers millions of dollars to manage. Brent said a landfill in Harmony Church cost the Post hosts RCI site visit

Lori Egan
Bayonet editor

In the quest to improve housing for Soldiers on Fort Benning, the post's Residential Communities Initiative Office hosted a site visit Tuesday for more than 50 interested developers.

The reason — the Army wants to get out of the housing business, and RCI is the means to the end.

The plan calls for Fort Benning to transfer its housing inventory to a developer. In return, the developer receives the Soldiers' basic housing allowance for providing families with quality, affordable and safe housing.

Col. Rick Riera, garrison commander, introduced Brig. Gen. Benjamin Freakley, commanding general, to the developers as a man who spent his career living in substandard housing.

Freakley talked about the "double-wide" he lived in as a battalion commander at Fort Hood, Texas, and how his family spent $300 on landscaping right after they moved in.

He told the developers that Soldiers deserve better than living in quarters that need serious repair and instead are

Two Soldiers lose battles with cancer

Community Life SGM hailed as 'ultimate Soldier'

Bridgett Siter
Bayonet staff

"Before the Army even wrote its values, Ronnie Porter lived them," said Col. Rick Riera, Monday, at the funeral of Sgt. Maj. Ronnie Porter, a career artilleryman who took control of Fort Benning's Community Life Program two years ago.

Porter

Porter, 48, died March 18 at the Eisenhower Medical Center in Fort Gordon, Ga., following a long battle with cancer. He was buried in the Main Post Cemetery.

Riera, Fort Benning's garrison commander, called Porter "the ultimate Soldier ... one who lived the Soldier's Creed."

Porter never surrendered, Riera

Former Best Ranger 'fought to the end'

One member of the Ranger family will be missed during next month's Best Ranger competition. Sgt. 1st Class Eric Riley, 39, who was recently medically retired, died from appendix cancer March 13.

Riley, a five-time competitor, won the Best Ranger competition in 1998 with (then) Sgt. 1st Class Thomas Smith.

RELAY FOR LIFE

Come walk with me

Bridgett Siter
Bayonet staff

Around this time every year, I start thinking about the American Cancer Society's Relay For Life, and who it is I'll be walking for — who I'll be remembering or praying for as I circle that track again and again. And each year I add a couple of new names to the list. But thankfully, my list has always been relatively short.

Until now.

Suddenly that list — that mental record I keep of the names of those I've known who've been victors over or victims of cancer — suddenly it doubled in a matter of weeks.

This year, it seems, I'll be dedicating every lap to a different person. And it hurts.

The first lap I'm reserving for Sgt. Maj. Ronnie Porter, whose death last week took many of us by surprise. Sure, I knew he was battling cancer, but the smile on his face and the strength in his voice belied the severity of his condition. Or maybe I just didn't want to see it.

As the Community Life officer, the man responsible for the folks who manage post neighborhoods, Ronnie left his mark on Fort Benning. He made many changes and improvements that will continue to have positive effect on the way we live here on post. He'll be sorely missed.

I'll be walking for Kathy Fritz, who lost her battle with cancer last month. Kathy was a leading contender for Coolest-Mom-On-The-Block every year when I was growing up in Kokomo, Ind.

She was the mother of one of my best friends, and looking back, I realize that Kathy was a big part of the attraction, the reason I loved to spend the night at the Fritz house, which was always filled with laughter. Kathy was only 56 when she died.

I'll be walking for Big Daddy, the grandfather of one of my coworkers. I've never met him, but I've been a fan ever since Erin shared this insight from Big Daddy: "The world is 99 percent ignorant," he says, and I hardily agree. I'll be walking and praying for Big Daddy, because the world can't afford to lose even one of the other one percent.

I'll be walking for Sharon Sharp, my stepmom, who lost her youngest brother Eddie to cancer last month — one of those deaths that leave the survivors with no sense of comfort, no sense of "he was ready to go." No, at 56, Eddy didn't want to go, and his poor mother and sister are still reeling from the loss. There's no salve for that kind of pain.

I'll be walking for my friend Linda Turner, who lost her daughter Katie to a rare form of cancer three years ago. Yep, three years ago. The way I figure, being a mother and all, some pains never heal, and the loss of a child is incomprehensible. Each year, I pray for Linda as I circle that track.

I'll be walking for Jennifer Riley, whom I've never met. But we have a couple of things in common, Jen and I. We're both proud wives of Rangers with four children each. Jen lost her Ranger to cancer March 13, and I can't begin to imagine what life is like at the Riley house now. I'll pray for that family as I circle the track.

I'll be walking for my friend Bill Brickner, who was recently diagnosed with prostate cancer. He's believing his vigilant doctor caught it early enough. I'll keep my fingers crossed and pray. And I'll walk an extra lap for Bill.

And finally, I'll walk a lap for someone whose name I do not know and maybe never will. I'll walk for whomever it is that's sitting in a doctor's office somewhere this very minute, hearing the words they dread the most. "It's cancer." Because until we find a cure, cancer will continue to kill.

Join me May 14 and 15 at Kinnett Stadium in Columbus for the the Relay for Life, and let's see if we can't generate a little money to help fund the war on cancer.

To join a team or start one of your own, call 324-4573.

Where's the welcome wagon?

Spc. Eliamar Castanon
Bayonet staff

I'm proud to say that growing up, I was the chairman of the neighborhood "welcome committee."

Anytime a new family moved into my block, I would run over there and volunteer myself (as well as the other 10 kids playing with me), to help unload the new family's belongings.

I also let them know what days the street sweeper, the trash truck and the county ticket lady drove by our block to help them avoid future headaches. Our help was always rewarded with ice cream or cookies.

I lived in the same neighborhood most of my life and when the crew and I grew out of my "welcoming committee" years, my younger siblings took over.

I moved only four times growing up and there was always someone to welcome me into my new house, which was conveniently located a block away from my old one. So moving was always a nice experience — up until two weeks ago.

I'm one of the single Soldiers who has recently moved into the post's family housing areas. Hooray for me!

I was really looking forward to my new kitchen, living room, back yard and the sound of kids playing outside.

That is, until "the kids playing outside" suddenly turned into a little boy standing across the street with his arms crossed making mean faces at me.

Needless to say, I wasn't feeling the love from the welcoming committee, not that there should have been one, but the excitement of my move into a new neighborhood was suddenly dampened.

Then my roommate told me about a neighbor who threatened to have her car towed if she parked in the fire lane again. Not to defend the illegal parking, but really, all that was necessary was a "Hey, you shouldn't park there anymore."

My next door neighbor was polite enough to point out that I was parked in his parking space and that we all had assigned parking spaces.

Hey, thanks a lot, neighbor, I appreciate the information and politeness.

There's no harm done in simply asking instead of threatening.

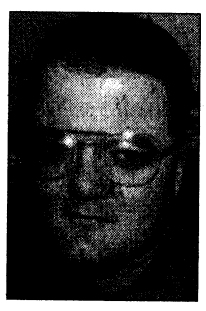
I understand, as well as most of the single Soldiers, that we aren't very welcome by the families living in housing areas. But really, what's the big deal?

Why can't we be looked at as just new neighbors? Why is there such an issue because we're single Soldiers? What's the threat?

We aren't here to cause any trouble; we just want to have a place we can call our own, a place we can invite a few friends to have a barbecue, a place where we can bake a cake, for crying out loud!

Those married Soldiers who lived the barracks life once upon a time know how bad barracks life can be, so cut us a break.

Just relax. Don't think of us as any different. We're not going to terrorize the neighborhood. We have the same responsibilities as the families in housing and are expected to maintain good behavior while we're here.



If there's a problem with any Soldier, including me, communication is the key. Just talk to us. We aren't foreigners. We speak the same language.

So hey new neighbors, we're here to stay — at least for a little while — so let's all take a chill pill and enjoy our stay in the Fort Benning family housing areas.

Home, sweet home.

If kindergarten teachers ran the world

Master Sgt. Paul J. Ebner
USAIC Public Affairs Office

Can you remember your kindergarten teacher's name? I can. Her name was Mrs. Darby and she had an assistant named Mrs. Wonneberger, who I hope will forgive me for the massacre I'm sure I just inflicted upon her name.

Mrs. Darby ruled the classroom with an iron fist and wielded her weapons of "time in the corner" and "calling your parents" with the skill and agility of a ninja.

Despite the fact she demanded we behave like young ladies and gentlemen (can you imagine?), I had a lot of fun. I also remember learning important life lessons that I still try to apply to my daily life. It's true — all you ever really needed to know you learned in kindergarten.

It's amazing how applying kindergarten concepts to almost any situation will make it better for everyone involved.

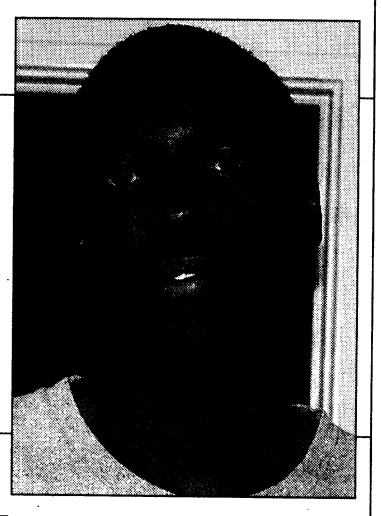
For instance, I wonder how others would behave if Mrs. Darby ran the gas station. I know exactly how she would expect me and the other three to behave.

First, she would demand straight orderly lines going in one direction. There would be no pushing, and keep your hands to yourselves! "Cutting" would not be tolerated and it would surely get you sent to the end of the line.

I think Mrs. Darby would find talking in your indoor voice acceptable, but playing loud music — especially loud music laced with profanity — while waiting in line would earn you a trip to the end of the line and some time in the corner for being inconsiderate. She'd probably want to wash your speakers out with soap, too, and then — oh horror! she would call your parents.

She would remind those finished pumping gas that shopping while parking at the pump is rude and inconsiderate of others waiting in line. Pulling ahead to a parking space would be the polite and right thing to do. Before pumping gas, she'd say, pull ahead to the furthest available pump, so that others may have their turn.

If you do get stuck waiting for somebody to move, being rude and shouting obscenities at that person will only get you sent to the corner of the room opposite from him or her. Or worse yet, you may be forced to spend the rest of the day side-by-side, "glued" to that person everywhere you go. And if you were really rude, you might find yourself at the end of — yes, that's right — the lunch line!!



Hmm … what if kindergarten teachers ran the world?

Thunder in Valley air show takes flight

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

"It's raining men.
Hallelujah! It's raining men.
Every specimen
Tall, blonde, dark and mean
Rough and tough and strong and lean ..."

It's Raining Men
Weather Girls

Many a girls' prayers were answered this weekend, when lean, green fighting machines fell from the skies of Columbus.

These Soldiers drawing "oohs and aahs" from an excited crowd were all part of the annual Thunder in the Valley Air Show Saturday and Sunday at the Columbus Metropolitan Airport.

Fort Benning Rangers fast-roped onto the tarmac from hovering helicopters for Rangers in Action demonstrations, and Fort Bragg's Golden Knights gave an awe-inspiring free-fall demonstration.

Jonathan Dreelin, 7, couldn't think of anything better to do with his day. Sporting head-to-toe camouflage, Jonathan explored the air show Saturday afternoon with his father, Dennis, brother, Andrew, and family friend, Jack Norman. But one day wasn't enough for these boys — they came back Sunday for more.

The trio climbed around on military equipment, took in all the aeroacrobatics they could handle and even got airborne in a HUEY helicopter. But for Jonathan, nothing beat the Golden Knights.

"Watching them fallin' out of the sky at really fast speeds ... that was the best part," he said, adding that he might just have to try it himself some day.

Dennis, a retired Navy officer, was more than happy to chaperone the boys at the air show.

"It's wonderful to see all the planes and people out here," he said. "This is just great patriotism, and we're big believers."

Meanwhile, Soldiers from other units around post manned static displays, giving visitors a hands-on peek at what it is today's Soldiers are doing.

Staff Sgt. Robert Osburn spent his time at the air show introducing visitors to the Army's antiarmor weapon systems.

The B Company, 2nd Battalion, 29th Infantry Regiment, Soldier said bringing Benning out to the event was a public relations venture of sorts — a way to keep the post's relationship with its surrounding communities healthy.

"It gives us a closer working relationship with the civilians," Osburn said. "And it gives them a better understanding of the military. And as a taxpayer, I would want to know how my dollars are being put to work."

Of course, many of the curious onlookers weren't taxpayers at all, but rather children jumping at the chance to play with sniper rifles (not loaded, of course), 50-cals and the like.

Osburn spent the better part of his day breaking down the technicalities of a thermal camera for a command launch unit to eager, little boys.

"They get pretty impressed," he said. "It lets them have a little hands-on."

While they weren't getting to know Fort Benning Soldiers or pawing around in Fort Benning's Stryker, Bradley Fighting Vehicle or HUEY helicopter, event-goers took advantage of the chance to peek at the inner workings of a variety of aircraft. Everything from the only flying B-29 in the world (100 feet long with a wingspan of 141 feet — that's half a football field) to military aircraft to one of the Wright brothers' first line of exhibitionary planes were front and center.

Dana Smith, a retired aviator who now spends his days traveling to air shows across the country, was proud to share a Wright brothers B-EX, built by the duo in 1911. The "EX" in the plane's name stands for exhibition, as this was one of a few planes the Wrights sent around the country to introduce Americans to the fantasy of flight.

"Most of the people who saw an airplane for the first time (back then) saw one of these things," he said, patting the plane's wooden wing.

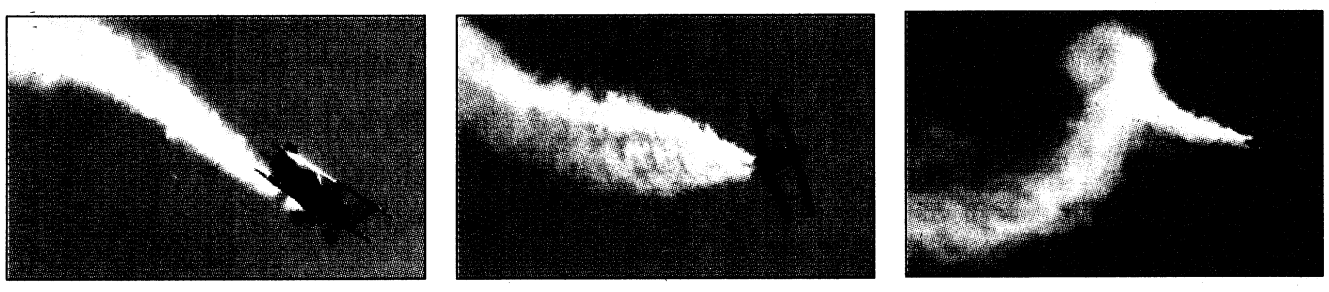
The plane has another distinction, Smith said — it was also the first plane to complete a transcontinental flight.

Cal Rogers, a famed historical pilot, flew the plane from Long Island, N.Y., to Long Beach, Calif., and it only took him 84 days, Smith said.

Photos by Sgt. Kim Dooley

Staff Sgt. Robert Whitely buckles his daughter, Marah, 3, into a helicopter at the Thunder in the Valley Air Show Sunday.

That was 49 days to Pasadena, Calif., where Rogers was hospitalized for more than a month after an accident, and three days on to Long Beach once he recovered.



But he made pretty good time, considering the plane only goes about 25 miles per hour for about 30 miles at a time, Smith said.

Smith has flown the historic air craft at more than 100 air shows and said it's never made him nervous, even though it can reach up to 10,000 feet.

"To me it's just like doing anything else," he said. "Besides, it's probably safer than when I drive."

For those who missed all the fun and excitement this time around, it's not the end of the world. There's always next year.

Reserve CG visits, talks of change to come

Spc. Nikki St. Amant
Bayonet staff

The commanding general of the U.S. Army Reserve Command, Washington D.C., visited Fort Benning Saturday.

Lt. Gen. James Helmly arrived at Lawson Army Air Field and was greeted by the post comanding general, Brig. Gen. Benjamin Freakley, the garrison commander, Col. Rick Riera, and other post officials.

Helmly first visited the 2145th Garrison Support Unit, a reserve unit from Nashville, Tenn., which has been mobilized and active here since January 2003.

He promoted Majs. Tharrel Kast and Bill Powell to lieutenant colonel in a short ceremony before a town-hall meeting with the Soldiers.

During the meeting, Helmly discussed many issues, including the media's constant debate over the necessity of the war in Iraq.

"Let me tell you what I think now, as a Soldier," Helmly said. "I've not seen one war, either read about it or participated in it, that everybody unanimously said, 'This is a good war.' In fact, I would tell you they're all bad, because people die in them and things get destroyed. But it is a fact, a fact of life. We can all pray and hope that one day we'll live in a world without war. But until then, I'm fond of the saying that says, 'You and I have to deal with the world as it is, not as we would like it to be.'"

Helmly talked about the current state of the Army Reserve, as well as the direction it is headed in the future. He referenced current and future operational tempos and described a need to transform the Reserve from a force organized for massive linear mobilization to one that is flexible and expeditionary in nature.

He described a new organizational structure to be gradually introduced during the next five to seven years. The new structure's goal is to provide some level of predictability to the average Reserve Soldier's reasonable expectation of mobilizations by organizing reserve units into a five-year rotation plan.

The new system would break the reserve force into five "packages." Units in package one can expect to be mobilized at any time, while units in package two would be relatively certain they wouldn't mobilize for about four years, when they cycle through to package one again.

Reserve Soldiers will be able to expect mobilization for a nine-month to one-year period every four to five years.

Soldiers in package five will not be able to retire or ETS from the Reserves until they are back in package two or three.

The new system, Helmly said, is designed to stabilize the reserve force and give Soldiers predictability and time to complete NCO Education Systems and officer development courses, along with other professional development actions.

The commander of the 2145th, Col. Daniel Schultz, said he fully supports Helmly's initiative and believes it will improve total Army readiness by ensuring units in the ready-to-mobilize phase of the five-year cycle are truly fully ready to mobilize and deploy.

Reserve Soldiers, Helmly said, cannot reasonably sustain the current operational tempo. He said they, as well as active-duty Soldiers, have to be given the opportunity to go home and reconnect with family and rest for periods of time, or morale, readiness, efficiency and retention all suffer.

Schultz said the 2145th was mobilized for one year, but was involuntarily extended in December for another six months, despite the fact that 80 of the 131 personnel volunteered to extend. He said he is proud of his Soldiers' motivation, and he has managed to handle individual problems that have arisen because of the mobilization with little impact on the unit's mission so far. But, he said, he agrees with Helmly that the system needs to change to alleviate stress and the impact of reserve commitments on families, individuals and civilian employers. Helmly also addressed the importance of the Army values during his speech.

He cited situations in U.S. detention centers in Iraq where detainees have been brutalized and the Soldiers who reported the mistreatment were ignored by the chain of command.

He also cited instances of sexual assault against female Soldiers, who were told by their commanders, "What do you want me to do about it if you can't identify the assailant?"

He described situations involving Soldiers whose conditional promotions were revoked because they could not complete necessary NCOES training within the prescribed time period because of deployment and questioned why such matters are making it all the way through the chain of command to his desk without any commanders in the chain having the personal courage to rectify the situation.

Helmly challenged the Army leadership to live up to their sworn oath. He demanded those charged with leadership duties restore the faith of Soldiers in their command and its ability and willingness to respond to the needs of Soldiers underneath them.

Helmly watched Reserve Soldiers conducting theater specific individual readiness training at a CONUS Replacement Center range and then spent time with the Soldiers discussing the new packaging system.

Helmly then conducted a walk-through of the CRC facilities and ate lunch at the CRC dining facility before departing for Lawson Army Air Field and a flight home.

Former Old Guard Soldiers donate uniform to museum

Bridgett Siter
Bayonet staff

Everything old is new again at the National Infantry Museum.

The 3rd Infantry Regiment, the Old Guard unit that keeps reinventing itself, will soon have a place in the spotlight at the museum.

"We're the Home of the Infantry, and the Third Infantry was the first infantry unit," said Frank Hanner, the museum director. "Stands to reason we ought to have something on display to honor the Old Guard."

Hanner's long-time desire to honor the nation's oldest regiment was fulfilled Tuesday when Command Sgt. Maj. Michael Bergman, a former Old Guard regimental sergeant major, and Staff Sgt. Steven Lee, a former sentinel at the Tomb of the Unknowns, presented the museum with an Old Guard uniform.

"I'm enamored with it," said Hanner, as he gazed at the Dress Blues, decked out with the ribbons and awards Lee wore in his two and a half years on guard detail. Bergman, the U.S. Army Infantry School sergeant major, completed the ensemble with a standard issue hat, sunglasses and white gloves.

"I couldn't be prouder. This is your museum," Hanner said to Bergman and Lee, "and you do us honor by sharing this with the people of Fort Benning."

The 3rd Inf. Regt. was called the 1st American Regiment when it stood up June 3, 1784. In 1815, it became the 3rd U.S. Infantry. It was deactivated in 1946, reactivated two years later, and named Honor Guard to the President in 1952.

Since then, it's continually evolved, adding first a drill team, then a fife and drum corps, a Commander-in-Chief's Guard and a military police company.

The Old Guard, headquartered at Fort Myer, Va., is now chiefly a ceremonial unit, the only U.S. Army unit with an official historic uniform, its own field music, and the only one to use horses in performance of its official duties.

Bridgett Siter

Staff Sgt. Steven Lee makes last-minute adjustments to the Old Guard uniform he donated to the National Infantry Museum Tuesday.

Old Guardsmen maintain an around-the-clock vigil at the Tomb of the Unknowns in Arlington National Cemetery, where they conduct more than 1,500 funeral details each year.

It was while on assignment at Arlington that Lee, now the Infantry Training Brigade's drill sergeant of the year, met Bergman.

The two met again at Fort Benning last year, and when Hanner expressed a desire to have something on display from the Old Guard, Bergman and Lee set about putting a uniform together.

"There's a lot of history in that uniform — and a lot of work," said Bergman.

The highly polished, neatly pressed uniform of an Old Guardsman takes nearly two hours to prep for duty, he said.

"The Old Guard represents the Army," Bergman said. "It's all about tradition and history and duty."

The uniform will be carefully catalogued and preserved before it's put on display, a meticulous and time-consuming process, Hanner said.

"It's important that we document and label and take care to preserve not just the uniform, but the historical information about the uniform," he said. "It'll take a little while, but we've finally got something from the Old Guard, and that's a step forward."

German Liaison Office donates to fallen troops

Spc. Eliamar Castanon
Bayonet staff

When 2nd Battalion, 69th Armor Regiment, came back from its deployment in support of Operation Iraqi Freedom, they were short three Soldiers.

Pvts. Gregory Huxley and Kelley Prewitt and Staff Sgt. Terry Hemingway were killed in action last April.

While the unit was still deployed, a mission began back home to make sure these Soldiers were not forgotten.

"Watching the news one night, a reporter on FOX News forgot Private Jessica Lynch's name when she was all over the news," said Teresa Sanderson, coordinator of the memorial garden. "I thought of our Soldiers and decided we needed to do something that would ensure they were not forgotten."

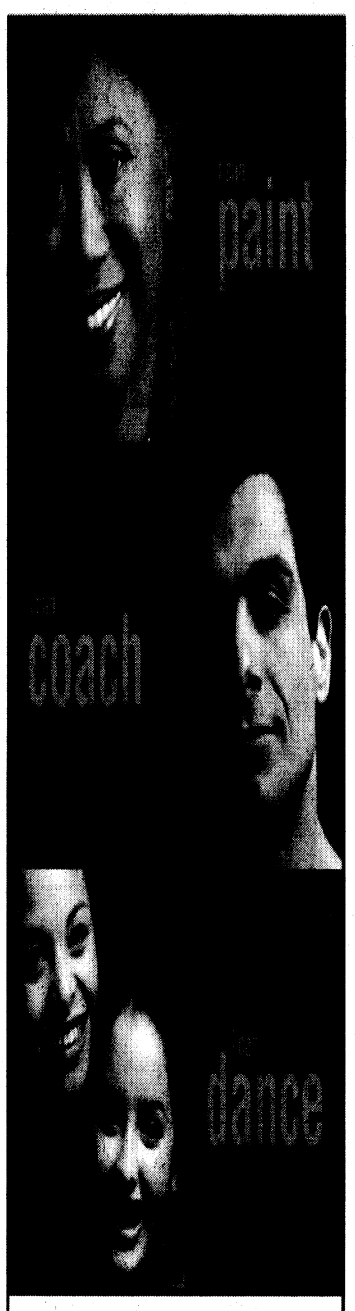
On Sept. 11, 2003, 2nd Bn., 69th Armor Regt., dedicated a memorial garden with a tree for each Soldier, as well as three rooms in the battalion's headquarters building named after each of the Soldiers, said Capt. Collin Donlin, battalion assistant operations officer.

Soon after the dedication of the garden, the post's German Liaison Office celebrated the annual Oktoberfest, but decided to do something special during their celebration for fallen Soldiers.

"The Oktoberfest is an annual celebration in Germany when we celebrate the end of the harvest," said Lt. Col. Herbert R. Sladek, German army liaison officer. "It's a time to eat and drink good authentic German food and beer."

Last year, however, the German liaison office set out to raise money for the families of Fort Benning Soldiers killed in action.

"I put a five-liter steinkrug on the table and told everybody I wanted them to fill it up with money by the end of the night to help out Soldiers," Sladek said.



The steinkrug, a large stone mug used in Germany to serve beer, was filled with $250.

"We didn't know how to find a Soldier or a family that needed the money, so we talked to the garrison commander, Colonel Rick Riera, and he directed us to the 2nd Battalion, 69th Armor Regiment, and their memorial garden," said Sgt. Maj. Manfred Jerabek, German army liaison sergeant major.

Sladek and Jerabek presented Lt. Col. Jeffrey Sanderson, 2nd Bn., 69th Armor Regt. commander, with a $250 check in a ceremony March 19 at the battalion headquarters building.

"This donation is greatly appreciated by all of us at the 2nd Battalion, 69th Armor Regiment, and will allow us to buy more flowers to keep up the garden," Sanderson said.

"It's important to always remember those Soldiers who have lost their lives defending our country," he said.

Airborne troopers remember Operation Varsity

Bridgett Siter

John Cobb, who served with the 17th Airborne Division during World War II, pauses to remember his fallen comrades, the 1,100 troopers killed during Operation Varsity, the largest and most deadly airborne assault in U.S. history.

Bridgett Siter
Bayonet staff

John Cobb made a tactical error. In 1944, the 17-year-old high school junior told his study hall teacher to go to hell.

Her husband was the president of the draft board in Bridgeton, N.J. Cobbs was drafted the day he turned 18.

After basic training and Airborne School at Fort Benning, Cobbs was shipped to Europe to join the Allied Forces. He was assigned to the 513th Parachute Infantry Regiment and "dropped into" the tail end of the Battle of the Bulge, where the 17th Airborne Division lost nearly half its troops. Cobb's C Company had only 17 men.

"Here I was in school, with war the farthest thing from my mind, and then suddenly I'm in the middle of War World II," recalled Cobbs, Wednesday. He joined 25 fellow 17th Division veterans on Fort Benning's Fryar Drop Zone, where 100 Soldiers from the 1st Battalion (Airborne) 507th Parachute Infantry Regiment conducted a mass tactical jump to commemorate the 59th anniversary of Operation Varsity

On March 24, 1945, 3,917 aircraft carrying American and British troops unfurled what has been called "a 200-mile airborne carpet over the skies" of Europe. More than 14,000 troops descended behind the Rhine River into the heart of the German defense near the town of Wesel.

The Germans outnumbered the Allies 10 to one.

No matter. Operation Varsity, which has never been matched in size, shook the war-weary Germans, whose resources were sorely depleted. Later, a German prisoner of war was quoted as saying, "They never told us they were going to drop the whole damn U.S. Army on us."

All told, the Allies took more than 2,800 German prisoners that day. Nearly 1,100 U.S. and British troops were killed and 522 wounded in what remains the single worst day in airborne history.

Despite its tremendous loss, the 17th Division secured all its objectives in less than four hours, and Operation Varsity was declared a success, ushering the Allies to eventual victory.

For 19-year-old Sgt. Eugene Howard, it was "an experience of a lifetime, like no other."

Howard had seen action on Utah Beach as a combat engineer. That experience proved extremely frustrating, Howard said. As an engineer he "couldn't shoot back," so after the battle, in what he called "an unguarded moment of unwarranted optimism," Howard volunteered for duty with the 17th Division.

"And I never regretted a day of it," he said, despite the massive loss of Allied Forces during Operation Varsity and despite the five times he came "within inches" of losing his life.

"We were young men. We didn't have any sense," Howard said with a laugh.

Then he grew serious.

"We knew we were there for a reason. They showed us pictures of German death camps, pictures of bodies stacked up by the ovens," he said. "I'll never forget that image."

"Those images" haunt Howard when he hears people disparaging the role of American forces in the war on terrorism.

"I have a lot of strong feelings about that," he said. "There are people out there who hate us, and the only thing they understand is force.

"People who think we can write a letter telling our enemies we love them and we want them to be nice, those people aren't living in the real world. Not the world we saw."

Soldier fights injuries for Ranger School

Spc. Nikki St. Amant
Bayonet staff

The tan beret. The scroll. The standards that defy most mortal men. Those are the signatures of a brotherhood earned with sweat and toil and consecrated in blood on the lonely battlefields of the world.

The elite ranks of Army Ranger units are filled with men who were faced with tests of unimaginable proportion and succeeded despite the odds.

Spc. Akili King, Headquarters and Headquarters Company, U.S. Army Infantry Center, has only just begun his battle to become a Ranger against seemingly insurmountable odds, but said beating the odds are nothing new for him.

As an all-state tailback at St. Andrew Episcopal High School in Jackson, Miss., King ran for more than 2,000 yards and, upon graduation, had offers from Southeastern Conference universities like Auburn, Mississippi and Tennessee.

King turned those offers down and accepted an opportunity from West Point in 1992 instead.

"I have a deep respect for the Army and for anyone who does their time for this country," King said. "I wanted to be a part of that."

During his three years at West Point, King set a single-game rushing record of 235 yards against Colgate his freshman year, ran for 883 yards with a six-yards-per-carry average his sophomore year and rushed for 136 yards against Duke his junior year before suffering a hamstring injury against Temple.

After only a week's recovery, King took to the field again and tore his left anterior cruciate ligament.

With his season over because of injury and his enrollment at West Point terminated later that year, King could have let go, but couldn't give up on the chance to return to the field.

KING

With the help of his coaches, King arranged to play for Oregon State University in 1996 and returned to his career on the field. Even with nagging injuries, King was selected as the team's most valuable player in his final year of college competition.

After Sept. 11, 2001, King answered the country's call for service and enlisted into the Army, but found himself frustrated by the attitudes of most of his fellow service members.

"It's the 'me' generation," King said. "Everything in our society is based on making us more comfortable and geared toward comfort instead of getting the mission accomplished."

He said the motivation to join the military shouldn't be based on selfish reasons, like college money or loan repayments. He said it's a volunteer force and people are joining for the wrong reasons.

As a demonstrator for the Land Warrior System, King travels the country epitomizing what tomorrow's Soldier should and will be, but being the Warrior Ethos poster child as the Army moves into a new era isn't enough for the former football star.

He has his sights set on Ranger School, and it is a challenge he is committed to overcoming, he said.

"I came in to be a Ranger," King said. "I won't settle for less. When you get used to being the best, you can't ever accept being mediocre at anything."

That attitude is what will help the infantryman overcome mountainous obstacles to get into the school.

After spending his whole life functioning at peak performance for no more than 100 yards at a time, the 30-year-old must retrain his body for long-distance, endurance-focused runs and cardio challenges in order to score at least 70 percent in all three of the Army Physical Fitness Test events in the 17- to 21-year-old bracket, which is only one of the prerequisites for Ranger School.

King said the hardest part is the mental challenge of forcing his body to keep going and battling recurrent injuries, but he is determined to keep training until he meets the rigorous physical standards demanded by the school.

King's NCOIC, Staff Sgt. Andrew Davis, a Ranger who earned a Bronze Star for valor with the 3rd Battalion, 75th Ranger Regiment, in Operation Iraqi Freedom last year, believes King has what it takes to make it in Ranger School.

Davis said King is strictly focused and goal-oriented.

"(King) is strong. He knows what he wants and doesn't stop," said Davis. "He just doesn't quit until he accomplishes what he wants to do."

Determination and personal courage to drive on through the rigors of Ranger School will be key to King's success, and he said he is ready for both the mental and physical challenges of not only the school, but the trials and tribulations that come with the Ranger way of life.

"If it was easy, everyone would do it," King said. "It looks cool, but the reality of it is it's not an easy life. It's hard. Standards don't change for anyone over there (at 75th Ranger Regiment.). I want to exceed the standards. "

King is immersed in a rigorous training regimen in preparation for the Ranger Indoctrination Program and, if all goes well, will be reporting for his personal test of intestinal fortitude in the next few months.

Driver fatigue causes post accident

Soldier struck by vehicle while running

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

Recently, as an initial entry training Soldier was running behind his morning PT formation as a road guard, he was struck from behind by a car.

Was the driver drunk? Speeding? Not paying attention? No. The driver was actually in the formation's trail vehicle, and an investigation revealed that the main cause of the accident was driver fatigue, according to a Fort Benning safety alert from post Chief of Staff Col. Charles Cornwell.

The Soldier was taken to the hospital for evaluation and released the same day — no serious injuries or broken bones. But that was a matter of luck, said Regis Beighley, post safety manager.

"When the truck struck him, it knocked him down and he fell between the (front) wheels," he said. "A few feet in either direction, he would have been run over. It was just a matter of inches between a few bumps and scrapes and a fatality."

Not everyone is so lucky. A Fort Benning Soldier returning from Christmas leave was killed when he fell asleep at the wheel and drove off the road.

While driver-fatigue related accidents on post are rare, Fort Benning Soldiers are regularly involved in them off of the installation, Beighley said.

In fact, it's a common problem on the road, and just as dangerous as, say, drinking and driving.

According to the National Safety Council, 37 percent of drivers have nodded off for at least a moment or fallen asleep while driving at least once in their driving careers. Eight percent have done so in the past six months.

"When you're driving long distances, you become more relaxed; you put your guard down," Beighley said. "You lose consciousness and start daydreaming even though you're awake — road hypnosis."

Today's cars are very comfortable, Beighley said. "Warm, comfy and sound-proof," can create quite the cozy environment. Add to that cruise control, dull landscapes, the droning of tires and engines and the repetitive patterns of headlights, trees, poles and highway center lines and you can enter that dangerous trance-like state.

Your senses deaden, your reaction time slows and it becomes a challenge to stay awake.

Once you fall asleep, you and drivers on the road with you will be lucky if you wake up in time to prevent an accident.

Fatigue is a major killer on America's roads, according to the National Roadway Management Agency, and a factor in 18 percent of all fatal crashes.

In fact, studies have revealed that driving after 24 hours without sleep puts drivers at the same risk as someone with a blood alcohol level of 0.1 — the legal limit is 0.08.

But there are things drivers can do to ensure that they don't become or create a driver-fatigue fatality, Beighley said.

"Have a road buddy to talk to and keep you awake, open the window, turn up the radio, chew gum, stop every two hours and walk around — anything to change it up," he suggested.

He also warned that cold remedies and even just one beer can contribute to driver fatigue.

And of course, Beighley said, "no matter what mistakes you or another driver makes, the consequences of any accident are less if you have your seat belt on."

School goes extra mile to educate ESL students

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

Evelyn Braman remembers it clearly — about eight years ago, a little, Korean girl moved to Fort Benning with her family. She spoke no English.

Her first few months at White Elementary School were tough, said Braman, the school's former ESL teacher and present gifted education teacher.

"I remember she would just stand against the wall at recess. The other children would try to play with her, but she would just shake her head — she couldn't communicate with them," she said.

In fact, the little girl had a hard time communicating with anyone. Her days were lonely as she tried to adjust to American life. The culture was strange, the food made her sick and she had no one to talk to at school.

That was before White became the only school on Fort Benning to offer a formal English as a second language program. Sure, there was a small class for ESL students before school. But the school didn't have a formal program.

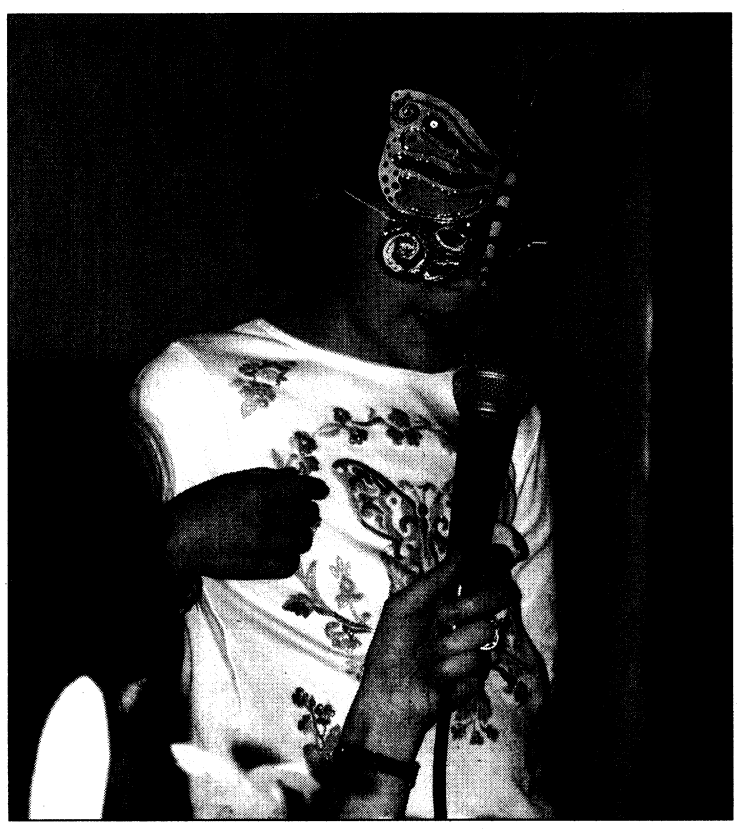
The school developed the Pals Program, which brought in volunteer "mentors" from the community to visit with ESL children and help them learn English.

The difference it made was amazing, Braman said.

"I remember the first time she ever spoke in English," she said. "We all celebrated — the other students were so happy."

Today's ESL program is a more structured Pals Program of sorts. Only Zoraida Andrade is every ESL students' "pal." Although she speaks only Spanish and English, Andrade has worked with children who speak several different languages, including French, Italian, Korean and Filipino.

"These students actually end up learning faster, because they can't just have me translate," Andrade said.



Most of her students are children of soldiers at the Western Hemisphere Institute for Security Cooperation who are only here for one or two years at a time, she said. Others are children or stepchildren of American Soldiers, and are coming to America for the first time.

They come from everywhere, she said — Honduras, El Salvador, Peru, Chile, Puerto Rico, Columbia, Mexico, Haiti, the list goes on.

But no matter where they've come from or how long they will be in America, they all need to learn English to be able to learn in school and make friends, she said.

"When the kids come here, sometimes they don't understand a word of English," Andrade said. "But the teachers in the regular classes don't have the time to stop and explain everything.

"The children go through a silent period — they're just observing and listening, and they won't speak," she said.

Spc. Nikki St. Amant

Isabel Colón, a White Elementary School second-grader recites her line during a play performed by the school's Spanish Club Tuesday.

"They learn the survival words — 'bathroom,' 'water,' 'nurse.'"

Andrade knows that feeling. She was only 5 years old when she moved to Chicago from Puerto Rico.

"I never had ESL," she said. "I was just kind of thrown into it — a sink-or-swim situation."

Although she "survived," she doesn't want her students to have that same experience. She meets with them every day for about an hour to an hour and a half to help them learn English.

Every object in her classroom, from the desk to the chair to the pictures on her walls, have a "name tag" on them, with their English names. She uses flashcards, pictures and drawing assignments to help the children learn basic English vocabulary.

For students who don't speak English or Spanish, she uses a lot of sign language and pictures to communicate with them, she said.

There are five levels of English proficiency — Level V being proficient, Andrade said. Most of the ESL students start out Level I and are generally proficient by the time they leave White.

But the program wouldn't be complete or successful without the support of the school's students and teachers.

"The children usually don't have any problem integrating with the other kids," Andrade said. "Right away, they all want to be friends with the ESL students, to help them."

Most classes "buddy up" ESL students with another student in the class to help them get through their first few months. The buddies help them read, show them where the lunchroom and the bathrooms are, etc., she said.

This is something the English-speaking children love, Braman said.

"We're kind of like ambassadors who teach them about American culture," she said, adding that many of the ESL students' home countries are "vastly different."

"The children really embrace the ESL students wonderfully and try to take care of them," Braman said. "They get so excited when the ESL students are speaking and reading English — they really share in their accomplishments."

Mixing the students helps to foster a more cultured atmosphere.

"The more they get to know and understand the ESL students, the more they realize that we're really all the same," Braman said. "It helps foster an atmosphere of tolerance."

And while the students offer their friendship to the ESL children, the school's teachers are making their own strides to ensure they can provide as much help as possible to the students.

In fact, one of the school's parent volunteers, Celiana Colon, has hosted several Spanish classes for the teachers to help them learn to communicate better with the ESL students and their parents.

It's basic Spanish, Braman said, but it can help set the parents and the children at ease.

Colon also led the school's Spanish Club, which attracted a "handful" of ESL participants before it ended Tuesday afternoon.

The Spanish club — created at White this year at the suggestion of Maj. Al Lugo — is one of the few things at school that reinforces what Spanish-speaking children already know, Colon said.

They were able to take leadership roles in the club, helping others along when new concepts were introduced. The club learned about aspects of Hispanic cultures — from food to vocabulary to traditions.

But perhaps more importantly for the ESL students, it gave them a chance to be just like everyone else.

"When you speak a different language, you feel different," she said. "But it's confidence-building when other students are interested in your language and culture. It helps them blend in, and it sends the message that it's OK to still keep their language and learn English, too."

3rd Brigade unit boosts family team building

Spc. Eliamar Castanon
Bayonet staff

The Fort Benning Army Family Team Building Office and 1st Battalion, 15th Infantry Regiment, worked together to empower their Soldiers and families for the future Monday at the AFTB Office in Soldiers' Plaza.

AFTB is a program designed to teach individuals and families how to be more independent with minimal outside support when their sponsors deploy.

"The threefold purpose of AFTB is to improve force readiness by teaching personal and family readiness, help the Army adapt to global changes and respond to family-related lessons from recent deployments," said Melissa Franks, AFTB volunteer program manager.

After 10 years as a military wife, Franks said she understands the issues military spouses face while their Soldiers are deployed.

"This is our first step in a process to build stronger family readiness groups and better prepare our families for the stress of a long deployment," said Lt. Col. John W. Charlton, battalion commander. "AFTB provides Army families with training and tools for coping with these deployments."

Family members, Soldiers and Department of the Army civilians may receive training through AFTB.

During the level-one training, Soldiers and their spouses learn about:

- Military terms and acronyms,
- Customs and courtesies,
- The chain of command and the chain of concern,
- Military and community resources, benefits, entitlements and compensations,
- Family and military expectations,
- Impact of the mission on he family life and basic problem solving.

"The Army has its own unique language that nobody knows anything about," Franks said. "As a military spouse, I know that every post is different, and it takes a while to get used to the language, especially if you're a new spouse."

Although the spouses will benefit from AFTB the most, it's important for Soldiers to attend the course and hear some of the issues their spouses face during deployments, Charlton said.

"It gives us more appreciation for what they go through," he said.

Encouraging all spouses to attend AFTB gives the commander a valuable resource since they are scheduled to redeploy to Iraq between November and February.

"I now have about a hundred spouses who can go out and better help other families that might be having difficulties with the Army life," Charlton said. "This all has a direct impact on unit readiness since Soldiers perform their duties better when their families are taken care of."

Heather Borosh attended the course with her husband of one year and a seven month deployment.

"This is a great benefit for wives because it helps us understand what our husbands do, and it teaches us what to do if something happens while they are gone.

"I think I will look into volunteering with AFTB in the future," she said.

"We're happy that the battalion requested us to do this for them," Franks said. "It shows they're concerned for the family members and want to make sure that the family members have the skills and the knowledge to take care of themselves when the Soldier is not around."

"This training will have a direct impact on the strength of our family readiness groups and greatly improve the overall readiness of the battalion," Charlton said.

For more information about AFTB classes, call 545-5377.

Band Soldiers test convoy live-fire range

Course to be integrated into future BOLC II

About 40 Soldiers from the Infantry Center Band conducted a training exercise to validate a convoy live-fire range for integration into the second phase of the future Basic Officer Leaders Course Tuesday.

The exercise, which took place at Ware Range, was conducted for two reasons, said Lt. Col. Alan Neyland, commander, 1st Battalion, 11th Infantry Regiment — to train a unit and to validate a concept for BOLC II.

Although many people may not know it, Neyland said, band members assigned to divisional installations have a wartime mission to perform security for the headquarters. Several bands have been deployed to Iraq in support of Operation Iraqi Freedom, he said.

"(When a band is deployed), as long as it is possible and safe, they perform for troops in the area to boost morale," said Sgt. Alan Salsberry, a tuba player in the Infantry Center Band and a squad member during Tuesday's exercise.

"When it's no longer safe, they switch to augmenting the military police," he said, "guarding prisoners of war, pulling security, etc."

Although the Soldiers of the Infantry Center Band do not deploy, when they move on to other assignments, they could be called upon to go.

But no matter where a Soldier is assigned, no matter what a Soldier's MOS, every Soldier must know the skills required for survival on the battlefield, Neyland said.

For this type of training, Neyland said, the band's training level was "fairly low."

"They go to the range and zero and qualify, but very rarely do maneuver live-fire," he said. "They had knowledge, but they were by no means expert. But during this training, their proficiency has increased."

Equally important to training the Soldiers, Neyland said, is the role this exercise will play in the future of the Army.

The Army is presently developing a course to train all officers — BOLC. There will be three phases, he said.

The first phase will be any commissioning source, such as a military academy. The second source will be a "basic training" of sorts, a collective training for all officers in the Army. Lieutenants will go to their separate branch training during the third phase.

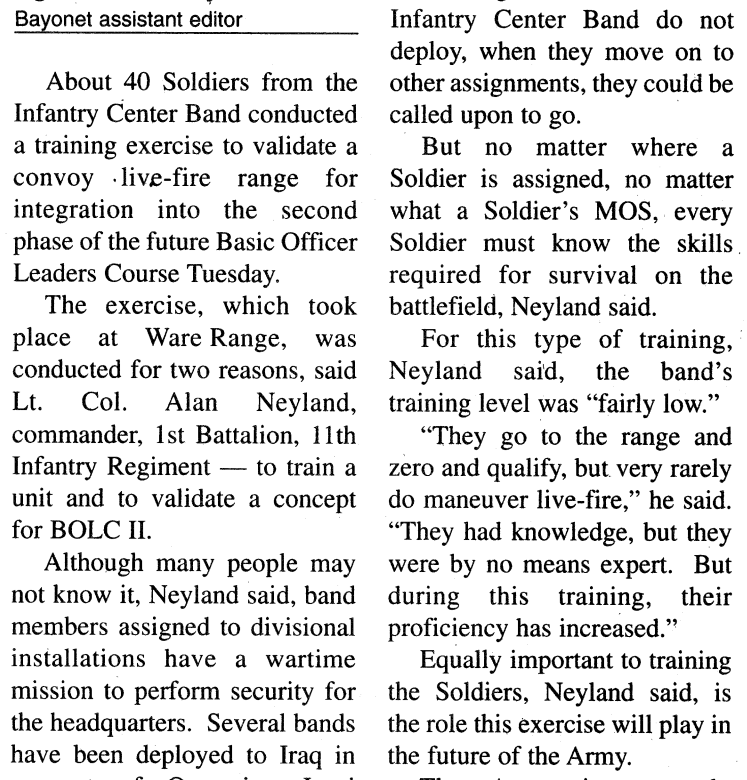
Neyland and the Soldiers of 1st Bn., 11th Inf. Regt., are responsible for creating the second phase, which will be conducted at Fort Benning and three other unidentified installations, Neyland said.

BOLC II, which is scheduled to be implemented in 2006, will incorporate the 40 warrior tasks and nine essential warrior battle drills identified by the chief of staff of the Army, he said.

One of those tasks is convoy operations.

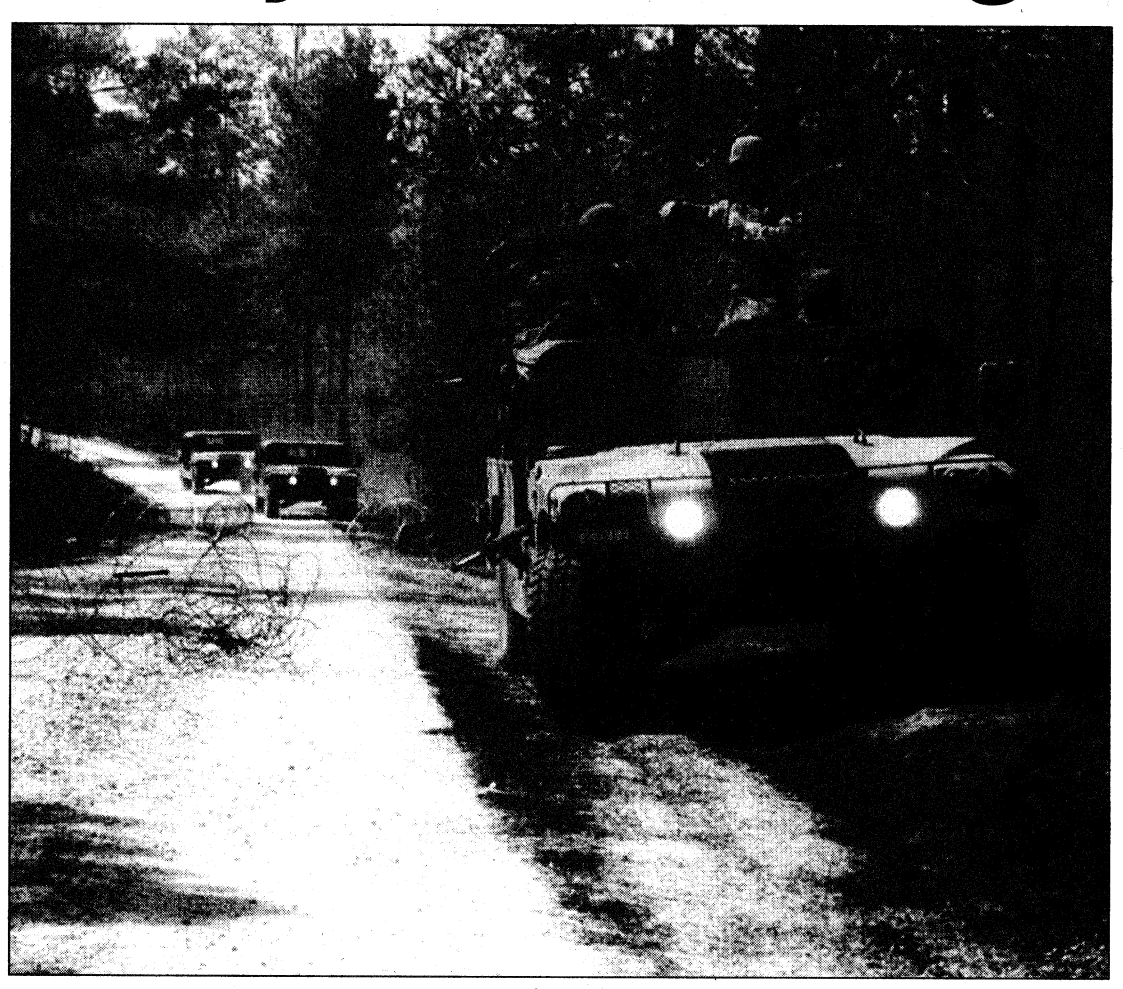
"Convoy live-fire is a critical aspect (of training Soldiers)," Neyland said. "If you watch any news, you see convoys on a routine basis, ambushed, running into (improvised explosive devices).

"This range mirrors what's happening in Iraq," he said.



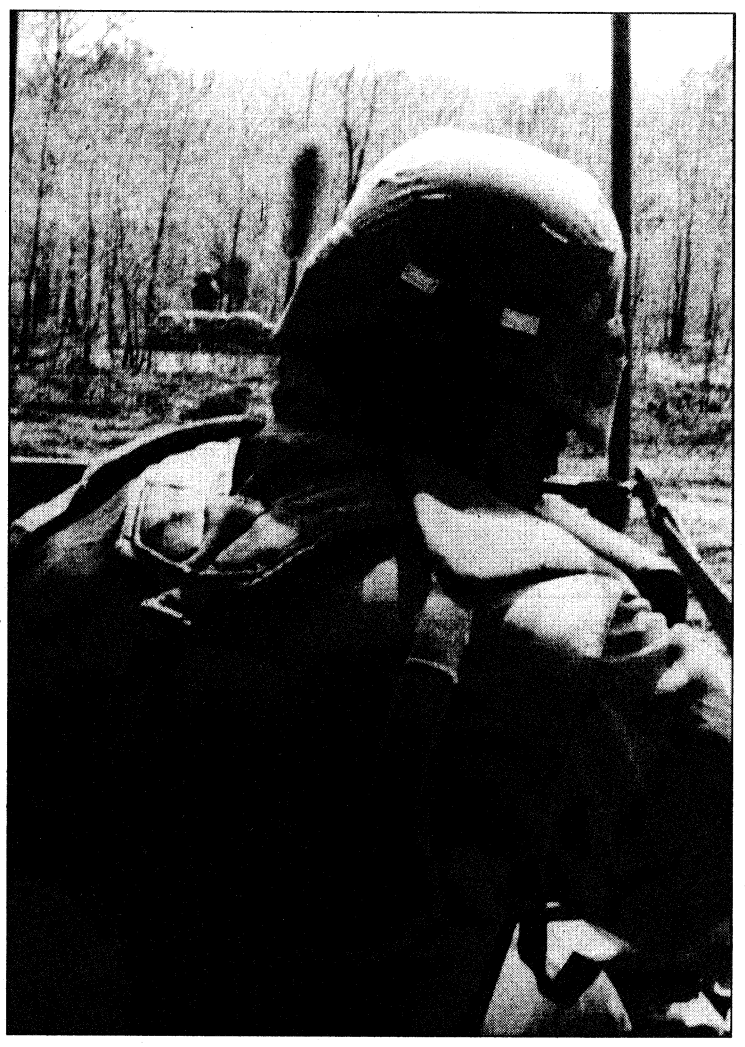
The exercise, which used a convoy of four humvees, trained the Soldiers how to set up 360-degree security around the convoy and how to react to wire obstacles, enemy targets, disabled vehicles and casualties, Salsberry said.

To ensure the training was as accurate as possible, Neyland called in a team of five observer/controllers and instructors from the Joint Readiness Training Center in Fort Polk, La.



The team's primary mission is training convoy live-fires, Neyland said. The team has assisted the Army's transportation school and several divisional units across the Army.

Tuesday, these expert trainers executed initial training for the band Soldiers', acting as OCs during the actual exercise and certified the course for future use.



The training exercise will be conducted again in June or July, using another unit that "has (Soldier) skills like those of a new lieutenant," Neyland said. The exercise will continue to get more challenging, he said, with the introduction of more targets and obstacles to react to, like non-combatants on the battlefield.

Army focuses on getting troops equipment

Sgt. 1st Class Marcia Triggs
Army News Service

WASHINGTON — Every Thursday, senior leaders on the Army staff spend an hour validating equipment requirements from commanders to ensure needed capabilities get in the hands of deploying troops.

Additional body armor, more up-armored humvees and battlefield robots are examples of requests that have been heard and approved by members of the Army Strategic Planning Board.

Getting the right equipment to combatant commanders in a timely manner is only one aspect of the Army's focus area "Resource Processes."

"It's a series of actions that match dollars to desired capabilities," said Lt. Col. Bobby Claflin, an action officer with the Deputy Chief of Staff for Programs, G8.

Nested in improving the Army's "Resource Processes" is supporting combatant commanders, getting re-deploying troops ready for future missions and working with other services to ensure money isn't wasted by developing redundant capabilities, G8 officials said.

The Army Strategic Planning Board was first formed after 9-11 with a primary focus on supporting the global war on terrorism. And even though it works as a gatekeeper, it has proven to compress equipment-fielding schedules from years to months and even weeks, officials said.

Unit commanders from company to theater-level submit operational needs statements to their major commands, and if those major commands can't fulfill the requests, they are forwarded to Headquarters, Department of the Army, for resolution, said Col. Mark Averill, chief of ASPB.

Before requests reach the ASPB's Thursday meeting, Averill hosts a Tuesday meeting where a council of colonels first reviews the requests.

"It's not layers of bureaucracy," said Lt. Col. Michael Komichak, a member of the ASPB.

"Instead of walking requests in each of the staff sections and trying to get on the G3's calendar," he said, "we provide a forum where multiple decisions directly impacting Soldiers on the ground can be made within 60 to 90 minutes."

The planning board isn't just driven by requests from commanders, Komichak said. Board members also think forward, he said.

They use lessons learned from previous rotations of Operations Iraqi Freedom and Enduring Freedom to "lean forward" and predict what units will need on the ground, Komichak said.

Among the board members are representatives from the Rapid Equipping Force. They look for off-the-shelf technologies that they can get in the hands of Soldiers as rapidly as possible. An example of a REF product is the "Well-Cam," which is being used in Afghanistan. The Well-Cam is a camera attached to an Ethernet cable that enables Soldiers to safely search wells for weapons caches.

By reprioritizing resources and restructuring other programs, the Army has reinvested $36 billion toward Army transformation, said G-8 officials. Technologies and capabilities are being developed that can be applied to the current force, officials said.

In addition to investing in new equipment, major items that have been used in Iraq and Afghanistan are being repaired through the "setting the force" program.

Through the reset program, all returning units will achieve a sufficient level of combat readiness to be able to conduct future missions, officials said.

Burns: Decrease wildfires, improve wildlife habitat

Wade Harrison, project manager for The Nature Conservancy, a global organization dedicated to preserving plants, animals and natural communities, said Fort Benning's controlled burning efforts support his group's objectives.

"It's a very convenient convergence of objectives," Harrison said. "And there's no bucking the system on either side. We're all working together to achieve a common goal."

And, Harrison said, if someone was making sure that the post is protected from unmanageable wildfires and ensuring that the wildlife has the best possible habitat through controlled burning, "you'd be burning as much as you could."

Harrison said Fort Benning is unusual in that the installation is a large, contiguous habitat that is burned continuously. The post, he said, is definitely doing a better job than the national forests.

Jonathan Neufeldt, who works with the red-cockaded woodpecker for the Conservation Branch, said one of the challenges is not being able to predict what the effects of the controlled burning will actually be in an area of timber.

He's seen a 5 to 7 percent growth in the RCW numbers and said the controlled burning is an important variable. Burning is mandated by the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service to ensure the fires are frequent enough to sustain the habitat.

"We've had an increase in the open structure of forest that is good for the RCWs and various game species," Neufeldt said.

In one year, he noticed three or four times as many wild turkeys in an area with a more diverse ground cover with an open canopy the turkeys like.

"Sometimes the fire is much better than expected," Neufeldt said, adding that weather plays a major role, sometimes making the fires more intense.

"But that's one of the risks you have to take," he said.

Harrison said they work on a "certain faith that more fire is better."

And burning acreage for a wide variety of reasons has positive effects on military training, as well as for the ecosystem.

"The military can spend more time training and not as much time putting their fires out," said Michael Fuller, a fish and game technician.

And, he said, the controlled burns reduce the parasite load as well.

"The decreased numbers of ticks and chiggers should make the Soldiers happy," he said.

From a wild game perspective, Fuller said the burning improves forage for deer and other small game. He's seen an increase in the weights of the deer harvested by hunters on Fort Benning and said the conditions are "phenomenal for turkey."

"The more you burn, the more you return the ecosystem to the way it should be," Fuller said.

Fort Benning has a high need for quality housing — the quarters built in the '60s and '70s were shoddily built and aren't suitable for today's Soldiers, Freakley said.

New plans for stabilized tours will keep officers here for three years and enlisted Soldiers will be here for four to seven years, Riera said, telling the developers that there is a demand for quality housing.

Riera told the developers the housing needs to be built to a higher standard in order to be competitive with the local community.

"Most Soldiers can't afford a $180,000 home unless the family is dual income," he said.

"We want to develop communities. Soldiers want a house that stands alone and to live in small communities — not housing areas and multiplexes," Riera said.

"We have those and the Soldiers don't want 'em."

During the site tour, Fort Benning housing officials showed the developers quarters in Custer Terrace, McGraw Manor, Bouton Heights-Davis Hill, the White Elephants and Iron Triangle.

Fort Benning's housing inventory has more than 4,000 units with 493 registered as historic homes, including the quarters on Austin Loop and Miller Loop, which represent the types of new neighborhood both Riera and Freakley would like to see built on Fort Benning.

Bill Mulvey, with Picerne Military Housing, said the neighborhood concept is what his company has done at Fort Meade, Md., and what is planned for Fort Bragg, N.C.

"We're ready," Mulvey said. "We're ready to knock things down and start building ... General Freakley said that he was ready (for a partner) and so are we ... of course, so is every other developer."

Ron Smith, Fort Benning's RCI program manager, said that the site tour was well-attended by qualified developers from across the country.

It seems, Smith said, that the developers who attended the site tour are interested in raising the standard of living for the Fort Benning Soldiers.

Toxic: Environmental clean-up can cost time, money post $15 million just to cap it.

Brent said not all the sites are so extensive, and several of them need no intervention at all.

Many, like the one recently found, have been in place for years, and the surrounding environment has adapted and is thriving in spite of the waste.

Brent said the division responds to sites that are discovered and assesses them to determine first if there are any health hazards present and, if so, to what extent.

"We don't want to endanger people," Brent said. "And we don't want to endanger local flora and fauna."

He said his division evaluates the environmental threat and develops a plan to clean the site, as needed.

This particular site, Brent said, may become one of the pit stops of the annual Help the Hooch clean-up program, because it is part of the watershed system that feeds the Chattahoochee River.

Brent said the Environmental Division tries to organize at least a few volunteer-based yearly clean-up projects on post.

The post has been actively working for more than 10 years, Brent said, to restore sites like this one to environmental stability and has invested more than $40 million in its efforts.

The specific location of this site is not being published in order to discourage exploration by post youth.

Porter: Leaves legacy of leadership said, through years of endless surgeries, chemotherapy and radiation treatments.

"He never quit; he never gave up. He is the reason Fort Benning is such a great place to live."

As the Community Life officer, Porter was responsible for the management of post neighborhoods and was instrumental in the development and improvement of the Volunteer Mayors Association and various other "quality of life" programs on post.

"Despite what he was going through, he continued to do what he did best. He took care of Soldiers and their families," Riera said. "He made an impact everywhere he went."

Porter's legacy of caring leadership started long before he took the helm of the Community Life Program, said retired Command Sgt. Maj. Kenneth Sponslor, who met Porter in 1995 when Porter became the command sergeant major of what is now the 1st Battalion, 10th Field Artillery Regiment, on Kelley Hill. Artillery, said Sponslor, was Porter's first love.

"It didn't take me long to find out what a great impact one man can have on a unit," he said. "He's known throughout the division as a great leader ... and whenever I hear the big guns of artillery, I'll think of Ronnie, because I know, directly or indirectly, he had an impact on every (Soldier) out there. Ronnie led the way."

Col. Tom Torrance met Porter when he took command of the 1st Bn., 10th FA, in 1997. Torrance arrived on Kelley Hill with a list of expectations for his command sergeant major. Porter, he said, made a "few changes" to that list, then presented his own — a list of his expectations for Torrance.

"I learned more from that man than any other NCO I'd ever met," Torrance said. "He was a model of professionalism, but he was compassionate. He taught me to be more compassionate. His enthusiasm was addictive, and it rubbed off on everyone around him."

Porter left his wife, B.J., of Smiths, Ala., and daughter, Regina Thomas, of Alpha, Ga.

Riley: 'Carved out a niche for himself'

well-known and well-liked by everybody. He was an awesome Ranger. We'll miss him."

Riley had an "insatiable desire to achieve," Sheehan said, and it was apparent in his repeated participation in the competition.

"You know, he carved out a niche for himself in Ranger history, but that wasn't what he was all about," said Sheehan, who serves with the U.S. Army Infantry School's Headquarters and Headquarters Company. "His name will be there forever, and we'll always have that reminder of him."

Capt. Marc Messerschmitt competed against Riley in the Best Ranger competition three times. The 4th Ranger Training Battalion's assistant operations officer said Riley was a man driven, "hell-bent and persistent, probably the smartest individual ever when it came to knowing how to approach the (Best Ranger) competition."

"I thought the world of that guy. We all did," Messerschmitt said. "He was one of those guys whose mind was always working. He just never gave up. He was an against-the-odds kind of person, and I think that's one of the reasons this is such a blow. We thought he'd beat this thing."

Messerschmitt, Riley and a few other competitors grew up within miles of one another near Riley's hometown of Batesville, Ind.

"It was kind of ironic that there was this group of us who grew up so close to each other, but it was neat to get together when we were on leave," Messerschmitt said. "Eric was one of us. He loved to have fun. I hated to compete against him, but I loved to hang out with him."

Riley, who was buried with his black beret and Ranger hatchet, leaves behind his wife, Jennifer, and four children, Amber, Gage, Madison and Brice.

David Watson, of Atlanta, said he learned a lot about his brother-in-law from the Rangers who attended his funeral last week.

"Eric was very reserved. He never wanted to be in the limelight. He was always talking about what someone else was doing, never what he's done," Watson said.

"We learned a lot about what he did as a Ranger — the missions he went on, that sort of thing," he said. "His friends were bragging on him. He was amazing."

Donations may be made to the Eric Riley's Children's Education Fund at 5/3 Bank, 3656 Springdale Road, Cincinnati, Ohio, 45251.

Get Outta Here

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

So ... you're missing that big-city culture you thought you gave up when you moved to Columbus.

Well, quitcher complainin' for half a minute, and I'll tell ya whatcher missin.

You can have all the metropolitan plays and musicals and theater your heart desires right here in Columbus — without empyting out your pockets and your gas tank driving all the way to Atlanta. It's just a few miles away at the ... Springer Opera House.

Wait! Wait! I knew I'd lose half of you at the first mention of "opera." But it's not what you think.

The Springer does have musicals — OK, OK ... and the occasional opera. But they also have plays — normal, no-music, no-singing, no-dancing plays. Plays and musicals you can sit through. Heck, even the most "uncultured" guys could survive these.

Aside from the convenient location and better-than-decent pricing, the Springer has one more thing those big cities don't — most of their actors are local yokels. (Speaking of which, if you're looking to get in on some theater action of your own, the Springer hosts actor and singer auditions every May for the following season. And they're always looking for volunteers to work backstage, usher, etc. Call 324-5714 ext. 520.)

This is a great first date — one of the best you're going to find in Columbus — a great girls night out, or just something different to do.

The production selection is actually pretty varied, and I found a few shows I plan to check out:

• A Piece of My Heart. Don't gag yet. This is actually an award-winning production about six women who served in Vietnam and how their lives were changed by their experiences there. It's based on the book (same name) by Keith Walker, which I just happened to read last fall and actually really got into.

And to top it off, this play will be performed by Columbus High School students involved in the Springer's outreach program, ArtsServe — probably even a few kids from our little military community. And it's only 10 bucks. Can't beat that.

This one will be March 29 and 30 at 7 p.m.

• James and the Giant Peach. So, I know I'm totally going to get made fun of for going to this one. But come on — who doesn't remember what a cool story this was way back when we were kids? An orphan escapes his evil, hideous aunts in a magical peach with a bunch of huge insects and they set off on grand adventures. I read it for the first time in third grade — the year Roahl Dahl died, actually — and I still love it.

Why pass up on the chance to be a wide-eyed kid again, if only for a couple hours? Check it out March 26 to 28 and April 2 and 3.

• Steel Magnolias. If any guys are still reading this, you may want to check out now. This play is what I had in mind when I mentioned the girls night

The Wright way

Bridgett Siter

Dana Smith, of Maine, uses his Wright B-EX exhibition plane, circa 1911, to encourage Faith Middle School students to work hard in school. The Wright brothers, Smith said, didn't finish high school and frequently had to "start from scratch" to learn the concepts and scientific principles they needed to know to build airplanes and bicycles. "Imagine what they could've accomplished if they'd had a good education," Smith said.

Eggstravaganza, carnival to bring 'break' to post

Spring break kicks off with Easter egg hunt

Lori Egan
Bayonet editor

Lace up your sneakers! The annual Easter egg hunt at Riverside is approaching and those who practice, grab the most.

The Easter Eggstravaganza at Riverside is 10 a.m. to noon April 3. Riverside is the home of Brig. Gen. Benjamin and Susan Freakley. After a brief welcome by the commanding general and his wife, the first egg hunt will begin at 10:05 a.m.

The egg hunts are separated by age group, with the youngest, 18 months to 3 years, going first.

At 10:30, the 4- to 5-year-old children will search for eggs, the 6- to 8-year-old children at 11 and the hunt for the 9- to 11-year-old children is at 11:30 a.m.

Prizes will be awarded in each age group, including two Easter baskets per age group, sponsored by the Commissary and the Main Mall Post Exchange, said Jamie Enos with the Directorate of Morale, Welfare and Recreation.

Other prizes are tickets to Columbus Catfish and Columbus Riverdragons games.

But what is an Easter event without the Easter bunny? He and Post carnival to spring onto Wetherby Field

Spc. Eliamar Castanon
Bayonet staff

Wouldn't it be nice to enjoy a nice Spring afternoon at a carnival without having to break your wallet?

Well now you can. The Fort Benning Community Youth Services is out to help you by bringing back for the fourth time the Spring Carnival from April 6 through the 10 at Wetherby Field.

Everyone can enjoy a nice afternoon with popcorn, cotton candy, hot dogs, sodas, roller coasters, games and much more at the Spring Carnival, said Linda Laine, Youth Sport and fitness director, Directorate of Morale, Welfare and Recreation.

"A few years ago parents started requesting a carnival on post so they didn't have to go spend a fortune downtown," Laine said.

So CYS and DMWR found a carnival company that is very good to military communities and has bringing them back to Fort Benning ever since.

The carnival will have the usual carnival rides — Ferris Wheel, Wipe Out, Orient Express and 25 other rides as well as

PX to host contest for mother of year

Military moms deserve recognition; get letters in by May 3

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

Military mothers are not your ordinary mothers — especially the past few years. They're mothers who have filled both parenting roles for six-month to yearlong stretches at a time. They're mothers who have kissed their children goodbye for months on end to perform their duties as Soldiers.

They're special; they go above and beyond. And they deserve recognition.

So AAFES sales area manager James Parker decided to give them just that when he suggested the post's first ever Mother of the Year contest, sponsored by the Main Mall Post Exchange.

Children, spouses, even friends can write a letter, nominating the military mothers (whether active-duty or family members) who are already Mother of the Year in their eyes.

"Military mothers are the foundation of the military community," Parker said. "They keep the military going and they keep the family strong.

"Sometimes we forget all the things they do on a daily basis," he said. "We take for granted what a mother is all about — staying strong for her family, consoling the kids while their dad's away, wiping their wounds, keeping them motivated and positive."

The contest — an idea Parker borrowed from other installations — will give mothers a chance to be recognized, but it will also give those closest to them a chance to show their appreciation, Parker said.

"It's very difficult to be a military mother," said Ellie Unrein, who is helping the PX promote the contest.

Unrein knows firsthand — her husband is retired military, and she had two children she raised on her own a good part of the time.

"Most times, it's just you between the deployments and field problems for extended times," Unrein said. "You become the mom, the dad, the friend, the doctor, the nurse ... Nobody is more deserving of recognition than a military mother."

Submissions nominating a military mother must include: the name, address and phone number of the person writing the letter, the person's relationship to the mother, the mother's name and 100 words or less about why this mother should be chosen.

Family portrait nets $500 for Wilson kindergartner

Alex Bessette

School has tradition of art excellence

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

When 5-year-old Alex Bessette's art teacher asked him to draw a picture of his family, the Wilson Elementary kindergartener turned it in like any other assignment. But, this one would garner more than a good grade.

Alex's artwork won the 2004 Armed Forces YMCA Art Contest for the Army.

"I like to draw and I had a lot of fun drawing the picture," Alex said.

The picture, which earned Alex a $500 savings bond, was of his family under a sunset. Also in the picture is the American flag, which Alex said

Registration to begin for skate park

Late night YS registration for 'boarders'

Melissa House
Bayonet staff

Skateboarders, the wait is almost over.

Opening ceremonies for Fort Benning's skateboard park are set for 10 a.m. April 17. Festivities will include appearances by at least two professional skateboarders.

Construction on the park is "moving right along," said Linda Laine, Youth Sports and Fitness director. She expects to have an airbrush artist in the "pit" next week to do some art work on the walls and the Fire Department in to conduct an assessment of the park's capacity.

"Skaters are going to have to observe some strict safety rules," Laine said. "They must wear helmets, elbow and knee pads, gloves and appropriate footgear. And all equipment must be in good shape."

But before skateboarders can put wheels in the pit, they must first register with Child and Youth Sports.

"You can't get in on the 17th without a white card," said Judy Cobb, YS outreach services director.

The white card is proof of registration and allows access to all YS programs.

Cobb said parents, not teens, must fill out and sign the YS registration forms as well as bring in shot records and provide a local emergency point of contact.

Registrations are accepted Mondays through Fridays at the Family Unit Network Center, Building 359, located at the corner of Ingersoll Avenue and Vibbert Avenue. Walk-in registrations are taken from 8 a.m. to 1 p.m. and appointments are offered between 1 p.m. and 3 p.m.

To help parents of older skateboarders, YS is offering two late night registrations from 5 to 8 p.m. on March 30 and April 13 strictly to handle skate park registrations.

"We hope everything goes well," Cobb said. "And although the late night registration is just for the skate park, of course, it registers them for any YS programs."

For more information about registration requirements or to schedule an appointment, call 545-2079.

Carnival: To offer plenty various food concession stands, Laine said.

The Officers' Spouses' Club will also participate in this years Spring Carnival by hosting a flea market April 10 from 8 a.m. to 7 p.m.

Sandy Risberg, the OSC fund-raising chairman, said this is the first time OSC participates in the Spring Carnival and the money will be placed into the the club's fund-raising fund.

"The money we make will go to our scholarship and welfare funds for graduating seniors, continuing education spouses and other private organizations that benefit Fort Benning," she said.

At the flea market, shoppers may buy anything from Avon and Tupperware to your regular yard sale selections. People interested in renting a space for the flea market may e-mail the OSC office at benningbazaar@aol.com or call 682-9585.

The Spring Carnival allows families and single Soldiers the opportunity to share some fun, quality time together without spending an entire pay check, Laine said.

April 7, 8 and 10, are all-you-can-ride wrist band days, meaning anyone may purchase a wristband for $10 at the CYS office or $12 at the entrance and enjoy the carnival all night. Individual tickets will also be available at the gate.

Carnival hours will be from 5 to 11 p.m. April 6-8, 5 p.m. to midnight April 9, and 1 p.m. to midnight April 10.

For more information, call the CYS office at 545-3562.

Hunt: To bring Easter fun

Mrs. Bunny will be available for photos during the Eggstravaganza.

Other activities include a giant slide, American Legion train rides, soccer and basketball shootouts, a cookie walk and Easter crafts.

New this year is the kiddiepillar, a 50-foot-long blow up activity that is similar to a caterpillar, said Linda Laine, Youth Sports and Fitness director, Directorate of Morale, Welfare and Recreation.

The Easter Eggstravaganza is free; however, children must be accompanied by an adult. Bring lawn chairs but leave your pets at home, Laine said, because candy on the ground and children picking it up isn't a good mix with pets.

For more information, call 545-3582.

Moms: To get recognition

Letters will be accepted from 9 a.m. to 9 p.m. from April 1 to May 3 at the drop box at the front of the Main Mall PX.

The letters will be judged by an independent panel of judges from May 4 to 5.

There will only be one winner chosen.

She will be notified by 8 p.m. May 6, and she will receive her award at 11 a.m. May 8 in front of the Main Mall PX.

The winner of the contest will receive a prize package that includes a Liz Claiborne or Ralph Lauren four-piece outfit, a pair of shoes and a handbag. She will also receive a manicure, pedicure and hair cut and style, as well as a make-over by Clinique.

On top of all that, she will receive a gift certificate to a local restaurant for a Mother's Day brunch with her family.

The Mother of the Year will also participate in special events on post throughout the year and will be a liaison between the Main Mall PX and the military community until next year's winner is chosen.

The contest will be a yearly event.

A Father of the Year contest will kick off in June.

is the best part of the picture.

"The one thing that drew me to Alex's picture was the fact that he had the sky and the ground meet, and the size of his family members in the picture were a good size," said art teacher Audrey Leanza.

"The size of people in photos is important," she said. "Many children don't draw their people big, but he did, and that is what jumped out to me."

Alex's mother, Stephaine, said that before he won the contest, he was always in a rush to do things, and his confidence was low.

"He was always rushing and he didn't put much effort into the stuff he did, and he wouldn't be too happy about the result," she said. "All of that changed once he won the contest. Now, he looks at every detail of his drawings and sits down and concentrates on what he has to do."

Alex's confidence wasn't the only thing that was built up after winning the contest — his grades and overall attitude in school has changed.

"Alex has made a big change in everything since he won the contest," Stephaine said. "He's doing better in school, and he's a much happier kid. I'm very proud of what he's done and the change he has made."

Alex's picture will be on posters on Army installations worldwide.

"This not only means a lot to Alex, but it means a lot to our school," said Wilson principal Phyllis Parker. "Anytime a student from our school does something very well, we like to recognize them and what they've done. Alex has brought a positive light on our school. I'm very proud of all he's done."

Parker also said that a Wilson student has placed in this competition the past few years.

"With our students doing so well in the competition, it shows that we have an art teacher that is dedicated to helping children," Parker said. "She puts in her time and effort to help the children out, and what better way to show her the great job she's doing than by our children doing well in this competition."

So, what's next for Alex in art class?

"We made picture frames last week, and now I'm going to draw a picture to fit inside of the frame," he said. "I can't wait to get started."

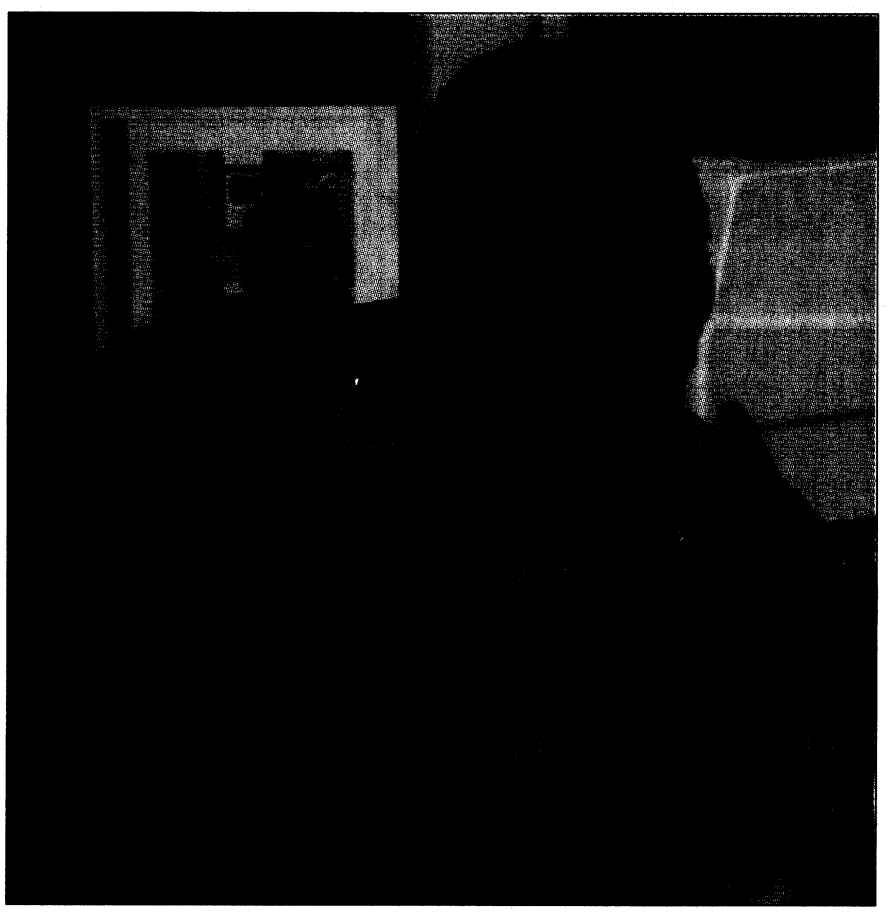
BCTB Soldiers mentor Wilson students in leadership

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

"I've seen the stars because I've stood on the shoulders of giants."
Galileo



It's a quote Capt. Alfonzo Ford has cherished for years, his favorite. And it explains just what the Leadership Academy at Wilson Elementary School is all about.

The academy, which is in its first year, combines fourth- and fifth-grade students who demonstrate natural leadership abilities and "phenomenal leaders" from the school's Partner in Education, the Basic Combat Training Brigade, said Dr. Wanda Person, the school's media specialist.

"We wanted to bring the natural need children have to enhance their leadership abilities together with the best leaders our country has," Person said. "And there's so much evidence that the Army produces the best leaders."

Ford is one of those leaders. A West Point graduate with six years in the Army, Ford said he has spent the past 10 years either learning, training or exercising leadership.

The academy is intended to cultivate leadership skills already present in the students through enthusiasm, exposure and experience, Ford said.

Photos by Sgt. Kim Dooley

Capt. Alfonzo Ford, of the Basic Combat Training Brigade, instructs Wilson's Leadership Academy Tuesday.

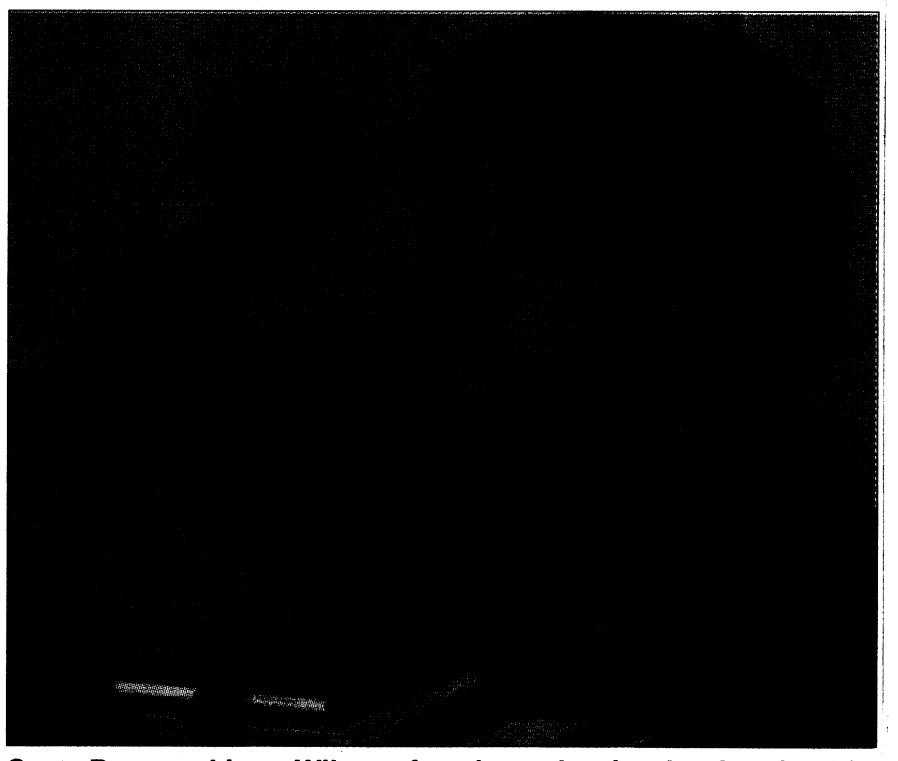
"We want to get them excited about being leaders," he said. "We give them exposure to things like guest speakers — they've met commanders and business owners — and field trips. They went to Faith Middle School and met with the student council."

Giving the children experience means giving them the opportunity to plan and be in leadership roles, he said.

The students — some of whom were too shy to even say their names in public at the start of the academy — will have a grand finale of sorts with a leadership conference that will combine everything they've learned.

The academy is broken down into seven basic lessons: character development; teamwork; character; organizational leadership; excellence in leadership; setting goals and objectives, making plans and developing a timeline; and teaching leadership.

"We learn about teamwork, not to be shy, to take responsibility and to have respect," said Sara Duszynski, a fourth-grader who has been in the academy for about four months now.



Duszynski said the academy has helped her make friends and have a better life. In fact, the academy helped her solve a serious problem.

Once upon a time, some people at school were mean to her, Duszynski said. So she was mean back to them — something she decided to change after becoming part of the academy.

"I learned to respect the people who were being mean to me," she said. "I was nicer to them, and they were more respectful to me."

Other students have found the pride and confidence to overcome shyness and timid tendencies, Person said.

"We have seen such a great impact on the children," she said. "The students had the strength of character; they just weren't taking the leadership roles."

Sara Duszynski, a Wilson fourth-grader in the Leadership Academy, raises her hand after the class instructor asks who in the class has set a goal recently.

Now, these students have "stepped up to the plate," Person said — volunteering to appear in the school's videos, serve as greeters and helping out other ways around the school.

"It may not seem like a big deal," she said. "But it really is. For them, it is."

And that's just what Ford had in mind.

"Our youth are our greatest asset," he said. "They're just like any other investment — if you pour heavily into it initially, you'll have great returns.

"Each student has tremendous potential to turn (his or her) life around and make a dramatic change," he said.

"Just by getting better grades or taking a stand and doing what's right, they gain increased self-worth, more confidence to do anything they want to do in the future."

> "We wanted to bring the natural need children have to enhance their leadership abilities together with the best leaders our country has. And there's so much evidence that the Army produces the best leaders."

Passover celebrates liberation for Jews

Retired Capt. Neil Block
Jewish lay leader

The very important Passover holiday, which celebrates the liberation of the Jewish people from Egyptian slavery and oppression more than 3,000 years ago, is celebrated in the early Spring. The date changes from year to year because the Jewish calendar, which marks it, is based on the lunar cycle, which is slightly different from the calendar we traditionally use — based on the solar cycle.

God commands that every Jewish man, woman and child commemorate the celebration of the redemption from a life of endless enslavement.

The celebration is based around a ritual meal where foods are served and consumed in a certain order. During the meal, the story of the miraculous exodus from Egypt is recounted. It is a festive family and community-oriented celebration and has a very specific order.

Although the ritual meal is called a Seder, the word really means "order" because of the fixed structure of the celebration.

According to the story of the Exodus, Moses, the great Jewish leader, a prince of the Egyptian court who raised by a daughter of the pharaoh and, as instructed by God to do, asked the Pharaoh to "let my people go." Pharaoh refused. As a consequence of Pharaoh's refusal, God caused a series of 10 plagues to visit upon the Egyptians.

REFLECTIONS

Not until after the last plague, the slaying of the firstborn of every Egyptian household, did Pharaoh relent and allow Moses to lead the Jewish people out of the land of Egypt. To ensure that the angel of death passed over the Jews' houses, the faithful marked their door posts. Hence the name Passover.

The Jews left Egypt so quickly that they did not have time to prepare, and the bread for the journey did not have time to be leavened. The non-rising, unleavened bread is called matzah and is required to be eaten during the Passover Seder in commemoration of the journey.

Other specific foods, such as vegetables which symbolize springtime and rebirth; a mixture of chopped nuts, apples, honey and wine and spices, which symbolizes the mortar the Jewish slaves used in making bricks; a roasted egg to symbolize the sacrifices during the days of the Temple, a roasted lamb bone symbolizing the Paschal Lamb; salt water representing the tears of the Jewish people who cried out for God; and wine are all parts of the Seder meal.

During the meal, as the story of the Exodus is recounted., we are reminded that the preciousness of liberty and freedom for all people is God's goal and should not be taken for granted. We thank God for his precious gift of liberty and freedom.

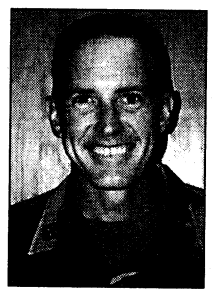
Negative labels can be hazardous

Chaplain (Maj.) Jeffrey Hawkins
Chaplain Family Life Center



"You're a smart aleck, aren't you?" the coach said. "Don't you bother coming back to my practice with that hippie hair." It was 1971. I was 10 years old. And I had just been labeled.

Maybe you've been labeled. Any of you out there "lazy" or "pigheaded?" How about "driven" or "bitter?" Perhaps "shy" or "aloof?"

Maybe you've done some labeling. "You're so stupid." "I can't believe you're really that slow." "Why are you so uncoordinated?"

Negative labels can be hazardous cargo we carry with us all our days, slowly eating away at our self-esteem. Who among us hasn't said something out of anger or frustration to a child of ours only later to think, "Man, I wish I wouldn't have said that."

Think back on your childhood. What negative labels did you pick up from those around you? How many of those shadows still cast themselves on your life today? How often have you unintentionally stuck a label on one of your children that they might not feel very good about?

Hawkins

The trouble with labels is that, once given, we start to play those roles. It's been said that people tend to live up, or down, to the expectations given them. How can we help our children break free of any negative labels and roles they may have picked up? Faber and Mazlish list six steps in their great little read, How To Talk So Kids Will Listen and How To Listen So That Kids Will Talk:

• Look for opportunities to show your children new pictures of themselves.

• Put your children in situations where they can see themselves differently.

• Let your children overhear you say something positive about them.

• Model the very behavior you want them to demonstrate.

• Be a storehouse for your children's special moments ("I remember the time you ....)

• If the children "slip back" into the old label or roles, state your feelings and restate your expectations. (I don't like that. Despite your strong feelings, I expect sportsmanship from you.")

Rather than negative labels, turn it around! What 10 positive labels might you come up with for your children this week? Write them out. Post them where you'll see them. Then have fun finding ways of catching them doing right and describing their new labels to them. (You're so diligent — you didn't give up even though you were frustrated. You're so affectionate — how did you do that? You're conscientious — that means you're concerned about doing it right ... I like that about you.)

Want more tips on talking so your kids will listen? Visit us in Building 2606 in Soldiers' Plaza or call 545-1760.

USAMU Soldier qualifies for Greece

Competition brings out best in 'old man'

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

At 43, Sgt. 1st Class Bret Erickson has been around the block a few times. Or in his case, around the world.

The U.S. Army Marksmanship Unit shooter has competed in various world competitions, including two Olympic Games — the 1992 Olympics in Barcelona, Spain, and the 1996 Olympics in Atlanta.

"Those were fun to compete in," the Bennington, Neb., native said. "Knowing that I was competing against some of the best shooters in the world meant a lot to me, and it is something that I will never forget. I'll be able to tell my grandkids about it and that's pretty cool."

For right now, though, Erickson has to put those memories on the back burner, so he can create new ones as he gets ready to head to Athens, Greece, where the first Olympics were held, for the XXVIII Olympiad.

Erickson qualified for the 2004 Olympics at the final Olympic selection match in the trap event at Hook Range Saturday.

"I'm excited to be going back to the Olympics," he said. "At my age, I should be going with a walker, but somehow I'm not."

Erickson earned a slot on the Olympic team after his performances in the Fall and Spring Selection Matches at Fort Benning.

While growing up in Nebraska, Erickson's father taught him American trap.

"Once my dad taught me the sport, I fell in love with it," Erickson said. "Now, it's something I'm hooked on and will probably continue to do even after I retire from the military."

Throughout the Olympic trials, Erickson held one of the top two spots in the event.

"I wanted to prove to myself that I could do it again," he said. "Shooting is something I love to do, and I don't know if I'll ever have a chance to compete at the Olympic level again."

Lt. Col. David Liwanag, USAMU commander, said Erickson is a great example for Soldiers.

"He's never given up his dream of standing on the medal stand at the Olympics," Liwanag said. "He's continuously strived to be the best, and it shows when he's on the range competing."

Going into the final day of the competition, Erickson said he knew he had a comfortable lead over the third-place shooter, but he was still nervous.

"I don't know what it is about this competition," he said. "I guess I just wanted it so bad."

During the competition, Erickson said the only thing he concentrated on was his shooting.

"I'm not a scoreboard watcher," he said. "I have to go out there and shoot the way I know I can. I can't control what other people do, so why should I worry about it? If I'm shooting like I should, then I know I'll be up there."

Erickson said he plans to just relax until the Olympic games.

"I don't want to get out there and shoot too much," he said. "I don't want to be tired of shooting by the time I get to Athens. I want to ensure that when I go there, I am having fun. That's why I got into the sport and that's what I want to continue to happen."

Blue Devils' defense sets new standard

Columbus lacrosse builds confidence

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

The Columbus lacrosse team went into its Friday night game against the Kennesaw Mountain Mustangs with expectations of winning against a high-profile opponent.

But the Lady Blue Devils weren't able to get anything past the Lady Mustangs' goalie, Sarah McClendon, and lost the game 7-1.

"The goalie was tough," said senior Carson Chuites, left attack wing. "Every shot we threw at her, she was stopping.

"We started the game by trying to shoot over her left shoulder because she wasn't getting those in warm-ups," Chuites said. "When she stopped those shots from us, we tried to shoot past her legs, but she was stopping those also. She was on her game."

Even with the loss, the Lady Blue Devils didn't hang their heads after the game.

"This is the first time the defense has held a team to single digits in goals," said assistant coach John Kocian. "That's a victory for us. We know that we don't need to make any major changes to our defensive style. All we have to do is work out the small kinks. Our defense is where it needs to be at. So, we'll build on that positive and go from there."

The Blue Devils held off countless Mustang attacks in the first 10 minutes of the match, but were unable to keep the momentum as Mustangs' attacker junior Heather Thompson scored to break the 0-0 tie.

The Mustangs scored two more quick goals to increase their lead to 3-0.

Before the end of the half, the Blue Devils got on the board with a goal by junior Liz Evans.

"The goal really built our confidence going into halftime," Kocian said. "We were very confident that we could come back and win the game."

The Mustangs put an end to those plans, scoring two goals midway through the second half to take the lead, 5-1.

Even though the Blue Devils were down, the players continued to hustle on every play and managed a few collisions with the Mustangs in the process.

"It was a tough, physical game," Chuites said. "Even though we didn't come out on top with a win, we hung in there and continued to fight on every play. We didn't give up and that shows what we are made of."

With the loss, Columbus' record dropped to 1-4. However, Kocian said, that record is not a real showing of how good the team really is.

> "We know we don't need to make any major changes to our defensive style. Our defense is where it needs to be at. So we'll build on that ..."

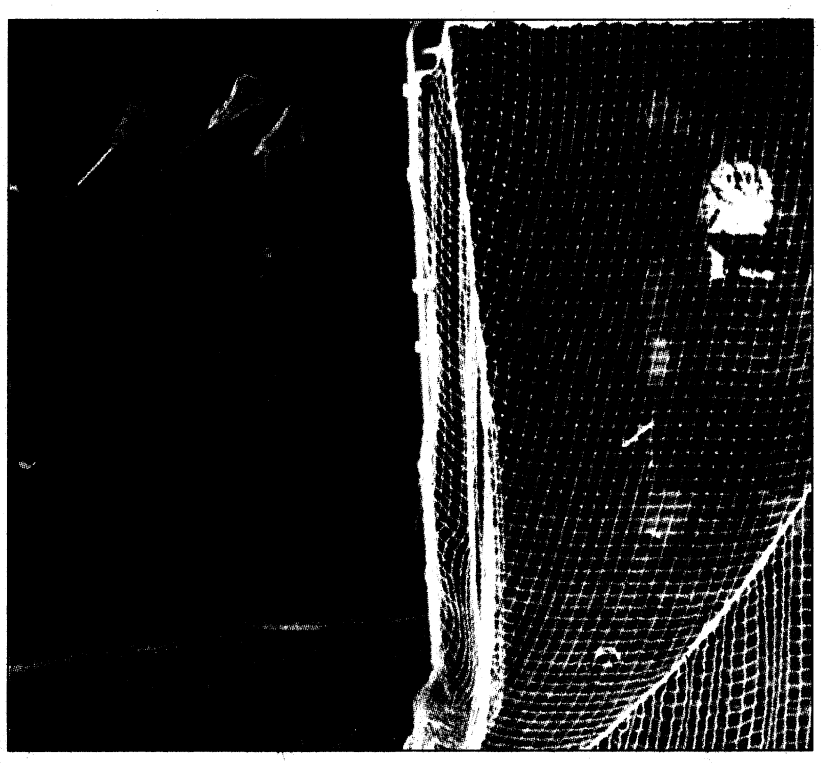
> Assistant lacrosse coach

"This team is an awesome bunch," he said. "We've been in a few games where if some of the plays would have gone our way, we could've made a difference in the outcome. But that's the way the ball rolls, and you can't do anything about that now."



The Lady Blue Devils will be back in action at 7 p.m. today in Doughboy Stadium against Woodward Academy. There is no charge of admission to attend the game.

"If we played the way we did against Kennesaw Mountain, I am sure we can come out on top," Kocian said. "It's just a matter of believing in ourselves and believing that we can do it."

Faith fields track team

Children set expectations for season

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

Running isn't something most children particularly enjoy. At least, that's what Harry Cleveland thought when he became the coach of Faith Middle School's new track team.

But after seeing more than 50 students from the school show up to the first practice, Cleveland was stunned.

"I didn't think this many students would be interested in running," he said. "But I was wrong and I'm glad I was. We have a big team this year, and I know they will do great things and accomplish many feats."

The Warrior Bears' track team trains on Mondays, Wednesdays and Thursdays at the track inside of Doughboy Stadium to prepare for track meets against other area middle schools.

"We've had one meet so far, and that was against Smiths Station Middle School," Cleveland said. "We didn't do as well as I had hoped, but I see a lot of potential in these students. They now know what it takes to be good, and I believe they're willing to go that extra step to do that."

When practices started, Cleveland said he had a hard time keeping the students under control. But after their meet, he said, many of them realized the teams they compete against are "for real," and they need to get serious about what they're doing.

"A couple of them came up to me after they lost their races and wanted to know how they could get better," he said. "I told them they need to discipline themselves in practice, so they can become outstanding runners."

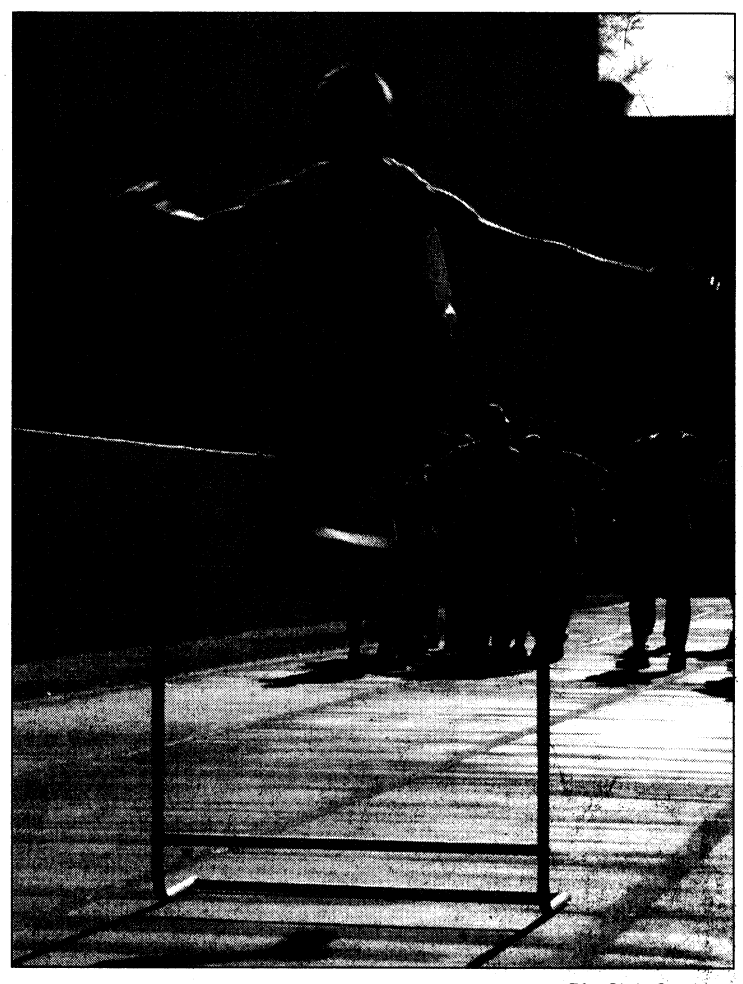
For eighth-graders Andrew Brown and Ricky Simmons, track is something they hope they can compete in next year in high school.

"The competition is fun," Brown said. "It's something that keeps me in shape and will keep me healthy."

Simmons said he wants to burn people on the track.

"There's nothing like leaving someone in the dust," Simmons said. "It motivates me to get better, because I don't like it when I'm in someone else's dust. I prefer to be in front."

Sixth-graders Rameca Simmons and Cheyanne Tumaliuan decided to run on the team because they both had run cross-country and they loved it.



"It relaxes you," Tumaliuan said. "It's something where all you have to do is concentrate on what you're doing."

Rameca said her favorite event is the hurdles because she is able to both run and jump in the same event.

"It's more than just running," Rameca said. "There's an extra skill involved in the race — that makes it more difficult."

Brown said his main goal this year is to improve on his events, so he can be ready for track season in high school next year.

"When I go to high school, I want to know what I'm doing," he said. "I don't want to be like a lot of incoming freshman and not know what's going on. I want to get there the first day of practice and get down to business. High school track is very serious, and there is no time to goof around. You have to get the job done every time you go out there."

Championships bring out best

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

For the first time in 10 years, Fort Benning hosted the All-Army Small-Arms Championships on McAndrews Range.

The competition drew more than 135 of the best shooters from around the Army, including active-duty, Reserve Soldiers, National Guardsmen and cadets from the U.S. Military Academy.

"The competition was fun," said Pfc. Alex Perez, 2nd Battalion, 34th Armor Regiment, Fort Riley, Kan. "It made me realize where my shooting was and helped me understand what I need to work on to get better."

There were six matches in the competition: Pistol Matches 201 and 202, Rifle Matches 301 and 302, and the Combined Small-Arms Matches 601 and 602.

Winners of the events were Staff Sgt. Charles Blackwell, Army National Guard's 161st Medical Battalion, who won Pistol Match 201 and 202 and the Combined Small Arms 601 and 602, and Sgt. 1st Class David Kerin 28th Signal Battalion, who won Rifle Match 301 and 302.

During the competition, Soldiers shot their M-16 A2 rifles at targets from 200, 300 and 500 meters.

"Most Soldiers are only taught how to shoot up to 300 meters," said Lt. Col. David Liwanag, U.S. Army Marksmanship Unit commander. "However, when you're on a battlefield, are you going to just shoot at targets that are within a 300-meter distance, or are you also going to shoot at the targets that are farther off? We're going beyond what these Soldiers know, and that will help them in the end."

Perez and the other Soldiers who participated in the competition not only had the opportunity to go against other shooters from around the Army — but were also taught advanced firing techniques by the USAMU.

The key to the whole competition was to ensure that the Soldiers focused on what they were being taught.

"That's what we're doing here," Liwanag said. "We're here to show advanced marksmanship techniques so Soldiers can be effective when they're shooting at a target at any range."

The pistol competitions were shot at 15 meters with the M-9 pistol.

"The pistol competition was harder because you didn't have as much time to shoot as you did with the rifle competition," Perez said. "Plus, if you're off by a little bit, that could really mess up your score and hurt you in the overall standings. So, you had to really steady yourself and have your aim at dead center."

Liwanag said the Soldiers will take many things back to their home stations including the advanced firing techniques.

"We teach, if you can see it, you can hit it," Liwanag said. "If you can hit it, you can kill it."

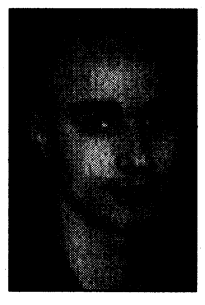
THE BAMBINO VERSUSES THE BILLY GOAT

Which curse will end first?

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff



Last year, I heard people discussing the issue of which curse would end first — the Curse of the Bambino or the Curse of the Billy Goat?

Before I make my pick, let's take a stroll down memory lane.

First, we'll start with the lovable losers, the Chicago Cubs.

In 1945, a Greek tavern owner by the name of William "Billy Goat" Sianis bought season tickets in box seats for him and his goat, Murphy. During Game 4 against the Detroit Tigers, Sianis was stopped at the front gate by ushers and told he couldn't come in. After talking to Cubs' owner P.K. Wrigley, the ushers told Sianis he could come in, but not the goat. When Sianis asked Wrigley why, he said "because the goat smells."

That upset him, so in retaliation, he stood in front of Wrigley Field and said, "Cubs, they not gonna win anymore. There never gonna be another World Series at Wrigley Field."

Thus the "Curse of the Billy Goat," was cast over the Cubs.

Since then, the Cubs have never been to a World Series. They've gotten close, but the curse continues to haunt them — most notably, last year when the Cubs were up three games to one on the Florida Marlins and all they had to do was get five more outs and they would get to the World Series.

I believe the billy goat summoned Steve Bartman to the game, where on the next pitch, a foul ball went into the stands and Bartman prevented Moises Alou from making the catch. The Marlins would later rally in the inning, win the game and, ultimately, the series.

Chicago fans think they have gotten rid of the curse by blowing up what is now called "the Bartman ball." I guess we'll see if that holds true this year.

Now, for "The Curse of the Bambino," for the Red Sox fans.

To sum it up, in 1920, Red Sox owner Harry Frazee sold the greatest player to ever play the game, Babe Ruth, to the New York Yankees. Since then, the Yankees have won 26 World Series and the Red Sox haven't won any.

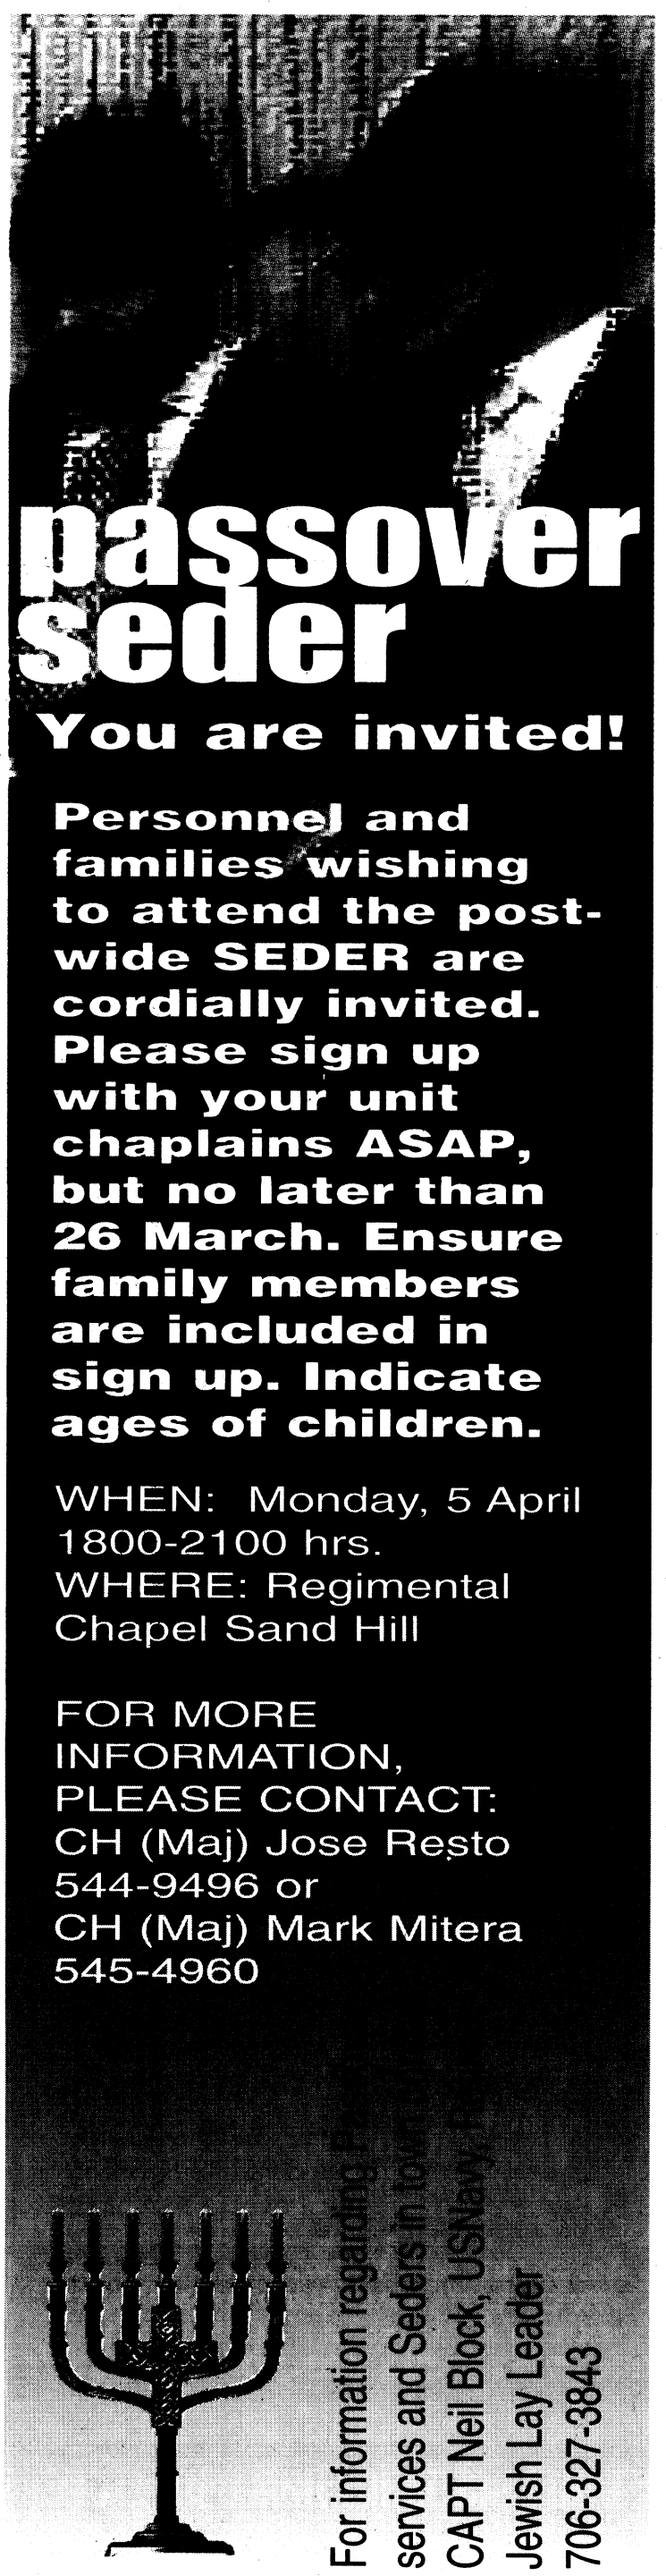
The Red Sox have been to four World Series, but have been unable to crack the curse.

My favorite curse moment is from the 1986 World Series when the Red Sox were up three games to two on the New York Mets, and were only one strike away from breaking the curse.

Then, everybody knows what happened next — the Bill Buckner fielding gem, which led to Game 7, where the Red Sox got out to an early lead, but crumbled in the middle of the game and lost.

Then there was last year when the Red Sox came close to going to World Series again, but the Yankees' Aaron Boone hit a walk-off home run in the bottom of the 11th inning to send the Yankees to the World Series. Poor Boston fans! I guess their slogan will continue . . . "Wait til next year."

They've been waiting til next year for 85 years.



So, which curse will most likely be broken before the other?

As much as I would like to see the Red Sox win it all, it's hard to imagine they can do it this year. After the off-season trade rumors involving Nomar Garciapara and Manny Ramirez falling through, I don't think there is much happiness in Beantown right now.

However, the Cubs have an excellent 1-2 pitching punch in Kerry Wood and Mark Prior to make a run at breaking the curse. Not to mention they have perennial all-star Sammy Sosa and the National League dark-horse, a guy I competed against in high school, Corey Patterson.

This is the year the "Billy Goat Curse," will be vanquished. It will be no more. My pick, the Cubs will beat the Red Sox in five games in the World Series, which will be played in Chicago, at Wrigley Field.

Now how's that for the Cubs not winning another World Series?

Benning to survey drinkers

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

Debrah Manning couldn't believe her ears.

"I rolled that sucker three times and walked away without a scratch," a young Soldier boasted of his recent car accident.

The Soldier was a student in Army Drug Abuse Prevention and Training; his accident was alcohol-related.

That comment was "the voice of youth and inexperience speaking," said Manning, a prevention coordinator at Fort Benning's Army Substance Abuse Program.

Unfortunately, she said, many Soldiers follow that train of thought.

"They believe they are 10 feet tall and bullet proof, that bad things only happen to other people," she said. "Unfortunately, due to alcohol abuse, we sometimes become those 'other people.'"

As of 2000, 21 percent of service members admitted to drinking heavily, and young military people between the ages of 18 and 25 drank more heavily than their civilian peers, according to an American Forces Press Service article.

By 2002, a Department of Defense Survey of Health Related Behaviors Among Military Personnel identified that military personnel ages 18 to 25 showed a rate of 27.3 percent of heavy drinking, said Yvonne Wilbanks, alcohol and drug control officer for ASAP.

Heavy drinking is defined as having five or more drinks on a single occasion at least once a week, she said.

Post officials to break ground today

"To say that I'm overwhelmed with joy that the construction of the new chapel is underway would be an understatement," said Chaplain (Col.) Joseph O'Keeffe, garrison chaplain pastor, as he talked about today's groundbreaking ceremony for the new chapel.

The groundbreaking ceremony will begin at 10:15 a.m. on Ingersoll Avenue in front of Wynnsong, the post theater.

"There were many doubting Thomases that a new chapel was going to be built, but prayer and the great support of Congressman Mac Collins and Senator Zeb Miller got the congressional approval and funding for the chapel," O'Keeffe said.

Once completed, the 22,057-square-foot chapel facility will hold a religious education resource center, four offices, 12 classrooms, two multipurpose

3rd ID commander visits post

Discusses force changes, restructuring

Spc. Nikki St. Amant
Bayonet staff

Maj. Gen. William Webster, the commanding general of the 3rd Infantry Division, outlined changes to Army force structure and described the possible impact of those changes on the global war on terrorism, the Army and the 3rd Inf. Div. during a press conference at Malone Range 7 on Sand Hill March 25.

Webster, who served as the deputy commanding general of land forces under Gen. Tommy Franks during the first phase of Operation Iraqi Freedom, said the Army chief of staff decided the Army will be more efficient and effective if it was reorganized.

Webster

He said the Army was previously division-focused. When mobilized for deployment, Soldiers who had never trained, lived with or even met each other were thrown together just prior to arriving in theater.

Under the new organizational structure, he said, the force will be brigade-focused. Each brigade will have all the elements it needs to deploy, fight and sustain its presence with little need for higher support.

As part of this restructuring movement, Webster said, the Army is working to form 10 to 15 additional brigades — without increasing total-Army end strength.

The 3rd ID was tasked to form two extra brigades. The division now consists of four maneuver brigades and an aviation brigade, which is twice the size it was before, Webster said.

The goal of this restructuring, Webster said, is to increase performance, morale and sustainability.

"In the future," Webster said, "Soldiers who will deploy together will live, work and breathe together all the time."

The new brigade combat teams will be labeled "units of action."

Webster said 3rd Brigade, 3rd Inf. Div., is unique in that its structure already mirrors the projected force structure.

All the components of the envisioned brigade combat team are here and have been training and fighting together for years, through peace and war, he said.

CALLING IT QUITS

Ditch drinking debacles

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

I like to drink. I like going out to the bar with my friends, kicking back, having a good time. I like to catch a little "buzz" now and then. I like the atmosphere, the people.

It's harmless fun, and (most of the time), I stay in control — I know when it's time to quit.

But drinking can be a bit like a game of Russian Roulette. Not just for me, but for so many people. Because there's that invisible line, the one you don't think about as your bar tab grows and the table fills up with empty bottles and glasses.

Where one more drink means the difference between making it home safely in a cab or being the person escorted out of the bar, unconscious, by security with vomit stains on their clothes.

Fortunately, I haven't visited that rock bottom (at least not in public), but it wasn't that long ago that I was close.

It wasn't long ago that I tiptoed that line, dangerously close to going off the deep end with my drinking habits.

Am I an alcoholic? No, I wouldn't say so. Did my life suffer really traumatic, permanent damage? No, I didn't climb behind the wheel or black out in public venues or get arrested — nothing that dramatic. My drunken deeds aren't going to rival or even compare to those you would hear in an AA meeting.

In fact, the only person they really hurt that badly was me.

But that's my point. When we lose control, we've gone too far. When we start drinking to get obliterated, when we regularly call our friends the next day to piece together the events of the previous night, when we wake up with no recollection of getting home, when we forfeit control of our faculties and sensibilities ... we've gone too far.

I'm a lucky girl, if you ask me. Not long ago, anything could have happened to me and there wouldn't have been much I could do about it. Because I wasn't in control of myself or my binge drinking.

I was a sitting duck for ill-intentioned guys, mean-spirited girls, anyone who wanted to take advantage of me. And I was blessed that no one ever did. But I see it all the time now. Now that I can stop once I've started.

I see people passed out in the bathroom, head on a toilet seat countless people have used just that night. I see people getting in fights, getting booted from bars. I see people who have been drinking for hours climb into their cars even after their friends have pleaded with them not to drive. I see people staggering home with strangers — different strangers than they left with last weekend.

Some of them I know, some of them I don't. It doesn't really matter.

Because we all have to ask ourselves — is it really worth it? When all it takes is a little bit of extra effort to avoid crossing the line— drinking slowly, pacing yourself, stopping when you know you need to. You still get to have fun. You still get to join in the party and have a good time with your friends.

And what are we really giving up? Are we having such a great time when we wake up with a ridiculously bad hangover that lasts all day only to go do it all over again that night? Are we having that much fun when we're strapped for cash a week before payday because we spent our paycheck at the bar?

Is it really worth it when we're facing serious day-after consequences? Maybe a DUI or a wrecked car, maybe a sexually transmitted disease or an unwanted pregnancy. Maybe cuts and bruises. Maybe wounds that can't be healed. Whatever the consequences, is it really worth it to cross that line?

What are you gonna do?

Bridgett Siter
Bayonet staff

What if, when a baby was born, Mom and Dad took a vow, kinda like they did when they wed? What if they promised to love and cherish and honor in sickness or in health.

Never forsaking.
Never shaking.
Never hurting.
Never beating.

And never, never, never — need it be said? — shoving or smacking or kicking or punching till death do they part.

It's National Child Abuse Awareness Month.

Are you aware that a Fort Benning Soldier was recently charged with killing his 5-year-old stepdaughter, a tiny slip of a thing with big brown eyes and an angel's smile. India was her name. He beat her, officials say, and left her to die on her bed.

Sorry, did I make you flinch?

Are you aware that the children of a Fort Benning family were recently taken from their parents? "Removed from the home" is the accepted verbiage, I think. They were hungry and dirty and mad at the world, and their constant rages at school were surely a cry for help.

Did you hear it?

What good is Child Abuse Awareness Month if we don't rip the blinders from our eyes? What good is it to be aware that child abusers live among us if it doesn't incite righteous anger and a willingness — better yet, a determination — to stop the abuse.

The question, then, is how?

The dream of ending abuse is a vague and lofty goal, like ending war and hunger throughout the world. It seems so unrealistic as to be unattainable. Much easier to close our eyes and ears and pray for peace, yadayadayada.

Many years ago, when I was just a child, there was a young woman in our church who married a widower and inherited a houseful of small children.

Together, they added a couple more to the brood within a couple of years.

The good church members watched and smirked and whispered and rolled their eyes as the overtaxed woman went into a slow, stressful tailspin. Even I, at the tender and totally self-absorbed age of 10, could see this woman had reached the breaking point.

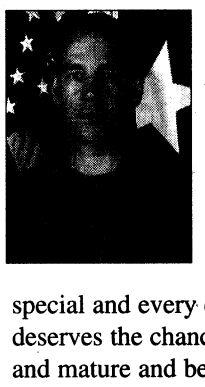
A broken arm here, a broken leg there. And bruises, always bruises.

My mom, a quiet woman of immeasurable faith who raised us seven with a firm hand (yes, she spanked, but she never abused), put her faith into action.

She stepped forward, reached out to the woman and offered something no one else had been willing to give — someone to talk to, someone to relate to, and someone full of the sage wisdom that comes with raising half a dozen children, plus one.

I wish I could tell you this story had a happy ending. I truly don't know.

I don't know what became of that family, but I know what became of the 10-year-old girl who watched her mother take a stand.



She grew up to write a column about National Child Abuse Awareness Month. And she wonders, if she had known little India and the mom and dad who should've vowed to cherish her, would she have reached out to help?

PROCLAMATION

CG stands up for kids

Children are our future — our most precious resource, the leaders of tomorrow.

We need to nurture children, protect them, defend them, and see in them all the promise and hope of our communities and our country.

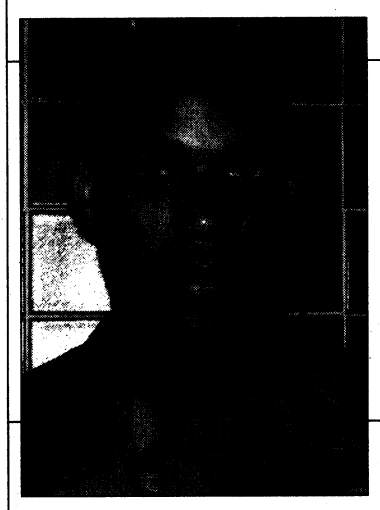
Since 1974, we have been committed by law, by regulation, and by action to take an active role in making sure child abuse and maltreatment are eliminated.

Abuse and neglect hurt and injure children now and undermine the potential for leadership and caregiving in the next generation.

Nurturing and protecting are the focus of the family, yet everyone has a part to play in protecting children and preventing child abuse.

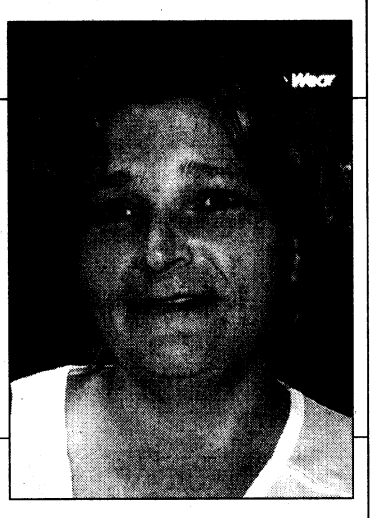
Our military and civilian professionals have specific responsibilities to assure the safety of children. However, the nurturing of children requires a contribution from everyone.

Only caring, communities can produce caring competent children. Each child is special and every child deserves the chance to grow and mature and be part of a peaceful world.



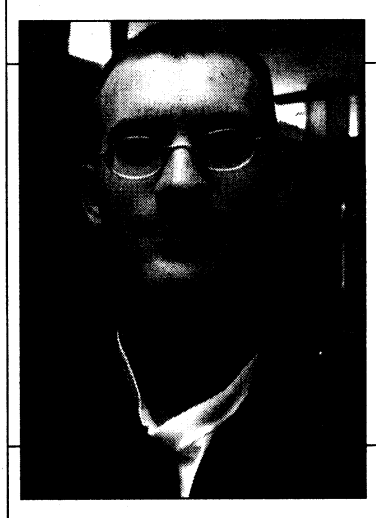
Therefore, I declare April 2004 Child Abuse Prevention Month at Fort Benning and call upon all Soldiers, families, citizens, community agencies, religious organizations, medical facilities, and businesses to increase their participation in our efforts to prevent child abuse, thereby strengthening the community in which we live.

Protect America's future by protecting America's children.



Brig. Gen. Benjamin Freakley
Commanding General

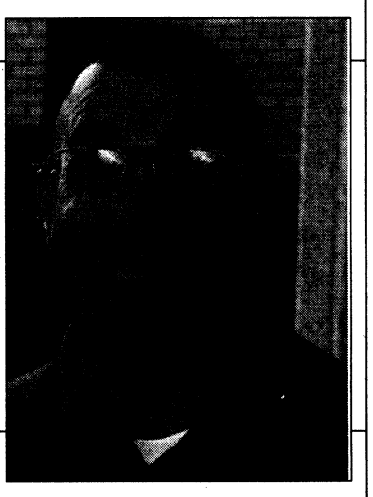
VARIOUS VOICES



How can alcohol abuse affect your life?

Sgt. Marcus Bloxton, 1st Battalion, 19th Infantry Regiment — "Alcohol can make you very dehydrated, and it can also make you do very badly on your PT test. It'll also burn out your liver."

Dorothy Davis, family member — "Alcohol can do away with a relationship. It makes it hard to communicate and it is just hard to deal with."



Pvt. Mateo Vaux, 30th AG — "It'll tear your career apart. When I was in the Marine Corps, I saw people I worked with get in big trouble because of it. It's just not worth it."

Damaris Flores, family member — "Drunken driving can kill innocent family members — even one of your own. I have friends who have been hit by drunken drivers. It's unfair to families and their children."

Sgt. Michael Skelle, 2nd Battalion, 29th Infantry Regiment — "Drinking too much in front of your children will make them think it's OK. It's just a bad thing for your kids to see."

Harry Hovey, retired — "Alcohol sometimes leads to promiscuous behavior, causing problems in your marriage, if you're married, or causing sexually transmitted diseases. Also, your friends won't want to hang out with you, because no one likes a lush."

OCS inducts 41 into Hall of Fame

Melissa House
Bayonet staff

Following a tradition begun in 1952, the Officer Candidate School will induct 41 of its graduates into the OCS Hall of Fame in a ceremony at 3 p.m. today in Marshall Auditorium.

The Hall of Fame was established to honor OCS Medal of Honor recipients and other distinguished graduates to motivate and provide an incentive for OCS candidates and graduates to excel.

"The Hall of Fame is extremely important to the OCS," said Lt. Col. Bradley Booth, commander, 3rd Battalion (OCS), 11th Infantry Regiment. "A sense of tradition and history is critical to building unit cohesion and espirit de corps."

To date, 2,136 Soldiers have been inducted into the Hall of Fame. Induction is automatic for any OCS graduate who has received the Medal of Honor or attained general officer rank. Other nominees are selected based on their distinguished service in their civilian and military careers.

There's no real checklist, said Capt. Enrique Torres, Hall of Fame action officer. The induction board, six local officers, votes on the nominees.

Booth said it is essential to recognize OCS graduates for their tremendous service to the Army and the nation and he is impressed by this year's inductees.

"They are a tremendous group," Booth said. "They represent literally hundreds of years of Army service."

The group, he said, is composed of everyone from junior officers who led units in combat to senior Army leadership.

Among the inductees are Col. Frank Harmon III, commander of Fort Benning's 29th Inf. Regt., and Lt. Col. Kim Orlando, who was killed in action last year in Iraq while commanding the 716th Military Police Battalion, 101st Airborne Division.

Booth said the Hall of Fame inductees are true role models for today's candidates.

Since candidates and cadre have the opportunity to mingle with the inductees, the events provide a glimpse of the type of contributions the nation asks of OCS graduates.

"OCS continues to turn out great officers for the Army and the nation," Booth said. "The standards, principles and purpose of why General Bradley created OCS are as valid today as they were 60 years ago."

As part of the Hall of Fame celebration, Torres said the inductees met for dinner at the Officers' Club Thursday, and will hold a reception following today's ceremony in Wigle Hall.

Wigle Hall is the building designated as the OCS Hall of Fame. The hall was officially named in 1958 in honor of 2nd Lt. Thomas Wigle, a 1943 OCS graduate and the first graduate to earn the Medal of Honor.

Former Special Forces Soldier receives Patterson Award

Melissa House
Bayonet staff

Although he's only a second lieutenant, James Clark is already out on top.

Clark was selected as this year's recipient of the Patterson Award as the outstanding graduate of the Officer Candidate School.

Clark was nominated by the command group of 3rd Battalion (OCS), 11th Infantry Regiment, and represents the best of the more than 1,200 OCS graduates from the past year.

Members of the Patterson Foundation in New York selected Clark for the honor.

Clark, a native of Metairie, La., joined the Army in 1989, following in the footsteps of his father, grandfather and great uncle.

"I was drawn to it (the Army) from my family and it was a good thing to do," Clark said.

"I didn't necessarily plan at the outset to stay," he said. "But I'm the first one in my family to make it a career."

Clark did a tour at Fort Carson, Colo., before going to Fort Bragg, N.C., for the Special Forces Assessment Selection and the qualification course in 1991.

After five years at Fort Bragg, Clark said he got to see all the places the 7th Special Forces Group had to offer, spending six to eight months at a time in Central and South America and the Caribbean.

Then, with six years under his belt in a forward-deployed SF company, and his name on the master sergeant promotion list, Clark decided he had done everything he wanted to do.

So he applied for OCS.

"I wanted to find a way to stay in direct contact, leading Soldiers," Clark said.

And he'll do just that as a platoon leader in the 82nd Airborne Division when he reports for duty in May.

Clark will have to do degree completion after his platoon leader time, and then plans to go back to the SF as a team leader.

To do that, Clark said, requires him to attend the SF course again.

"I did it the first time at 20 or 21. This time, I'll do it at 35 or 36. It will make for good war stories later, when I'm old."

Lt. Col. Bradley Booth, commander, 3rd Bn. (OCS), 11th Inf. Regt., said Clark's selection as the distinguished leader graduate of OCS Class 4-03, his military record as an enlisted Soldier and his performance at OCS and in the Infantry Officer Basic Course led to his selection.

The Patterson Award was established in 1952 by friends of Judge Robert P. Patterson, who set up a trust fund on his behalf.

Patterson enlisted in the 7th Infantry New York Army National Guard in 1915 and was commissioned in the infantry after completing Officer's Training Camp in 1916.

He served in both world wars, leading infantry Soldiers and displaying extraordinary heroism in action in 1918, when he earned the Distinguished Service Cross on a "daring daylight reconnaissance into enemy lines and personally destroying an enemy outpost."

He also earned the Silver Star and Purple Heart.

After leaving the military, Patterson served on the U.S. District Court and Circuit Court of Appeals and as undersecretary of war for President Franklin Roosevelt and secretary of war for President Truman.

At the time of his death in a plane crash in 1952, he had dedicated 21 years to military and government service.

Clark will take a windfall with him as he leaves Fort Benning. His prize for winning the Patterson Award — an engraved 9 mm Beretta pistol in a presentation case and a check for somewhere around $2,000 made out to his wife, Kary.

The check, Clark said, represents the interest accrued on the Patterson trust fund, and will be going into his "house fund" for the family's move to Fort Bragg.

"It's, by far, the nicest award I've ever gotten," he said.

Army speeds up issue process

Commercial items tested for Soldier use

Spc. Eliamar Castanon
Bayonet staff

The Soldier Enhancement Program is now looking for input and ideas from Soldiers during its current revitalization process.

The program tries to get commercial, off-the-shelf items to Soldiers in less than three years instead of the normal research, development, testing and evaluation process that may take six to 10 years.

"The troops are going out and spending money out of their pockets to buy items that will make their missions and lives easier while they're out in the field," said Sgt. Maj. Tom House, Training and Doctrine Command Systems Manager-Soldier sergeant major. "The goal of SEP is to make equipment that Soldiers are buying available through the Army in less than three years."

SEP, however, does not purchase or issue any equipment for Soldiers.

Its main purpose is to identify the need for an item, test it and type classify it — procurement dollars must still be budgeted for the equipment, said Ken Sutton, SEP manager for TSM-Soldier.

Soldiers and their commanders are encouraged to submit ideas to SEP for consideration; however, it is not an incentive award program, House said. No monetary awards are given for proposals that are adopted for use and result in a cost savings to the government.

In order for an item to go through a SEP evaluation, it must meet certain criteria, House said.

- Will the item be worn, carried or consumed for individual use in a tactical environment?
- Is it a nondevelopmental item that is commercially available, off-the-shelf right now?
- Are Soldiers spending their own money on this item to make their lives better while in the field?

"We do not fix, improve or develop new ideas," House said. "We only take ideas that are already out there and make sure they will help Soldiers."

Some of the successful items that have gone through SEP are items all Soldiers count on while in the field — like the battle dress uniform, desert BDUs, modular sleeping system, the M-4 carbine rifle, desert boots, MRE heaters, M-45 protective masks, the five-Soldier crew tent and more than 30 other items.

There are quarterly meetings held at different installations where ongoing programs are reviewed and new proposals are considered.

House encourages Soldiers to attend the meetings to see what is being offered and supported by combat developers.

During the revitalization process, SEP managers are looking for new ideas on what may be done to speed up the evaluation process, House said. "Some of the items — boots, socks, hats and belts — should only take 12 months to be approved."

Also, SEP is currently in the process of rewriting its policy to provide the logistical trail for items that are currently being issued through the rapid fielding initiative program, House said.

"Currently, when a Soldier receives an item during RFI and they lose it or break it, it is non-replaceable and the Soldier must replace that item him or herself," Sutton said. "We're trying to change that so Soldiers may receive replacement parts through military issue."

The next SEP meeting is scheduled in May at Fort Leonard Wood, Mo.

For more information on the upcoming meetings, call House at 545-3327 or Sutton at 545-6047.

Don't let your dog tags dangle in the dirt ...

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

Today, the U.S. military is developing and testing a new tag, which will hold 80 percent of a Soldier's medical and dental records on a microchip.

This dog tag is not intended to replace the present tag, but rather to augment it as part of the "paperless battlefield" concept.

"The Army is looking for a quicker way to identify Soldiers," said Frank Hanner, director, National Infantry Museum. "If they can scan the chip on the battlefield, the process of identification and relaying information to command and next of kin, will be quicker."

Currently, Soldiers wear military identification tags to ensure they can be identified should they be killed or wounded in battle.

At one time, Soldiers were required to wear them only while in a field environment, traveling in an aircraft or when outside of the continental United States, but the Army Regulation, 600-8-14, was changed in September.

The Fort Benning policy changed at that time as well. Policy memorandum 670-1-5 was signed by Col. Charles Cornwell, chief of staff, U.S. Army Infantry Center, and reads, "Fort Benning Soldiers will wear identification tags (dog tags) at all times while in uniform, with the exception of the physical fitness uniform."

"All Soldiers will wear them," said Fort Benning Command Sgt. Maj. Michael Kelso. "Every Soldier is in an expeditionary Army. All Soldiers are subject to deployment at a moment's notice, no matter what their job is."

So, what are these dog tags? How did they come about? And how have they evolved into what they are today?

The first record of Soldiers wearing these tags was during the Civil War. Their identification tag methods varied and all were purely a result of the Soldier's initiative.

"History tells us that 40 percent of all Civil War dead remain unknown," said Willie Johnson, Kennesaw Mountain National Battlefield Park historian. "If it weren't for the Soldiers taking the initiative to make their own (tags), the number would've been a lot higher."

Currently, Soldiers wear two dog tags. Why?

"Soldiers wear two dog tags, because if they are killed or wounded, one tag goes with the casualty officer to turn in to administration when they turn in a casualty report," Hanner said. "The other tag stays with the body, so that body can be identified. Eventually, the tag may be returned to the family."

The first time the identification tag became an option for Soldiers was in 1899, but didn't become mandatory in Army regulations until 1913.

By 1917, all combat troops were wearing two aluminum discs on a rope or chain. By 1918, serial numbers were introduced, due to many Soldiers having identical names, i.e. Brown, Jones and Williams.

Next in the evolution of dog tags, came a more oblong shape with more uniform printing. First they were made of brass and then a "Monel" metal (an alloy of nickel and copper, melted with small amounts of iron and magnesium) which proved to be more corrosion resistant.

Notched dog tags were adopted in 1940 for wear, but by the early 1970s, the notch was removed, and the dog tags took their present form of stainless steel.

Throughout their evolution, dog tags have maintained some of the same information, including Soldier's surname, first name, middle initial and blood type.

Other information has come and gone including next of kin information and the serial number, which was replaced by the Soldier's Social Security number.

Abbreviations for religious affiliations were added to the tags in 1941 — Protestant (P), Catholic (C) and Hebrew (H). For Soldiers with no religious preference, no letter was printed.

In the early 1940s, there was no regulation on what other items could be worn on dog tag chains.

In today's Army, Soldiers put religious symbols and other personal momentos on the chains.

However, according to the U.S. Army Infantry home page, Soldiers are required to have one long and one short chain interlaced with one I.D. tag per chain. The only other items authorized to be hung from the chain are the Army Values card, one key, any medical alert badges and a barracks pass (if issued).

"No matter how high-tech we think we are," Hanner said, "Soldiers want to know, should they be killed in action, that their bodies will go back home to their loved ones."

"I'm proud to put on my dog tags every day," Kelso said. "There hasn't been one day since I joined the Army, I haven't put them on. It's an Army tradition, and it serves a very useful purpose."

When 'no' means no

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

She was like so many other girls. She got dressed up, headed out on the town, had a drink, maybe two ... the rest is a blur. When she woke up, head pounding, she's unsure of what's going on but feels right away that something isn't right.

And it wasn't. She'd been raped. More than likely, it was someone she knew before — a friend or co-worker, maybe even her boyfriend. More than likely, she can't remember much of it, or any of it. But she knows. She's been violated, taken advantage of. And more than likely, she won't report it.

She is any one of the 683,000 women who are raped each year — 75 percent of whom were raped by someone close to them, 85 percent of whom don't report the incident, according to the National Women's Study.

Date rape, or acquaintance rape, is a common violent crime that too often involves alcohol and "date rape drugs," like Rohypnol and gamma-hydroxybutrate, or GHB.

This crime most often involves two parties who knew each other beforehand — the victim probably trusted her attacker, probably felt she was in safe hands and would be taken care of even if she became inebriated, according to www.rape101.com.

But that's not always the case.

"Some men believe that spending money on a woman creates a situation where the date owes them sex at the end of the evening," the site reads. "Some men also believe that women play hard to get, say 'no' and mean 'yes' and enjoy being pursued by an aggressive male."

Regardless of an attacker's relationship to the victim, regardless of his mentality, anyone who abuses alcohol is at an increased risk for becoming a victim.

"Unfortunately, alcohol use is probably the easiest and most common way to become a victim of a date rape drug," said Debrah Manning, an education and prevention coordinator with Fort Benning's Army Substance Abuse Program.

"The most common scenario is to be out drinking at a club or party," she said. "You leave your drink unattended to go out to the dance floor, visit the restroom — for whatever reason. Someone slips the drug into your drink and walks away. You return, pick up your drink, take a swallow and the drug is now in your system."

Only most women won't detect the drug, Manning said. Although some date rape drugs do have a salty or bitter taste, this flavor is usually covered up by the alcohol. Other drugs are odorless and tasteless.

"The drug's presence is virtually unnoticed," she said. "Until the drug begins to take effect, which can be in as little as 10 to 15 minutes, with the victim being rendered totally unconscious in as little as 30 minutes."

Side effects of these drugs include drowsiness, confusion, dizziness, headaches, impaired judgment, difficulty speaking or walking, loss of consciousness and even amnesia, said Yvonne Wilbanks, alcohol and drug control officer at ASAP.

Sound familiar? These side effects are common signs of intoxication and can easily be mistaken as such.

Although there are steps women — and men — can take to protect themselves from date rape when drinking, Manning said, abusing alcohol can only lend more gravity to a dangerous situation.

"I personally believe that it is everyone's responsibility, male or female, to stay in control of his or her faculties at all times," she said. "Know your limits, know your surroundings, know the people you are with.

"'I was drinking,' 'I was drunk,' 'I didn't know' are not excuses, legally or morally," Manning said. "It doesn't matter if you are the victim or the cause — what's done is done and you can't turn back time."

But you can stop it before it starts. There are many ways to protect yourself from a date-rape scenario, Wilbanks said.

"Go out in groups. Look out for each other and never go off alone with someone you don't know well," she said. "Trust your instincts — if it does not feel right or makes you uncomfortable, leave. Be careful with your drinks and never leave them alone. Never drink something you did not open and pour yourself."

And pay attention, Manning said.

"After you have your drink, never leave it unattended," she said. "If you have to, then when you return to it, dump that drink and get a new one.

"Also be watchful ... If you see someone messing around with another person's drink, question it, or immediately tell the drink's owner what happened. These drugs can render a person who is large and strong as weak as a newborn baby in a matter of minutes."

Manning also warned men to keep their guards up.

"Women are no longer the only victims of date rape drugs," she said. "We are seeing more and more men brought into emergency rooms suffering the effects of these terrible drugs."

For more information about date rape drugs or any other drugs, call ASAP at 545-8362.

Alcohol: Can create issues

abused by military and civilian communities alike, Manning said, and its "ripple effect" is felt by everyone.

"Alcoholism can have many affects on any community, ranging from chronic illness and absenteeism to a decline in morale because one has to pick up the slack for an impaired coworker," Manning said.

Add to that more serious alcohol-related consequences — driving under the influence, crimes, domestic violence, sometimes even suicide and death — and the impact becomes devastating.

But Fort Benning doesn't plan to stand idly by and be a victim. This month — National Alcohol Awareness Month — the post will reenforce an already strong message advocating alcohol abuse prevention through education.

On April 8, National Alcohol Screening Day, Soldiers, family members and civilians will have the chance to assess their drinking habits.

ASAP will set up sites around post where individuals can stop by, take two or three minutes to complete a survey, and speak to a clinician for results, Manning said. Sites will also offer a number of fact sheets, hand-outs and "goodies."

"Quite often, we don't realize a problem exists until we see our response in writing," she said. "When we see where we stand against a national standard, it may register that a change is necessary."

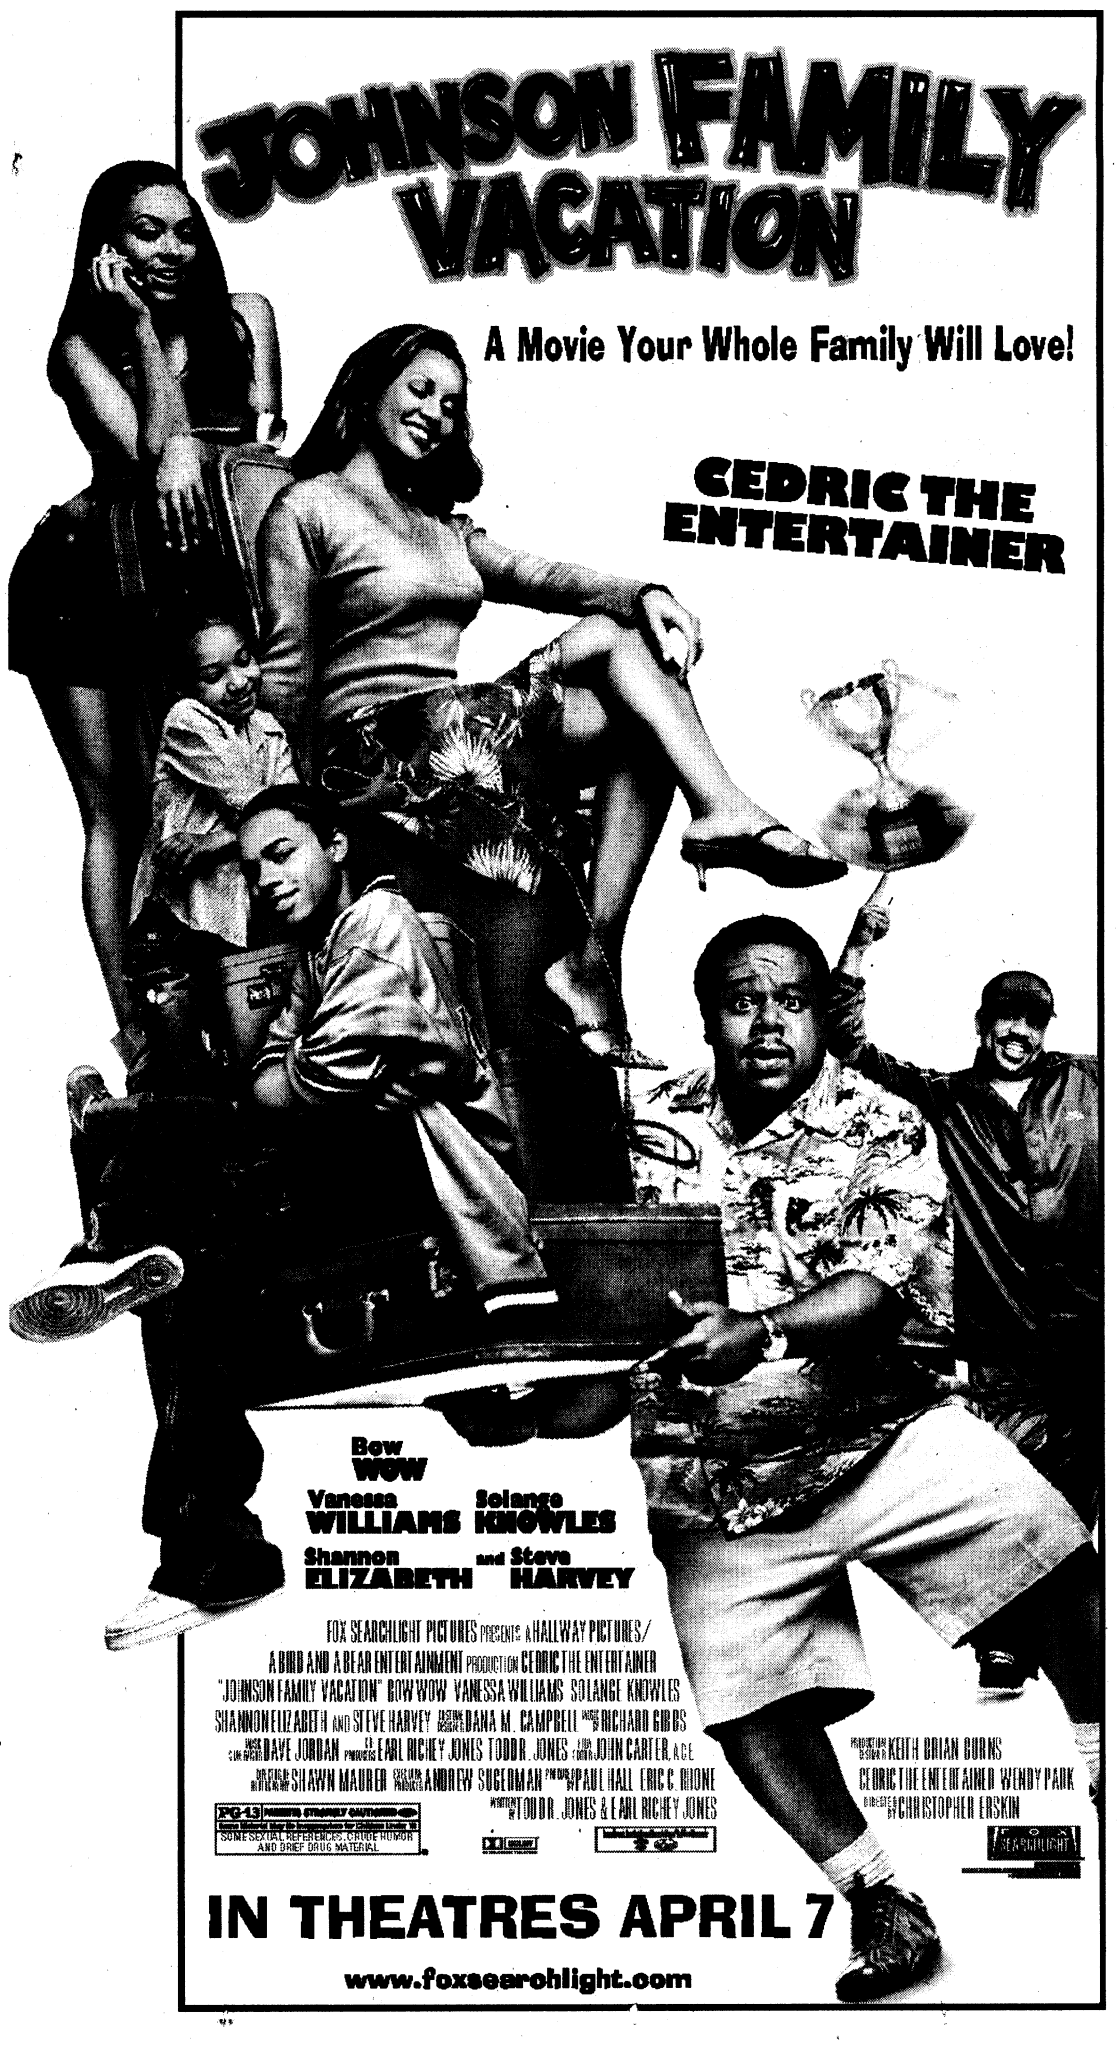
The survey asks a series of questions with the "if you answered yes, you may have a problem with alcohol" tagline, Wilbanks said.

Questions include:

• Has anyone expressed concern about your drinking or asked you to cut down?

• Have you or someone else been injured or hurt as a result of your drinking?

• Have you been unable to remember what happened while drinking during the past year?



• Do you drink more than four drinks when you drink?

"(This is) an excellent opportunity to take part in a national survey, but perhaps more importantly, the results give us an immediate response to the needs of our community," Manning said. "Very often, an individual will answer a survey or poll question more honestly than they would a verbal question. When the results are tallied, we see a more accurate picture of the trends within the community."

Sites around post will be at the Martin Army Community Hospital pharmacy lobby, the Main Mall Post Exchange lobby, the 36th Engineer Group dining facility, the Bryant Wells Fitness Center and Infantry Hall.

Benning drill sergeants lead way in Iraq

BCTB NCOs train Iraqi soldiers

Spc. Nikki St. Amant
Bayonet staff

Ten Fort Benning drill sergeants from B Company, 2nd Battalion, 47th Infantry Regiment, are on the ground in Iraq as part of a pilot program to use American drill sergeants as trainers for the Iraqi Civil Defense Corps.

The drill sergeants deployed in January on 179-day orders.

The B Co. commander, Capt. Christopher Coulter, said the drill sergeants' mission is one that supercedes their mission here.

"The Army needed expert trainers to develop the Iraqi Civil Defense Corps," Coulter said. "The drill sergeants we sent are some of the finest military trainers in the world. Although we miss their experience and expertise at Benning, we are all very proud of them and what they are accomplishing."

Sgt. 1st Class Tyrone Miller, one of the 10 deployed in Iraq, said the drill sergeants have encountered significant challenges in training the new Iraqi force.

"Some of the difficulties we face while training the Iraqi army are language barriers and finding interpreters who can get a key point across while teaching. Another is getting (Iraqi soldiers) to work together," Miller said. "It's hard because of the different backgrounds.

"For years, they were taught to be separate and look down on each other, and now we are trying to teach them to work together. We have Turks, Arabs and Kurds, so the key is to try to balance the units we are building."

In their time in Iraq, the drill sergeants have had to learn to adapt to a changing mission scope.

"Our mission was to facilitate basic training for the Iraqi Civil Defense Corps," Miller said. "It has since changed to creating and teaching a primary leadership development course.

"We have supported the 173rd Airborne out of Italy, 25th Infantry Division from Hawaii, the 4th Infantry Division from Fort Hood, Texas, and the 1st Infantry Division out of Germany," he said. "With each unit, the scope of our duty changes. Some of us have gone on raids and improvised explosive device sweeps, manned check points and conducted patrols."

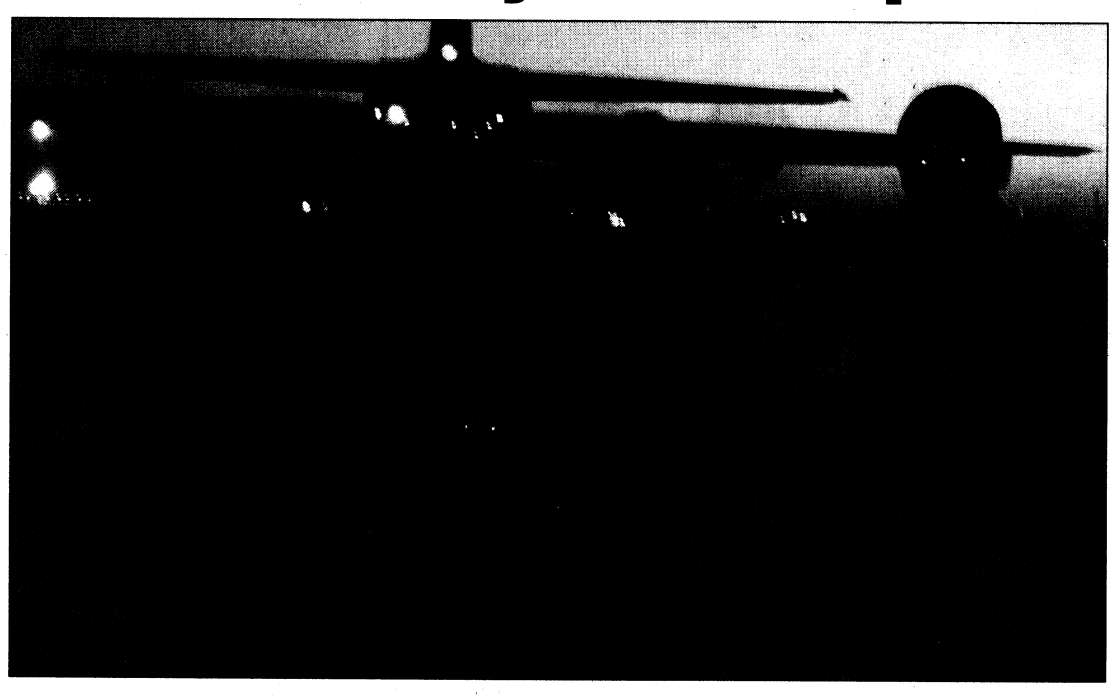
The drill sergeants have served in Bilad, Kirkuk, Tuz, Al Fallujah, Daquq, Tazul, Tikrit and Baqubah in the few months they have been in Iraq.

Even though drill sergeants aren't usually tasked to serve in combat theaters and the drill sergeants didn't volunteer, Miller said they are happy to be there.

"Although we were selected to deploy to Iraq, we are excited to have a chance to do our part and serve with the rest of the men and women who are enduring the hardships of combat and being away from home," Miller said.

"Being here makes you appreciate home," he said.

These 10 drill sergeants have also had the pleasure of enjoying one of the most valuable rewards of the position — one that most drill sergeants never have the opportunity to experience.



"Most of us have had the opportunity to go on patrols or raids with Soldiers we trained at Fort Benning and see how they have grown and matured and are applying the basics we taught them," Miller said. "The experience is outstanding."

Miller said tradition and loyalty is what keeps the drill sergeants going through the hardship of being pulled from a TRADOC assignment and being assigned to a combat zone.

"Many men and women before us have gone to combat and upheld the standards and pride of military service — no matter what branch. It is truly an honor to be a part of military history and to serve among the best," Miller said.

Though tradition is what keeps the drill sergeants professionally grounded, it's family that keeps them emotionally grounded.

"We would like to say to our families that we are OK, we love you and thank you for your support because it means more than you could ever know," Miller said for the group. "No matter what, we remember our drill sergeant motto — 'This we'll defend!'"

Soldiers get awards at redeployment ceremony

Wounded in Iraq, Soldiers reunite

Sgt. Jamie Brown
131st MPAD

Two Soldiers who were seriously injured while stationed in Iraq with each other were reunited to receive their Purple Hearts Wednesday.

Spc. Gerald Robinson and Spc. Anthony Albert, along with Sgt. John Rice, all of the 781st Transportation Co., Alabama Army National Guard, each received the Purple Heart at the unit's redeployment ceremony at Fort Benning.

The 781st had been on active duty since April of last year.

Robinson and Albert were on an escort mission near the Baghdad airport Oct. 24, when an improvised explosive device exploded on the right side of their humvee.

Robinson, who was driving and Albert, who was serving as gunner, suffered shrapnel wounds. Robinson remained conscious, and was able to drive to the airport, where medical help was available.

Both Robinson and Albert are recovering from their wounds.

Robinson was able to recover in Iraq, but Albert returned to the U.S., where he has been rehabilitating, and is awaiting surgery.

Both Soldiers said they are happy to be reunited.

"It's special to get this award, but the most special thing is that this is the first time I've gotten to see this man (Albert) since they hauled him away," Robinson said.

"I was really looking forward to seeing him, almost as much as seeing my family." he said. "The last time I saw him, they were putting him in the back of an ambulance, so this was nice, seeing him today."

The ceremony was an emotional event for Albert, because he had not seen his fellow unit members since his injury.

"I'm glad to be back," he said. "I'm glad to see them. I hated to be over here while they were over there."

The other Purple Heart recipient, Rice, was on a mission Sept. 21 when an IED destroyed his truck. He suffered shrapnel wounds, was hospitalized for four days, and eventually returned to duty.

"I'm getting there," he said. "I'm about 99 percent, good enough to go back to work when I get out of the Army."

The 781st will finish the demobilization process at Fort Benning over the next several days before returning home.

AFLAC, Cottonmouths thank Benning Soldiers

Appreciation night held at Civic Center

Night of hockey boosts troop morale

Cottonmouths defenseman Mitch Fritz avoids Stingrays defense player Aaron Power, on his way to the net during AFLAC Military Appreciation Night Saturday at the Civic Center. The Cottonmouths defeated the Stingrays 6-2.

Soldiers and family members from the Fort Benning community joined the rest of the tricommunity's hockey fans at the Columbus Civic Center Saturday night during an event held to boost troop morale.

The Columbus Cottonmouths and AFLAC joined forces to gather Fort Benning Soldiers and family members for the AFLAC Military Appreciation Night. AFLAC, sponsored the event by purchasing more than 2,000 tickets and giving them for free to Fort Benning Soldiers.

The Cottonmouths, wearing camouflage jerseys that were sold to the highest bidder at the end of the game by the players, defeated the South Carolina Stingrays, 6-2. The proceeds from the jersey auction go to local charities.

Cottonmouth and Army of One pucks were given to the first 1,500 fans to arrive from a crowd that totaled 4,838 — the largest crowd of the year, said Scott Middlebrooks, director of sales, promotions and marketing for the Cottonmouths.

"It's the first time this year we have an official military appreciation night where the players wear camouflage jerseys," Middlebrooks said. "We've been having military appreciation nights for eight years now, but we always have good military discounts so Soldiers can come and enjoy a fun evening with their families and friends."

This is the first time AFLAC has sponsored an event like this for the Fort Benning community.

"Fort Benning is a huge part of this community and Soldiers are a large number of AFLAC's policy holders," said Teresa Lummus, a state trainer and independent AFLAC agent. "This is AFLAC's way of saying thank you to all those Soldiers who, in one way or another, are defending our freedom."

The color guard from the Western Hemisphere Institute for Security Cooperation presented the colors during the National Anthem, and Command Sgt. Maj. Michael Bergman, U.S. Army Infantry School command sergeant major, dropped the first puck of the night.

"It's fantastic for AFLAC and the Cottonmouths to invite us all here and to give the Soldiers free tickets for them and their families," Bergman said.

Among the Soldiers present Saturday night were Pvt. Tony Garrett, 1st Battalion, 50th Infantry Regiment, and Pfc. Adam Schley, 1st Bn., 30th Inf. Regt., who thought the event was definitely a nice thing to do for Soldiers.

"I think this is a very big morale booster, especially for Soldiers who have been in training for a while," Garrett said. "It gives us a time to relax and have some fun."

The Cottonmouths' support for the troops doesn't stop at free hockey games.

"We send a few players out to units and the players talk to the Soldiers about teamwork," Middlebrooks said. "Soldiers show them their military equipment and the players share their hockey equipment. They even eat the MRE's."

Middlebrooks said the players also go to local schools and talk to students.

For more information on the Cottonmouths game schedule visit their Web site at www.cottonmouths.com or call at 571-0086.

NCOA helps Soldiers

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

Living by the Noncommisioned Officers Association creed is something members of NCOA take to heart. Not only do they jump at the call to lead their country into battle, but also jump at the call to help Soldiers on the home front.

"NCOA is Soldiers helping Soldiers," said retired Sgt. Maj. Bobby Wright, corporate member recruiter. "We are an organization concerned about all Soldiers and willing to help in their time of need."

NCOA, which was formed in 1961 by a group of senior NCOs in San Antonio, represents the five services including all active-duty, National Guard and reserve component Soldiers, retirees and veterans.

NCOA offers many programs and services to the community.

One such program is the Veterans Employment Assistance Program.

The program is designed to help service members as well as their spouses find employment upon separation from military service, regardless of rank.

"Helping Soldiers and their families find employment is important to us," said O.D. Davies, NCOA member. "We want to help them in any way that we can once they leave the service."

Each year, NCOA distributes more than $250,000 in scholarships, medical grants and donations throughout the military and veteran community including:

- 35 new scholarships, renewable for up to three years after initial grants are awarded to spouses and children of NCOA members annually
- 48 Betsy Ross educational grants to Auxiliary Division members annually
- medical fund grants that help offset incidental expenses related to catastrophic illness within the military members family
- Disaster Relief Fund grants that help offset emergency expenses incurred by enlisted members as a result of natural disasters
- grants from NCOA's Operation Appreciation to purchase quality of life items ranging from musical instruments to televisions for use by hospitalized veterans.

Davies said the reason he joined the organization was because he saw where the money was going first hand.

"In many organizations, you don't really know if the money is going where they say it is," Davies said. "NCOA is for real. It's all about helping Soldiers."

As for friendships formed in NCOA, they last for a lifetime, said post Command Sgt. Maj. Michael Kelso.

"We establish bonds of comraderie that bring NCOs together," Kelso said. "And these don't just last while we are on active duty; they continue after we retire."

The friendships build on what NCOA is and what it does.

Command Sgt. Maj. Michele Jones imparts words of wisdom at the Women's History Luncheon Tuesday.

Good was never enough for Command Sgt. Maj. Michele Jones. When she joined the Army in 1982, she wanted to be more; she wanted to be exceptional.

Nearly 22 years later, Jones is the ninth command sergeant major of the Army Reserve — the first female to hold the position — and the most senior-ranking enlisted female in the Army, regardless of component.

Tuesday, Jones was also the guest speaker at Fort Benning's Women's History Month Luncheon at the Officers' Club, her message — and the theme of the luncheon — "hope and possibility."

"Hope and possibility is instilling in someone a belief that it can happen," Jones said. "Every person in this room has been touched by a woman in a way that has given them hope and possibility."

For Jones, those women were her mother, grandmother and great grandmother — women who taught her that "it's OK to be a woman; it's wonderful to be a woman."

As a leader responsible for every enlisted Soldier in the Army — because "all Soldiers are in some category of the Reserves sooner or later" — Jones said she realizes that she directly influences how women are viewed in the Army, a responsibility she has taken seriously over the years.

"I know people are watching me ... I am responsible for being a role model, something I can never take lightly," she said.

"I've never used being a female as an excuse to do something or not do it."

Despite this, Jones said she has encountered people in her career who for one reason or another "attempted" to discriminate against her.

Whether it was because she is a woman or because she is an African American, Jones said she has never let it set her back.

"It wasn't a deterrent, and it wasn't an excuse for me to stop," she said. "It just motivated me."

Jones, who began her career as a legal specialist in the active component before moving into the active guard reserve, said her best defense was, well, herself.

"My success is my best revenge against those who've tried to stop me," she said. "I never gave anyone ammunition to take me down. I knew my responsibilities, and I just did it. There are some people I may have changed their minds about women in the military, but some people can't let it go.

"I don't need to prove anything just because I'm a woman, and I don't need to try to be a man," she said.

In fact, Jones said, it's not about being women or men in the military — it's about being Soldiers, period.

"I serve, not because I'm a woman, but because I am an American," she said. "There are three reasons I am in the Army, three things I believe in, three things I am willing to die for, things that only a Soldier can protect — God, country and family, in that order.

"God gave me life, my country is my way of life and my family is my life."

And every woman who has become a Soldier has done so with her own reasons and beliefs, Jones said.

"They didn't do it because of being a woman. They didn't do it with the intention of being recognized, celebrated and honored," Jones said. "Every woman served because she believed she had to."

And it was those "phenomenal women who have come before us" who laid the groundwork for women in the military today, said Jones, who remembers when to see a female staff sergeant was something unusual.

It was those women who gave today's women hope and possibility, Jones said.

> "My success is my best revenge against those who've tried to stop me."
> Command Sgt. Maj. Michele Jones
> Command sergeant major of the Army Reserve

And now, it's Jones' turn to pass that on to today's Soldiers — men and women, alike.

"Command Sergeant Major Jones is a role model not only to women, but to all Soldiers," Commanding General Brig. Gen. Benjamin Freakley said at the luncheon.

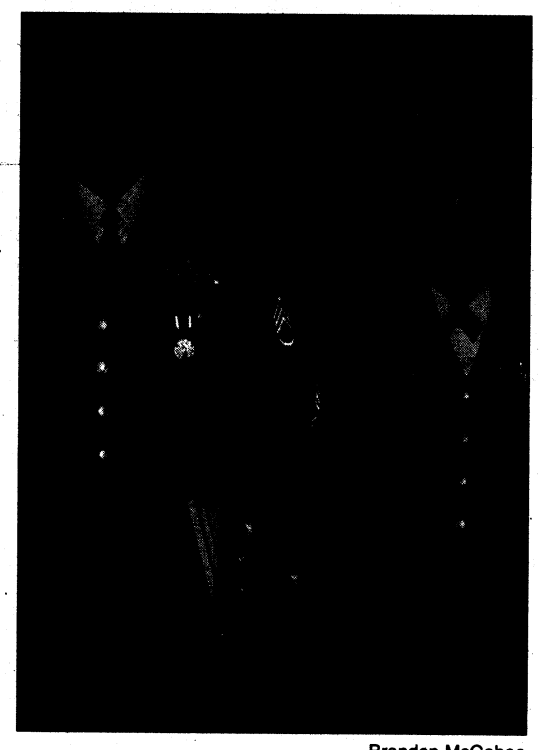
She watches, talks to and, most importantly, listens to Soldiers and their families to understand their needs, he said.

"Wherever brave men and women have fought and died, she's been there," Freakley said, citing a resumé that includes participation in Operations Desert Shield, Desert Storm, Restore Hope, Provide Comfort, Joint Endeavor and Noble Eagle.

And yet she remains humble, he said, surprised that she would be invited to Fort Benning to speak.

For Jones, though, it is simply a matter of being "better than good."

It's a matter of making the difference for her Soldiers — a goal she hopes is shared by her fellow troops.



"We all have people in our lives who have given us hope and possibility," she said. "My question for you is who are you giving hope and possibility to?"

Best friends retire together

Pair join up to improve family's life

Bridgett Siter
Bayonet staff

Brandon McGahee

Staff Sgt. Cornelius Parks and Sgt. 1st Class Peggy Mosley celebrated Parks' retirement last week at Fort Benning's Marshall Auditorium.

Cornelius Parks wants answers. After 20 years of service, the retiring staff sergeant from the 104th Transportation Company wants to know why he joined the Army in the first place. No regrets, mind you, just a few unanswered questions.

"Why did I enlist? I really couldn't tell you," Parks said with a shrug and a laugh. "It wasn't my choice, but it was a good choice. I thank God for the Army."

Parks was an 18-year-old senior at Columbus' Baker High School in February 1984 when his best friend drove him to Atlanta. They "swore in" together.

His best friend left immediately for basic training. Parks delayed entry until after graduation.

The two were reunited last week at Infantry Hall, when together they walked across the stage of Marshall Auditorium during Parks' retirement ceremony.

"We walked into this together, and we always said we'd walk out together. We've come full circle," said Sgt. 1st Class Peggy Mosley, Parks' best friend and mother.

Back in 1984, Mosley was a single parent, 35-years-old, raising two sons and three of her sister's children on the meager salary she made as a civilian employee on Fort Benning. Her applications for better paying positions were repeatedly turned down.

"I said, 'Who is this guy named Vet? He keeps getting my jobs,'" Mosley said. "Then someone explained to me about veteran's points, and I started thinking about the Army. I wanted those veteran's points."

And she wanted something more, Mosley said — a future for her sons. College, it seemed, was out of the question for Cornelius, her "buddy," the child she bore at 16, who was about to graduate from high school. There was simply not enough money.

But together, she figured, if they joined the Army, and pooled their resources, they could put his younger brother through school. And they could attend college on the Montgomery G.I. Bill.

"You could say we joined for the education — ours and his," said Mosley, a counter intelligence special agent at Fort Meade, Md. "I said, 'We're going to do this for four years. Then we'll get out and go to school, and I'll get those veteran's points.'"

That's not the way it happened.

"I just can't believe it's been twenty years. Twenty years, come and gone just like that," Mosley said. "And I'd do it all over again if I had to."

Her son agreed. The Army, he said, taught him great "people skills" and gave him wonderful opportunities to travel.

"It's not a glamorous career. You have to have it in you to work hard," said Parks, who plans to study business management at North Georgia College. "I certainly never intended to join the Army, but once I was in, I adapted well and gave it my all. It was worth it. After four years, I never even entertained the idea of getting out."

A paperwork snafu delayed Mosley's retirement, which will become official in a few months. Will her son stand by her side when she retires?

"There will be no ceremony," Mosley said. "I had my ceremony, right there by his side. That's all I need."

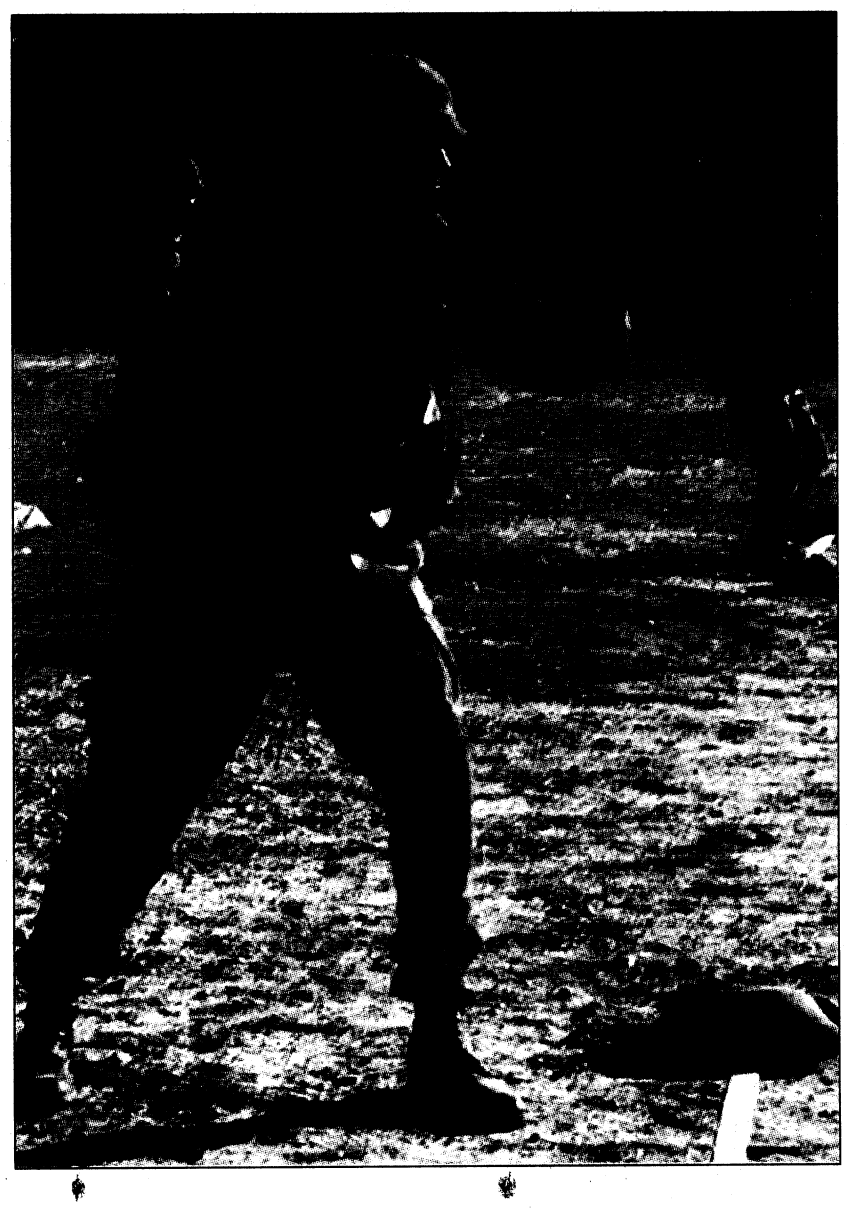
Spc. John Kirkpatrick, B Company, 1st Battalion, 15th Infantry Regiment, high crawls during the unit's training exercise March 26. The training included a 12-mile road march, combatives, movement under fire, a stress fire range and reciting the Soldier's Creed, all in succession.



STRESS UNDER FIRE

"This is the best job in the world. I'm 33 years old, I get to fight ... shoot things and blow stuff up."

Not exactly what you'd expect to hear from someone who rose hours before the sun to strap on a rucksack, hump 12 miles, grapple with another Soldier, practice moving under fire and engage the enemy on a stress-fire range — all in succession.

But Sgt. 1st Class Dave Salie was all grins about earning his paycheck March 26.

Salie was one of about 53 Soldiers from B Company, 1st Battalion, 15th Infantry Regiment, who participated in the training exercise — testing their intestinal fortitude and instilling the warrior ethos spirit, said Capt. Dave Taylor, company commander.

The training began with a 12-mile road march to Coursen West Range along paved and wooded trails, which the Soldiers had only three hours to complete successfully.

From the road march finish line, it was straight to the "pit," where they traded their rucks for flak vests and put to use the combatives skills they'd been learning for several weeks.

Then it was on to low-crawl, high-crawl, three- to five-second rush movement techniques. And finally, the stress-fire range, where the Soldiers fired at targets in a standing position, stopping, walking and turning corners.

In the final event — a pop-quiz style station the Soldiers weren't expecting — they had to recite the Soldier's Creed.

The troops received points for completing each event. At the end of the day, the points were tallied, and whoever had the most points from each platoon was granted a three-day pass. The overall winner will be recommended for an Army Achievement Medal, Taylor said.

Pfc. Casey Galey, the winner from Headquarters Platoon, wrapped up the 12-miler in 2 hours and 46 minutes.

"My legs are cramping up like crazy," he said, stretching after the final event. "By the time I got to the three- to five-second rush, I could barely stand up."

For Galey, the best part of the day was the combatives ... and getting rid of his ruck sack.

But in spite of the pain, the troop morale was off the charts, and the majority of the Soldiers were happy to be out of the motorpool, doing "Soldier stuff," Taylor said.

The training was like killing two birds with one stone, Taylor said. The road march fulfilled 3rd Division Fit to Fight requirements and knocked out a prerequisite for testing for the Expert Infantryman Badge in May.

> "A lot of these guys are fresh out of basic or are young Soldiers. And these days, the (operational tempo) is so quick, you have to instill in them what it means to be Soldiers. Everybody has to know the warrior ethos."

But more than that, he said, it instilled warrior ethos, something important to do even in the infantry.

"A lot of these guys are fresh out of basic training or are young Soldiers," Taylor said. "And these days, the (operational tempo) is so quick, you have to instill in them what it means to be Soldiers. Everybody has to know the warrior ethos."

Part of that ethos is tough training, Taylor said — putting your mind and body to the test to accomplish the mission.

"We're instilling in them that sense of, 'Hey, I'm infantry; I'm a warrior. And it takes difficult training to be prepared for a deployment,'" Taylor said.

And with Operation Iraqi Freedom 3 lurking just around the corner, that preparation is more important than ever.

"All these guys are feeling the same right now," Taylor said, nodding to the Soldiers resting against their rucks, trading "war stories" from the morning's events. "They're all sore, their legs hurt, they're beat."

But instead of being worn down, the Soldiers were lively, excited and seemed to actually enjoy themselves — and that was the ultimate goal, he said.

Although this is the first time the unit has conducted this training exercise, Taylor said he would like to conduct it quarterly, keeping track of the Soldiers' progress.

The day's winners were:

- 1st Platoon, Pvt. Jon McBride
- 2nd Platoon, Pfc. Walter Merida
- 3rd Platoon and overall winner, Spc. David McDowell
- Headquarters Platoon, Pfc. Casey Galey.

Engineers pave paradise to put up parking lot

'Skill to Build' Soldiers use dozers, graders to build 300-space lot

1st Lt. Mamie Murphy
63rd Engineer Company

Proud parents and personal friends will soon be able to park in close proximity to Pomeroy Field parade ground for the pomp and circumstance of Basic Training graduation, thanks to perspiration and persistence from the 63rd Engineer Company.

Friends and family looking for a place to park near the parade field aren't the only ones benefiting from the parking lot project. Soldiers from the 63rd Engineer Company are gaining valuable experience and watching a project take shape.

"This is great hands-on experience for us," said Spc. Dariusz Sadkowski. The Chicago native has been with the company for a year as a heavy equipment operator.

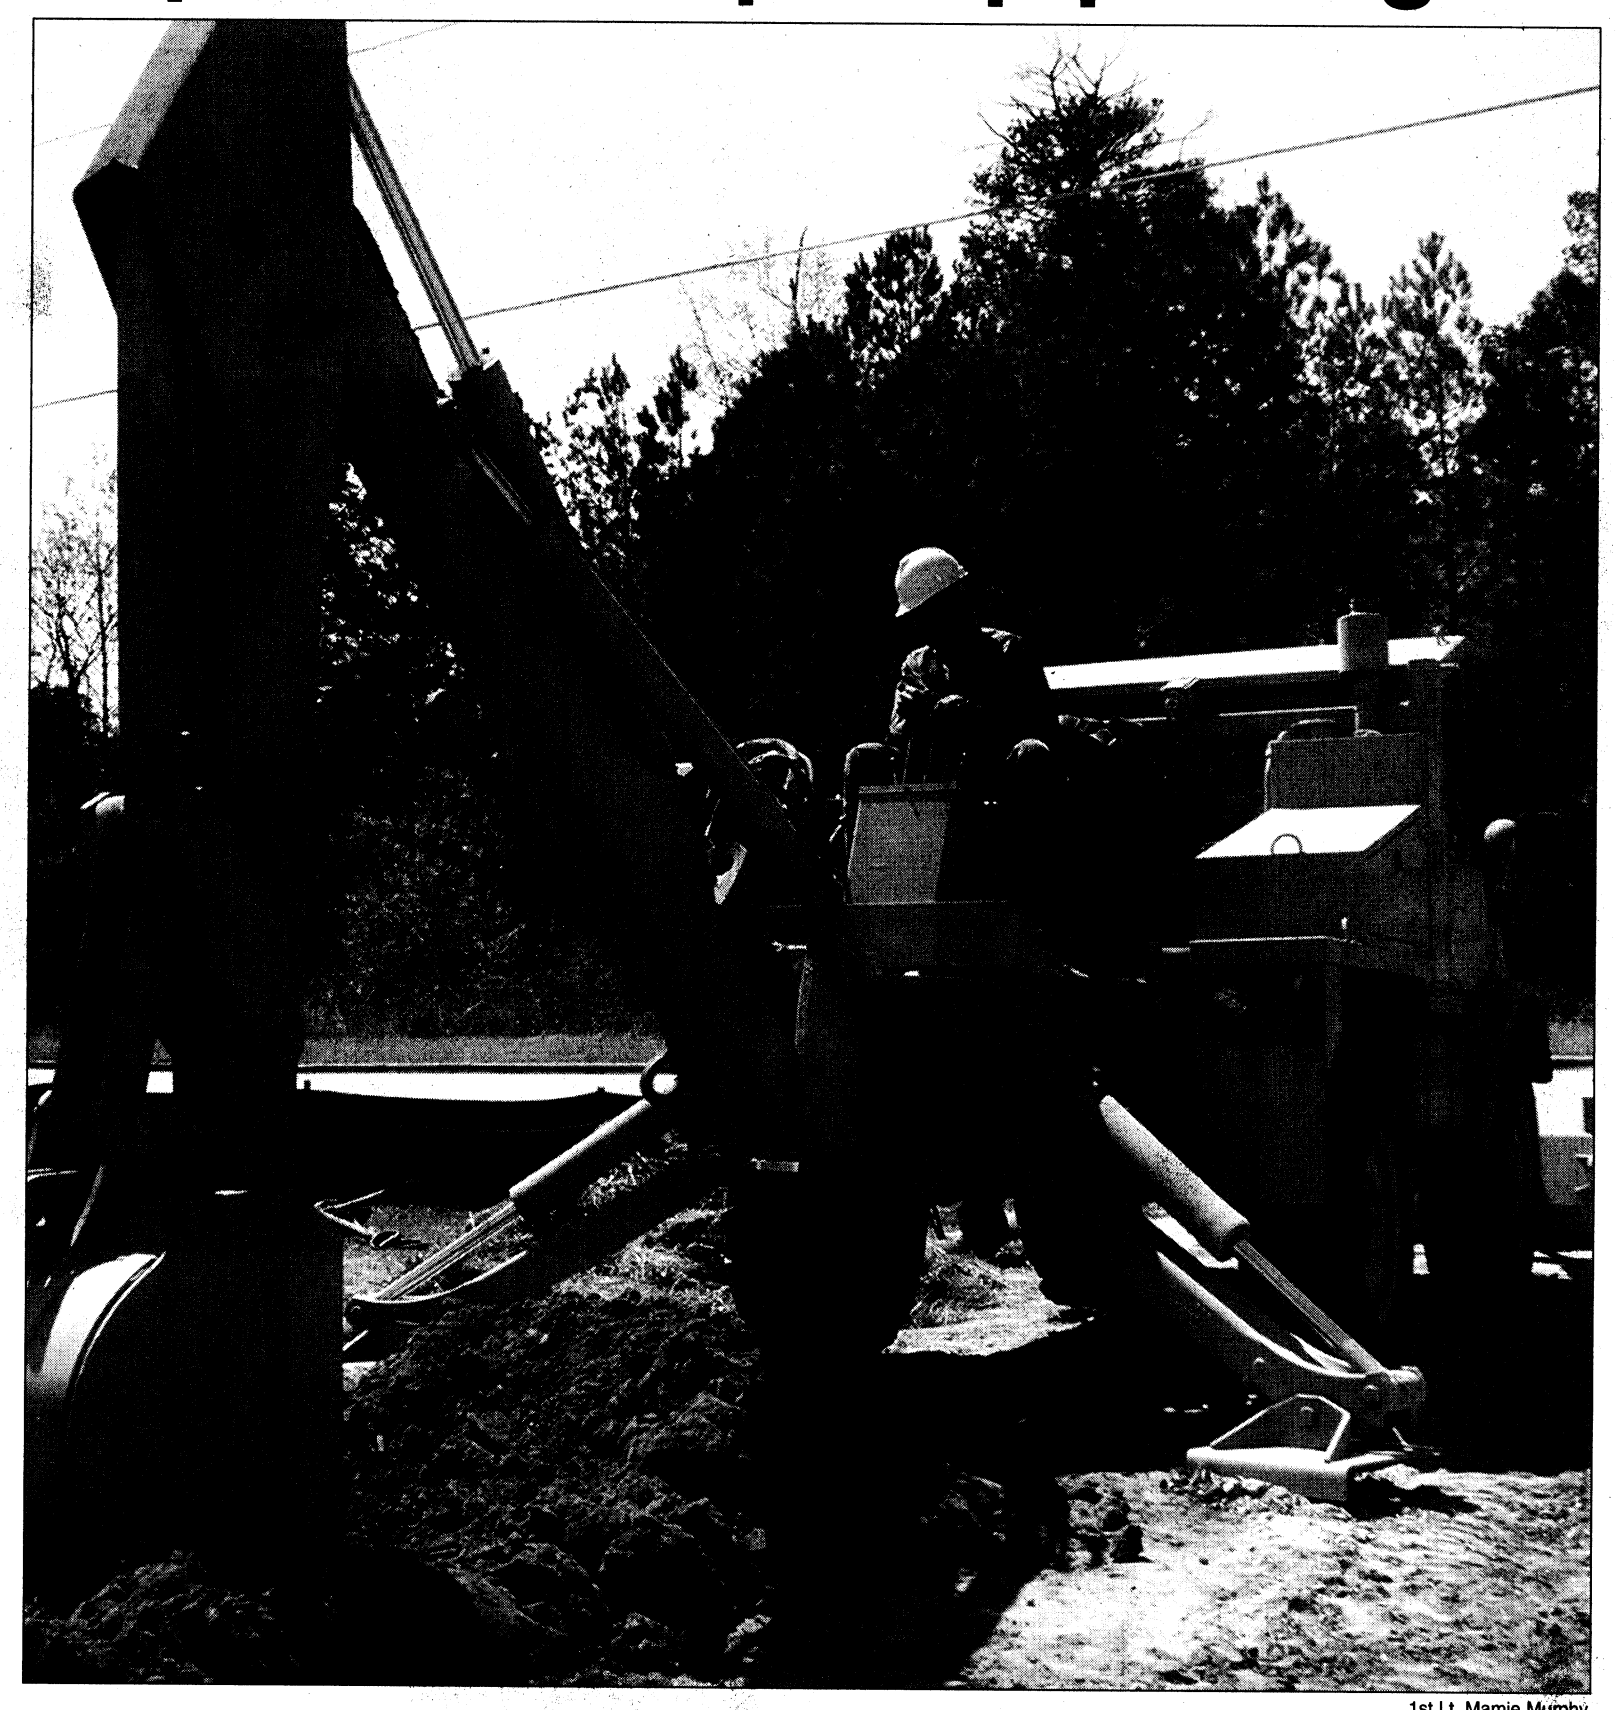
"It's nice to actually be out here working rather than stuck in the motor pool just doing maintenance on our equipment," he said.

The "Skill to Build" Soldiers began working on the Sand Hill parking lot Jan. 19.

The first step in creating the 300-space parking lot was clearing and grubbing the 2.25-acre area of trees and stumps.

Thirty stumps, approximately 36-48" in diameter, were removed from the area before Soldiers could move on to the next step of construction. Soldiers used bulldozers to cut the stumps out of the ground and uproot them.

To create a smooth, level surface for the parking lot, the Soldiers used dozers and graders to cut and fill dirt in the area. When finished, the engineers will have moved thousands of cubic yards of dirt.



Based on the parking lot's design, there will be a slight crown in the middle to facilitate drainage and reduce erosion.

"In our training areas we just don't have the space to push that much dirt around," said 1st Lt. Ivy Miller, platoon leader.

"It's great experience for the Soldiers to be able to get out here in a nice open area and really test their skills."

"Our Soldiers get to use the equipment and get practice, see a full project from beginning to end and see a real value to the mission they're accomplishing," said company commander, Capt. Holli Bennett.

"We have some new Soldiers who didn't deploy with the unit who are getting some stick time, so it's a great learning experience for them.

rooms, a nursery and an industrial-grade kitchen.

O'Keeffe said the new chapel will be fully multimedia capable and will have simple but necessary features like a cry room for mothers with infants in the main sanctuary and separate men's and women's changing rooms in the baptistry area. The chapel will have 406 seats that can be expanded to 616.

Part of the same project, O'Keeffe said, is the 5,000-square-foot addition for The Infantry Center Chapel annex that will add two large and four divided classrooms and restrooms.

The addition will be built along Brockman Street and is scheduled to be completed in August 2005. The chapel construction is scheduled to be completed in October 2005.

The chapel plans were presented to O'Keeffe Nov. 7 by McKnight Construction Company Inc., from Augusta, Ga., and are part of a more than $6 million contract that was awarded to McKnight Sept. 26.

O'Keeffe said the company drew up the plans using a standard chapel model provided by the Army Chief of Chaplains Office.

Although Fort Benning lost the Main Post Catholic Chapel to fire on Jan. 12, 2002, O'Keeffe is quick to say the new chapel is not a replacement for that one.

"It's a new chapel for multidenominational use," he said. "We'll have to work out the worship schedules next summer."

The groundbreaking ceremony will be done on the foundation line of the new chapel.

After the ground-breaking there will be a reception and cake-cutting at the site, O'Keeffe said.

"We're inviting the community to participate in this event to indicate the high level of interest in looking forward to a large facility that can meet the varied religious and educational needs of an Army community in the 21st century," O'Keeffe said.

"We're beginning something that will hopefully stand for 100 years once we're all gone."

force structure changes won't be felt by the average Soldier, said Col. Steven Salazar, 3rd Bde. commander.

The teams are already built here, Salazar said, which has given 3rd Bde. an advantage on the battlefield.

"In this game," Salazar said, "success is always about teamwork."

The restructuring of 3rd Bde. will be completely administrative, Salazar said.

Units that have always supported and trained with the brigade, but fell under the authority of other commands, will now be moved under 3rd Bde. command.

Salazar said the change will bring the brigade some additional assets, though.

Some of the support available at the divisional level now, like surveillance capabilities and counter-battery radars, Salazar said, will be moved down to the brigade level.

Counter-battery radar detects incoming enemy artillery fire and allows the originating point to be pinpointed, said Lt. Col. Geoffrey Ward, 3rd Bde. executive officer.

Ward said the brigade used counter-battery radar extensively in Iraq and said it is extremely useful in combat operations.

Assets like these will only complement a brigade that, so far, has performed outstandingly, Salazar said.

3rd Bde. continues to train for another round in Iraq and has received a warning order that they will go back late this year or early next year.

It shouldn't hurt to be a child

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

The neighbor's little girl is playing in the street again, toddling between cars parked along the curb, darting in and out of the road, playing keep-away with a dog through the fence.

You know you should say something — this isn't the first time she's been out there alone. But then, maybe Mom's watching from the kitchen window. OK, probably not. Maybe she's around back and the toddler just managed to escape her attention for a moment. Well, no, she's been out there for quite some time.

Come to think of it, she looks a little ... dirty. Her hair doesn't look like it's been brushed in a few days, her clothes are soiled, her face is grimy.

Actually, she's looking a little on the thin side, too, especially for a girl her age.

You start for the phone, then stop yourself. You sigh, hesitate, then return to your own children in the living room. After all, it's somebody else's problem. Or maybe it's not a problem at all. Maybe you're just overreacting — not all parents raise their children the same way.

What if you're just being paranoid? Then what? You've caused a family undue turmoil, smeared a mother's reputation and created an enemy of a neighbor.

Next time, pick up the phone.

"Better safe than sorry when it comes to a child," said Rebecca Welch, Family Advocacy Program manager with Army Community Service.

Most people think of cuts and bruises when they hear the words "child abuse," but child abuse is any act or failure to act that endangers or impairs a child's physical or emotional health and development, according to Childhelp USA.

There are four major forms of abuse:

• Physical abuse is any non-accidental injury to a child. This includes hitting, kicking, slapping, burning, pinching, choking, shoving, paddling, etc.

• Sexual abuse is any sexual act between a child and an adult.

• Neglect is failure to provide for a child's physical needs. This includes lack of supervision, inappropriate housing or shelter, inadequate provision of food, inappropriate clothing, abandonment, denial of medical care and inadequate hygiene.

• Emotional abuse is any attitude or behavior that interferes with a child's mental health or social development — screaming, name-calling, demeaning them.

The most common form of child abuse reported on Fort Benning, Welch said, is neglect.

"Lack of supervision — we get lots of those calls," she said. "Leaving young children unattended, letting them play in the street ... that sort of thing."

While the post does see some instances of physical abuse, she said, these are isolated instances and don't even begin to compare to the off-post problem. Of about 100 reports of physical child abuse a year, only 50 to 60 are substantiated, she said.

But that's still too many for Welch.

"You can't place a value on life — everyone deserves a chance to have a quality life," she said. "And these children are defenseless. Their safety is everybody's responsibility."

To that end, Welch and her FAP counterparts spend a great deal of time putting to work a very effective tool in the fight to end domestic violence — education.

"Prevention is the key," she said. "The more we talk about it, the more awareness we create. And if we see something happening, we'll know where to go, who to call, what to do.

"Because this is everybody's responsibility. You can't stand by and wait for others to get involved."

But people do stand by. They go about their business and assume the situation will resolve itself or that it's not their family, so they shouldn't get involved. And every day in this country, at least three children die as a result of child abuse in the home, according to the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services.

Most of those children are younger than six years old, and most of them die from neglect, pure and simple.

And yet the actual incidence of abuse and neglect is estimated to be three times greater than the number reported to the authorities, according to USDHHS findings. In fact, only one of every three Americans polled have reported child abuse when confronted with an actual situation.

But that's not Fort Benning's Soldiers and civilians, not if you ask Welch.

"I have been here for going on 16 years, and I love it because Fort Benning is such a caring community," she said. "This is one big team, and if you know there's a family in need ... (let someone know)."

So how can you tell if a child is trapped in an abusive situation? How can you be sure you're not paranoid or misinterpreting a situation?

Just take a look, Welch said.

Look for signs of possible physical abuse:

• Unexplained injuries, especially those located on parts of the body not usually affected by normal childhood activities

• Repeated injuries, such as bruises, welts or burns.

• Unexplained fractures

• Denial on the part of the parents that anything is wrong, unlikely explanations for the child's injuries, delay in obtaining medical care.

Look for tell-tale signs of child neglect:

• The child appears poorly nourished or inadequately clothed

• The child appears consistently tired or listless and always seems as though no one cares.

• The child evidences a consistent lack of good hygiene or an obsession with cleanliness.

• The child is left alone for long periods of time, regularly.

Look for subtle warnings of emotional abuse (the most difficult form of abuse to verify):

• The child may display behavior that is extreme — lying, stealing, fighting or being overly aggressive.

• The child may appear defensive, shy or overly dependent.

• The child may be verbally abusive to others by using the same language and demeaning terms he or she has experienced.

Sexual abuse includes non-physical abuse (indecent exposure or "peeping toms"), physical abuse (fondling and intercourse) and violent abuse (rape and other forms of sexually violent behavior).

Incidents of sexual abuse, no matter what kind, may seem isolated or somewhat minor, but they may be repeated, sometimes over a period of years.

Look for behavior problems like withdrawal, aggression and nightmares. Also look for physical signs like cuts or bruises, development of a venereal disease, pregnancy, etc.

So you've finally made up your mind — it's not in your head. Something's going on, and you've got to do something about it. Who do you call?

Call the military police (especially if you witness an abuse scenario), call FAP, call Social Work Service, call your Community Life NCO, call your chain of command — call someone in a position to help.

Of course, if Welch could have things her way, it would never get to that point, and she's doing everything possible to ensure that it happens as little as possible.

That's why she and a like-minded friend founded the Child Abuse and Domestic Violence Conference in 1990 — a conference that, now in its seventh year, draws 300 to 400 participants.

The conference brings together organizations from Fort Benning and its surrounding communities to join efforts to provide the best possible help to those in domestic violence situations, especially children, Welch said.

"It's a way to bridge the gap," she said. "We need to know each other better, so we can work together better."

The conference also serves to create a team of the "best-trained people" to work Fort Benning's child abuse cases, Welch said, by involving the post's MPs, CID agents and social workers, just to name a few.

This year's conference will be April 27 to 29 at the Columbus Convention and Trade Center. To register or for more information, e-mail Welch at welchr@benning.army.mil.

In the meantime, though, there are plenty of programs and resources available every day right here on Fort Benning to help Soldiers and their families avoid child abuse and other forms of domestic violence, Welch said.

"The main focus of the Family Advocacy Program is to develop prevention programs that contribute to a healthy life for the Soldiers and their families," she said. "We provide training to help educate the families and direct them to services that will assist them in meeting their needs before an incident occurs or a problem arises."

Programs designed to help prevent child abuse:

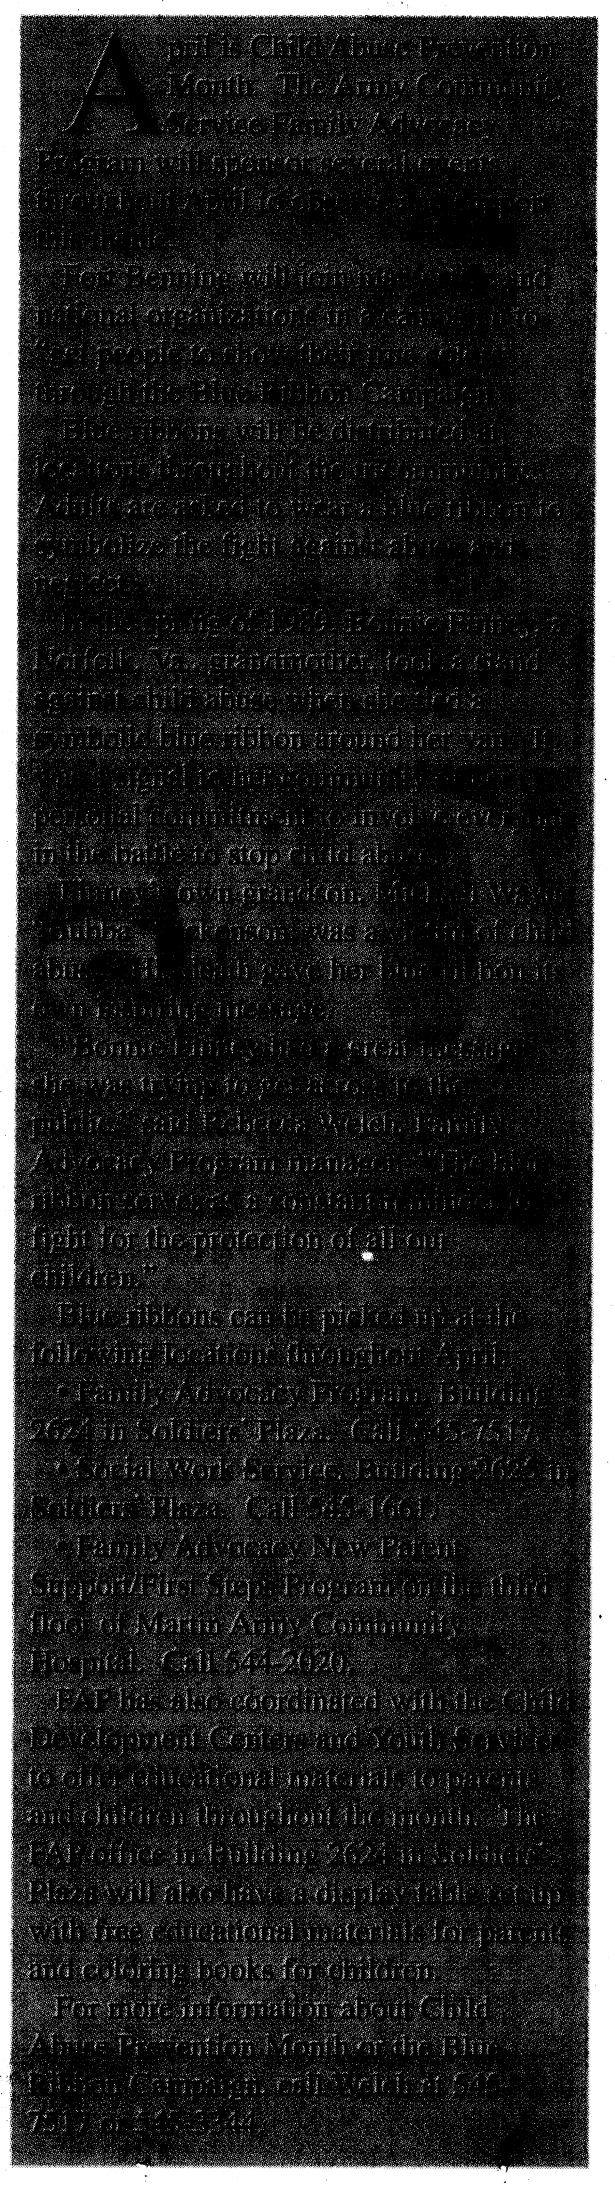
• Violence intervention. The FAP manager or victim advocate coordinator may provide crisis intervention for families in emergency situations.

• Parent education. This program teaches basic skills in physical care, supervision and psychological nurturance, appropriate to a child's age and stage of development. Call 545-1760.

• New Parent Support/First Steps Program. This program provides emotional support, parenting education, referrals to community resources and follow-up contact to parents with newborns.

• Respite child care. This is temporary child care for the purpose of relieving parental stress. It can be provided for families when both Soldier and spouse attend parenting classes or counseling.

• Safety education for children. This program emphasizes the important supervisory and protective roles of adults and community members who interact with children.



• Foster care. This is a voluntary or court-mandated program for abused and neglected children. It provides 24-hour care and supportive services in a family home or group facility for children who are not cared for by their own families and need substitute care. The FAP has a memorandum of agreement with the Department of Family and Children Services to provide foster care. Families interested in becoming foster care parents may contact their local DFCS.

• Spouse abuse shelters. The FAP contracts with the Russell County Shelter and the Columbus Alliance for Battered Women to provide a 24-hour residential facility or temporary accommodation to ensure there is a safe, temporary place to stay with emotional and material support to victims of spouse abuse and their children. The shelters offer counseling, transportation and community services, including legal, medical and financial help. Call the shelters directly — Columbus, 324-3850, or Phenix City, (334) 297-4401.

According to the National Center for Victims of Crime, approximately 879,000 children were neglected or abused in 2000. Of them, 79 percent were abused by their own parents.

ASK THE JUDGE

Office of the Staff Judge Advocate

Q: I am the divorced spouse of a soldier. We have one child, and I have custody. I have been told that I have to turn in my ID card. Is this true? What about our child?

Also, my mother is the widow of a retired Soldier, and she is now in a nursing home. How can I buy articles for her use and comfort?

A: There is a system in place to take care of both of these situations, but they are handled in slightly different ways, so I will discuss both separately.

Divorced spouse with child

When a husband and wife are divorced, the relationship between them is ended by law. Accordingly, the wife no longer is entitled to privileges under the Identification Card Regulation. The child of the marriage, however, is an authorized dependent of the military member, and as such is entitled to most benefits that he or she enjoyed prior to the divorce of the parents: medical coverage remains in effect, the ID card is retained, and shopping in the post exchange and use of Morale, Welfare and Recreation resources is authorized.

However, the child is not entitled to use the Commissary, because he is not in the household of the military member. You will, therefore, be able to shop in the post exchange for the child, if you follow required procedures. This involves securing written authorization from the ID Card Section, allowing you to shop on behalf of the child until he or she is age 16. You will need to bring proof of status, such as the child's ID card and a picture ID such as a driver's license showing your information.

Parent is authorized patron

In this situation, an unremarried widow such as your mother is entitled to full privileges under her own identification card.

When she is too ill or infirm to go to the Commissary or PX, or she cannot pick up her medicines at the pharmacy, established procedures are in place to allow you to shop for her in either the Commissary or PX.

At present, a statement from her physician that she is unable to care for herself, whether physically or mentally, is required. This statement is presented to the ID Card Section by the ID card holder if able to come in. The section prepares an "agent letter" for you, and will need some sort of picture identification from you as well.

These are only two possible situations. The Adjutant General's ID Card Section interprets the regulation, and section personnel are familiar with the many types of issues which may arise.

They are both knowledgeable and helpful, and are the best place to get accurate information at any point in time, since the regulation may change. They are located in Soldiers' Plaza in Building 2638, the telephone number is 545-1411.

If these or any other legal situations apply to you, contact the Legal Assistance Office at 545-3282.

OUR HOUSE

IOBC helps home for abused kids

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

The children of Our House don't lead privileged lives. The home offers a safe haven and a second chance to Muscogee County children ages to 4 to 17 — most of them boys — who have endured abuse and neglect from their own families. It's a place to transition into the foster care system. And it's also a place where the community can make a difference.

To that end, about 80 Soldiers from the Infantry Officer Basic Course spent Saturday morning improving the home's playground and wooded area.

The Soldiers — students of 4th and 5th Platoons, C Company, 2nd Battalion, 11th Infantry Regiment — met up with a considerable to-do list.

The wood chips and mulch on the playground needed to be leveled, and a garden area needed to be created. Meanwhile, the trails in the woods behind the home were begging for help.

The Soldiers cleared the trails of debris, cleared away brush along the sides of the trail, created various camp sites, laid the groundwork for a bridge to be built and created a sandbag entryway, said Maj. Chuck Allen, company commander, who joined his students and cadre.

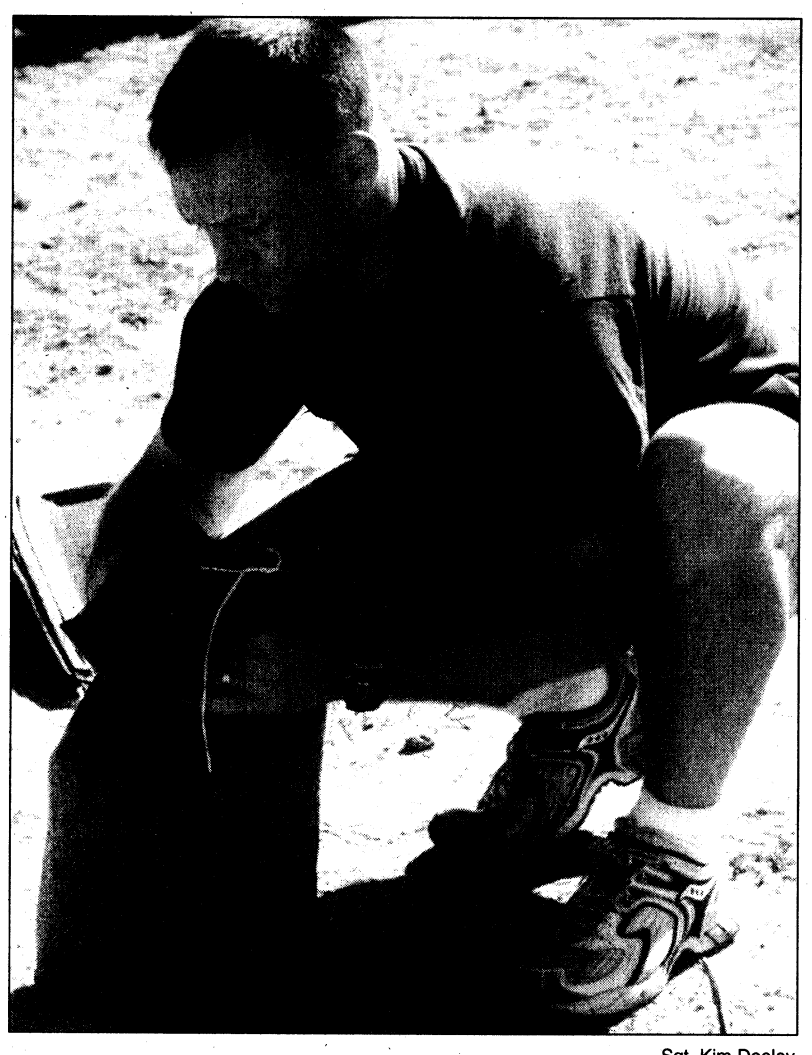
"Every platoon in IOBC does a post project — like range maintenance — and a community project," he said.

"Service to the community is very important," he said. "And Fort Benning is part of the Columbus community."

The Soldiers' work at the foster home will allow the children to participate in a Boy Scouts program of sorts, said Randy Boswell, Our House staff member.

The facility is home to about 40 children, 12 in temporary care and 18 boys in a long-term care program, specially designed for children who have experienced such traumatic abuse that they aren't ready to go to a foster home, he said.

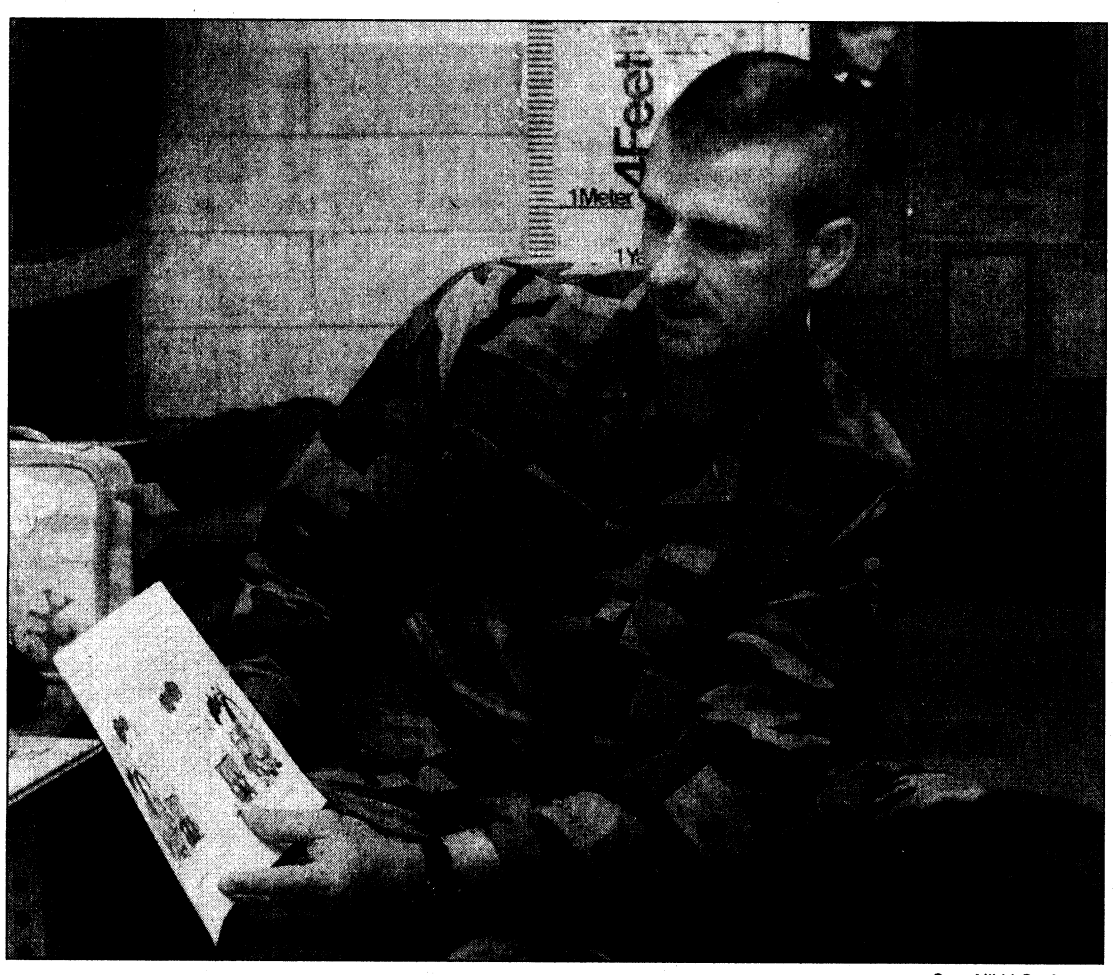
A Boy Scout program will allow the staff to take the kids out into the woods for camping and other activities without going all the way to Pine Mountain, Ga. This way, Boswell said, if a child has a hard time adjusting to being in the wilderness and is too frightened, it will be much easier to get him back to his room.



"The ultimate goal here is to have the kids get used to the woods," said Sgt. 1st Class Horace Terry, C Co., 2nd Bn., 11th Inf. Regt. "(The staff) can introduce them to the outdoors, but they're still close so they can go back if they need to."

Having Soldiers help out at the home benefits everyone, Terry said.

"It shows them our civilian side and it builds teamwork," he said. "Besides, you never know — one of these kids might be a general someday."



Whether or not they ever see the children again, the lieutenants could feel good about lending a hand and supporting an outreach program that helps children, said 2nd Lt. Erik Klasnick.

"It shows those involved in Our House that there is someone out there to help them," he said. "That we're not just turning our back on them."

Capt. Ryan Hanson, an Infantry Officer Basic Course trainer, helps fill sand bags to line the entryway of the home's wooded area Saturday morning at Our House. About 80 Soldiers from 4th and 5th Platoons of IOBC's C Company spent the day helping out on the home's grounds.

203rd FSB donates sign, time to Loyd Elementary

PIE partners create special relationship

Spc. Nikki St. Amant
Bayonet staff

Between the deployments, rotations to the National Training Center, field training exercises and an assortment of other missions that pack the 203rd Forward Support Battalion's schedule, the unit still finds time to hunker down with the latest Berenstein Bears book, muster up their most convincing grumbly voices and spend a little quality time with the students of Loyd Elementary School.

This past November, the 203rd FSB filled a Partners in Education hole that had been empty for two years, principal Angie McPherson said.

Recently, the 12 volunteers who currently participate in the program were on hand to hang and dedicate a new sign outside the school's front door advertising the school and the 203rd's partnership. The sign was paid for using funds donated by the battalion.

The volunteers help out in a variety of ways, McPherson said.

Depending on the requests of the teachers, the Soldiers may read to the class as a group, or work separately with students who are having trouble with reading.

"(The Soldiers) have done a wonderful job with students who just need a little extra help," McPherson said.

Literacy, she said, is an important focus of the school and the Partners in Education program.

These volunteer partners go above and beyond with the range of help they provide.

They not only assist with the school's ongoing literacy initiative, but also tutor students in math, science and other subjects, McPherson said.

Sometimes it's good to set the books and brains aside and just have a little fun — something the Soldiers have no problem doing.

When it's time to hit the gym for physical education, the Soldiers are all about fun and games and use the opportunity to teach sportsmanship and teamwork.

The 203rd's P.I.E. coordinator, 1st Lt. Theresa Ballash, said the battalion commander, Lt. Col. Charles B. Salvo, felt it was important for the unit to be in touch with the post community and recognized that Loyd was one of the few schools on post that did not have a partner in education.

McPherson said with Ballash's help, the 203rd has made a big difference. And the program isn't only for the students' benefit, she said.

"The students are children of military sponsors," she said. "(The program) gives Soldiers the chance to see what is going on in the schools."

It appears the P.I.E. program at Loyd has ended up a win-win situation in this case, said McPherson.

McPherson also said she is grateful for the Soldiers' involvement in the school's effort to foster a love of reading in the students and promote their general education and well-being. She said the school has never had a partner as active and involved as the 203rd has been thus far.

So, whether it's donating a sign, rubbing elbows during a basketball game during P.E. or tongue twisting through classic Dr. Seuss rhymes and riddles, the Soldiers of the 203rd and the students of Loyd Elementary School appear to have a fun, productive partnership to count on in the future.

Infant AVID shows promise at Faith

Bridgett Siter
Bayonet staff

Jesus Medvano was slipping through the cracks. He was an inner city kid from a poor family, surrounded by crime and violence. His 2.0 grade point average was a reflection of his paradigm, not his potential.

Medvano "made it out alive." In fact, he flourished, finishing high school with a 4.0 thanks to AVID — Advancement Via Individual Determination — a program designed for students like him, students who have the ability to succeed but lack the motivation or study skills.

"Instead of falling into a life of crime and violence, I chose the alternate route," Medvano said in a speech that was broadcast to Faith Middle School teachers March 25 during AVID University, a workshop designed to educate teachers about the program's goals and guidelines.

After enrolling in AVID, Medvano said, "everything changed. The darkness disappeared ... and I turned myself around. AVID was the key."

Now in its 24th year nationwide, AVID is proving incredibly successful if success can be measured by the number of students who've graduated from a four-year college or university.

But AVID's in its maiden year at Faith, where Angie Cotton is one of three teachers trained in the curriculum, which emphasizes practical skills like note-taking, time management and organization.

It's too soon to say how many of the 30 Faith students enrolled in AVID will attend college, but Cotton's certain she sees success in the eyes of her students.

There's 11-year-old Paul Bezner, a sixth-grader who seemed to suffer from "extreme bashfulness" at the beginning of the year. Bezner met the criteria for AVID. He attended school regularly, maintained average grades and was never a discipline problem. But he hung his head in class and rarely contributed to the discussion.

These days, Bezner appears more confident, Cotton said, though certainly not effusive. He speaks when spoken to, and he'll look you in the eye. He's making plans to study law at Harvard, a goal his mother believes he'll reach.

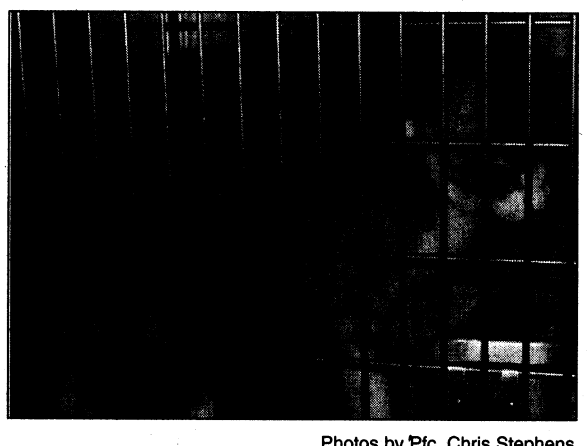
"I used to have to prod him to do his homework all the time, every day," she said. "Now, he does it on his own. I don't have to say a word."

And there's Edmund Gonzales, an eighth-grader whose seventh-grade year was riddled with absences and discipline problems. The former honor-roll student was barely passing his classes.

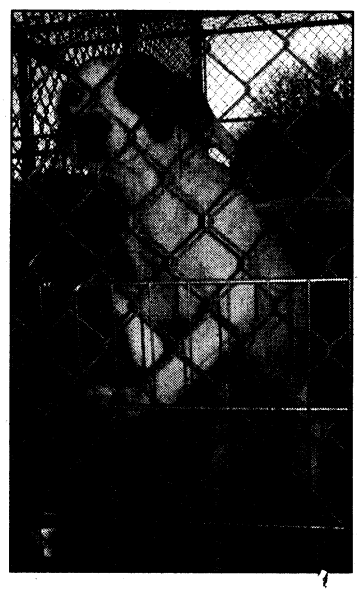
Thanks to AVID, Gonzales is once again earning As and Bs, and he's making plans to attend Texas A&M. He spoke during the Monday meeting of the Fort Benning School Board, extolling the value of AVID and the impact it's had on his life.

"Now I realize I'm the lucky one," he told the school board members, recalling a time early in the year when he envied his classmates, those who weren't enrolled in AVID and weren't required to maintain meticulous notes and adhere to a rigorous study schedule.

Rigor is what AVID is all about, said Dr. Barbara Smith, AVID's Eastern Division director, who explained the program to Faith teachers last week.



AVID students have an abundance of untapped potential, and they must be challenged, Smith said.



"Take a group of students with average ability, give them exceptional skills and watch them do extraordinary things," she said. "AVID works because it takes those students who aren't performing at capacity and it introduces them to academic rigor. It's not a study hall. It's giving them the academic and social support they need to succeed."

Debra Alexander spearheaded Faith's introduction to AVID this year. The Fort Benning Schools instructional support specialist believes all students could benefit from AVID. One day she hopes to see the program incorporated schoolwide.

In the meantime, she's beginning the selection process for next year's AVID classes, which will include students in sixth and seventh grades. Students or parents of Faith students interested in the program should contact Alexander through the school office at 545-5524.

Dexter Elementary School's preK students gave two performances of PreK Speaks Mother Goose last week as their Spring Program.

The students recited nursery rhymes in full costume and sang and danced in separate performances for their parents and their classmates.

Each student memorized a line, but 4-year-old Charlyn Moss, who played Mother Goose, delivered lines to introduce 18 different rhymes — all completely from memory.

Dexter students render honors

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

Every day, Dexter Elementary School's fifth-graders take part in a special ceremony — raising, lowering and folding the American flag.

Each of the students take pride in this responsibility, but for some students — like Briona Beckford — whose parents have deployed in support of Operations Enduring Freedom and Iraqi Freedom, the ceremony is personal.

"My dad works at Kelley Hill," Beckford said. "When he was in the war, when we put up the flag, I used to think about him a lot."

Thinking of her father at war brought the flag to life for Beckford. She gained a new understanding of what it stood for.

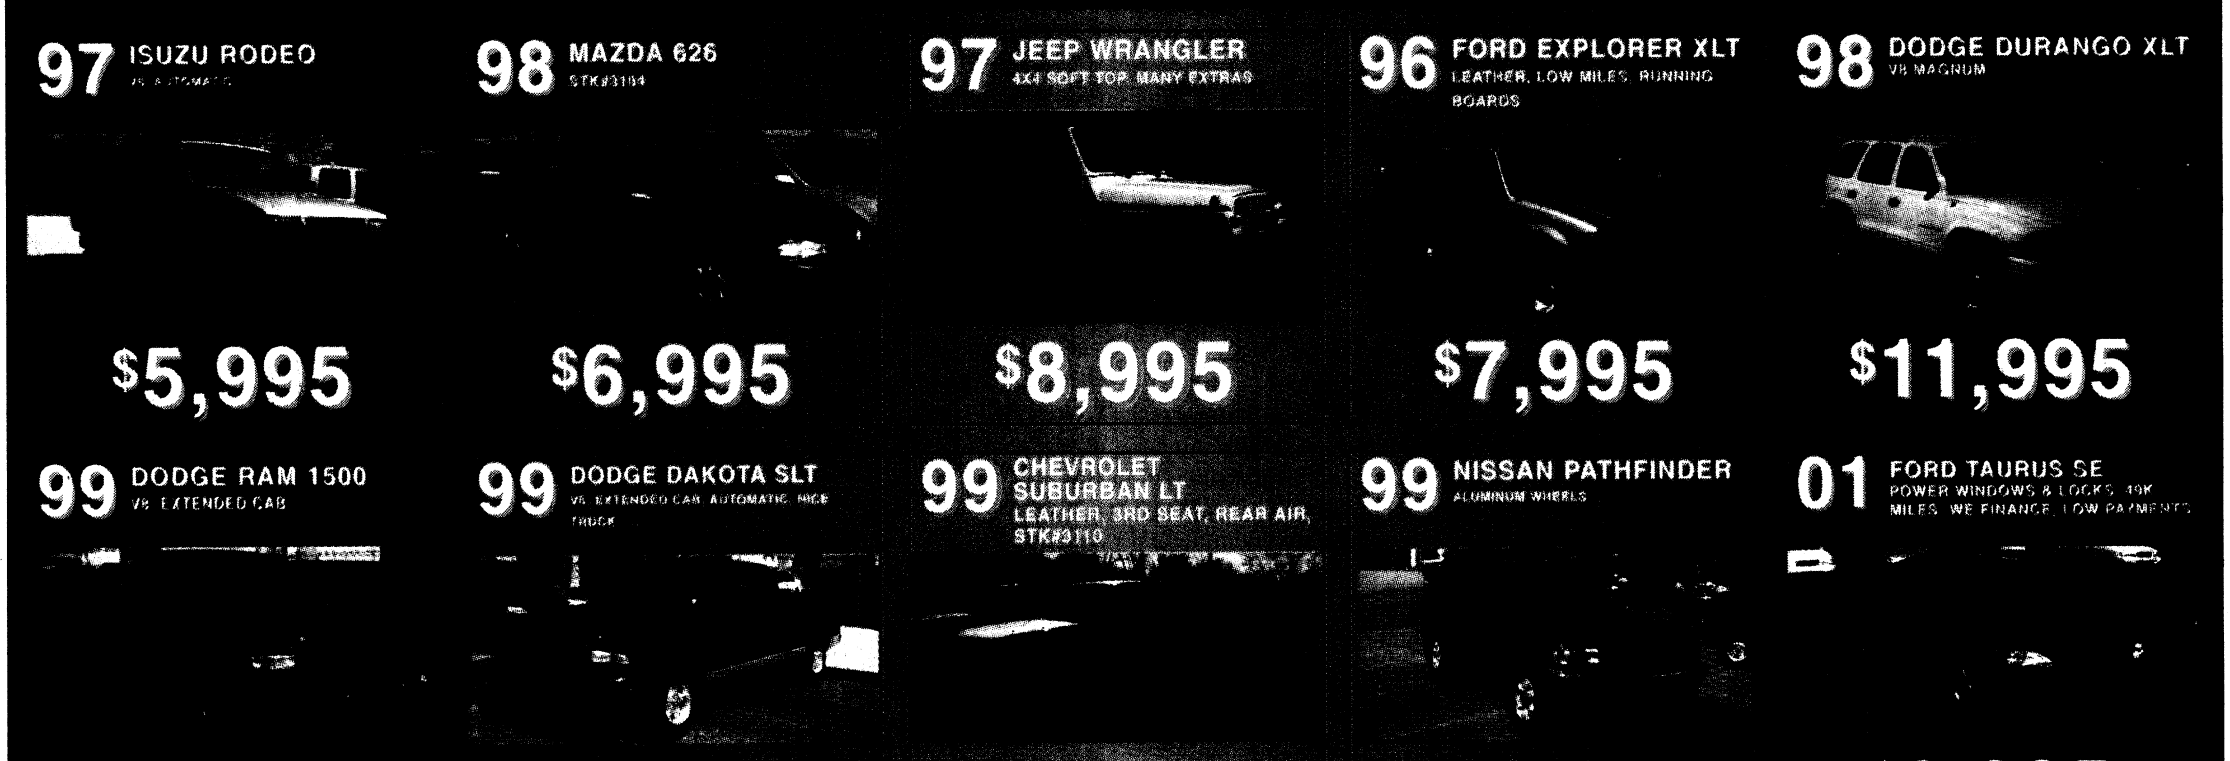
"This flag represents our country and the Soldiers who fight to protect our country," she said. "They do a good job."

So it is with special care that the students render honors to both their nation and their parents. And to ensure they perform the ceremony just as it should be, the students looked to Soldiers of their Partner in Education, 1st Battalion, 10th Field Artillery Regiment.

Five Soldiers from the battalion joined the students at the school Tuesday. Their mission — to show the children how to properly raise, lower and display the flag, said Sgt. Christopher Rose, B Company, 1st Bn., 10th Field Artillery Regt.

But more than that, Rose wanted to put the ceremony into perspective.

"It's good for the kids to know the reason behind what they do every morning," he said. "That way they're not just doing it — it has a proper meaning."



Rose and his fellow Soldiers can rest at ease — Beckford is not the only student with a deep appreciation for the flag.

Kiuana Hemmingway, whose father, Capt. Cory Hemmingway, is a service battery commander with 1st Bn., 10th Field Artillery Regt., said she understands the flag is important and why it should be "kept up" and respected.

"It represents our country and what it's for," she said. "And the military groups, people who work every day to protect our country."

"These are American, military children," said Sandy Risberg, the battalion commander's wife, who helped out at the class. "They have to start somewhere, respecting their flag and their country. And there's no one better to show them how than American Soldiers."

Forgiving brings us back into fellowship

USAIC Staff Chaplain's Office

REFLECTIONS

By now, most of us have seen the new blockbuster movie by Mel Gibson, The Passion of The Christ. If you have not, I highly encourage you to go and view it before it leaves the movie theaters. Gibson's movie follows the traditional passion play format of Holy Week.

Passion plays have a long and distinguished heritage in Christianity, and no discussion of its purposes and its aftermath can be complete without an understanding of the theological significance.

As the Lenten season ends with Christ's triumphal entry on Palm Sunday and we move into the Easter season, (which begins with his resurrection), it is a time of renewing and rebirth. It becomes apparent that we are provided with the perfect occasion to focus our spiritual walk on the central teachings of our faith —that of justification by grace through faith in Christ Jesus alone.

The Doctrine of Justification by the gift of grace is wounded in the full atonement, which Christ won by spilling his blood and dying on a wooden cross. What do I mean by atonement? Well, in scripture, it is referred to in terms of redemption, expiation, reconciliation and the taking away of the stain of sin. Sin then, is an offense to God, a debt that we owe, a broken relationship between God and us, a stain which we cannot remove or blot out.

"But God desires all men to be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth." (1 Timothy 2:4)

So God has done everything necessary to pay for our debt to reconcile, liberate and forgive us, in order to bring us back into fellowship with him. It's all God's doing, not ours.

God gives us the gift of grace, not because we deserve it or because we have earned it by doing good things, it is entirely his free gift to give, and he does so willingly. It is given by his grace alone. "For by grace you have been saved through faith; and this is not your own doing, it is the gift of God — not because of works, least any man should boast." (Ephesians 2:8-9)

The wonderful Gospel (Good News) is that by God alone, by his grace that gives us the faith and transforms our hearts and lives into something new and beautiful. It is through the heroic endurance of Christ Jesus as he forgave his tormentors for the merciless cruelty of being tortured and crucified, which express how much and by what means our transformation was accomplished.

Let us then respond in kind and forgive others for what they have done to us. For it is through the act of repenting and forgiving that we are brought back into fellowship with God. What better time is there to allow change of our lives than the Easter season.

Heroic faith figures have failed too

Chaplain (Maj.) Jeffrey Hawkins
Chaplain Family Life Center

My jumpers exited the aircraft perfectly, I followed immediately, and the landing couldn't have been easier. It was my last jump and the last day of three of the most intense weeks any paratrooper can endure ... U.S. Army Jumpmaster School. On top of that, I got the amazing news as they queued us up for the informal graduation ceremony on the drop zone I would be named the distinguished honor graduate of our class. Everything was going fantastic — until the jumpmaster committee walked up to me in the graduation rank and asked me to follow him.

"Sergeant Hawkins," he asked, with a pained, concerned look on his face. "Please, please tell me that you checked the trailing edge of the aircraft door before you exited your last stick?"

The blood drained from my face as I rewound the video tape of the last jump in my head. Then suddenly, it hit me — he was right, I had forgotten the most basic and critical of safety maneuvers we were required to demonstrate: Check the trailing edge of the aircraft door.

Hawkins

And in the time it took him to genuinely say, "I'm sorry," I went from standing in the distinguished honor graduate spot to receive my wings to standing about 15 feet away, dropped from the course on the last day, last jump, last minute in fact, watching everyone else get their jumpmaster wings ... and me get nothing. I had failed and failed miserably.

Have you ever failed? Have you ever failed miserably? If so, you're not alone. In fact, the club you are a part of doesn't just include me, it includes some pretty heroic figures of the faith.

How about Moses? Now Moses murdered a guy and tried to literally "cover it up" by burying him in the sand. Within 24 hours, he'd been found out and fled the country in shame. How about King David? From the medal of honor at age 15 in slaying Goliath, he wound up in a love triangle as king that got him on three counts of UCMJ action: desertion, adultery and murder. Have you seen the movie The Passion of The Christ? What about Peter? He disowned Jesus three times after telling him only hours before that he would die for Jesus if he needed to. Talk about abysmal features!

Was each of their failures final? Or did they know the secrets to failing forward? When failure comes, what do you do to make stepping stones out of your stumbling blocks ... What can you do to ensure your failure isn't fatal? ... What do you do to fail forward? Well that's exactly what I'll talk about in next week's column, "The Secrets of Failing Forward."

LAYIN' DRAG

Run the quarter on the strip, keep racing off the streets

Spc. Nikki St. Amant
Bayonet staff

Are you one of those drivers that has a 1970 Chevelle Super Sport? You know, the one with the 454-cubic-inch monster under the hood, and the super-wide slicks in the back to put 450 horses' feet on the ground?

Or maybe you're the import-crazy type with the '93 Mazda RX-7. Modded up, with its twin-turbo, rotary engine, a carbon-fiber hood and matching trim, GReddy dual-air intake and exhaust, 50-shot NOS injection that takes the car to 390 horses at the back wheels, 18-inch Nittos on catch-me-if-you-can, light-weight rims and a competition audio system — it's an import must-have.

From one racing addict to another: you don't have to risk your car or motorcycle, your license, your cash, your life or the lives of the humdrum, "normal" drivers around you anymore.

In response to the street racing pandemic, many different organizations have teamed up with law-enforcement, political figures, racing icons, and national agencies to provide relatively safe, legal venues for the reformed street racer to feed the need for speed.

According to their Web site, the National Hot Rod Association has spearheaded a program called Street Legal Drags to reduce the proliferation of illegal racing by convincing racers to race a strip and not the street.

More than 140 member tracks across the nation are participating in the program, which opens up one-eighth-mile or quarter-mile tracks to street legal cars.

The tracks usually open street racers on weekend nights, and, for a budget-minded fee of about $10 to $20, racers can make as many passes as they want. Most of these events are straight grudge races, heads-up challenges pitting a car against whoever happens to pull up next to them in the staging area.

Formal bracketing is usually not used in order to maximize the number of passes available to all drivers.

Many other programs are available across the country as well.

Some cities, like San Diego, have programs that incorporate law enforcement into the picture as partners to help foster an environment of understanding between racers and police forces.

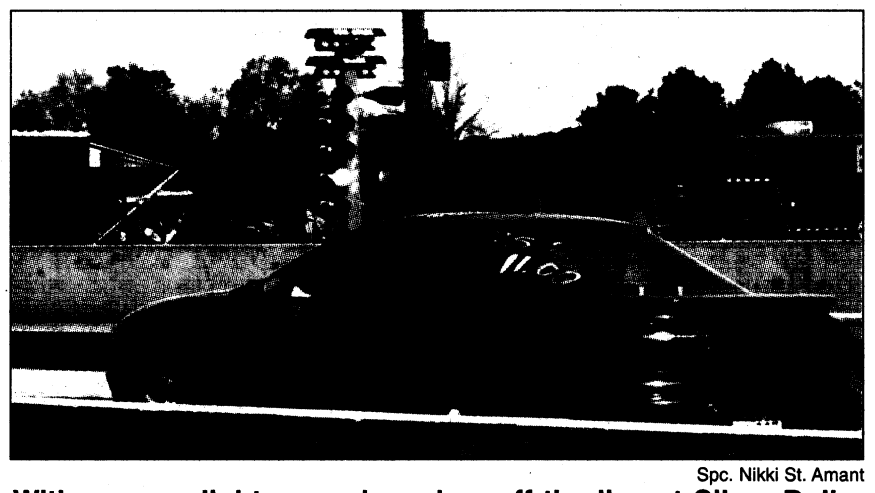
During special events, San Diego's street legal track program, Race Legal, pits off-duty police officers against their former prey in light-hearted, friendly racing competition.

The program there, according to their Web site at www.racelegal.com, has an average turn-out of 350 cars and motorcycles on any given night, has reduced the number of illegal-racing deaths by 78 percent in just one year and reduced organized illegal street racing by 99 percent.

The only problem is that for many areas, like Columbus, the closest quarter-mile tracks that participate in programs like these are between an hour and a half to three hours away or more.

The closest one here is the Silver Dollar Raceway on Highway 96 in Reynolds, Ga.

Ed Swearingen, track owner, said they have a fairly significant turn-out on Friday nights, when the most racers come out for the Street Legal Drags event and said he thinks the program is helping keep some drivers racing on the track instead of on public roads, but said the word needs to get out better to street racers that there are legal alternatives.



Many tracks, including the Silver Dollar Raceway, participate in a NHRA Junior Drag Racing League, Swearingen said, that teaches teen-agers the dangers of street racing and encourages them to keep their racing on the strip instead of on the street by providing a healthy, safe environment for young racers to learn the values of competition, track procedures and appreciation for the vehicles they are driving and the inherent dangers of the sport.

Though requirements vary from track to track, at the least, drivers need a valid driver's license, proof of registration and insurance, DOT-approved, street-legal tires, seat belts, a muffler and, if using nitrous oxide, the bottles must be stamped as meeting DOT's 1,800-pound standard, according to the NHRA Web site.

Some tracks may require helmets, 5-point restraint systems or other safety equipment.

Those requirements aren't asking much of drivers in return for a safe place to race with almost no interference from law enforcement agencies and no risk of causing a potentially fatal accident involving innocent people.

To find NHRA-sponsored tracks that participate in the Street Legal Drags program or for more information about track procedures, visit www.nhra.com.

Post Soldier retains powerlifting crown

Kelley Hill Soldier prepares for U.S. nationals in June

Bridgett Siter
Bayonet staff

It's the quiet ones you have to watch out for Sgt. 1st Class Calvin Thompson is, by all accounts, a quiet man — "low key" his wife says — and he's not one to brag, which is why few people know he's held the Military Nationals Power Lifting Super Heavy title since 1997, save for last year when he was deployed with the 29th Infantry Regiment to Iraq.

Thompson regained the title March 13 at the Military Nationals in Fort Hood, Texas, lifting 600 pounds in both squat and dead lift and 520 pounds bench press.

At "40-something," the 20-year veteran was the oldest in his class.

Thompson, who said he grew up on a farm in Mississippi "baling hay and tossing cows," admits he's naturally strong and has never had to resort to supplements or muscle enhancers.

In fact, his approach to powerlifting is unorthodox by anyone's standard.

He doesn't adhere to a strict exercise regimen, doesn't spend a great deal of time in the gym, and eats most anything his heart desires.

"Actually anything Deborah puts on the table," he said of his wife of 20 years. The couple have three sons, Phillip, 18, who's preparing to lift competitively, Calvin Jr., 15, and Patrick, 12.

Thompson became interested in competitive powerlifting in 1995, the year his father died.

"I was angry. I needed someplace to vent — someplace other than home," he said.

New to Fort Hood at the time, Thompson headed to the post gym after work each day to deal with his grief.

Johnny Graham, the coach of the post's powerlifting team, spotted the new guy hoisting more than 400 pounds and invited him to join the team.

"I saw a really, really quiet guy with a lot of power and undeveloped technique," said Graham, a retired master sergeant who also coaches the men's and women's U.S. Powerlifting Masters teams.

After the first tournament, Thompson was hooked, and he made up his mind then and there he'd become the military champion and retain the title until he retires.

He may be able to hold the title longer, since retirees can compete in military weightlifting events.

Thompson, whose Fort Benning home is littered with years and years worth of trophies, said lifting helped him "deal with the down time" during the regiment's deployment to Iraq and Kuwait last year.

When barbells weren't available out in the desert, he lifted sand bags instead.

"It helped keep me focused, helped me stay positive," he said. "Lifting will do that for you."

Now Thompson — whose "form is one of the best you'll find in the U.S.," according to Graham — qualifies for the U.S, National Powerlifting Championship, which will take place in June in St. Louis.

His wife has no doubt he'll do well.

"I'm not cocky about Calvin. I'm confident," Deborah said. "He doesn't do anything halfway. He simply likes to win, and he's made up his mind to do it."

Think twice about street racing excitement

Spc. Nikki St. Amant
Bayonet staff

You've spent hours fiddling with your boost controller, playing with the computer management system you just had installed, fine tuning the suspension and, basically, pampering that car of yours like it was your first-born child. Now it's time to hit the street on Friday night and show that hot Supra that smoked you last weekend what you're made of, right? WRONG!

Street racing interest has multiplied exponentially in the years since such pop culture films as The Fast and the Furious and Gone in 60 Seconds, which glorify street racing and fast, dangerous driving, were released.

The National Highway Traffic Safety Administration reported illegal street racing was a factor in 135 fatal crashes in 2001, which is almost twice the number reported in 2000.

In 1999, the Florida Department of Highway Safety for Motor Vehicles reported 28 accidents related to street racing, with two fatalities and 27 injuries. Not that many, right? The number of accidents has risen 70 percent since then, and the number of injuries has risen 120 percent.

The people who die or are hurt in street racing accidents aren't necessarily street racers themselves, either. Many times, it is innocent, legal drivers and their passengers whose lives are destroyed when racers lose control.

On Feb. 14., on the Hawaiian island of Oahu, two Mitsubishi Eclipses, driven by Army Soldiers, were racing on the H-1 highway and collided with a truck. All three vehicles were consumed by flames that erupted when the truck's gas tank exploded. A passenger in the truck was killed, and the driver was seriously injured. Both the drivers of the Eclipses died in the accident and one passenger was killed, according to the Honolulu Advertiser.

The toll in human lives and injuries should be enough to discourage most racers, but if the bodies of innocent bystanders along impromptu drag strips isn't enough to make racers think twice, maybe the possible legal implications of illegal street racing can dissuade the fast and way too furious.

While penalties vary from state to state, most are becoming more punitive as deaths rise.

In many states, like California, Missouri and others, street racers who cause accidents that lead to fatalities can now be charged with second-degree murder instead of vehicular homicide, opening the door to far lengthier prison sentences — up to 25 years.

Many states have passed laws that forfeit the titles of cars of drivers with a second conviction for drag racing. So that sweet little WRX or juiced up Mustang you have sunk thousands of dollars into could become the property of the state and be sold at an auction to some lucky stranger.

The fines for street racing continue to rise as well. In some states, you may have to fork over up to $5,000 per offense, if convicted.

In most states, conviction for drag racing results in a mandatory driver's license suspension for the first offense.

In most cases, judges will assign community service for first-time offenders in lieu of jail time, but for repeat offenders, the possibility of doing time behind bars is very real.

Insurance rates skyrocket as well for convicted street racers because of the extremely high risk of devastating accidents tied to the sport.

Military service members caught drag racing on Department of Defense installations aren't exempt from prosecution or severe penalties.

Racers on post can be charged with drag racing, speeding and reckless endangerment.

Possible penalties for these offenses range from fines of up to $1,000 per offense to revocation of installation driving privileges and prosecution under the Uniform Code of Military Justice, said Carol Hiller of the Office of the Staff Judge Advocate.

So, if you are one of those speed demons who just loves competition, do us all a favor and think twice. Weigh the consequences before you and the guy next to you launch off the line at your local neighborhood stoplight.

A three-car crash on the Hawaiian island of Oahu on Feb. 14, 2004, that killed four people. The drivers of the two cars were Army Soldiers. Witnesses reported the two vehicles were racing when one slammed into the back of the truck, rupturing the gas tank and igniting an inferno on the H-1 highway.

Faith starts wrestling team

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

The Faith Middle School wrestling team had the chance to finally get on the wrestling mats in their cafeteria for the very first time Tuesday.

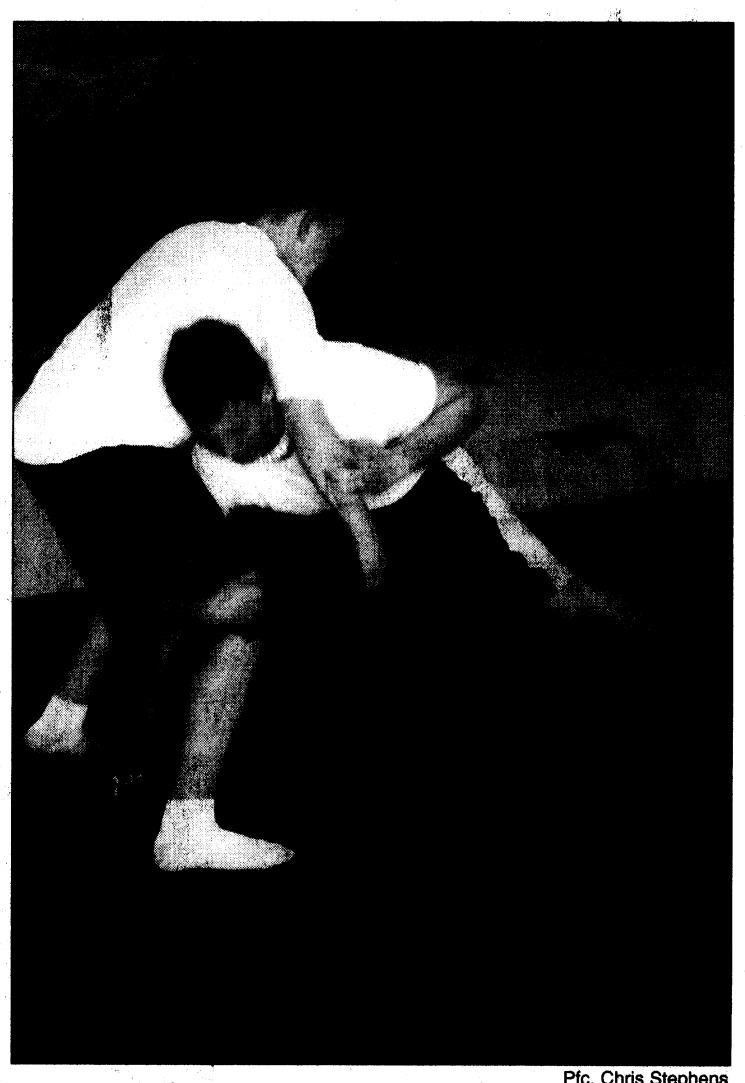
For two weeks, the almost 20-member team went through rigorous conditioning workouts with their coach to prepare them for the school's first wrestling season.

"I wanted to see what these guys were made of," said head wrestling coach Rick Everett. "I wanted to see how bad they wanted it."

After the two weeks of workouts, Everett could tell his team wanted it, and he began teaching them the basics on the mat Tuesday.

The basics included the three basic takedowns; the fireman's carry, single-leg takedown and double-leg takedown.

"The basics are very important in wrestling," Everett said. "Without them, a wrestler won't get anywhere. They'll get beat every time they go on the mat."



For the wrestlers, they were happy to finally see some action on the mat.

"It's nice to get on the mat and throw people around," said eighth-grader Alex Anderson. "That's why I came out here, to be physical, and I plan on doing that. I want to become the very best that I can."

Some of the students saw wrestling as something different for them to participate in after school.

"I've played baseball most of my life, and I got a little bored with it," said eighth-grader Ryan Shepherd. "I wanted to do something else, and I've always been interested in wrestling, so I figured I would give it a try and so I came out here."

Anderson and Shepherd said their goal this year was to learn as much of the basics and modern techniques as they could for when they wrestle next year at one of the Columbus-area high schools.

Pfc. Chris Stephens

Jacob Siter, right, performs the fireman's carry on Ryan Shepherd during practice Tuesday afternoon in the Faith Middle School cafeteria.

"I want to know what I'm doing when I wrestle next year," Anderson said. "If I can go ahead and get down the basics and learn and a few more techniques, then I feel I will be able to succeed next year at the high school level. I also have to put in the hard work and effort in all of the practices and meets. If I do that, then I feel I will be doing all right at the beginning of next year."

Most of the wrestlers agreed they are going to take their licks this year by some of the competition.

"To be a winner, you have to know what it feels like to lose," Shepherd said. "With some of our inexperience, that's what we're probably going to do. However, it will make us better in future matches. We will learn from our mistakes and use it as an advantage against our other opponents."

In order to compete for the team, wrestlers are required to maintain at least a 'C' average in the classroom.

"That tells me I have to work hard both in the classroom and on the mat," Anderson said. "In order for me to get better in wrestling, I have to do good in school. It all works hand-in-hand."

The team is currently considered a club team and has hopes of competing in open tournaments this year.

"It's important for these wrestlers to get into some tournaments," Everett said. "The more first-hand experience they have in competition, the better off they will be."

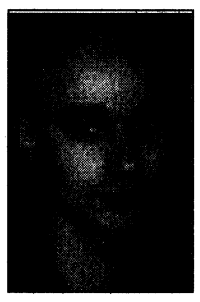
Dare I say — Jackets win it all?

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

All right, it's time for another one of my bold predictions. The Georgia Tech Yellow Jackets are going to win the National Championship in college basketball.

After taking a lot of time on whether or not I wanted to come out and say it, since I'm a die-hard Georgia Bulldogs fan, I decided to go ahead and suck up my pride and get it over with. It's not all that painful.

In this instance, I hope I'm wrong because I don't like to see them do well, but facts are facts, and they have the team that will win it all.



In the National Semifinals, the Jackets will play the Oklahoma State Cowboys. Now, Oklahoma State has a good team, but they can't match Tech's depth on the bench.

In the four NCAA tournament games the Jackets have played, there have been four different players who have been the high scorers for the game.

When one player has had an off day, the other players have helped pick up the slack.

A great example of this was in their Sweet 16 game against the Nevada Wolf Pack.

The team's leading scorer B.J. Elder went down with an ankle injury with only two minutes off the clock in the first half.

Teammate Marvin Lewis responded by leading the team in scoring and hitting key shots to outlast the Wolf Pack.

And when they played the Kansas Jayhawks in the Elite Eight, Jarret Jack stepped up with 29 points. Jack was money the whole day at the free throw line, hitting 13 of 14 shots. He also hit two free throws in overtime to clinch the game.

And, in the end, the bench is what wins you games.

In the other semifinal, the Connecticut Huskies will face the Duke Blue Devils.

Everybody is saying this should be the National Championship Game. You can argue it however you want, but let's face it, they're playing each other in the semifinals, not the finals.

Although UConn has the size advantage over the Blue Devils, I predict Duke will come out on top in this game because the Huskies can't match the Duke's speed. Players like J.J. Reddick, Chris Duhon and Luol Deng like to push the ball upcourt, and I don't think the Huskies can keep up with them.

With that, it will create an all-Atlantic Coast Conference final between the Blue Devils and the Jackets. I know, that's just what everybody wants to see.

Now, the Blue Devils are 2-1 against the Jackets this year, but Tech did snap Duke's home winning streak earlier in the season at Cameron Indoor Stadium.

Georgia Tech-Duke will be a great matchup. One sub-matchup that will be interesting to see is if Duhon can match the speed of Jack off the dribble, and vice versa.

Both players have a great deal of speed and they love to push the ball up. Each of them can create plays in a matter of seconds. Whichever player can prevent the other from imposing his will, will lead his team to victory.

Now, why am I picking Tech over Duke? True, Duke has beat Tech twice this year. But, the NCAA tournament is a different season.

I believe the Tech players want it more, and that's what will win them the game. Duke players have been here before and they are going to become complacent being in the National Championship game again.

I look for Tech to sweep in and steal the show, not behind their all-star players, but behind their team players. That's what they are — a team! They share the ball and they don't try to get personal glory.

It's all about the team.

The Savvy Consumer's Guide to Home Buying
Are you thinking about buying a home? If so, you will not want to miss this valuable seminar on the largest purchase you will ever make. The seminar will be held on Tuesday, April 13, 2004, 6:30-8:30 p.m. at the Family Unit Network Center, Building 359.

This seminar will take you through all the steps in making this major investment, and you will gain control of the home buying process. Step one begins with you. The seminar will address research, preparation, shopping for the realtor, shopping for the mortgage, who the players are and what each person's responsibility is. You will learn valuable tricks to help you get the most bang for your buck, get the best possible deal, save the greatest amount of money, and be happy with your purchase. If you are considering buying a home in the future - even a couple of years in the future, you will want to get the knowledge that is provided by this seminar.

Registration is required. You may register by calling the Army Community Service Center Financial Readiness Program, Building 2633, Soldiers' Plaza, 545-5485. The registration deadline is April 8, 2004.

Make a good decision for your future.

Quality childcare requires nurturing, devoted caregivers. At our centers, we have a few positions available for those who want a career, not a job.

Our center managers all started as paraprofessionals. You have real opportunities for advancement in our company.

If you have the same dedication to quality and meet our criteria, we invite you to apply for employment. Full and part-time positions are available.

All employees must have a high school diploma and child care experience. A CDA or other college is a plus! A hiring bonus and new pay scale is offered in certain positions.

Benefits include 40% childcare discount, HMO health insurance (Evergreen), life insurance, paid holidays and vacation, direct deposit and a 401K plan.

Apply at 5900 River Rd, Suite 500,
Monday – Friday from 8:30am to 4:00pm.

We look forward to meeting you!

Soldiers scammed off post

Post tax center protects troops from fraud

Spc. Nikki St. Amant
Bayonet staff

Post taxpayers who choose not to use the Fort Benning Tax Center run the risk of becoming one of the many Soldiers who have been defrauded by commercial tax preparation firms in the local area.

Capt. Steven Collins, of the Office of the Staff Judge Advocate, said he urges Soldiers to use the Tax Center in lieu of off-post preparers.

Collins said even legitimate tax preparation agencies can charge from $200 to $500 for services the post center provides for free.

Collins said Soldiers have come to him and reported significant difficulties with local tax preparation agencies. He said the most common problem reported to him is difficulty getting copies of the tax return itself and a statement of charges from the preparation company.

But problems can be much more serious than paperwork issues, said Sgt. Maj. Keith Dragnett, Infantry Training Brigade training and operations sergeant major.

Dragnett said Soldiers have reported some tax preparation firms promised them astronomical returns, took their paperwork and then gave them the run-around for more than a month before they received even a partial return that actually ended up being a loan that accrued interest.

Dragnett said one company promised him a $10,000 return for the current year and offered to get him and his wife $40,000 by refiling their previous three years' returns.

According to the Internal Revenue Service's Web site, the majority of these over-inflated return promises are achieved through illegal methods, like claiming false dependents, exaggerating personal and business expenses and non-existent business losses, and claiming unauthorized credits.

The Web site advises those who hire a tax preparer to take the time to investigate the agency's history and credentials. It also tells users to beware of agencies that promise huge returns or base their fees on a percentage of the return.

The quickest way to get a legally obtained tax return is through electronic filing, according to the

I-185 gate update

Lori Egan

Construction on I-185 continues and is on schedule, said Capt. Mindy Rosito, project officer for the access control point construction. I-185 is still scheduled to reopen Aug. 23 with five inbound lanes and two outbound lanes. There will be a visitor's center and an inspection lane for trucks once the construction is complete. Using an excavator, a worker is building up enough dirt to stabilize the equipment in order to place a concrete slab between the wing walls at the end of the box culvert. The box culvert, which will provide drainage, needed to be extended so the two outbound lanes can be built.

Former Benning officer charged

Sgt. Kim Dooley

Possession of child pornography. Fabricating evidence. Lying under oath on a sworn statement. Impeding an investigation.

Not what you'd expect to see on a rap sheet for an Army officer, but last month, the former commander of D Company, 1st Battalion, 11th Infantry Regiment, was found guilty of those and other charges in Fort Benning's courtroom.

Former Capt. Hector Fernandez-Garcia was sentenced to two years in confinement, to forfeit all his pay and allowances and was dismissed from the service.

Fernandez's case began almost two years ago, when he turned over the reins of D Co. to a new officer and moved to another assignment.

While cleaning up the file system on the government laptop computer turned over to him by Fernandez, the incoming commander discovered numerous files in the "recent" and "temporary Internet files" folders that contained pornographic titles.

The new commander turned the laptop over to the acting battalion commander at the time, who noticed the titles on the computer's Windows Media Player indicated that recent movies played on the computer were likely child pornographic

Post officials spend ACOE money

Lori Egan
Bayonet editor

Post officials looked through the wish lists and have made their decisions on how to spend the $500,000 Fort Benning received for winning the Army Communities of Excellence Chief of Staff Award in 2003.

The criteria for spending the money is that it will be used to improve quality of life, said Col. Rick Riera, garrison commander, and that's how the projects were decided upon.

Major subordinate commands and residents submitted many ideas on how to spend the money, including restoring Gowdy Field, fixing the swimming pool on Sand Hill and building a state-of-the-art physical fitness center on the track across from Infantry Hall.

But the projects that received the go ahead are:

• Playground improvements in the housing areas, at Tot Town and at Santa Fe Child Development Center. Playground safety in the housing areas was a major concern for the community mayors and residents last fall, which resulted in the removal of older, unsafe equipment. Upgrading the playgrounds on Fort Benning will cost approximately $300,000.

Kaye Elliott, director of Tot Town, said the playground equipment the center will get is more age-appropriate and will be safer for the children.

Another improvement Elliott said she was excited about was the addition of tricycle tracks around the play area.

"And the fence is going to be replaced with a Teflon-coated fence that is safer for the kids," she said.

The total cost of the improvements to Tot Town is $75,000.

Santa Fe Child Development Center will also get new playground equipment to replace its old, wooden equipment. The new equipment will consist of two age-appropriate modules, one for 6- to 24-month-old toddlers and an activity center for children who are 1 to 4 years old.

The cost of the Santa Fe improvements is almost $12,000.

• Improvements to Santiago Gym. More than $49,000 will be spent on both the outside and inside of the building. Landscaping the entrance, painting the interior (which is almost completed) and new equipment will be most of the improvements, said 1st Sgt. Tom

OPERATION GUARDIAN ANGEL

'Love you, stay safe'

Darsi Busler
Bayonet staff

"Love you." These were always the last two words you'd hear as you left the house or hung up the phone — at least they were at my best friend's house.

I remember the first time I went to his house. I was sitting at the kitchen table and heard him, his mom and his dad all say, "Love you," to his sister as she was rushing out the door.

I raised a cynical eye in amusement. They didn't really say that, did they? Well, yes, they did. There hasn't been a single time in the last 10 years when I haven't heard them say it in parting. Even if they were storming out of the house in mid-argument, no matter how angry they were at each other, they'd still remember to yell that over their shoulders.

This small sentiment took on an even greater meaning with an early morning visit three years ago. I only remember parts of it. "There's been an accident ... a car hit his motorcycle ... helmet cracked ... bike totaled ... hospital."

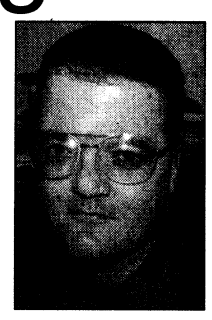
Seeing the terrified look in his father's eyes was one of the most visibly painful sights I've ever seen. He came within inches of losing his only son. Amazingly, my best friend walked away from that with just a small gash above his eye.

The one thing about that day that will stick with me the most is something else I saw that morning, the reason for all the love you's. No matter what happened, the family never left the important things unsaid. It wasn't just a feeling they were announcing, it was a way of saying, "I care about you. Take care of yourself. Be safe until I see you again."

Worrying about someone's safety is natural. With so many Soldiers entering combat zones around the world, friends and family are constantly worried about the security and safety of their own Soldiers. The concern, however, shouldn't end with redeployment.

Returning to a normal home life after spending so many months in war is difficult and takes time. The contrast in lifestyles may lead Soldiers to overindulge or have problems with relationships. These factors place them at higher risk for accidents and injuries.

To combat this increased risk, the U.S. Army Safety Center has created Operation Guardian Angel. The new campaign is an effort to keep every Soldier safe at home. It encourages friends and families to remind their Soldiers to practice safety throughout the readjustment period.



Anyone can be a guardian angel. It's easy — just do anything that will keep a Soldier safe. Take away someone's keys if they've been drinking. Remind bikers to wear a helmet next time they go for a ride. Let them know you care and appreciate them.

It can take as little as two words to let Soldiers know you care. Drive safe. Take care. Be smart. And in the words one family never forgets, two words that seem to say it all — love you.

For more information about Operation Guardian Angel, visit the U.S. Army Safety Center website at http://safety.army.mil.

Complete idiot's guide to driving

Master Sgt. Paul J. Ebner
USAIC Public Affairs Office

This week, I was asked to write about POV safety. My heart sank and I threw my best tantrum to get out of it, but it was no use. I was given a mission and told I must carry on.

What makes it difficult for me is POV safety is a serious issue and requires a different set of writing tools. I can't use jokes or poke fun at it. Surely, sarcasm has no place either. So, I tried research and came up with some interesting findings.

Traffic lights, it seems, have different meanings since I learned to drive, or so I thought. I did some checking with local authorities and discovered that when a traffic light turns red at an intersection it means "STOP!," not "Hey, if you don't mind, would you stop so those with the green light could go?"

A yellow light is a caution to let you know the light is about to turn red, not a warning to stomp on the gas. Green still means go, but consider making sure everyone traveling in the cross lane has a clear understanding of red before you take your foot off the brake.

All the auto manufacturers I contacted tell me turn signals come standard on all their models, as do brake lights. They haven't, however, figured a way to make them automatic, so we will have to continue to rely on drivers to make sure the lights work and are used correctly before tailgating and pulling out in front of traffic.

I also researched a rumor about Interstate 185. It seems the speed limit on Interstate 185 is still 55. Yep, in all lanes until you get out of the city limits, where 70 m.p.h. is the highest I have seen — at least between here and Atlanta. Oh, there are no exemptions for those with fast cars, pretty cars and especially not for those with pretty and fast cars.

And I learned those nifty red and white triangle signs posted at the end of on and off ramps with the letters Y-I-E-L-D on them are not just for decoration. According to the Georgia Department of Motor Vehicle Safety 2003 Driver's Manual, they mean yield. You must slow down to a reasonable speed for the conditions and, if necessary, stop so that you may yield the right of way to traffic on the road or in the intersection.

On a serious note — no really, I'm serious — for those drivers who don't like to buckle the kids or even themselves in a proper safety seat or seat belt, I want you to go to your refrigerator and get an egg. Hang that egg from a string a few inches below your rearview mirror. Now accelerate slowly and drive at a normal speed around the block. When you get back to your home, pull up to where you park and stop suddenly.

When you're done cleaning the egg off your windshield, go give your kids a hug and a kiss and promise yourself you will never let them, or you, ride unbuckled again.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Hospital employee shows good customer service

I am responding to your solicitation of information about service excellence in Bridgett Siter's column on March 19.

I would like to tell you about one of the operators who answers the phone when you call for appointments at Martin Army Community Hospital.

I can't remember his name, which embarrasses me since he always makes a point of introducing himself when you call.

If you are lucky enough to connect with this gentleman when you call in needing an appointment, you will be well taken care of.

Not only is he extremely good at fitting your appointment need into your time schedule, he is cheerful, positive and polite while doing so.

He will go the extra mile to make sure that you can see the doctor you need at the time that works best for you, which isn't always an easy task. His customers feel valued, important and "in good hands," which is how any enterprise wants its clients to feel!

I'm embarrassed to not remember his name, but anyone who has had contact with this man will know exactly who I'm talking about.

He is a shining customer service star at Martin Army Community Hospital, and I thank him!

The following letters to the editor are in response to Spc. Eliamar Castanon's March 26 commentary about single Soldiers in housing:

Resident not excited about new neighbors

As an individual who will soon be having single Soldiers in their living area, I would like to respond to Spc. Castanon's editorial.

She wondered where the welcome wagon is and why the hostility. Why her hostility? She came across open and angry.

We were not asked if we approved of moving the Soldiers to the housing areas, which is an advantage of being married or having children.

As a resident of the housing area, I personally feel that the single Soldiers are not as "settled down" as some of the married Soldiers. I know that there are exceptions to the rule, but some that I have spoken to do not realize that there is a quiet time and that they (the single Soldiers) cannot just do as they wish.

With three Soldiers per house, it will be like three different families living in the same apartment. With parking assigned to one vehicle per household, what will they do with the other two vehicles? Park in someone else's assigned spot as she wrote?

If there are no problems arising from the single Soldiers moving into housing, I would greatly welcome them to the housing area with an open smile and "can I help?"

But I will say this — if many problems arise, I will be there working against them.

— Name withheld upon request

Single Soldiers still need home, nice neighbors

I am married to a Soldier and was once upon a time a Single Soldier. I understand what you mean about coming home and feeling a part of something.

But I think what is traditionally thought of when you think of single Soldiers is "party, party, party" with no thought about who is around them.

That should not really bother you, and there are married people in quarters who do not respect one another.

It is something that is going to be an adjustment. But if you were my neighbor, I would invite you to tea ...

Respect has to be given from all parties, as well as earned.

Commanding General Brig. Gen. Benjamin Freakley, left; Brig. Gen. Randal Castro, commanding general, U.S. Army Engineer Division, Southeast Region; and Steve McKnight, chief executive officer, McKnight Construction Company; shovel the soil during the groundbreaking ceremony April 2 for the new multidenominational chapel that is going to be built across the street from Wynnsong Theater on Ingersoll Avenue. Once completed, the 22,057-square-foot facility will hold a religious education resource center, four offices, 12 classrooms, two multipurpose rooms, a nursery and an industrial-grade kitchen. Part of the same project is the 5,000-square-foot addition for The Infantry Center Chapel annex that will add two large and four divided classrooms and restrooms. The project is part of a $6 million contract scheduled for completion in October 2005.

OCS Hall of Fame inductees inspire, influence candidates

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

Lt. Col. Kim Orlando was a man who led from the front, no matter where he was or what he was doing. And that's how he'll be remembered by the Soldiers he led from the 716th Military Police Battalion, 101st Airborne Division — two of whom he spilled blood with on the desert sands of Karbala, Iraq.

Orlando, the battalion's commander, and two of his Soldiers were killed in October when they confronted a group of armed men who were out after curfew and the Iraqis opened fire.

"He was a guy who was proficient in all things you would expect an officer to do, as well as the things that he expected his Soldiers to be able to do," said Lt. Col. Lennie Upshaw, a friend of Orlando's. "He was an out-front type of leader."

But Orlando's leadership and impact did not end with his death. Last week, his influence reached all the way to Fort Benning, where he was posthumously inducted into the Officer Candidate School Hall of Fame April 2.

Forty-one officers were inducted during the ceremony held in Marshall Auditorium at Infantry Hall.

"Induction is the critical link between the past and present," said Lt. Col. Bradley Booth, commander, 3rd Battalion (OCS), 11th Infantry Regiment. "(The officers chosen) will inspire these candidates as they are commissioned."

It is the stories and examples of these inductees that will inspire today's officers in training as they make their way into the Army, and in many cases, onto the frontlines of freedom in Afghanistan and Iraq, he said.

Young Soldiers like Senior Officer Candidates Alex Wymore and Adam Kaufman.

Kaufman was particularly touched by Orlando's story.

"I hadn't realized that he was killed in action, that he was a military policeman," said Kaufman, who will become an MP officer. "You don't usually think of MPs as being out there on the front lines. It made me stop and think about the seriousness of the branch I've been chosen for."

For Wymore, it was inspiring to think that, someday, it could be him or his fellow classmates crossing the stage.

"It just made me think about where we're all going to be in 30 years," he said, nodding at the inductees, most of whom began their service two or three decades ago. "People from our company could be back here in 30 years — I know I would be very grateful to."

The candidates' interaction with the Hall of Fame inductees went beyond the stage, though. The OCS students provided the inductees with tours of the OCS barracks and grounds, and some candidates even got the chance to sit down to dinner with them.

Danny Barker

Guest speaker Maj. Gen. William Cugno congratulates Jason Orlando, 10, for his father's posthumous induction at the ceremony April 2.

Senior Officer Candidate Sun Ryu said it was a great opportunity — not just to learn from those who walked before her, but also to enjoy the fellowship that only OCS grads can share.

"They were talking about their experiences as OCS candidates — spit shining the floors, eating with their elbows crooked at a 90-degree angle — it was physically tougher then," Ryu said, laughing at one inductee's harrowing tale of sneaking a pizza into the barracks.

"But even though there's that 30-year gap, (the inductees) are still my comrades, they still have so many of the same experiences that I do," she said. "There was a bond, even though we didn't know each other.

"You can't understand it unless you've actually been through OCS ... but wherever I go, if I see an OCS grad, I'll have some commonality with them," Ryu said. "It was just a really neat experience."

3rd ID tests new 'unit of action' at NTC

Gary Sheftick
Army News Service

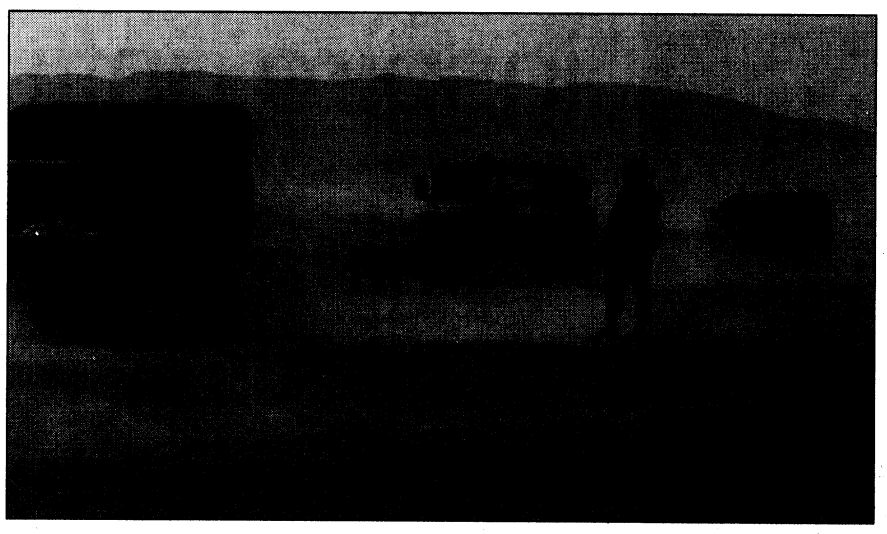
FORT IRWIN, Calif. — How can fewer tanks, fewer Bradleys and fewer howitzers add up to a more lethal unit?

That's what the Army's first "unit of action" set out to prove at the National Training Center March 26 to Saturday.

In the first field test of the new brigade structure, the 2nd UA of the 3rd Infantry Division is also training to return to Iraq. This time last year, many of the Soldiers were charging their armored vehicles victoriously into Baghdad as the 2nd Brigade Combat Team of the 3rd Inf. Div.

One difference between the BCT and the new unit of action is the addition of assets that previously belonged to the division. Field artillery, signal, chemical and engineer units that once supported the brigade are now permanently assigned to the UA. Capabilities such as counter-intelligence, human intelligence, and electronic warfare have been moved down to the UA.

"This organization has injected a lot more efficiencies with us and that makes us a lot more combat effective than what we were," said Col. Joseph DiSalvo, 2nd UA commander. "And we were pretty damn combat effective before the reorganization."



Restructuring as a UA brought about a significant change in task organization, DiSalvo said.

Instead of three maneuver battalions, now there will be only two in the UA. The UAs will be modular — each with one infantry battalion and one armored battalion.

As it restructured, the brigade lost a battalion of armor, and that means 44 fewer M-1 Abrams tanks. But a cavalry squadron was added to the UA, and will eventually become a reconnaissance, surveillance and target acquisition squadron, or RSTA. It will replace the brigade reconnaissance troop with more than three times the force.

The 1st Battalion, 19th Field Artillery is also permanently assigned, minus a battery of Paladins that used to support the BCT. The brigade also lost a battery of air defense artillery as it transitioned to a UA.

In the brigade support area, the 26th Forward Support Battalion and elements of the 10th Engineer Battalion are also now assigned to the UA. In the past, the FSB and engineers supported the brigade in combat, but now they're permanent UA assets.

A convoy of 3rd Infantry Division vehicles pass Whale Mountain during the first field test of the Army's new "units of action" at the National Training Center.

"With people staying here and working here for an extended period of time, you get a good team, a really good team going," said Staff Sgt. Kirk Hill, a communications NCO with the 26th FSB. "Continuity-wise, I know how the other guy works and he knows how I work."

It all adds up to a more self-sufficient and cohesive team, according to a division operations officer. He said UA commanders should have more flexibility and the capability to maneuver elements faster.

A signal company and military intelligence company is also part of the UA. A four-person public affairs section will be part of the UA, and the headquarters will be beefed up by a total of 58 additional personnel.

DiSalvo said the indirect fires of the field artillery, combined with intelligence assets, make the UA more lethal.

"With these assets, there's a better chance we'll collect the information," DiSalvo said, adding that new equipment such as unmanned aerial vehicles, sensors and communications suites will be fielded with UAs in the future, to further improve combat effectiveness.

As for now, DiSalvo and the UA are focused on Iraq.

"This is part of our training for OIF-3," he said. "We can't squander it, we only get 14 days."

Army officials announced last month that a newly restructured 3rd Infantry Division would return to Iraq for the next rotation, possibly as early as November.

Officer: Sentenced to 2 years confinement, dismissal video clips.

There were hundreds of file names that indicated pornography, several along the lines of "preteen having sex."

Fort Benning's CID launched a full investigation.

At the time the investigation began, Fernandez was attending a child custody hearing in Germany concerning custody of his young daughter.

When he returned, a CID agent requested his personal laptop computer to undergo a search. Eventually, he consented. The agent obtained it from the Best Buy in Atlanta, where he had dropped it off for repairs.

There were a number of files on the hard drive Fernandez attempted to recover before investigators took possession, though, including full-length and digitally "cut" portions of conversations he had recorded between his wife and himself.

These shortened files had been used to fabricate a conversation he claimed occurred between his wife and him.

Fernandez had created the recording in an attempt to exonerate himself of the child pornography charges, taking bits and pieces of his wife's responses and combining them with various questions he later recorded that indicated she had placed the pornography on his computer to blackmail him.

Fernandez then had a transcript of the recording typed and submitted to the CID agent investigating his case and provided her with a compact disk containing the digital file he had created.

In the fabricated conversation, he included references to his government quarters in an attempt to show that his wife was responsible for the child pornography he knew would be found on his home computer.

Knowing that CID would contact his wife — especially after he pinned the blame on her — Fernandez asked her not to talk to Army officials. Adding to her fear was the fact that he had previously told her he had reported her to the State Department when she took their child to Germany without his permission.

Confident she would not cooperate with investigators, he then made a sworn statement, fully blaming his wife and claiming he had never seen, downloaded or viewed child pornography on his personal laptop, home computer or government laptop.

The very next day, Fernandez went back to CID to "clarify" his statement. He still blamed his wife and maintained he had nothing to do with getting the child pornography there, but indicated that he had known of the pornography and attempted to delete it because, knowing it was there, he "felt dirtied."

But as more and more evidence came to light — including his wife's testimony — it became clear that Fernandez was entirely responsible for the child pornography.

All in all, Fernandez knowingly possessed more than 150 images of children. Of these, 79 were determined to be of children identified through federal, state, and international law enforcement investigations. These 79 images were of nine child victims between 9 and 13 years old.

The children were identified by a "hash database fingerprint" — much like a DNA fingerprint — that allows computer forensic and law enforcement examiners to match known child victims with ongoing child pornography investigations, said Capt. Josh Shuey, lead trial counsel on the Fernandez case.

One girl depicted in several of Fernandez's photos was photographed biweekly by her stepfather in sexually explicit and degrading poses for more than two years, Shuey said. She was around 11 years old in the photos.

"There wasn't a question of age with these victims," he said. "They were clearly children — some of them identified child victims."

Unfortunately, Shuey said, Fernandez's case is not entirely rare.

"We've had several instances (of child pornography possession) on Fort Benning in the past few years, but that's pretty low compared to other posts," he said. "Generally, it's just possession — not distribution — but it's pretty substantial Armywide."

But who would think that sexually explicit pictures and films of children would be such a pervasive problem in either the military or civilian communities?

According to the Campaign Against Child Pornography Web site, these graphic materials are available through nearly every mode of communication from print to video to audio.

"The nature of the Internet means that the availability of child pornography is no longer limited by geographical boundaries, and adults with a sexual interest in children can discreetly communicate with others sharing that interest with ease and largely without consequences," the site reads.

And just by downloading these materials, people are contributing to the problem, Shuey said, by fueling demand and thus production.

"If adults want to engage in pornography, that's one thing — theoretically, no one's getting hurt," he said. "But with child pornography, a child has to be sexually exploited or abused in some way to produce it."

Because identifying child victims and, in turn, their perpetrators, can be next to impossible in many cases, law enforcement agencies are counting heavily on deterrents to stop child pornography.

"They're trying to drive down the demand for these materials by making the punishment for possession so severe, the demand dries up and production slows or stops," Shuey said.

For possession of child pornography alone, perpetrators can face up to 10 years in prison.

If you know of someone who possesses or distributes child pornography, call CID at 545-1726.

ACOE: Plans made

Sparks, Headquarters Service Company, ITB.

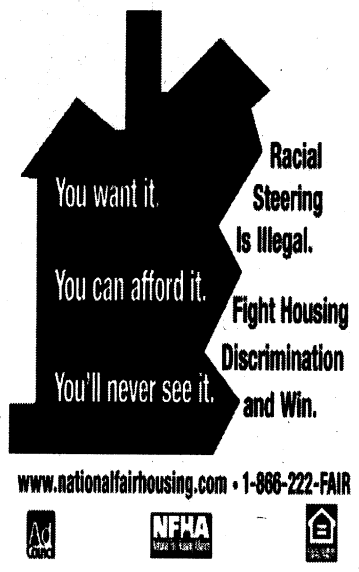
The gym, which gets a lot of use from deploying and redeploying Reserve Soldiers, Sand Hill cadre and Soldiers, and civilians, is getting 16 new weight machines, Sparks said.

This is good because ITB is expecting to grow by seven companies this summer, he said, listing the new equipment available for use — twist left, twist right; high squat; V squat; super horizontal machine ...

Sparks said other improvements include a gazebo for a break area, new exercise mats and two new sets of dumbbells, which range from 5 to 50 pounds.

• Landscaping for The Infantry Center Chapel. Total landscaping, to include sitting areas, will cost $50,000 and complete the renovation of the chapel.

Chaplain (Col.) Joel Cocklin, U.S. Army Infantry Center chaplain, said the removal of the Bartlett pear trees is what will be most noticeable.



The trees overwhelmed the church, Cocklin said, and by clearing the area, the chapel will be the focal point — TIC Chapel is one of the Army's most prominent chapels and its architecture shouldn't be engulfed by the landscaping.

• Updating 14 computers in Sayers Library. It will cost $14,000 to improve the computers in the library, which was an Army Family Advocacy Program issue, Riera said.

The computers need to be updated because they don't have the required memory and speed to provide customers with access to the Internet, said John Cook, Sayers Library manager.

The ACOE money needs to be spent on projects that benefit the community, Riera said, and these projects will improve quality of life for post residents.

The Sergeant Audie Murphy Club will meet at 11:30 a.m. Tuesday in the Corregidor Room of the Fort Benning Officers' Club. All members are encouraged to attend. For more information, call Sgt. Kim Dooley at 545-3367 or 545-2201.

Helping hands thanked for hard work

Benning Red Cross volunteers recognized

Spc. Eliamar Castanon

The Red Cross Fort Benning station held its annual Volunteer Recognition Ceremony Tuesday in the Lexington Room of the Officers' Club.

During the ceremony, the Red Cross recognized more than 200 volunteers who provided their services to help the community.

"A lot of these people are retired and give their time volunteering with the Red Cross," said Lorrie Pierre, Red Cross station manager. "This is our way of saying thank you for everything they do and letting them know that their work does not go unnoticed."

Col. Donald Bradshaw, MEDDAC commander, thanked the volunteers as a Soldier, a family member, a commander and, most importantly, as an American for all their contributions at Martin Army Community Hospital.

"Their portrayal of values are an example to all Americans," Bradshaw said. "The volunteerism and the support of one another demonstrates exceptional selfless service."

Special recognitions were presented to retired Col. Roy Brooks and Gene and Darla Gibbs.

Brooks received the Cynthia Wedel Hub Level II Award, which recognizes volunteers who have displayed superior and outstanding leadership to the Red Cross for a number of years. This award was presented to him for his work with the "care-mobile" at MACH.

The care-mobile transports people from the parking lot to the hospital and from the hospital back to their cars. Care-mobile drivers have transported 305,798 patients since July 2003.

"Brooks has been the first and only shuttle supervisor for six years," said Gene Gibbs, MACH volunteer coordinator, during the presentation of the award.

"From recruiting, scheduling and training more than 25 volunteer drivers, maintaining the shuttle and covering shifts, Brooks' dedication truly represents the spirit of American Red Cross volunteerism," he said.

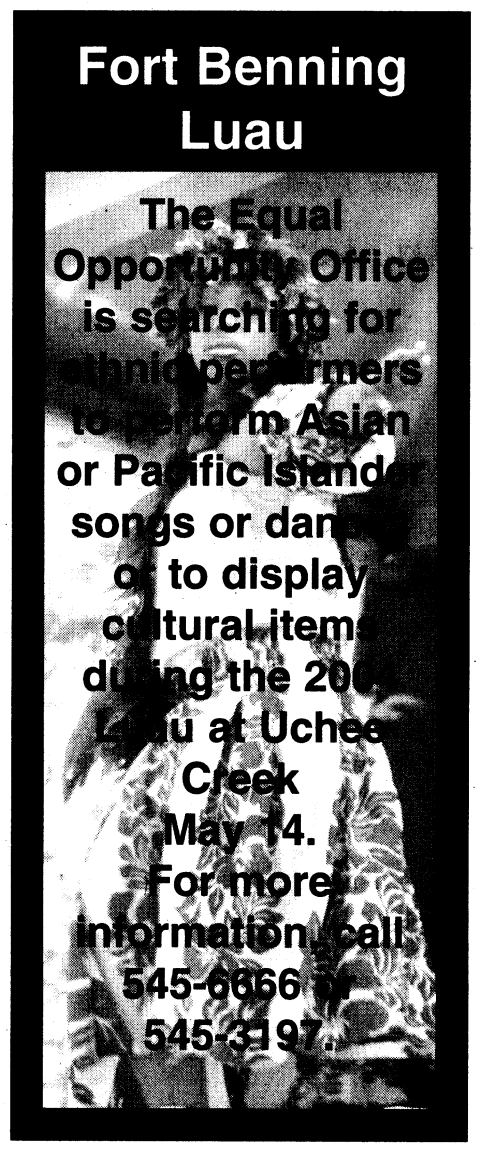
Gibbs and his wife, Darla, received a national honor award with a special citation for exceptional volunteer services for volunteering more than 380 hours a month with the Red Cross.

Since the Gibbs arrived at Fort Benning in September 2002, they have become certified CPR and first-aid instructors, part of the Red Cross Speakers Bureau, helped brief hundreds of service members and family members on Red Cross services and are both trained armed forces emergency service case workers. They work not only during the weekdays, but also on weekends to help the Red Cross and the community, Pierre said.

"We do what we can, when we can," Darla said. "We've been blessed, so we feel obligated to give a little back."

"This certificate recognizes volunteers who demonstrate an exceptional interest in and responsibility for services on behalf of the American Red Cross," Pierre said.

The Gibbs said they will be leaving the Red Cross in July to do some traveling and catching up with their grandchildren.



"Since their arrival, they've been full-time volunteers and committed themselves to learning policy, procedure and the history of the Red Cross. We will surely miss them once they are gone," Pierre said.

During the ceremony, the Red Cross also recognized Peggy Cornwell, Pauline Fabrigar and Michele Walton for their continuous support to the Red Cross.

In the year in review, Red Cross volunteers put in:

- 14,577 hours from July 2003 through February 2004,
- Visited 194 new mothers in 2003,
- Had an active youth program that put in 1,220.75 hours during a six-week period,
- Briefed 7,096 service and family members on Red Cross services during 73 briefings and orientations,
- Held three successful fund-raising events that raised a combined amount of $2,853,
- Held the annual free CPR training weekend March 20 with 69 participants.

For more information about volunteering with the Red Cross or to find out about its services, call 545-5194 or visit the Red Cross Station in Building 2626 at Soldiers' Plaza.

1st Stryker unit proving value in Iraq, officials say

Vehicles hold up when put to test in OIF

Joe Burlas
Army News Service

WASHINGTON — A year after conducting its Initial Operational Capabilities testing, the Army's first Stryker Brigade Combat Team is faring well in Iraq, according to senior Army procurement officials.

Members of the Pentagon press corps got an update Tuesday on successes of the Army's first fielded SBCT — 3rd Brigade, 2nd Infantry Division, based in Fort Lewis, Wash. — and the Army's fielding plan for the remaining planned Stryker brigades.

"The 3rd Brigade, 2nd Infantry Division is performing extremely effectively in combat in Iraq," said Col. Nick Justice, acting assistant deputy for Acquisition and Systems Management for the assistant secretary of the Army for Acquisition, Logistics and Technology. "The SBCT has effectively used speed and situational understanding to kill and capture dozens of enemy fighters."

That speed and quietness of the wheeled Strykers, compared to armored track vehicles, has earned the unit a nickname among many Iraqis, Justice said. Iraqi citizens around Samarra gave the brigade Soldiers the nickname "Ghost Soldiers" as the Stryker vehicles arrive and deploy their infantrymen with little noise or warning.

Citing that no Soldiers have been killed due to rocket-propelled grenade or improvised explosive devise attacks while riding in a Stryker vehicle since the SBCT arrived in Iraq last fall, Justice said Army leaders are very pleased with its survivability in combat. The most serious injury due to an RPG or IED attack against a Stryker vehicle to date has been a broken ankle.

The brigade has suffered casualties in Iraq — among them, three Soldiers who were killed in a Stryker rollover when a roadway embankment gave way in December.

Strykers in Iraq are augmented with add-on slat armor that is proving effective against RPG attacks.

Despite the effectiveness of the slat armor against the current threat in Iraq, the Army is still pursuing the development of reactive armor.

"Slat armor is successful, but we don't want to be locked into it as there are other threats out there where reactive armor is needed," Justice said.

The Army plans on building enough Stryker add-on reactive armor kits to equip several brigades. Those brigade sets will be drawn from a pre-positioned site and used when a mission requires it, according to Army officials.

The first brigade set of reactive armor is scheduled to be fielded in March 2005, with another set ready the following year.

Stryker operations in Iraq have given Army procurement officials some lessons learned that will be implemented in the near future.

Among those lessons, there is a need for greater sensor range and greater reach-back communications capability. To address the sensor issue, the Army plans to make the sensor mast on the Stryker Reconnaissance Vehicle taller; and for the communications issue, replace the 44 near-term digital radios in the brigade with 53 satellite radio sets capable of operating in a joint environment over greater distances.

On the logistics side, the brigade is proving that having a common chassis for its combat vehicles means a smaller logistics tail. The brigade carries about 160 lines of spare parts, compared to an armored brigade that carries about 300 lines of parts, Justice said. Having a common family of vehicles within the brigade also means a common set of skill sets among brigade Soldiers to keep the vehicle maintained, he said.

Stating that a year of combat operations equates to about seven years of normal operational use of a combat vehicle, Justice said the operational readiness rate of the Stryker is about where he expected it to be — above 90 percent.

There are two variants and eight other configurations of the basic Stryker Infantry Carrier. The Mobile Gun System and the Nuclear, Biological and Chemical Reconnaissance and Survey Vehicles have yet to be fielded due to several human engineering issues that are being worked, according to officials. Low-rate production of the MGS is expected to start late this summer, Justice said.

The Army's second SBCT — 1st Brigade, 25th Infantry Division — is currently undergoing it Initial Operational Capabilities evaluation. It is expected to be certified by the Department of Defense as operationally ready sometime this summer.

The next brigade to transform to a SBCT will be the 172nd Infantry Brigade (Separate), Fort Richardson, Alaska. The 172nd will start getting its Stryker vehicles in May, Justice said.

A February Defense Acquisition Board decision has funded the fourth Stryker brigade -- 2nd Armored Cavalry Regiment (Light), Fort Polk, La.

DoD has recently directed the Army to include the remaining brigades for Stryker conversion — 2nd Brigade, 25th Infantry Division (Light), Schofield Barracks, Hawaii; and the 56th Brigade of the 28th Infantry Division (Mechanized), Pennsylvania Army National Guard — in its budget planning process.

> "The 3rd Brigade, 2nd Infantry Division, is performing extremely effectively in combat in Iraq. The SBCT has effectively used speed and situational understanding to kill and capture dozens of the enemy fighters."

Coalition vows to destroy militia

Gerry J. Gilmore
American Forces Press Service

WASHINGTON — U.S. officials in Baghdad Wednesday vowed to defeat insurgents and restore order in Iraq after a third day of countrywide attacks against Iraqi and coalition forces.

Coalition Provisional Authority officials blamed outlaw Shiite Muslim cleric Muqtada al-Sadr and his "Mahdi army" militia for many of the recent attacks.

Iraqi officials have put out an arrest warrant on Sadr for his alleged role in the murder of a prominent Shiia cleric last year.

"We will attack to destroy the Mahdi army," Army Brig. Gen. Mark Kimmitt, the coalition's deputy operations director, vowed to reporters during a news conference.

U.S. and coalition counterattacks will be deliberate, precise and powerful, "and they will succeed," he said.

The insurgent attacks in Iraq, Kimmitt noted, represent a struggle between extremism and democracy.

The insurgents, he said, want to make Iraq into a country "where anarchy and chaos rule." He said U.S.-coalition and Iraqi security forces "are here to prevent that from happening."

According to a U.S. Central Command news release Wednesday, 12 U.S. Marines were killed April 6 near Ramadi during fighting against insurgent militia.

U.S. and coalition forces also have been fighting in and around Fallujah since April 4 in searches for the persons responsible for the March 31 killing and debasement of four American contractors.

Sadr, now under an arrest warrant for the alleged murder of an Iraqi cleric last year, has called upon Iraqis to rebel against the U.S.-led coalition. CPA officials said they believe Sadr seeks to disrupt the turnover of sovereignty from the coalition to an Iraqi government slated for June 30.

Dan Senor, chief CPA spokesman, said the coalition would be victorious against insurgents seeking to disrupt Iraqi reconstruction and the establishment of a democratic government. The insurgents, he said, want mob violence to dictate the political policies of a new Iraq.

"We will not tolerate that now, and we will not tolerate that after June 30," he said.

The majority of the Iraqi people, he said, want a new democratic government.

Troops: Lose money filing taxes off post

IRS Web site. Agencies that promise one- or two-day returns are actually loaning money to the taxpayer based on the projected return, and interest can accrue at rates of up to 100 percent.

The IRS holds the taxpayer responsible for anything done in his name by a preparer, whether or not the taxpayer was actually aware of the illegal actions.

The penalties imposed by the IRS, according to the agency's Web site, can be financially catastrophic and even if the return is filed legally, the interest accrued on tax return loans can often negate the value of the return.

Collins encourages Soldiers to use the legal, professional tax preparation services offered free of charge at the Tax Center to avoid the complications of financial stress, legal prosecution, audit or penalties that can arise from using a too-good-to-be-true tax preparation service off-post.

The tax center is closed today but will be open Saturday from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. The center will be closed on Sunday for Easter. On Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, the center will be open from 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. On Thursday, the center will be open from 8:30 a.m. until midnight.

Change to RCP retains trained NCOs

Melissa House
Bayonet staff

If 22 is better for you, it's better for the Army, too.

A Military Personnel Message released March 16 extended the retention control point for staff sergeants from 20 to 22 years.

The message cited a need to retain experienced NCOs and support a recent 30,000-Soldier endstrength increase for the Army.

The increase will support the force structure changes associated with the new "units of action."

Since the end strength increase was not approved as a permanent change, it only affects those staff sergeants whose ETS is on or before Sept. 30, 2005. Soldiers in overstrength military occupational specialties 14R (Bradley linebacker crewman), 14S (Avenger crewman and 42L (administrative specialist) do not qualify for the increased retention control point.

Soldiers who have a retirement date approved for before Sept. 30 may request their retirement be withdrawn. Soldiers without a retirement date whose ETS is before Sept. 30 will have their ETS adjusted automatically by Human Resources Command..

Irma Mason, chief of the Personnel Actions and Services Division, said she has not had a lot of feedback so far on the new RCP, but for one Soldier who came in to her office, it was a good thing.

Test unit fields new basic battle skills

One of the two new pilot basic training programs that launched on Fort Benning earlier this year conducted its final field training exercise this week.

B Company, 2nd Battalion, 47th Infantry Regiment, left for it's end-of-cycle FTX Sunday and will wrap up more than 100 hours of field training today with an 8.5-mile road march, said 1st Sgt. James Connor, company first sergeant.

"The unit is the pilot for the 'alternate' program of instruction, which extends the normal FTX time total from three days to 10 days and, over the span of the course, incorporates new Soldier tasks and battle drills.

The "immersion" POI pilot, A Co., 1st Bn., 38th Inf. Regt., graduated April 1, said Sgt. Kimberlyn Burns, regiment personnel staff. That POI extended the FTX total to 23 days and included more skills and drills over the course than both the current POI and the alternate one.

Soldiers who trained under the alternate POI learned skills regular basic trainees missed out on. Additional training included extensive familiarization with heavier arms and focus on the M-249 squad automatic weapon, as well as tasks identified from the Army's "lessons learned" from Operations Enduring Freedom and Iraqi Freedom, said Capt. Christopher Colster, company commander.

Focusing on improvised explosive device recognition and reactions, convoy operations, hostage situations, reactions to ambush while mounted, urban operations and media affairs training, among other subjects taught, is intended to prepare these Soldiers for the possibility of deployment to Iraq shortly after their graduation, he said.

The Soldiers graduating April 15 are better prepared and have increased survivability in combat operations than their regular basic training counterparts, Connor said, but he still isn't completely comfortable with putting any of them on a plane for an imminent danger zone.

Connor said that, while the new POIs add more than 30 individual tasks and nine new battle drills to the standard POI, the current training period of nine weeks is maintained. The additional training is possible because, under the new POI, the training week is extended from five to six and a half days a week.

A trainee conducts urban entry drill Monday.

The basic trainees of B Co., 2nd Bn., 47th Inf. Regt., said they have gotten far superior training than their battle buddies who conducted training under the regular POI, but are in disagreement as to whether the course is long enough.

Pfc. James Burnett said tasks like checkpoint training and the IED instruction have sufficiently prepared him for the possibility of deployment to a combat zone, but said he thinks the course should be extended a few weeks to further reinforce training.

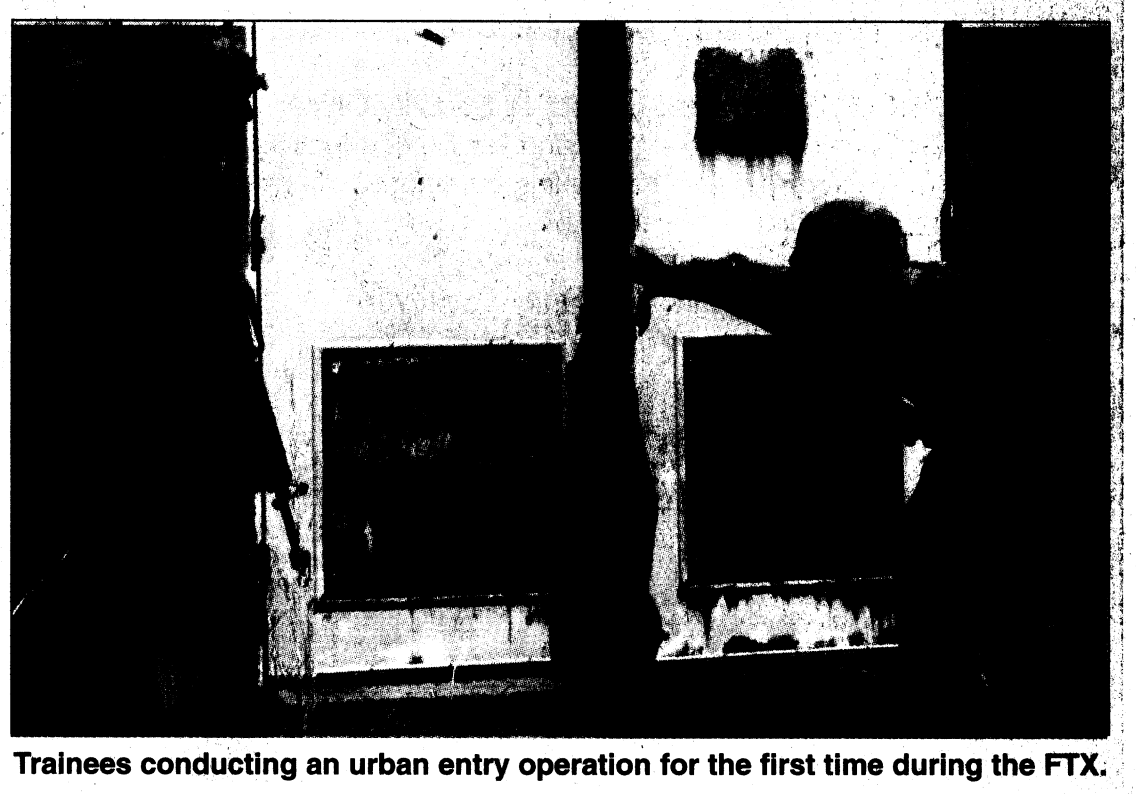
By postponing what he considers "unnecessary" training like media affairs, Army history and briefings on Army policies and programs, Pfc. Jarvis Byers said the course could be shorter and more tactically efficient.

Colster recommended the course be extended because, even after nine weeks of training, young Soldiers still aren't fully prepared and comfortable with combat skills that could be called to action within weeks of graduation.

He also expressed concern for the well-being of drill sergeants who, under the regular POI, worked excessive hours and endured the relentless emotional cycles of phase training and the physical challenges of constant intense training and are now being tapped for further sacrifices of time and rest under the advanced POIs.

"You can only have Soldiers so long at the level of intensity we're constantly working at before it not only begins to wear on the Soldiers, but the cadre, as well," said Connor.

Under the new POI, training has been extended to Saturdays and half-days on Sundays, in addition to the regular training conducted Monday through Friday.



Connor predicted drill sergeants enduring three-year assignments may not be able to maintain the operational tempo called for by the new POIs.

But both Connor and Colster agreed the Army is moving in the right direction by implementing changes in the training of new troops.

Colster said he provides weekly after-action reviews to his chain of command and hopes Task Force Soldier, the think tank responsible for developing the new POIs, and the Army will continue to modify the new system until it overcomes drawbacks.

Reserve unit shows cadets real deal

Sgt. 1st Class Jim Collins describes the engineer mission and fields questions from JROTC cadets from Russell County High School Saturday.

Soldiers of the 718th Engineer Company, a reserve unit based at Fort Benning, spent Saturday afternoon demonstrating their skills for local Junior Reserve Officer Training Corps cadets as part of a partnership with local U.S. Army Recruiting Command officials.

The cadets, members of the Russell County High School JROTC Warrior Battalion, were broken up into two groups and rotated through two locations.

At one location — an area across from the Ivy Road physical training field on Kelley Hill — the cadets were greeted by the company commander, Capt. Ronald Hughes. They received a slide-show briefing on the background and mission of the unit, then moved outside, where they observed 718th Soldiers in action using various pieces of engineering equipment and were briefed on the different missions of an engineer company — in both a garrison and combat environment.

After the demonstrations were complete, the cadets were allowed to sit in some of the vehicles and had a question-and-answer session with the Soldiers.

At the other location, the unit's motorpool on Kelley Hill, the cadets were familiarized with the unit's maintenance facilities.

After both groups cycled through both locations, the group rallied for chow back at the motorpool, courtesy of the 718th.

Hughes said the unit was approached by local recruiters to spend Saturday with the cadets in an effort to supplement other recruiting tactics in the area.

Sgt. 1st Class Scott Sickels, the supervisor at the Victory Drive recruiting station, said the partnership with the 718th goes a long way to show prospective recruits and their often concerned parents there is more to the Army than infantry Soldiers and tanks.

Sickels, who has been a recruiter for five years, said the program exposes cadets to both sides of the Army — the active-duty branch and the Reserves — and shows them that the Army isn't only about jumping out of planes and shooting the enemy.

The cadets, Sickels said, are often concerned about deploying, given the current situations in Iraq and Afghanistan.

He said he tells them he can't guarantee they won't deploy and tries to explain the differences in military jobs, the needs of the Army and deployment possibilities in both the active-duty component and the Reserves.

Sgt. 1st Class Kevin Peoples, the operations sergeant for the 718th, said it is important to make time for the JROTC cadets even though the unit has a tight training schedule, because the unit's efforts are directly rewarded by helping to ensure it is fully manned. Peoples said he hopes to get five of the cadets to commit to serve with the unit upon graduation from high school.

The senior Army instructor with the Russell County High School JROTC Warrior Battalion, retired Lt. Col. Lee Washington, said the JROTC program and the demonstrations with units like the 718th give local youth options they may not have been aware of.

He said many of the students don't have college scholarships and the Army opens doors to educational funds that may not have been available through any other means.

The program is positive, Hughes said, for both the unit and cadets, because it gives the unit and the Reserves exposure to potential recruits and provides options and insights into jobs local youth may not have been aware of.

Hughes said he hopes there were a few aspiring young engineers whose minds were made up Saturday after seeing the unit in action.

Soldiers learn basics of explosives

IEDs killing troops in Middle East

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

In operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, American Soldiers have come across a new and deadly weapon used by militants — the IED.

IEDs, or improvised explosive devices, are designed to maim, harrass or kill the enemy. These devices are created using various chemicals or military components in combustible combinations.

"IEDs are a major concern for our Soldiers deployed in the Middle East," said Sgt. 1st Class Jeffrey Sawhill, 2nd Battalion, 29th Infantry Regiment, an IED instructor at Landmine Warfare on Sand Hill. "A lot of the Soldiers don't know what they are, or what they look like, so that is a real danger for them."

IEDs come in all shapes and sizes. They can come in something as small as a soda can or as large as a mortar round.

"IEDs are only limited by a person's imagination and the materials readily available to them," Sawhill said. "All that is required in them is some type of explosive, an initiator and something to set it off. Anything that emits a signal can be used to set off the IEDs. Cell phones, pagers and garage-door openers are very common."

Basic trainees are learning how to identify IEDs, but are learning another important lesson, as well.

"Situational awareness is very important," Sawhill said. "When I'm teaching about these IEDs, I try to tell Soldiers to look for anything that is out of place and to report it."

> "In today's urban warfare, they (IEDs) are a lot more common. They're about as common as an American Soldier carrying an M-16 rifle."
> Maj. Michael McNally
> Ranger Training Brigade Operations officer

Soldiers from E Company, 2nd Battalion, 58th Infantry Regiment, learned exactly what Sawhill was talking about when he showed them different items to look for during landmine warfare training.

The Soldiers saw a telephone outlet on the side of a wood display.

The only problem — there were wires hanging from it, no telephone wire connecting to it and there was a box behind it.

"Something as simple as a fake phone outlet is something that can get Soldiers," Sawhill said. "Many times, they aren't aware of their surroundings, and that puts them in a position where they can be hurt or potentially killed."

The Soldiers also saw a pile of garbage. But in the pile was a trash bag with a wired-up mortar round in it.

"You just never know where the enemy is going to put these," Sawhill said.

The Ranger Training Brigade is also training its Soldiers on the hazards of IEDs.

"It's something we knew about before, because we experienced a little of it in Korea and Vietnam," said Maj. Michael McNally, brigade operations officer. "In today's urban warfare, they are a lot more common. They're about as common as an American Soldier carrying an M-16 rifle."

Ranger students learn to focus on principles like situational awareness, and not the specifics.

"If the enemy is not effective in the way he builds IEDs, he has to change," McNally said. "As soon as we figure out how to suppress one IED, another one comes out.

"The enemy's goal is to harass and injure Soldiers so they'll leave the country," he said.

IEDs are becoming more frequent in the Middle East and Soldiers are learning the steps to avoid them.

"All Soldiers deployed in the Middle East are encountering IEDs," McNally said. "It's not just the infantrymen and Rangers who come across IEDs, it's also the mail clerks, the cooks and the ammunition specialists. No Soldier is immune to the danger of them, and all need to be aware of their surroundings. And if they happen to come across something they believe is an IED, they need to get out of there and report it. It's important to know enough and respond to it correctly."

'Can Do' Battalion completes team leader course

PLDC basics put to use in field environment

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

Soldiers from 1st Battalion, 15th Infantry Regiment, recently completed the first Dragon Team Leader Course.

The course, which lasted nine days, took knowledge and skills learned in the Primary Leadership Development Course and put those to use in a field environment.

"PLDC is a lot of classroom work, and this course made it all hands-on," said Sgt. Brian Benson, C Company, 317th Engineer Battalion — one of two engineers to complete the course with 1st Bn., 15th Inf. Regt. "You had to go out there and actually do what it said in the manual. You weren't talking about how to do the steps; you were performing them firsthand."

It's something for the junior leaders, who aren't required to attend PLDC until they're ready for BNCOC, to train on, so they can train their Soldiers, said Maj. Ed House, battalion operations officer.

"We're getting ready for Operation Iraqi Freedom 3 and we need all of our Soldiers prepared, especially in their marksmanship skills and their close-quarter combat skills."

The 20 Soldiers who completed the course faced a variety of tasks, including a 12-mile road march in three hours, expert qualification on the M-16 A2 rifle, day and night land navigation, day and night stress-fire ranges and battle drills.

"Our job as instructors was to not only challenge the Soldiers mentally, but also physically," said Staff Sgt. Reynaldo Ayala, an instructor from A Co., 1st Bn., 15th Inf. Regt. "We wanted to see how well they would react when put in a pressure situation, and for the most part, everyone did well with what they were put in."

Benson said there were a lot of stressful situations in the course, but he couldn't allow himself to get distracted from what his mission was.

"That's what they're trying to do — get you distracted from doing your job," he said. "But all I did was concentrate on the task at hand and ensure that I could perform it to standard, to the best of my ability."

Instructors noticed Soldiers were not sure what to expect at the beginning of the course.

"They were a little apprehensive at the beginning," Ayala said. "But as the course went on, the Soldiers became more confident in what they were doing and started to enjoy the training. Some of them seemed to have too much fun with the training."

Soldiers not only performed well in the stressful situations, they also performed them in minimal time and with minimal sleep.

"While going through this course, everything had to be performed with no errors, to standard, and with minimal sleep, because that's what happens in a combat zone," Benson said. "The instructors didn't care about the lack of sleep we got. They just wanted us to get the job done. That's exactly what we would have to do in a field environment."

The course also met the pre-requisites for the Expert Infantrymen's Badge.

"Many of our Soldiers don't have the badge, and this was a great way for them to meet all standards needed prior to starting the requirements for the badge," House said.

At the graduation ceremony, Command Sgt. Maj. Michael Howard, battalion command sergeant major, said the Soldiers are now better prepared than they would have been if they had only gone to PLDC.

"This course provided them with a multitude of challenges," he said. "They had a limited time to prepare for the situations thrown at them in this course, and I believe they did an excellent job performing to standard.

"The Soldiers will now be a lot better in their marksmanship, land navigation, and other skills they learned. Now, it's their job to go back, as team leaders, and teach their Soldiers the same standards they learned."

STARVING FOR PERFECTION

Eating disorders are sign of deeper, underlying problems

Anorexia, bulimia affect Soldiers too

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

AP Photo

Abigail's* parents were fat. Unhealthy, even. Her mother had a stroke, and her father had developed diabetes and was about to have triple bypass surgery.

She watched them struggling just to get out of the car or climb a flight of stairs, and she saw this as her own future.

"I decided to exercise and eat healthfully," she said, recalling the day she first started down the path to anorexia nervosa eight years ago. "Although I wasn't dieting, I lost 12 pounds. I thought I was eating plenty ... "

As the next few years passed, she would periodically lose her appetite and drop a few pounds. But once the weight was gone, she didn't want it back.

"I felt powerful for being able to lose weight," she said. "It's something most people want but never achieve."

About two years ago, though, it became more than a mild change in eating habits.

"At a particularly low point in my life when I was feeling miserable and out of control, I made an active decision to see how much weight I could lose," she said. "My body was the only area of my life where I felt completely in control."

In the midst of fear and desperation to feel good about herself, Abigail turned to food restriction and exercise. She ate alone, when she ate at all — she wouldn't even chew a piece of gum for fear of the five calories she would consume.

Later that year, she was admitted to the hospital with only 95 pounds to her 67-inch frame. She met with an eating disorder treatment therapist and a nutritionist. She joined a support group.

But she wasn't recovering. When she was released, she quickly shed more than half the weight she had gained during her treatment.

"I was absolutely terrified to give it up ... " she said. "I knew all I had to do was put food in my mouth — hardly a challenge for most people — and yet I couldn't fathom how that would become OK for me."

Eventually, it did become OK. Abigail found her recovery through a second bout in a support group and the realization that her anorexia was a choice she had made and a choice she could unmake.

But for so many people — people in this community — that revelation seems out of reach.

An eating disorder is a coping strategy that an individual uses to deal with deeper problems, which are too painful or difficult to address directly, according to the National Eating Disorder Information Center.

There are three primary types of eating disorders, according to the Parenting Teens Web site:

• Anorexia nervosa is characterized by an intense drive for thinness, intense fear of gaining weight or becoming fat or a considerable misperception of body size and shape.

Anorexia ranks as the third most common chronic illness among teen-age girls in the United States. Girls and women account for 90 to 95 percent of individuals who suffer from anorexia.

• Bulimia nervosa is characterized by episodes of binge eating followed by some form of purging or restricting. The purging usually takes the form of self-induced vomiting, but it can also consist of excessive exercise, fasting or abuse of laxatives.

It occurs in as many as 2 percent of all adolescents and young adults.

• Binge eating is the consumption of unusually large amounts of food in a brief time period.

Studies suggest that 25 to 50 percent of obese individuals eat in binges.

And although it is difficult to judge exactly how many servicemen and women are suffering from eating disorders, it is known that members of the military community have a higher rate of eating disorders than their civilian counterparts, said Jennifer Rogers, a dietitian at BAMC.

In fact, "for bulimia, numbers appear about 15 percent higher for military personnel."

And Fort Benning is no stranger to eating disorders.

The post's Chaplain Family Life Center deals with the issue somewhat regularly, said Chaplain (Maj.) Stephen Hawkins, chief of CFLC.

Eating disorders are complex, Hawkins said, and usually mask a deeper, underlying problem.

"There are two main trains of thought with an eating disorder," Hawkins said. "It's primarily an issue of power and control. And there's the issue of family dynamics and structure — the individual is still searching for that family balance."

The common thread, Hawkins said, is that most people suffering from eating disorders are searching for something.

"For whatever reason, their needs are being met through choosing an eating disorder," he said. "It's serving a purpose for them."

The question is what is that purpose, he said. Be it acceptance, unconditional love, feeling valued or popular or esteemed — eating disorders fulfill some need that is otherwise not met.

Whatever lies beneath the surface, many disorders are triggered by things we are bombarded with every day, Hawkins said.

"Where wouldn't people get the idea (that it's so important to be thin)?" Hawkins said, pointing to television, movies, music, books, magazines, even parents.

"It's a powerful message and comes from every direction — life is for the thin, svelte and beautiful. In order to have the life worth living, you have to be good ... you have to be perfect," he said.

For some, though, it isn't just about being perfect — it's about being merely "good enough."

Being heavier than one's peers, struggling to shed weight after a baby, maybe even failing a tape test — these situations can all lead to the negative self-image associated with eating disorders or borderline eating disorders.

Borderline disorders are evident in people who constantly complain about their appearance, think about food obsessively, constantly count calories or severely monitor their intake daily, said 1st Lt. Paula Wedel of Nutrition Care at Martin Army Community Hospital.

"Often, individuals use food to cope with personal situations or various societal pressures — both seen in overeating and in severely restrictive eating," she said.

The impact of these eating habits — whether borderline or full-blown — can be detrimental to an individual's health.

"Short-term impacts could include fatigue, irritability, etc.," Wedel said. "Long-term consequences ... include poor hair and nail texture and strength, growth failure in children, swelling, apathy, skin lesions, diarrhea, anemia, tissue wastage, hypothermia, hypotension, amenorrhea (loss of monthly period), reduced digestion, increase in sleep, slow heart beat, weakened immune system and ability to fight infection, slowed metabolism and many other problems."

So how can all this be avoided?

Well, it's not easy, Hawkins said, but the most important thing is not to ignore the problem. Whether it's you, your child or another loved one, take action.

"Hope is not a method," he said.

If it's your child, think prevention, Hawkins said.

"Children are getting messages from so many other sources, parents have to control the messages they send in their homes," he said. "Teach them to question the messages they're getting (outside the home).

"When you see a message that acceptance is about what you are on the outside as opposed to who you are inside, use it to start a dialogue — 'Can you buy that? Is that really what we believe?'"

Another important lesson is to be aware of the messages you send as a parent, Hawkins said.

"Double-check the message you're sending — are you saying derogatory things about something external, someone else's physical appearance?" he said. "Because it's not fair to judge — that's not where our value is."

If it can't be prevented, seek counseling for your child — look for help at the CFLC or at MACH's Behavioral Health.

Meanwhile, although adults are legally able to resist treatment or therapy, be supportive and encourage recovery.

"A healthy way to deal with these problems is to seek out mental health or other professionals who will help the individual figure out the root of their problems and work through that," Wedel said.

Individuals looking to lose weight in a healthy way can always seek help at MACH's Nutrition Care.

"Dietitians are a great resource," Wedel said. "Every post Soldiers go to has nutrition professionals who work to assist them with sorting out the facts myths from myths that are out there."

Post kids bring light to cancer patients

Spc. Nikki St. Amant

DeeDee Dumas, 4, enjoys the "happy hat" volunteers from CYS' middle school and teen center brought to her March 31. The 4-year-old is diagnosed with leukemia. Her happy hat was one of more than 150 hats made by the volunteers in an effort to bring smiles to the faces of cancer patients on the pediatric oncology wing at Columbus Medical Center.

Spc. Nikki St. Amant

When the five young volunteers arrived on the fifth floor of the Columbus Medical Center March 31, the first thing the little girl sitting on the one of the hospital beds said to them was, "I don't feel good."

DeeDee Dumas is only 4 years old and has been diagnosed with leukemia. She was visiting the outpatient wing of the medical center's pediatric oncology unit for one of her weekly appointments to receive medications, when a group of volunteers from Fort Benning's Child and Youth Services stopped by with a small gift for her.

The five pre-teens carried a large, blue box filled with more than 150 handmade "happy hats."

The group, along with the help of other volunteers from CYS programs like 4H, Teen Supreme and Smart Moves, spent two months sewing the hats before bringing them to the hospital to distribute to young cancer patients who lose their hair as a side effect of their chemotherapy treatments.

Volunteer Kelsey Glenn, a sixth-grader, said she helped make and distribute the hats so she could see smiles on the kids' faces.

The project coordinator, Lori Graves of CYS, said she got the idea while taking part in a teen forum in Colorado and decided to bring it home to the Fort Benning community.

She said programs like the happy hats project are important for relations between the military and civilian communities.

"It builds a partnership — a friendship," Graves said.

Debby Dodge, the outpatient pediatric oncology nurse, agreed and said the patients enjoy having other kids visit them.

Dodge said she feels it is important for the volunteers, as well, because they learn to develop empathy and to appreciate the value of giving to others.

Natasha Duvaln volunteered "to make sick kids happy" and said she truly enjoyed the volunteer experience.

While there were only two patients in the seven-bed outpatient ward of the oncology unit, Dodge said the rest of the hats will be put to good use on the center's inpatient

There will also be a Flea Market Saturday morning from 8 a.m. to 7 p.m. Carnival ride wristbands are $10 at the Child and Youth Services Office or $12 at the gate. Get Outta Here

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

Sick of sitting around in that barracks room looking at the walls? Need to get the family out of the house or just take a break? We've got the answer for you. 'Get Outta Here' will appear in The Bayonet each week to highlight recreation and leisure venues right here in the tricommunity. If you would like to suggest a hot spot for the column, call Sgt. Kim Dooley at 545-3367.

Bad news, folks. The weatherman says it's gonna be a wet weekend — thunderstorms and lightning. And on a three-day at that.

Now, I don't know about you, but I've been waiting for this mini-break, and I don't intend to spend the whole time cooped up in my house, staring out my rain-streaked windows.

No, I think I'd rather go out and have a little fun of the old-fashioned variety. I think I'd rather travel back in time to my childhood, when everything was exciting and entertaining, when it didn't cost a fortune to amuse myself ... when I was easy to please.

Enter the Hollywood Connection.

What's that you say? What's so great about yet another Columbus movie theater?

Well, this is no ordinary movie theater, my friend. The Hollywood Connection is actually home to Columbus' only full-blown amusement center (that I know of, that is).

Putt your way through 18 holes of miniature golf at the Caddyshack Golf Course. Cough up quarters to more than 100 games, including interactive video games (think auto racing, skiing and combat "simulators" — i.e. games you can actually fit into). Lace up a pair of roller skates and make a fool of yourself for the first time in years in the Xanadu Skate Center. Got kids? No problem! Send them off on their own adventure in the amusement area, complete with a mini ferris wheel, carousel, swings, train and a softplay maze. Ooh, and the little bumper cars you only wish you could fit into.

All of this under one roof. And the price tag won't knock you (or your bank account) out. The whole place works on a points system. You buy a certain point package — say, the 60-point package (which comes with 30 free points for a grand total of 90 points) for $20. One round of mini-golf will eat up 18 points, a daytime skate will cost you 14 points and games knock off a few points a piece.

So for $20, you and a friend can go 18 holes, fall victim to gravity in the skating rink and still have enough left over for a classic game of Ski-ball.

So unless you plan to grow webbed feet this weekend, hop in your car and make your way to the Hollywood Connection, located off Bradley Park Drive.

ASK THE JUDGE

Capt. Steven J. Collins
Office of the Staff Judge Advocate

Q: Can you explain some of the tax myths I need to be aware of during the filing season?

A: Having a working knowledge of the tax code is imperative before a taxpayer decides to file his or her taxes. The tax system is full of myths, and if you are relying on advice from misinformed sources you could be exposing yourself to an audit. Outlined below are 10 common myths we have seen at the tax center this year.

No. 1 — I was told I could deduct the purchase and dry cleaning of my BDUs.

Wrong. BDUs are deductible only if local installation regulations prohibit their off-duty wear. Fort Benning does not prohibit off-duty wear, so they are not deductible.

No. 2 — Can I deduct haircuts?

No. Haircuts are not ordinary business expenses and not deductible.

No. 3 — I do not have my W-2. Can I use my December LES?

No. You must file your taxes with a Form W-2. If you have not received your W-2, it can be accessed on dfas.mil.

No. 4 — I attended eArmyU last year and received tuition assistance. Can I claim an education credit?

If you incurred any qualified expenses above and beyond your tuition assistance, an educational credit may be claimed. Qualified expenses are defined as tuition and mandatory fees paid by the taxpayer to an accredited educational institution eligible to participate in the federal student loan program.

No. 5 — Can I get a full credit for the child and dependent care expenses I incurred last year?

No. The credit is based on a percentage of your expenses. Another thing to remember is that the maximum credit is $3,000 for one child or dependent and $6,000 if two or more are involved.

No.6 — Can I claim gymnastics and karate class expenses as child and dependent care expenses?

No. Recreational after school programs or other extra-curricular activities do not qualify for the credit.

No. 7 — Last year my refund was bigger. Why am I paying more in taxes this year?

The hard and fast rule here is the more money you make, the more you are going to pay in taxes. Most people receive an annual pay raise, so there is going to be an increase in tax liability. An additional consideration to increase the likelihood of a refund is to increase the amount of exemptions on your Form W-4. This will increase the amount of salary withheld from your paycheck every pay period. The more money withheld usually means a bigger refund at the end of the year. Withholding exemptions may be changed on dfas.mil.

No. 8 — Can I deduct the cost of improvements made to my main home?

In most cases no, but if you are selling the home the cost of the improvements can be added to the basis (cost) of the home when it is time to sell.

No. 9 — I attended IOBC last year. Can I deduct my out of pocket expenses as educational expenses?

No. Attending required Army schools do not count as qualified tuition and expenses.

No. 10 — Can I deduct moving expenses resulting directly from a PCS move?

Any expenses above and beyond what the Army reimburses you for is deductible. Mileage reimbursement to your new residence along with lodging is deductible, but meals are not. Pre-move house hunting trips are not deductible.

The tax code is very complicated and there are always exceptions to the rules for special circumstances. If you would like more information, please contact your tax preparer or call the IRS tax help number at 1-800-829-1040. A tax representative is available to help you 24 hours a day, seven days a week. You can also access the IRS web site at http://www.irs.gov.

If you would like further assistance regarding your taxes, call the Fort Benning Installation Tax Center at 545-4267 or come by Building 880 to speak with a tax advisor. The tax center is open for business until April 15. Hours of operation are today and Monday through Wednesday, 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. The tax center will be open Saturday from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. Thursday the center will be open 8:30 a.m. to midnight.

CHILD ABUSE PREVENTION MONTH

Shaking babies can cause lifelong disabilities

Continuous crying not an excuse

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

"My baby wouldn't stop crying. I just couldn't take it any more."

It's the number one reason parents, guardians and caregivers give for shaking infants and toddlers to the point of injury.

Shaken baby syndrome is caused by vigorous shaking of an infant or young child by the arms, legs, chest or shoulders, according to a Department of Research and Program Services article by Dr. Susan Palmer.

And it's not an isolated occurrence.

An estimated 50,000 cases occur each year in the United States, Palmer said.

"Shaken baby syndrome usually occurs when a parent or other caregiver shakes a baby because of anger or frustration, often because the baby would not stop crying," said Rebecca Welch, Army Community Service Family Advocacy Program manager.

Although shaken baby syndrome is a serious form of child abuse, Welch said, parents are often unaware of the injuries that shaking can cause.

A baby's head and neck are especially vulnerable to injury because the head is so large and the neck muscles are still weak, Palmer said.

In addition, a baby's brain and blood vessels are very fragile and easily damaged by whiplash motions, such as shaking, jerking and jolting.

Forceful shaking can result in brain damage leading to mental retardation, speech and learning disabilities, paralysis, seizures, hearing loss and even death, she said.

It can also cause bleeding around the brain and eyes, resulting in blindness.

Once a child has been shaken, the potential damage can't be undone. But it can become more serious if the child does not receive medical attention.

"If your baby's brain is damaged or bleeding inside from severe shaking, it will only get worse without treatment," Welch said. "Getting medical care right away may save your child's life and prevent serious health problems from developing.

"Don't let embarrassment, guilt or fear get in the way of your child's health or life," she said.

Even if a child is treated immediately following the incident, though, fewer than 10 to 15 percent of shaken babies are believed to recover completely, Palmer said.

The remaining victims exhibit a variety of disabilities, including partial or complete blindness, hearing impairments, seizure disorders, cerebral palsy, sucking and swallowing disorders, developmental disabilities, autism, cognitive impairments and behavior problems.

The most important thing is never to shake a baby in the first place, Welch said.

"Taking care of an infant can be challenging, especially when an end to the crying seems nowhere in sight," she said. "If you have tried to calm your crying child but nothing seems to work, it's important to stay in control of your temper.

"Remember, it's never OK to shake, throw or hit your child."

Instead, Welch said, if you feel as though you could lose control, stop and go through the following check list:

- Take a deep breath and count to 10.
- Take time out and let your baby cry alone.
- Call someone close to you for emotional support.
- Call your pediatrician. There may be a medical reason your child is crying.

CLOSER LOOK

If your child will not stop crying and you feel as though you might lose control:

- STOP
- Take a deep breath and count to 10,
- Take time out and let your baby cry alone.
- Call someone close to you for emotional support.
- Call your pediatrician. There may be a medical reason your child is crying.

Training available for baby sitters through Red Cross

Required class pays off for young sitters

Spc. Eliamar Castanon
Bayonet staff

Baby-sitting is one of the easiest ways teen-agers have to make money. With summer vacation right around the corner, many students are looking for kids to watch.

The Fort Benning American Red Station Office is preparing the future baby-sitting force with baby-sitting certification classes once a month. The next class is from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. April 17 at the Red Cross Office in Soldiers Plaza.

"Fort Benning requires baby-sitters to have this certification to baby-sit on post," said Lorrie Pierre, Red Cross station manager. "The class will prepare the baby-sitters to handle any situation that may arise while they are watching a child."

The baby-sitting class is part of the many services the Red Cross offers the community, said Michele Walton, Red Cross health and safety director.

The class is for kids from 11 to 15 years old and costs $32. Once the student has gone through the class he or she is a certified baby-sitter and does not need to go through another class again, Walton said.

During the class, kids learn:

- Basic child care for all ages, beginning with newborns
- How to change a diaper — both cloth and disposable
- How to carry a baby
- How to bottle feed
- The steps of CPR (however, they are not CPR certified)
- First aid
- What they need from the parents before they are left alone with the child.

During the three years the Red Cross has offered the baby-sitter certification class, it has certified 221 baby-sitters, Walton said.

However, the Red Cross does not provide parents with a list of kids that are certified for baby-sitting.

"I learned stuff I didn't even know about during the class," said Rebeca Riera, who took the class last fall.

"The instructor was really fun," Riera said. "He taught us how to keep the kids entertained and how to handle different situations."

"Some of the kids ask us what is the going rate is for baby-sitting, but we leave that up to their discretion," Walton said.

Knowing that a baby-sitter has gone through this class should assure the parents that the baby-sitter is prepared to act responsibly in any situation, Pierre said.

"I don't think that anyone is ready to handle everything — not even a parent — but the class is definitely a verification that you're prepared if something happens," Walton said.

After the kids have completed the all-day class, they will receive a certificate that states they have completed the Red Cross Baby-sitter's Certification Class and the Baby-sitter Training Handbook.

"We want kids to attend the class because it's mandatory, it's educational and it reassures the parents that they are leaving their child with someone responsible," Pierre said.

The Red Cross offers 10 seats per class.

For more information, call 545-5194 or visit the Red Cross Station at Soldiers Plaza in Building 2626 or e-mail at redcross@benning.army.mil.

Mower tune-up time

yardcare.com

Empty the fuel tank, disconnect the spark plug wire and tune up your mower.

Clean the mower. Use a screw driver or putty knife to clear the under carriage of grass and debris and wipe the entire mower down.

Sharpen or replace the blade. Have the blade professionally sharpened or replaced if there are large nicks or dings. Refer to the owner's manual for additional information on maintaining the cutting blade.

Change the oil. Clean the oil fill area, remove the dipstick and place a catch can under the mower. Depending on manufacturer recommendations, either tip the mower on its side to allow the old oil to drain from the oil fill tube or remove the oil drain plug located under the deck. Allow the oil to drain completely and if necessary, replace the drain plug. Refill the engine with oil.

Change the spark plug. Before installing the new plug, be sure to check its gap (refer to the owner's manual). Once you have checked the plug for proper gap, screw it in tight with your fingers. Then give it a turn more with a socket.

Replace the air filter. Check the owner's manual to see which type of filter the mower requires.

There are generally two types of filters: paper or foam. If the mower requires a foam filter, be sure to saturate the foam filter with fresh engine oil, wrap it in a clean rag and then squeeze out the excess oil before installing.

Lubricate moving parts. Spray all linkages, cables and wheel areas with WD-40. Do not use oil because oil will retain dirt and clog the area.

When the tune-up is completed, replace the spark plug wire and fill the gas tank with fresh fuel. Your mower is now ready for the mowing season.

Hats: Bring joy to sick youngsters

pediatric oncology wing.

The hats, which come in a kaleidoscope of colors or are adorned with popular cartoon icons like SpongeBob SquarePants, will be sure to bring smiles to the faces of children who, at too young an age, are facing the fight of a lifetime, Dodge said.

The inpatient pediatric oncology wing age span runs the gamut, from infants to teen-agers battling juvenile cancers.

According to the National Cancer Institute's Web site, cancer in children is relatively rare with a rate of about 3.8 to 4.8 out of 100,000 children afflicted.

Dumas is one of that small percentage, but her grandmother, Carla Dumas, said she has great hopes for the preschooler's battle.

"(DeeDee) holds up well. She's got a fighting spirit," Carla said.

The survival rate for children DeeDee's age who are diagnosed with leukemia is 80 percent.

Eleven-year-old Edward Scott, the only young man present to distribute the happy hats, said he thought it would be a nice thing to do and decided to go ahead and take part.

It's mission accomplished for Scott and the rest of the CYS volunteers — one lavender happy hat alone transformed misery into a smile on a 4-year-old's face.

A WORLD of SERVICES. A SINGLE purpose.

TIC Chapel celebrates 70th anniversary

Sgt. Kim Dooley

The Infantry Center Chapel celebrated its 70th anniversary on Palm Sunday.

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

It was a morning like many others for retired Master Sgt. Sam Garrett and his wife, Sarah. The couple rose early, headed to their "church home" and got to work cooking for a brood of more than 125 of their fellow parishioners.

But it was also a special day — a day that marked the decades of impact The Infantry Center Chapel has had on the lives of those in the Fort Benning and surrounding communities.

The chapel celebrated its 70th anniversary on Palm Sunday and recommitted itself to continuing its good works.

"This chapel means so much to so many people," said retired Col. Wallace Veaudry, parish president, during his remarks at the service.

Something the Garretts can attest to.

The couple, who has attended the chapel for 22 years — long after Sam retired from the Army in 1971 — found something special at TIC Chapel.

"This chapel has a deep meaning for all of us," Sarah said. "So many people have been touched by this ministry — it serves people."

And it also gives people an opportunity to serve Christ, she said.

The Garretts found their niche in the church kitchen, where they've headed up the food and decorations committees for going on 15 years.

Aside from service, TIC Chapel offers a place where Christians of every Protestant denomination can join to worship together, Sarah said.

"We all feel very comfortable here," she said, pointing to Holy Communion as an example of the open-to-all services. "If you want to go to the altar, you go to the altar, or you can stay in your seat, and they have grape juice and wine — it's all covered."

Sam, meanwhile, enjoys the camaraderie he feels with his fellow Christians.

"It means an awful lot to me to come here," he said. "The Christian atmosphere, the fellowship with the other retirees ... ."

And perhaps more important than that is the opportunity to influence the lives of young Soldiers, he said — young Soldiers new to the Army, away from home for the first time, maybe alone.

"I admire the young Soldiers of today; they're doing such a great job," said Sam, who spent 27 years in food service before he retired as the NCOIC of the Martin Army Community Hospital mess hall.

"Through the chapel, we've had them into our home for Thanksgiving and Christmas dinners," he said. "And sometimes we take them up to a cabin we have out at the lake, let them have a good time."

The church, home to Soldiers, retirees and civilians from the tricommunity, is also home to decades of Fort Benning history.

Its legacy is unique, said Chaplain (Capt.) Patrick Basal, project officer for the celebration, because most infantry Soldiers will end up at Fort Benning three to four times in their careers. And each time they return, they "plug back into the same chapel family."

> "You see the same faces come and go over the years. We send people literally out to the four corners of the world ... They leave here and, hopefully, they take what they've learned here and they become a light into the world."

"You see the same faces come and go over the years," he said. And those Soldiers and their families take with them something special when they leave.

"We send people literally out to the four corners of the world — they go from here all over the place," Basal said. "They leave here and, hopefully, they take what they've learned here and they become a light into the world."

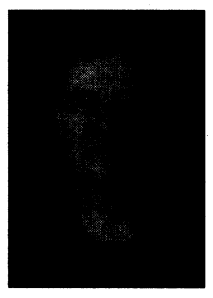
God does what it takes to get our attention



Chaplain (Col.) Joel Cocklin
USAIC Chaplains' Office

How far do you want God to go in getting your attention? If God has to choose between your eternal safety and your earthly comfort, which do you hope he chooses?

What if he moved you from your home and familiar surroundings? Like he did Abraham. What if he called you out of retirement? Like he did Moses. What if he refused to take "no" for your answer? Like he did Jeremiah. What if you could not find anywhere to get away from him? Remember Jonah? How about a promotion like David's or a demotion like Samson's?

God does what it takes to get our attention. That's a major theme in the Bible and the culminating message of Easter. The relentless pursuit of God. God on the hunt. God in the search to bring each person into the right relationship with him. God doing whatever it takes: Allowing us to stray until we come to our senses, shaking the bushes for lost sheep, sweeping the house to find the last coin, cupping hand to mouth to shouting into the canyon or mud wrestling with us Jacobs.

REFLECTIONS

Cocklin

It's really a simple story. God made us, we rejected God, and God will not give up until he wins us back. Easter is all about God going to extremes to get our attention to win us back.

Natural disasters, words of prophets and event schedules were not impressive enough for us humans to understand the extent of God's love for us.

Even the brutal execution of his son was not even as much as a speed-bump in the road of everyday living. It took the ultimate, God raising the shredded body of Jesus from the grave, to get our attention!

If God would let this injustice, resulting in a massacre, happen to his son to pay for all the sins you and I will ever commit, he must really want us back badly. Has he gotten your attention?

Be sure to worship God this Easter season — at the place of your choice — the God who got our attention by resurrecting Jesus and promising eternal hope to us.

Hook up, make up and move on

Chaplain (Maj.) Jeffrey Hawkins
Chaplain Family Life Center

Last week I wrote about my unbelievable failure on the last jump, the last day of Jumpmaster School. I mean nobody fails jumpmaster school on the last jump! But I did. Have you ever done things that you thought you'd never do? Have you experienced the sting of failure — failing to live up to your own expectations, much less family, friends or even God's? If so, you're not alone. In fact, the club you are a part of doesn't just include me, it includes some pretty heroic figures of the faith like Moses, King David, even Jesus' disciple, Peter.

Interestingly though, each of their failures wasn't final. What did they know about the secrets to "failing forward?" How did they make stepping stones out of their stumbling blocks — and how can you, too? To make sure failure isn't fatal, just like them, you've got to:

No. 1 — Hook up. You've got to get connected to God! Why get connected?

Hawkins

Well, in any connection, that is where the power is. I went to put my boat in the water this past weekend at Lake Oliver. The only trouble was that when I turned the key, instead of racing on the water, I was sitting dead in the water. I had no power. My terminal was disconnected from the power source. The first thing we have to do in order to fail forward is to connect, or reconnect in a close, vibrant, real relationship with the God who loves us ... then we've got the power to do the next thing which is ...

No. 2 — Make up. In order to turn stumbling blocks into stepping stones we've got to do a U-turn from what we have done wrong, and start doing what we know is right. The Bible talks about "repentance." Whether it's with God we've failed, a wife we've failed, or a child we've failed, it's about being sorry enough, not just to say it, but sorry enough to do a U-turn and act right instead of wrong. Once we've repented and gotten things straight with God, others, or even ourselves, then it's time to ...

No. 3 — Move on. You must take decisive action! It's been said the number one thing that keeps you from being all God wants you to be, is your past. I remember in the Special Forces "Q" Course, one of the things I was taught in patrolling was that if you were caught in a "L-shaped ambush" you had to "move on and move out" — whatever you do, don't stay in the kill zone! Spiritually, it's the same, once you've hooked up in relationship with God, once you've made up with God, then it's time to move on!

You have to take decisive action to get from where you are to where you want to be.

BREAKING NEWS ... BREAKING NEWS ... BREAKING NEWS ...

After a national television broadcast disclosing unacceptable business practices in the Columbus area regarding young military personnel and car dealerships, the MILES Program was created. Before MILES, service members having limited or no credit often were forced into less than favorable choices. Joining the MILES team are members of the Nationally Certified Dealer Network and US Bank, the eighth largest in the nation. Setting standards in pricing and quality, MILES protects and assists those who serve our country.

CAR BUYING 102

sponsored by Rivertown Ford Exclusive Franchise Dealer for the MILES program.

What to ask your dealer .... As a customer, make sure your dealer has an Automotive Service Excellence (ASE) certified technician on staff. Next, ask the dealership if they will allow you at least a 24-hour return privilege on used cars.

Keep in mind ..... Dealers have a right to make a "fair" profit on each vehicle - knowing the dealer's cost will not get you something for nothing. There are many good independent lots that have been in business for years and have well-established reputations for customer satisfaction. As the buyer, you should consider having your vehicle checked out by an independent mechanic.

AND REMEMBER TO DO YOUR RESEARCH AND CHECK REFERENCES!

Hammer Week boosts Marne morale

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

Soldiers from 3rd Brigade, 3rd Infantry Division, participated in athletic events, otherwise known as the "Hammer Cup" as part of "Hammer Week."

The week, which was designed to boost troop morale, brought out the best "Rock of the Marne" Soldiers in different events.

"This competition is the best against the best," said Sgt. Michael Moody, 2nd Battalion, 69th Armor Regiment. "If you want to truly call yourself the best, then you have to prove it against the other Soldiers from the other units."

The competition consisted of many different events, including soccer, softball, tug-o-war, volleyball, a 5-kilometer run, flag football, 4x400-meter relay, super Army Physical Fitness Test, basketball, stretcher relay and team bench press.

Throughout the competition, 1st Bn. 10th Field Artillery Regiment, "Rock Support," made their presence felt in every event.

"We came into the competition feeling pretty confident we could win the whole thing," said Staff Sgt. Anthony Davis, 1st Bn., 10th Field Artillery Regt. "We knew all we had to do was come together as a team in all of our events and we would be fine."

Units received five points for first-place finishes, three points for second-place and one point for third place.

The "Rock Support" team placed in all but three events on their way to win the title.

But, it wasn't until after the last event, the stretcher relay, that they discovered they won the entire competition.

Going into the event, 1st Bn., 10th Field Artillery Regt., was ahead of 2nd Bn., 69th Armor Regt., "Speed and Power," by two points.

"We knew we had to come through big in the stretcher relay," Davis said. "As long as we were ahead of 2nd Battalion, 69th Armor Regiment, then we had it won. But if they passed us, they could end up tying us or winning. And we just couldn't let that happen."

Although under pressure, 1st Bn., 10th Field Artillery Regt., took first place in the stretcher relay, only one second ahead of 2nd Bn., 69th Armor Regt.

The "Speed and Power" team put themselves in position to win the "Hammer Cup" with a key victory in flag football.

With the game tied at seven with less than a minute to play, the "Speed and Power" team intercepted the 317th Engineer Battalion team's pass on their 20-yard line.

Two plays later, 2nd Bn., 69th Armor Regt., scored as time ran out, giving their team the much needed victory.

"It proves that if you never quit, anything can happen," Moody said. "We did make mistakes, but we didn't get down on ourselves. We continued to fight hard on every play and it showed when we pulled out the victory."

The "Hammer Cup" a way for the Soldiers from the different units to compete against each other, but it was a way to build their morale and unity as they get ready for Operation Iraqi Freedom 3.

"This whole week has allowed us to build as a team," Davis said. "We've been able to get out of our work schedule and just enjoy spending time together. When we deploy, I know we will be a better unit because of this week. We have really strengthened our bonds as a unit and we are going to be so much better because of it."

Tour de Georgia features best cyclist in world

Elsie Jackson
USAIC Public Affairs Office

It's the Dodge Tour de Georgia, sports fans, and it's coming to town April 21.

Forget that namby-pamby NASCAR stuff. I'm talking real racing. A peloton (French, it means "platoon") of more than a hundred internationally ranked cyclists racing across miles of Georgia roads, potholes and all, averaging more than 26 m.p.h. Sprints across finish lines have been clocked in excess of 45. Descents down mountains are expected to be even faster.

The cycling world's most recognized professional, Lance Armstrong, will be there, leading a U.S. Postal Service – Berry Floors team. Fellow Texan Bobby Julich's new team, Denmark's Team CSC, has accepted an invitation.

A USA Cycling developmental team guided by former Tour de France stage winner Jonathan Vaughters will also compete.

Teams representing Domina Vacanze, Jelly Belly, Ofoto/Lombardi Sports, Webcor Builders and Georgia-based Jittery Joe's Coffee are just some of the other teams expected to compete.

The Tour de Georgia is no ordinary ride. It's the longest multi-day stage race in North America sanctioned by the Union Cycliste Internationale and will cover 641 miles, ridden in seven stages over six days. Cycling's elite from more than 15 countries will be vying for more than $100,000 in cash and prizes.

Chris Horner, riding for Team Saturn, won last year's inaugural Tour de Georgia, blazing across 613 miles in 23:01:36. Another American, Fred Rodriguez, riding for Vini Caldirola Sidermec, was seven seconds behind for second place. A mere 13 seconds separated first and third place after a week of racing.

Horner will be there to defend his title, wearing the colors of his new team, Webcor Builders.

The Tour de Georgia starts in Macon on Tuesday with an 85-mile loop from Macon to Milledgeville and back.

Wednesday's 115-mile stage 2 starts in Thomaston and ends in Columbus.

The riders will face an unusual double stage day on Thursday. First, a 72-mile eye-opener in the morning between Carrollton and Rome. Then stage 4, a 21-mile individual time trial in the afternoon.

After racing the 128 miles from Dalton to Dahlonega Friday for Stage 5, the race will span another 128 miles, from Athens to Hiawassee/Young Harris on Saturday.

The Athens to Hiawassee/Young Harris leg, Stage 6, features a mountaintop finish on Brasstown Bald.

The race will wrap with Stage 7, an 80-mile stage from Dawsonville to Alpharetta, just north of Atlanta. Stage 7 is a circuit race, ridden in laps, and giving fans multiple opportunities to experience professional cycling at its best.

By the time they reach the finish line in Alpharetta on April 25, the teams will have covered 641 miles and climbed nearly 50,000 feet.

Scattered across the tour's route are 11 sprint zones and 11 "King of the Mountain" climbs. Bonus primes (say "preems") in the form of points, time, money or prizes will be awarded to the winners of these intermediate sprints and climbs.

In a stage race like the Tour, the fastest cyclist at the end of each stage is the stage winner. The overall winner of the Tour is the cyclist with the fastest composite time for all seven stages.

At the end of each stage the overall leader, the best sprinter and the best climber (the "King of the Mountain") are awarded special jerseys. It's a tradition started at the Tour de France, when race organizers started awarding a yellow jersey to the race leader to help reporters and spectators spot him, no matter where he was riding in the peloton.

And since this is the Tour de Georgia after all, the leader's jerseys are not only distinctive colors, they're adorned with peaches.

Eight riders will make up each Tour de Georgia team, unlike the Tour de France teams of nine. Should a rider crash, become ill or for whatever reason is unable to finish a stage, there are no substitutions and the team rides on. With the tougher, mountainous stages late in the race, maintaining a full team roster will be critical.

Lance Armstrong has said that it's not about everyone on a team trying to cross a finish line first. It's about one rider with a team backing him up and helping him win.

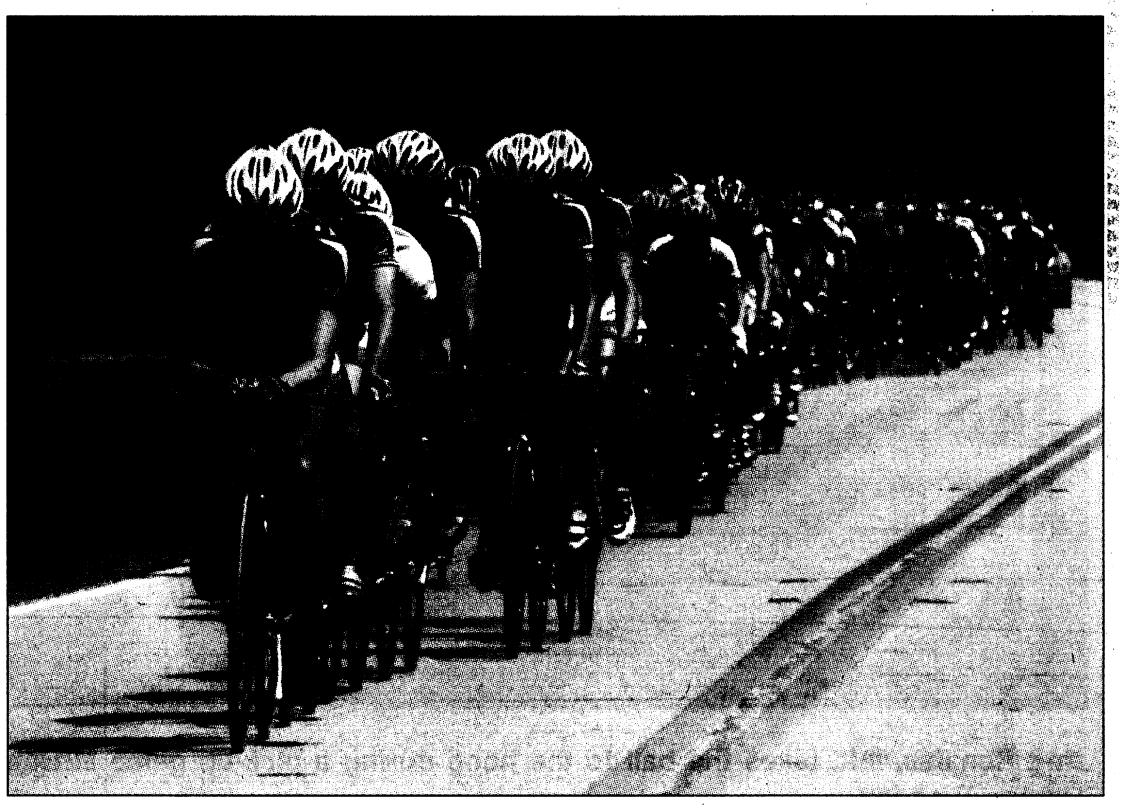
And he should know. He's won the Tour de France five times with the help of his U.S. Postal Service – Berry Floor teammates. In the hundred year history of the Tour de France only five men have won the race five times, and Armstrong is one of only two to have won consecutively.

Each team has a leader, the other riders are "domestiques." They are never far from the team leader, protecting him from winds and jostling from other riders. To conserve his strength, they will ride in front of him so he can draft, or "get pulled" in their slipstream. If another team attacks, breaking away from the peloton, the domestiques will use this drafting technique to help their leader bridge the gap to the breakaway.

Domestiques shuttle from the leader to their support vehicle and back carrying food, water and clothing.

If the leader's bicycle has a flat tire or other mechanical problem, one of the domestiques will trade out one of his tires, or even his bicycle, to minimize the leader's time loss.

The individual time trial is the only stage where cyclists ride alone, racing only against the clock. The cyclists will start, one at a time at one minute intervals, riding bicycles modified specifically for what has been called "the race of truth."



It's not just about cycling, either.

The Georgia Cancer Coalition is the Tour de Georgia's official beneficiary. The GCC raises funds and actively promotes cancer education, prevention, early detection and treatment.

Recreational cyclists may book a "Tour of the Tour" vacation through Atlanta-based Discover Adventures and ride the actual race routes for themselves.

A portion of the Discover Adventures "Tour of the Tour" will benefit the Georgia Cancer Coalition.

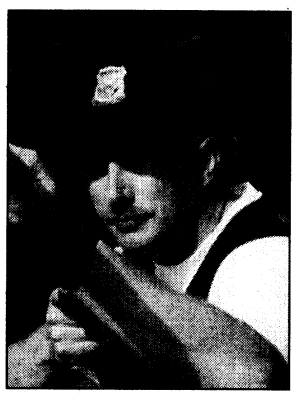
Three Soldiers make dreams reality



Paula J. Randall Pagán
Army Marksmanship Unit

Three Soldiers of the U.S. Army Marksmanship Unit are doing what very few people get to do in their lifetime; they are living out their wildest dreams.

USAMU shotgun shooters Sgts. 1st Class Bret E. Erickson, Shawn C. Dulohery and Todd Graves made the 2004 U.S. Olympic Team and will represent the United States at the Olympic Games in Athens, Greece, in August.

Erickson, 43, who also represented the U.S. in the 1992 and 1996 Olympics, will compete in both Trap and Double Trap. Dulohery, 38, and Graves, 41, shot their way on to the Men's Skeet Team.

Graves is a four-time Olympian who won the Bronze Medal in Skeet in the 2000 Olympics. Dulohery, a former Skeet World Champion, will be competing in his first Olympics.

Erickson

Dulohery

"The highest level that an athlete can achieve is the Olympics," Dulohery said. "Being an Olympian is an honor, knowing that I will represent not only myself, but the country and the flag as well."

USA Shooting conducted its final Olympic Shotgun selection match March 17 to 27 at Hook Range, and filled the nine slots on the U.S. Olympic Shotgun Team.

The Soldiers said experience in shooting these types of matches with shooters who are the best in the world is what gave them the edge in the selection matches, as well as being able to compete here at Fort Benning.

"Being able to train with the top shooters in the country on a daily basis at the world-class facility the Army has here at Fort Benning is what gave me the advantage," Dulohery said.

"Having been there before, I was able to block out distractions and just perform to my best abilities," Erickson said. "If you are a competitor and want to win, you will always be anxious, but I knew that my experience and maturity could carry me through."

"I was not very confident going into the final matches," Graves said. "But since I was able to handle the pressure, somehow I was able to pull it off."

Dulohery said he was confident and relaxed going into the match.

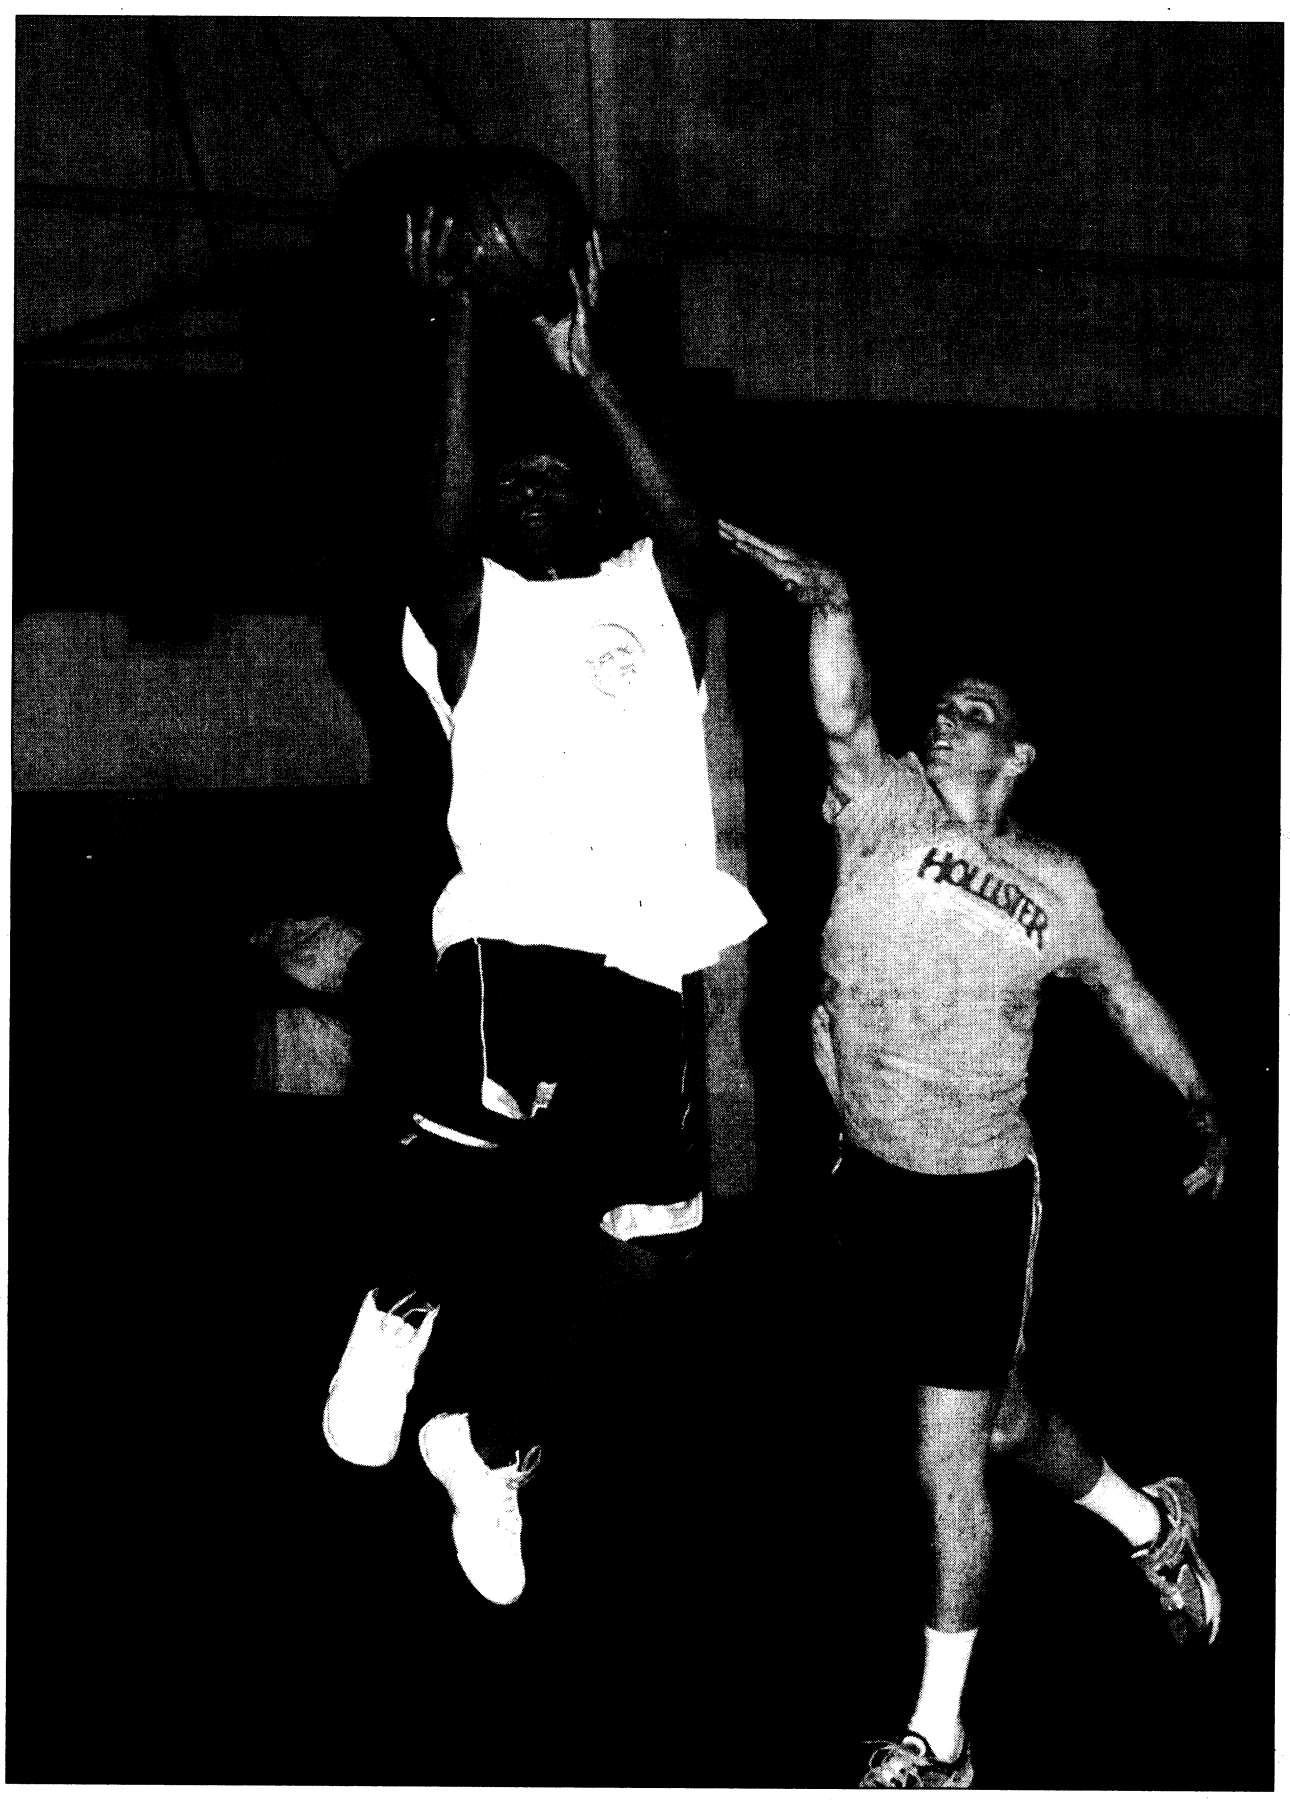
"After the first day and posting a low score of 93 (out of 100), I knew I needed a change for the next two days," Dulohery said. "Shooting a 99 the second day gave me confidence going into the final day."

All the Soldiers agreed their biggest challenge in Athens will be staying focused and blocking out all of the distractions.

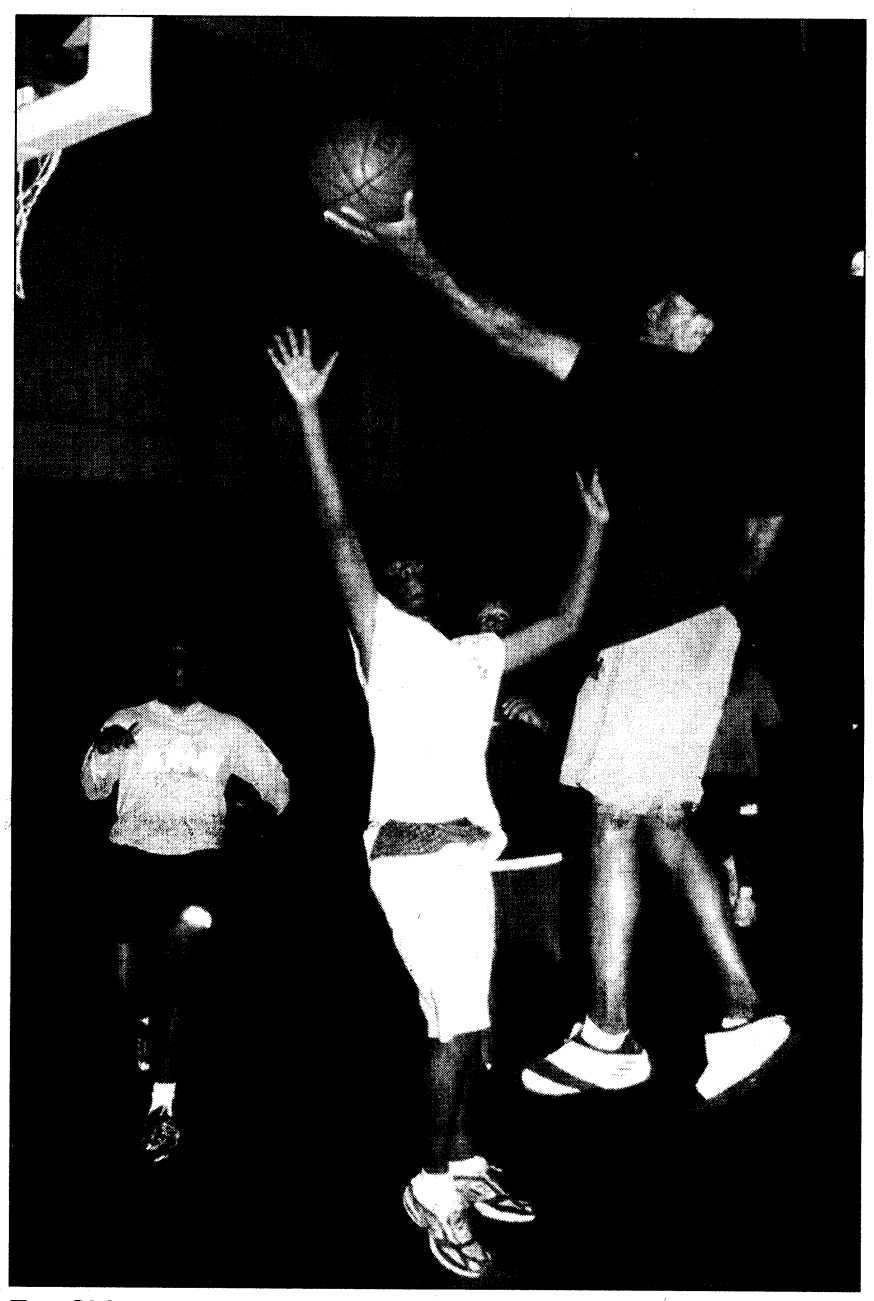
They said the key to winning is remembering that the Olympic competition will be no different than any of the other world-level matches throughout the year — In the Olympics they will be competing against the same people they compete against at the other matches around the world.

The three shotgun shooters credited the Army with making their Olympic dreams a reality.

The Soldiers also attributed their success to their families for all the support they provide to the athletes year after year.



"Without the Army and the Army Marksmanship Unit, I would not be an Olympian," Erickson said.



"They are the ultimate sponsor and support system," Dulohery added. "The Army gives me the best facilities, personnel, support staff and teammates."

"I owe everything to the Army and the unit," Graves said. "I could not have done it without them — and my wife for making me work hard."

USA Shooting's rifle, pistol and running target final Olympic selection matches will be May 20 to June 3 at Fort Benning, where shooters will vie for the remaining 16 slots on the 2004 Olympic Shooting Team.

Every afternoon around 5:30 p.m., Santiago Fitness Center fills up with Soldiers and family members who want to play basketball.

The games, which are played to 11, are 5-on-5 and offer a competitive atmosphere.

"We have fun playing pick-up games," Adrian McLaurin. It offers us a chance to continue to play basketball against quality competition even in the off-season. Plus, not to mention, it's a lot of fun."

Although the games are very competitive, everyone ends up going home knowing they gave it their all.

Santiago Fitness Center, which is located on Sand Hill, is open Monday through Friday from 5:30 a.m. to 9 p.m. and Saturday, Sundays and holidays from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m.

I found buried treasure in my attic.

More than 40 years ago, Grandma gave you some Series E Savings Bonds. So you put them in a safe place and forgot about them—until now. You were looking for old records when you found an unexpected treasure . . . those old Series E Savings Bonds. And even though your old bonds are no longer earning interest, they could still be worth more than 5 times their face value. So why not redeem those old bonds at your local financial institution? U.S. 'must not waver'

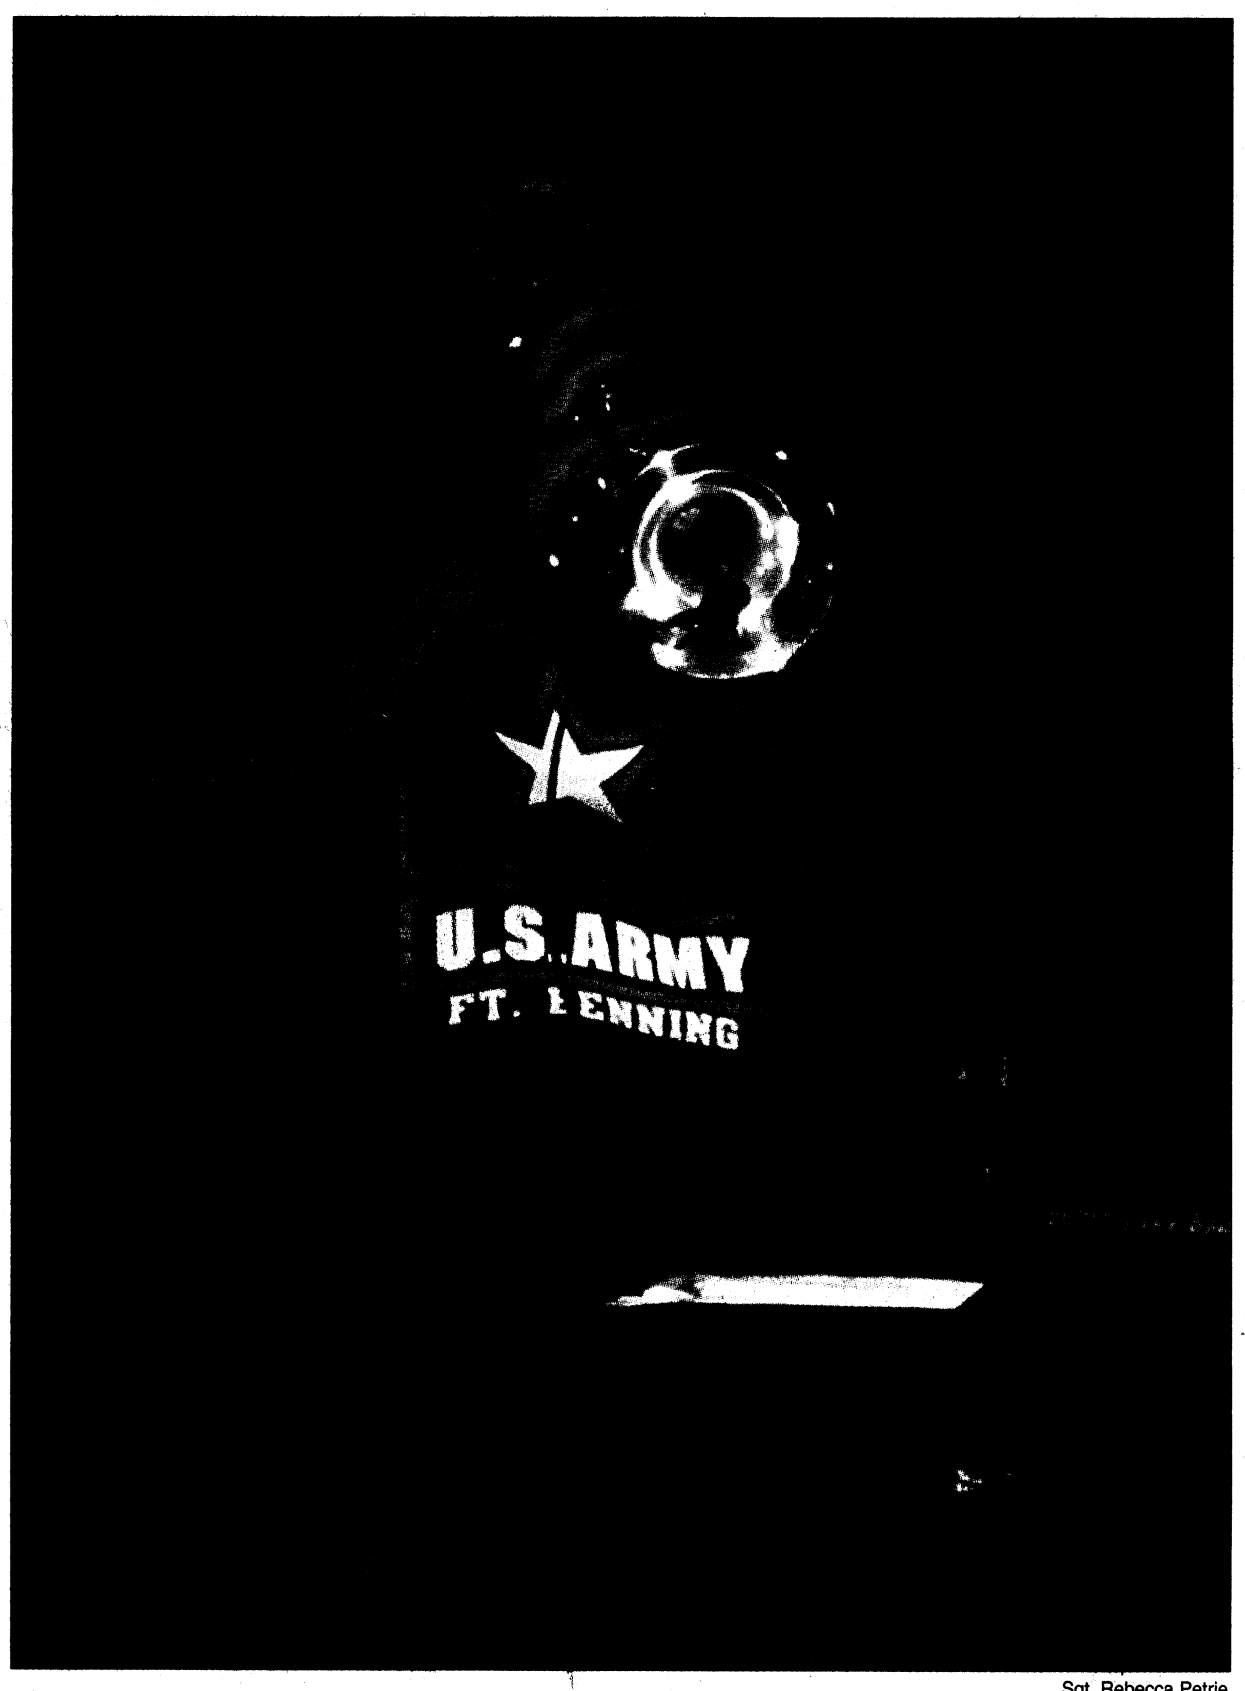
Violence in Iraq reason to stay, complete job

Sgt. 1st Class Doug Sample
American Forces Press Service

WASHINGTON — The United States will continue in its commitment to an independent, free and secure Iraq, and the United States "must not waver" despite "a tough, tough period," President George W. Bush said at a Tuesday night news conference.

The president stood before reporters in the East Room of the White House to make his administration's case for standing firm in Iraq, even with sporadic violence continuing and the June 30 transfer of power to an interim Iraqi government two months away.

Despite the recent increase in violence and casualties, Bush said the United States will not retreat from its mission.



"Weeks such as we've had in Iraq make some doubt whether or not we're making progress," the president said, "but we are making progress."

Bush offered military members assurances of the nation's commitment, and he emphasized the importance of the mission in remarks aimed at their families.

"We'll stay the course and complete the job, and you'll have what you need," he said to forces in Iraq. "And my message to the loved

Team collects lessons in Iraq

CATD looks at Army's urban ops overseas

Sgt. Kim Dooley

When 3rd Brigade, 2nd Infantry Division, hit the ground in Iraq in November, it set a precedent for the Army's mode of fighting.

The brigade, based at Fort Lewis, Wash., is the first unit to conduct combat operations using the Army's newest fighting vehicle, the Stryker.

The Stryker Brigade Combat Team has also become a key source for "lessons learned" — lessons that will influence doctrine, training and logistical issues for future Stryker brigades.

But these aren't lessons that can be communicated on paper. Rather, they require firsthand, up-close-and-personal interaction with the equipment, the unit and the mission.

To that end, a team from Fort Benning's Combined Arms and Tactics Directorate paid a visit to the SBCT in Mosul, Iraq, last month.

Headed up by Col. Edmund Woolfolk, CATD director, the three-man team spent eight days with the brigade, collecting feedback from leaders and Soldiers, observing the unit in action and joining in on operations.

Rangers dedicate trophy to fallen comrade

Every Ranger School graduation is preceded by Rangers in Action, a demonstration that highlights skills a Soldier learns at the school. The April 19 graduation for Ranger Class 5-04 had an additional ceremony, the dedication of the Capt. Russell B. Rippetoe Trophy.

After the thunderous explosions and the drone of the helicopter quieted down, after the echoes of Soldiers yelling "RANGERS!" faded away, there stood a retired Soldier in his dress greens with his wife by his side.

Forty-four years ago, he came to Fort Benning to earn his own Ranger tab. Three years ago, he came to Benning to pin the tab on his only son. This year, he returns to dedicate a trophy in memory of his son, Capt. Russell B. Rippetoe.

His son held many titles that list the accomplishments in his life ... captain of the soccer team, Eagle Scout, homecoming king, Ranger.

But two distinctions those who knew him wished he didn't have are being the highest ranking officer of the 75th Ranger Regiment to be killed in combat since the unit formed in 1983, and being the first casualty of the war in Iraq to be

ON THE SPOT

Foul behavior begs correction

Bridgett Siter

The other day, I found myself in the waiting room of a post clinic, surrounded by Soldiers, including a young man with one very limited vocabulary. He was peppering his conversation with words that would make a sailor blush.

I'd been there no more than five minutes when a civilian clerk leaned over the counter and barked at the young man, "Hey, you! You need to shut your mouth. Can't you see there's a lady present?"

I was reminded of another incident, relayed to me by a Soldier friend, who recently encountered a group of angry, young female Soldiers in a local restaurant. Apparently they became belligerent when a diner at the next table objected to the language they were using within earshot of her child.

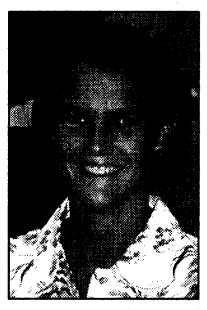
She asked them to "keep it down," and they retaliated, upped the volume and increased the frequency.

My Soldier friend, dining across the restaurant with his family, stepped in to diffuse the situation. He made an on-the-spot-correction and took down their names and units. They were shocked and the poor patron was grateful. But too late for the child, no doubt disillusioned, who will remember the behavior of the Soldiers in uniform long after he's forgotten the man who stepped in to straighten them out.

On-the-spot corrections were once practiced regularly by Soldiers who believed it was their responsibility to help maintain the integrity of the uniform. It was drilled in them in basic training — "If your buddy's jacked up, square him away. If you don't do it, someone else will."

These days, few Soldiers are willing to step outside their comfort zone outside the combat zone. And on-the-spot corrections are definitely uncomfortable for everyone involved, including those who observe the situation from afar.

As the wife of a young Soldier, I used to cringe when my husband would get up from the table, cross the mall or — heaven help us! — stop the car to correct another Soldier for what I perceived to be minor infractions. Who's it hurting if his head gear's on wrong, I asked. Who cares if their music's too loud? Don't make a scene. Let someone else handle it.



These days, with the eyes of the world focused on America's military, I understand the importance of minding our manners, so to speak, here and abroad. Soldiers are ambassadors wherever they go, in uniform or blue jeans, whether they're lunching with friends or launching an attack on terrorists.

If it's true the real measure of a man's character is his behavior when no one is watching, it follows then that the measure of a Soldier's character is his behavior at home, at the clinic, at the restaurant or theater.

And furthermore, the real measure of a Soldier's character is his willingness to speak out when the behavior of others Soldiers threatens to jeopardize the integrity of the uniform they wear.

Tradition, n. the handing down of statements, beliefs, legends, customs, etc., from generation to generation, especially by word of mouth or by practice.

Traditions. Every family has them. And when you are part of a military family like mine, many of your traditions are military in nature.

And I can't help but hope, as a third generation Soldier, that one or all three of my boys will continue our family's military tradition, because both my husband and I have a wealth of things to hand down.

My boys have had the good fortune to know my paternal grandparents. Pops, who turned 90 in October, still gets around well and can pick a mean tune on his banjo. But what's most interesting about him is his stint in the Army.

You see, Pops served in the Army just before World War II. He was in field artillery, which ironically, was exactly what I wanted to do in the Army. Pops' field artillery, though, was back in the days when the Army still used horses. His stories are great, and my boys get to hear them firsthand.

Not only do we pass on our stories, but we have a few military items that have changed hands a few times, as well.

When my dad went to West Point in 1958, he got a gray wool bathrobe. I took the bathrobe back to the school at the start of my sophomore year and wore it as I braved the cold, dashing across the sallyport to the latrine in the other wing of the building.

The bathrobe, now faded to a purplish color, had wrestling patches my father added, and patches from Army units like the 7th Army, "Seven steps to Hell." I added a few patches to the back, like a Marine Radio Recon patch I got from my Airborne School buddy. And when I graduated, I handed the bathrobe off to my brother as he started his sophomore year.

But the bathrobe wasn't as meaningful as Dad's 1963 jump wings.

His wings pre-date the two-prong-with-the-"dammits" and shiny Sta-Brite finish. They were dull with a straight bar pin and fastener.

He pinned those very same wings on my uniform after I turned in my parachute to the "nice" blackhat at Fryar Field. It was a hot, dusty day in July 1988. I was tired, I was sweaty, but I never felt better. And the best thing was some nice person captured the moment on film for us. Those pictures are now in my military scrapbook.

Five years later, Dad pinned the same wings on my brother. Unlike the bathrobe, those wings represented the first of our military accomplishments.

I'd love to someday have my dad pin those same wings on my sons' uniforms, but even if they don't choose the military, maybe their children will. And those wings will still be there, ready to be pinned on the next family member to jump out of a perfectly good airplane.

So what's your military family tradition? If you don't have one yet, it's not too late to start one. Your children will appreciate it.

NATIONAL LIBRARY WEEK

Visit them, use them, and learn

Our nation's public, academic and school libraries provide service to all.

April 18-24 is National Library Week and libraries play a vital role in providing millions of people with the resources they need to live, learn and work in the 21st century.

Libraries are changing and dynamic places, and librarians are the ultimate search engine, helping people of all ages find the information they need in print and online.

Libraries are part of the American dream — places for opportunity, education, self-help and lifelong learning; libraries bring you a world of knowledge both in person and online, as well as personal service and assistance in finding what you need, when you need it.

Libraries are a key player in the national discourse on intellectual freedom. Libraries narrow the "digital divide," and they are open to all.

Awareness and support must be increased for libraries, librarians and library workers by raising their visibility in a positive context and by communicating clearly and strongly why libraries are both unique and valuable, and how librarians provide the information that people need to succeed throughout life.

More individuals must be recruited to the profession and to work in libraries to maintain their vitality in today's changing workplace.

Celebrate National Library Week by visiting one of the post libraries and see why there is something for everyone at the libraries and media centers on Fort Benning.

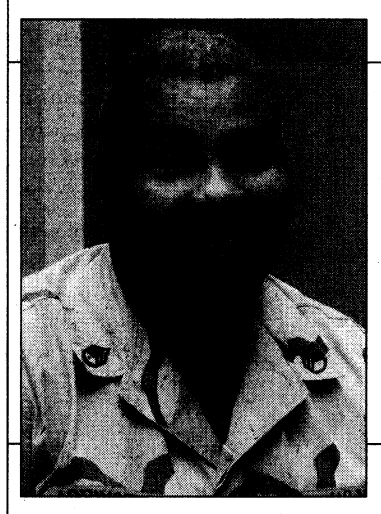
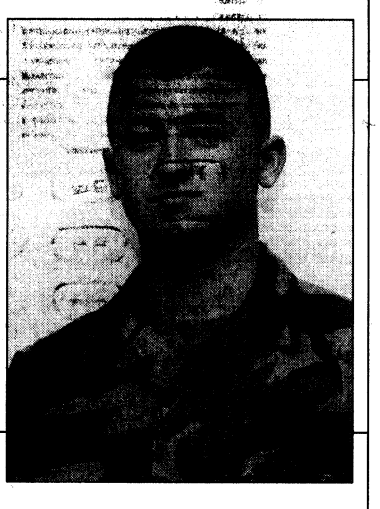
VARIOUS VOICES



What is an on-the-spot correction and when and how should it be made?

Staff Sgt. David Thomas, 1st Battalion, 50th Infantry Regiment — "An on-the-spot correction is a correction of someone who is doing something against Army rules and regulations. It is done tactfully as soon as the problem is recognized."

Spc. Matthew Dozier, 2nd Battalion, 54th Infantry Regiment — "Letting your buddy know something's wrong as soon as you notice it, but when it's not going to cause any trouble."



Staff Sgt. Larry Arrington, 803rd Quartermaster Company — "It should be done immediately. But it should be done courteously and with the intent to help that Soldier do better."

Staff Sgt. Robert Osburn, 2nd Battalion, 29th Infantry Regiment — "If a Soldier is doing something wrong, unsafe or unprofessional, a correction should be made, regardless of rank. But it should be done politely."

Spc. Adriane Lewis, 781st Transportation Company — "It should be done on the spot to correct whatever is wrong."

Warrant Officer John Hantzis, 498th Medical Company — "Anytime you see anybody, regardless of rank, doing something wrong, you should correct them. It should be done professionally and not publicly."

Graduate adds to OCS, family history

Lieutenant third-generation OCS graduate

Melissa House
Bayonet staff

He was only one of 89 to graduate from Officer Candidate School April 8, but as Ryan Schloesser crossed the stage, he represented a third generation of OCS graduates.

Ryan's father, Brig. Gen. Jeff Schloesser, the assistant division commander for support for the 101st Airborne Division (Air Assault) at Fort Campbell, Ky., graduated from OCS in 1977. His grandfather, retired Lt. Col. Kenneth Schloesser, graduated in 1959. And as far as anyone knows, this is a first for OCS.

Kenneth Schloesser enlisted in 1949 and spent 10 years as an armor Soldier before becoming a member of 51st Company, OCS. He said his decision to attend OCS came after he realized that the "end of the line" as an enlisted Soldier was coming up.

His class graduated two weeks after it began, and Kenneth was commissioned as an armor officer. He served in armor and armored cavalry units until he retired in 1982.

Now, 55 years later, he watched his grandson graduate from OCS as a member of the same company — now called B Company, 3rd Battalion (OCS), 11th Infantry Regiment.

"I never thought I'd see this day," Kenneth said. "Never in my wildest dreams."

His son considered and rejected attending the United States Military Academy or participating in the Reserve Officer Training Corps. It looked as if the military tradition would start and end with him.

So when Jeff called Kenneth in Japan to tell him he had enlisted during his senior year at the University of Kansas, it came as a surprise. Jeff said he heard about a program to enlist directly in the Army's Special Forces that caught his attention. But when he went in to enlist, his recruiter told him about the OCS college option, not SF. So after graduation, Jeff went first to basic training at Fort Jackson, S.C.

His OCS experience was a little different than his father's.

"There were only two OCS classes every year then," Jeff said. "It was after Vietnam, and the Army needed far fewer officers."

One of the strengths of the OCS program, he said, was the course's ability to combine and teach both people with substantial prior service and recent college graduates.

When his class graduated two months later, Jeff was initially commissioned as an engineer officer, but became an aviator three years later in 1980.

When Ryan went off to the College of William and Mary, the thought of a third OCS graduate in the family never crossed anyone's mind — not even Ryan's.

He, too, had quickly considered the Academy, decided not to participate in ROTC, and focused on his studies in international relations and Arabic.

"But once I left, I realized people are different in the civilian world," Ryan said. "I missed the military traditions, the values, the way people act. The Army is a special place, and it's where I belonged."

Once he realized he missed the military way of life, Ryan enlisted in the Army in October 2003 for the same OCS option as his father. And just like his father had done, he called his grandfather and told him the news.

Melissa House

Ryan Schloesser, left, his father, Brig. Gen. Jeff Schloesser and his grandfather, Kenneth Schloesser, leave Infantry Hall after the OCS graduation ceremony April 8.

Then Ryan was faced with the tough decision about what he wanted to do in the Army.

"I thought I'd be infantry," Ryan said, "until I watched the Green Berets."

He said the depiction of the combat engineers in the movie was what helped him with his decision. He liked the engineers' dual role of "construction and destruction" and the fact that they're also being used as infantryman.

"It's the best of both worlds," he said.

Though Ryan chose to be an engineer like his father, Jeff said Ryan wasn't following in anyone's footsteps, but making his own path.

The family is extremely proud of Ryan, but for his parents, his OCS graduation was a bittersweet moment as well.

"I have mixed emotions," said his mom, Patty, who married Jeff two days after his OCS graduation. "It's different when it's your son, especially with Iraq and Afghanistan."

His parents will worry about him as he heads off to Germany.

"I know the nation is at war," Jeff said. "I'm as anguished as any parent. But OCS is now achieving its legacy — a long time for something that started in World War II."

CAS3, officer advanced courses to merge soon

Gary Sheftick
Army News Service

WASHINGTON — The last class of the Combined Arms and Services Staff School at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., will graduate May 19.

CAS3 will be consolidated into the various branch officer advanced courses, Army officials said. A one-week combined arms exercise will be added to those advanced courses, which now last 18-20 weeks, depending on the branch.

The one-week exercise, officials said, will provide captains attending the branch schools with much of the combined-arms experience critical to CAS3, which now lasts just over five weeks.

During the past 22 years, some instruction such as problem-solving or military decision-making has become part of the curriculum at both the advanced courses and CAS3, said Col. David Thompson, CAS3 director at Fort Leavenworth. He said decision-making is then stressed again at a higher echelon at the Command and General Staff College.

"Some repetition may be good," Thompson said, for the learning process. "What we're trying to do is eliminate any redundancy in instruction."

Eliminating redundancy was a suggestion resulting from the Army Training and Leadership Development Panel study, known as ATLDP, completed in May 2001. It was also examined under the Officer Personnel Management System XXI study about six years ago.

"This is not a knee-jerk reaction," said Lt. Col. Dennis Harrington, the G1 Officer Education System liaison at the Pentagon. "This has been considered for years."

The change, planned as part of the Officer Education System transformation, was originally scheduled for fiscal 2005, but is being moved up for operational reasons, Army officials said.

"With the Army at war, captains need to get back to their units," Thompson said, and the change will get them back to units almost four weeks earlier.

The change will affect about 3,100 captains annually.

In recent years, most captains have gone to their advanced course as a permanent-change-of-station move. In the future, they will go in a temporary-duty status and return to their units, officials said. This will be part of Force Stabilization.

Army National Guard and Army Reserve captains may continue taking CAS3 at Reserve Forces Schools at least through the end of the fiscal year when existing courses finish. The reserve-component officer advanced courses are shorter and do not include much combined arms curriculum, said Maj. Larry Mosely, a training officer at the U.S. Army Reserve Command in Atlanta.

Thompson said he envisions what is now the two-week resident phase of the Reserve Forces CAS3 becoming very similar to the combined arms exercise for active-duty captains. Mosely said the officer advanced course for Reserve Soldiers may adapt into a two-week phase at a branch school, then a distance-learning course, followed by a combined arms exercise.

A one-week pilot for the combined arms exercise is planned for this summer at Fort Leavenworth. Then the exercise may move to the combat arms branch schools, Thompson said.

"It's a compact course," Thompson said about the exercise being planned, adding that many important elements of the current CAS3, such as problem-solving, staff interaction and briefings will be part of the program.

"Many written requirements will fall to the wayside," Thompson said, such as formal memo assignments. "I don't think a captain in today's Army needs to know how many spaces to indent," he said.

The combined arms instruction will include either computer-simulated exercises, Thompson said, or scenarios with staff injects.

"My job here is to ensure we don't hinder the education of our captains," Thompson said. "I think we have a great answer."

"There should be little difference," Thompson said, between the knowledge base of CAS3 graduates and those who complete the new officer advanced course with the additional combined-arms exercise.

Barracks construction underway

11th Inf. Regt. to benefit first, August 2005

Spc. Nikki St. Amant
Bayonet staff

More than $45 million in congressionally approved funds allocated to Fort Benning for structural improvements in fiscal 2003 are now being put to use.

The funds are part of the $1.2 billion allocated to the Department of Defense for new construction and modernization of existing barracks.

The project manager, Dean Miller, Real Property Master Planning, Directorate of Public Works, said the funds will be used to develop three separate sites, beginning with the construction of four L-shaped barracks at the corner of Dixie Road and Edwards Street.

"The four barracks will house 92 Soldiers apiece, totalling 368 spaces for 11th Infantry Regiment Soldiers," Miller said.

More than 100 Soldiers, including single Soldiers from the 11th Inf. Regt., 29th Inf. Regt. and the 988th Military Police Company, moved into family housing units in McGraw Manor and Indianhead Terrace in March to make room for renovations in their old barracks, Buildings 17 and 27.

Construction kicked off last week, Miller said, with the erection of a fence around the area and continued this week with the protective netting of trees at the site.

Drainage problems and other site issues, including design finalization, delayed the start of construction from its original start date in January, Miller said.

"The proposed completion date," Miller said, "is August 2005. But that is subject to change."

Spc. Nikki St. Amant

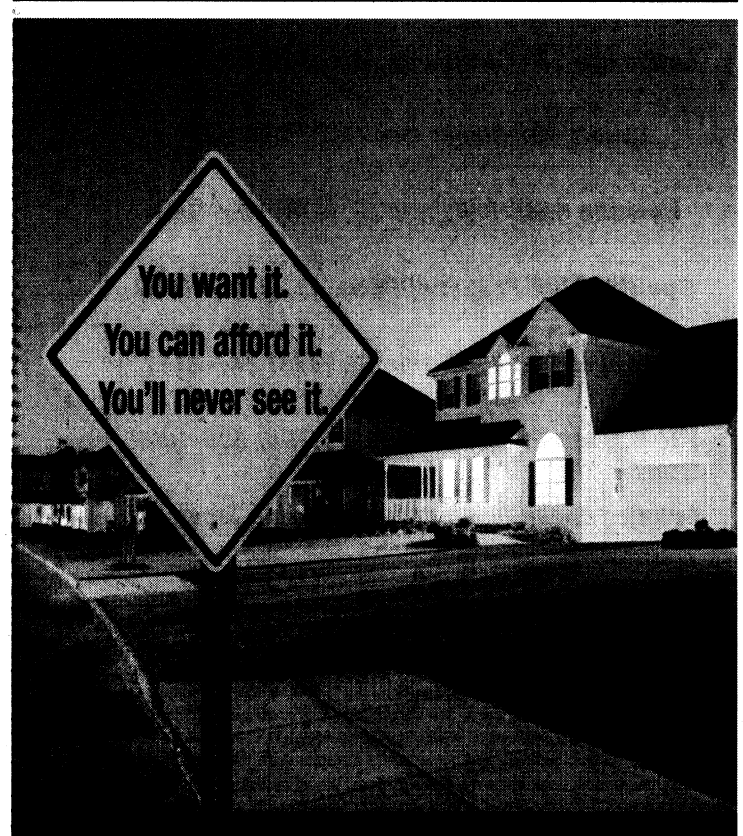
The fence was installed last week to cordon off the barracks construction site on Dixie Road.

The Corps of Engineers is in charge of administering the contract and monitoring quality control.

"The way it's set up is we do quality assurance in the sense that we monitor Clark Construction's quality assurance to make sure they are doing the job right," said Bill Coon, the Corps of Engineers representative in charge of the site.

The second barracks site, Miller said, near the hospital, will house 121 Medical Activity and Dental Activity Soldiers and will include a company operations facility for MEDDAC.

Construction on that site, Miller said, is slated to start in about three weeks, if all goes well.



Miller said the third site is a battalion headquarters building for the 1st Bn. (Airborne), 507th Infantry Regiment on Indianhead Road in the Airborne School complex.

He said there is no projected timetable for that particular site at this time.

Monument honors fallen 3rd Brigade Soldiers

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

Last week, 3rd Brigade Soldiers and their families dedicated this monument to the four Soldiers who lost their lives in Operation Iraqi Freedom and all of the Soldiers who fought beside them.

Photos by Sgt. Kim Dooley

Maria Garza, widow of 1st Sgt. Joe Garza, who was killed in Operation Iraqi Freedom, touches her husband's name on 3rd Brigade's Operation Iraqi Freedom monument. The monument was unveiled April 8.

As the rain and clouds cleared from the Fort Benning skies April 8, Soldiers and families of the 3rd Brigade gathered on Kelley Hill to unveil a monument dedicated to the Soldiers in the brigade who fought in Operation Iraqi Freedom — those who came home and those who did not.

The monument, which reads "Sledgehammer ... Not Fancy. Just Tough" on its front, stands as a tribute to the four Soldiers the brigade lost during its first tour in Iraq.

On its side, their names are inscribed: Pvts. Kelley Prewitt and George Huxley, Staff Sgt. Terry Hemingway and 1st Sgt. Joe Garza.

During the ceremony, the fallen Soldiers' families were presented flowers and escorted to the monument one by one to bear witness as their Soldier's name was revealed.

For Jean Prewitt, Kelley's mother, it was both a beautiful and painful experience.

"I didn't think I would get through the anniversary of his death," she said. "This is so difficult."

Kelley bled to death from shrapnel wounds April 6, 2003.

"I remain very proud of what he did. The Army was good for him. It gave him direction," Jean told a Ledger-Enquirer reporter the day of the ceremony. "Coming back here, on a day like this, brings back painful memories. But I would never consider not coming back. I owe it to Kelley."

There is much owed to Kelley and the three others who gave their lives in the name of freedom, said Col. Steven Salazar, brigade commander.

And much is owed to their families, too, he said.

"You don't raise heroes; you raise sons and daughters. If you raise sons and daughters, they'll turn out to be heroes — even if it's only in your eyes," Salazar told these families.

"Well, it's not just in your eyes that your sons, husbands and brothers are heroes ..." he said. "We offer our humble thanks to you.

"And we rededicate ourselves to their cause — the cause of peace and freedom — in hopes that their sacrifices will be justified," he said.

A cause Steve Prewitt knows his son believed in.

"I know Kelley knew he was over there for the right reasons," he said. "And I know he would go back."

And if he were here, he would be in good company — in the company of the nearly 4,000 3rd Brigade Soldiers who stormed Iraq when the war began last year, and who are preparing to return for OIF 3 in the coming year to uphold the mission they began.

"We wanted to take this opportunity to recognize the Soldiers who fell, to thank their families for their sacrifice," said Salazar.

"But also very importantly," he said, "to remember the service of all Soldiers who fought in that great campaign."

It was those Soldiers who carried on the brigade's great tradition, and "added a remarkable chapter to this unit's history," Salazar said.

In this chapter, he said, these brave Soldiers uncovered weapons caches in schools and mosques, covert enemy training camps and propaganda — including a "horrific" mural of planes flying into the World Trade Center and Saddam Hussein laughing, smoking a cigar.

"With skill, determination and courage, they defeated and toppled Saddam's evil regime," he said.

"The global war on terror did not begin on 9-11," Salazar said. "But its end began on that day ... We will serve to see the end to this generation's threat to peace."

Recycling benefits many

Dorinda Morpeth
Directorate of Public Works

In celebration of Earth Day, Fort Benning is highlighting the installation's highly successful recycling program.

Fort Benning has had a qualified recycling program in place since the mid-1990s.

The program relies on the participation of family housing residents and military offices and units located on post. The materials handled by the Materials Recycling Facility at Fort Benning are cardboard, all types of paper, glass, plastic and metal cans.

Material is collected and delivered to the MRF where it is sorted and baled for sale. Items are also brought to the MRF by individuals. Fort Benning's recycling program kept more than 5,000 tons of material from being sent to the landfill last year.

The continuous circle of the "three Rs" — reduce, reuse, and recycle — is showcased in a large presentation located inside the front entry of Infantry Hall today through [illegible].

The [illegible] products packaged or made [illegible] that can be recycled. These items are collected and processed at Fort Benning's recycling facility.

A variety of products made from recycled materials are displayed to educate consumers on buying recycled and the types of products that are available.

Taking center stage is original folk art and hand-crafted whirligigs made by Floria and Ronnie Yancy from Brooklyn, Ga.

Floria has sold her art throughout the world and paints on a variety of media. Ronnie crafts his whirligigs entirely from recycled materials, showing that discarded items are still useful and can be remade into new, different and beautiful things.

The continuous circle of the three Rs relies on consumers to support companies that do not use excess packaging for products, according to the Environmental Protection Agency's Consumer Handbook for Reducing Solid Waste.

We can reduce waste and costs of disposal by finding a new use for products or give them away to a charity that can refurbish them or make them available for resale. Recycling and reuse have been given a much higher status with the TV spot From Trash to Treasure and similar programs. Books and magazines now cater to recycling and reusing many items once thought to be no longer useful.

The recycling program at Fort Benning depends on everyone to be a success. Take the time to sort and set out your items for pick-up and use the cardboard recycling containers located throughout the installation.

Follow the recycling guidelines and be an active participant in the program. Recycling reduces Fort Benning's solid waste costs and proceeds from the sale of recycled materials benefit the Morale, Welfare and Recreation fund.

Curbside Recycling Program

Why Recycle?
Recycling reduces disposal cost, conserves natural resources, and minimizes problems associated with land disposal.

How to Recycle?
Curbside collection is once per week on the same day as garbage is collected. Residents are provided with a brown recycling bin. The bin must be placed at the curb by 7 a.m.
Do not put the containers out prior to 6 p.m. on the previous day. Empty containers must be removed from the curb on the day of collection. Place paper items, except corrugated cardboard, in a paper grocery bag or tie in a bundle and put next to or in the recycling bin. Drop-off recycling collection centers are located in Building 4000 in the Harmony Church area and the Main Mall parking lot by the Shoppette.

What's Acceptable?
1. Aluminum cans
2. Plastic food and beverage containers
3. Glass food and beverage containers Rinse and remove tops from plastic and glass containers
4. Paper products
   a) Newspaper
   b) Magazines
   c) Bags
   d) Unwanted mail/shredded paper
   e) Newspaper flyers
   f) Office and school paper
   g) Non-corrugated paperboard boxes (flatten)
5. Steel/tin cans – rinse
6. Corrugated cardboard – flatten and place next to the recycling bin

What's Not?
Personal items such as tissue, napkins, bandages, diapers, pet bedding, toys, automobile batteries, liquids, heavy metals and any other contaminated items. Unacceptable items can cause public health problems and cannot be placed in recycling bins. Rejected items must be removed immediately from the recycling bins. Do not place any items other than those on the acceptable list into the recycling bins.

Unit leaders refresh skills learned in war

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

With many units on post preparing for Operation Iraqi Freedom 3, there is a need for all Soldiers to get a refresher course on different things they will need to know while in the desert.

The 13th Corps Support Battalion is doing just that. Twenty officers from the unit took a Leadership Development Course to help them become proficient in the skills they need for combat. The course began Wednesday with an Army Physical Fitness Test and concluded today with a 12-mile road march.

"It's important for all of these officers to know these skills because we're most likely going back to a combat zone," said Capt. Jonathan Allen, battalion operations officer. "If they know and understand the tasks, then they can go back to their squads or companies and teach their Soldiers the same tasks. By doing that, each squad and company will be better prepared for operations in the Middle East."

Lt. Col. Matt Higginbotham, battalion commander, said he requires all the officers in his battalion to not only go through the course, but be efficient in all of the tasks.

"If I can't depend on my leaders to be efficient in these tasks, how can I depend on the rest of my Soldiers?" he said. "It all starts with the leaders, and the training they receive in this course will, in turn, be given to their Soldiers. So, they need to know what they're doing."

Higginbotham said 50 percent of the officers in his battalion have been in combat operations.

"That's very important when leading Soldiers," he said. "Soldiers feel more confident in their leaders when they've experienced combat. They know they can trust their platoon leader or company commander to lead them in the right direction."

After finishing the APFT, the officers road marched to Wendy Field, where they received training on critical wartime tasks, including identification of improvised explosive devices, administering first aid, use of a global positioning system and night-vision goggles training.

Identifying IEDs is a class the officers paid careful attention to.

"IEDs are a big thing in Iraq," said Capt. Tonya Prevo, 598th Maintenance Company commander.

"It's scary to think how many (IEDs) are over there. Our awareness has to be at its peak. I believe looking for IEDs is the second most important thing to look for over there after enemy insurgents."

The officers also learned to use the global positioning system.

"In this unit, everything we do is a convoy operation," Higginbotham said. "We're not always going to have an escort, so it's important that everyone is proficient with the GPS. By knowing it, we can be sure that we're going where we need to go in both a timely and efficient manner."

> "If I can't depend on my leaders to be efficient in these tasks, how can I depend on the rest of my Soldiers?"
> Lt. Col. Matt Higginbotham
> 13th Combat Support Battalion commander

The Soldiers also received hands-on weapons training Thursday to familiarize themselves with a few weapons, including the M 249 SAW, and the .50-caliber machine gun.

"Weapons familiarization is very important for this unit," Allen said. "When deployed, you never know when you're going to have to step up and take hold of a certain weapon. And it helps if you've had training with that weapon."

The officers also had a refresher on basic first aid.

"You can never train too much on first aid," Allen said. "Who knows, a medic might not be available, so you have to know what you're doing to possibly help save a life."

By receiving all of this training, the 13th CSB has begun to ready itself for possible deployment in support of OIF 3.

"We want to make sure we're ready, should we be called on again to serve in the Middle East," Allen said. "This course is just one of the steps in us accomplishing that."

Army Emergency Relief Campaign to end April 30

The installation's 2004 Army Emergency Relief Fund Campaign is scheduled to end April 30.

Major campaign objectives include: increase awareness about AER; publicize procedures so everyone knows how to obtain AER assistance in time of need; raise funds to support AER assistance programs; and inform contributors that their support "Helps the Army Take Care of its Own".

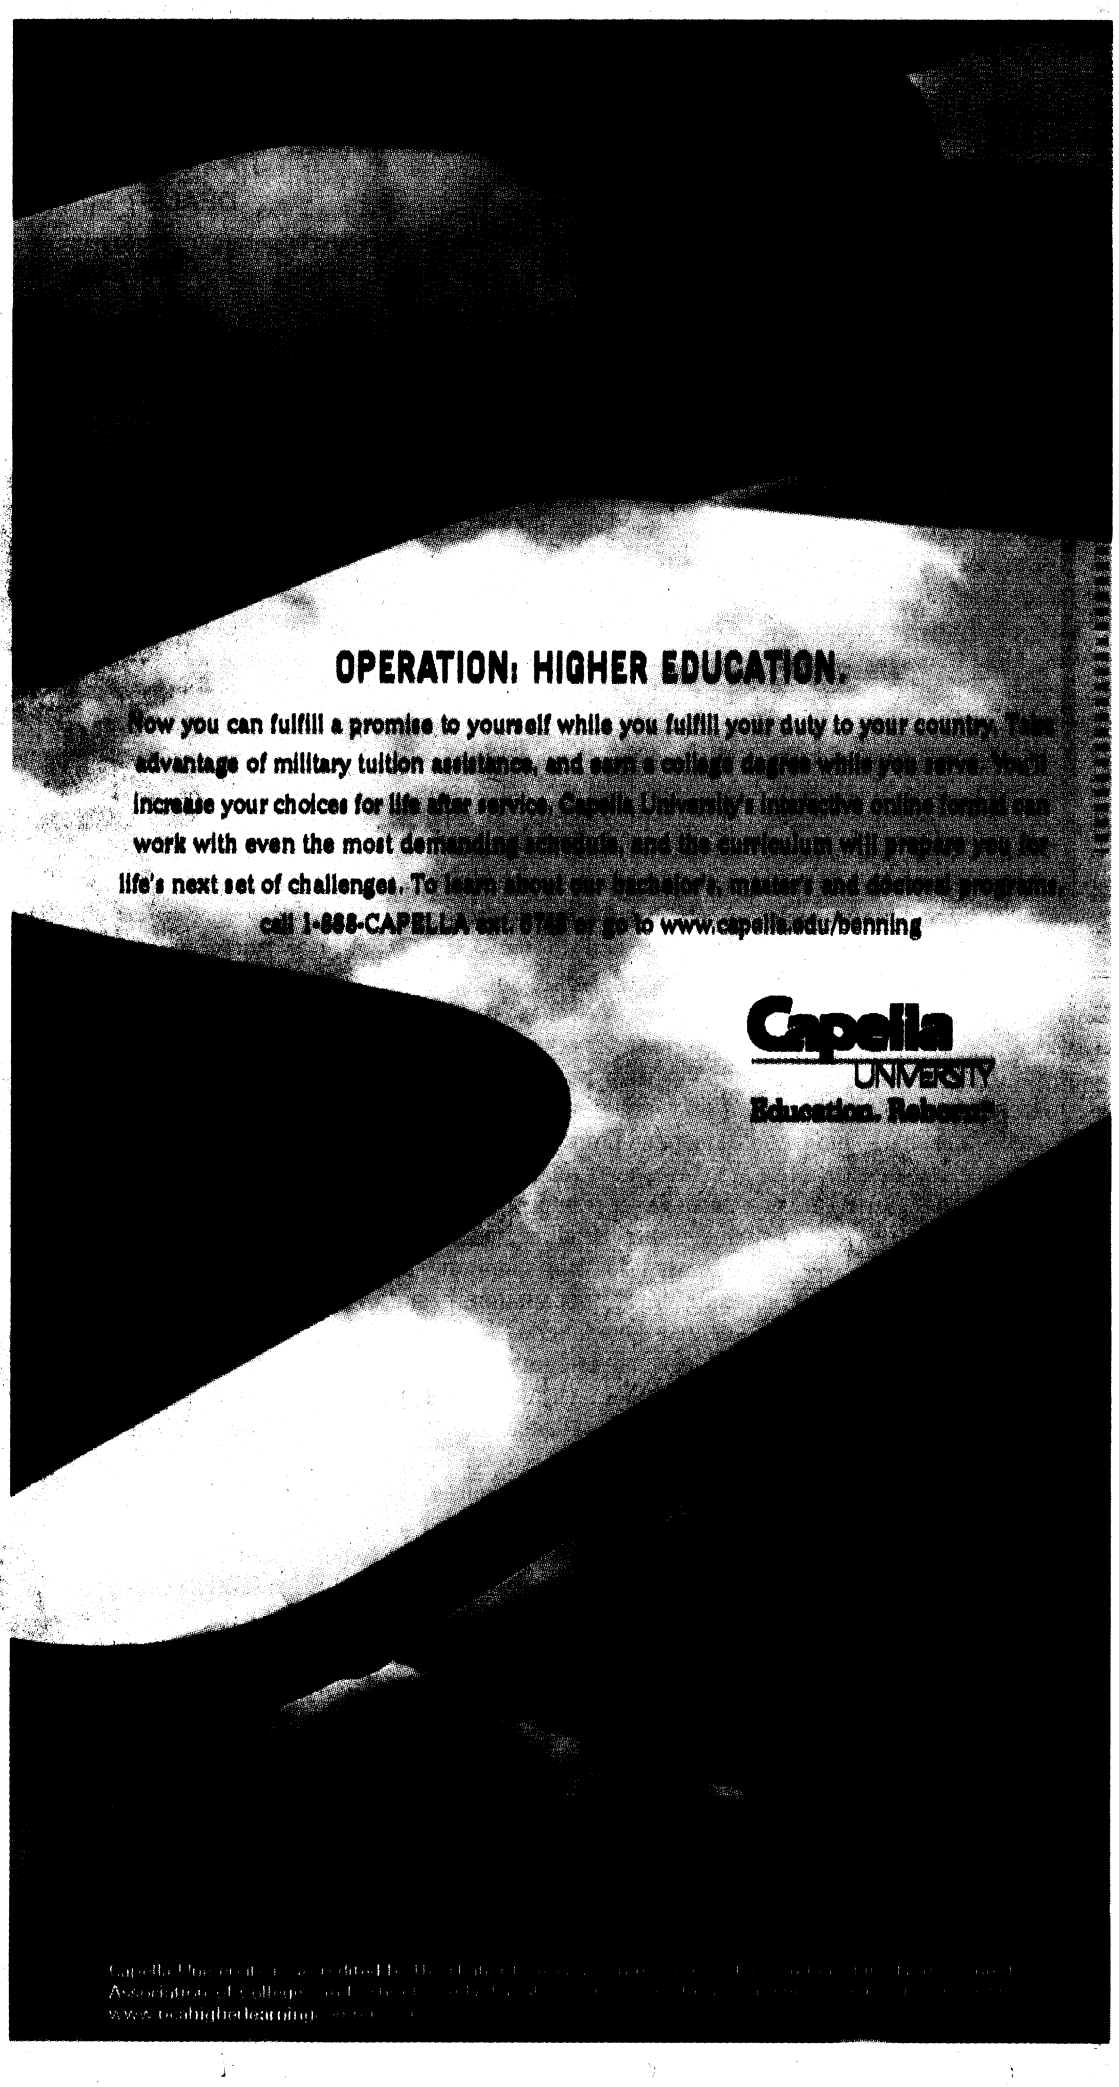
In the November 2003 issue of Reader's Digest, AER was selected as one of the best charities in the United States, one that "you can trust with your dollars."

Composer Irving Berlin helped start AER by donating the proceeds from his stage and screen play This is the Army.

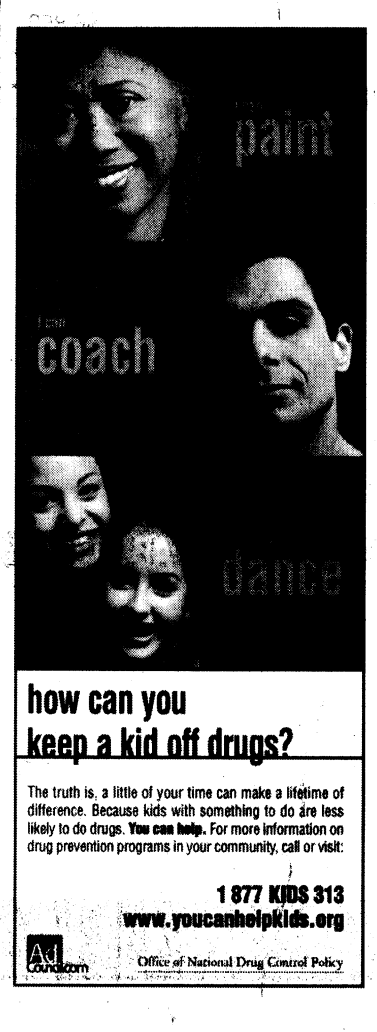
Since then, members of the "Army family" have kept the organization going by generously contributing and providing assistance for their fellow Soldiers in financial need.

AER Annual Fund Campaign is the only time each year Soldiers are asked to help their own organization and their fellow Soldiers.

Contributions will ensure availability of funds for Soldiers who find themselves in need.



Each major subordinate command, directorate and unit throughout the installation were represented at the campaign kick-off. Key persons are charged with soliciting contributions.



You may make contributions by allotment, cash, money order, or checks. Contributions by allotment allow you to spread your donation over a period of time.

This year's installation goal for the campaign is $175,000. As of week March 26, the Campaign Fund Drive had collected 29.9 percent ($50,908) of that goal.

During 2003, the installation AER Section provided $639,875.95 in loan assistance to 628 eligible clients and $88,901.80 in grants to 81 clients.

Do your part — contribute to the AER Campaign.

Bush: Answers questions

ones who are worried about their sons, daughters, husbands and wives is your loved one is performing a noble service for the cause of freedom and peace."

The president placed blame for violence in Iraq on three groups: remnants of Saddam Hussein's regime, Islamic militants and terrorists from other countries.

He said that although these instigators of violence come from different factions, they share common goals.

"They want to run us out of Iraq and destroy the democratic hopes of the Iraqi people," he said.

Calling the violence in Iraq a "power grab" by extreme and ruthless elements, Bush sought to dispel the notion that the recent violence reflects the will of the Iraqi people.

"It's not a civil war. It's not a popular uprising," he said. "Most of Iraq is relatively stable. Most Iraqis by far reject violence and oppose dictatorship."

Bush specifically cited radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr as one of those responsible for inciting riots and attacks against coalition forces. Sadr has assembled supporters into an illegal militia and publicly supported the terrorist groups Hamas and Hezbollah, the president said. He also accused Sadr of violence and intimidation against Iraqi Shiia. Iraqi authorities have indicted the cleric for the murder of a prominent Shiia cleric, Bush said.

"Iraq will either be a peaceful, democratic country or it will again be a source of violence, a haven for (terrorists), and a threat to America and to the world," he said. The president noted the violence in Iraq has a familiar ideology.

"The terrorist who takes hostages or plants a roadside bomb near Baghdad is serving the same ideology of murder that kills innocent people on trains in Madrid, and murders children on buses in Jerusalem, and blows up a nightclub in Bali, and cuts the throat of a young reporter for being a Jew," the president said.

"We've seen the same ideology of murder in the killing of 241 Marines in Beirut," he said, "the first attack on the World Trade Center, and the destruction of two embassies in Africa; in the attack on the USS Cole, and in the merciless horror inflicted upon thousands of innocent men and women and children on Sept. 11, 2001."

Though terrorist acts often have religious reasons as the professed motive of the perpetrators, Bush said that's not really the case.

"None of these acts is the work of a religion," he said. "All are the work of a fanatical political ideology."

Meanwhile, Bush said his administration is reviewing the needs of troops on the ground, and he promised to send military commanders all the troops and resources they say they need.

Bush said Army Gen. John Abizaid, commander of U.S. Central Command, is "clearly indicating" that he may want more troops.

"It's coming up through the chain of command, and if that's what he wants, that's what he gets," the president said.

Some 135,000 U.S. troops are in Iraq, Bush said, and he said the U.S. military presence there will continue "as long as necessary, and not one day more."

The president said the nation is committed to the June 30 transfer of sovereignty to the Iraqi people, and said a delay would send the wrong message to the Iraqi people and to the world about the value of an American promise.

"We have set a deadline of June 30. It is important that we meet that deadline," he said. "Iraqis do not support an indefinite occupation, and neither does America."

But sovereignty involves more than a "date and a ceremony," Bush said. "It requires Iraqis to assume responsibility for their own future."

The president said according to a schedule already approved by the Iraqi Governing Council, Iraq will hold elections for a national assembly no later than next January. That assembly will then draft a new permanent constitution, which will be presented to the Iraqi people in a national referendum held in October of next year.

Iraqis then elect a permanent government by Dec. 15, 2005. That vote, he said, will mark the completion of Iraq's transition from "dictatorship to freedom."

In the meantime, he said, other nations and international institutions are stepping up to their responsibilities in building a free and secure Iraq. The coalition is working closely with United Nations envoy Lakhdar Brahimi and with Iraqis to determine the exact form of the government that will take charge of the country June 30. A United Nations election assistance team, headed by Carina Perelli, is in Iraq developing plans for next January's election, Bush said. NATO is supporting the Polish-led multinational division, and 17 of the alliance's 26 member nations have forces in Iraq.

The president listed several reasons why he believes success in Iraq is vital to the United States.

He said a free Iraq will give 25 million Iraqis the right to live in freedom and will stand as an example to reformers across the Middle East. He also said that a free Iraq will show that America is on the side of Muslims who wish to live in peace.

But just as important, he said, a free Iraq will confirm to the world "America's word, once given, can be relied upon even in the toughest times."

Victory on the Iraqi front is key to further victories in the global war on terror and therefore to U.S. security, the president said.

"Above all, the defeat of violence and terror in Iraq is vital to the defeat of violence and terror elsewhere, and vital, therefore, to the safety of the American people," he said. "Now is the time and Iraq is the place in which the enemies of the civilized world are testing the will of the civilized world. We must not waver."

On Easter Sunday, the president said he visited wounded Soldiers hospitalized at Fort Hood, Texas, presenting the Purple Heart to some of them, and thanking them on behalf of all Americans. Others, he said, have paid an even greater cost. The nation honors those killed and prays their families will find "God's comfort in the midst of their grief."

He promised the families of those killed in Iraq that "we will finish the work of the fallen. This government will do all that is necessary to assure success of their historic mission."

Award: Remembers fallen Ranger

buried in Arlington National Cemetery.

Rippetoe was a true Soldier. The son of a retired lieutenant colonel, he took care of his Soldiers, and he knew how to inspire fierce loyalty in his men, Spc. Chad Thibodeau told Clay Latimer with the Rocky Mountain News, in an article on the Arlington Cemetery Web site.

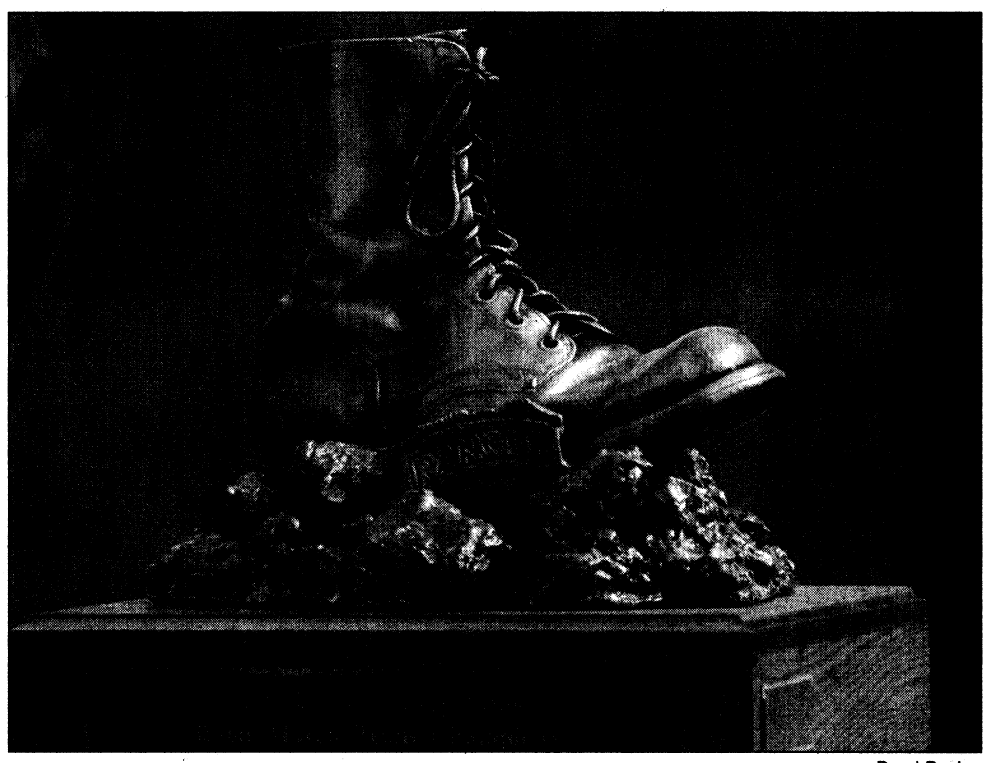
"In life, Captain Rippetoe embodied the Ranger Creed in every way," said Col. William G. Kidd, commander, Ranger Training Brigade.

He was confident, charismatic, and most of all, caring, said retired Lt. Col. Joe Rippetoe, Russell's dad.

So on April 3, 2003, when a pregnant woman got out of a car yelling for assistance at a checkpoint in Northwest Iraq, this big-hearted Ranger went to help.

Moments later, the driver of the car detonated explosives hidden inside the vehicle, killing himself, a female passenger, the pregnant woman, Rippetoe and two fellow Rangers.

The 27-year-old captain, who saw combat in Afghanistan as part of Operation Enduring Freedom, seemed uneasy as he departed for Iraq, his father said. No one knew just how uneasy he was until the family found a note on his locker. It read, "I want a military funeral, and I want it to be by my people."



Despite his reservations, he knew he had a mission to accomplish. Less than a month later, his premonition came true.

Perhaps the "Shield of Strength" that hung on a chain around his neck held words of comfort for him. The emblem displays a U.S. flag on one side and a quote from Joshua 1:9 on the other: "I will be strong and courageous. I will not be terrified, or discouraged, for the Lord my God is with me wherever I go."

His father has this scorched metal now. And it is he who is keeping his son's life in the minds of so many young Soldiers.

As the retired lieutenant colonel rose from his seat next to his wife, Rita, at the Ranger graduation Friday, he told the new Rangers something he always told his son.

"You're physically strong, you're mentally strong, but I want you to be spiritually strong so if something happens, you'll be on a first-name basis with God."

Darsi Busler

This award, a bronzed combat boot, will be given to the team that wins the road march event in the Best Ranger Competition.

Russell inherited his father's heart with the "anything I can do to help" attitude, while at the same time having a competitive side to always be the best, Russell's longtime friend, Brent Tuccio, told Latimer.

One year after his death, Russell B. Rippetoe's name will now forever be synonymous with being the best.

A bronzed combat boot trophy was named in honor of the fallen Ranger and will be awarded to the two-man Ranger team that wins the road march event at the David E. Grange Best Ranger Competition held annually at Fort Benning.

The road march is the last event on the first day of the 60-hour competition and typically cuts the field in half.

Competitors must complete the march of an unknown distance, usually between 18 and 25 miles, while carrying 65 pounds of equipment.

"We dedicate this trophy in his memory so others can use him as a role model ... so others can follow in his footsteps," Kidd said.

"That inner toughness he possessed allowed him to keep going when others fell by the wayside, a characteristic that also marks the winners of the road march event," said retired Col. Thomas Dials, president of Armed Forces Institute, the award's sponsor.

Russell prepared to compete in Best Ranger two times, but mission requirements prevented him from attending the competition, Joe said.

While his son is no longer here, Joe is most definitely still a father, not only to his daughter, but to every Ranger who crosses his path.

"To be a Ranger is awesome ... it's a different breed," he said.

Next week, he will watch members of his extended Ranger family vie for the honor of Best Ranger with the pride of a father.

Whether it is words of advice or doing "anything he can do to help out," Joe is a proud man. He is proud of the Rangers, proud of the Army, and proud of his Ranger son.

Lessons: Help develop strategy totally different to get out there and actually experience some of the friction and hardship the young leaders out on the tip of the spear are facing," Woolfolk said.

"You've got to actually participate in the operations — it's the best way to collect (information)."

The team joined the unit's troops on patrols — day and night, mounted and dismounted — raids and a cordon and search mission.

Woolfolk jumped in on a raid to capture "blacklisted and noncompliant personnel" and to search for contraband, i.e. weapons and explosives.

The mission was successful, he said, turning up several of both. The weapons were taken and given back after they were registered; the explosives were confiscated and destroyed.

Missions like these are what helped the team get a grasp on how the unit and its equipment are performing under pressure.

"We went there to collect as many lessons learned as we could from the guys on the ground," said Capt. Paul Cunningham, another member of the CATD team.

"But you have to get a firsthand view of what's going on and see it with your own eyes," he said.

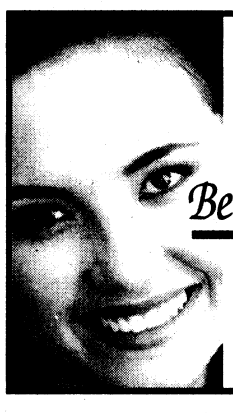
The team was there to assess "all the key functional areas," Woolfolk said, evaluating doctrine, urban operations strategy, equipment, leadership development, personnel and facilities.

The results will be applied throughout the Army in up-and-coming Stryker brigades, officer and NCO professional development schools and especially here at Fort Benning.

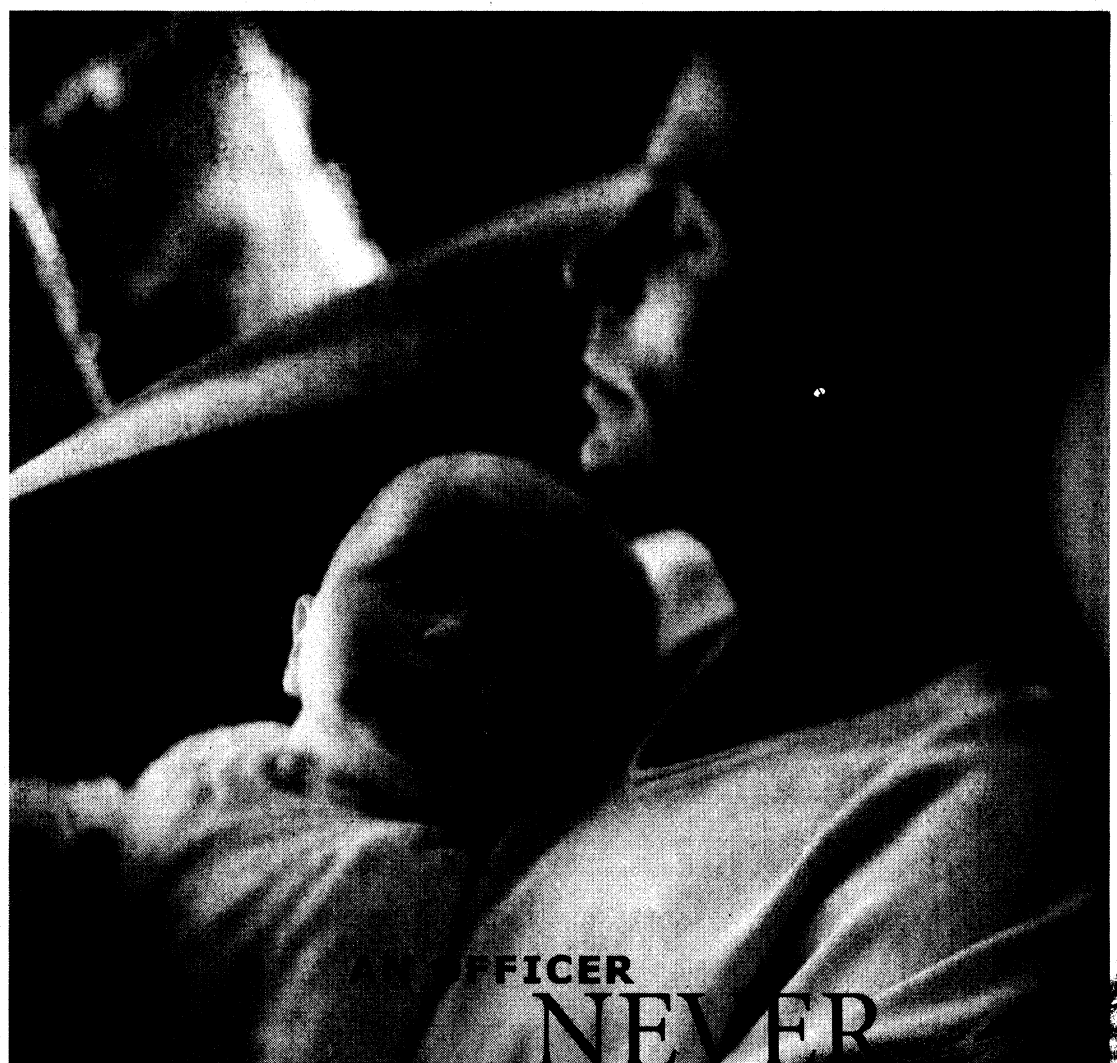
CATD is responsible for developing UO strategy Army-wide Woolfolk said.

On top of that, the directorate is also called upon to travel to SBCTs in the making and train them as they come on line, and to incorporate these lessons into leader development courses — mainly the Infantry Captains' Career Course, Cunningham said.

Although most of the results are confidential — "Anything can be used as a vulnerability (by the enemy)," Woolfolk said — overall, the doctrine is sound, he said, the organization is "tailor-made" for Mosul and the unit is very pleased with the equipment, with a few exceptions.



Woolfolk said, the unit is doing well, and the "handover" between American and Iraqi forces in June looks like it will be right on schedule.



"The unit is well-led and very motivated," he said. "Their quality of life is improving daily, and they're making headway with the local population."

Not bad for a unit built from the ground up on a concept born just four years ago.

Riverfest ready to rock for 35th time

Weekend of music, food, education for all

Spc. Nikki St. Amant
Bayonet staff

The Historic Columbus Foundation's Riverfest Weekend will celebrate its 35th anniversary this year when it kicks off Thursday.

This year, the festival will return to its roots in the historic district to commemorate its landmark anniversary and promote the restored homes and parks that benefit from the funds raised by the foundation during the event, said festival coordinator Francis Quick.

The festival started as a one-day event called the Salisbury Fair.

"As we grew from a one-day affair to a three-day event with much more than the original arts and crafts and children's area, we changed into what is now Riverfest," Quick said.

More than 75,000 attendees are expected to flood the historic district this year to enjoy a schedule packed with entertainment, educational and culinary opportunities in what should be Riverfest's finest hour thus far, Quick said.

"This year," Quick said, "will be the best Riverfest ever."

The weekend officially launches Thursday, with a Kitchen Tour of Homes that will include admission to eight historic district homes, culinary sampling and cooking demonstrations, followed by a fine wine and cheese reception. Tickets for the tour are $25.

The festival offers a little bit of everything for the well-rounded attendee looking for diversity.

Providing almost non-stop musical performances throughout the weekend, the festival hosts a line-up that includes the Grammy-winning blues rock band Blues Traveler, country star Tracy Byrd, Capt. Jason Kostal, former commander

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

Sick of sitting around in that barracks room looking at the walls? Need to get the family out of the house or just take a break? We've got the answer for you. 'Get Outta Here' appears in The Bayonet each week to highlight recreation and leisure venues right here in the tricommunity. If you would like to suggest a hot spot for the column, call Sgt. Kim Dooley at 545-3367.

So you're sick of hanging out in the same old places downtown — waiting endlessly for a turn on the pool table, elbowing your way through the crowd to wait in line for the bathroom for half an hour, shouting to be heard over the band.

You're looking for a more laid back atmosphere, somewhere you can go to hang out in peace, to relax and unwind.

Well, retired 1st Sgt. Charles McGurk has just the place for you. He called me up Wednesday to tip me off to his favorite stomping grounds — Papa Top's Lounge.

Doesn't sound like your cup of tea? Don't let the name fool you.

Think Cheers with a Southern twist. None of that rowdy ruckus you get downtown. None of the claustrophobia-inducing crowds or lengthy lines. Nope, not here.

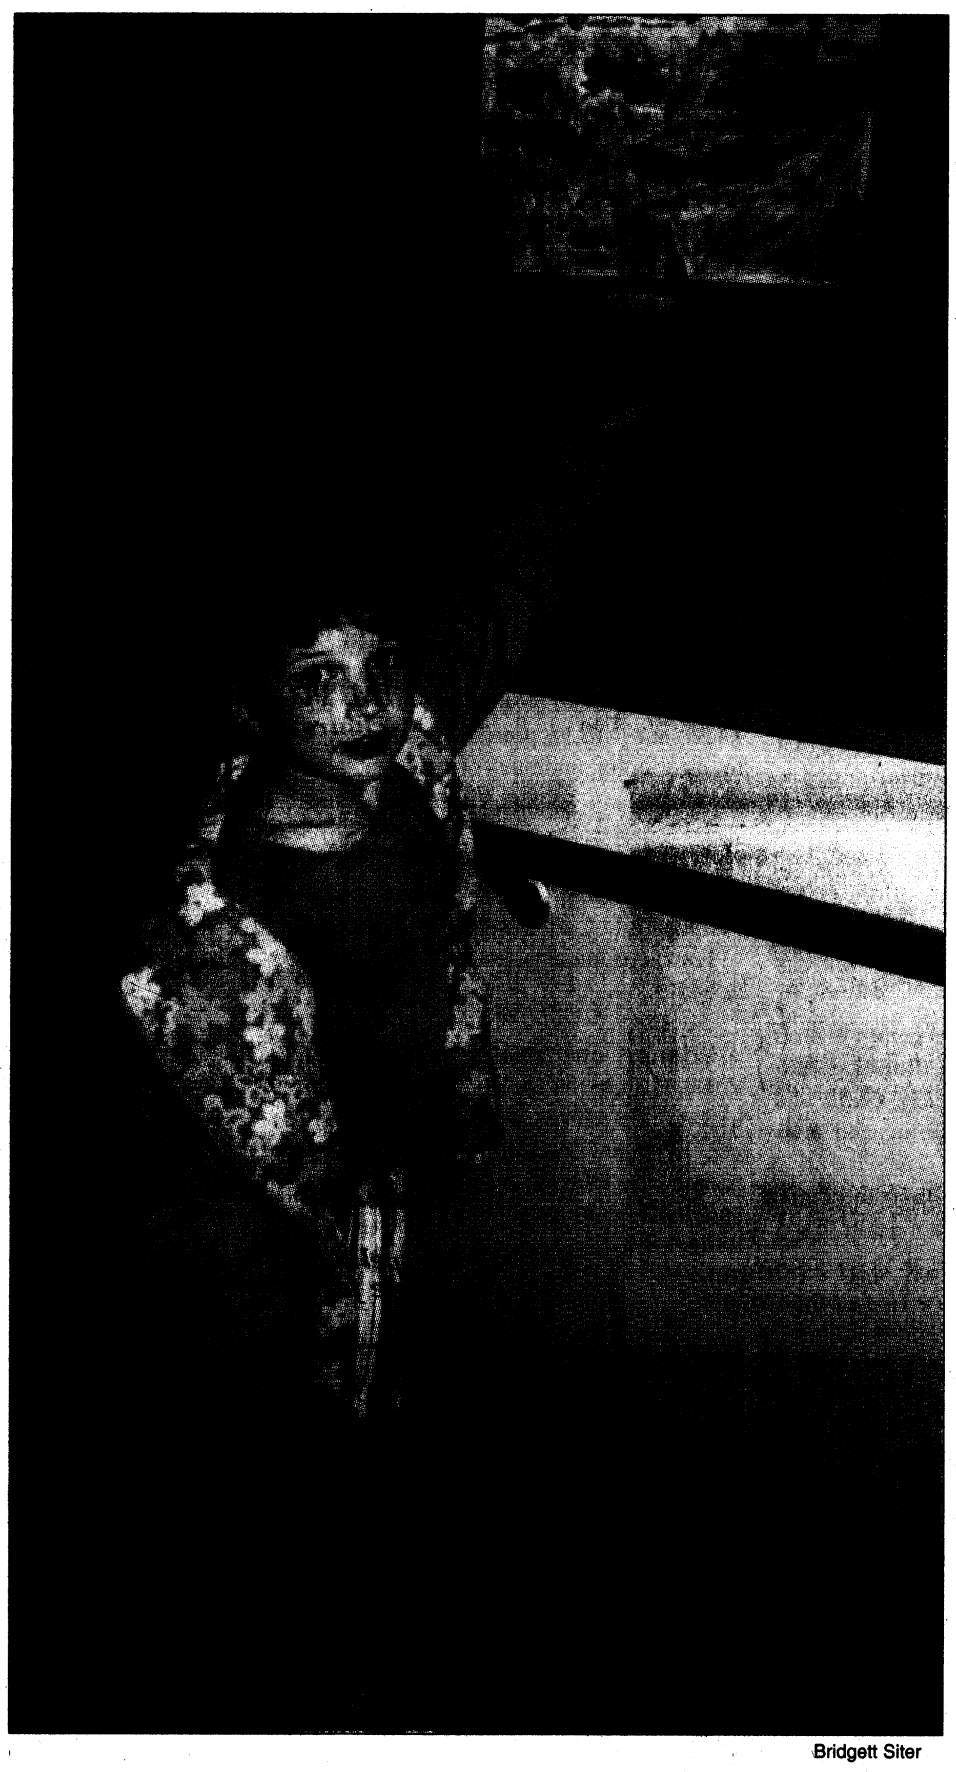
This is a place "perfect for Soldiers to come before they head downtown," if you ask McGurk. And I think he might have something there.

With pool tables, dart boards and even a horseshoes pit, Papa Top's already has more to do than half the bars in Columbus.

And there's a bonus. Nearly every Saturday — with rare exception — Papa Top's is home to "some good homecookin' on the grill." Come out about 4 or 4:30 p.m., McGurk said, grab a beer and partake of the free barbecue.

Now there's only one drawback, as far as I can tell — and some of you may actually go for this sort of thing — they play country music. Not a whole lot of that newfangled country music, but you can definitely count on a classic country tune or two.

Now, I'm not exactly lining up for the next do-si-do myself, but I think I could stand it long enough to check this place out, maybe even ignore it and make myself at home.



And if you're into country music — "the good stuff" — well then, you better boot scoot your behind over there and check out one of the only bars in town that caters to your taste in music.

Even if you don't much care for all that twang, don't pass up this downhome, downtown establishment.

Located on 2nd Avenue, Papa Top's is the perfect place to start your night on the town, and even better if you're one of the many townspeople taking up residence in the loft apartments downtown.

Check it out, and while you're there, look for a happy fella by the name of McGurk, shake his hand and thank him for the tip. (And the free barbecue!)

Aubryn Middleton spots her artwork at the Columbus Museum April 1 during a special reception for the students in Kris Clemons' and Susan Lapp's second-grade classes at Stowers Elementary School.

The students visited the museum in March and toured the exhibition Tales From the Easel, where they each chose a painting to write a story about.

Sharon Del Gobbo, Stowers' art teacher, then helped the students create their own artwork, which will be displayed at the museum through the end of April.

The Columbus Museum is located at 1251 Wynnton Road. It's free to the public and features a children's interactive activity room.

Food drive to can hunger

Post residents aim to 'Stamp Out Hunger'

When you clean out your closets for the annual postwide yard sale May 8, don't overlook the pantry. For the third year in a row, the sale coincides with the national Stamp Out Hunger food drive, sponsored by the National Association of Letter Carriers.

Mail carriers in more than 10,000 cities nationwide will collect food along their regular mail routes. Patrons are asked to leave nonperishable foods — canned, boxed or bagged — by their mail boxes. All donations will be distributed to local food banks.

Last year, post residents donated 2,200 pounds, said Jerry Hooks, the retired letter carrier who coordinates the Fort Benning food drive. That's nearly 500 pounds less than the previous year.

"We were a little light, but that was to be expected, I think," said Hooks, a retired Soldier. "So many of our Soldiers were in Iraq and a lot of families were gone, so we really understood.

Benning skate park to open Saturday

Event marks grand opening of Youth Services Teen Center

Fort Benning's Child and Youth Services will host a grand opening celebration for its skateboard park Saturday, and it's a BYOB event — bring your own board.

Though the park will be open to registered CYS members, the Fort Benning community is invited to the grand opening activities, which will include professional skate demonstrations by Dorian Tucker and Joe Pino, free T-shirts to the first 150 guests, door prizes, free refreshments, a climbing wall and a bungee bull.

The event will also feature tours of the new Teen Center, located in the CYS's former pool house.

The center, designed by Fort Benning teens, is "just gorgeous," said Linda Laine, recreation specialist for Fort Benning Youth Sports and Fitness. It will house a pool table and comfortable furniture — "home-like," Laine said.

Spc. Nikki St. Amant

Fort Benning's Youth Services will host a grand opening for its skateboard park Saturday.

"It's a place they can call their own. They can kick back, relax and hang out with their friends," she said.

Saturday's activities will begin at 10 a.m.

Skaters must have their own boards, helmets and pads, and parents must sign a liability waiver.

The much-anticipated skate park, the result of a CYS recreation survey of Fort Benning youth, was built by Wynn Contractors, a local company. The modular skate equipment was designed and built by Skatewave of Illinois, whose parent company, Landscape Structures, has been building playgrounds for 30 years. The skate park replaces the old CYS outdoor swimming pool on McIver Street. To register for Youth Services, visit the Family Unit Network Office, Building 359, off Ingersoll Avenue.

Faith students hone wrestling skills

Sgt. Kim Dooley

Charles Freehill, left, a seventh-grader at Faith Middle School, practices wrestling techniques with sixth-grader Michael Hill at the school's Wrestling Club Tuesday.

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

It's 2 p.m. on a Tuesday in Faith Middle School's cafeteria. Thirteen rambunctious boys horse around on the floor, competing to be heard after a long day of sitting semi-quietly in class.

But it takes only a few words to calm even the most excited of the bunch — "Shhh!!! Coach is coming!"

And with that, the chaos settles, and the boys resign themselves to stretching.

It's the second month the boys have been involved in the school's Wrestling Club and only the fourth time they've been on the mat, and they're ready to get down to business.

In its first year, the club, 20 boys in all, is gearing up for competition, something they hope to do in the next month or so, said Coach Rick Everett.

After a few weeks of conditioning using "Army PT style" training — push-ups, sit-ups, running — the boys are learning a few basic moves, Everett said, building the foundation and forming a team.

Everett, who subs at the school as a seventh-grade geography teacher, knows what wrestling can do for the boys.

After all, he's been "in or around" it for going on 25 years.

"I love it, because there's so much self-discipline involved ... And the character it builds is just unreal," he said. "And even though you're competing as an individual, it takes a lot of teamwork. In order for one guy to get good, it takes the whole team working together."

Participating in the club will also give the boys an edge as they graduate the middle school years, Everett said.

"All the Columbus high schools have wrestling programs, and most of these kids are going to be here long enough that they'll go to these high schools," he said. "But they're going in three to five years behind. If we start here, they'll have enough knowledge and experience to compete when they get to high school."

Of course, a club in its infancy isn't without challenges. The club has only one mat for 20 boys — it needs a set of three, Everett said, an expense upward of $8,000.

The club's mat was donated by a post unit, something he's grateful for, Everett said. He's hoping to find more of that support to procure the rest of the equipment the club needs.

But cramped space doesn't stop Nicky Esposito from getting the most from the club. The youngest member of the club, Esposito is actually a fourth-grader — the club is for children of all ages on post, Everett said.

"My brother, Thomas, is a seventh-grader and he brought me over here," Esposito said. "We both do karate, too, so we thought this could help us."

Although it's tough to be the youngest and the smallest kid on the team, Esposito said learning karate has given him an advantage over the other boys.

"It's harder for them to stretch, and that's not really hard for me," he said. "But it does help me be more flexible and stronger, and this helps with karate."

Eight-grader Kevin Jenkins said the club is about more than learning to wrestle.

"It shows power, the ability to move and flexibility," he said.

Jenkins said wrestling is fun, but challenging for him. Some of the moves he's trying to learn are only made more difficult because he's not flexible.

But that doesn't deter this novice wrestler.

"I like getting on the mat and trying new things and trying to be better at all the things we learn," Jenkins said. "And I'm looking forward to trying hard in competitions, trying to think and use the skills (I've learned in the club) on the mat."

School liaison officer advocates for education

Sheryl Nix
Bayonet correspondent

Soldiers moving into and out of Fort Benning can do so a lot easier these days, knowing the post has someone dedicated to making the transition easier for their school-age children, no matter what their age.

Although Dewayne Baldwin has been Fort Benning's school liaison officer — part of the Child and Youth Services program — for the past 15 months, many families are not even aware that the post has a school liaison officer, much less that one of his chief purposes is to be an advocate for them.

"Military children and families face unique situations," Baldwin said. "They are constantly moving around and entering new environments. My job is to advocate for them, inform them of their options and help make their transitions a little easier."

Since parents may not know he's out there, Baldwin takes the School Liaison Services Program to them.

He is now part of the in- and out-processing procedure for Soldiers, with tips on how to assimilate into a new school environment, enroll children in local schools, ensure students receive adequate credit for transferred coursework and much more.

Baldwin also provides information for families leaving Fort Benning. He researches schools at a family's new location to find enrollment procedures, requirements for special education and gifted and talented program criteria, and provide tips on how to keep children's school records organized.

"My door is always open," he said. "Parents can contact me with questions about schools, scholarships, or any question or concern they have about their children's education."

Sheila Patton, a Fort Benning parent and community volunteer, did just that. She contacted Baldwin initially to get information and resources for an off-post school, but now he's helping her track down information on a scholarship for her son.

"His advice and referrals were very helpful," Patton said. "Any time I have an issue with my son's high school, he points me in the right direction or helps me ensure I'm looking at the situation in the right way."

Although her current situation involves the complex issue of scholarship residency requirements for military children, Patton is hopeful that she'll find the help she needs from the School Liaison Services Program.

Baldwin acknowledged that many of these issues are tough, but he pledges to tackle each one.

"Parents should take pride in the fact that there is someone advocating for them," he said. "We don't stop trying, no matter what the issue is."

Patton said that parents hold the key.

"Parents need to get educated about what this program has to offer so they can help (Baldwin) implement it. You can't take his job lightly. Our children's education is too important," she said.

Baldwin said this passion from parents is what sets military families apart from other communities.

"Military parents are keenly aware of the importance of education," he said. "Parental involvement is the single most important factor in a child's educational success."

The School Liaison Services Program recently received a boost. Baldwin secured almost every surrounding school district's endorsement for a memorandum of agreement which will help provide consistency in military children's education.

This Department of Defense initiative outlines nine tenets that each participating school district agrees to implement. The tenets highlight an emphasis on key topics from improving the timely transfer of records and developing systems to ease student transitions, to increasing access to extracurricular programs and providing college application and scholarship information tailored for military children.

"Because these districts value military children, they are willing to do what is necessary to meet their needs" he said. "The goal is to provide a streamlined program so families can expect the same types of programs and services wherever they go."

The future is one of Baldwin's favorite things to talk about. He plans to keep working with home school families to help them take advantage of all the resources available to them. He also wants to host a large college career fair.

His "to-do" list also includes projects like the creation of a new educational task force comprised of parent volunteers with students in surrounding school districts.

Task force members will work with the Garrison Commander to tackle key issues affecting military children throughout our community.

To volunteer for the educational task force or for more information about the School Liaison Services Program, call Baldwin at 545-3062.

Riverfest: To return to roots

of the 29th Infantry Regiment Sniper School, and almost 30 other local and national performers in several genres.

In Salisbury Park, the festival's original home, folk art and traditional arts and crafts will be on display, and the Children's Interactive Area will be in Heritage Park, the city's newest park, which was funded in part by past Riverfest proceeds.

And when tummies start grumbling, the festival will be well-staffed with food vendors from around the country, offering everything from greasy favorites to gourmet desserts.

Die-hard barbecue fans can sample entries in the time-honored Pig Jig Barbecue Cookoff Contest and cast votes for the "people's choice" award. Judges will declare a winner sometime in the afternoon April 24.

The Folklife Village will showcase many forms of art and will include a Folk Art Show with 50 Southern folk artists, a fine art exhibition showcasing more than 100 local, regional and national artists, artisans and craftsmen, a youth art show and Native American skills demonstrations.

The Children's Interactive Area offers a wide variety of activities for the young and young-at-heart, including face painting, a musical petting zoo, chalk art, karate, sand-art sculpting and hands-on art projects with nationally-known folk artists.

There will also be carnival rides, a 5K race and one-mile fun run and a fireworks display in honor of the 35th anniversary of the festival.

The more than $2 million expected to be generated by the festival, Quick said, will be used to fund the foundation's Heritage Education Program in all Muscogee County public schools, including Fort Benning schools, and will replenish funds used for "facade loans."

Facade loans are $5,000, five-year, interest-free loans available to local historic home owners. The funds may be used for restoration work like painting, roofing and general upkeep.

Tickets for the festival are $5 a day for adults and include all activities, except the main concerts, and $10 a day for all activities and the concerts. Tickets for children ages 6 to 12 are $2, and tickets for children under 6 years of age are free.

For more information, maps, parking locations and shuttle routes and schedules, go to www.columbusriverfest.com or call 324-7417.

Drive: To ease hunger

"But this year we'd sure like to beat that by a whole bunch," Hooks said.

Carriers along Fort Benning's eight mail routes will deliver the food to the Custer Road fire station where it'll be weighed before it's taken to the Army Community Service Food Bank.

There, it will be available for Soldiers and their families who find themselves in financial need.

Post residents will soon find a postcard in their mailboxes reminding them about the 12th annual drive, which is cosponsored by Campbell's Soup, America's Second Harvest Food Banks, United Way and the U.S. Postal service.

They're asked to leave nonperishable foods, such as canned meats, tuna, fruits and vegetables, dried milk, cereals, juices and dinner mixes.

No glass containers, please.

Each of us has potential to be masterwork

Chaplain (Lt. Col.) Ruben D. Colón
USAIC Chaplains' Office

In Middle Eastern villages, where each Oriental rug is handwoven by men and boys under the direction of a master weaver, a weaver often makes a mistake.

But when a mistake is made, instead of pulling the work out to correct the error, the master weaver finds some way to incorporate the error into the pattern.

Experts say that the exceptional beauty of complex designs in the rugs is often due to the skill of the master weaver in turning mistakes into works of art.

In the creative plan of God, each of us is in the "process of becoming." Each of us has the God-given potential to become a uniquely beautiful masterwork of God's creative art. Moreover, each of us is a co-creator in his or her own life pattern.

We are the weavers, in this sense. We have a hand in the process of completing the pattern, making ourselves whole.

REFLECTIONS

We are co-creators, but we cannot do it alone. We run into snags. We make mistakes. Oh, how we make mistakes! And so we need a 'master weaver' to show us how to redeem our errors.

We need a 'master weaver' to learn how to transform our lives so we do not continue to make the same mistakes over and over again.

We have a capacity to easily distort the pattern of our lives with foolish and unfortunate decisions. But by God's grace, we can rely absolutely on being redeemed by transforming broken patterns in life into a picture of emerging beauty.

Saint Paul wrote in Romans 5:2-5, "We can boast about looking forward to God's glory, but that is not all we can boast about; we can boast about our sufferings. These sufferings bring patience, as we know, and patience brings perseverance, and perseverance brings hope ..."

There is something about dark times that can inspire our most profound thoughts on the really important questions about life.

For example, isn't it remarkable Lincoln's Gettysburg Address, often called the nobles-speech ever made in American history, came in the darkness of the Civil War?

In other words, early in life we learn hope usually involves struggle, and our hopes are never fully realized unless we understand both are part of an inseparable whole.

Hope and the struggles in life are not disconnected episodes. But hope is the anchor of the human spirit. Hope is a miracle of everyday life. Never let it slip away from your grasp.

Successful life matters to all

Chaplain (Maj.) Jeffrey Hawkins
Chaplain Family Life Center

"Dearly beloved, we are gathered here in the sight of God to not just mourn the loss, but celebrate the life of ..." When you hear those words, what image rolls across the screen of your mind?

This past week, as I have done more times than I can remember, I had the privilege of standing in front of The Infantry Center Chapel and honoring a Soldier and his service to his country as family, friends and loved ones said goodbye to him at his funeral service. Though I'd be "pumping sunshine" if I said every funeral doesn't have a touch of sadness, it would also be misleading to not point out that a good number of the funerals I do are wonderful celebrations. Some of you may find that hard to imagine. What is the difference between having a celebration versus a somber dirge at your funeral? It's really a matter of success. When life has been lived successfully, when the "mission" has been well accomplished, then a celebration is in order.

Hawkins

The key question then is, "How do you define your success?"

Be a great role model for your life, your relationship with the one you love and your relationship with your kids if you have them. We take every action we possibly can now in light of how we want to be remembered then. Let me give you a practical illustration of how this worked at the Hawkins house one morning.

As our family was in a morning departure frenzy, one of the Hawkins Team, who will remain unnamed, jetted out of the garage in our new Honda Civic, only to come to an abrupt halt on the grill of my Jeep Grand Cherokee parked in the driveway 15 meters to the rear. Now, what you need to know to capture the moment with the same intensity that I felt, was that I had just gotten the Civic back after 11 weeks in the shop and a $9,000 repair bill! Needless to say, my first reaction as I watched another insurance claim explode in my yard was to go absolutely apoplectic (emotionally ballistic). And for about three seconds, I did just that as I raced to the point of impact and did some quick battle damage assessment.

However, it was there at the back end of one of my cars and the front end of the other, both damaged, that God helped me out in the way that only God can do and whispered, "What do you want the driver to remember about how you handled this?" And with that, my natural reaction was transformed into a supernatural response, as I calmly put my arm around the driver and say, "Hey, it's OK, it's OK — you're alright, and it's only stuff — it'll be OK."

Was I mad? Sure I was. Did I have to show it? Nope! Not with two things going for me: God's power and a clear picture of how I want that driver to remember me when she goes to my funeral.

Want help with your success? Visit me at CrossRoads Contemporary Chapel or call the FLC at 545-1760.

Baseball re-branded in Columbus

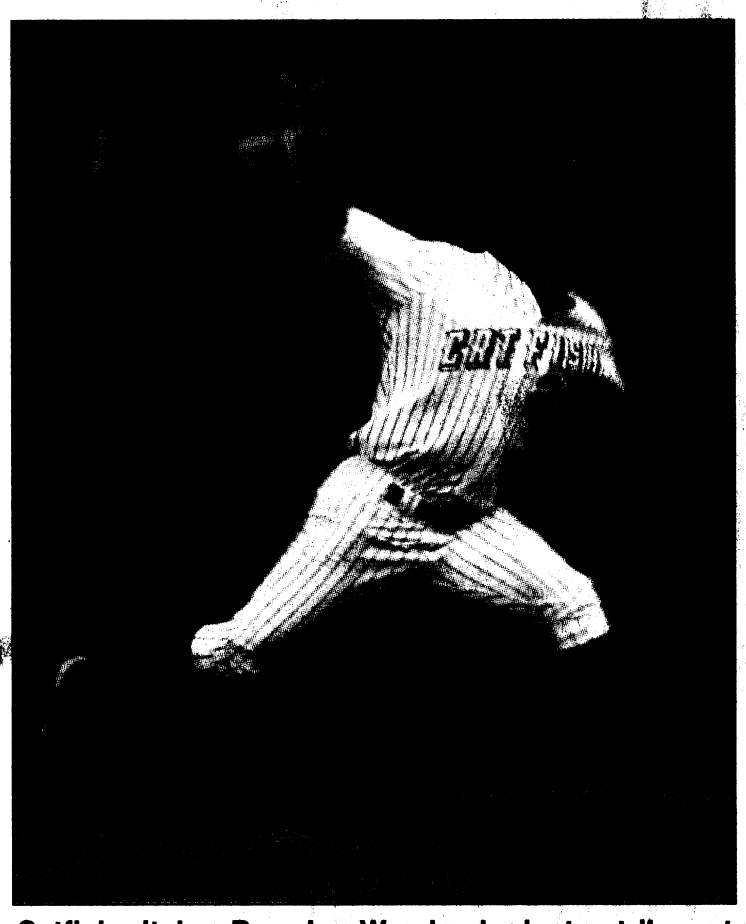
Catfish give Columbus win opening day

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

Minor league baseball has been a fixture in Columbus for many years. But during the past two seasons, the seats at Golden Park haven't had many people to fill them.

That all changed this season with the entrance of the Columbus Catfish. The Catfish, originally the South Georgia Waves, were re-branded, given a new name to better suit the city of Columbus.

"Columbus can officially call this their team," said Megan Thomas, public relations director for the Catfish. "Last year, the Waves came in 10 days before the start of the season, and there wasn't much of a fan base. The year prior, the RedStixx had announced they were leaving Columbus, so many people didn't come out to support a team they knew was leaving."



Before the season began, the word began to spread about the Catfish.

"We wanted everyone to know that we had a team that was here to stay," Thomas said. "All we needed was the city's support."

At the first home game on April 8, the city of Columbus showed their support for the team. More than 1,100 people attended the game, which Columbus won, 5-4, over the Capital City Bombers.

"The turnout for the game was great for this team," Thomas said. "After the game, the players were saying how much they enjoyed playing in front of them and how much it boosted their game."

Third-baseman Andy LaRoche said that he enjoys playing for the fans.

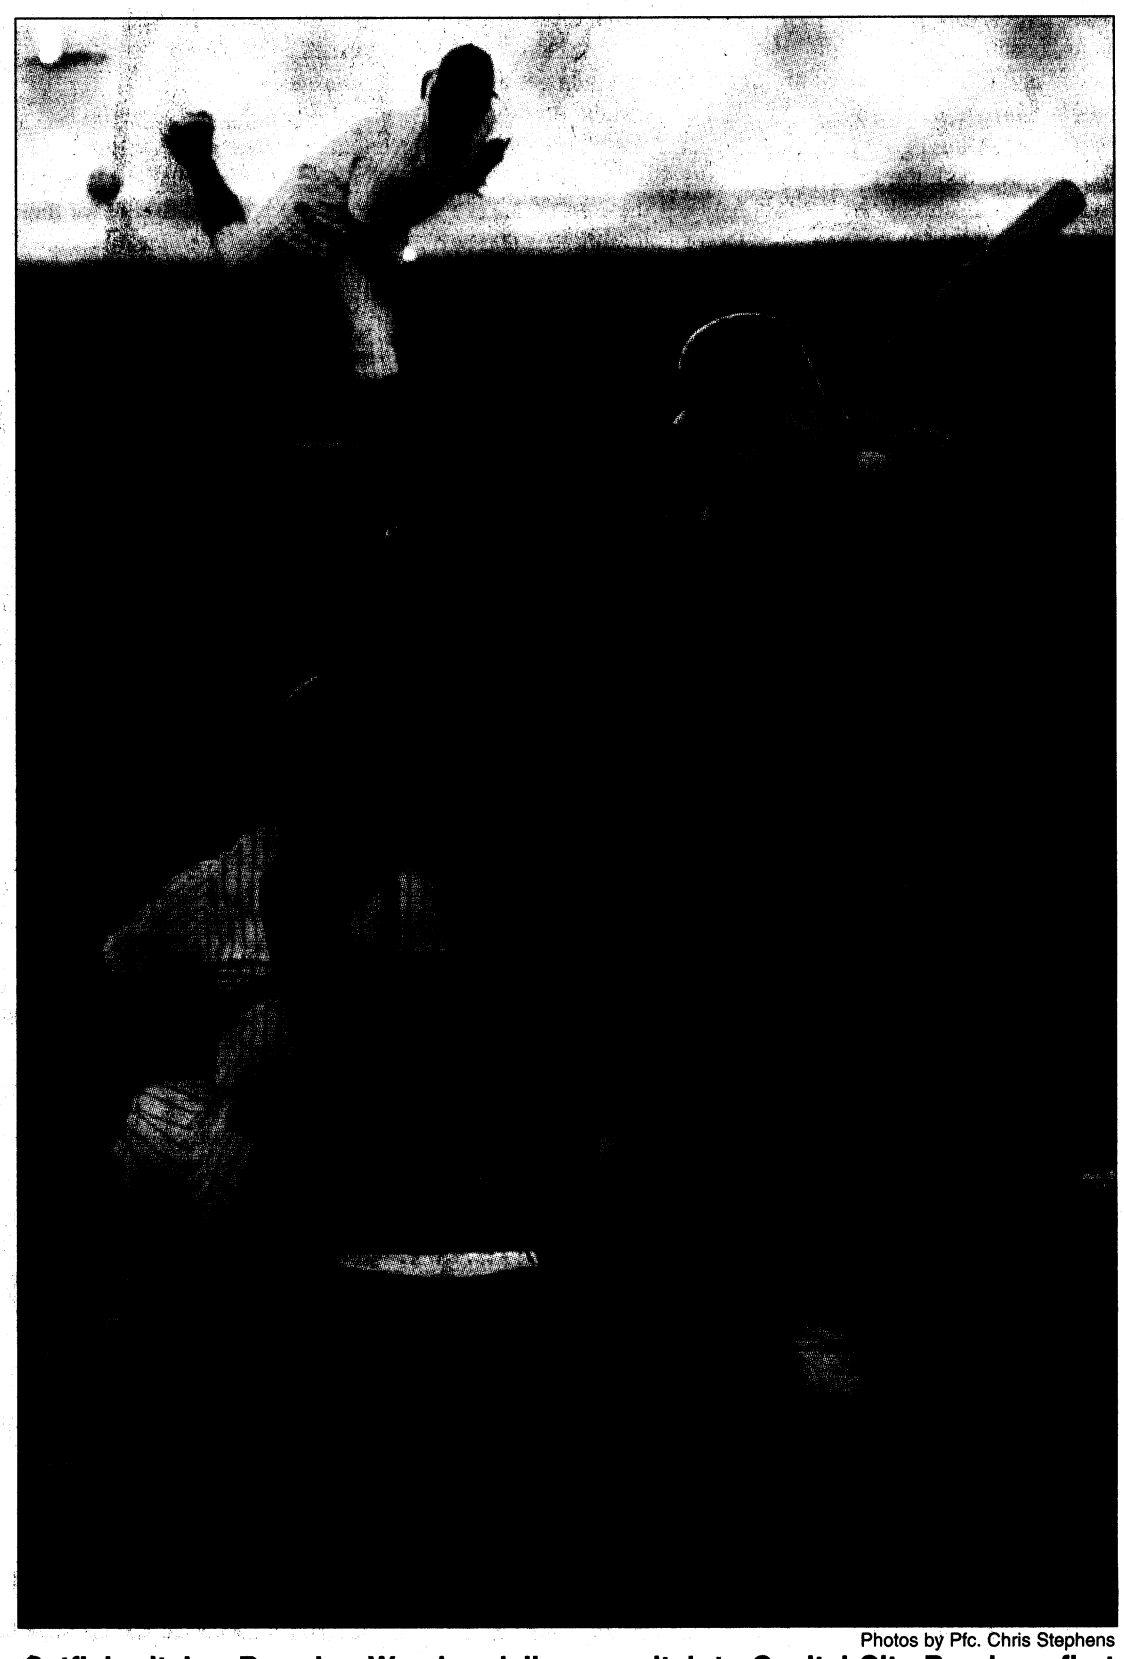
Catfish pitcher Brandon Weeden looks to strike out his next batter during the fourth inning.

"This is the whole reason we're out here," he said. "This game is for them. But if there aren't any fans in the stands, then it's sometimes hard to give it your all. But, when the seats are packed and the fans are all cheering for you, then that's a motivation to go all out."

LaRoche, along with teammate, Mike Nixon, said they feel very blessed to be paid to play a game they've played all of their lives.

"This is something that most kids dream about — playing professional baseball," Nixon said.

"Knowing that I have been blessed with this opportunity, I don't take it for granted. I'm thankful for where I'm at, and I feel I need to show that by giving it my all, every time I step on the field."



Nixon also said he doesn't just give it his all for himself.

"I have many friends who I played high-school baseball with, who will never make it to this level," the 20-year old catcher said. "I'm playing for them. Also, I'm playing the town I grew up in. I was always told to never forget who you are and where you came from. That's something I'll always know."

Minor league baseball is different from major league in a sense that the fans are a lot closer to the players.

"The fans can actually reach out and shake the players' hands and get their autographs, like it's nothing," Thomas said. "And who knows, the next autograph someone gets, could be a future hall-of-famer."

The Catfish have many different promotions for this year's home games including Thirsty Thursdays where all drinks are $1; Fireworks Saturdays with a feature fireworks show after the game, no matter the outcome; and Family Sundays when kids will have the opportunity to step onto the field and run the bases at the end of the game.

Catfish pitcher Brandon Weeden delivers a pitch to Capital City Bombers first baseman Ian Bladergroen during the first inning of the Catfish's home opener.

Tickets are $5 for general seating, $6 for field box seats. Military tickets are $4 for general seating. Sky boxes and suites are also available for purchase.

"For a small price, this team and organization promises you three hours of jam-packed entertainment on and off the field," Thomas said. "It's a great atmosphere and it brings back the life in Columbus baseball."

Post ready to kick off intramural season

Sports builds unit cohesion, player says

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

Today's the last day to register for the annual U.S. Army Infantry Center Softball Tournament, which is scheduled for April 24 and 25 at Gowdy Field.

The pre-season, single-elimination tournament is designed to prepare teams for the upcoming season, which will begin May 17, said Carol Gearheart, sports specialist.

The tournament is open to teams from all active-duty units, including activated Reserve units.

Units deployed last year in support of Operation Iraqi Freedom, such as the 3rd Brigade, 3rd Infantry Division, and 36th Engineer Group will be able to showcase their talents in the tournament.

"This will be a great opportunity for our unit to show what we're made of," said Staff Sgt. Brian Locke, Headquarters and Headquarters Company, 36th Engineer Group.

"We didn't have the chance to participate last year because we were deployed, so this year, we're ready to compete against the other units."

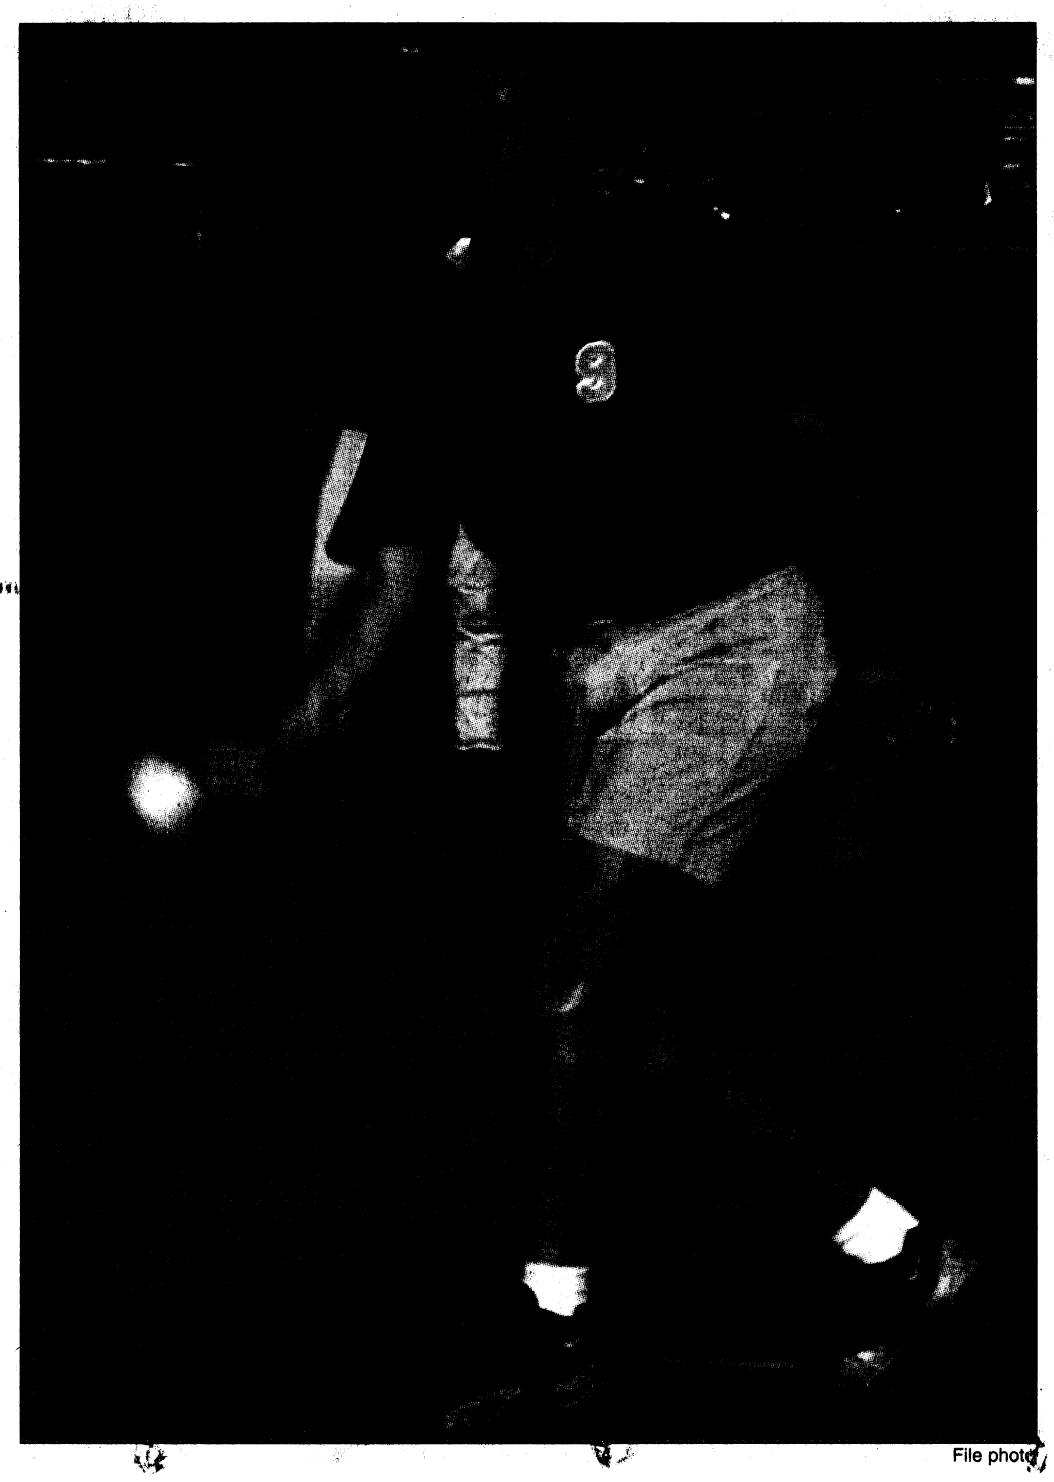
Participation in team sports is a great way to build unit cohesion, Locke said.

And it offers an alternative to regular P.T.

"Most of the time, P.T. is the same," he said. "By playing a sport, you get to do something different than what you do as a unit every morning."

Softball's not the only sport Fort Benning athletes are warming up for.

With the summer months ahead, Fort Benning is gearing up various intramural sports, including volleyball. The U.S. Army Infantry Center Volleyball Tournament will kick off Monday at Santiago Fitness Center.



Volleyball is something different for units to compete in, said Jesse Moore, sports specialist.

It's a chance for Soldiers who may not be good in basketball, football or softball to compete in a sport competitively, he said.

Basketball season is also around the corner, with the season scheduled to start June 1. Games will be played at Audie Murphy Fitness Center, Kefurt Gym and Santiago Fitness Center.

To register for the softball tournament or the upcoming ball season, call Carol Gearheart at 544-4511 and provide a unit roster, a point of contact and a telephone number.

To sign your unit team up for basketball, call Fred Woods at 545-1940.

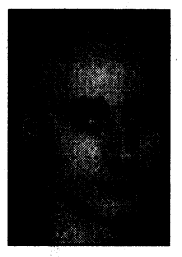
The tournament is held each year before softball season begins to allow teams to get ready for the season.
It also gives teams that can't play during regular season because of mission requirements the opportunity to compete, said Carol Gearheart, sports specialist.



Give college athletes some money

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

In the realm of college sports, it is illegal to pay college athletes money or give them gifts for their participation. But some athletes break those rules and accept money and gifts on the side. If caught, players lose their eligibility to play.

I disagree with the whole thing. Athletes in college deserve to be paid at least a little bit of money for their play. I think it's only fair for all of their hard work. Most athletes can't get a job because practices and games consume most of their time. So how are they supposed to go out and have fun with their friends if they have no money? How are they supposed to have transportation? How are they supposed to stay in contact with their friends back home and on campus? The pay phones are all well and good, but those cost money. Having a cell phone would make it cheaper each month for the athletes to make necessary calls.

Athletes kinda get the short end of the stick, don't you think? Aren't they young adults just like the rest of us between the ages of 18-24? Don't you think that maybe they like to do some of the same things we do? Forgive them for being gifted in a sport. Is what they're being told true — you can either play sports and have no life whatsoever outside of school, practice and games, or you can just go to school like everyone else and get a job so you can earn money to go out with your friends? Isn't being an athlete sort of like a job? I'll bet most of them put in as many hours practicing and games as those who work a 40-hour week.

Plus, let's not forget the fact that everyone involved in college sports is making money off these athletes, except for the athletes. Tell me that Adidas, Nike, Reebok and other companies don't make millions, maybe even billions, off them. Tell me the NCAA doesn't make millions off of these guys. What about the schools? How much money are they making? I don't care if most of these athletes are getting a free ride to college. They earned their scholarship. Why should they have to be broke because they are gifted athletes?

Are they supposed to get money from Mom and Dad at home? People forget that more than 30 percent of all college athletes come from homes where parents can barely provide for their families.

After doing some research, I found a startling fact. In 2001, CBS signed a $6 billion deal with the NCAA to televise the NCAA tournament. And that's just for men's basketball.

Now, you're telling me that the athletes can't get a little bit of that. I'm not saying a big chunk, but at least some money to make car payments, maybe have a cell phone and some entertainment.

They work for the universities and how are they thanked in return? Free travel to games.

Whoop-de-do!

Maybe that's why many of the athletes are jumping to the pros so quickly — because they're tired of not having money to spend on things they want. Maybe that's also why some athletes are skipping college altogether.

Wouldn't it be cool if one day all the athletes playing NCAA sports decided not to play until they were paid for their services?

Maybe that would get the message across that they are not puppets used only to entertain these bureaucratic aristocrats and fill up their already fat pockets.

Come on, give them some money, and all this scandal will go away.

Only then will you see the best games any of the sports have every played.

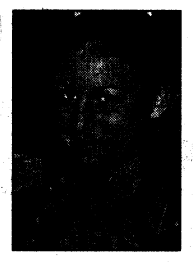
Give me a break! Athletes get paid plenty

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

"Athletes in college deserve to be paid at least a little bit of money for their play. I think it's only fair for all of their hard work ... Athletes kind of get the short end of the stick, don't you think?"

Pfc. Chris Stephens

GIVE ME A BREAK! Stephens' argument here is that these poor, under-appreciated college athletes — many of whom are on scholarship, I might add — should be paid to play for their colleges because:



- They don't have time to get a job because practices and games are time-consuming.
- They don't have time to have fun with their friends.
- They're too poor to call home on the pay phone, and really, shouldn't they have cell phones, anyway?

First of all, a good portion of college athletes are on a scholarship, which means their tuition, their lodging, their meals — it's all taken care of. And not just for the season they play their sport — all year.

And Stephens failed to mention that they already receive a monthly stipend during the season and up to $2,000 in the off season.

So, if I was a college athlete, I would get a job and save up my money during the summer and the season when I'm not undergoing the tortuous task of playing college sports. And if I wasn't on scholarship, I would stop to consider that it's a choice to play college sports.

Second of all, I haven't noticed any shortage of "fun" among college athletes lately.

In fact, I've been reading about it in the newspapers.

It's amazing that these enslaved ball players manage to find time for highly publicized alcohol and drug abuse, sex scandals, problem gambling and other such troubles with their — what was it — "40-hour work week."

Finally, let us not forget that these underprivileged athletes are not the only kids coming from a poor background. They aren't the only kids who "can't afford to call home on the pay phone."

(And if you have enough money to engage in binge drinking and gambling — as studies show college athletes do considerably more of than their peers — not getting paid enough to play college sports isn't the reason they can't afford to call home.)

They're not the only students working hard.

Most kids in college these days have to earn their scholarships using their heads, because they weren't blessed with a good arm.

And if they can't compete for that scholarship, they're taking out student loans, seeking grants, working one, two, maybe three jobs to put themselves through school. How much "fun" do you think they're having?

A free college education should be enough. The gateway to a professional career should be enough.

Yeah, the schools are making money from their sports teams, but that money is used to improve the school, the quality of its education, the quality of its sports programs — including the minor sports that don't receive media attention.

"Forgive them for being gifted," Stephens says.

Well, forgive me for not having much sympathy. These athletes are not the poor, defenseless "puppets" Stephens makes them out to be. They're not victims.

They're not being forced into the pros (and I'm sure that leap has something to do with the six-figure salary and 15 minutes of fame). And they're most certainly not being forced to skip college.

So if these kids want to stage a walk-out, be my guest. Maybe they'll learn to appreciate what they're given after they throw it all away.

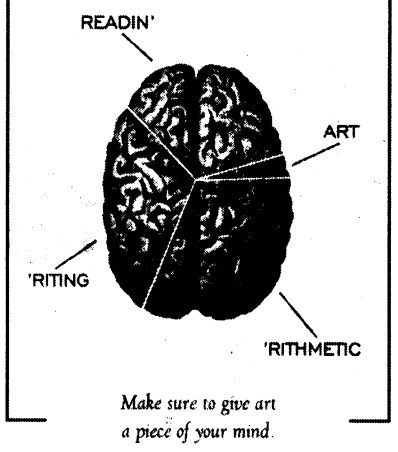
THERE'S NOT ENOUGH ART IN OUR SCHOOLS.

NO WONDER PEOPLE THINK

CARAVAGGIO

IS A GUY ON THE SOPRANOS.

It's quite hard to believe. Here's a 16th-century Baroque master whose bold naturalistic painting style first created a sensation, then a movement. A guy whose life was filled with the turbulence and excess of a dozen Mario Puzo novels. A guy who, while troubled, ultimately found redemption — and immortality — in his art. But does the kid next door even know who Caravaggio is?



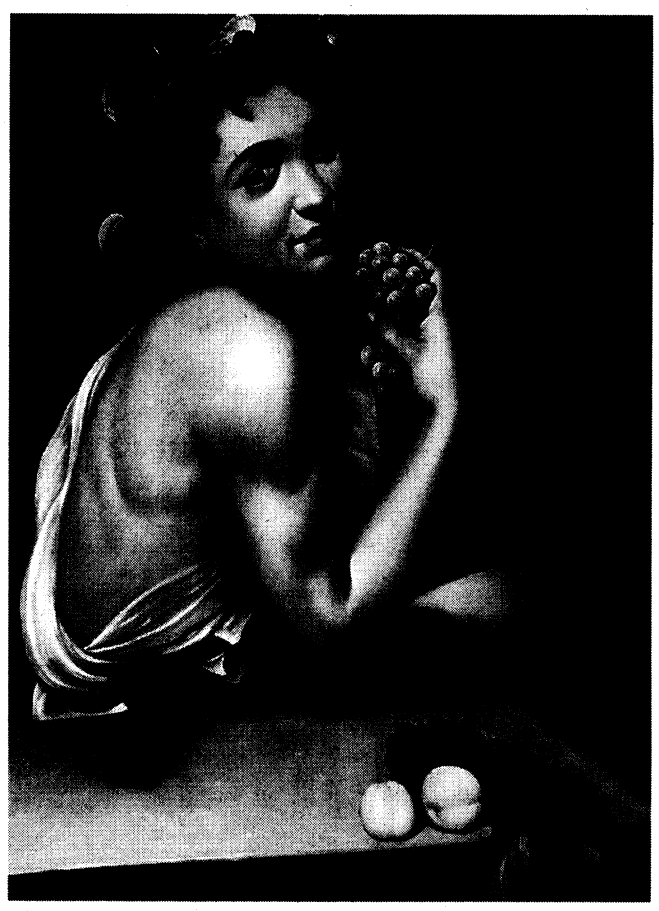
If you're looking for Caravaggio, you're very, very cold.

Fuhgedaboutit.

This loss is incalculable. Especially when you consider how much children can learn from the conflicted life of someone like Michelangelo Caravaggio.

He grew up in less than ideal circumstances. Much of his family perished in the plague, and he spent much of his youth on the notoriously treacherous streets of Rome. As a young man, he labored beneath others much less talented than he and had difficulty making a living. He faced adversity at every turn.

Make sure to give art a piece of your mind.



And when his legendary temper threatened to get the best of him, he created his most vital masterpieces. The angry contrast between light and darkness that he felt deep in his soul now hangs in stark evidence in countless museums around the world.

Caravaggio's body of work is not only a great example of the Baroque period, but also a case study in the importance of art as an outlet. One we're fast removing from our kids' lives.

AN IMPORTANT LESSON.

Study after study shows that an overwhelming majority of parents believe the arts are integral to their children's education. They like that dance and music teach kids to be more tolerant and open. That painting and drama allow children to express themselves creatively. And that the arts help to promote individuality, while bolstering self-confidence and improving overall academic performance.

If only they knew that their kids spend less time in arts classes than they do watching commercials.

A self-portrait of Caravaggio as Bacchus. Let's be honest; he wouldn't last 10 minutes on The Sopranos.

LET'S CUT TO THE CHASE.

If the arts are indeed a vital part of your child's education and well-being (and they are), then you should demand your child's fair share. To find out what you can do to help, or for more information about the benefits of arts education, please visit us at AmericansForTheArts.org. Because, as Michelangelo Caravaggio would no doubt tell you, a life without art is torture.

ART. ASK FOR MORE.

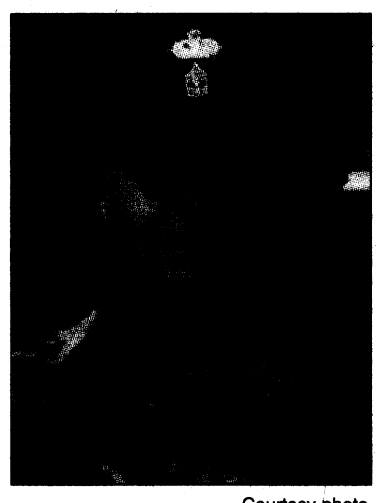
Accident kills 507th 1st Sgt.

Darsi Busler
USAIC Public Affairs Office

A Fort Benning Soldier was killed April 12 in a motorcycle accident as he returned from visiting his family in Florida.

According to initial reports, 1st Sgt. Ty Sariego, 39, was trying to avoid a deer when he lost control of his motorcycle on Alabama Highway 165, six miles northeast of Eufaula.

Sariego, who was assigned to B Company, 1st Battalion (Airborne), 507th Infantry Regiment, lost consciousness and was given CPR en route to the Alabama Medical Center in an attempt to revive him. He was pronounced dead at 6:23 p.m.



A memorial service will be held today at 2 p.m. in the Infantry Center Chapel.

"He was just a great person, a great Soldier, and a great leader. He was definitely a major asset to the battalion," said Lt. Col. Aidis Zunde, battalion commander.

"You'd be hard pressed to find someone that didn't like him ... he was a very easy going kind of guy who liked good jokes," said one of Sariego's Black Hat instructors, who wished to remain anonymous.

"He was a hundred percent military all the way, but at the same time, knew how to make the job enjoyable," he said.

Sariego is survived by his wife, Patricia, and two sons, Jonathan and Ty Jr.

608th returns from Iraq

Spc. Nikki St. Amant

Staff Sgt. Aaron Blankenship, 608th Ordnance Company, 13th Corps Support Battalion, holds his five-day-old son, Aaron Jr., for the first time at the unit's redeployment ceremony Wednesday after spending a year in Iraq in support of OIF.

One hundred and forty members of the 608th Ordnance Company, 13th Corps Support Battalion, returned Wednesday afternoon from a one-year deployment in Iraq.

The plane carrying the 608th Soldiers, along with Reserve Soldiers of the 741st and 813th Adjutant General companies, touched down at Lawson Army Airfield on time at about 2:20 p.m.

Kim Douglass drove 14 hours from Maryland to welcome her son, Sgt. Carl Douglass, a crane operator with the 608th who was promoted while in Iraq.

"I was worried sick while he was gone," she said, "but I am so happy he is home now."

Kim said that while she doesn't completely support the war in Iraq, she is behind the troops 100 percent.

Jacquelin Simmons, mother of Cpl. Ron Simmons, said the worry she endured while her son was deployed tested her faith but, in the end, made her stronger.

"The feeling of having him home is unexplainable," she said. "He's the only son I have."

Ronnie's 5-year-old son, Darien Simmons, said having his dad finally on the ground is exciting.

Staff Sgt. Aaron Blankenship returns home a new dad after his son, Aaron Blankenship Jr. was born April 16.

Aaron Sr. said it feels great to finally be home and with

Civilians to enter new personnel system

Darsi Busler
USAIC Public Affairs Office

If implementation goes as planned, Fort Benning civilian employees will be incorporated into a new civilian personnel system late in fiscal 2006.

The National Security Personnel System will introduce changes in how the Defense Department recruits, hires, pays, promotes, disciplines and fires its civilian employees.

"The NSPS represents a unique opportunity to develop a flexible and fair system that will help us attract, retain, reward, and grow a civilian work force to meet the national security demands of the 21st century," said Reginald J. Brown, assistant secretary of the Army (Manpower and Reserve Affairs) in a memo to Major Army Command commanders earlier this month.

The NSPS will not change rules for health and life insurance benefits, retirement, leave and attendance policies or firefighter pay.

The new system will be flexible and will streamline processes to bring employees on board, said Hans Knoff, director of the Civilian Personnel Advisory Center. "It will change who, how, and how fast we can get new employees," he said.

One of the biggest changes between the old and new systems is how civilian employees will be paid. NSPS will move away from the General Schedule grade classification and create three or

Best Ranger Competition underway

Bridgett Siter
Bayonet staff

When Maj. Michael McNally speaks of this year's Best Ranger Competition, using terms like "traditional" and "historical," he's not referring to the event's usual fare — the Buddy Run or Night Stakes or Darby Queen. No sir, McNally's got a few tricks up his sleeve, a few "mystery events" that would surely make Maj. Robert Rogers — the Rogers of Rogers' original Rangers — plum proud.

And that's all McNally has to say about that subject.

"Don't want to give away any secrets," he said with a gleam in his eye Tuesday, after giving the competitors a skeletal overview of what they can expect in the competition, which started today at 6 a.m.

McNally's the operations officer for the competition's host unit, the Ranger Training Brigade. As such, he's the one to credit or blame for blueprinting a plan that's likely to drop him a few notches in the popularity polls.

"I might make some people mad at me," he said.

With only 19 teams in this year's event, less than half the usual number at the start of competition, McNally and the 4th Ranger Training Battalion cadre who run the show figured they'd better throw in a few curves. After all, the decline in participation, a direct result of the Army's increased optempo with the war on terrorism,

> "Our goal is to design quality events that will stress them to their very limits. That's how you weed them out and identify the best Ranger team."
> Maj. Michael McNally
> Ranger Training Brigade operations officer

may create too much down time and a decrease in optempo during the competition.

The start times for certain events are set in stone, McNally explained. So if 19 teams finish an event in less than half the time it would've taken 50 teams, there'll be far too much time to rest between events. And rest is the antithesis of the BRC, hence the lack of sleep time scheduled into the 60-hour event.

"Our goal is to design quality events that will stress them and push them to their very limits," McNally said. "That's how you weed them out and identify the best Ranger team."

Surprise events aren't the only changes in this year's competition. The scoring system, though still relatively complicated, has been simplified. One no longer needs an engineering degree to decipher it, McNally said.

SPIN YOUR WHEELS

Try Earth-friendly fuel

Melissa House
Bayonet staff

Call me a granola. I never have any trouble remembering Earth Day. It was yesterday. So was my husband's birthday. I'll get you a card today, dear.

But you know me, I'm the one who recycles everything I can. I sometimes have to pull homework or other important school papers out of the recycling bin because I was a little too zealous in my efforts.

But Monday, I got hit with a totally different sort of bug — a cousin of recycling, so to speak.

I was in Uptown Columbus and saw a new Georgia license plate with an aspen leaf. Under the leaf were the words "alternative fueled vehicle." The car was your standard, run-of-the-mill Ford Taurus. I had no idea that Ford, or anyone else, had such vehicles on the market.

So, as someone who's looking to replace an 8-year-old minivan sometime in the next few years, someone obsessed with gas mileage, but also needing to cart around three boys who will surely be over 6 feet tall in a few years, I thought I'd find out more about this "earth friendly" vehicle. What I found was the Taurus has quite a few friends in all shapes and sizes, running on a variety of alternative fuels. Some are already on dealer's lots and the rest are due out near the end of this model year.

If I want to go with compressed natural gas, I have a few choices. There's the Honda Civic, Ford F-150 and Crown Victoria, Chevy Silverado and GMC Sierra. All have at least ultra low emissions. And the good news is I can get fuel for them right here in Columbus on Victory Drive.

My earth-friendly Taurus driver has the best of both worlds. His model, a flexible fueled vehicle, runs on either unleaded gas or E85 fuel- which is 85 percent ethanol and 15 percent gasoline — or a combination of both in his tank at the same time.

I did a quick search of alternative fuel sites and since there are no E85 sites within 100 miles of Fort Benning, I'm guessing he's running mostly on unleaded around here. The Mercury Sable and Mountaineer, Ford Explorer and Explorer Sport Trac, Chevy Tahoe, Suburban and Silverado and GMC Yukon and Sierra and even three Mercedes C320 models, round out the FFV list.

There are two bi-fuel vehicles out there as well. They carry two tanks — one for AF and one for unleaded. One model of the F-150 runs on compressed natural gas or unleaded, the other on liquefied propane or unleaded. Liquefied propane is also available at three locations in Columbus.

And now that we've all done our 2003 income taxes, I'll point out that there are both federal and state tax incentives for owners of AFVs to the tune of two to five thousand dollars.

And I don't mean to leave out the most fuel-efficient cars out there, the hybrid electrical vehicles that operate on an internal combustion engine and an electrical motor. They're Hondas Civic and Insight, Toyota Prius, Chevy Silverado and GMC Sierra. These vehicles convert energy wasted during coasting and braking in to electricity which is stored in the battery until it is needed. The mid-sized Prius gets an unbelievable 60 mpg in the city and 51 on the highway, and unlike a purely electric car, doesn't have to be plugged in somewhere and charged.

And now I definitely don't want that Toyota Sequoia my husband thinks I need. It's the one that scores zero out of 10 for emissions on the Environmental Protection Agency's list of "green" vehicles. My current clunker rates an eight, and I'll consider it my way of helping the environment.

Rangers put on great show

Erin A. Nash
Bayonet staff

I don't like to exercise. My personal philosophy is run only when being chased.

So the first time I ever heard about the Best Ranger Competition, I thought, "Are these guys crazy?" Five years ago, I went out and watched some events. Crazy? No. Awesome? Definitely.

In July 1981, the Chairborne Rangers — a civilian organization that supports Rangers — asked the Ranger Training Department to design and conduct a "Ranger Olympics."

Dick Leandri wanted to honor his friend, Lt. Gen. David E. Grange Jr., former director of the Ranger Department and former commanding general of Fort Benning, with a perpetual competition. Thus, the David E. Grange Jr. Best Ranger Competition was born.

This year marks the 21st anniversary of the competition — there was no competition in 1991 because of Operation Desert Storm and no competition in 2003 because of the war on terrorism.

So, with all those historical facts, I invite each and every one of you to join me and many others this weekend in watching and supporting these Rangers.

A lot of these Rangers have seen combat, and some have just returned from overseas. What better way to support our troops than to come out and cheer them on?

And what they do will take your breath away.

The competitors start out at 6 a.m. today with a PT test, and go for 60 continuous hours with no programmed sleep.

The first day consists of a spot jump out of a helicopter, marksmanship test and a road march that lasts into the wee hours of the morning.

The second day has Day Ranger Stakes and the Prusik climb, held at Todd Field.

Day three includes a water confidence course and helocast at Victory Pond and of course, the Darby Queen obstacle course.

There are many other events that haven't been announced, including a surprise event for competitors.

I have to say my favorite event to watch is the water confidence course. By this time, the Rangers are exhausted and just all-around drained. They climb up the ladder (drawing gasps from the crowd when they miss a rung or two) and walk (and sometimes run, more gasps) across a beam over the water, shimmy down the rope, touch the Ranger tab and drop into the water.

This year, a special guest will be retired Lt. Col. Joe Rippetoe. Rippetoe's son, Capt. Russell B. Rippetoe, was killed in action on April 3, 2003, in Iraq. Rippetoe was with 3rd Battalion, 75th Ranger Regiment.

Joe will award a bronzed combat boot trophy named in honor of his son to the Ranger team who wins the road march event.

So come out and join the new Rangers, old Rangers, friends, family, Soldiers and everyone else who will be out there.

These guys don't have to do it; they want to do it.

I would be remiss if I didn't mention my husband is in the competition. Good luck to him and his partner, and of course, the other teams.

Thank you for my freedom and thank you for the great show this weekend.

Food for thought, help for the hungry

I confess, I've got something for my mailman. It started a few years back. He left a note in my mailbox, and I thought, well why not? What will it hurt, just this once?

We've been conducting this once-a-year rendezvous ever since.

I know, I know, it's a terrible cliché, but it's a healthy relationship — a bit of give and take. And though I'm certain my husband knows what's going on, as long as there's food on the table when he gets home, he's not one to complain. He's a team player.

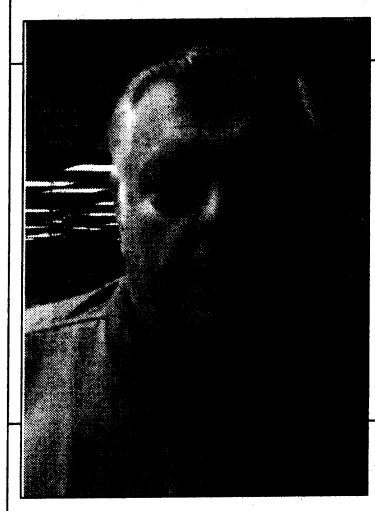
Well it's that time of year again, and any day now, the mailman will leave a note in my box.

It's time to come clean. It's time to clean out the pantry.

It's time for the annual Stamp Out Hunger Campaign.

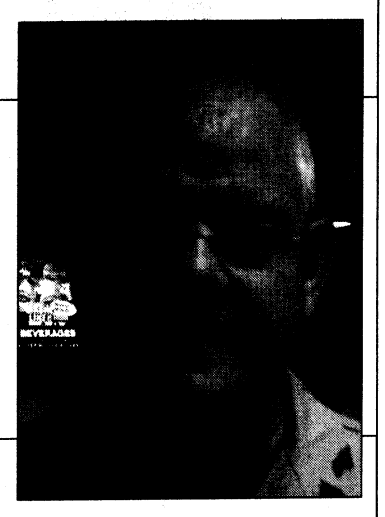
Join me May 8. Fill a bag or box with nonperishable foods in unbreakable containers and leave it by your mailbox. Your mail carrier will pick it up and deliver it to a local collection point, where it'll be weighed before being donated to a food bank.

Here on Fort Benning, all the food — every bite — will be turned over to the post's food locker, where it'll be distributed to the families of Soldiers who find themselves in dire straits.



Fort Benning's food locker relies largely on the Stamp Out Hunger Campaign, which accounts for as much as half of the locker's annual food supply.

Last year, Fort Benning folks fell short of our usual generous donation, probably because so many of our Soldiers were deployed and their families took the opportunity to head home for the duration.



Let's see if we can't make up for it this year. I'll leave two bags for the mailman if you will.

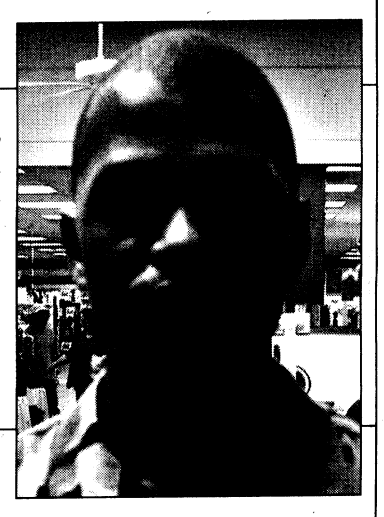
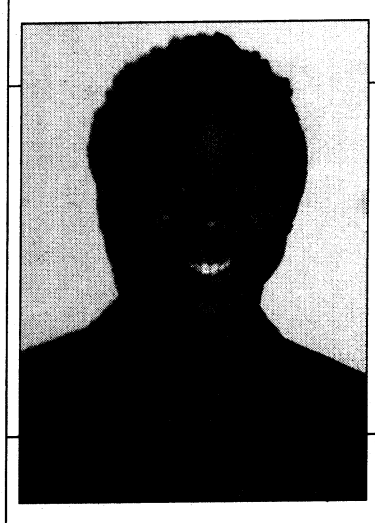
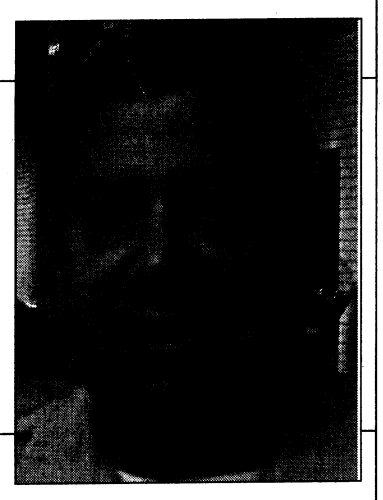
What are some of the more creative ways to recycle?



Retired Tech. Sgt. Tommy Thomas, Pine Mountain, Ga., — "Have an organization fundraiser. If the whole organization collects cans and bottles, then you can raise a lot of money."



Sgt. 1st Class William Guyton, 877th Engineer Battalion — "Take egg crates and make decorations out of them for around the house. You can also plant seeds in bottles."



Retired Chief Warrant Officer Jack Lyner, Wedowee, Ala. — "Play a game with collecting recyclable items. Whoever gets the most, gets a prize."

Staff Sgt. Walter Smith, BNCOC — "Do something in the neighborhood to make the area look better. If everyone pitches in, a lot can be accomplished."

Spc. Rominica Wade, Headquarters and Headquarters Company, U.S. Army Garrison — "Have some type of contest or build something out of the items. You can always use stuff for beautification."

Retired Sgt. 1st Class Fabio Vargas, Columbus — "Save anything you can make useful. Landscaping around the house is something I like to do."

Soldiers from 1st Bn., 507th Inf. Regt., march into the Airborne Awards Festival April 15 held on Eubanks Field. All airborne units were represented by their colors at the event.

Former 'hunter from sky' returns to Benning for Airborne Festival

Pfc. Chris Stephens

Retired Chief Warrant Officer Thad Selman never expected to see the airborne legacy carried on. A member of the original airborne test platoon, he never even expected to make it home from World War II.

But somehow Selman — and every other member of the platoon, for that matter — did make it home. And some 50 years later, he hasn't forgotten his roots.

The paratrooper was on hand for the 27th annual Airborne Awards Festival on Eubanks Field April 15.

The festival, hosted by 1st Battalion (Airborne), 507th Infantry, was an opportunity to honor and remember those who didn't make it home.

> "When we were going through (airborne operations), all you could do was jump out of the plane and wait to land."
> Retired Chief Warrant Officer Thad Selman
> Member of the original airborne test platoon

But it also gave the former "hunter from the sky" and his fellow veterans an in-depth look at today's airborne Soldier through demonstrations and some hands-on time with a few of today's weapons.

"A lot has changed since I began as an airborne Soldier," Selman said. "The training they provide today is better than what we received."

The festival was also chock-full of aerial action. Fort Benning's parachute demonstration team, better known as the Silver Wings, made its first jump since 2000, followed by the annual airborne assault on Fryar Drop Zone.

"The airborne assault shows how powerful our Army is," said Command Sgt. Maj. Donovan Watts, 1st Bn., (Airborne) 507th Inf., command sergeant major. "When we can project ourselves anywhere in the world, at any time, and under any conditions, it is one of the rawest displays of our national power."

The demonstrations were a little different than the tricks Selman and his cohorts used in their day.

"It's amazing what people can do today with a parachute," Selman said. "When we were going through it, all you could do was jump out of the plane and wait to land. You couldn't do all of these tricks you see them doing today."

Benning, Columbus celebrate Law Day, landmark case

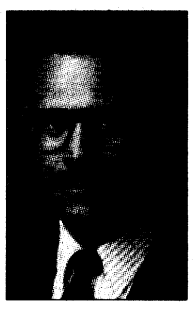
Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

Standing before a crowded room of his peers, he remembered vividly where it all began.

It was 40 years ago when this day first took on special meaning for him.

He was 17 years old then — an ambitious, young black man caught in the middle of an era in which racism was the norm.

Despite that, he entered a local essay competition, which he won, and attended his first Law Day luncheon to receive his award.



Four decades later, on April 15, Congressman Sanford Bishop again attended the annual luncheon — this time as its guest speaker.

"This is such a special opportunity for me, because that first Law Day luncheon was truly what heightened and peaked my interest in the law," Bishop said.

Every year, in cities across America, members of the legal community gather to celebrate the country's legal system, the milestone laws it enacts and the cultural changes that come about because of them.

Fort Benning's legal professionals join forces with community legal professionals to celebrate, this year at the Columbus Trade Center.

Adding to the day's meaning for Bishop was the theme of the luncheon — a celebration of the 50th anniversary of the 1954 Supreme Court decision in Brown v. The Board of Education.

Bishop

Bishop was 7 when that ruling was announced, and he said he remembers very clearly the night it hit the six o'clock news.

"At the time, I didn't know the significance of that decision," he said. "But my parents did, and they sat me down and explained to me how it would open up so many opportunities for me."

And indeed it did, he said. It was because of Brown, because of the precedent that decision set, that Bishop was able to attend Emery University and become a lawyer, he said.

It was because of that decision that he was admitted to the Columbus Bar — known as the Columbus Lawyer's Club at the time — and became one of its first three black members.

"My parents said to me, 'You will have opportunities and doors swing open for you, and you must be prepared,'" Bishop recalled.

"And it is a very emotional experience to see the changes in my lifetime that my parents predicted," he said, "to fulfill what they told me when I was 7 years old."

But more than that, Bishop said, Brown served as the basis for the civil rights movement and all the civil rights acts that followed.

"This decision changed the history and culture of this country forever," he said. "It is an understatement to say it was a landmark decision."

Today's children face a better America than the one he faced as a child — maybe not perfect, but better, Bishop said.

"Perhaps we're not where we want to be, and perhaps we're not where we're going to be, but as José Williams used to say, 'Thank God we ain't where we used to be,'" he said.

Among the kids recognized for their art and essay submissions were nine Fort Benning children who competed in the post's contest:

- Sixth to eighth grade essay: 1st place, Kate Vail; 2nd place, Breanne La Camera; 3rd place, Damias Lyles
- Third to fifth grade art: 1st place, Laura Becker; 2nd place, Marinel Rincon; 3rd place, Omari Anyabwile
- Kindergarten to second grade art: 1st place, Ashley Cecil; 2nd place, Victoria Montgomery; 3rd place, Joshua Checa.

Benning is home to 'miracles'

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

Fort Benning has a special distinction among the Army's many installations — it's a place where dreams and wishes come true.

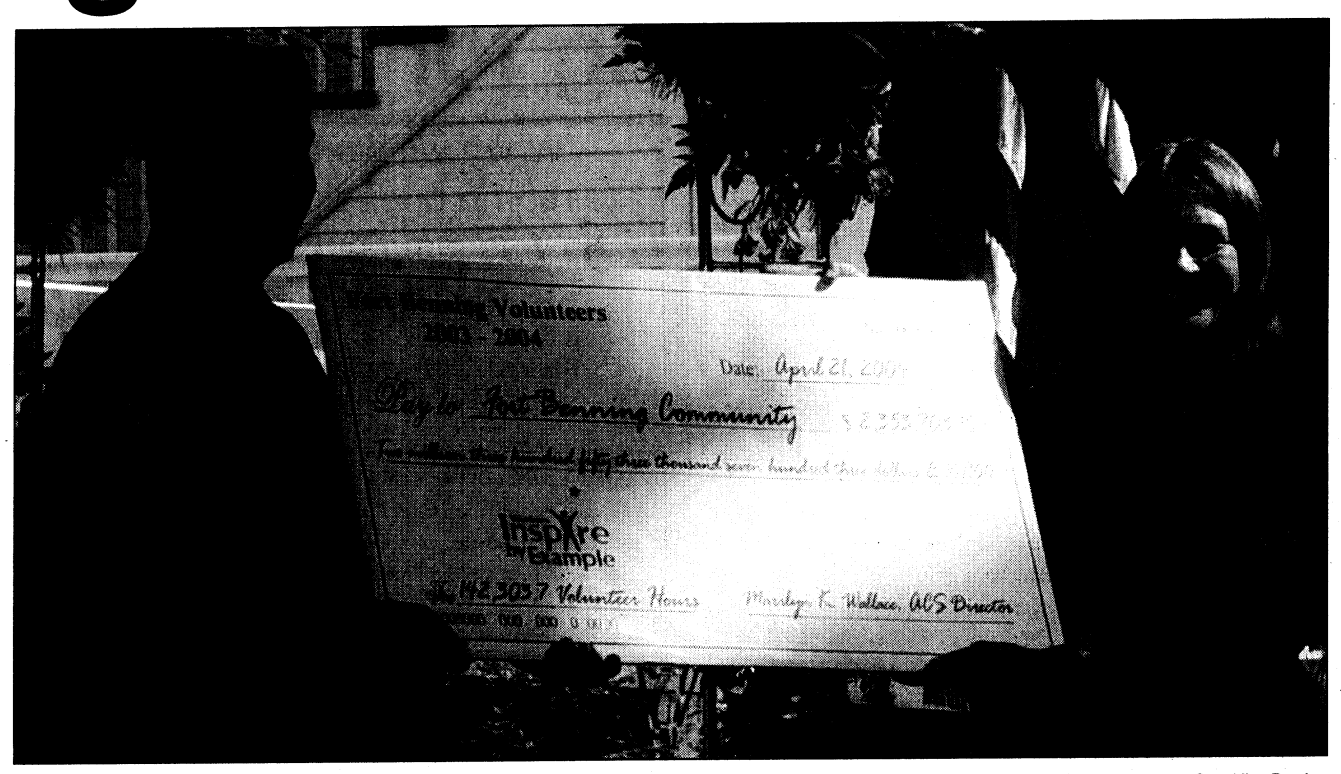
Just ask the post commander — he'll tell you.

Not long ago, Commanding General Brig. Gen. Benjamin Freakley said, Malcolm Mobley, a 17-year-old family member, wished he had a place to ride his skateboard. Saturday, the post celebrated the grand opening of its first skate park.

Before that, a woman by the name of Kim Akers wished for a way to bring the women of Fort Benning together — officer and enlisted spouses alike. A few months ago, about 200 women gathered at the Fort Benning Officers' Club to celebrate the post's first women's conference.

And even before that, the post chief of staff's wife wished for a venue to offer the post's theatrically inclined a place to exercise their dramatic skills and a place for Fort Benning residents to enjoy tasteful dinner theater. Lo and behold, Benning Backstage was born.

"Fort Benning is a place where miracles happen," Freakley said at the annual Volunteer Recognition Ceremony Wednesday.



"It's a unique installation, and it has nothing to do with the equipment or the architecture," he said. "It has to do with the love of community. It has to do with the people who pull together to make it better."

And the general wasted no time in crediting those people.

"Miracles happen here because volunteers make them happen," he said.

Volunteers are the ones who "make Fort Benning happen," he said.

Had it not been for Mobley's hard work collecting 350 signatures lobbying for a skate park, Fort Benning never would have seen Saturday's grand opening.

Sgt. Kim Dooley

Had it not been for Akers' tireless efforts, seeking a $2,000 grant, coordinating with women on post, seeking sponsors and organizing the event, the women's conference would still be a dream.

Had it not been for Peggy Cornwell, Benning Backstage's founder, the post would still be without a home for its thespians and lacking a great entertainment venue.

And these examples are just a few of hundreds, Freakley said.

Volunteers are everywhere on this installation, he said — whether it's the American Red Cross, the chapels, youth sports, schools, libraries, scouts, Army Community Service or the hospital.

And they've been the heart of Fort Benning for decades, he said, pointing to the poignant example of Julia Moore.

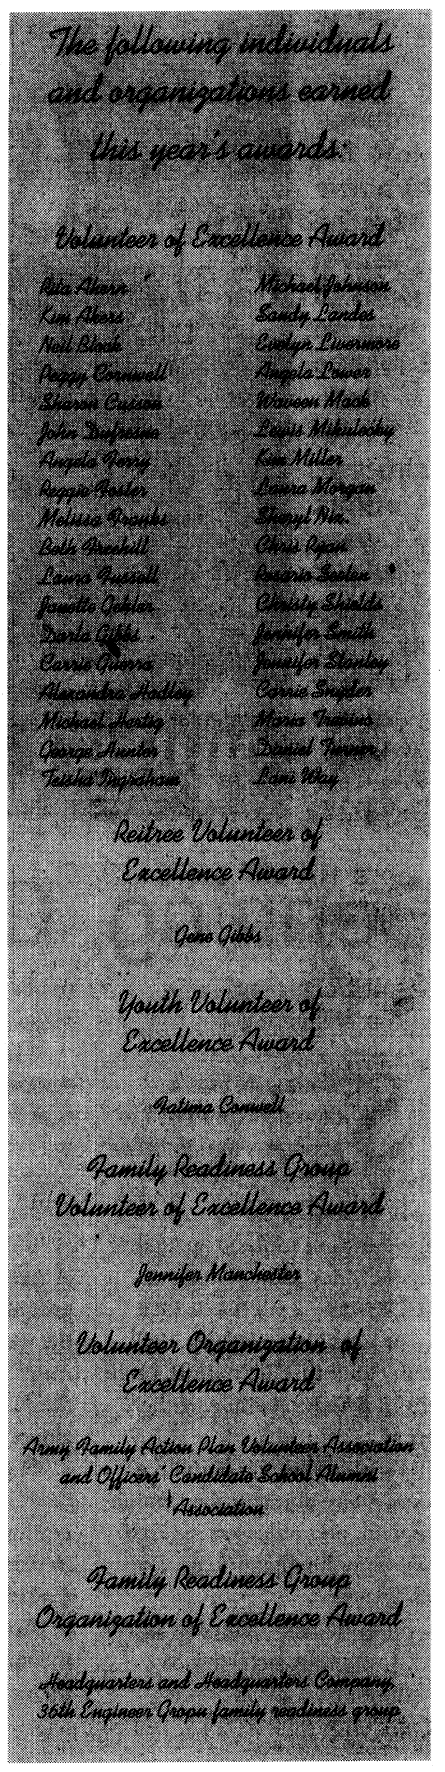
Moore was the wife of retired Lt. Gen. Hal Moore, the former commander of the 1st Battalion, 7th Cavalry, and a main character in the book and movie We Were Soldiers Once ... And Young. She passed away Sunday, and was laid to rest in Fort Benning's cemetery Thursday.

But her legacy — the example she set while her husband was commanding in the jungles of Vietnam — lives on, Freakley said.

The movie was slightly inaccurate, he said, because when her husband deployed, the Army told her, "You can leave Fort Benning. You have five days."

And yet when she heard that yellow taxi cabs were delivering death telegrams to the families of fallen Soldiers from the 1st Bn., 7th Cav., she volunteered, Freakley said.

She volunteered to deliver those telegrams family by family, and she volunteered to go to their funeral services and be with their families. And she raised such a fuss with the Army, Freakley said, that not much later, an officer and a chaplain became the bearers of such news.



She was a volunteer, she was an inspiration and she was a hero. Because volunteers are America's true heroes, Freakley said.

Volunteers like Red Cross volunteer coordinator Gene Gibbs, a retired Soldier who's "made volunteering his full-time job," according to his Retiree Volunteer of Excellence Award citation.

Volunteers like Jennifer Manchester, who coordinated a communitywide effort to collect goods for deployed Soldiers, who made a "direct impact on the Soldiers on the front lines," according to her award citation.

Volunteers make this community a better place, Freakley said, not only through their efforts, but also through the money they save the installation.

During the ceremony, Freakley was presented a "symbolic check" for $2,353,703.10 — that's how much unpaid work Fort Benning volunteers performed during the more than 142,303 volunteer hours they put in during the past year.

Post honors top troops

NCO, Soldier of Year overcome board competition

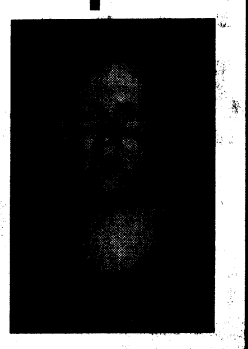
Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

They are Soldiers who set the "extreme example," Soldiers who distinguished themselves from their peers. And Tuesday, they were front and center to be officially recognized as Fort Benning's 2003 NCO and Soldier of the Year.

Friends, family and fellow Soldiers gathered to look on as Staff Sgt. Andrew Bullock and Pfc. John Valdez were presented the Army Commendation Medal and several awards from sponsors throughout the tricommunity.

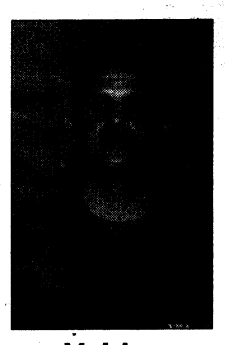
The Soldiers faced a long board process to earn their way into the limelight. After graduating from company, battalion and brigade boards, both troops competed at the post level for selection as NCO and Soldier of the Quarter.

Then it was on to the year board, where they were scored on a written exam, various Soldiers tasks, day and night land navigation, an Army physical fitness test, a six-mile road march and a verbal board.



Bullock, an instructor with 5th Ranger Training Battalion, Ranger Training Brigade, said the road to success was tough, but well worth it.

"I've learned a lot through this board," the San Diego native said. "And it's given me a chance to represent the 5th Ranger Training Battalion — we can be kind of forgotten up there."



This was especially important in light of the support he received from his unit, Bullock said.

"My chain of command was excellent about giving me the proper time to prepare for the board," he said.

In 5th RTB, instructors work on a rotating "24 hours on, 24 hours off" basis, Bullock said.

Bullock

Valdez

Although he was still expected to pull his shifts, his command worked with him to allow him to make the most of his time and study for the board.

"Instead of walking along with the students and grading them, they would have me at the command post, where I could study," he said.

And that study time came in handy for Bullock, whose biggest challenge was the verbal board.

Meanwhile, Valdez, an infantryman with B Company, 2nd Battalion, 29th Infantry Regiment, said he did most of his studying in the motor pool.

Valdez's whole platoon went through the board process at the company level, but Valdez's performance was above and beyond, said Staff Sgt. Edward Sigler, his squad leader.

"He's a high speed Soldier — a PT stud," Sigler said. "He's always ready to do anything we ask him to — he's a good Soldier."

Valdez, who's spent a year and a half in the Army, will be promoted to specialist and will more than likely be given a team leader position, Sigler said.

For Valdez, though, most of the glory is in knowing what he's accomplished.

"I just wanted to win — I don't like to lose," he said.

Valdez said he encourages his peers to use their down time in the motor pool to study up and get active in the boards.

Meanwhile, the 19-year-old San Antonio native has turned his sights on a new goal: "to win the Army 10-miler," earn a bachelor's degree in business management and open up a paintball store.

Time to put a team together for the Relay for Life May 14-15. Call 324-4573 today.

New infantry museum designer selected

Spc. Nikki St. Amant
Bayonet staff

The National Infantry Foundation announced Tuesday Boston architectural firm E. Verner Johnson and Associates as the architectural firm selected to design the proposed new National Infantry Museum complex.

The NIF, a private, nonprofit organization, will oversee the construction of a 200-acre facility, said Cyndy Cerbin, the foundation's director of communications.

E. Verner Johnson and Associates is the only architectural firm in the nation that specializes exclusively in museum planning and design and has built more than 140 museums, including work at the Louvre, a museum in Paris, and projects at the Smithsonian Institution.

The planning, fund-raising and construction of the facility, when it commences, is a huge undertaking, said foundation official, retired Maj. Gen. Jerry White, and the choosing of one of the most crucial partners in the endeavor was no small task.

Through portfolio submissions and presentations, an initial field of 18 architectural firms was pared to the three finalists, and a mixed-bag committee of local leaders and NIF officials traveled to sites created by all three of the firms before convening to choose one, Cerbin said.

The current museum on post is only 50,000 square feet and can only display 10 percent of its collection, said National Infantry Museum director and curator Frank Hanner.

"I think (the new museum) is way overdue," Hanner said. "There is not a war our nation has completely won that hasn't been won by the infantry — the last 100 yards belong to them."

The blueprints for the new complex detail a 150,000-square-foot main building that will house eight 5,000-square-foot galleries, a cafe, themed cafeteria and gift shop centered around a grand rotunda. The new structure will provide climate-controlled, protective storage for undisplayed items.

Aside from the main building, the site will be home to five outdoor bronzed vignettes depicting scenes from major conflicts in the infantry's past; a World War II Company Street with authentic, restored buildings from the post's WWII era; a quarter-mile Memorial Walk of Honor lined with dozens of monuments and memorials in garden settings; and a five-acre parade field, complete with covered seating for 1,500 which can be used by the more than 30,000 infantry, airborne and Ranger students who graduate each year.

E. Verner Johnson, the firm's founder, said they are exploring the possibility of an IMAX theater, a three-dimensional theater, which uses holograms, special effects and simulators.

Both Cerbin and Johnson said the foundation hopes to break ground before the end of the year.

Although fund-raising efforts have already netted $26 million of the projected $70 million budget, two-thirds of the funds remain unsecured — a gap Cerbin said the foundation hopes to close with the projected launch of a national, grass-roots campaign in August, further federal funding and untapped donor resources in the defense industry.

Fort Benning's commanding general, Brig. Gen. Benjamin Freakley, said he is proud to be a partner in the move to properly honor and commemorate the sacrifices of infantrymen past, present and future.

"We owe it to these men," Freakley said, "who came forward and said, 'I will serve, and I will do my duty for my country to preserve freedom.'"

With an estimated 300,000 visitors a year, Columbus Mayor Bob Poydasheff said Columbus State University's Abbott Turner College of Business anticipates the museum will have a $40 million annual impact on local businesses and will create 400 jobs, while revitalizing ailing South Columbus.

"Look at what this project is going to do for this town," Poydasheff said. "This is one of the greatest things that's ever happened to Columbus, Georgia.

"But more importantly," he said, "it impacts and continues to cement the relationship that this city has always had with Fort Benning."

New AAFES facilities to improve life on Benning

If you find yourself waiting in line at the gas station for half an hour wishing those in front of you would hurry up — relax, help is on the way.

The Army and Air Force Exchange Service is in the beginning stages of design, development and construction of new facilities around post that will make shopping, pumping gas and eating out a less frustrating experience.

In April 2001, AAFES representatives from the real estate division visited Fort Benning and decided the facilities provided by AAFES were too small for the size of the installation, said Glenn Schubert, Fort Benning's AAFES general manager.

Now, the post will receive facilities that will better accommodate its community, Schubert said.

Part of the AAFES master planning process, the AAFES-funded projects include gas stations, mini malls, fast food venues, shopettes, a new Post Exchange Shopping Center and other services, Schubert said.

Kelley Hill is the first project site to break ground. The project includes a gas station, drive-thru Burger King and an 8,000-square-foot mini mall, complete with a barber shop, an arcade, a dry cleaner and two concession carts.

The $4,300,000 project is expected to be completed by January 2005 and will be located next to the existing recreation center and Subway, Schubert said.

"This is a sorely needed addition to Kelley Hill," he said. "The shopette on Kelley Hill is too small, and Soldiers stand in line outside of the store because they don't fit inside."

Right now, there are only three gas stations on post — two on Main Post and one at Harmony Church. Ongoing plans call for three new gas stations on Fort Benning.

The current 24-hour shopette will be replaced by a shopette on Dixie Road in the empty field next to Soldiers' Plaza, Schubert said. This location will be more accessible.

Although the project is only 50 percent into its design phase, the expected groundbreaking date is in October, and the opening is projected for November 2005.

The 8,967 square-foot building's projected cost is $3,996,000 and will include a Class VI, Church's Chicken, a drive-thru car wash, and a gas station with diesel, ethanol and regular gas, Schubert said.

The clearing between the fire station and Interstate 185 on Custer Road will become home to a 6,120 square-foot facility with a Blimpie's drive-thru, a Class VI, a gas station and a shopette. The facility is slated to open in November 2006.

Schubert said the Custer Road shopette will support the McGraw Manor and Custer Terrace housing areas.

The Burger King on Main Post will be replaced by a $2,290,000 dual food facility that will include a Taco John's and a Burger King with a playground.

The mini mall will be located in front of the library and include the same services the current mini mall offers with a few additions.

"There will be a food court area, a Class VI and a troop store — all under the same roof," Schubert said.

This is a $4, 572,000 project and is expected to open in December 2005.

Another project still on the drawing board is a new Shopping Center. A 224,000 square-foot modern main PX will be built on the opposite side of the Commissary. The new design is similar to a mall, with a separate food court area and a larger selection of products, Schubert said.

The old PX building will be turned into a Soldier Center, where all the services from Soldiers' Plaza will be moved, Schubert said.

BEST RANGER TEAMS 2004

Competition: Sure to be full of surprises

Events will be "weighted" on a scale of two to five points, five being reserved for the foot march and land navigation course, which typically render the most eliminations. Standings will be updated regularly and posted at each event site so spectators can stay abreast of the scores.

Spectators will also find yards and yards of yellow tape along the competition route. The tape marks designated holding areas where competitors wait between events. A word of caution, McNally said, spectators must not cross the tape and should refrain from chatting with competitors before events.

"When they're in there waiting their turn, they need to be resting and preparing mentally," he said. "Unless you're certain your Ranger is the kind of person who thrives on encouragement and support before the event, it's best to wait till he's returned to the holding area after he competes. Then it's probably OK to talk to him."

Though talk is OK, any form of assistance is prohibited, McNally said. Physically assisting a competitor, handing him notes, water, food, etc., will result in his disqualification, no matter what the intent.

With the smaller number of teams in this year's BRC, it's anyone's guess how many spectators will be on hand. More than 4,000 attended in 2002.

Last year's competition was cancelled because of the war. That meant most of the RTB Soldiers experienced in the planning and execution of the competition are no longer here. Challenging indeed, but in some ways, the lack of "subject matter experts" worked to the unit's advantage, said Lt. Col. Terrence McKenrick, 4th RTB commander. It allowed for the element of creativity (read: surprise!) that McNally is so proud of.

"We've put a lot of time and effort and energy into this thing, and I think the end result will show it," McKenrick said. "From a Ranger's perspective, this year's competition will showcase the Army's very best Soldiers, and right now, while we're mired down in the fight against terrorism, it's a good chance for people to see, here at home, the caliber of Soldiers who are out there fighting for their freedom."

The BRC exemplifies "warrior ethos," something Army officials have been preaching loud and long, said Maj. Dean Weiler, the 4th RTB's operations officer and a former Best Ranger competitor.

"The kind of people who come here to compete are not the kind to quit," he said. "They're the Soldiers who sow the seeds of warrior ethos for the whole Army."

Benning hosts JROTC competition

8 local high schools wage 'war' for title

Will Miller, Jordan High School, tackles one of the challenges posed by the obstacle course as part of a Junior Reserve Officer Training Corps Leader Challenge competition Saturday.

Junior Reserve Officer Training Corps programs at eight local high schools fielded 25 teams for a JROTC Leaders Challenge competition Saturday on Fort Benning.

More than 100 students competed in the 11th annual event, said H.W. Fails, a civilian logistics employee with the local JROTC headquarters that coordinated the event.

Planning for the event started more than a month ago, Fails said, and required the assistance of not only the schools and JROTC programs, but also Fort Benning's range control and Soldiers from the 29th Infantry Regiment, who were on hand to serve as graders and instructors.

The command sergeant major of 2nd Battalion, 29th Inf. Regt., Command Sgt. Maj. Gregory Patton, said his Soldiers volunteered for the extra weekend duty because they believe the relationship between the Army and the JROTC program is important.

"I think the 29th has a lot of good things the JROTC program can benefit from," said Patton. "I've had sniper instructors go out on their own time and teach basic rifle marksmanship skills to JROTC rifle teams."

Sgt. 1st Class Calvin Thompson, Headquarters and Headquarters Company, 29th Inf. Regt., whose son Phillip is a student at Spencer High School and was a competitor in Saturday's competition, volunteers his services as a physical training instructor to JROTC cadets at Spencer from 7:30 to 10:45 a.m. three days a week.

"(JROTC) is giving young kids a sense of direction," Thompson said. "It's good for them."

It was a long day that began at 7 a.m. for the volunteers, competitors and spectators.

The event launched with an Army physical fitness test at Olive Watson Physical Training Field, complete with a two-mile run, which some of the competitors completed in BDUs and combat boots.

After the APFT, the cadets were given a short rest period before beginning staggered rotations through four separate task stations. Points were awarded for the four timed events, which included a search and recovery mission, the assembly of a functional rope bridge, a leadership aptitude drill, a 100-question written exam and completion of the 11th Regiment obstacle course near the Central Issue Facility, said Capt. Brian Schmanski, commander, HHC, 29th Inf. Regt.

Local JROTC headquarters official Maj. Allen Brinkman said the competition this year was extremely successful and fulfilled its goals.

"The idea is for (the cadets) to demonstrate not only teamwork," Brinkman said, "but leadership, as well."

The teams designate leaders at the beginning of the day, he said, but the leadership can be switched between events.

All events are affected by each individual's performance, and because of the nature of the scoring system, a blowout on even a single event makes it virtually impossible to win the competition.

This scoring system, Brinkman said, ensures that the winning teams must demonstrate strength in all five events.

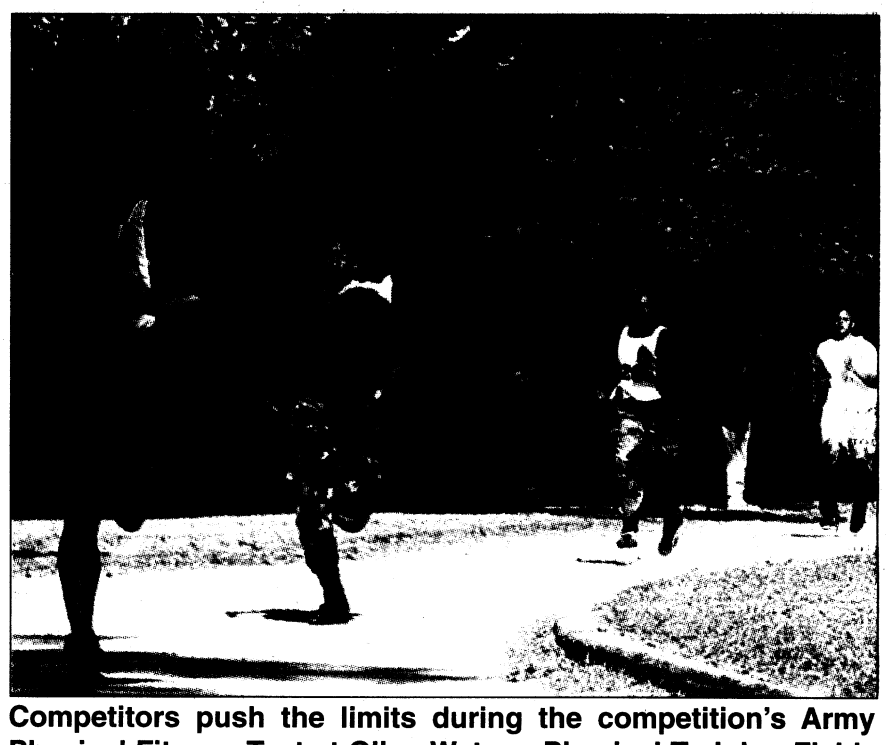
All team members of the top three teams in both the male and female categories receive medallions, he said.

Winners for this year's event are:

Boys

1st Place - Carver High School Blue Team

2nd Place - Columbus High School Blue Team

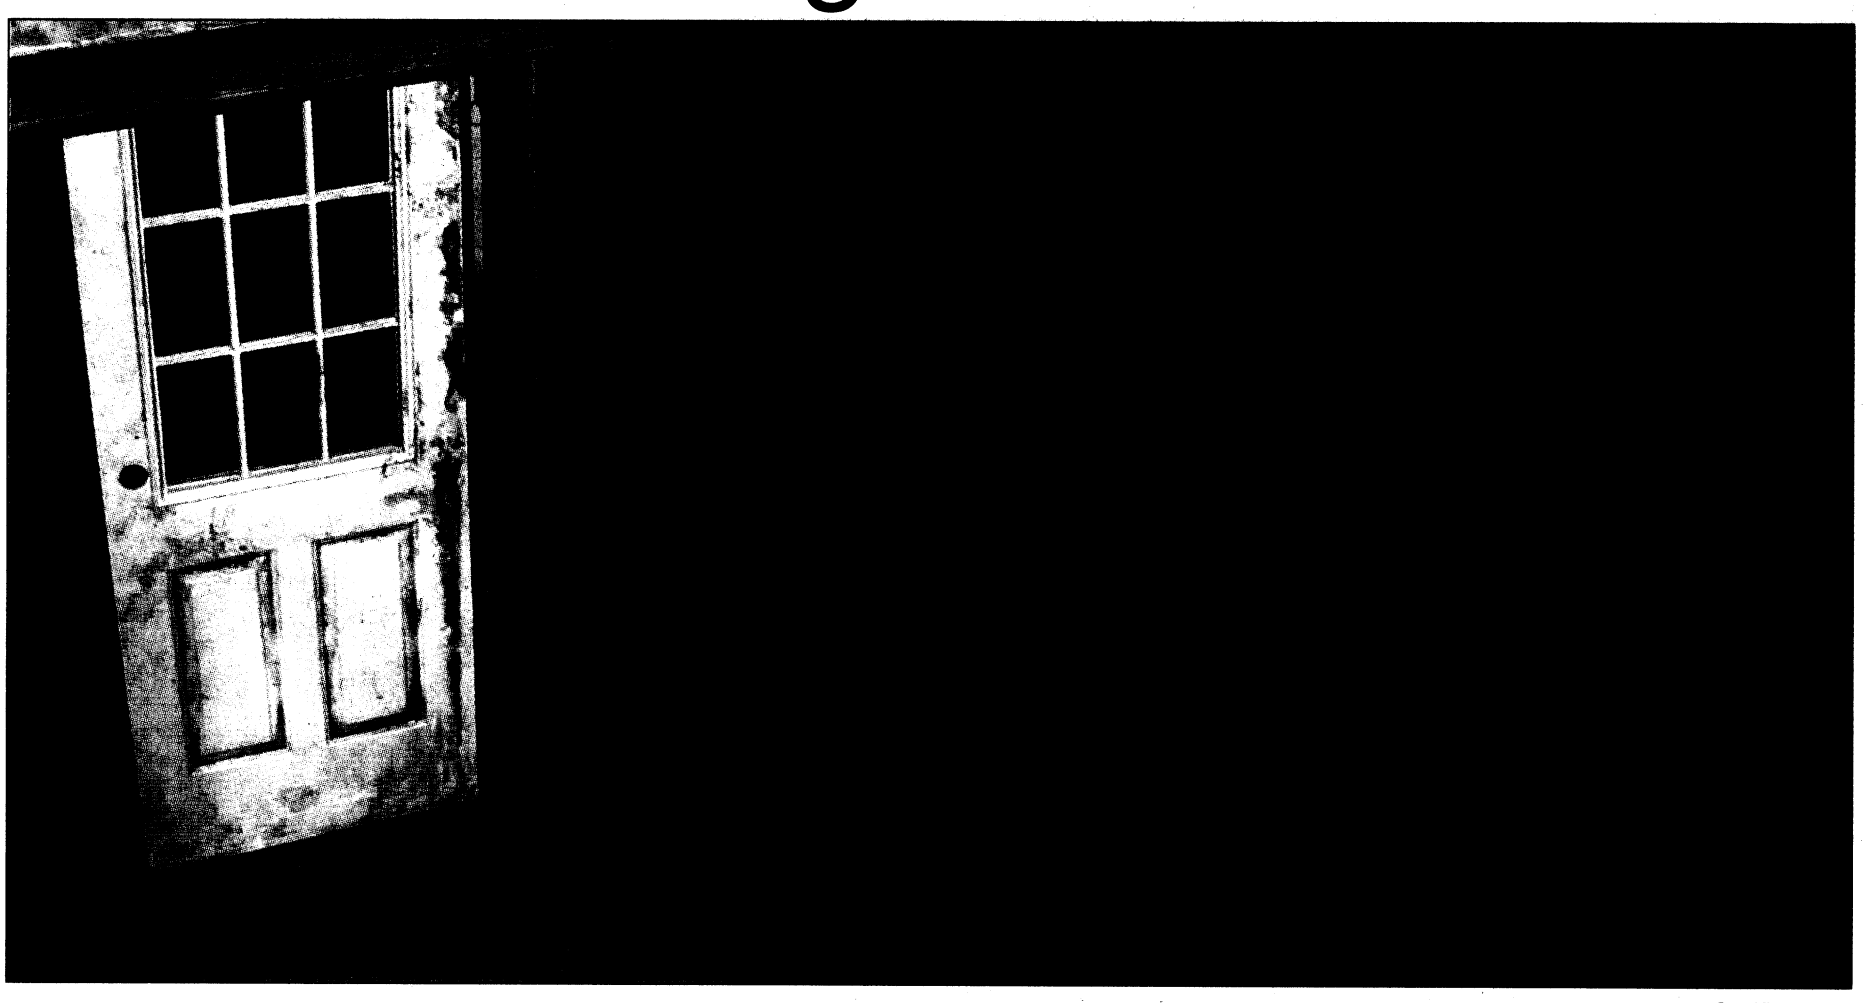


3rd Place - Hardaway High School Red Team

Girls

1st Place - Hardaway High School Pink Team

2nd Place - Carver High School Red Team



3rd Place - Columbus High School Orange Team

Competitors push the limits during the competition's Army Physical Fitness Test at Olive-Watson Physical Training Field.

'Can Do' Soldiers wage urban warfare

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

Sgt. Kim Dooley

A four-man team from C Company, 1st Battalion, 15th Infantry Regiment, readies to clear a room in a "shoot house" during its FTX.

Inside, it was still, dark and quiet. But was it empty? The Soldiers couldn't be sure. Huddled close in a four-man team, they moved through the building, searching for enemies, friendlies and contraband.

It's a scenario that many 3rd Brigade Soldiers are familiar with after their tenure in Iraq last year, and one the troops of C Company, 1st Battalion, 15th Infantry Regiment, will be ready for when the brigade returns for Operation Iraqi Freedom 3.

The company wrapped up an eight-day field training exercise at Brann Range Wednesday. Their focus? The "big four," said Capt. Vern Tubbs, company commander — marksmanship, physical training, battle drills and medical skills.

The Soldiers left Kelley Hill on foot last week on a 12.7-mile road march to the range. Once there, they trained on combatives, close-quarters marksmanship, breaching, clearing buildings and applying tourniquets.

The Soldiers practiced combatives daily, led by the unit's five Level II trainers. By the time the unit headed home, 90 percent of its troops were Level I-qualified, Tubbs said.

The marksmanship training, meanwhile, familiarized the Soldiers with firing outside the foxhole — kneeling, standing, turning and running.

"Close-quarters marksmanship isn't as accurate, but it's quicker," Tubbs said.

And in an environment like the urban areas of Iraq, it's what the Soldiers are more likely to use.

Breaching techniques are used to remove obstacles, like locked or barricaded doors. The troops learned and practiced explosive, ballistic and mechanical breaching. Explosive breaching employs demolitions, ballistic breaching calls for a shotgun and mechanical breaching uses manual tools, like a sledgehammer or hooligan tool.

These techniques were new to many of the Soldiers, even though many of them encountered these barriers in Iraq, said Cpl. Shawn Rice, a team leader.

"In Iraq, we were kicking in the doors, and using shotguns. But for a lot of guys, the first time they used a shotgun was (to breach a door) in Iraq, so they weren't familiar with it," he said. "It kind of messed them up."

The techniques they learned during the FTX will help them breach faster and save them energy, Rice said.

The Soldiers got to put those techniques to the test in two "shoot houses," where they practiced entering and clearing rooms in four-man teams.

Using a "building block" approach, the troops started off as single teams clearing single rooms, Tubbs said.

Once they had that down, they began adding variables — multiple rooms, doors, furniture, enemy targets, friendlies — eventually working their way up to multiple-team, multiple-room missions.

The Soldiers performed several runs through the shoot houses — dry runs with no ammunition, then runs using blanks and later live rounds, Tubbs said.

Having two shoot houses and the ability to vary the rooms enhanced the training, Rice said.

"When it's just one shoot house, you'll practice, practice, practice to the point that you know what it looks like — you don't have to think anymore," he said. "But with the second shoot house, it's a whole different (set-up), so it surprises you. It's more realistic."

As the FTX drew near its end, the Soldiers were able to flow in putting together everything they had learned, Tubbs said.

They entered the shoot houses, breached doors, engaged enemy targets using close-quarters marksmanship, used their combatives skills to detain a resistant "bad guy" — a combatives trainer in an impact reduction suit — and cleared the building.

For Pfc. David Mulligan, the FTX was vital training.

Mulligan, 19 and already a team leader, wasn't with the unit during its first bout in Iraq, but he will be when it heads back.

"This gave me some hands-on experience, actually getting a feel for how to enter and clear a room," he said. "It gave (my team) a chance to learn each other's jobs and just do a whole bunch of training."

And training is something Mulligan takes seriously.

"The bottom line is that we're going back to Iraq," he said. "And over there, it's a life or death situation when you go into a building.

"I know I'm coming back alive, and I'm bringing all my men back alive."

608th: Returns from yearlong deployment

a newborn child.

"I'm a little scared and a little nervous to be holding (Aaron Jr.) for the first time," he said, "but its amazing."

The proud new father said he was sorry he missed his wife's nine months of pregnancy after he came home on emergency leave in July, but is glad he didn't miss as much of his newborn's life as some of his comrades.

As he got into a limousine rented by his family, Staff Sgt. Dorian Williams said it was awesome to be back and said he appreciated the support shown by those at the redeployment ceremony.

A rear detachment of 23 Soldiers remains in Camp Doha, Kuwait, and will supervise the transport of the unit's vehicles and gear before returning home in about two weeks, said Lt. Col. Matthew Higginbotham, 13th CSB commander. The 608th was the last of the original units deployed to Iraq from Fort Benning to return home.

"While deployed," Higginbotham said, "the 608th provided ammunition support to supporting units in the Operation Iraqi Freedom theater."

"Our families have done a superb job in supporting our Soldiers," Higginbotham said. It is solid family support, he said, that helps ensure the success of the 13th CSB's deployment procedures.

"I'm surprised at the energy of our Soldiers," Higginbotham said. "(The 13th CSB) has and extensive reintegration and recovery program required of all redeployed Soldiers. Our leadership is committed to ensuring Soldiers receive a smooth transition back to home station and receive all necessary assistance from post agencies — who, by the way, have done an outstanding job.

"We're learning the key to handling deployment turmoil is to constantly communicate with the Soldiers," he said. "They mainly want some type of predictability."

With the return of the 608th, the battalion is as close to full-strength at home as it has been since Higginbotham's assumption of command in June 2003. The 233rd Heavy Equipment Transport Detachment returned from Iraq in August 2003 and the 104th Transportation Company returned in March 2004, but the 233rd deployed again in January, Higginbotham said, and no redeployment date for that element has been set.

The elements of the 13th CSB that returned earlier were hard at work as well these past months.

In February, the 13th CSB deployed to the National Training Center, Fort Irwin, Calif., in support of the 3rd Brigade, 3rd Inf. Div., and is currently ramping up for an upcoming Joint Readiness Training Rotation in Fort Polk, La. scheduled for August.

Upon return from the block leave Higginbotham said the Soldiers will focus on receiving equipment from Iraq and will start an extensive training cycle to regain proficiency in critical Soldier skills.

Attached to 3rd Brigade, the unit is preparing for the certainty of a return trip to Iraq, Higginbotham said.

Goals for the JRTC rotation, he said, are to exercise base defense and convoy security operations. Despite the enormous call the unit has responded to in support of the global war on terrorism, Higginbotham said morale is good and reenlistment numbers are high. "I am proud and amazed at the professionalism and dedication of our Soldiers in supporting our mission in Iraq," he said.

"Most of them understand the importance of our job and are totally committed to accomplishing whatever logistics mission we are called to do."

System: Changes

four pay bands.

Under this system, employees would no longer receive within grade step increases, cost of living or annual across the board pay increases. Instead, a pay for performance system will be created where an employee's supervisor will determine pay.

"A supervisor will have to rate performance on a bell-shaped curve. Most employees will rate in the middle ... but the best and brightest should be rewarded handsomely," said Knoff. Currently, there are no set guidelines for this.

How well the pay-for-performance system is implemented, how much money is in the pay pool and how well management makes the differentiation between employees' performances will determine an employee's salary, Knoff said. Performance will also determine reductions in force and promotions, unlike under the current system, in which seniority makes many of those determinations.

But before any of these changes can be made, implementation procedures must be worked out with the national labor organizations so rules can be implemented systemwide and do not have to be negotiated with local labor organizations at each installation.

"Unless this piece is accomplished, none of the others can fall into place," said Knoff.

At the end of November, the Pentagon will publish proposed regulations on the new rules for union negotiating. If accepted, proposals for performance-based pay and for filing appeals in disciplinary cases will be issued in January. Once these proposals are passed, a representative group of employees will enter into a six-month pilot personnel program. Once completed, DoD will evaluate it using input from employees and the Office of Personnel Management and make any necessary changes before launching a second group of employees into a 12-month pilot program, scheduled for February or March 2006.

By the time a third group phases in, 300,000 employees will be under the new system. With approval from OPM, DoD will expand the system including the remaining 400,000 civilians in the work force. Changing systems will be a slow process, he said.

"It's not something to be concerned about in the right here and now," Knoff said.

How important is insurance?

States require licensed drivers to maintain a certain level of liability insurance coverage in order to operate a motor vehicle. Although this requirement is important, it does not provide physical damage coverage for your vehicle. Physical damage insurance is very important to your financial survival in the event of a collision or comprehensive claim. NOTE: All lenders require collision and comprehensive coverage during the term of the loan.

What determines the cost of insurance?

There are several factors determining the price of the auto insurance: • Your driving record • Your age • Gender or marital status • Make & model of the vehicle • Territory. Just remember: It pays to shop around for insurance coverage. Premiums can vary by hundreds of dollars!

What is GAP protection?

Since our insurance will only pay the current retail value of your car (less your deductible), GAP protection pays the difference in the event of total loss (including theft). This GAP is the result of owning more to the bank (due to taxes, depreciation and interest).

Remember: Regular Service will increase the life span, performance and resale value of your vehicle.
See your owner's manual for the manufacturer's recommended maintenance schedule.

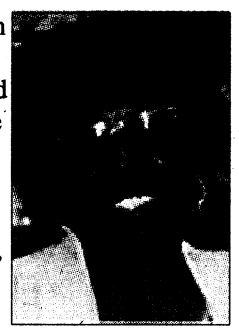
Cancer survivor shares 'lesson learned'



Early detection key to breast cancer survival

Bridgett Siter
Bayonet staff

Ann Justice was handed a clean bill of health and headed out the door when something told her to ask one more question.

"Don't you think I need a mammogram?" she asked her doctor.

With no family history of breast cancer and no reason to suspect the small lump that lurked below the tissue of her right breast, Justice believes it was God that prompted her inquiry that day in 1990.

Justice

"I even shocked myself. I had one foot out the door when I heard myself ask him that," said Justice, a fifth-grade teacher at Fort Benning's Stowers Elementary. "Later, I understood. As a Christian, I know it was the Holy Spirit directing me."

Justice was "at that age," when doctors recommend women have their breasts examined annually, but it had been two years since her last mammogram. Her doctor ordered an immediate exam. Three days later, Justice found herself in a surgeon's office.

Stage one cancer, he said, and recommended an immediate lumpectomy and radiation.

"I believe I'm alive because we caught it early," she said. "The message for everybody is the importance of mammograms — women and men. You know, men get breast cancer, too. There was a man at my church who was diagnosed with breast cancer about the same time I was. By November, he was dead. We're all human — we all have mammary glands."

Justice's message is one the American Cancer Society has been stressing for some time now; breast cancer is not a woman's disease. In fact, according to the ACS' most recent statistics, 1,500 men were diagnosed with it in 2002.

Though women are a hundred times more likely to get breast cancer, they're also more likely to detect it in its earliest stage, when it's 98 percent curable.

That's why it's important to ask for a mammogram, Justice said.

"Don't wait for the doctor to suggest it," she said. "I can't emphasize it enough."

In 1990, when she was the assistant principal at Stowers, Justice called a faculty meeting and encouraged her coworkers to learn from her experience.

"I'm the kind of person, if something's going on in my life,

Rock on at Riverside

Spc. Alfonso James sings during a Sunday concert on the lawn of Riverside, the home of Fort Benning's commanding general. Brig. Gen. Benjamin Freakley invited the Fort Benning community to enjoy the Infantry Center Band's rock group, Iron Mike. More than 100 families attended the concert, where they enjoyed songs like Sweet Home Alabama, Come on Elleen and other favorites. James kept his audience involved by dancing with the crowd of children and teaching them to do the electric slide. This is the first of a series of concerts at Riverside. The next Concert will be at 3 p.m. May 23 and is featuring the USAIC Concert Band performing Marches, Musicals and More.

Get Outta Here

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

As it was so tactfully pointed out to me by my swell buddy, Trinity, last week's "Get Outta Here" sent readers on a search for a bar called Papa Top's. Wrong, wrong, wrong. It's actually Pop-A-Top Lounge. It's still on 2nd Avenue, though, and it's still a good place to go — just ask Trin. So, my apologies to 1st Sgt. McGurk (the reader who tipped me off on the lounge's bounty of recreation activities and free barbecue on Saturdays) and the Pop-A-Top Lounge for the name change. Now onto this week's GOH ...

Lucky you, Columbus. Riverfest weekend has finally arrived.

What's Riverfest, you ask? Well, allow me to enlighten you.

Concerts, a carnival, a barbecue cook-off, fireworks, arts and crafts, demonstrations, face painting ... the list goes on. And it's all conveniently located just down the street, so to speak, in Columbus' Historic District.

Now, the folks behind the scenes are really rolling out the red carpet on this one.

Grammy-winners Blues Traveler and country star Tracy Byrd top the list of 30 or so local and national performers in every genre from rock to classical.

And when you've had enough on the music front, fill up on barbecue samples from more than 30 competitors in the Pig Jig Barbecue Cook-off and cast your vote for the People's Choice Award.

Not into barbecue? No problem. Food vendors apparently "flock" to this festival, offering up every culinary creation you can think

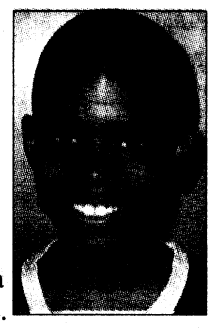
Faith science students get national nomination

Spc. Eliamar Castanon
Bayonet staff

When Curtis Phelps' science teacher gave him an envelope to take home, he thought he was in trouble.



The Faith Middle School student took the envelope home, gave it to his father and expected the worst.

To Phelps' relief, he wasn't in trouble. Staff Sgt. Calvin L. Phelps, a small arms repairman with the 203rd Forward Support Battalion, was proud to inform his youngest son he had just been nominated for the U.S. Achievement Academy Award for Science.

The national award is an honor that fewer than 10 percent of all American high school students receive.

And Curtis isn't even in high school, he's 13 years old and one of 17 seventh-graders from Faith who were nominated by their science teacher, Mary Matthews, for this award.

Matthews received a letter from USAA asking her to submit the names of her top science students. So she sent in the list, and not much later, she received the envelopes inviting the parents to submit their children's biographical information to include in the academy's 2005 yearbook.

Curtis

Matthews said she believes it is important to show kids they're doing a good job at this age.

"Any time you can do something for middle school kids, it's a good thing," she said. "They're in a time of their lives when a pat on the back every once in a while feels great."

Curtis and his classmates may now appear in the official 2005 USAA yearbook and qualify to receive college scholarships from $1,500 up to $2 million.

Matthews said she hopes these nominations will show her students they have an aptitude for science and encourage them to consider it as a career.

"If kids work hard, they can follow their dreams and have more opportunities to do good things in life," Curtis said.

Curtis' dream is to someday build a giant robot or a car that turns into a credit card to avoid car theft.

He recently applied for the National Honor Society and hopes to be accepted, though he won't find out until the end of the school year.

As for right now, he's just waiting for the summer to come to have some fun, volunteer at the hospital and get to wear his Chuck Taylors again.

Matthews nominated the following Faith students for the award: Curtis Phelps, Hannah Henry, Shevonna Hill, Bobby Seawright, Crystal Austin, Matt Melhado, Shannon Wright, Tyler Foster, Clara Buchanan, Buddy Dyer, Maggie Gallagher, Bethany Hart, Chelsea Middleton, Paul Miranda, Vianca Torres, Yaro Ortega and Thomas Esposito.

Red Cross offers post water safety classes

Spc. Eliamar Castanon
Bayonet staff

In 2000, there were 3,482 unintentional drownings in the U.S., an average of nine people per day — 943 of those victims were children between the ages of 1 and 14 years old, according to Center for Disease Control and Prevention Web site.

Drowning remains the second leading cause of injury-related death for children between those ages.

With summer right around the corner, the Fort Benning Red Cross Station has started its Learn-to-Swim and lifeguard training programs to ensure everyone is prepared to get in the water.

One of the classes offered is the Mom and Tot class for mothers and babies from 6 months to 3 years.

The Moms and Tots and the preschool lessons are designed to get children comfortable with the water before they learn to swim or move on to lessons, said Michele Walton, Red Cross health and safety director.

Meanwhile, parents learn how to keep their child safe, whether it's in the bathtub or the pool.

"Swimming is a necessity for everybody, I don't care how old you are," Walton said. "You never know when it can save your life or ... somebody else's."

The Learn-to-Swim program is a progressive swimming program that introduces children to swimming and develops their swimming skills.

"Even if it's not with the Red Cross, all parents need to take their children to swimming lessons," Walton said.

Each level has its own safety portion that goes along with the class. Students learn the fundamentals of using life jackets, safe diving rules, how to open an airway for breathing and eventually become familiar with CPR without mouth-to-mouth contact.

The lessons are taught by certified Red Cross instructors who cover the following levels:

• Level 1 - Water Exploration provides an orientation and a sound foundation for aquatic and safety skills.

• Level 2 - Primary Skills expands on fundamental aquatic locomotion and safety skills.

• Level 3 - Stroke Readiness increases competency and teaches safety and non-swimming rescue skills.

• Level 4 - Stroke Development introduces the breast and side stroke and develops confidence and competency in strokes and safety skills.

• Level 5 - Stroke Refinement continues stroke refinement and introduces the butterfly, surface dives and springboard diving.

• Level 6 - Stroke Proficiency develops maximum efficiency and endurance and introduces flip turns.

• Level 7 - Advanced Skills encourage lifetime fitness, refine strokes learned in previous levels, develop springboard diving and learn advanced rescue skills.

Georganna Rapaport and her nine-month-old baby boy, Brennan, swim together during the Red Cross Mom and Tot swimming lessons.

Lessons are held Monday through Friday for two weeks and are for military and Department of Defense ID card holders. The next Level 1, 2, Preschool and Mom and Tot classes are June 7 through the 18. Each class is $30.

For the teen-agers 15 and older interested in lifeguarding during the summer, the Red Cross also provides lifeguard training classes.

All teens who want to take this class must pass a prerequisite swim test before they may participate in the course, Walton said.

The prerequisite test involves a 200 meter freestyle swim, a 100 meter breast stroke, a 200 meter freestyle or breast stroke swim without stopping, a 20 meter swim, dive to a minimum of nine feet to pick up a ten pound object and carry the object to the staring point.

If the teen-ager does not pass the test they cannot begin the course. The next class begins Saturday and costs $125.

Survivor: Advocates early detection in women, men everybody's going to know it," she said. "I put them all on alert. I said, 'This is what's happening to me. Now go get a mammogram.'"

Justice speaks to women's groups and church groups whenever she's given an opportunity. She believes teaching children is a ministry, and God spared her because her work is not finished.

But she also believes God wants her to share her survival story with others.

When Justice lost her mother to pancreatic cancer in 1984, few were willing to talk about the disease, she said. The silence left many ignorant to the overwhelmingly encouraging statistics about survival rates among those who detect early.

"Back then, people didn't even want to say the word. They called it the 'big C,'" Justice said. "They had all kinds of misconceptions about it. Mostly, they thought it was a death sentence."

Now, Justice said, more and more people realize that early detection is the key to survival, and the key to early detection is education.

"It's important for people to hear the success stories," she said. "It makes people realize they can live through cancer."

Author visits Loyd

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

Loyd Elementary School students got a special treat Thursday morning.

Popular children's author Eddie Bowman — better known as "Chester Drawers," the hillbilly comic — paid them a visit to read a few of his books and sing some of his songs.

"The children loved his performance," said Mitzi Crow, the school's information specialist.

"They had a great time listening to him read his stories and seemed to really enjoy the jokes he made," she said. "Their favorite part was singing the songs along with him as he played them on his guitar."

Bowman, a native of Branson, Mo., is not only an author, but an entertainer and motivational speaker, as well.

By the time Bowman arrived, the children were already familiar with many of his works — books like Sonny the Trick Horse, Roddy the Rooster and The Dust of the Butterfly Wings.

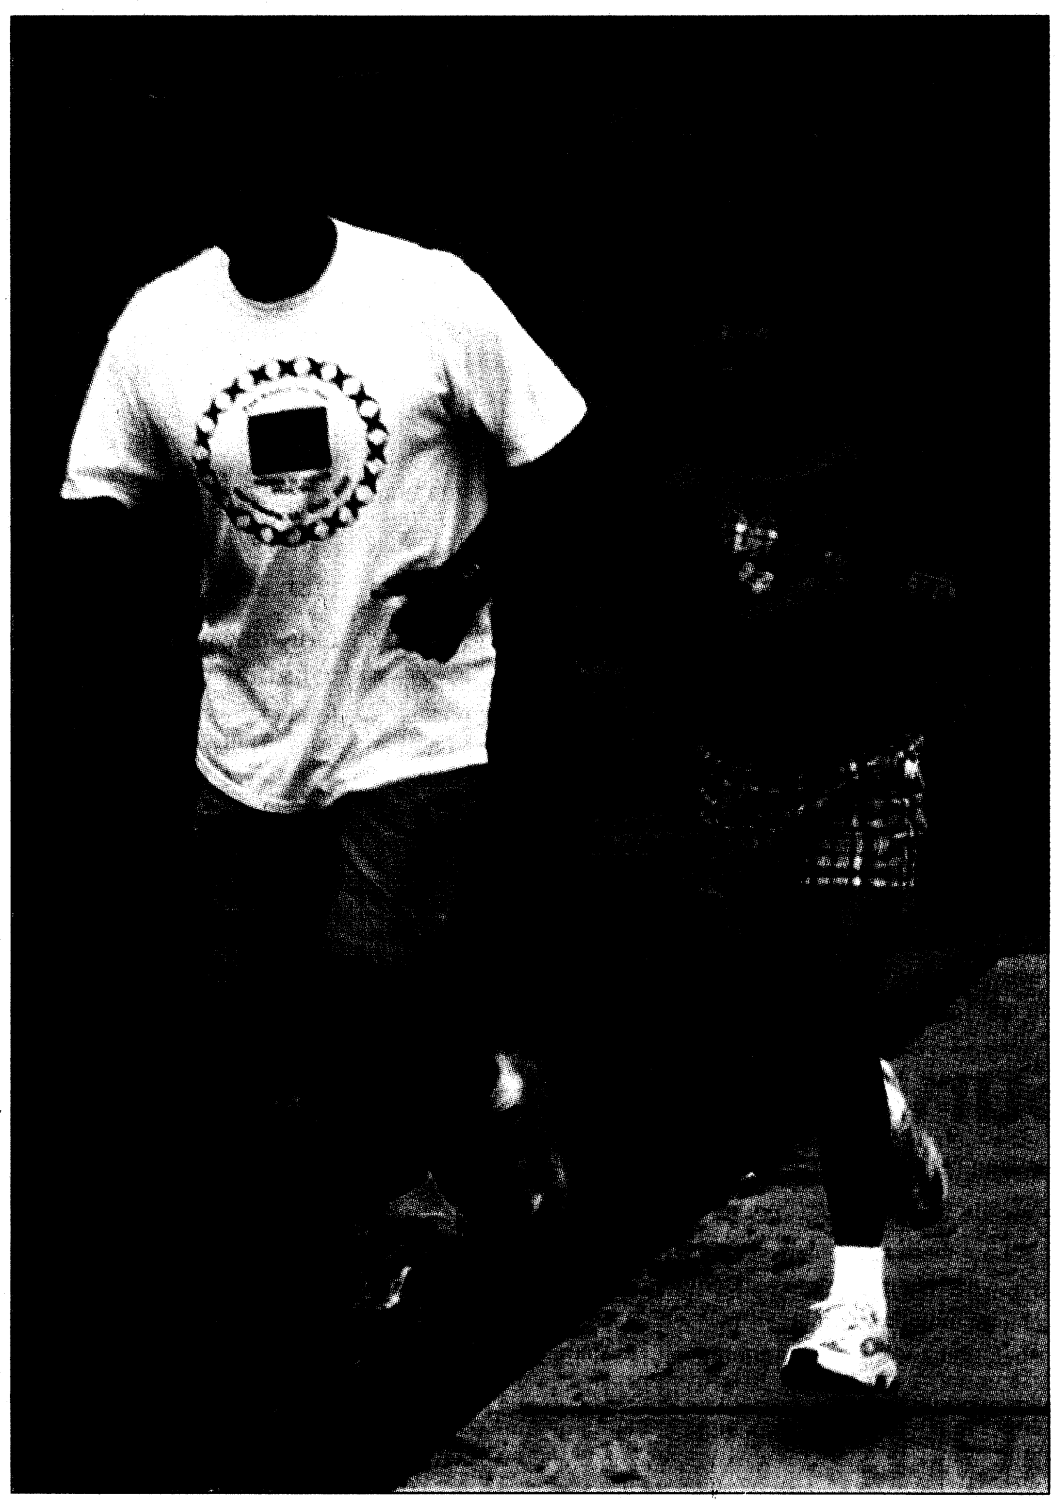
Pfc. Chris Stephens

Loyd Elementary School students clap along with children's author Eddie Bowman Thursday.

"Before he came, we got to read some of his books," said second-grader Destiny Gonzales. "They were real funny, and I was excited that he was coming here."

The visit was also a first brush with fame for some of the students.

"I had never met an author before," said second-grader Filsan Olhaye. "It was nice that he read to us and let us forget that we were in school."



Second-grader Bianca Trevino said she was looking forward to getting Bowman's autograph.

"I like to get autographs from famous people," she said. "It's cool when you collect a lot of them and can show your friends all of the ones you have."

Crow said the school highlights many authors throughout the year, so to have one of them visit the school is great.

"It's nice for the children to put a face to the author of a book they read," she said. "A lot of them will remember this for a long time."

Run like the wind

Pfc. Chris Stephens

Staff Sgt. Roy Trevino, left, a student at Fort Benning's Drill Sergeant School, runs with his daughter, Bianca, 8, during a one-mile run in physical education class at Loyd Elementary School Wednesday. Parents were invited by the school to run along with their children during the class.

Students celebrate Earth Day

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

Throughout the week, Loyd Elementary School students were preparing for Earth Day, which was Thursday.

As part of their preparation, the students learned about effects of pollution caused by garbage.

"We want the students to learn early in their life what happens to the environment when we decide to throw our trash on the ground," said kindergarten teacher, Katherine Walker. "We tried to raise their awareness, so they can go out and help keep the Earth clean."

Kindergartner Bruce Summers said he would be cleaning up his backyard for Earth Day.

"My dog got into stuff and there is a lot of trash around," he said. "I didn't make the mess, but I'm still going to help out."

As part of their Earth Day celebration, the students participated in a parade.

But this was not an ordinary parade. The students marched in costumes they made out of items that could have been thrown away or recycled.

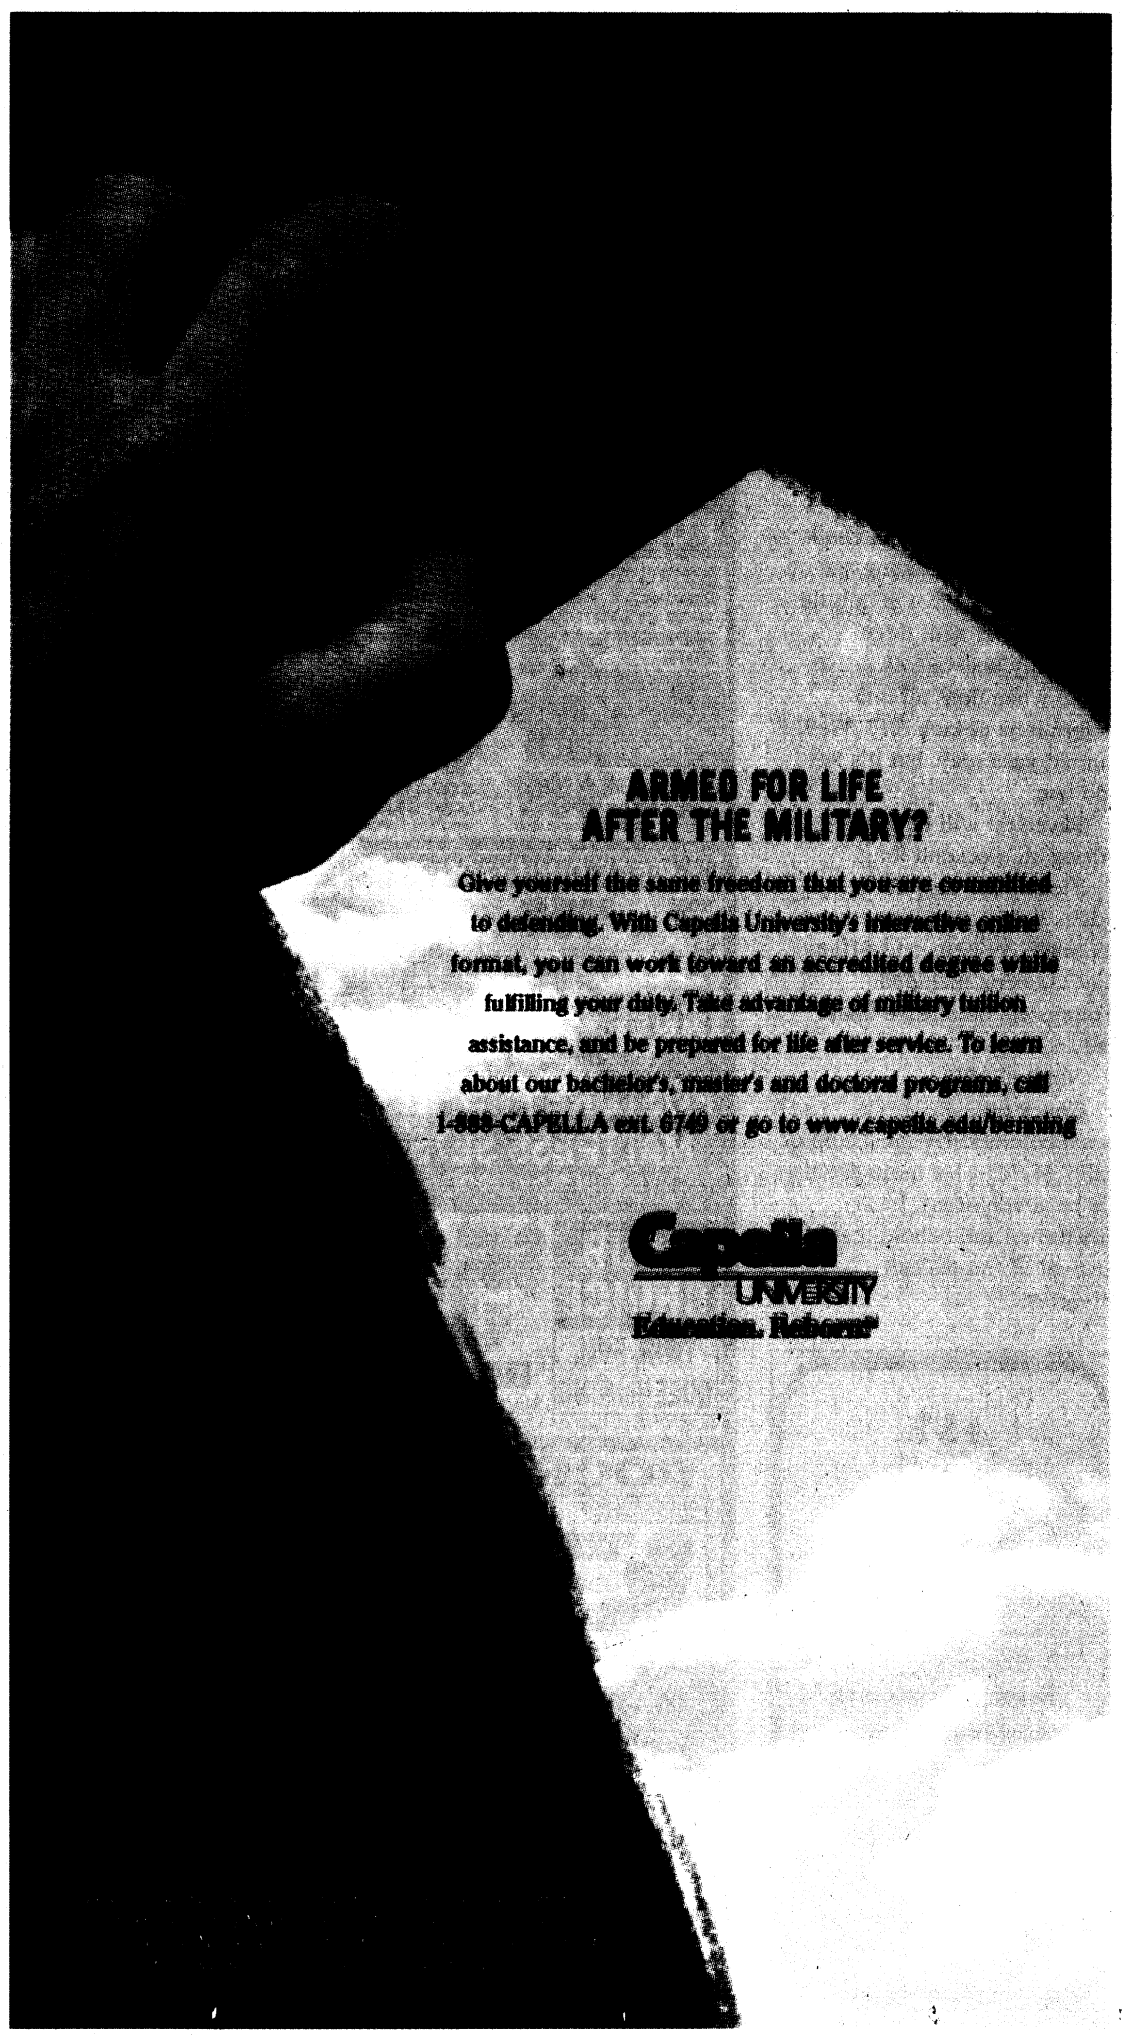
"We told the students to be creative," Walker said. "We told them to use plastic bottles, newspapers and other stuff they would have otherwise gotten rid of."

"When you see 400 students marching around the school in newspapers, plastic bottles and soda cans, you see how much trash we really throw away. And that's just in one school. Imagine if we all put our trash together, how much that would be."

Kindergartner Celeste Huff said she had fun making her costume for the parade.

"My costume is cool," she said. "It is made out of plastic bags, and it has a butterfly on it made out of newspaper. I also have a crown I will put on my head that is made out of newspaper."

The students also had the opportunity to make noisemakers out of paper towel rolls.



"I can't wait to use them," said kindergartner Chasity Twyman. "I want to shake it and make a lot of noise."

Walker said many of the students will continue to try to keep their area clean.

"We told them that Earth Day isn't the only day they should help out," she said. "They know they have to help keep the Earth clean everyday, so that there is less pollution."

REFLECTIONS

There are many theories regarding success. We can approach the discussion on success with the kind of things that make people successful, or we can begin with a definition of what is success. I believe that success is an attitude of the heart. We do not need to be rich, or to lead a large corporation to be successful. All we really need is to develop life-giving abilities. If we can share our lives with others and in that process we help them find enjoyment in their relationships with God and others, we will be successful. Let me share with you what I call two principles for successful living.

• Only keep your own score. I have been playing golf for more than 20 years. I have not gotten very good at it, but I play well enough to enjoy the game. In my first 8 years of golfing I spent a great deal of energy and time keeping mental score of other players' games in my foursomes. I would finish games upset and exhausted. One day I joined a gentleman for a round of golf. I remember very distinctly that he was not as good as I. We came upon the 12th hole, a par five, as I recall. I had a couple of decent shots and ended with up with a bogey six. I was satisfied. I had seen my partner take shot after shot and not make a great deal of progress. I counted as many as 11 strokes, but to my amazement at the end of the hole he declared triumphantly that he had scored a five and had parred the hole. I figured that he shaved at least six strokes. Even though I am a slow learner, several questions hit me at once. What was it to me whether my golf partner is successful or not? Why not celebrate his good shots and mourn his bad shots? I cannot be successful if I am always comparing my score to that of a person next to me. Keeping my own score means that my personal success is not limited by other's successes.

Scott

• Take ownership of self — A world-class chess player once said that if he was able to make his first 10 moves without resistance from his opponent, he could win every game in less than 30 moves. He believed he could control the board to such an extent that he could put the other player in a constant defensive posture. In playing chess, I learned quickly that while I have to react and respond to my opponents' moves; it is always up to me HOW I respond. Every move I make requires that I pick up my chess piece and move it where I want to. I make choices when to sacrifice a pawn, bishop, or a knight. But it is always my decision. I cannot point fingers at anyone else. All I can do is learn to play the game well enough so that I make the best possible moves with the knowledge and experience I have acquired.

Taking ownership of my moves means that I must strive to know, to the best of my abilities, how the game of life is played.

It pays to check your life gauges

Chaplain (Maj.) Jeffrey Hawkins
Chaplain Family Life Center

Recently I was tooling around in my well-dinged, mean-green driving machine: my 165,000-mile Jeep Grand Cherokee. In fact, last weekend was so gorgeous that I just had to hook the boat up and head for the backwaters (if you think my car is old, you should see my boat!) I hadn't gone too far when I made it a point to look down and check three gauges on my dash: the temperature, the gas and the oil pressure. Why did I check them?

Well, experience is a great teacher, and last year, I learned a painful lesson. One fine Saturday, Team Hawkins scrambled all around the house collecting everything from snorkels to skis to SPF 5000 and then loaded up for a fantastic day on the water. In all the frenzy and excitement, however, Dad didn't check the gauges. And lo and behold, instead of cooling off from the blazing sun on Lake Harding, we were sweltering over a spewing radiator in 100-degree heat. It always pays to check to gauges, doesn't it?

Hawkins

And if it pays to check the gauges on you car, just think how much more sense it makes to check the gauges on your life. What are those gauges? Well, when it comes to your relationships, I can think of at least three:

Gauge #1 — Draining relationships. Ever have those people that you cross paths with that, shall we say, "suck the very life out of you?" You know these people. When faced with the prospect of an evening at their house, you remark to your loved one, "I'd rather have all my toenails pulled out one by one and salt poured in the wounds!" If the draining relationships in your life are completely blocking you from enjoying folks in the next two categories, then you may want to consider some emergency roadside assistance.

Gauge #2 — Neutral relationships. These are friends who don't empty your tank — but they don't necessarily fill your tank either. They just are. These are folks that you can take or leave.

Gauge #3 — Replenishing relationships. Now here's where you want to maximize your efforts! If you could take a vacation with anybody you could, who would it be? Who inspires you to dream? Many of us could use a few more of these folks in our lives.

So this week as you're driving around, don't just check out the dashboard of your car... check out the dashboard of your relational life! If you need help in getting a tune-up, come see me at CrossRoads Contemporary Chapel at 11 a.m. Sundays on Kelley Hill or call the CFLC at 545-1760.

More than 250 people attended the Saturday grand opening of the skate park and adjoining teen center, The Hangout. The park will be open Tuesday through Saturday for registered CYS members between 6 and 18.

Die-hard skaters lined up at 6 a.m. Saturday for the grand opening of Fort Benning's skateboard park and teen center. By the time the gates opened at 10 a.m., the excitement was palpable among the grunge-dressed, board-bearing teens who tried hard to look anything but excited.

It took Brig. Gen. Benjamin Freakley several minutes to quiet the crowd, mostly Fort Benning youth who've been clamoring for a place to skate for some time now. The park, said Freakley, Fort Benning's commanding general, proves "the people of this post care about what (the youth) on this post want."

Skaters long complained about the lack of skate facilities locally and what they perceived as harassment by law enforcement officials on and off post, said 17-year-old Malcolm Mobley. When a group of students from Spencer High School broached the subject at a teen town-hall meeting last year, post officials took note.

"They said show us an interest, and we did," said Mobley, who helped collect 350 signatures on a petition for the construction of a skate park.

Freakley said he urged officials to "move fast" on the project, and the folks at Child and Youth Services and the Directorate of Morale, Welfare and Recreation responded with enthusiasm.

"This is a total team effort," Freakley said, before inviting a group of teens to help him cut the ribbon.

About 250 people, some on wheels, some not, swarmed the park, which was designed by Skatewave of Illinois and constructed by Wynn Contractors, a local company.

Local artist Dave Alcott painted graffiti art on the park walls and inside the adjoining teen center, called The Hangout, which features a pool table, computers, a snack bar and plasma TV.

Professional skateboarders Joe Pino and Dorian Tucker performed for the crowd after Tucker encouraged his audience to "skate smart." A skater's most important investment is not a top-of-the-line skateboard, he said.

"Your helmet is the most important piece of equipment you can buy. Pads are good — they'll save you a trip to the hospital. But a good helmet will save your life," he said.

After the demonstration, the park was opened to all skaters. Alex Johnson, 16, gave the course his nod of approval and described the park as "mellow."

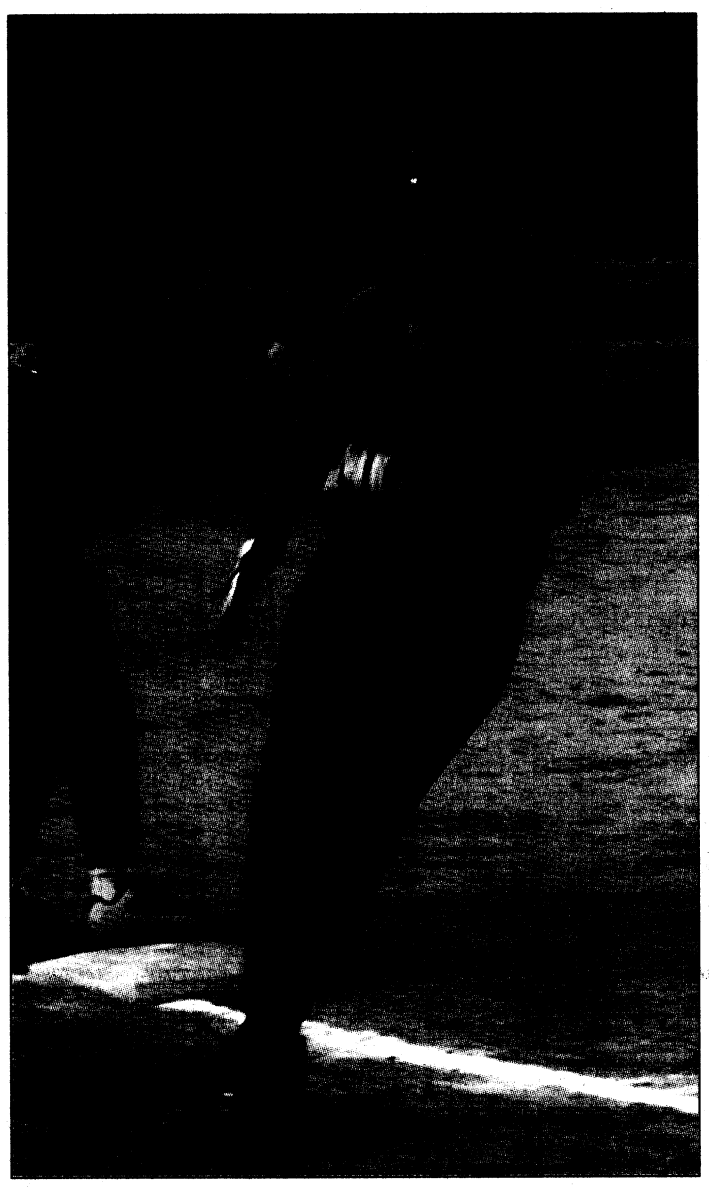
"It's smooth. It's got an easy flow," said Johnson, who skates competitively for Media Skateboards. "It's got a nice combination of ramps and a smooth set-up. It's mellow."

The skate park and teen center is open to registered CYS members. All skaters must have a waiver on file signed by a parent. The skate park is open Tuesday through Friday from 3 to 5 p.m. and Saturday from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. for members ages 6-10.

The park is open Tuesday through Friday from 5 to 8 p.m. and Saturday from 1 to 8 p.m. for CYS members 11-18.



The Hangout will be open Tuesday through Thursday from 3 to 8 p.m. and Friday and Saturday from 3 to 10 p.m.

The Youth Services 9- to 12-year-old Marlins came out on top in a game against the Sea Wolves, 13-1, Tuesday.

The Marlins, powered by strong hitting and great pitching, overmatched their opponents the entire game.

"These kids have worked hard at all of our practices," said Alberto Benitez, the Marlins' head coach. "They continually want to get better, and it shows out on the field during both games and practices. I'm proud of the effort they put in every day."

After Sea Wolves pitcher Lucas Carswell loaded the bases with walks, Byron Weaver and Steven Benitez hit consecutive one-run singles to give the Marlins an early lead.

"It was nice to score a couple runs in the first inning," said Marlins' pitcher Kyle Weaver. "It's easier to play the game when you are beating the other team."

The Sea Wolves got back one of those runs in the bottom of the first inning after Marlins pitcher Albert Benitez walked four straight.

After Kyle came in to pitch, the Sea Wolves couldn't do anything. He struck out three to leave runners stranded on all three bases.

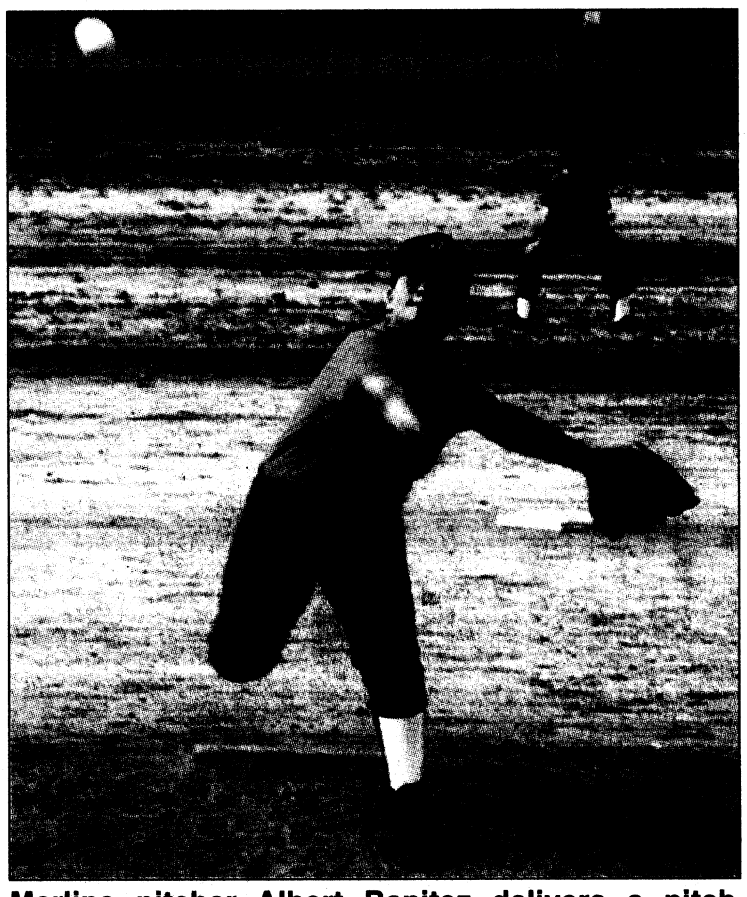
The Marlins' offense came alive in the bottom of the second inning, when they scored six runs. The inning started with the bases loaded with walks by Sea Wolves pitchers. Scott Gallup and Kyle hit consecutive two-run doubles to open the Marlins lead.

But the inning didn't stop there. Byron and Steven each drove in a run to end the inning.

Kyle continued his dominance on the hill, striking out five of the next eight batters.

The highlight of the game for the Marlins was in the top of the fourth inning, when Kyle, Byron, Steven and Albert all hit inside-the park homeruns.

"I don't think I've ever seen that happen," Alberto said. "Hopefully we can continue to hit the ball that well in the rest of our games."



Even with the score well out of reach, the Sea Wolves never giving up.

"I'm proud of the way these players continued to play," said Sea Wolves coach James Connell. "We have a very young team, and they're starting to learn more about the game."

At the end of the game, the players congratulated each other on a game well played.

"They played good today," Kyle said. "Sometimes that's just the way the game goes. You never know what's going to happen."

With the win, the Marlins' record is now 6-0, and the Sea Wolves drop to 2-3 on the season.

Post troops train Iraqi army

Iraqi soldiers being trained to Army standard

Spc. Eliamar Castanon
Bayonet staff

A group of Fort Benning Soldiers and civilians are responsible for building the new Iraqi Army. Three of those Soldiers are Fort Benning leaders — Maj. Gen. Paul Eaton, former post commanding general, Col. Jeffery Buchanan, director of Fort Benning's Combat Development, and Maj. Geoffrey Fuller, Eaton's former aide-de-camp.

Buchanan and Fuller recently returned from their assignments overseas, working as the coalition director of operations for the Coalition Military Assistance Training Team and the CMATT headquarters commandant respectively.

CMATT is responsible for manning, training and equipping the new Iraqi army.

Eaton, Buchanan and Fuller are all quick to say that the construction of this new army is not an individual achievement. CMATT has called on experts from the U.S., Australia, Great Britain, Jordan, Spain, Poland and Romania.

Also, they all agreed that the success of the mission is due in part to the hard work of the Fort Benning NCOs who are helping to train the new army and to Sandy Ellis, budget chief.

The blend of tactics, techniques and procedures will allow the Iraqi army to best select what works for them, Eaton said.

The old Iraqi army was disbanded in May 2003 when the coalition took over Iraq.

It was composed of more than 400,000 men, including 12,000 generals — compared with 300 generals for the American Army of almost 500,000, Eaton said.

"The army was large, inefficient and officer bloated," Eaton said.

Staff Sgt. Adam Nash, 75th Ranger Regiment, hangs on tight during the inverted rope descent at the Best Ranger Competition this weekend. Nash and his teammate, Staff Sgt. Colin Boley won the competition.

75th Regt. Rangers take home top title

Spc. Nikki St. Amant
Bayonet staff

The 2004 David E. Grange Jr. Best Ranger Competition wrapped up three days of grueling challenges Monday with an awards ceremony announcing the Best Ranger team.

Staff Sgts. Colin Boley and Adam Nash, both of the 75th Ranger Regiment, edged out the second-place team, Staff Sgt. John Sheaffer and Sgt. 1st Class Matthew Wilson, also of the 75th Ranger Regt., by just nine points.

The third-place team was Staff Sgt. Jeffrey Lewis and Capt. Corbett McCallum, both of the 4th Ranger Training Battalion.

The 21st annual, three-day competition started April 23 and pitted 19 teams of Ranger-tabbed Soldiers from around the Army against each other in a series of events designed to challenge the contestants both mentally and physically.

Nash said he started training for the competition about seven weeks ago and wasn't even sure he was going to get the chance to compete until a few days before the event.

"I got injured before the regiment coach broke the teams up, and I was left out," Nash said. "I was an alternate."

Nash was teamed up with Boley, who returned from a deployment to Afghanistan two weeks before the competition began, and the two decided to participate.

Nash said he didn't go into the event expecting to win.

"In my eyes," Nash said, "if I would have been in Vegas, I would have put all my money on Wilson and Sheaffer — they are a strong team."

Boley initially turned down the offer to compete, thinking he was not prepared.

"My biggest goal going into the competition was to not end up in the hospital," he said. "I really didn't want to go to the hospital."

Another of Boley's main goals was to do something for the Rangers who couldn't be here for the competition, he said.

"I think we focus too much on the competition and not enough on the guys who are deployed," Boley said. "We participated to represent the (75th Ranger) regiment and to honor Soldiers who are deployed."

Col. K. K. Chinn, 75th Ranger Regt. deputy commander, said it is awesome to have Soldiers in his unit placing first and second in the competition.

"These guys are dedicated, hard-working Soldiers who competed as representatives of the Soldiers in the 75th Ranger Regiment," he said.

Chinn said the determination demonstrated by Nash, Sheaffer

TRADOC chief calls for training changes

Spc. Nikki St. Amant
Bayonet staff

Current and upcoming changes in Training and Doctrine Command programs designed to tap the growing wealth of combat experience in Army ranks and lessons learned in Operations Iraqi and Enduring Freedom were a major focus of information the TRADOC commander, Gen. Kevin Byrnes, put out during a visit to Fort Benning April 22.

Byrnes said one of the biggest changes will be the curriculums of current TRADOC courses. With the growing number of combat-tested Soldiers, much of the information taught in the officer and NCO education systems is irrelevant, he said.

"There is a tremendous effort underway to modify our schoolhouse to account for a very experienced force that has 'been there, done that,' as well as a force operating in an environment that's different than (the Army has) operated in before," Byrnes said. "So we're adapting our Soldier programs and leader development programs to meet those needs."

Byrnes said the entire NCOES will transform based on input and research done by combat-veteran NCOs. The new system will be focused on training Soldiers as part of a force that is, and will remain, at sustained war. These changes are expected to go into effect Armywide Oct. 1, he said.

The Henry Caro NCO Academy commandant, Command Sgt. Maj. Charles Raper, said the Training and Doctrine commander Gen. Kevin Byrnes discussed several upcoming changes in how TRADOC does business:

- Education systems will add lessons learned based on information from combat vets.
- Basic training will be tougher.
- ANCOC, BNCOC will conduct concurrent combat leader training.

Prep for the postwide

Bridgett Siter
Bayonet staff

The May 8 postwide yard sale is not for the weak or faint-hearted. You should not attempt it if you have problems with your heart or bladder. It's not recommended for pregnant or nursing women or anyone older than 65, and especially not pregnant or nursing women older than 65.

That said, there's nothing like it. It's one of the highlights of my year. But then so is the Mother's Day all-you-can-eat barbecue buffet at Sonny's, so you shouldn't base your expectations on my recommendation.

My point, and I have one, is that this particular yard sale should not be undertaken lightly. It's intense — a yard sale of biblical proportions, shock and awe and all that. You get the idea.

Ideally, those of us given to yard sale madness would take advantage of the strategically scheduled Best Ranger Competition, which usually takes place a week or so before the PWYS. The BRC would be a good warm-up exercise for the sale, and the whole Ranger buddy system would lend itself nicely to the yard sale format. We could call them Bargain Buddies.

Until BRC officials come around to seeing things my way, and I'm working on it, I have another solution, a sure fire way to prevent the strained muscles and bruised shins that result from what I call "cold saling."

Out of the kindness of my heart and consideration for sister salers across post, I've scheduled a yard sale at my house Saturday — a sale savvy shoppers will consider a dry-run, a warm-up, a pre-postwide sale of pre-posterous proportions. It'll be a doozy.

Lots and lots of really nice people with really good taste in clothing and accessories have donated merchandise to my sale, and with good reason. Proceeds from my pre PWYS will go to the American Cancer Society.

You see, a few of my Bargain Buddies and I annually participate in the Relay For Life, the society's premier fund-raiser. Our team raises money, as do all the other teams, for cancer research and treatment.

With the relay just a couple of weeks away, we're way behind the power curve. Time to do our part to support a cause we believe in. If you believe like we believe, join us tomorrow morning, say shortly after 8 a.m., at 302 Austin Loop, across from Riverside and the Office of the Staff Judge Advocate (aka JAG) on Main Post. Hope to see you there.

Editor's Note: The Bayonet can not be held responsible for any injury, accident or bankruptcy incurred during the postwide or pre-postwide yard sale as a result of this article. The printing of this article does not constitute compliance, validation or support of any vendor's pricing or policy.

The Bayonet strongly recommends its readers consult their doctors before beginning the postwide yard sale or any other form of strenuous activity. Don't say we didn't warn you.

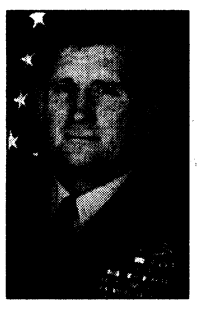
SEXUAL ASSAULT

Army won't tolerate it



Sexual assault is a crime that cannot and will not be tolerated in the U.S. Army. It has a devastating and often lasting impact on the victim, a fellow Soldier. Moreover, sexual assault tears at the moral fiber of our unit formations, degrading our readiness.

Brownlee

Sexual assault has no place in the Army ... we're a values based organization; we take care of our fellow Soldiers ... and treat all Soldiers with dignity and respect.

Army policy promotes awareness and education to prevent sexual assault; sensitive care for sexual assault victims; aggressive, timely, and thorough investigation of all reported sexual assaults; and accountability for those who commit these crimes.

Schoomaker

Further, we demand and expect that leaders at every level will create and promote a positive command climate in which victims have the confidence in the chain of command and criminal investigators to report these crimes immediately.

Additionally, leaders must ensure that Soldiers and other members of the Army community treat sexual assault victims with dignity, fairness, and respect for their privacy.

The Army has existing medical and legal policies and programs to assist leaders. Use these resources to provide victims with immediate medical care, follow-up counseling and seamless victim assistance.

Bottom line: this is a leadership and chain of command issue. Let's make the right things happen.

CORRECTION

Last week's paper incorrectly reported the date and time of 1st Sgt. Ty Sariego's death. He died April 18 at 11:12 p.m. in the Alabama Medical Center.

Also in last week's paper, the date for the AUSA Job Fair is wrong. The correct date is May 13.

Suicide doesn't stop hurt for families, friends

Spc. Nikki St. Amant
Bayonet staff

The ironies of life never cease to amaze me.

A little more than a month ago I wrote an article about suicide imploring those considering killing themselves to seek help and advising friends and family members to be proactive with loved ones who may be at risk.

That was the first article I have written in my short career I felt served a higher calling. The idea that through my job I would have the opportunity to reach out to people and make a difference to even one person filled me with a sense of meaningful usefulness and relief that my life can have more substance and purpose than just tapping the oxygen supply of the earth until I die.

Then, three weeks ago, my cousin sat outside my uncle's camp, (which for all you non-Louisianians is a lodge-type house on a piece of land on the banks of the Atchafalaya Basin used for recreational get-aways,) put a black plastic bag over his head, tied it shut around his neck with a shoelace and used a hose to pump it full of freon. My uncle found him the next morning. He was 20 years old when he killed himself.

Once again, I felt purposeless. I thought to myself, "If I can't help someone I know and love then how can I ever hope to reach complete strangers?"

After wallowing in self-pity for a few days, I had this incredible moment of clarity and realized that at a time when I should have been grieving the loss of a friend and family member, I was grieving the loss of my own sense of purpose. How shamelessly self-involved is that? I think it was a sick form of denial to get me through those first 72 hours. Then I got angry.

How dare he kill himself?

How could he do that to his parents, to his friends, to ME? Once again, everything seemed to end up revolving around how horrible this was for me instead of how horrible it must have been for him.

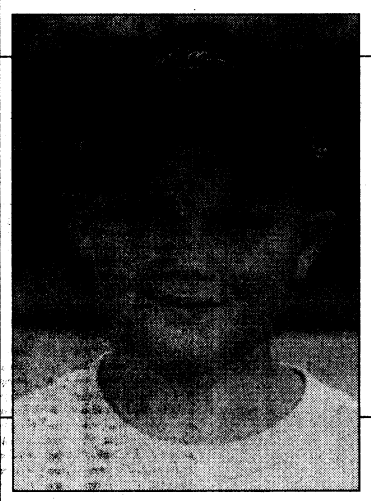
So, I decided that some way I had to let go of all that and find a way to let myself grieve his death instead of the end of my short-lived endeavor into the realm of "wanna-be" social service work.

After nine-hours of listening to very deep music and countless out-loud arguments with myself, I managed to put myself in his shoes.

I felt all the pain I know he must have been feeling. I imagined all the shame he must have felt for the things he had done. I envisioned in every direction the bleak hopelessness that lay before him and understood on some level how he came to the edge and decided to let himself go.

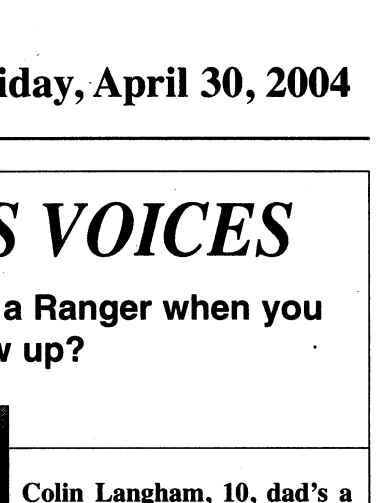
Then I realized, for the first time, the most important thing about the mechanics of suicide. Human beings are unique in that we can survive just about any hardship, endure any hellish existence, as long as we have hope. Once hope is gone, the will to live fades quickly.

It killed me that, at only 20 years old, this smart, funny, good-looking young man had endured so much personal pain and was so blinded by his misery that he could not see tomorrow.



All I need to keep me going through all the endless trials and mostly self-inflicted tribulations of my life is the knowledge that, as far as I know, the sun is going to rise tomorrow. The chance that out of all the remaining days of my life I could have one beautiful summer day, an open road leading to a beach fronting blue waters and friends and family I love to share it with is worth a million days of misery. Life and the simple ability to exist is just that amazing to me.

That is hope to me — that tomorrow could be that one perfect day in all my life, and, you know what? That chance isn't worth throwing away.



So to anyone out there who is on the edge, if you don't call your chaplain, if you don't tell a friend you need help, if you do nothing else to help yourself, all I ask is that you paint a picture in your mind of your one perfect day and hold onto it with all your might, because tomorrow is coming, whether you believe it or not, and it could be your day.

Post to work on hospital parking

Melissa House
Bayonet staff

Martin Army Community Hospital patients and employees frustrated by the current parking situation will have to wait a bit longer for the situation to ease.

"We recognize the necessity of this (additional parking) project," said Chuck Walls, deputy garrison commander, "and we hoped to see work on it shortly, but funding is extremely tight."

In fact, Walls said, funding is so tight, it is nonexistent at the moment, causing the parking lot and several other priority projects to be put on hold.

Walls said the parking lot was an easy design and the plans are all ready to go once the money comes — hopefully with end-of-year funds. If those funds don't become available, Walls said he's optimistic the project will happen in fiscal 2005.

Walls said the parking woes are due to an increase in the Army's operational tempo and the role Fort Benning and MACH play in the mobilization and demobilization of Reserve and National Guard Soldiers. Medical holds add to an already robust patient load of Soldiers, retirees and their families.

MACH's chief of Facilities management, Chris Flowers, said the parking lot currently has 954 marked spaces, 89 designated spaces and 59 handicap spaces.

Those spaces, Flowers said, hold the nearly 1,700 people who come and park at MACH each day. The Directorate of Public Works is working with the 36th Engineer Group to lay gravel in the new lot until it can be paved.

The expansion, Walls said, will give much needed breathing room.

In the meantime, patients have been making their own temporary parking, sometimes with unpleasant results.

Sgt. Tiffany Wynn said the traffic section is acting on parking complaints from the hospital, ticketing and towing cars illegally parked in handicap spaces.

Parking on the grass is OK, Wynn said, but cars parked and impeding traffic in fire lanes or on sidewalks, will be dealt with.

Photos by Melissa House

The majority of the 954 spaces in the parking lot at Martin Army Community Hospital were full at noon April 28. One MACH employee said parking is such a problem, "if you don't get here by 6:30 a.m., you won't find a spot."

Additional visitor parking, available behind the handicap section, is "free-form" parking on the grass.

Benning captain reunites with troop he helped save

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

Capt. George Chigi doesn't consider himself a hero. But for one Texas family, he's more than a hero; he's an angel. Alan's angel, that is.

Cpl. Alan Babin and Chigi were fellow paratroopers in 1st Battalion, 325th Parachute Regiment, 82nd Airborne Division, when the unit deployed to Iraq.

On March 31, 2003, the unit was working to secure a bridge on the Euphrates River near Samawah, Iraq, when it came under intense enemy fire and Babin saw another paratrooper go down in an open field. The 23-year-old medic wasted no time, giving up cover and rushing to aid the Soldier.

Before he could reach him, Babin was shot in the stomach. The shot hit him in the side, an area his body armor did not cover.

Chigi, who was fighting nearby, took a call over the radio to "secure the objective and get him out." By the time Chigi and a group of other Soldiers reached the fallen trooper, Babin was "in bad shape," Chigi said.

From there, they evacuated him to the aid station. That was the last time Chigi saw him. That is, until about two weeks ago, when an incredible coincidence reunited one war hero with another.

After nearly a year of complications, surgeries and moving from hospital to hospital, Babin was admitted to the Texas Neuro Rehab Center in Austin, Texas, on Christmas Eve, bringing him closer to his hometown of Red Rock, Texas.

And closer to Chigi's father, Special Agent George Chigi, a retired Soldier with the Criminal Investigation Division in Fort Hood, Texas.

George Sr.'s good buddies in the Vietnam Veterans and Legacy Veterans Motorcycle Club learned of Babin's sacrifice and ongoing hardships and decided to hold a fund-raising rally in his honor.

When they learned Babin was with the 82nd, they asked George Sr. if his son might know him.

Once they discovered George Jr.'s role in his rescue, it was a given — George Jr. had to be there for the rally.

So the officer, now home from war and preparing to take a position in the 29th Infantry Regiment, loaded up his Harley and headed for Austin. But before he left, he grabbed an 82nd flag and began collecting signatures from fellow paratroopers. And at the rally on April 17, he continued gathering signatures — those of World War II, Korea and Vietnam vets.

The next day, George Jr., his father and some of the motorcycle club veterans made the ride to Red Rock, flag waving, to Babin's home, where they presented it to him and met his family.

Courtesy photo

Capt. George Chigi, right, presents the 82nd's flag to Cpl. Alan Babin, who was wounded in Iraq in March 2003. Chigi helped rescue him.

The scene was emotional.

"(His mother) hugged me and said, 'Thank you for bringing my baby home,' and at that point, I just lost it," he said. "Everyone was misty-eyed."

George Sr. painted a similar picture.

"There were a lot of tears shed — here you have all these grizzled, old men standing there crying," he said. "It was just a fantastic thing to be part of."

The gratitude from Babin's family and the "amazing turnout of supporters" at the rally overwhelmed George Jr., who is quick to remind people that he wasn't the only one involved in the rescue.

But that doesn't matter to Babin's mother, who has her son home alive, or to George Sr.

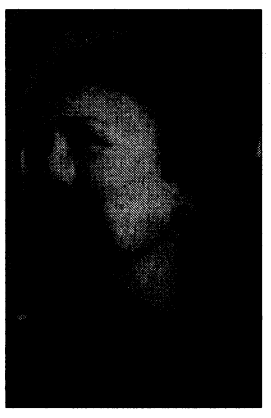
"I almost can't even talk about it, because I'm just so proud of him, of how modest he is," George Sr. said. "Just being a part of (the rally), watching him interact with the Babin family ... it was just so emotional and so incredible that I could be there to witness it."

Beloved Army wife laid to rest in post cemetery

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

While the men of 1st Battalion, 7th Cavalry fought, bled and died in Vietnam's Ia Drang Valley in November 1965, a smaller, but no less important battle raged at home.

This battle was waged not by tireless, American Soldiers, but by an outraged Army wife, wielding nothing but the heartfelt determination that the families of her husband's fallen Soldiers would be treated with the respect and compassion their sacrifices deserved.



That woman was Julie Moore. And on April 22, she was laid to rest beside the men she fought so valiantly to honor.

The wife of retired Lt. Gen. Hal Moore — the battalion commander at the time of the 1st Bn., 7th Cavalry's infamous battle at Landing Zone X-Ray — Julie was appalled to learn that death telegrams for the Soldiers killed in that battle were being delivered by taxi cab drivers.

"In those early days of the war, the Army was overwhelmed by hundreds of death notices for unsuspecting families," wrote Joe Galloway, the war correspondent on the ground with her husband in Vietnam, after Julie's death from cancer April 18 in Auburn, Ala. "It had forgotten how to do this right, so the Western Union telegrams were handed over to taxi drivers."

This was no excuse to Julie, who learned of the practice when a lost taxi driver pulled up to the small house where she and the couple's five young children were living and asked for directions.

"Mrs. Moore followed in the wake of that taxi and others to comfort the new widows and orphans of (the war)," Galloway wrote. "She also raised unshirted hell with the Pentagon about so callous a method of notifying the families."

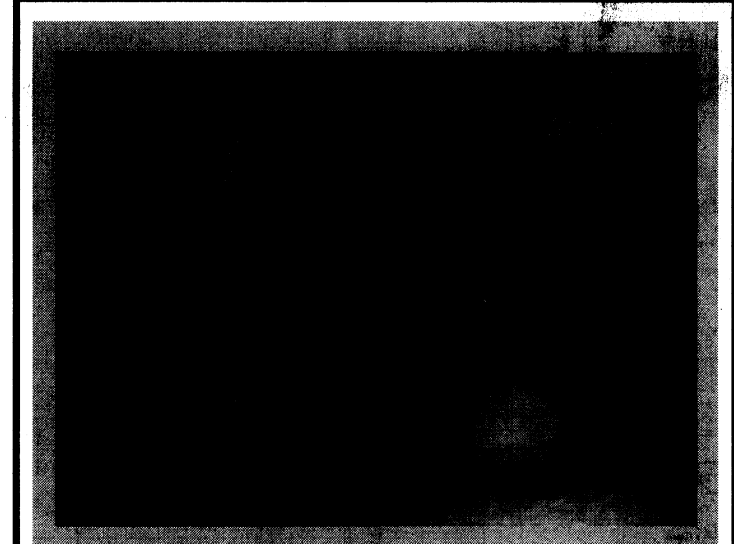
Moore

Within two weeks, he said, the policy was changed and a new one instituted, requiring that an officer and a chaplain personally deliver the news.

Julie's efforts righted an unbelievably impersonal practice and marked the beginning of a concern for Army families that can be seen in today's family readiness groups and Army agencies and programs.

Deemed "one of the finest Army wives who ever walked" by Galloway, Julie knew the meaning of war. Her father fought in Europe in World War II, her husband was wounded in Korea and Vietnam, and one of her sons fought with the 82nd Airborne Division in Panama and the Gulf War, according to an Associated Press article.

As the men of 1st Bn., 7th Cav., began dying in the Ia Drang Valley, "she personally comforted each bereaved family and attended every (local) funeral of every Soldier lost in combat under her husband's command," the article stated.



And she never let them be forgotten. She and her husband visited their graves in the Fort Benning cemetery frequently over the years, long after that terrible battle nearly 40 years ago, long after her husband retired.

Last week, she was buried there, "near her mother and father, and in the middle of the 7th Cavalry troopers whose wives she comforted and whose funerals she attended in 1965," Galloway wrote.

"She will rest in the arms of the Army she loved so long and served so well."

VA office offers work-study opportunities

Part-time jobs available for students

Melissa House
Bayonet staff

Are you going to school as part of a Veterans Administration program? Are you interested in a work-study program that could give you a little extra money each month? If so, the VA office on Fort Benning has an offer for you.

For at least the past 11 years, VA representative Peggy Morris said her office has employed part-time, temporary staff to perform a variety of clerical and administrative tasks in the VA office on Fort Benning.

Morris visited several local colleges and universities last week to see if they had any students to refer for the work-study program.

"The program is designed to provide extra assistance to agencies that provide veterans programs," Morris said, and the part-time jobs are a fringe benefit option for the students while they are attending school.

Students work on a temporary, part-time basis, usually no more than 25 hours a week and at minimum wage. But, Morris said, the pay is tax-free.

The five or six students the Fort Benning office hires take care of duties like filing, making appointments and handing out information

"And anything that leaves our office that is not going to the regional office in Atlanta, or files the Soldiers don't come back to pick up have to be shredded," Morris said. "The students free up the VA counselors to do their jobs."

In addition to processing paperwork at VA offices, work-study options include performing outreach services under the supervision of a VA employee or performing services at VA medical facilities or the offices of the National Cemetery Administration — jobs directly related to VA work.

Soldiers leaving the Army process through the VA office where they receive important information about all of the VA programs available to them. Counselors talk about educational and disability benefits, medical care, loan guarantees, insurance and casualty assistance programs.

Retired Master Sgt. Curdy Dortch worked at the Fort Benning office for Morris for several years after he retired while he completed both his bachelor's degree in social science and then a master's. He now works at the CONUS Replacement Center.

"The work study is a great program when you are transitioning from the military," Dortch said. "It helps you financially with books or whatever."

Retired 1st Sgt. Bill Jordan participated in the work study for about three years after he retired in 1999 while he finished two degrees from Troy State University's Fort Benning campus.

With the support of his wife, Patricia, and mother-in-law, Dorothy Knopf, Jordan said he could concentrate on going to school full-time and not have to take a minimum-wage factory job.

Jordan said the 100 hours each month with the work study were very beneficial to him and allowed him to learn a lot.

"If I didn't find the work study program, I probably would have had to slow down, or even stop my classes," Jordan said. With his degrees, Jordan was able to land a high-salary job as a requirements writer in the electronics division of the Directorate of Combat Development, matching the needs of the Army with technology.

"The Fort Benning VA office is a great team," Jordan said. "They really inspired the work studies to continue their education. I hope more people look into it."

AUSA plans May job fair for Soldiers, civilians

Darsi Busler
USAIC Public Affairs

Update those resumés, brush up on your interview skills and get ready for the Association of the U.S. Army's annual job fair from 9 a.m. to 2 p.m. May 13 in Infantry Hall.

An estimated 100 employers from all over the country, including state police, hospitals and universities, will be available to answer questions, accept resumés and give on-the-spot interviews to potential employees.

"I'm just thoroughly pleased at the amount of companies attending this year's job fair," said Walter Pollock, local veterans employment representative for the Georgia Department of Labor.

The job fair, created eight years ago in conjunction with the Georgia Department of Labor, primarily targets Soldiers and civilian employees who have decided either voluntarily or through reductions in force to leave the Army work force, said retired Col. Richard A. Nurnberg, AUSA's executive vice president.

"We wanted to offer an easy way for Soldiers and civilians affected by downsizing to find new employment," he said.

Family members and the general public are also invited to attend the community's largest job fair. Pollock expects a crowd of nearly 4,000.

In preparation for the job fair, bring at least 20 copies of your resumé and dress for possible on-site interviews.

"This will give each organization a first impression of you ... and answer the question, 'Do we really want this person representing us?'" said Mark Mills, manager, Army Community Service Employment Readiness Program.

In addition, prepare for possible interview questions. Be able to list your job qualifications, explain your marketable skills and when the interviewer asks, "Do you have any questions?" ask something, Mills said.

"The most common answer to that question is 'no,' but it's the one question applicants can control. ... Ask 'What advantages will I have working for your company?' or 'How fast can I expect to advance?'

"Applicants can also use this as an opportunity to say that they don't want to work for the company," Mills said.

Mills also suggested bringing a portfolio containing transcripts, certificates and awards that show above average work, such as employee of the month awards.

"This will make applicants look prepared, show they're detail-oriented and show a good, professional demeanor," he said.

Whether using the job fair as a learning experience, as a job search tool, or as an opportunity to plan a career after retirement, Nurnberg suggests "know what you want, be flexible and make a good first impression" to be successful.

For assistance with writing resumés or cover letters, call the Army Career and Alumni Program Transition Assistance Office at 545-2308 or the Army Community Service Employment Readiness Program at 545-5516.

ON THE ROAD AGAIN

Worker returns to oversee changes to post entrance

Supervisor remembers former job site

Bridgett Siter
Bayonet staff

Charles Shepherd worked on the Lindsey Park entrance when it was originally constructed in 1963.

When 20-year-old Charles Shepherd went to work on the new access road to Fort Benning in 1963, he never thought he'd see the day his country came under attack on its own soil.

"I don't know what this world's coming to," said Shepherd, as he lifted his hard hat and tipped his head to the breeze Monday. Now a supervisor for Alexander Contracting, the company responsible for the roadwork at three of the post's six new access control points, Shepherd's aware that the construction has caused "a lot of fuss" among those whose daily commute has been disrupted.

Back in '63, he said, local folks "were tickled to death" at the prospect of a new entrance to Fort Benning. Back then, the road would make the drive to work more convenient. Post employees would breeze through the gate with a sticker on their windshield. No need to stop.

"Of course, back then, there was no such thing as a terrorist threat," Shepherd said.

Back then, the "Stone Gate" on Fort Benning Road was the only route from Columbus to post. It would be another decade before I-185 was built. The road that linked Airport Thruway and Victory Drive was called the Lindsey Park Bypass.

So when Fort Benning officials contracted the Hewitt Construction Company to extend the bypass to Dixie Road, the new access road was naturally dubbed Lindsey Park, a name few residents recognize these days.

And few will recognize the Lindsey Park entrance once it's reopened, Shepherd said. The changes, which include the addition of several incoming lanes, with separate checkpoints for trucks, and a new welcome center, will be worth the wait.

"In the long run, everybody's going to love it," he said.

And considering the two years it took to construct the road back in the 60s, "the long run" isn't very long at all. With construction "pretty much on schedule," the road will likely be opened by the end of August, said Capt. Mindy Rosito, project manager for the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers.

Shortly after the Lindsey Creek access road re-opens, construction will begin on the access control point at the Fort Benning Road entrance. The inbound lanes will be closed for that project, Rosito said.

Retired warrior shares experiences

Vietnam veteran offers insight to Benning leaders

"We've got to deal with what it is to lose Soldiers," said commanding general, Brig. Gen. Benjamin Freakley.

This was just one of the lessons he hoped to impart on Fort Benning Soldiers at this month's Combat Leadership Speaker's Program.

The Infantry School began the program in March to allow former warriors to share their experiences with today's leaders to prepare them for future challenges.

Students from the Infantry Captains Career Course, Infantry Officer Basic Course and Officer Candidate School, along with all assigned company-grade officers, first sergeants and higher gathered in Marshall Auditorium April 22 to hear the Honorable James Webb speak about his experiences.

Webb, a former Secretary of the Navy and best-selling author, is a decorated Vietnam veteran who was awarded the Navy Cross, Silver Star, two Bronze Stars and two Purple Hearts.

"Our speaker is all about leadership ... he's practiced and lived duty, honor and country, those values that we all hold dear," Freakley said in Webb's introduction.

Webb said he hopes Soldiers will combine his knowledge with their own to help understand what Soldiers are facing in today's conflicts, but realizes other factors are also important.

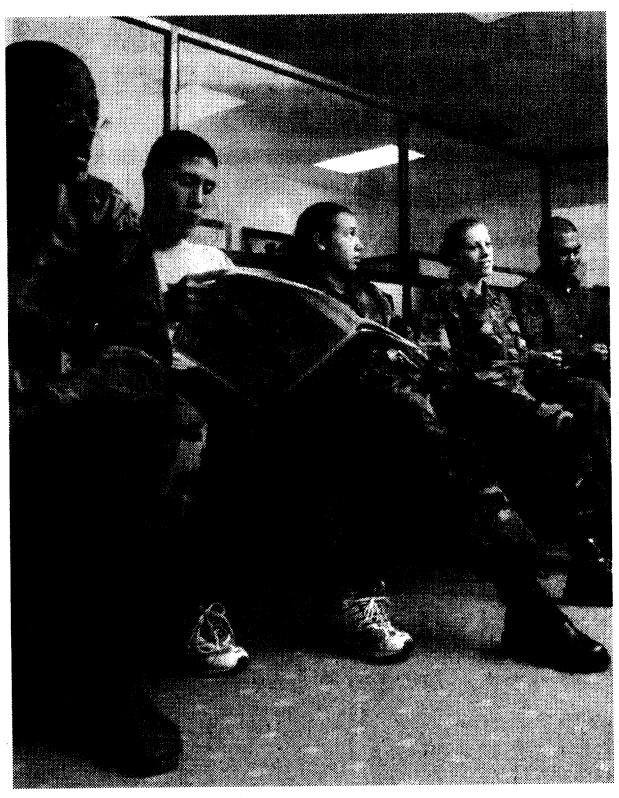
"Success in war not only lies in knowledge, but in the warrior's soul," Webb said.

Webb has seen his share of warriors. He was a rifle platoon leader and company commander with the 5th Marine Regiment in Vietnam's An Hoa Basin, where he turned servicemen into infantrymen.

There, he was faced with guerrilla warfare, including hit and runs, booby traps, snipers, ambushes and hidden ordnance.

"When you can't trust the ground, it affects the way you think," Webb said.

Besides these tactics, Webb saw conventional war strategies and terrorist strikes against people associated with the South Vietnamese government, scenes similar to those played out in Iraq today.



While Webb walked away from Vietnam a changed man, he said, he learned valuable leadership lessons, which he shared with the Fort Benning leaders in attendance:

- Trust the quality of your people and insist they live up to that quality.
- Anticipate what may go wrong in every mission and know what actions you will take if it does.
- Keep a good institutional memory.
- Trust your doctrine but be adaptable.
- Respect traditions and those who went before you.
- Interrupting sleep patterns affects personality, judgment and temper.
- 24-hour security is key to successful missions.
- Moral dilemmas are part of being a leader, so know what you can and cannot do.

"I've seen 19-year-olds make moral decisions CEOs of today would never touch," Webb said.

Army scientists, engineers develop liquid body armor

Tonya Johnson
Army News Service

ABERDEEN PROVING GROUND, Md. — Liquid armor for Kevlar vests is one of the newest technologies being developed at the U.S. Army Research Laboratory to save Soldiers' lives.

This type of body armor is light and flexible, which allows Soldiers to be more mobile and won't hinder an individual from running or aiming his or her weapon.

The key component of liquid armor is a shear thickening fluid. STF is composed of hard particles suspended in a liquid. The liquid, polyethylene glycol, is non-toxic and can withstand a wide range of temperatures. Hard, nano-particles of silica are the other components of STF. This combination of flowable and hard components results in a material with unusual properties.

"During normal handling, the STF is very deformable and flows like a liquid. However, once a bullet or frag hits the vest, it transitions to a rigid material, which prevents the projectile from penetrating the Soldier's body," said Dr. Eric Wetzel, a mechanical engineer from the Weapons and Materials Research Directorate who heads the project team.

To make liquid armor, STF is soaked into all layers of the Kevlar vest. The Kevlar fabric holds the STF in place, and also helps to stop the bullet. The saturated fabric can be soaked, draped, and sewn just like any other fabric.

Wetzel and his team have been working on this technology with Dr. Norman J. Wagner and his students from the University of Delaware for three years.

"The goal of the technology is to create a new material that is low cost and lightweight, which offers equivalent or superior ballistic properties as compared to current Kevlar fabric, but has more flexibility and less thickness," Wetzel said. "This technology has a lot of potential."

Courtesy photo

Kevlar fabric with shear thickening fluid after impact by a fragment simulating projectile.

Liquid armor is still undergoing laboratory tests, but Wetzel is enthusiastic about other applications that the technology might be applied to.

"The sky's the limit," Wetzel said. "We would first like to put this material in a Soldier's sleeves and pants, areas that aren't protected by ballistic vests but need to remain flexible. We could also use this material for bomb blankets, to cover suspicious packages or unexploded ordnance. Liquid armor could even be applied to jump boots, so that they would stiffen during impact to support Soldiers' ankles."

In addition to saving Soldiers' lives, Wetzel said liquid armor in Kevlar vests could help those who work in law enforcement.

"Liquid armor is much more stab resistant than conventional body armor. This capability is especially important for prison guards, who are most often attacked with handmade sharp weapons," he said.

Capt. Corbett McCallum and Staff Sgt. Jeffrey Lewis, team 10 from the 4th Ranger Training Battalion, finished third in the Best Ranger Competition. Here, McCallu approach the finish line during Sunday's helocast event.

BEST RANGER, 200

Bridgett Siter
Bayonet staff

It took 45,000 feet of caution tape to rope off the Best Ranger Competition course.

"That's because it's a crime scene," said Staff Sgt. Adam Reiber, after completing Saturday's Day Stakes, which included the infamous Prusik Climb and a surprise run-tunnel-shoot event.

With only 19 teams competing, this year's BRC was "specifically designed so there'd be no misconceptions about it being easier this time around," said Maj. Michael McNally, operations officer for the Ranger Training Brigade, which hosts the annual event.

When brigade officials began planning this year's BRC last summer, they anticipated the possibility of fewer teams, with the Army's increased op tempo during the war on terrorism. Fewer teams in the 60-hour competition — one typically designed for 50 teams — could mean more rest for competitors between events, and a well-rested Ranger is not a stressed Ranger.

"The object of Best Ranger is to stress them and push them to their very limits," McNally said.

"That's how you weed them out and identify the best Ranger team."

To that end, brigade officials designed individual events to be more difficult than those in recent history — no small task given the BRC's reputation as a world-class athletic competition. McNally believes they succeeded.

"No one can say they didn't earn it this year," he said.

And if the degree of difficulty is the measure of this year's success, the 12 returning contestants agreed.

"It was a smoker. Everyone who had competed before agreed unanimously that the first day was the hardest day we've ever done," said Staff Sgt. Adam Nash, referring to Friday morning's back-to-back PT tests, 8-mile run and 3-mile litter carry. Nash and his 75th Ranger Regiment teammate, Staff Sgt. Colin Boley, took first place in what some say was the closest competition ever.

With 752 points, Nash and Boley were only nine points ahead of the second-place team, Staff Sgt. John Sheaffer and Sgt. 1st Class Matthew Wilson, also with the 75th Ranger Regiment. The two teams crossed the finish line together on the last event, the Buddy Run, in a show of solidarity.

"It's not about us getting first or them getting second. It's about bringing the title back to the regiment," said Nash, who finished fifth in 2002, when the 5th Ranger Training Battalion took top honors.

The third-place finishers, the 4th Ranger Training Battalion's Capt. Corbett McCallum and Staff Sgt. Jeffrey Lewis, scored 723 points and were the only team to land both competitors in the target area on the spot jump event. McCallum and Lewis had the fastest time on the Prusik Climb and the Day Stakes' run-tunnel-shoot event.

Nash and Boley went into the competition with two strikes against them. Tendonitis nearly waylaid Nash during the 18-mile road march Friday night, and Boley, one of 21 combat veterans in the competition, had no time to prepare for the event. He returned from Afghanistan less than two weeks ago with no plans to compete.

"I'm not going to lie about it. Right now I'm wishing I'd never started," Boley said Saturday during a brief rest after the hatchet throw event. "Right now I could be on leave."

Though Nash and Boley credit their success to each other, their wives, their coach, their unit — pretty much anyone and everyone other than themselves — the 4th Ranger Training Battalion cadre responsible for manning each event said the duo used lessons learned from their experience in combat and past competitions to their advantage.

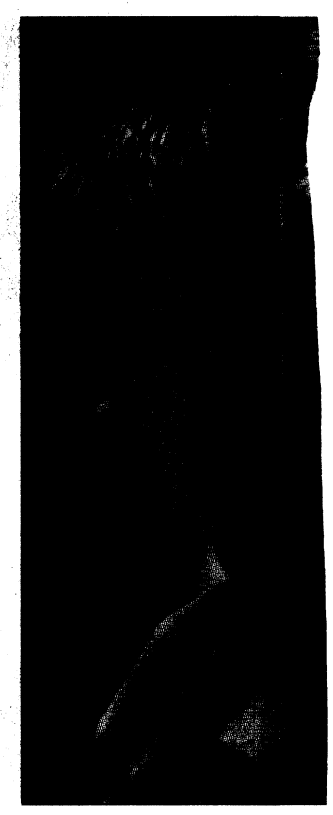
"You can see they've got the experience and the strategy," said Maj. Kevin Brill, who observed the race from the canoe event finish line Saturday and the helocast landing site Sunday.

"You can see that some of these guys ... well, fatigue has set in and it's interfering with the decision-making process," Brill said. "(Nash and Boley) adapt quickly. They're playing smart."

Indeed, Nash and Boley "used their heads" when they used their pistol belts as a litter support, freeing their arms "to pump" during the litter carry event, Brill said. They passed two teams on that event, putting them in position to lead in the canoe event. There, at the finish line, they dumped the water from the boat, donned their ruck sacks and raced across the finish line.

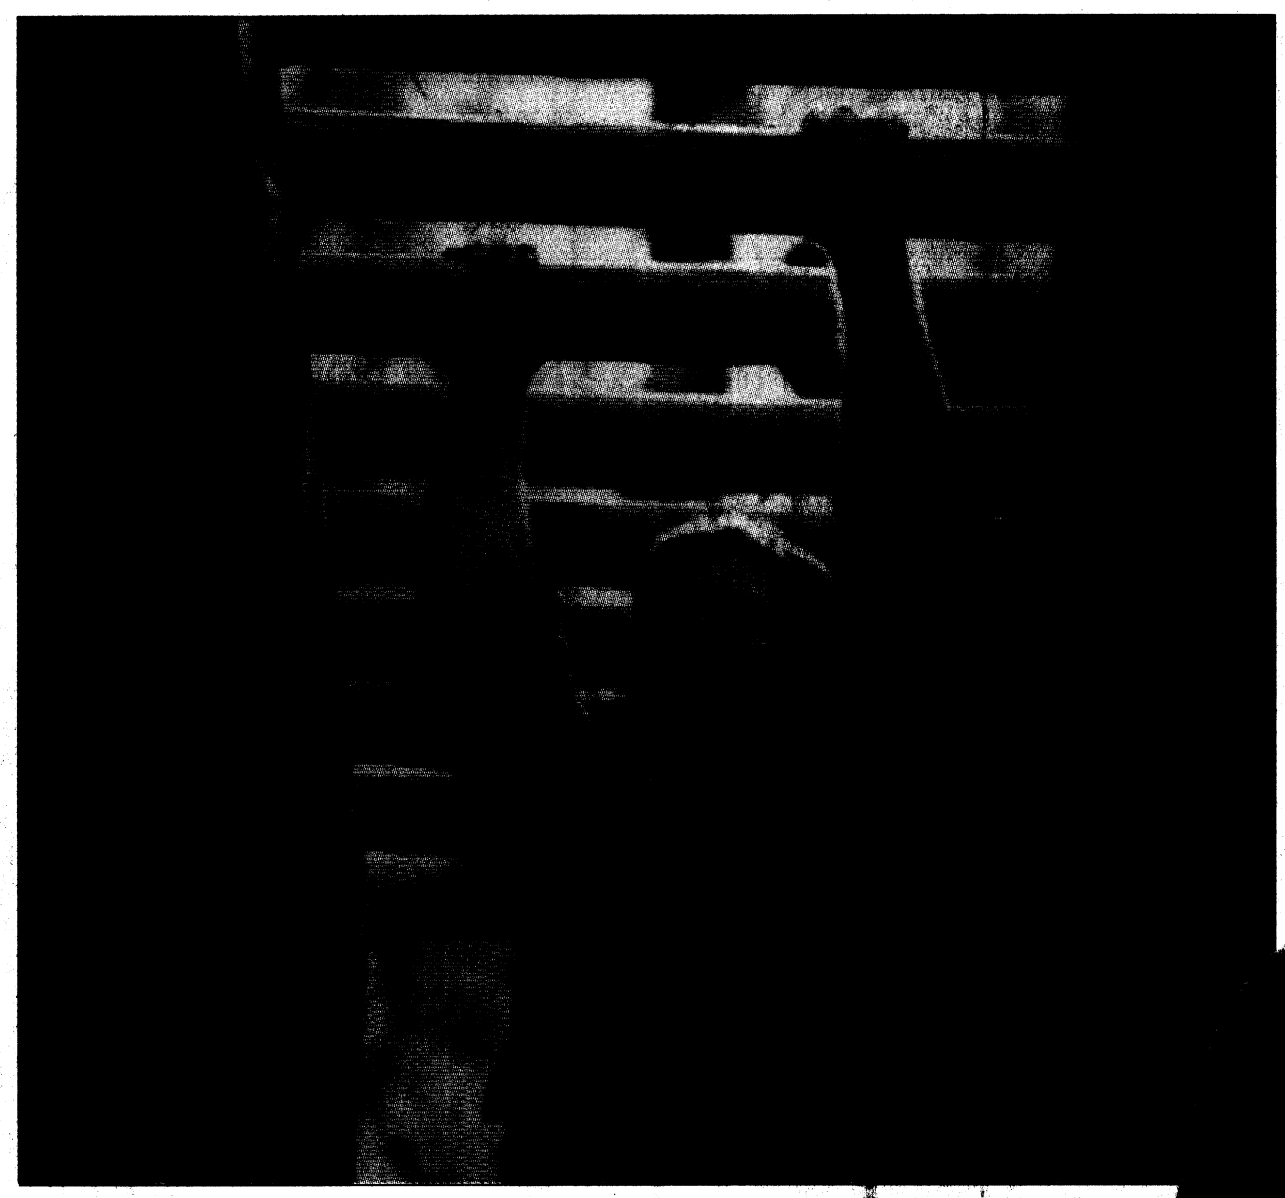
"It's little things, like taking the time to dump the water instead of trying to pull the canoe with the water in it and their ruck sacks in it," Brill said. "It's little strategies that make the difference, and that comes from experience."

When strategy didn't help, pure stubbornness paid off, Nash said. When his tendonitis flared up and his back began to ache from the weight of his 75-pound ruck sack — "A tick," he called it. "It sucks the life out of you." — Nash refused to give up and found inspiration in his teammate.



"Colin's awesome. Here he just got home a few days ago and hasn't had any time to train. And I'm thinking I'm going to have to pull him along at some point. But that never happened," Nash said. "He wouldn't let himself give anything less than 100 percent. I had to do the same."

Nash was hard-pressed to describe his feelings about winning Best Ranger — "I don't think it's sunk in yet," he said — but there's one thing he's certain about.



"We're not the best Rangers," he said. "In my opinion, the best Rangers are the ones who are deployed right now. They're Staff Sgt. Joshua Carswell, left, leads the way Friday during the litter carry event. Carswell and his teammate, Capt. Kevin O'Connor, 4th Ranger Training Battalion, both first-time competitors, finished eighth in the competition. The BRC started with a field of only 19 teams, less than half the usual number, and quickly dwindled to eight.

TRADOC: NCOA to change training academy is already piloting some of these changes.

Raper said demolitions, war casualty and combatives training have been incorporated based on feedback from Soldiers on the ground in Iraq and Afghanistan.

"(The NCOA) is transitioning the advanced and basic noncommissioned officer courses into combat leader-focused courses," Raper said. "ANCOC and BNCOC classes will soon start simultaneously, allowing for concurrent, more realistic training."

Instead of spending six to eight weeks in a classroom, he said, ANCOC and BNCOC students will soon spend up to 200 hours in the field as part of an effort to get Soldiers back to soldiering.

In response to the nation's current enemies' rapidly evolving guerrilla tactics, TRADOC hopes to develop leaders whose strengths will be mental agility and the ability to think outside the box, Byrnes said.

Doctrine can no longer show NCOs the set steps for reacting to a given scenario, he said — it must teach them how to think on their feet, not what to think, while encouraging creativity and adaptability.

The post command sergeant major, Command Sgt. Maj. Michael Kelso, said the changes aren't necessarily a knee-jerk reaction.

"All armies going into a conflict plan to fight the previous war," Kelso said. "I believe no matter what war it is, there are always lessons learned.

"Any time an army encounters a new type of war tactic, especially the tactics we are seeing in Iraq and Afghanistan, it has to analyze ways to counter that," he said. "Once it has decided those lessons are valid, it then incorporates them into its training."

Army combat training centers have already changed, Byrnes said. The environments currently being used at the Joint Readiness and National Training Centers and the Army's battle command training programs directly reflect environments units are encountering on the ground in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The new training environments are complex and unpredictable, he said. Combatants and non-combatants are mixed, improvised explosive devices are used realistically and the roles of religious sects and political leadership are emphasized.

Byrnes said a unit undergoing training may conduct traditional force-on-force exercises one day and then find itself at company level the next day, conducting patrols and raids in a small village, facing completely different scenarios.

Basic training is going to change, as well, Byrnes said.

> "The drill sergeants, the instructors and the other cadre who work in the schoolhouse have their rucksacks on pretty tight."
> Gen. Kevin Byrnes
> TRADOC commanding general

Soldierization has to be tough, he said, and TRADOC is going to make basic training more rigorous. The assumption is that as an Army that will remain at war for the foreseeable future, Soldiers have to be as fully prepared as possible for wartime operations upon graduation from initial entry training.

The Army is already reviewing three pilot basic training programs.

Two were conducted at Fort Benning and incorporated far more field training exercise time, IED training, convoy operations training and a slew of other new skills and drills without extending the current course length of nine weeks.

"Fort Benning has always been the leader in producing quality Soldiers to the field," Byrnes said. "The drill sergeants, the instructors and the other cadre who work in the schoolhouse have their rucksacks on pretty tight."

He said he knows most of the Soldiers working in the rear, training Soldiers for what awaits them overseas, would probably rather be on the front line, but he said he believes "tomorrow's victories truly do begin at the training base."

Byrnes said many of the successes in Iraq and Afghanistan started at Fort Benning, and he is counting on cadre to continue to do an outstanding job and adapt to the new requirements.

"We are rolling out the best Soldiers anywhere in the world," Byrnes said. "Please keep it up — the nation is counting on you."

More tasks and tougher missions weren't all Byrnes said is in store. He said he plans to make sure TRADOC units have the resources they need to get the job done in the future — whether it's manpower, funding or equipment and facilities.

"It's kind of a contract I have to have with our noncommissioned officers in the schoolhouse," Byrnes said. "I'll do my job to give them the tools they need to train, and they've got to continue to train the best quality Soldiers they can."

Iraqi army: Modeled on U.S. Army

"The NCO corps did not exist as we know an NCO corps to be. The officers lived a life of considerable privilege, supported by the Baa'th party."

CMATT's mission is to construct a new Iraqi army from scratch, an army that includes a land component, maritime component and a small air force.

The first task was to "man" the new army. There were three recruiting stations — Baghdad, Basra and Mosul.

In a briefing to the Coalition Provisional Authority in January, Eaton said the locations of the recruiting stations cover the spread and the ethnic distribution, so each class that graduates is ethnically balanced.

"This provides an atmosphere where tolerance is essential to mission accomplishment," he said.

"We have been very faithful in the Governing Council's intent and the focus in ensuring that the Iraqi armed forces, and the Iraqi army in particular, meet the ethnic and religious representation of (Iraq)."

"It wasn't recruiting as much as it was processing," Buchanan said. Many Iraqis needed jobs that paid, and the new army was hiring.

The age limit was raised to 40 years versus the U.S. Army's age limit of 35. This was done to recruit mature and experienced prior service soldiers, Buchanan said.

"We are looking for those individuals who wish to defend Iraq and its newfound freedom, and are skilled in such professions as truck driver, heavy equipment operator, food service, first aid and, above all, infantry," Eaton said.

The new Iraqi army also includes females in its fighting force for the first time.

"Because of the Islamic culture in Iraq, it's important that we have females at checkpoints to search other females," Buchanan said.

The Iraqi female recruits are currently being trained in Jordan by the Jordanian army, which has females in its army and knows how to train them, Buchanan said.

Eaton said the female Iraqi recruits will help fill positions with the military police force, administration and, eventually, military intelligence.

Although the vast majority of officers, NCOs and about 60 percent of the soldiers recruited had previous military experience, "we had our work cut out for us," Fuller said.

"We were trying to build an army like we have in the states with a strong backbone of NCOs, a professional officer corps and good, confident soldiers," he said.

"The infantry soldiers recruited who had prior service came from an army that gave them five rounds of ammunition per year," Buchanan said.

They were not trained to the standard infantrymen should be trained to, he said.

"The most important aspect was to get the leadership right."

The first four battalions trained by the CMATT were trained under a system that puts officers, NCOs and recruits through the same training simultaneously, but separately. All three groups were then brought together for three weeks of collective training before the battalion graduated and went to a garrison base, Eaton said.

The first battalion trained is currently in Kirkush with the 4th Infantry Division (Mechanized), Eaton said.

The second and fourth battalions are garrisoned at Tadji with the 1st Armored Division, the third battalion is in the Mosul area, he said.

"Training has focused on an end state that provides an individual soldier who possesses fundamental soldier skills, functions as a member of a multiethnic team, is oriented to military service and service to the Iraqi nation, and is also schooled in human rights and the law of land warfare," Eaton said in a CPA briefing.

In September 2003, the original goal of nine battalions increased to 27 battalions organized into nine brigades and three divisions by Sept. 30, forcing CMATT to re-evaluate its training techniques to improve and speed up the training, Buchanan said.

Based on the premise that 1,000 leaders can create an army faster than creating an army 1,000 soldiers at a time, Eaton said CMATT then adopted the same model of recruiting and training the U.S. used to gear up for World War II — officers and NCOs would conduct separate training.

> "We were trying to build an army like we have in the states with a strong backbone of NCOs, a professional officer corps and good, confident soldiers."
> Maj. Geoffrey Fuller
> CMATT Headquarters commandant

The remaining 23 battalions are being trained under this new method.

The focus was then placed on emphasizing leadership skills and values for the officers and NCOs so they could then train their own soldiers, Fuller said.

Eaton emphasized that this will be an Iraqi army trained by Iraqis.

In December, the modified training began in Jordan for officers and in Kirkush for NCOs, Buchanan said. The officer training course graduated 400 officers in March.

The NCO training course has three fundamental areas of training — combat arms training, combat service support group and the squad leader's combat course.

Both training courses for officers and NCOs last from six to eight weeks.

The training is set up for the officers and NCOs to graduate at the same time so they can then train together, Buchanan said.

The old light leaders course training outline is used to bring the officers and NCOs together to train in their subordinates' positions so the soldiers, officers and NCOs learn to appreciate each other — it's team building, Buchanan said.

The last part of the integration training prepares the officers and NCOs to train their own army's basic training.

Eaton said all soldiers are being trained for mounted and dismounted patrolling, border work, checkpoint operations and small unit urban operations.

"The training is not to the level of our Army given the time available," Eaton said. "Eventually, they will catch up."

Fuller said the primary mission of the newly trained Iraqi soldiers is to re-establish security in Iraq and protect themselves from outside threats.

The operational air force has a squadron of helicopters and two C-130B aircraft. The navy has five 30-meter patrol boats with marine detachments and a fast patrol squadron, Eaton said.

As the mission continues, CMATT picks up more responsibilities.

As of March 2004, CMATT has been assigned to oversee not only the construction of the new army, but also the development of the entire Iraqi armed forces, including the police, fire department, border patrol, Iraqi Civil Defense Corps, the air force and the maritime components, Fuller said.

What was once known as CMATT is now also the Office of Security Cooperation.

"It's important to build up the (Iraqi armed forces) to allow the coalition forces to leave Iraq," Buchanan said. "It won't be a one-for-one replacement, but it will allow us to eventually move out."

Is the Iraqi armed force ready to take care of the country alone?

"To a degree, the Iraqi army is not ready for high-intensity urban combat operations, but ready for low-level insurgency and peace enforcement operations," Eaton said. "Coalition forces will be needed for some time. What is missing is the view that they represent the legitimate armed forces and that they must confront the illegitimate forces out there."

Rangers: Quitting never an option

Wilson, and most of all Boley, was impressive.

"What it really shows you is this competition is about how much heart you have," he said. "The guys with the most heart rise to the top."

Nash said by winning this year, he has done what he set out to do and will not compete again.

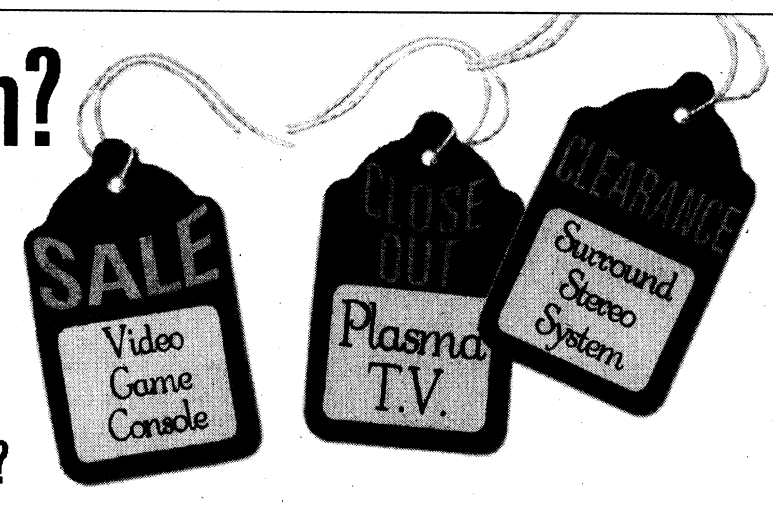
"It's a very prestigious honor," he said. "I am very honored to have done it with Staff Sgt. Boley."

Boley said he didn't pay attention to the standings until land navigation, and winning wasn't a thought at that point.

"I wanted to quit a hundred times," he said. "During the road march, we both kept saying 'we aren't going to make time, there's no way we're going to make time,' but, for some reason, we kept on walking."

"The road march was the hardest," Nash said. "I hadn't walked, and Colin really hadn't trained up."

"I got a blister during the first run," Boley said. "After that, I knew the rest was going to be hell."



Nash and Boley each received the Order of St. Maurice and a .45 caliber, gold-plated Colt pistol at Monday's award ceremony.

'Rugged Seahorse' group sponsors conference

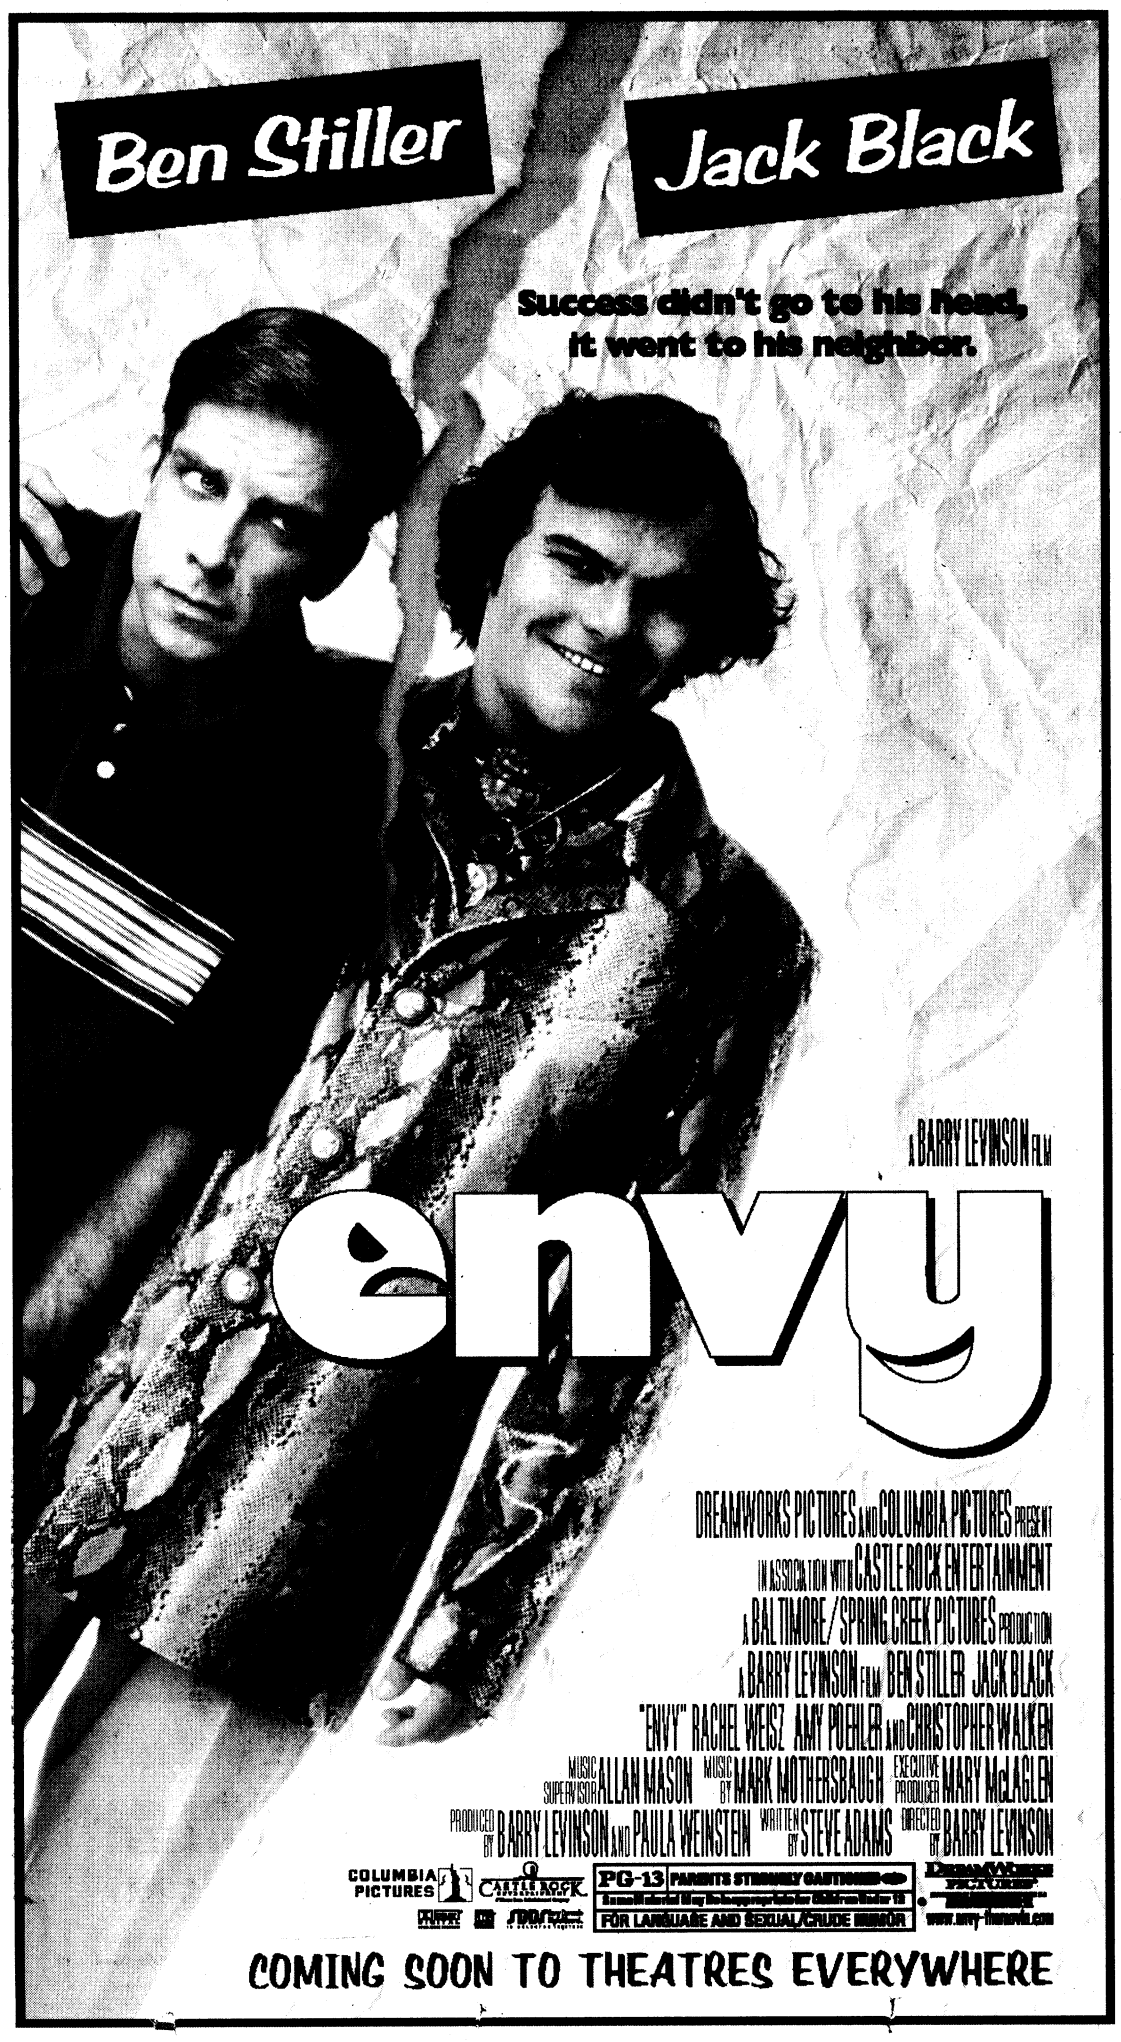
Event reviews current, future missions

1st Lt. Mamie Murphy
13th Corps Support Battalion

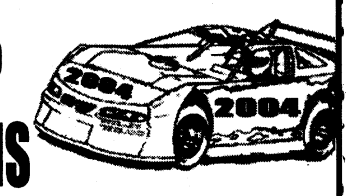
Seventy attendees came to Fort Benning April 13-15 for the 2004 Engineer Combat Heavy Conference, sponsored by the 36th Engineer Group.

"The purpose of the conference is to review current developments, discuss current and future missions, deployments, and develop focused topics for Colonel Brooks to bring forward to the Engineer Council of Colonels, and Engineer Regiment" said Capt. Endia Cook, Plans Officer, 36th Engineer Group.

Col. James Brooks, 36th Engineer Group said, "Most of the combat heavy engineer commanders are separate FORSCOM units with no engineer higher headquarters in peacetime. The intent is to get this non-divisional construction engineer unit leadership together and discuss their issues and challenges, as well as give them information on the Army transformation initiatives, and develop a transformation road ahead for the Combat Heavy Engineer Force."



Especially important to the conference was the input from commanders with recent Operation Iraqi Freedom and Operation Enduring Freedom experience. Issues and concerns were very similar across the board.



"There were three overarching issues for all the units that attended the conference," Brooks said. "The frequency of deployments of low-density construction engineer units, internal force protection concerns, and the age and condition of the construction equipment that is still in use. The equipment we are using is older than most of the operators, and some of it is older than me."

Possible solutions to the equipment concerns discussed were replacing or upgrading current equipment, because parts for equipment in use are hard to come by through the Army supply system, or leasing equipment through commercial contractors such as Caterpillar or John Deere.

The conference was very productive. The future capability and transformation of the army construction engineer community can only improve with their continued interaction, cooperation, and proactive thinking.

IOBC lieutenants pilot live-fire training

Sgt. Kim Dooley

2nd Lt. Robert Cosgriff, B Co., 2nd Bn. (Infantry Officer Basic Course), 11th Inf. Regt., looks at his target while calling in artillery support.

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

Leroy Cisneros knew he would be called to active duty when he enlisted in the National Guard, but he never expected this much. The Los Angeles police officer has been called up four times since 9-11.

A sergeant first class when the global war on terrorism began, Cisneros' unit sent him to Officer Candidate School, where he became an infantry lieutenant.

Now a second lieutenant in the Infantry Officer Basic Course, Cisneros is more than aware that, between his field of expertise and the Army's current op tempo, the skills he learns in the course will one day be put to the test where they count. And the training he receives here may very well be his only preparation for the real thing.

About 70 to 75 percent of IOBC students will find themselves "in theater" within months of graduating, said Capt. Aaron Freeman, the senior platoon trainer for 1st Platoon, B Company, 2nd Battalion (IOBC), 11th Infantry Regiment.

"We even have some students graduating early, getting on the plane and going straight to combat," he said.

Other lieutenants are arriving at their units just in time to deploy or are filling brigades that will eventually replace those already overseas, Freeman said. National Guard or regular Army — they're all likely to deploy.

And it's the IOBC cadre's goal to ensure they're ready.

"They should leave here competent for combat with minimal unit train-up," he said.

To that end, B Company piloted what will eventually become a new addition to the IOBC curriculum — an indirect fire, live call for fire exercise.

For today's infantry lieutenant, that knowledge is vital, Freeman said.

"In recent conflicts, many of our junior leaders have lacked proficiency in being able to use (call for fire)," he said. "But indirect fire and close air support are huge assets on the battlefield today, and the platoon and squad leaders have to be the ones who know how to put that into effect."

In the past, the lieutenants have trained the task in the classroom and on computer simulators. But the closest they've come to live-fire training was to hunker down in a bunker and watch other Soldiers fire artillery to show the damage it can inflict and to familiarize the lieutenants with how close different types of rounds can be fired safely, said Maj. Jody Miller, B Company commander.

Because the training depended on 3rd Brigade's 10th Field Artillery Regiment — the only unit with the necessary assets — it became hard to execute as the unit was called off on multiple deployments and training exercises.

"We should have been doing this a long time ago," Miller said, explaining that indirect fire and call for fire are "critical and perishable skills" that an infantry platoon leader needs to know and will definitely use in the course of being a lieutenant.

But due to resource constraints and training priorities in the past, CFF live-fire training in IOBC wasn't programmed by "whomever was controlling the resources," Miller said.

That changed, however, as Fort Benning senior leaders began to question why the training wasn't included in IOBC, he said.

Now, after more than a year of struggling to get the ball rolling, B Company is the test bed, so to speak, for what Miller and his fellow IOBC cadre hope to see fully integrated into the course in the near future.

The company's students rotated through four stations at Red Cloud Range Tuesday through Thursday, learning how to use Air Force close air support, and indirect fire artillery and mortars on the battlefield in conjunction with tactical maneuver and direct fires.

The exercise took the joint efforts of IOBC, the Combined Arms and Tactics Directorate, D Co., 2nd Bn., 29th Inf. Regt., and the 17th Air Support Operations Squadron.

"With what's going on in Iraq and Afghanistan, this is very beneficial to them," said Capt. Matt Gregory, primary instructor for the call for fire live-fire exercise.

"(The students) get to see the assets available to them on the battlefield, how they work and how they'll go into the mission if planned correctly," Gregory said.

For Cisneros and fellow B Company student 2nd Lt. Benjamin Blaylock, the exercise provided the "real time" aspect that other training lacked.

"Using the computer simulator, you get the basis of what you need to do," said Blaylock, a University of Iowa graduate who was commissioned through ROTC. "But doing this, you see what it's actually like."

Cisneros said the cadre heightened the experience.

"They added pressure; they kept (giving us situations) and asking us what we would do," he said. "It made me think on my feet. I could give answers and see if they would actually work.

"There's a good chance that we'll have to do this for real," he said. "After this, I think we're about as ready as we'll ever be."

Post units team up for new marksman course

Snipers 'fill gap' in Soldiers' M-16 A4 training

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

The U.S. Army Sniper School is currently teaching a group of Soldiers from 1st Battalion, 15th Infantry Regiment, new marksmanship techniques as part of a test bed for a new Squad Designated Marksman Course.

The course, which is designed to hone a Soldier's ability to accurately shoot at distances beyond 300 meters, teaches students different marksmanship techniques than they are used to.

"This course teaches us so much more than we were ever taught before," said Pfc. Ryan Coffield, 1st Bn., 15th Inf. Regt. "We've always been taught how to shoot at targets within 300 meters, never beyond that."

As Staff Sgt. Steven Penix, senior instructor at the Sniper School, points out, that's where the problem lies.

Soldiers are only taught how to shoot at targets from point blank range to 300 meters, he said. Snipers are taught to shoot between 600 and 1,000 meters.

"There's a gap there that we need to fill. And this course is doing just that," Penix said.

The overall goal of the class is to put a precision marksman in each squad.

"By putting someone with these skills in each squad, then threats can be taken care of quickly," Penix said. "These Soldiers will be able to take out both partially and fully exposed targets beyond the range of 300 meters if necessary.

"Another advantage of having one of these Soldiers in a squad is the ability to sight danger from much farther distances," he said. "With their ability to do that, they can send the information higher, and the problem can be taken care of."

As part of their training, the Soldiers learned range estimation, shooting moving targets beyond 300 meters, fundamentals of marksmanship and target detection.

For range estimation, the Soldiers were taught two different methods. The first was the football field method.

"Most everyone knows how long a football field is, so we tell them to estimate it using that method," Penix said.

But, the method most preferred is using the sights on the M-16 A4. Soldiers used the Advanced Combat Optical Gunsight, or ACOG.

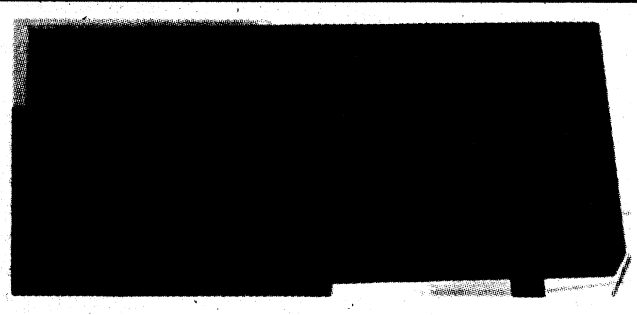
"The sight picture has two marks for you to put your target's shoulders in between," Penix said. Depending on where you can fit the target's shoulder between, is how far they are away."

The U.S. Army Marksmanship Unit made a few alterations to the weapon to better suit Soldiers.

Changes to the weapons included putting on a new match-grade barrel, putting flutes in it to keep it cool, installing a quad-rail hand guard and installing a two-stage match-grade trigger.

Pfc. Chris Stephens

Soldiers from 1st Bn., 15th Inf. Regt., fire live rounds at 300-meters down range during Squad Designated Marksman training Tuesday at Maertens Range.



This trigger only requires four pounds of pressure, whereas the other much more, said Cris Murray, small-arms repairman and primary builder of the new weapons.

"All of these changes were made to give Soldiers better control of their shots," he said.

A change which Penix said is important to today's Army.

"When Soldiers are deployed, they will most likely experience many riots," he said. "On the M16A2, you can't really control your shot as much as you can with this weapon. So if you need to take someone out in the crowd, you can be pretty confident that you'll hit that person and not a person to the left or right of them."

Safety high priority on state waterways

All boaters should wear life jackets

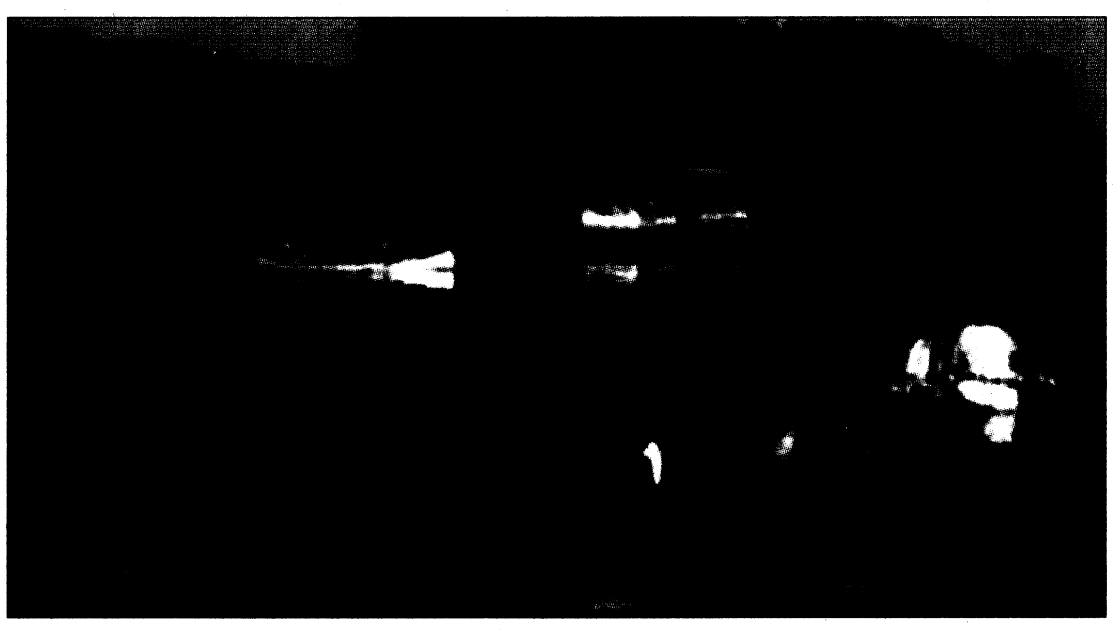
Spc. Eliamar Castanon
Bayonet staff

Now that the sun is out more often than not, boat owners may be ready to hit the waters of Uchee Creek or the Chattahoochee River.

But while enjoying these relaxing excursions, it's important to be prepared for accidents and to know the local regulations that will keep a nice afternoon from going sour.

Harley Chase, a bass boat owner and safety occupational specialist with the Directorate of Public Safety, has "rules to live by" for boaters.

"Don't drink, always wear a life jacket, don't horseplay, know how to operate your boat, operate your boat in a safe manner and don't overload it.



"Boating accidents can be prevented," he said. "It's as simple as paying attention and wearing a life jacket."

Georgia and Alabama state laws require boats to have life jackets for each person on board, as well as a separate floating device, Chase said. By law, all children younger than 10 must wear life jackets while on a boat.

Uchee Creek requires all passengers to wear life jackets at all times, said Patti Hails, Uchee Creek assistant manager.

During the summer, military police and the Reserve Coast Guard Auxiliary patrol the river to make sure boat regulations are followed, Hails said. Both authorities ticket boaters who do not wear their life jackets or don't comply with other regulations.

Although Alabama and Georgia laws require all boat drivers to have a boating license, Hails said Uchee Creek only requires a person complete a Boaters Safety Course to rent

I'm a firm believer that everyone should see a rugby match at least once in their lives.

It's intense, it's entertaining and it will take your breath away what these ruggers will willingly put their bodies through for the sake of the game.

This weekend is your chance to witness one of the world's most popular sports (second only to the much gentler game of soccer, and the real ultimate sport if you ask me or most of the players on the pitch) right here on Fort Benning.

The Columbus/Fort Benning Cruisers will host the USA Rugby Military Club Championships on Blue Field Saturday and Sunday. So far, we've got eight teams in the running for one title, so both days will be packed with action.

Now for those of you who have never witnessed a rugby match and have no idea what you're in for, let me give you a quick run down so you're not completely lost come game day.

Rugby is an action-packed game that will have you on the edge of your seat, on your feet and yelling at the top of your lungs. OK, well, maybe that's just me. But it's hard to imagine anyone on the sidelines not getting into the game.

You've got 30 guys on the field — 15 on each team. You have the forward pack — affectionately deemed the "piggies." These guys average 200 pounds or more with tree-trunk legs, thick necks and a look in their eyes that will send a shudder down your spine. (In other words, these are not the guys you want to be lined up against in a full-contact sport.)

Meanwhile, the backs are typically smaller-framed, but make up for what they lack in size in gazelle-like speed.

While the pack can be counted upon to push and shove its way into the other team's "end zone," the backs will sprint, twist, turn, fake and cast every tricky move in the book to make their way across the try line.

These guys take the field with no protection, save a mouth guard and the occasional scrum cap. All with the same mission in mind: run the ball to

Post NCOs build community ties

Pfc. Chris Stephens

U.S. Army Infantry School Command Sgt. Maj. Michael Bergman, steadies beams on a wall being built on site at Habitat for Humanity. Bergman was one of eight sergeants major to participate Saturday in Phenix City.

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

Eight members of the Fort Benning Sergeants Major Association made a trip to Phenix City Saturday to help Habitat for Humanity.

According to its Web site, Habitat for Humanity is a nonprofit, ecumenical Christian housing ministry. Habitat seeks to eliminate poverty housing and homelessness from the world, and to make decent shelter a matter of conscience and action.

The trip allowed all of the sergeants major the opportunity to do good in the community.

"Habitat for Humanity is a great organization," said Command Sgt. Maj. John Schwamberger, CONUS Replacement Center command sergeant major.

Habitat helps people who need homes, Schwamberger said, and it's a great feeling to be able to help the cause.

The goal for the day was to build exterior walls on two houses and to start with the interior walls on one of those houses.

"There's nothing like getting down and dirty," said Sgt. Maj. Jan Stegeman, 11th Infantry Regiment operations sergeant major. "It reminds me of back in the old days, when we would do barn raising."

Barn raising was fun work, Stegeman said — working outside all day, building something and then seeing the progress at the end of the day.

Stegeman said all Soldiers should get out and help the community.

"No one person is better than another," he said. "Aren't we an Army of One? Then, there should be no excuse why everybody can't get out and help the community. We all live in it, and we need to help out."

"If we just sit around and complain about everything wrong with the community, then we are part of the problem, and that's not what our post commander wants from us," Schwamberger said.

Brig. Gen. Benjamin Freakley, post commander, has stressed that post Soldiers and families should be a part of the solution and not part of the problem.

"If we roll up our sleeves and help those who need it, then we are part of the solution. It's that simple," Schwamberger said.

Many of the sergeants major out at the site said they would like to see more Soldiers help with Habitat for Humanity.

"If the Soldiers see how much work goes into building a house, then maybe that will help them take more pride in taking care of their house," Stegeman said.

Soldiers take for granted the government provides them a set of quarters, and don't realize what some people go through just to get a house, he said.

New principal to take charge at middle school

'High energy' DoD schools veteran is 'man for Faith'

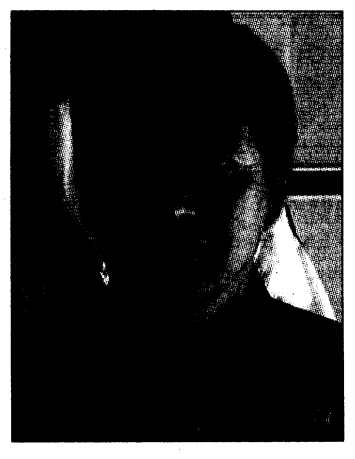
Bridgett Siter
Bayonet staff

Dr. Julio Gonzalez, a 20-year veteran with Department of Defense schools, will assume position as principal at Fort Benning's Faith Middle School this summer.

Gonzalez is the principal of Scott Middle School in Fort Knox, Ky., where he has worked since 1999. He replaces Dr. Gregg Mowen, who left Faith in March to serve as the assistant superintendent of the Puerto Rico Cuba School District.

Gail Wilson, Fort Benning Schools director of accountability, has been the acting principal since March. Wilson said Gonzalez is "just the man for Faith."

"He's high energy," Wilson said. "His commitment and dedication and compassion is incredible, and he really seems to understand the needs of the military middle-school child."



Janice Harvey, a Fort Benning family member and substitute teacher, worked with Gonzalez at Fort Knox three years ago. Harvey said she was pleased to learn he is taking the helm at Faith.

"He promotes an atmosphere conducive to learning," Harvey said. "He emphasizes efficient and effective discipline."

Gonzalez received a Department of Defense Meritorious Civilian Service Award during the National Association of Hispanic Federal Executives Summit April 15.

Gonzalez could not be reached for comment.

He and his wife, Mariela, have two daughters, Jessica and Julie.

Boating: Safety is key in summer

before renting boats.

The Boaters Safety Course entails watching a 45-minute movie about the safety regulations and precautions boaters should be aware of before leaving the marina, and is offered at Uchee Creek before renting one of their many vessels.

According to the National Center of Injury Prevention and Control Web site, there were more than 750 deaths attributed to boating accidents in 2000 — 442 of those accidents were caused by negligent drivers and 82 people were killed because they were not wearing life jackets.

Alcohol also accounts for a large number of accidents, Chase said.

In 1997, an airborne student was killed after falling off a pontoon boat at Uchee Creek, Chase said.

The driver tried to scare the airborne student as a joke by pulling back on the throttle, sending the student forward into the water and under the propellers, he said.

In 2001, a Soldier drowned at Uchee Creek during a training exercise, Chase said.

"He was a poor swimmer and was not wearing a life jacket," he said.

For those who are not familiar with Fort Benning regulations, here are some important things to keep in mind from the U.S. Army Infantry Center Garrison Regulation 200-3:

- Privately owned motorboats must be registered and meet all requirements in accordance with either Georgia or Alabama state law as appropriate.
- A personal floatation device is required for each passenger in the boat. The device must be U.S. Coast Guard approved and the appropriate size for the passenger.
- Any person operating any watercraft on the waters of the installation must comply with rules and regulations related to boat equipment, operation, lights and navigation rules.
- Combustion-type motors will not be used to power boats on any pond or stream on Fort Benning, except on the Chattahoochee River. Electric motors may be used in ponds and other streams around Fort Benning.
- All lakes, ponds, rivers and streams on the installations are off-limits to recreational swimming, water skiing, snorkeling, aquaplaning and scuba diving.

The Georgia Boat Safety Act prohibits boaters from boating under the influence — this includes operating any boat, sailboat, personal watercraft, water skis, sailboard or similar devices while under the influence of alcohol.

Anyone arrested for boating under the influence could lose their privilege to operate a vessel until they successfully complete an Alcohol or Drug Use Risk Reduction Program approved by the Georgia Department of Human Resources.

They will also be charged with a misdemeanor, punishable by fines up to $1,000 and prison time for up to a year.

For more information about water safety and state regulations, visit www.boat-ed.com.

Habitat: helps people in community

For the families who receive the houses, Habitat requires at least 500 hours of what they call "sweat equity."

"Sweat equity is the number of hours the families receiving the house must put into their house personally," said Barbara McClurg, former Russell, Ala., Habitat volunteer. "Of the 500 hours we require them to put in, we ask that the actual family that is moving in put in 200 combined hours, and they can use friends and family to put in the other 300 hours."

The organization is looking for people to build houses in partnership with families.

For more information, call (229) 924-6935, or go to the Web site at www.habitat.org.

GOH: Don't miss rugby tournament

run the ball to the other end of the field, touch it down in the other team's end zone and breathe a sigh of relief if you prevail unscathed.

Of course, it can't be that easy, or we'd all do it. No, no, no. En route to that plush paradise that is the end zone, these ruggers must face a mob of defensemen of equal size and strength with their territory (and pride) on the line.

Players can pass the ball laterally or behind them, but never forward. The only time the ball moves forward legally is via kicking or running.

Most rugby plays end in a hazardous pile of players fighting tooth and nail for possession of the ball. This struggle continues amidst grunts and cries of pain until a player finally emerges with the ball, or the ref blows his whistle, at which point, the whole thing starts all over again.

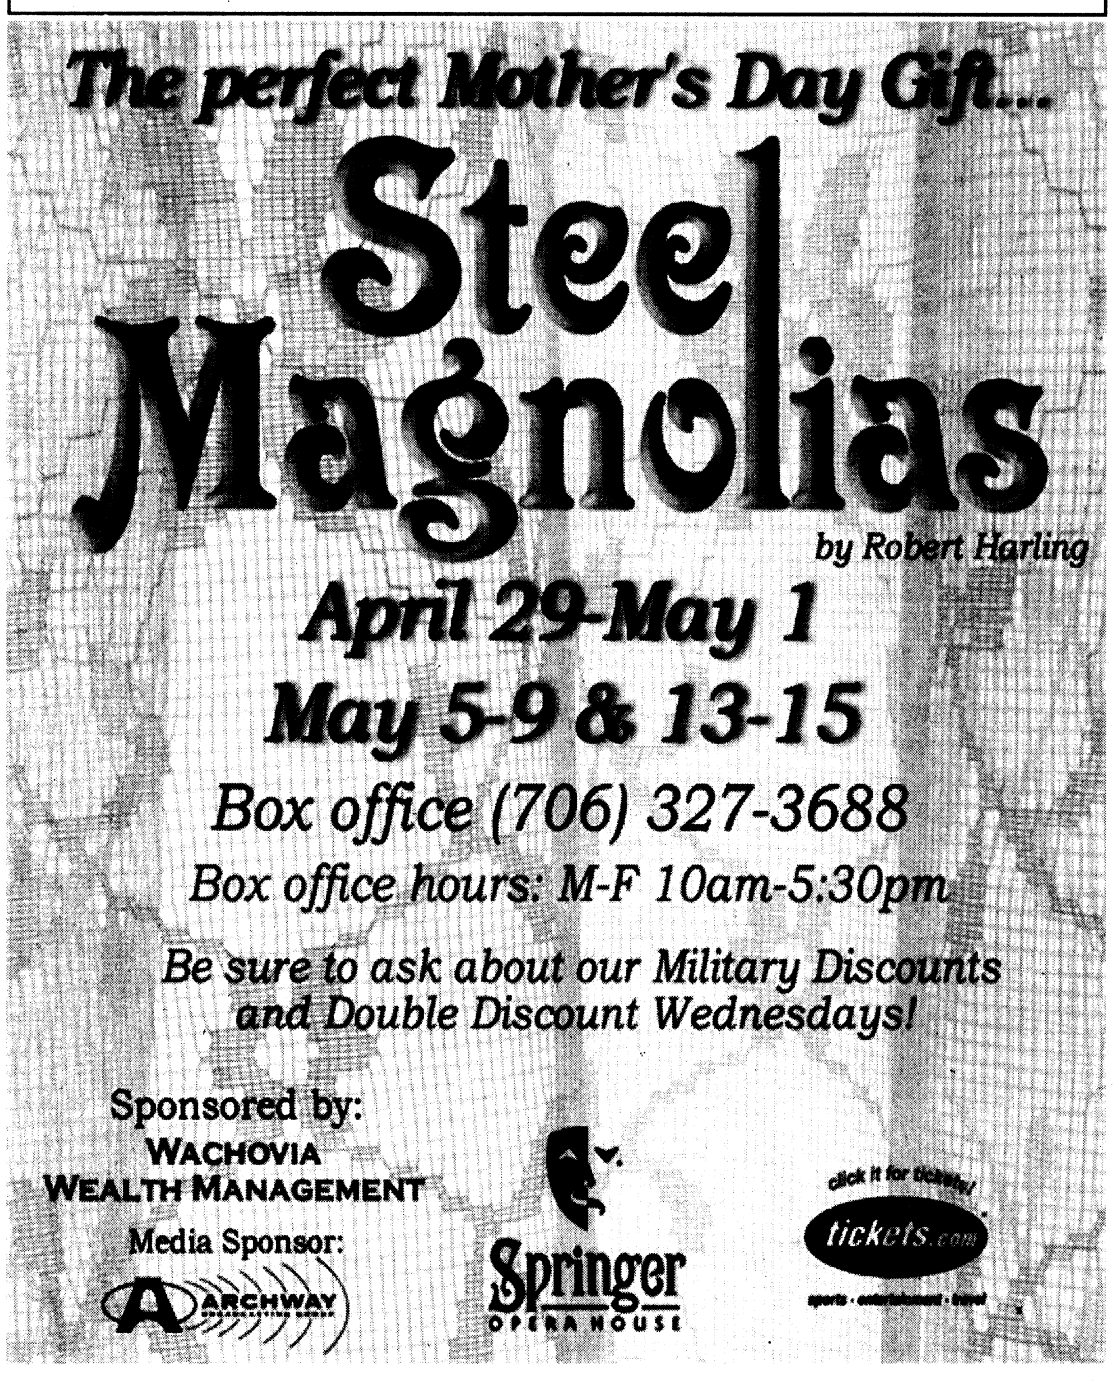
Needless to say, this is not exactly an in-depth description of the game, but it's enough to give you some insight into the semi-organized frenzy on the field.

The truly beautiful thing about this game, though, is the heart that goes into it. As Cruiser inside center A.J. Cortes has said on way more than one occasion, "You can't teach heart."

And that may be true. But with most ruggers, you don't have to.

No matter what his size, what his speed or strength, the true blue rugger will throw himself into the oncoming man to prevent him from getting past. He'll run full speed ahead straight into the defense, subjecting himself to bone-crunching tackles to ensure his team maintains possession of the ball. He'll risk pain and possible injury all for the team.

It's a game that will have you shaking your head in wonder — "what the heck are these guys thinking?"



But more than that, it's a game of heart and determination, where guts triumph over pain.

The tournament will be on Blue Field Saturday and Sunday, starting at 8 a.m. both days. The championship game will kick off Sunday at 2 p.m. Be there.

'Country Style Casino Night'

The Officers' Spouses' Club will host a country-style casino night tonight at 7 p.m. at the Officers' Club. The event will feature dancing with a square dance caller and troupe, "funny money" gambling, an old time jail, bingo hall, basket auction and country hall. The event is open to the public. Admission is $10 and includes a light meal and "starter bucks" for gambling. All proceeds will benefit the OSC Scholarship and Welfare funds. Advance tickets can be purchased at Bit of Benning Gift Shop from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m., or at the Officers' Club membership office. For more information, call 687-3537 or e-mail BenningBazaar@aol.com.

McBride Elementary School students recently got a lesson in cultural diversity during the school's World Day.

The "celebration of differences," organized by first-grade teacher Melissa Lewis, introduced the children to countries around the globe and some of their traditions.

Every year, Lewis said, the school tries to do something to acknowledge and affirm that everyone is different, and that's OK.

"Because of the backgrounds our children have, we wanted to celebrate the differences of people all over the world," she said.

To celebrate World Day, Lewis directed a special presentation that involved students at every grade level, teachers and even parents.

Students highlighted some of the many inventions of blacks who have helped people all over the world, sang a traditional spiritual, modeled traditional garb from several countries and shared poems they'd penned about the diversity in every day life.

Meanwhile, parents provided firsthand accounts of living in another country — including the Ivory Coast of Africa and China — and a special guest detailed his visit to Saudi Arabia.

This portion of the presentation was particularly relevant to the children, Lewis said, because so many of their parents have traveled to the Middle East in support of Operation Iraqi Freedom.

The program wrapped up with a row of cultural dishes the children could sample to "taste around the world."

"This is a chance to start early teaching the children to accept being different," Lewis said. "To show them that there are people with different cultures and beliefs and attitudes around the world."

Lewis believes that lack of acceptance and tolerance of these differences is what has led to so much conflict on the global front.

"If I could teach every child in the world one thing, I would teach them that they have to be tolerant," she said. "We can't infringe our beliefs on someone else ... we have to respect each other."

Lewis may not reach every child in the world, but she's certainly reaching students at McBride — students like third-grader Jennifer Fussell.

"Kids should learn about (diversity) now so they won't grow up and and tease other people about their skin color or how they look," Fussell said.

Although she's only read about that kind of treatment, Fussell said that discrimination is still a big problem today.

But Fussell doesn't buy into that train of thought. Differences are just fine by this third-grader. In fact, at a young age, she's already able to see past them.

"Everyone's really the same if you think about it," she said. "And if you treat someone differently, you're not being a good person."

McBride student pays tribute to war heroes

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

Cameron Dostie cares about the war in Iraq. He cares about the hundreds of Soldiers who have given their lives, about their families here at home. It's an injustice in his young mind, one that saddens him.

The McBride Elementary School first-grader, a serious little man with a furrow in his brow, seems older than his 6 years, more deeply impacted by current events than his peers.

So when McBride students were given a project to focus on something in the "100s" for its hundredth day in session, Dostie brought in "100 Iraqi Freedom Heroes," a poster with the pictures of 100 Soldiers killed in Iraq.

His teacher, Melissa Lewis, wasn't surprised. But she was touched.

Lewis noticed something different about Dostie early on in the school year.

When the class read a story about Ruby Bridges, a first-grader going to integrate an all-white school, and Ruby was heckled and threatened as she walked into the school, Dostie couldn't understand it.

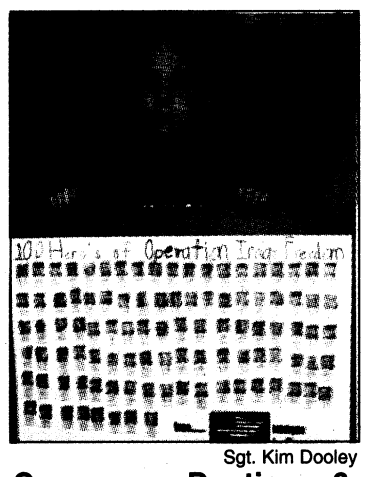
"He just kept saying, 'But why would they do that to her? Why would they treat her that way?'" Lewis said.

It was the same with a book the children read about a fire boat that was being put to pasture when it was suddenly needed to save people's lives after 9-11.

"The book was for children; it explained the burning buildings and all the people killed that day," Lewis said. "Cameron just couldn't believe that someone would want to hurt all those people."

It's that same compassion — a compassion Lewis said Dostie expresses for everyone and everything that crosses his path — that led the first-grader to his project.

"I wanted people to know what was going on in the war," he said. "I don't think we should ever have a war. People should not fight in the war, because we should all get along, no matter what our country is."



Dostie doesn't like the war, but he knows that it will "make the Iraqi soldiers who are bad lose so that part of the world can get along."

But it still makes him sad to think of all the people who have died in the war, he said, especially since his father will deploy in the coming months.

"It makes me feel sad and worried," he said.

If it were up to him, no one would go. And one day, Dostie said, after he's retired from being a paleontologist, he's going to become president and "tell the whole world not to have these wars."

"And I believe him," Lewis said laughing. "He is such a compassionate and serious child, and I believe it's going to lead him places."

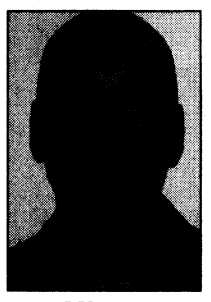
Make difference on National Day of Prayer

Chaplain (Maj.) Mark A. Mitera
USAIC Chaplains Office



If you knew that five minutes in one day could impact and change America, would you be willing to block out that time in your schedule to make that happen? We actually have the opportunity to see change happen when we observe the National Day of Prayer on Thursday. The theme of this year's National Day of Prayer is "Let Freedom Ring," and the theme verse from the Bible is Leviticus 25:20 which says, "Proclaim liberty throughout the land to all the inhabitants."

This year, especially, makes a national prayer meeting compelling when you consider issues such as the upcoming presidential election, a divided country, the dangerous conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan, terrorist threats and the numerous issues threatening to destroy marriages and families.

One way you can truly make a difference in combating these negative influences in the world is by dedicating five minutes of your time to prayer asking God to make a difference. It would be even more dynamic if you could commit to praying for our country on a daily basis, but spending five minutes in prayer, Thursday would be a great start.

James 5:16 tells us, "The effective prayer of a righteous man can accomplish much." You can make your prayers effective by praying for the following on Thursday:

REFLECTIONS

Mitera

• Government — The government establishes and implement policies that have far-reaching consequences. Pray that the Lord would grant wisdom, discernment and boldness to those who serve in authority over us, from our commanding general at Fort Benning, to city council members in Columbus, to the president of the United States.

• Media — Whether it's news broadcasts, movies, television sitcoms or Internet sites, the media is the most influential center of power in America. Pray for journalists to be fair and accurate and for entertainers to conduct themselves in a responsible manner.

• Education — Pray that our schools will get back to basics when it comes to educating our children, instilling the leaders of tomorrow with a respect for the Judeo-Christian values upon which our nation was founded.

• Church — The church, including the Fort Benning chapel community, is in a position to impact communities for eternity, as well as influence social change. Pray for your churches, pastors and military chaplains, asking God to grant us the wisdom and vision to make the church a vessel for healing and revival in America.

• Family — The traditional family is truly one of America's greatest assets. Pray, not only for the institution as a whole, but also for individual families within your circle of influence who may be struggling.

As a sign of unity, Dr. Barry Black, chaplain of the U.S. Senate, is asking people to pray the "Prayer for the Nation" at noon Thursday, wherever they are. Let's all join our hearts together in trusting God to do great things in the days to come. You can find out more about the National Day of Prayer at www.nationaldayofprayer.org.

Love the children like Jesus did

Chaplain (Maj.) Jeffrey Hawkins
Chaplain Family Life Center

The little blond-haired, blue-eyed girl sang the tune quietly; she sang the tune gently, "Jesus loves the little children." Jesus does love the children ... and so should we.

Almost all the things I do as a chaplain are a joy. One responsibility I discharge here on Fort Benning, though, is not. It is being a member of the Case Review Committee that meets weekly to review alleged incidences and recommend treatment plans for abuse of all types, including child abuse. I don't mind telling you it's the low point of my week.

If I could skip it, I would. If I could delegate it, I would. If I could wish it away, I would. But I can't. So I go. And I sit. And I listen. And sometimes I even look at photos — photos that no one wants to look at.

Hawkins

What is child abuse? Well, it can come in several forms. There's physical abuse when we push or slap or hit or kick. It's the dad of three who's been dumped on all day at work, who comes home and sometimes consciously, most times unconsciously, takes his "stuff" out on somebody who doesn't even know what his "stuff" is.

Then there's sexual abuse, when we touch and fondle, coax or threaten. It's the 17-year-old who got ahold of the "harmless" Penthouses and stumbled across the videos under the bed in Mom and Dad's room and now has a problem — a problem he doesn't understand — and a problem his 6-year-old stepsister doesn't understand either.

Then there's emotional abuse, when we threaten or humiliate, demean or harass. It's the mom in the commissary whose words are weapons and whose target is her child.

Lastly, there's neglect, when we don't provide the basics in terms of food or shelter, cleanliness or watchcare. It's the couple who decides it's just easier "not to." It's easier not to wash the dishes. It's easier not to fold the clothes. It's easier not to let the dog out. It's easier not to take the infant in. It's easier not to keep an eye out — it's just easier "not to."

Jesus loves the little children ... and so should we.

Want some help in loving your children better? Call the Chaplain Family Life Center at 545-1760 today for hope and help in a confidential setting.

Post to hold military rugby tourney

Fort Benning will be home to a new kind of battle this weekend — the fight for the prestigious USA Rugby Military Club Championship title. In the world of armed forces rugby, it's the highest honor a team can vie for.

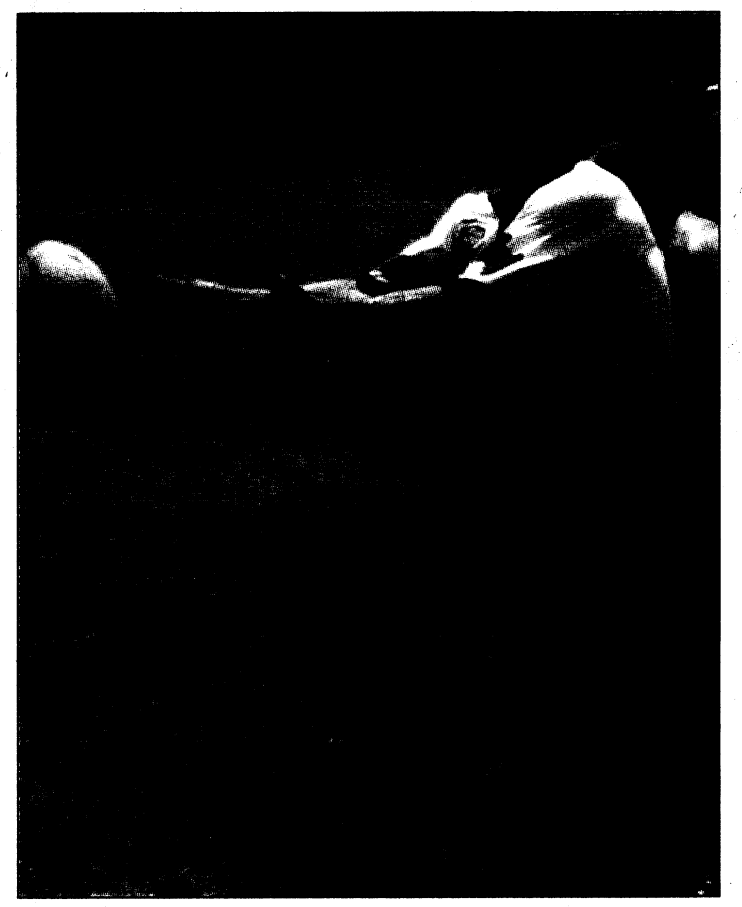
The tournament, which has been held on post for 10 of the past 14 years, will be hosted by the Columbus/Fort Benning Rugby Football Club, better known as the Cruise-a-Matics.

With a half-and-half mix of Soldiers — officer and enlisted from units across post — and civilians, the team will be a much better competitor this year than it has been in the past, said Cruisers inside center A.J. Cortes.

Last year, the team left the tournament two for two.

"In the years before, we've lost people through the military for deployments and PCS," Cortes said. "This year, we've been holding on to the same guys, so we've been working together, and we're stronger as a team."

That stability has also allowed the team to strengthen its "pack," Cortes said. The pack consists of the team's forwards — larger players who are generally used to hold off the opposing team's offense and to force their way into the other team's end zone when on offense.



"I really believe the strength of the team is in the pack," he said. "Last year, what we were lacking was a strong (forward line). But this year, we have a good strong core in the pack. I think we're going to do very well."

Club president Roy MacDonald is also optimistic.

"We have a lot more experienced people playing now as compared to last year," he said.

But the tournament won't be without its challenges. As of Saturday, seven other teams were in the running for the top honors, said Ray Davis, tournament chairman.

The teams expected at the tournament will travel from as far away as Europe and represent several branches of the military, Davis said.

Shawn Thayer passes the ball during a drill.

So far, the Cruisers will match up with combined services teams from Europe, Washington, D.C., and Eglin Air Force Base, Fla.; Marine teams from Camp Lejeune, N.C., and Cherry Point, N.C.; and Army teams from Fort Campbell, Ky., and Fort Stewart, Ga.

But whether you're a rugger, a potential rugger or a spectator, you're in for a show, MacDonald said.

"This is a chance to see what rugby is all about and to (witness) the lifelong friendships you develop in rugby," he said. "It's also a chance to see the second most popular sport in the world after soccer — one that's picking up in the U.S."

The Cruisers will also host the USA Rugby South High School Championships during the two-day tournament, Davis said.

Although details are still in the works for the high school tournament, it will take place in the same vicinity as the military tournament, he said.

> "This is a chance to see what rugby is all about ... (and) to see the second most popular sport in the world after soccer — one that's picking up in the U.S."

The military tournament will start at 8 a.m. Saturday on Blue Field with an opening ceremony and remarks from Col. Rick Riera, garrison commander. The games will start immediately after the ceremony, Davis said.

Sunday, the semi-finals will kick off at 8 a.m., and the tourney finals will be at 2 p.m.

Softball tournament brings out best teams

Competition dominated by Airborne Soldiers

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

The pre-season intramural softball tournament was held April 23 and Saturday on Knappenburger Field.

The tournament, which had 14 teams entered in it, brought together many teams from 3rd Brigade, the 36th Engineer Group and other units on post.

"This tournament is a great thing for our unit," said Spc. Joseph Arceneaux, Headquarters and Headquarters Battery, 1st Battalion, 10th Field Artillery Regiment. "It really brings us together as a unit. It's nice to get to know the other people in your unit outside of work."

The tournament had its share of close games and blowouts.

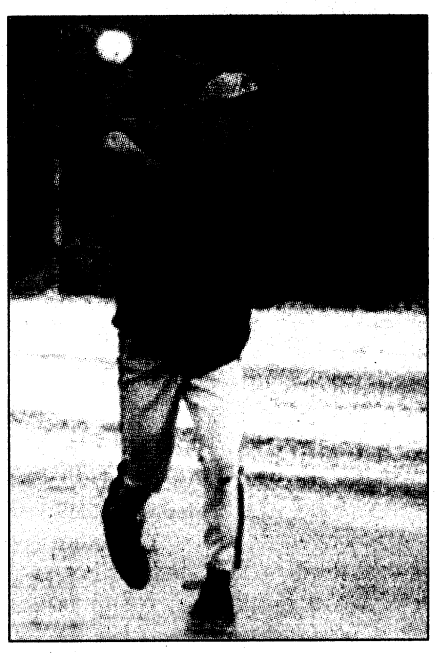
The first game of the tournament between the 63rd Engineer Company and C Company, 317th Engineer Battalion, was a defensive struggle, but was won on an inside-the-park homerun by 317th's shortstop J.R. Renteria.

"I saw the centerfielder was playing too shallow, so all I did was put it over his head," Renteria said. "After it went over his head, I knew I just had to keep running and I would have an easy inside-the-park homer. The fence in the outfield is too far back for someone to make a play if the ball should get back there. It's rare to see someone play real deep, so if the ball goes back there, then you'll definitely have extra bases."

With the 8-3 win, the 317th Engineers moved into the second round.

Saturday's action brought a lot more excitement.

In the last game of the quarterfinals, E Company, 1st Battalion (Airborne), 507th Infantry, better known as "Absolute Airborne," faced HHB, 1st Bn., 10th Field Artillery.

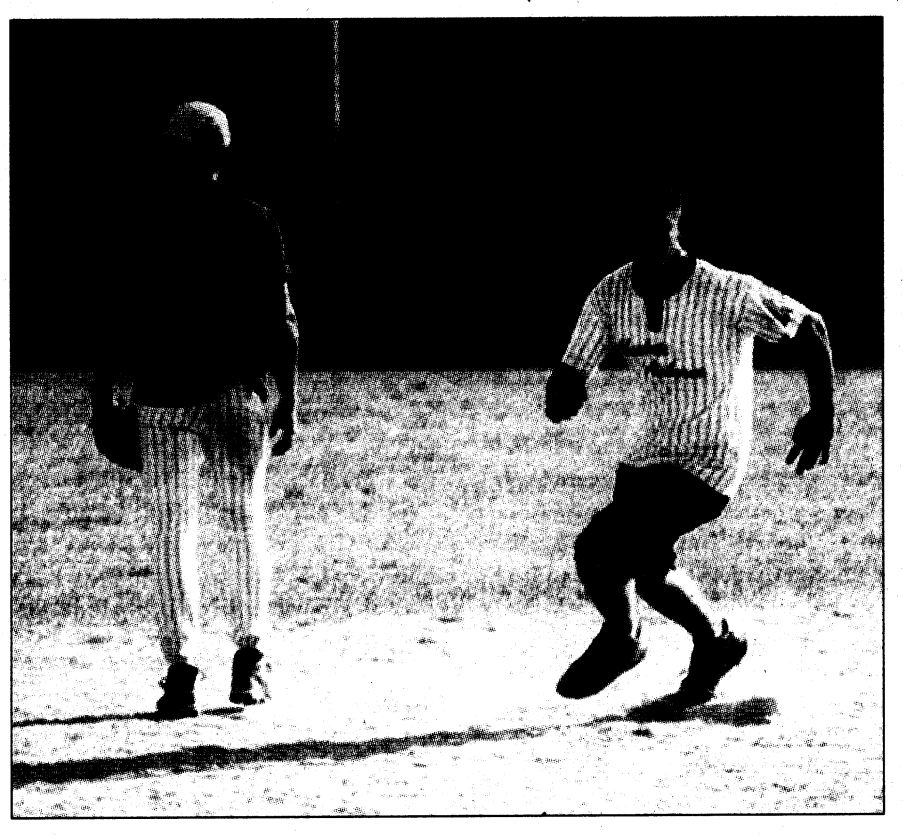


With a combination of smart base running and great defense at the end of the game, the Absolute Airborne team was able to pull out the win, 11-8.

"Last year, we didn't do too well in the season," said Matt Halfaker, Absolute Airborne second baseman. "We wanted to come out this year and make a statement. We wanted to show everybody that we could win it all."

The Absolute Airborne team made it past the semifinals and faced the team from the Western Hemisphere Institute for Security Cooperation for the right to claim the tournament championship.

From the get-go, Absolute Airborne had its way with the WHINSEC team, manhandling pitches and scoring runs at will.



In the first inning, the airborne team scored seven runs, powered by an inside-the-park grand slam from Halfaker.

317th Engineers shortstop J.R. Renteria hurls the ball toward first base to get the runner out.

"It was my first at-bat in the game, and I just wanted to get the bat on the ball," he said. "I wasn't trying to do anything special — I just wanted to get some runs in. Luckily, I hit it in the right spot, and I was able to come around and score."

The rampage didn't stop there for the Airborne team. In the second inning, they capitalized on WHINSEC errors to score four runs, making the score 11-1.

Absolute Airborne's Matt Halfaker rounds second base and heads for third during the championship game.

Absolute Airborne only scored four more runs the rest of the game, but more importantly, they were able to keep the WHINSEC bats in check by playing good defense and not giving them any chance for a comeback. Absolute Airborne won the game and the pre-season tournament championship, 15-5.

Airborne pitcher Marvin Tom said his defense backed up his pitching and helped pull him out of jams.

"My team is awesome," he said. "The defense was outstanding and I couldn't have asked for anything more."

Soldiers compete in Hockey All-Star game

Friendships formed during season

Pfc. Chris Stephens

Sgt. Chris McFarland, right, moves to block the shot of his opponent during the two-on-one portion of the skills competition. McFarland did stop the shot.

With a lot of focus on the Columbus Cottonmouths and the youth ice hockey leagues this year, many people have overlooked another type of hockey — on wheels.

Roller hockey, which is fast-paced and action-packed like ice hockey, is something three Fort Benning Soldiers do in their spare time.

"I love to play roller hockey," said Sgt. Chris McFarland, 3rd Battalion (OCS), 11th Infantry Regiment. "It's a challenge, especially at my position (goalie), that I take on with pride."

McFarland, along with Spc. Mark Weeks, U.S. Army Marksmanship Unit and Staff Sgt. Phil Blaisdell, 4th Ranger Training Battalion, compete in the Columbus Adult Roller Hockey League, which is held at the D.A. Turner YMCA.

The league, which has four teams, hit its midseason with an all-star game and a skills competition April 22 to recognize the best players in the league.

"This is the best of the best in our league competing," McFarland said. "Both the skills competition and the actual game were tough because of the talent out there."

For the skills competition and the game, players were broken up into two teams — North and South.

Skills competitions were broken into goalie and player divisions.

The skill competition included a fastest skater trial, puck handling and shooting accuracy.

"The skills competition was a lot of fun," Weeks said. "It was the first time since the start of the season that we all got to just hang out and have fun."

The goalie competition included rapid-fire, one-on-one and two-on-one events.

"The rapid fire event was the toughest because the shots were coming in so quickly and so fast," McFarland said. "Luckily I stopped six out of eight shots — although I only saw the first one coming at me. The rest of the time I was just sliding back and forth, hoping for the best."

After the skills competition was over, it was on to the all-star game.

After the puck dropped, the action was nonstop from beginning to end.

The North team, which had all three Soldiers on it, dominated the game, winning 23-11.

"The game was the best action the YMCA has seen," McFarland said. "Of course it was supposed to be that way being that it was an all-star game. With that said, both the score and the shots on goal were doubled from a normal game."

The South team jumped out to an early lead, but soon fell behind for good after many turnovers in their zone.

Weeks said before the game, the South team was talking about how they were going to dominate the game and ultimately win.

"They were making mistakes and we capitalized on them," he said. "We played good team hockey at both ends, and that is what won the game for us."

With half of the season gone, the league hopes to continue to have a succesful season, not only on the playing surface, but off as well.

"The best thing about this league is the friendships you form outside of the game," McFarland said. "Much like how the military has with cohesion in uniform, we have the same family feeling in the league."

Draft day gos and woes

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

Last weekend, the National Football League draft took place in New York City. I saw many positives out of the draft and noticed a few teams I feel got the best out of the draft.

First, I have to start with the Detroit Lions. By picking wide receiver Roy Williams from Texas and running back Kevin Jones from Virginia Tech in the first round, the Lions have the weapons they need on offense to compete in the NFC North.

Williams will be able to take some of the load off last year's first round pick Charles Rogers. Quarterback Joey Harrington now has two viable targets to throw to down field. Jones will also boost the running game, which ranked last in the NFL in 2003.

The Atlanta Falcons also had an excellent draft.

Needing desperately to get a shut-down corner, the Falcons were happy when cornerback DeAngelo Hall, from Virginia Tech, fell into their lap with the eighth pick in the draft.

Hall will improve the worst pass defense from 2003 and will soon be considered as one of the premiere corners in the league. An interesting fact about Hall — Michael Vick, the Falcons' quarterback, said that Hall is faster than he. Talk about quickness. Vick has been considered not only the fastest quarterback in the league, but also the fastest player.

Demorrio Williams from Nebraska and Chad Lavalais from LSU will also come in and make an immediate impact on the Falcons' opponents' overall running game.

The Falcons were also able to pick up another receiver in Michael Jenkins from Ohio State, to give them another deep threat.

One team I was surprised at having a good draft was the Arizona Cardinals.

Picking up wide receiver Larry Fitzgerald from Pittsburgh, linebacker Karlos Dansby from Auburn and defensive tackle Darnell Dockett from Florida State put Arizona as my team to beat in the NFC West. I think they've finally got the pieces to the puzzle they need to be successful.

And then, of course, I have to talk about last year's Super Bowl champs, the New England Patriots.

I'm still stunned at the caliber of talent they got in the draft.

The Patriots addressed their running back situation a few days before the draft, picking up Corey Dillon from the Cincinnati Bengals.

With that said, the Patriots picked up two outstanding players on defense and one on offense, which begs me to ask, "Who can stop them now?"

Picking up defensive linemen Vince Wilfork from Miami and Marquise Hill from LSU put two more power players on a defensive line that ranked fourth in the league against the rush in 2003.

Also, the addition of Ben Watson from Georgia gives the Patriots the much needed tight end they were looking for. I look for Watson to come in and immediately be a starter.

If anything, I feel the only thing that can stop the Patriots is the fact that they don't have a big play receiver. If they can find one, then who knows, they could be unstoppable.

After saying a few things about the teams with good drafts, I feel there were a few teams that really stunk up the show.

The worst is definitely the Dallas Cowboys.

They were in desperate need of a running back, and they traded that pick. How stupid can they be? They had the opportunity to pick up Steven Jackson from Oregon State with their first-round pick, and yet they traded it away. I feel that was the stupidest move of the draft.

True, the Cowboys did get running back Julius Jones from Notre Dame, but let's face it, he'll never amount to much in the NFL. He's not a big or speedy back, and in the NFL, you have to be one or the other.

Another team I was disappointed in was the Kansas City Chiefs.

What were they smoking during the draft? They got no one who will be able to help their team this year or in the future. I would just like to know what their thought process was during the draft. Players they picked up, including defensive tackle Junior Siavii from Oregon and linebacker Keyaron Fox from Georgia Tech, are unproven in the college ranks. Their ability to succeed in the pros will be slim to none.

The bad move of the year award goes to the New York Giants. I can't believe how much they gave up just to get Mississippi quarterback Eli Manning from the San Diego Chargers. They had selected N.C. State quarterback Philip Rivers with the fourth pick. Why couldn't they be happy with that?

The Giants traded Rivers to the Chargers along with a third-round pick in the draft and a first and fifth round pick in next year's draft.

To me, I think that's just too much. I don't believe Eli will ever be the quarterback that his brother Peyton is.

In fact, I believe Rivers will be a better player in the NFL than Eli will.

With everything that happened, this NFL season will be an exciting one. Who knows what will happen?

I found buried treasure in my attic.

More than 40 years ago, Grandma gave you some Series E Savings Bonds. So you put them in a safe place and forgot about them—until now. You were looking for old records when you found an unexpected treasure . . . those old Series E Savings Bonds. And even though your old bonds are no longer earning interest, they could still be worth more than 5 times their face value. So why not redeem those old bonds at your local financial institution? To find out more, call 1-800-4US BOND, or write to Savings Bonds, Parkersburg, WV 26106-1328. Old Savings Bonds. They're a treasure worth digging for.

BREAKING NEWS ... BREAKING NEWS ... BREAKING NEWS ...

After a national television broadcast disclosing unacceptable business practices in the Columbus area regarding young military personnel and car dealerships, the MILES Program was created. Before MILES, service members having limited or no credit often were forced into less than favorable choices. Joining the MILES team are members of the Nationally Certified Dealer Network and US Bank, the eighth largest in the nation. Setting standards in pricing and quality, MILES protects and assists those who serve our country.

CAR BUYING 105

sponsored by Rivertown Ford Exclusive Franchise Dealer for the MILES program.

How do I select a lender?

Always visit your union or bank first! If you go elsewhere, make sure you look at ALL FACTORS, including the following; interest rates; Fees; Terms of loan; Total of payments; Balance financed. Always take the following items to the dealership: A current LES statement & ETS date; Your current military ID; Your driver's license; Spouse's paycheck stub; Down payment, Insurance card.

What is a credit score and how is it used by lenders?

Your credit score predicts your reliability to repay a loan. Lenders base their decision on several criteria, but the credit score is the most important. A credit score considers the following: • Payment history • Amounts owed • Length of credit history • New credit requests • Types of credit use. Visit www.credit-score-online.com to find out more information.

Why might I have trouble purchasing a vehicle?

• No previous credit • Poor credit history • No co-signer • Bankruptcy • Repossession. The good news is sometimes these obstacles can be overcome!! Through miles MILES and Rivertown Ford you have an opportunity to receive financing through US Bank, the eighth largest in the nation.

Can I influence my credit score?

YES, you can by taking control of your finances. Past due collection balance should be paid off as soon as possible. Make sure your credit report is accurate. Close accounts that are no longer used or necessary. Pay down high balances on credit cards (if you can). Establish good credit history with no late payments for 12 to 24 months. Even if you have had bad credit in the past, a recent pattern of paying bills on time will help.

Making vehicle payments ... Many lenders will require an allotment. Utilizing the allotment process offers you peace of mind your obligations are being taken care of, even if the event of a deployment. Make sure you set this up properly right from the beginning to ensure regular payments to the lender.

THE HOW, WHAT, WHEN AND WHY OF PURCHASING A VEHICLE

How to negotiate the price ...

Be prepared, so you can make an informed buying decision. You should research:

- Ask the sales person to show you the NADA or Kelley Blue Book value
- Ask for a detailed list of add ons and what you are being charged for each. MILES prohibits excessive add ons.
- Ask for a CARFAX report!

Rivertown Ford and Miles Program will assist you in getting the vehicle you want and do it the RIGHT WAY!

ALL PRICES EXCLUDE TAX, TITLE AND WRA FEES. WITH APPROVED CREDIT. DEALER RETAINS ALL REBATES AND INCENTIVES. ALL IMAGES ARE FOR ILLUSTRATIVE PURPOSES ONLY. SALE ENDS NOVEMBER 30, 2009.

Goal: Decrease accidents by half

Army initiative hopes to reduce Soldier wrecks

Spc. Nikki St. Amant
Bayonet staff

The signing of the Army Safety Campaign Plan April 11 officially launched an Armywide initiative to reduce accidents 50 percent by the end of fiscal 2005.

Acting Secretary of the Army Les Brownlee and Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter Schoomaker were the signing authorities.

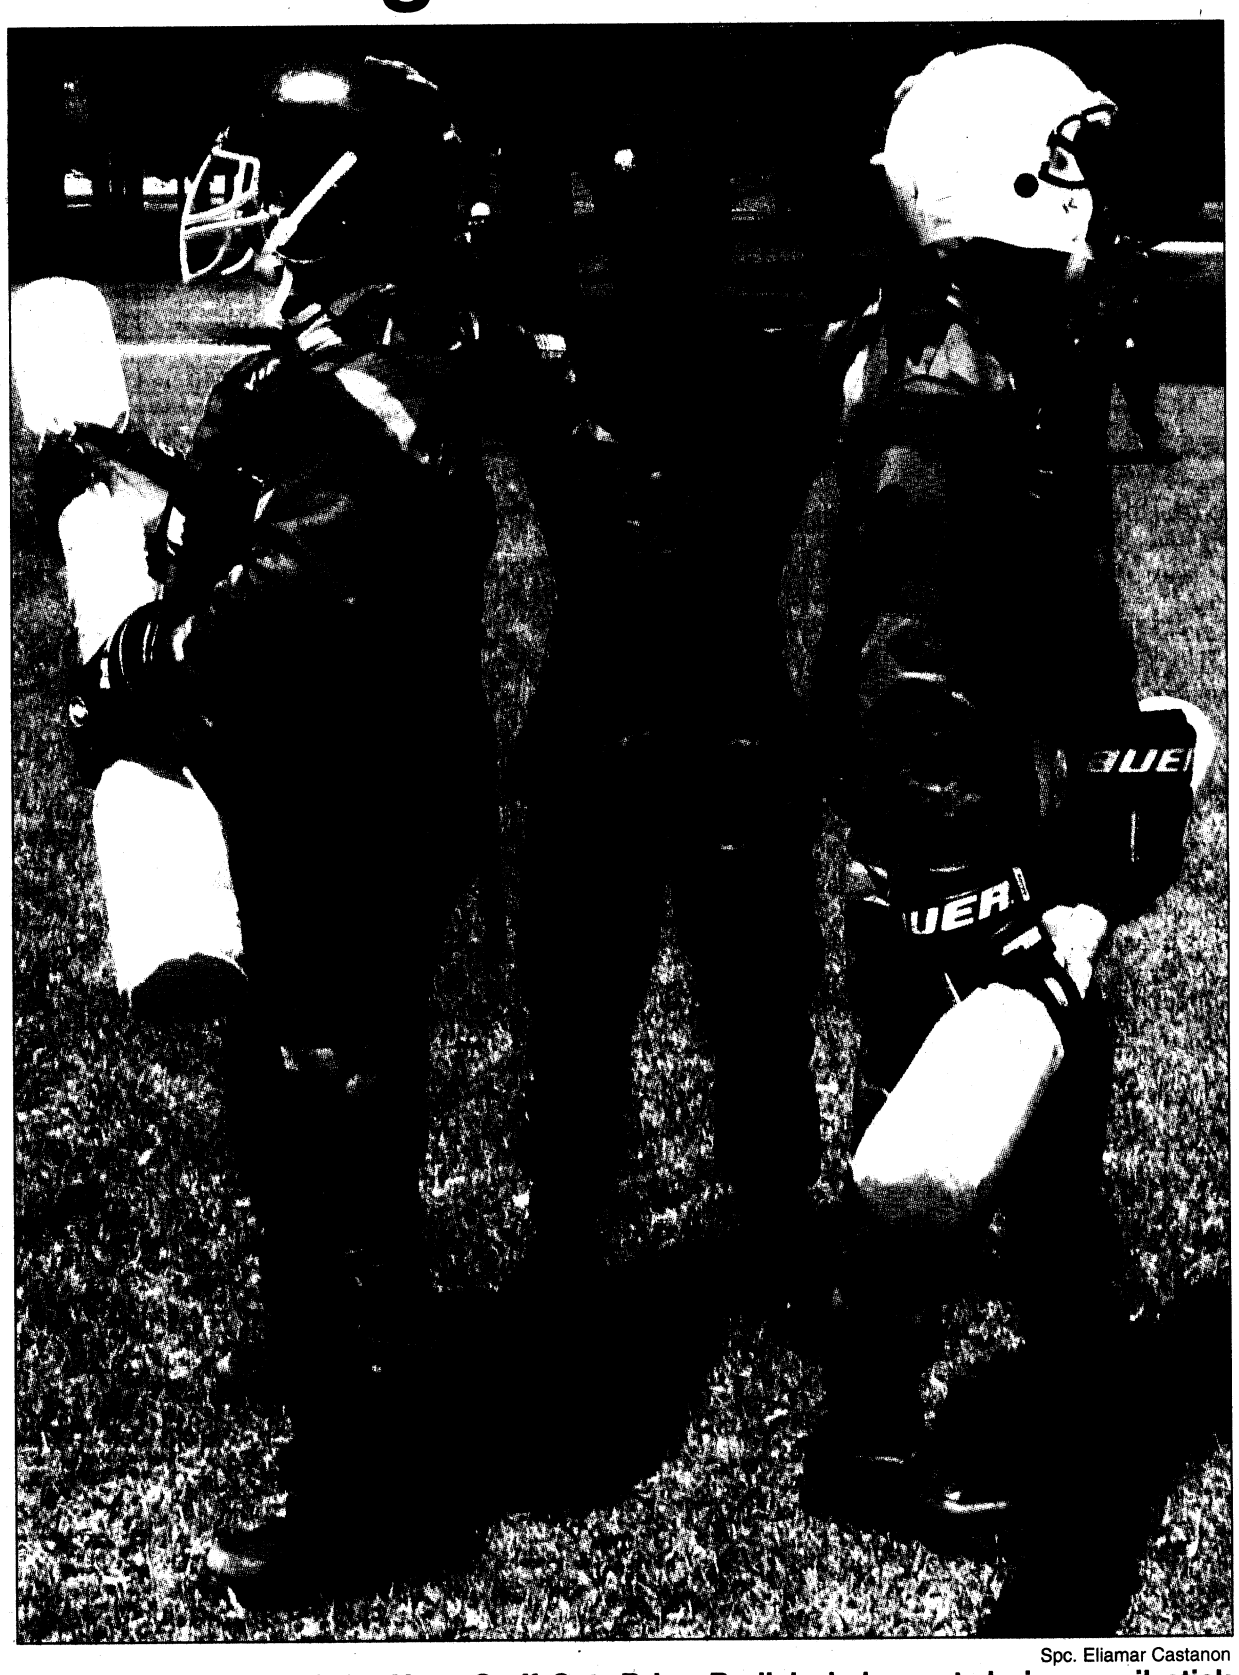
The Army initiative comes in response to a Department of Defense call to reduce accidents in all branches of the armed forces.

"Armywide, accidents have gone down since a 10-year high in 1994, but during the last five years, the numbers have begun creeping back up," said Regis Beighley, Fort Benning's safety manager.

Beighley said 185 active-duty accident fatalities were reported across the Army in 1994. That number dropped by almost two-thirds to 58 by 1998, but since then has steadily risen. In 2002, 105 deaths were reported.

Nationally, accidents are the fifth-leading cause of death behind heart disease, cancer, stroke and pulmonary diseases, Beighley said.

Since 1998, Fort Benning has lost 45 Soldiers to accidents, he said.



The majority of those deaths were related to automobile accidents, but four were heat injuries, two were drownings, one was a lightning casualty, one was a training accident involving a Howitzer, one was a parachute accident and one was alcohol poisoning.

Although not every accident can be avoided, many can be prevented and the new Army safety campaign aims to target those.

Drill Sergeant of the Year

Post to recognize DS of Year

"A successful drill sergeant makes a successful Army," said 1st Sgt. Ismael Diaz, Fort Benning's Drill Sergeant School first sergeant.

"Drill sergeants are 10 feet tall, bullet proof, larger than life," to a new Soldier, he said. "They are the subject matter experts."

Fort Benning will recognize the one drill sergeant who has gone beyond that at the Drill Sergeant of the Year ceremony at 1 p.m. May 12 in the Sand Hill Recreation Center.

Although he's not exactly 10 feet tall — he's 5'6" — Staff Sgt. Brian Rudick, C Company, 2nd Battalion, 47th Infantry Regiment, has earned the title of Drill Sergeant of the Year.

In a tough competition that began at the battalion level, the nominated drill sergeants were tested on their physical fitness and ability to provide proper hands-on training for Soldiers. They also memorized and delivered 11 oral presentations and underwent a rigid board covering everything from the military uniform to personnel actions for Soldiers in training, Diaz said.

"I never thought I'd make it this far," Rudick said. "But I did."

Rudick, 29, joined the Army Reserves as a motor transportation operator at 18. A year later he joined the active Soldiers.

The Charlotte, N.C., native is the father of a 5-year-old girl, Jordan, and husband to Kelly, his wife of 10 years. "I couldn't have done anything without the support of my wife," Rudick said. "I would've never made it this far without her."

As a former drill sergeant, Diaz understands the challenges of being a drill sergeant.

"Drill sergeants work long hours and face a lot of challenges, both physically and mentally. They need to always be ready to rise to the occasion," Diaz said.

As the 1996 Fort Jackson, S.C., Drill Sergeant of the Year, Diaz also understands the importance of the responsibilities that come with this title.

As the Drill Sergeant of the Year, Rudick will serve as the "voice of reason for the drill sergeants of the installation," Diaz said.

Rudick will serve as a liaison to acquire feedback from drill sergeants on the trail concerning training and other issues and bring those topics up to the post commander and post command sergeant major, Diaz said.

"I've accepted the challenge and feel honored to have been chosen," Rudick said.

"There are a lot of great drill sergeants out there worthy of this recognition," Diaz said.

Abizaid wants more troops

WASHINGTON — An Army brigade and two Marine expeditionary units will replace units of the 1st Armored Division and the 2nd Armored Cavalry Regiment in Iraq, Defense, Joint Staff and Army officials said.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld told reporters Tuesday at a Department of Defense news briefing that he has approved Army Gen. John Abizaid's request to keep the number of U.S. troops in Iraq between 135,000 and 138,000.

In April, Abizaid, head of U.S. Central Command, asked for additional troops. DoD extended two brigades of the 1st Armored Division and the 2nd Light Cavalry Regiment in Iraq to give commanders a mobile reserve. ITB gets ready for plus-up

Spc. Nikki St. Amant

To meet the Army's need for more Soldiers, the Infantry Training Brigade will train 2,225 additional infantry Soldiers this fiscal year and 6,145 additional Soldiers in fiscal 2005.

The plus-up is part of the "temporary" upsizing of the Army by 30,000 bodies over the next few years, the majority of which will be infantry Soldiers, said Col. Brian Baldy, ITB commander. The Army will gain 37 new infantry battalions by the end of fiscal 2007.

"The Army has a requirement for additional Soldiers to support the global war on terrorism," Baldy said. "Our mission is to not only support this requirement, but also to ensure there is no degradation in the training standards for the more than 17,000 infantrymen and special forces we are already training today.

MILITARY SPOUSE

Backbone of the Army

Melissa House
Bayonet staff

I bet you didn't know today is Military Spouse Appreciation Day. And don't forget, Sunday is Mother's Day, so you still have time to get out there and do something nice for Mom.

The military spouse has certainly evolved a bit over the past century or two. They've gone from being all women, to being men and women. And from "short term" spouses — those whose Soldier only served one three-year stint in the Army during wartime — to "long termers" with 20 or 30 or even more years with the Army under their belts.

But I've decided the military spouse of today is not really that much different than those of 30 or 40 years ago.

Here's my case study — a classic boy-meets-girl, boy-joins-Army story.

She grew up in a small northeastern Pennsylvania town.

He grew up outside of Philly. They meet in college, fall in love. She waits a year for him to graduate so they can get married. So far, so good.

He carts her off to Fort Benning for a year of infantry, Ranger and airborne training. She teaches at Columbus High, until he moves her off to Panama for a few years, then goes off to war in Vietnam. So the young wife waits, and hopes and prays for his safe return.

He makes it back, carts her off to Alabama, Michigan, New York, Kansas and then to Germany. By this time, they have two children along for the ride.

Now in the second decade of service, our Soldier introduces his family to the joys of Virginia, California and Illinois. Years later, our spouse confesses she never, ever, ever wanted to go to Illinois. The kids never knew.

By not saying anything, by not complaining about casting her lot with her Soldier, she gave the children the opportunity to make the move with open minds. They did well there, and our spouse emerged from the experience as a die-hard Cubs fan.

And she moved on. Another trip to Virginia, then Texas, then back to Illinois. Then, right after dropping her youngest at college, our spouse packed off to Germany for three more years. She returned to Pennsylvania, and then it was back to Illinois yet again, then a third trip to Virginia. She logged countless miles and 32 houses in 36 years.

Our military spouses of today aren't so different. Many of them finish high school with the same friends they had in kindergarten, leaving town only because of a set of military orders.

Some will argue that the NCO is the backbone of the Army. I tend to disagree. I think it's the military spouse — you know — the one waiting, hoping and praying for the Soldier's safe return from Iraq or Afghanistan.

She's the one putting her career plans on hold to hold down the fort while her Soldier makes the world a better place, in this decade, just like the Soldiers before him.

She's the one charging into each new move with an open mind and a "let's-make-the-best-of-this" attitude. And, somehow, she knows more about medicine than your doctor and you wonder if she might have wanted to be one, but never could manage medical school with a Soldier and a family. She'll be the one you call for advice.

If you see a spouse today, say hi. Say thanks for all she does for her family and for the Army.

Chances are she needs it.

And don't forget to call you mother this weekend either. I know right where to find mine.

She's back home in Pennsylvania.

My mom rocks and rules

Bridgett Siter
Bayonet staff

I knew being a mom wasn't going to be easy. I grew up watching The Brady Bunch and The Partridge Family. Entire episodes revolved around kid problems like jealousy and tattling and teen hormones.

The problem was, Carol and Shirley had nothing on my mom. She wore pantyhose and skirts every day, served meals that didn't start in a box on plates that weren't paper, and ironed all our clothes. (Even sewed some of them.) She monitored our TV viewing and refereed our fights. She ruled the house, Mom did, since Dad was mostly not home. And she made it all look easy.

Did I mention there were seven of us children?

So why is it that I, child number five, who inherited her mother's forehead, her taste for all foods fried and her love of literature, why wasn't I outfitted with Mom's designer genes?

Oh sure, I got the first part right — that whole reproduction thing comes fairly easy, thank you very much. I've been blessed, and I do mean blessed, with four incredible children.

But these wonderful, brilliant, funny, complex creatures often leave me wondering. I mean wondering, as in, "Whose kids are these, and why do they keep tugging at my sleeve?" And wandering, as in, "Help me someone, help me find my way out of this maze of dirty laundry."

Really good mothering is an art, I'm convinced, and my mom was the master — still is, for that matter.

Don't get me wrong. I'm not saying she never broke a sweat, never raised her voice and never served leftovers. Au contraire. She had, in fact, the world's most diabolical mother glare, one that sent shivers down my spine. It was nearly always accompanied by a great sigh — more like a heave — one that engaged her entire upper body starting low in the lungs. By the time the sigh was expelled in a great, windy gust, it was too late. Better run.

But Mom had the whole child-rearing act down pat in the areas that mattered most. She was consistent and unequivocal in principle and policy. Bad behavior wasn't tolerated in our house, even if the culprit was on TV. We never doubted who was in charge, and like Aesop's Fables, stories of the few times we challenged her authority still circle regularly at family reunions, in hopes the younger crowd might somehow profit from our folly.

Last year, my sweet daughter Brittney entered a contest sponsored by a local radio station called "Treat My Mom Like a Rock Star." Brittney's letter won, and for a brief moment I allowed myself to believe I just might make the Really Good Mom short list one day.

But truth be told, in spite of my daughter's blind faith in me, bless her, I know I'm just a watered-down, second-generation wannabe when it comes to rockin' mommas.

My mom still rules.

Army recognizes spouses contributions

In 1984, President Ronald Reagan proclaimed May 23 Military Spouse Day to recognize the important role spouses play in the readiness and well-being of our nation's armed forces. The secretary of defense standardized the day as the Friday preceding Mother's Day in 1985. This year we honor our military spouses today.

We are an Army engaged in our nation's global war on terrorism. During the past year, our Soldiers have once again been asked to defend our freedom and the privileges we all enjoy.

While our Soldiers face increased deployments and longer separations, our spouses remain the consistent, predictable cornerstone for the well-being of our Army family. Army spouses continue to meet the unique challenges of Army life, as has been the case throughout the Army's nearly 229-year history. Army spouses have always played an instrumental role in the preparedness and success of our forces.

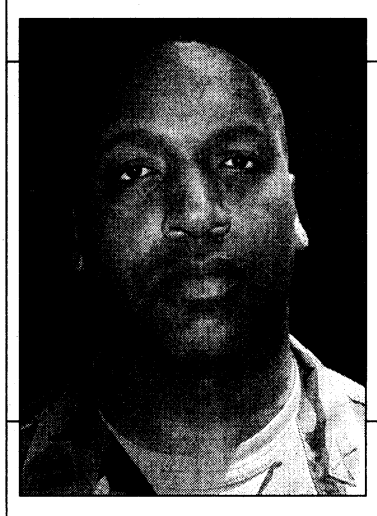
The contributions of the first spouses who followed their Soldiers to Valley Forge in 1777 set the standard for all who followed. These brave women nursed the wounded and laundered Soldiers' uniforms. At times dodging bullets and even taking up arms when needed, they provided unending support and served as the Army's first force multipliers, but never received official recognition from the Army. Their immeasurable contributions to the ideals of family, patriotism, service and freedom, and their distinctive sacrifices continue to endure today as our Army and our nation face new threats.

Much has changed in the years since Valley Forge. Today's Army spouses receive well-deserved recognition for their role in the defense of our nation; support programs, systems and services allow for a level of well-being not always available in the past.

In a world where change is the norm, Army spouses remain the constant. They continue to be the mainstay of moral support and encouragement on the home front for our Soldiers and the work force that supports them. They are the driving force and energy that makes our Army strong. Today, as in the days of old, through great personal sacrifice, the Army spouse is a key component in keeping our Army relevant and ready.

Military Spouse Day affords us the opportunity to publicly acknowledge the commitment of our Army spouses across all components — active, National Guard and Army Reserve — and to pay tribute to their critical role in the strength of our nation and the success of our Army in accomplishing the mission. So, to the many spouses who support their Soldiers, thank you for your courage and patriotism and the love and commitment to your Soldiers and to the Army family.

Furthermore, we would like to thank you for your generosity and your devoted service. Many blessings to you and your families, the Army and our nation today and throughout the year.



— Honorable Les Brownlee,
Acting Secretary of the Army

Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker,
Army Chief of Staff

Sgt. Maj. of the Army Kenneth Preston,
Sergeant Major of the Army

Conference unites post, community officials in mission to prevent domestic violence

Sgt. Kim Dooley
Bayonet assistant editor

Officials from Fort Benning and the surrounding communities joined forces to promote education and prevention in the fight to stop domestic violence last week.

More than 200 social workers, law enforcement agents, educators and other community agency representatives — including 150 from Fort Benning — met for the biennial Domestic Violence Conference at the Columbus Trade Center April 27 to 29.

The conference, which began in 1990, educates community agencies that will most likely be involved in domestic violence cases and betters the working relationship between military and civilian agencies, said Rebecca Welch, Fort Benning's Family Advocacy Program manager and co-founder of the conference.

"This was an opportunity to bring our communities together for the betterment of family life," Welch said. "We have a lot of military families living off the installation, so we need to have a good working relationship with off-post agencies, like the Columbus Police Department. If they have to respond to a (domestic violence) call with our families, it's good to know who you're talking to."

But for Welch, the ultimate goal is that it never gets to that point, and education is the key to prevention, she said. Education is especially important in the military community, where Soldiers come and go constantly.

"This is a way to expose us to new ideas, concepts, research and practices that will help all of us perform our duties more effectively," she said.

The attendees spent three days learning about new domestic violence laws and developments, trends and misconceptions and other important information.

One of the "highlights" was a guest speaker who discussed a common stigma about domestic violence, Welch said.

"A lot of people look at abuse and automatically think it was a man abusing a woman," she said.

But that's not always the case, and a growing number of men are coming forward as domestic violence victims. One of those men, Stanley Green, who has appeared on 20/20 and Oprah, shared his story at the conference.

"It's something that many people don't think about," said Yvonne Wilbanks, alcohol and drug control officer for Fort Benning's Army Substance Abuse Program, who attended the conference. "It's just such an underreported problem, but these males can also be victims, and they need our help and support, too."

> "Your family should be the closest thing to you; you should appreciate them ... All of us are going to have stress. We're all going to have problems in our lives. The key is how you deal with it."
> Rebecca Welch
> Family Advocacy Program manager, conference co-founder

Wilbanks said Green's presentation and the overall conference were "very enlightening."

Other presentations brought to light new information about how the Department of Child and Family Services handles its investigations, distinguishing between types of infant deaths — instead of dismissing them as Sudden Infant Death Syndrome — how domestic violence perpetrators are prosecuted and how victims should be assisted.

James Rutland, a counselor at McBride Elementary School, attended the conference to update his knowledge base about child abuse.

"This conference is just an excellent way to keep up on new news and to learn about child abuse," said Rutland, a 38-year teaching veteran.

"You always need to know the signs of child abuse and how to be able to teach children about the different lures (perpetrators) use," he said. "It's all about prevention, and we want to provide a safer environment, safer homes and schools."

For Welch, the conference was also about revitalizing and rededicating herself to her mission — preventing domestic violence and helping those families who still suffer.

"Day in and day out, when you think about all the calls that come in, when you're dealing with all these problems, it's just so sad ... It drains your energy level on a day-to-day basis," she said.

When Welch was directly involved with assisting domestic violence victims, her "reward" was knowing they had been taken care of.

"Being on the prevention side, the reward is that I'm providing the best training for these professionals," she said. "It gives us an uplift that we are doing the best job we can, that we're providing the best training to Soldiers and their families and that we're trying to stay on top of this problem."

And "this problem" — family abuse — is deeply personal for Welch.

"Family probably means so much more to me than some others, because I don't have one," she said. "I know how important it is. Your family should be the closest thing to you; you should appreciate them."

Welch said there aren't many days that go by when she doesn't get a call from a parent or spouse having problems with their loved ones.

"All of us are going to have stress. We're all going to have problems in our lives," she said. "The key is how you handle it."

And there are plenty of resources to help families deal with their problems effectively, she said, especially in the military community. It should never come to abuse.

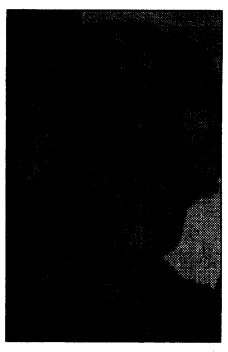
Widow donates uniform, money to museum

Bridgett Siter
Bayonet staff

Like the widow's copper coins in St. Luke's Gospel, a local woman's donation of $100 to the National Infantry Foundation touched the heart of one who recognizes its value beyond dollars.

As the director of the National Infantry Museum, Frank Hanner cannot solicit funds for the foundation, which needs $70 million to construct a new state-of-the-art museum complex on the 200-acre strip of land that connects Fort Benning and Columbus along Fort Benning Road.

But he has a vested interest, nearly 25 years of sweat equity and an emotional attachment to the museum's collection of more than 30,000 artifacts.



So he stays abreast of the foundation's progress, and he's well aware that some might say Isabel Emmerich's contribution pales in comparison to the five-figure donations offered up by large businesses and government grants.

But Hanner figures the true value of Emmerich's "gracious gift" is immeasurable if one considers the sentiment behind it.

"She just wanted to save her sister's uniform and share her story with others," said Hanner, explaining the Hamilton, Ga., resident's reason for visiting the museum in March.

Emmerich's sister, Adelaide Ashton Davies, was a member of the Army Nurse Corps during World War II. She crossed the Rhine River with Patton's Army and worked in field hospitals until the war's end. Davies retired as a major in 1963 and died shortly after.

Davies had no children, so her younger sister inherited the uniform and the stories that go with it. Emmerich, who's in her 90s, passed them along to Hanner March 22.

Emmerich

"I can't take care of them anymore, but I wanted them preserved so other people could enjoy them," she said. "It was important to find a good place for them."

Emmerich is confident she found that place in the National Infantry Museum, and most assuredly in the hands of Hanner and his associates.

"I appreciate what they're doing there," Emmerich said. "Mr. Hanner is so obviously dedicated and remarkably knowledgeable about our history."

And of her contribution to the construction of the new museum, Emmerich simply said, "It's something that's greatly needed."

Indeed, the National Infantry Museum on Baltzell Avenue is the most frequently visited public building on Fort Benning. More than 2,000 visitors toured last week alone. But they saw only a third of the museum's collection, because, with only 55,000 square feet available, much of the military artifacts are relegated to basement archives.

That'll all change with the opening of the new museum, though no one can say just when that will be. Architectural firm E. Verner Johnson and Associates was selected to design the 150,000-square-foot main museum, which will be flanked by a five-acre parade field, a quarter-mile Memorial Walk, life-size outdoor vignettes of war scenes and a World War II company street.

A few years ago, Hanner might have been forced to turn away Emmerich's uniform. With limited space, the museum's staff of five had to focus strictly on infantry artifacts. Now, with their sights on the new museum, they can paint a much broader picture of the history of the infantry.

"We want to put a face to military history," Hanner said. "Yes, our focus has always been the infantry. We are the Home of the Infantry. But for every infantry Soldier on the battle field, there was a mom back home, or a wife and children. And there were nurses like Ms. Emmerich's sister and scout dogs and drummer boys.

"If we're going to tell the story of the infantry and do a good job of it, we'll have to tell the whole story."

And with her "widow's offering" of $100, Emmerich will help preserve a chapter of that story.

Prison investigations moved swiftly, officials say

Jim Garamone
American Forces Press Service

WASHINGTON — Once military authorities received information about possible prisoner abuse at Abu Ghraib prison outside Baghdad, investigations moved swiftly, Defense Department officials said Monday.

A Soldier, disturbed by the goings-on at the prison, went to officials with his allegations Jan. 13.

The next day, Army Lt. Gen. Ricardo S. Sanchez, commander of Combined Joint Task Force 7, launched a criminal investigation.

The criminal investigation has resulted in the Army charging six Soldiers from the 800th Military Police Brigade with a variety of offenses. The Soldiers are serving in Iraq still — although not as military police — and will remain there until the investigations are complete. The offenses against them include conspiracy, dereliction of duty, cruelty and maltreatment, assault and indecent acts with another.

There are four other investigations into the "heinous" acts that allegedly took place in the prison, said a senior defense official.

A second investigation, recently completed by Army Maj. Gen. Antonio M. Taguba, looked into procedures used at the prison. Taguba is the deputy commanding general for support at the 3rd Army, Fort McPherson, Ga. Although classified, the investigation is "damning," said one official. Six NCOs and officers have received letters of reprimand following that investigation.

The Army inspector general's office has launched a third investigation, which began in February. That group will look at "detention operations around the world" to ensure humane, normal policies are being followed.

Lt. Gen. James R. Helmly, chief of the Army Reserve, ordered a fourth investigation to assess the state of training of Army Reserve units. The 800th is an Army Reserve unit based at Fort Totten, N.Y.

Another investigation is looking into the possible involvement of military intelligence personnel in the abuse. Army Maj. Gen. George Fay, the deputy chief of staff for intelligence, is leading that inquiry.

Individuals' actions, not system, at fault

Jim Garamone
American Forces Press Service

WASHINGTON — Soldiers who allegedly abused and tortured Iraqi prisoners acted as individuals, said the spokesman for the Combined Joint Task Force 7 during an interview on NBC's Today program.

Army Brig. Gen. Mark Kimmitt, the command's deputy operations director, said these are cases of individual criminal conduct.

"Nobody gave them the order to break the law," he said.

Kimmitt said his response to the allegations at Abu Ghraib prison outside Baghdad is the same as every other Soldier in Iraq: "Just absolute disgust."

Six Soldiers face courts-martial for the offenses. Another six have received reprimands for their actions or lack of action, Kimmitt said in a follow-up interview. When the alleged acts occurred, the prison was under the control of a company of the 800th Military Police Brigade out of New York. The 16th Military Police Brigade (Airborne) from Fort Bragg, N.C., now runs Abu Ghraib.

Army Lt. Gen. Ricardo S. Sanchez, commander of CJTF 7, has ordered a third investigation into military intelligence aspects of the case.

The case has caused outrage throughout the Middle East, officials said. Pictures of the torture and humiliation have appeared on the front pages of Arabic-language newspapers throughout the region.

"We need, as Americans, to be a bright, shining light for the treatment of prisoners," Kimmitt said. "We have to demonstrate to the world that our Soldiers treat their soldiers with dignity and respect. Otherwise, we have no right to ask that of our adversaries. That does have me concerned."

Kimmitt said the actions of a few do not indicate a systemic problem throughout the Army. The general said those in charge needed to do more "checking, double-checking and rechecking. And it's also having the guts to stand up, when you find something's wrong, and say, 'That's wrong, and we need to fix it.'"

Community contributions crown campaign goals

Melissa House
Bayonet staff

Fort Benning's efforts during the 2003 Combined Federal Campaign will be recognized May 21 in a ceremony at the White House.

Cindy Cain, director of the tricommunity CFC, received a phone call last week from the Office of Personnel Management inviting her and a representative from Fort Benning to the ceremony.

Chuck Walls, the garrison manager, will travel with Cain to accept the award for the highest percentage dollar increase.

Walls and Col. Rick Riera, garrison commander, oversee the CFC campaign at Fort Benning and head the local federal coordinating committee.

The $770,000 pledged by Fort Benning Soldiers, civilians and from local governmental agencies like the Internal Revenue Service and U.S. Postal Service represented a 27.2 percent increase, Cain said. The tricommunity campaign beat 352 other national campaigns.

Cain said she was excited by the award, but wanted to make sure the right people got the recognition they deserved.

"The general and I can set goals and strategize," she said, "but it's the key workers down in the units, those trying to get donations — those in the trenches — who made it happen."

And what happened was Fort Benning Soldiers and civilians met and exceeded their CFC goal, collecting more than $650,000 for agencies in the tricommunity and across the nation.

> "ITB — God love them. They just give and give and give."
> Cindy Cain
> Director of the tricommunity Combined Federal Campaign

Cain gives a great thanks to the Infantry Training Brigade for collecting more than $238,000 of that money.

"ITB — God love them," Cain said. "They just give and give and give."

She said she personally processed all of the pledge cards and "saw where the young Soldiers and older NCOs gave their money. They picked organizations that meant something to them."

She regrets that the CFC budget doesn't hold enough money to allow for some sort of big recognition event, but said Fort Benning is headed in the right direction with its commanding general's awards program.

"I hope that someday, somehow, we will have a huge recognition celebration," Cain said.

"Right now, we just have to be good stewards of the money (people pledge)."

Once the word gets out about the award, Cain thinks it might be the push the tricommunity CFC needs to reach the $1 million mark next year.

"You keep pushing and pushing," Cain said, "but we still only have 36 percent participation."

Those 11,060 donors deserved the biggest thanks, Cain said.

"During these days where demands on time, resources and focus are understandably extreme, true professionalism and a kind heart still seem to rise to the surface when the welfare of others is at sake."

International jump promotes partnership

Spc. Maggie E. Ruiz
WHINSEC Public Affairs Office

The Western Hemisphere Institute for Security Cooperation conducted its first international airborne operation April 29 afternoon at Fryar Drop Zone.

At a height of 1,500 feet above ground level in a UH-60 Blackhawk helicopter, several Fort Benning units including WHINSEC, 75th Ranger Regiment, 4th Ranger Training Battalion, 11th Infantry Regiment and 1st Battalion (Airborne), 507th Infantry, took to the skies, earning a pair of Chilean jump wings at the conclusion of the event.

However, for many, the event held a deeper meaning than just a simple exchange of foreign jump wings, said WHINSEC Commandant Col. Gilberto Perez, who has earned four international jump wings.

"There is a certain elitism that comes with being a paratrooper," Perez said. "It's a unique camaraderie we share. We are friends and allies pursuing the same goal regardless of our nationality. Sharing this risky experience as one entity during this operation symbolizes, to me, the great strength we have as professionals and allies."

Paratroopers representing the United States, Chile, Ecuador, Colombia and Australia participated.

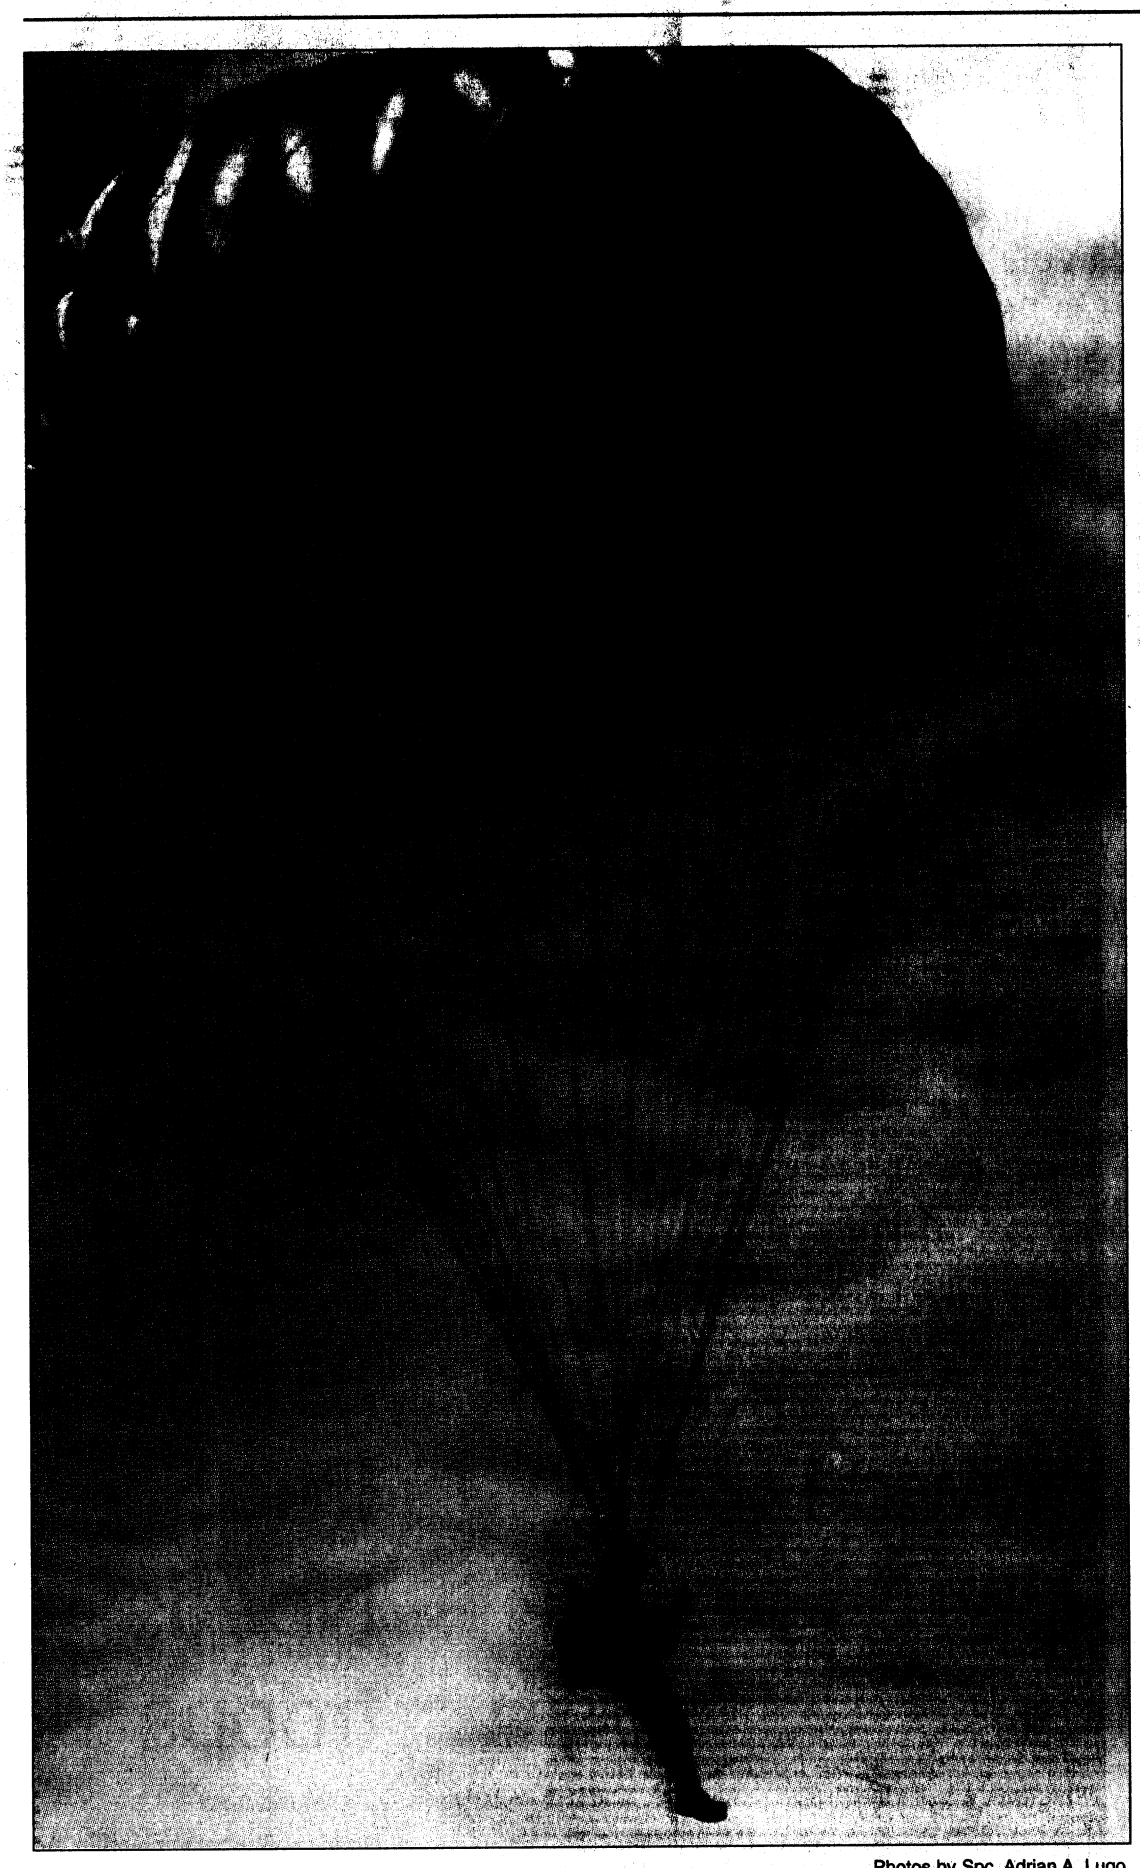
The jump was supervised by one U.S. jumpmaster, Staff Sgt. Raul Esteras, and one Chilean, Master Sgt. Luis Vasquez. Vasquez brought significance to development of the event by being one of the first WHINSEC guest instructors to be certified to conduct jumpmaster duties in the United States, therefore affording the opportunity to fellow paratroopers to gain Chilean jump wings during the event.

WHINSEC Commandant Col. Gilberto Perez watches as Chilean guest instructor Master Sgt. Luis Vasquez V. performs a safety check on WHINSEC Command Sgt. Maj. Rafael Colondres's gear.

"This jump showcases my ability as a jumpmaster, which goes beyond just being able to perform them in my country," Vasquez said.

"Our countries share the same kind of training, the same experiences and the same brotherhood that is born through our same goals and risks we take, because we know the rigors of jumping," he said.

Vasquez said he feels more confident after the success of the jump.



"I know what it takes to conduct such an operation, beginning from its planning stages to the moment our feet touch the soil," he said. "I hope that I may be able to do this again and do it right as I have in this event."

The event's primary purposes were to promote the working relationship and partnership between WHINSEC and other Fort Benning units and to re-establish the foreign jumpmaster program at WHINSEC, said Capt. Orlando Cosme, safety officer for the jump.

"This airborne op demonstrates WHINSEC's ability to plan and execute airborne ops in conjunction with international jumpmasters," Cosme said.

"We are very appreciative of the teamwork that other units have displayed toward us. They play a great part in our success."

He said more jumps will be organized for future dates. Events such as these promote unit cohesion and boost morale.

Capt. Vincent Bray, an operations officer with the 36th Engineer Group (Construction), glides down to Fryar Drop Zone April 29. Bray joined about 70 of his U.S. and foreign military parachutist brethren in a jump wing exchange hosted by the Western Hemisphere Institute for Security Cooperation and sponsored by the Chilean government.

Army Reserve gets more full-time positions

Increase to support active AGR mission

Army News Service

ST. LOUIS — The Active-Guard-Reserve program has seen an increase of approximately 300 new assignment opportunities during this fiscal year.

The increase comes as a result of ongoing efforts to add more full-time support to Army Reserve units, officials said. Another 975 positions will also become available during this fiscal year through normal attrition, according to officials at the Army Reserve Active Duty Management Directorate in St. Louis.

"The AGR program is absolutely vital to the training and readiness of our units," said the chief of the Army Reserve, Lt. Gen. James R. Helmly. "AGR Soldiers are now deployed in Afghanistan, Iraq, and around the world as an essential part of our Army, enabling mission accomplishment and executing important missions on behalf of the nation.

"We will continue to grow the AGR program with the required skills necessary to transform the Army Reserve while at war, enabling a greater level of readiness, agility and responsiveness," he said. "We need the best and brightest as AGR Soldiers and I encourage all who are interested to apply and join the ranks of our AGR Soldiers."

AGR Soldiers serve in full-time, active-duty positions in worldwide locations.

They provide day-to-day operational support needed to ensure Army Reserve units are ready to mobilize when needed.

The program, begun in 1979, provides AGR Soldiers with the same benefits as their counterparts in the active Army. This includes active-duty pay and allowances, medical care, commissary and post exchange privileges and a full retirement after 20 years of active federal service.

In addition to a wide range of assignment locations, the AGR program also offers officers, warrant officers and enlisted Soldiers the opportunity to serve in a variety of fields including transportation, human resources, military intelligence, finance, medical service and recruiting.

The AGR program is open to Soldiers who serve in the Army Reserve, the Army National Guard and the active Army.

To download an application packet, Soldiers can visit the AGR portion of the U.S. Army Human Resources Command Web site at https://www.2xcitizen.usar.army.mil/soldierservices/programs/agr/agrprogram.asp or call (800) 318-5298.

ONE TEAM

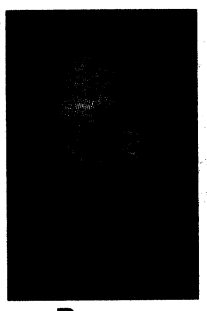
Civilian's 40-year dedication earns Army employee recognition

Master Sgt. Paul J. Ebner
USAIC Public Affairs Office

There is probably nothing more heartwarming than Soldiers returning home to Fort Benning after a deployment to a combat zone. The flood of emotions, tears and pride from family members and friends is overwhelming.

There is, however, a stranger to most of these returning Soldiers who, although he may not always be at the homecoming, takes a great deal of pride in knowing that he and his staff played an important role in their safe return.

Earl Brown, chief of Plans and Mobilization Division, received the Meritorious Civilian Service Award April 13 and was also recognized for his 40 years of civilian service at the Commanding General's Two Star Excellence Breakfast April 23.



Brown is proud of his accomplishments, but is quick to share the credit for his success.

"It is a team effort," Brown said. "We have an excellent staff experienced in mobilization."

The 2145th Garrison Support Unit, CONUS Replacement Center, Directorate of Logistics, Directorate of Public Works, Directorate of Community Activities, MEDDAC, DENTAC and AG all play a vital role in preparing Soldiers for deployment. He also credits his supervisors, Col. Robert Brown, director of Operations and Training, and Robert Jordan, deputy director.

"They give me a lot of flexibility and allow me to do my job without direct supervision," he said.

His supervisors not only give him flexibility, but credit him with the successful deployment of more than 191 Reserve units and 7,000 individual augmentees for a total of more than 18,800 soldiers since 9-11, Col. Brown said.

Brown

"He is a consummate professional who is highly regarded by those he works with here at Fort Benning, TRADOC, 1st Army and FORSCOM," Col. Brown said. "The CG of 1st Army comes to Fort Benning on a regular basis just to sit with Earl Brown to seek his views and opinions on mobilization issues. His ideas on the roles and missions of the CRC after Desert Storm, led to the development of the Garrison Support Unit to help with the administrative burden of mobilizing units."

Brown has known deployments for years.

He began his Army career as an infantryman in 1955 and retired as a command sergeant major in 1985. After retiring, he moved over to the civilian side of the Army.

"I wanted to stay associated with the military," he said. "Being a DA civilian is as close as you can get without being in uniform."

The Missouri native began his civilian career as a Combat Development Organization planner in the Directorate of Combat Development. He then moved to the chief position in the Mobilization Branch before assuming his current position.

Although he is not in uniform his concern for Soldiers is just as great. When asked about his most memorable accomplishment, he said it was the opportunity to bring Reserve Soldiers to Fort Benning to be mobilized and deploy. Individual Soldiers and units were brought on board and had to prepare for deployment.

Training had to be validated, as well as logistic operations, personnel readiness and medical readiness.

"They have to be ready," Brown said. "There's no compromise in readiness. We check to ensure they are trained and equipped. We don't waive any training or equipment issue. It's a good feeling when we deploy Soldiers knowing they are ready. I get great satisfaction in being part of that."

His commitment to the mission is evident, Col. Brown said.

"Sometimes I think Earl Brown works eight days a week," said the colonel said. "I have to sometimes tell him to go home and get some rest."

Another notable accomplishment of Brown's is his education. He began his Army career as a high school dropout, but took advantage of the few educational opportunities available then.

"I was a brigade operations sergeant going to school at night during the week. There were no day or weekend classes then." Senior NCOs were expected to earn an associate's degree then. He has since earned a master's degree.

His work as a junior NCO paid off with a promotion to sergeant major. He was selected for and attended the first class at the Sergeants Major Academy at Fort Bliss.

Brown isn't planning on retirement soon.

"I'm still in good health and as long as I enjoy it, I'll continue to work."

But someday Earl Brown will retire, and if Col. Brown gets his way, it won't be until he leaves.

"I've told Earl Brown he is not authorized to retire on my watch," he said. "When it does come time for Earl Brown to retire, it will be extremely difficult to find someone to replace him. I mean, we can all be replaced, but Benning will be hard pressed to find a replacement in the near term to do all that Earl Brown does."

Citizens face danger in rebuilding Iraq

Civilians hold strong role in Iraq mission

Sgt. 1st Class Marcia Triggs
Army News Service

WASHINGTON — The kidnapping and murder of civilian contractors in Iraq has not deterred thousands of workers from providing aid to American troops and assisting with the build-up of Iraq and Afghanistan.

Restoring fuel, water and power lines, providing humanitarian aid, and maintaining military vehicles — there are umpteen jobs being performed by civilians in Iraq, and most will go unknown.

"I have been part of several large incidents within Iraq where many people have lost their lives or been brutally hurt due to cowardly acts of terrorism," said William Hodge, a firefighter with Kellogg, Brown and Root.

Hodge, of Sumter, S.C., is part of an education program that is training 125 people on the local fire department, and bringing the country up to date with 21st century firefighting.

"Seeing smiles on little kid's faces as we pass by in fire trucks is remarkable," Hodge said.

Kellogg, Brown and Root, a subsidiary of Halliburton, has more than 24,000 employees and subcontractors in Iraq and Kuwait. The company has lost 34 personnel, including the recent confirmed death of Tony Johnson, 47, of Riverside, Calif., who was involved in a convoy ambush April 9.

Part of that same convoy was Thomas Hamill, a truck driver with Halliburton, who escaped from his Iraqi captives May 2. Hamill, from Macon, Miss., suffered a gunshot wound during the attack. He was reunited with his wife, Kellie, at the Landstuhl Regional Medical Center in Germany Wednesday.

A firefighter with KBR said he will remain in the dangerous environment to support the overall cause — freedom.

"Without contractors, the military would have to fill positions that may be of less importance in nature, rather than being on the battlefield enhancing our military force," said Evan Bolles, a firefighter in Baghdad. "I know that by volunteering, it gives relief to our Soldiers who have been in the area for a long time."

The U.S. military has always used contractors in times of war. However, until the charred bodies of civilians hanging from a bridge in Iraq were aired on the news, most Americans didn't realize how close contractors work with Soldiers in combat zones.

"Our employees followed Soldiers into Iraq within 72 hours after they crossed the border and began providing logistical support," said Patrice Mingo, a Halliburton public affairs specialist. "They (Halliburton employees) live in the same camps that come under mortar fire, and travel in the same convoys that come under attack."

> "Without contractors, the military would have to fill positions that may be of less importance in nature, rather than being on the battle field enhancing our military force."
> Evan Bolles
> Firefighter in Baghdad

Contractors augment the military by providing non-combat services. KBR recruits for more than 100 jobs, including food service, laundry, water purification, and fuel distribution, Mingo said.

MPRI, a smaller company headquartered in Alexandria, Va., has about 500 contractors in Iraq and Afghanistan providing convoy security, instruction to ministries of defense and training to the new Iraqi army.

Even though some countries have urged their civilians to leave Iraq, and American corporations, such as General Electric have suspended operations, MPRI has not had any withdrawals, said Rick Kiernan, vice president of Strategic Communications for MPRI.

"We are prudent in our daily movement to and from our place of duty. We also have the benefit of working and living on secure compounds," said Kiernan, who is a retired Army lieutenant colonel.

Former military personnel make up the majority of MPRI's contractors overseas, performing similar duties based on their military training and expertise, Kiernan said.

Minus the uniform and an M-16, a number of KBR workers are also doing the same job they once did in the military.

What motivates citizens, who aren't enlisted in the armed forces, to leave their families behind to build a democratic nation elsewhere in the world?

"If the troops can do it, so can we," said Terry Johnston, a firefighter from La Porte, Texas. "Just because we are civilians doesn't make us any better than the military. I want to do my part as an American to help support the troops in any way possible."

Contractors working overseas can earn up to a six-figure salary, which can be an incentive for some to apply for dangerous duty.

There are three reasons people work overseas — patriotism, money, and opportunity for change, Mingo said. But once they arrive in country and begin working with Soldiers, their desire to serve becomes paramount, she added.

"What I'm doing in Iraq doesn't compare to what the Soldiers are doing for the locals," said Tyler Libby, a firefighter with KBR. "Soldiers don't have a choice but to be here. God bless them all, and I hope them a safe return home."

Unlike Soldiers, employees for KBR sign a one-year contract, Mingo said. However, if conditions change and they make the decision to leave, KBR will fly them back to their home of record.

"Our employees and subcontractors understand the danger in Iraq and — with very few exceptions — they are steadfast in their dedication to complete the job in Iraq," Mingo said. "KBR also provides ten days rest and relaxation for employees every four months."

Contractors are regulated by the Logistics Civil Augmentation Program under the Army Material Command. LOGCAP was established with the publication of Army Regulation 700-137 in December 1985.

Safety: Extends campaign Armywide

drawn from a phrase commonly used by Soldiers in combat theaters, was outlined as an aggressive, proactive plan by Brownlee and Schoomaker in an Army Safety Campaign plan publication.

The publication challenges leaders at the strategic, operational and tactical levels to target problem areas, hold leaders and Soldiers accountable and establish clear, consistent messages throughout the Army.

"We are an Army at war," Schoomaker said. "We owe it to our nation to protect every Soldier. Simply put, we can't do it without every one of you."

The safety campaign plan outlines five major objectives to guide actions within the ranks.

The objectives urged Army agencies and commands to disseminate the Army initiative information to the lowest levels, use proven safety measures, incorporate risk management into training, measure the effectiveness of the campaign and reward safety excellence.

"Now more than ever, we need the focus of every first-line leader to enforce policies, teach their Soldiers about everyday hazards and reduce risk in everyday operations," said Sergeant Major of the Army Ken Preston.

"Our Soldiers are too valuable to the Army and their families to take any chances with their safety," the plan reads. "Each life saved, each serious injury avoided and each piece of equipment undamaged may be the deciding factor in a battle in the global war on terrorism."

Under the new initiative, company commanders will be required to complete a commander's safety course prior to assumption of command and unit safety officers and NCOs will be required to complete the course within 30 days of receipt of duty assignment orders.

It urges leaders to keep safety in the face of their Soldiers and urges them to review current measures and modify them accordingly.

Here at Fort Benning, where there have already been three privately-owned vehicle fatalities this year, as compared to three for all of last year, focus on safety has been measurably sharpened.

On Kelley Hill, 3rd Brigade has implemented strong corrective training for Soldiers who are caught not wearing their seat belts.

For a first offense, the Soldier spends a day standing at an intersection with a sign that says "buckle up."

On the second offense, the Soldier's platoon sergeant and company commander have to stand with him.

Command Sgt. Maj. Mark Baker, brigade command sergeant major, said there haven't been any second offenses.

"We had some pretty bad accidents," said Baker.

"Soldiers were killed and some got very seriously injured and weren't wearing their seat belts, so the brigade commander and I implemented this policy," he said. Safety is a major priority for the unit.

Readiness is key, Baker said, and making sure the unit is prepared for its missions takes strong leadership.

"We practice safety procedures every day," Baker said.

"The policies have been in place, but it takes good leaders to enforce the regulations and standards," he said.

Baker said POV and motorcycle safety have been major concerns since the unit's redeployment last year and the subsequent proliferation of new vehicles and renewed interest in driving..

In addition to the seat belt focus, the brigade has implemented motorcycle safety courses to supplement the one required by installation regulations, Baker said.

Initiative like that is the action encouraged by the safety campaign plan.

"We are counting on every member of the Army team to do his or her part in reducing preventable accidents," it reads. "Every leader at every level is responsible for raising their units' level of safety awareness. This is a command function. Safety must be an integral part of every operation, on and off duty, tactical and administrative. The American people expect no less."

Iraq: Needs troops

Najaf, Karbala and Al Mahmudiyah.

Under the plan, the units were set to spend not more than 90 days extra in Iraq and not more than 120 days before getting home.

Now the 2nd Brigade, 10th Mountain Division from Fort Drum, N.Y., the 11th Marine Expeditionary Unit from Camp Pendleton, Calif., and the 24th MEU from Camp Lejeune, N.C., will arrive in Iraq in the June-July time frame.

"That will take us to a sustained level for now of around 135,000," said Air Force Lt. Gen. Norton Schwartz, the Joint Staff operations chief.

Before the Abizaid request, planners estimated the number of U.S. troops in Iraq was set at 115,000.

The 10th Division's brigade is going back to a combat zone after about seven months at Fort Drum.

The brigade deployed to Afghanistan and arrived home in December 2003. The Marine units will have spent a year at their home stations.

The Marine units will stick to their seven-month rotation plan, Schwartz said, and the Army unit can spend up to a year in Iraq. All this, of course, is subject to the needs of the combatant commander, he pointed out.

Schwartz also said that Rumsfeld has approved alerting more than 600 Army National Guard and Army Reserve units as part of the deployment for the Operation Iraqi Freedom 3 rotation.

These units will not deploy until later in the year.

This alert affects more than 37,000 Soldiers in combat-service and combat-service-support units.

He said the units include the gamut of specialties — among them aviation, transportation, quartermaster, signal, medical, military intelligence, military police, explosive ordnance disposal, maintenance, adjutant general, chaplain and engineer units.

The forces could be in Iraq for a year.

Plus-up: Requires Benning's mission to grow

"Our annual mission will rise from training 17,000 infantrymen a year to more than 23,000," he said. "We need to ensure all leave with the same skills and confidence to perform their infantry mission immediately upon reaching their first unit of assignment. Today's world situation demands this."

The fiscal 2005 gains increase the projected student load of 17,703 to 23,848 — a 30 percent increase, said Col. Robert Brown, director of Operations and Training.

Brown said the tasking for fiscal 2004 will cost $19.2 million. Of that, $6.6 million will pay for equipment, rounds and other training materials, while the remaining $12.6 million is already paying for modular housing for the additional troops, utilities, expanded dining facilities, additional 30th Adjutant General Reception Battalion billeting and additional civilian support.

The fiscal 2005 tasking has been tentatively priced at about $63 million.

That amount is significantly larger than what was approved to support the ITB mission in fiscal 2003, Brown said.

The money will have to come from somewhere, and funds may be diverted from officer and NCO education courses, he said.

The reallocation of OES and NCOES funds will come at a time when mission requirements are growing for the NCO Academy here, Brown said.

An NCOES backlog created by the ongoing operational tempo is already stretching the academy's resources, as well as those of Fort Benning's other source of trained instructors, the 29th Infantry Regiment.

Instructors who have been stabilized at Fort Benning for up to five years are now finally PCSing, Brown said, leaving NCOA and the 29th short on manpower and experience. Those holes aren't easily filled when it can take 30 to 90 days to train and certify an instructor, he said.

Brown said another big challenge is scraping together the equipment needed to train Soldiers to standard.

The wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have depleted the pool of M-16 A4s, optics, M-40 gas masks, NVGs and ammunition, he said, leaving basic training units and combat courses hard-pressed to get the mission accomplished.

Brown said when adding this many new students, new units are formed and personnel, like rounds, "don't exactly grow on trees," he said.

"You have to build new companies," he said. "So you have to have a company commander and a first sergeant, an administrative section, a supply section and you have to have 12 drill sergeants to a company.

"Where do they come from?" he asked. "The Reserves."

The 1st Brigade, 84th Infantry Division (Institutional Training) is composed of Reserve drill sergeants who will augment the already short-staffed, active-duty drill sergeants currently on Sand Hill. The unit arrived Sunday.

A new battalion, the 1st Battalion, 329th Infantry Regiment, has been formed to help handle the regular summer rush of basic trainees and the additional Soldiers brought on by the tasking.

The new brigade structure will add the four companies and battalion headquarters of the 1st Bn., 329th Inf. Regt., and supplement the regular five battalions with E and F companies, Brown said.

These arrangements will carry ITB through fiscal 2004, Brown said.

But to meet the fiscal 2005 goals with the resources available, those Reserve drill sergeants will have to extend for an additional year and Training and Doctrine Command will have to stand up two additional companies.

"If they inactivate those drill sergeants, (TRADOC) has to replace that capability," he said.

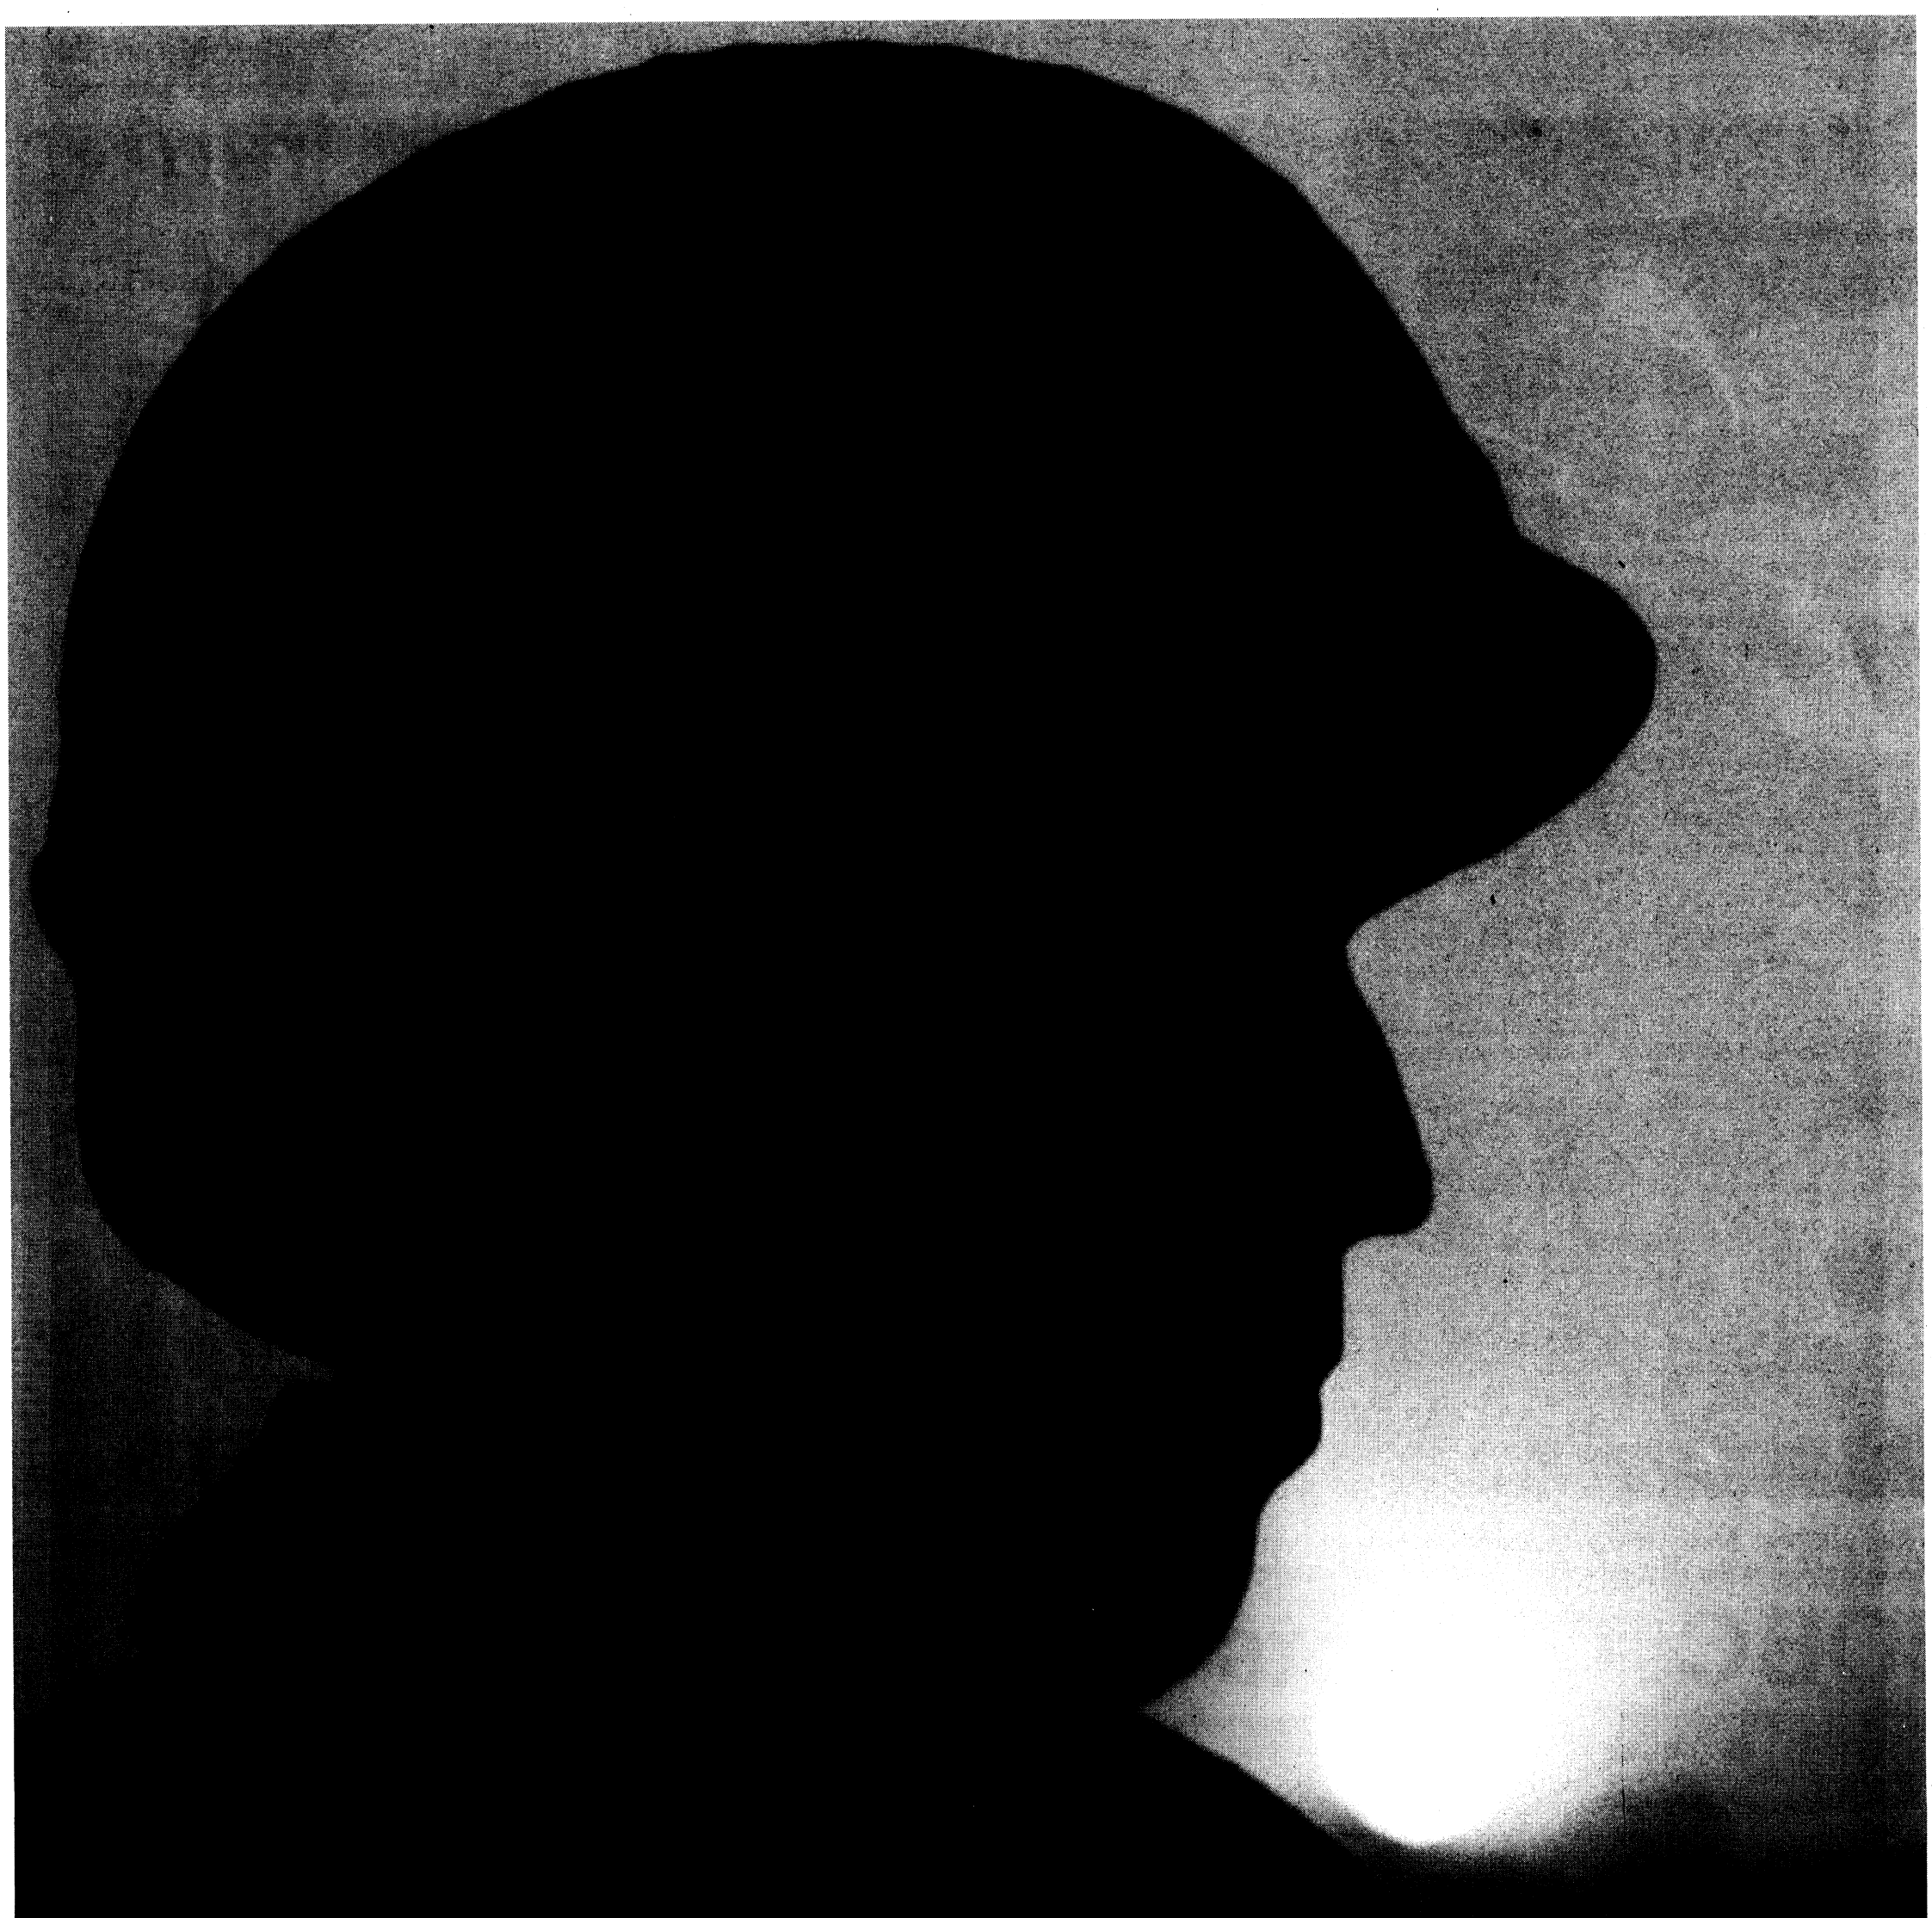
Another option would be to have the Basic Combat Training Brigade conduct one-station unit training, as well, Brown said, but that option is "not acceptable for the infantry."

Because more than 60 percent of the skills taught in Armywide basic training units are infantry skills, Fort Benning is the proponent for basic combat training. By converting BCTB to OSUT, Fort Benning would essentially be giving up its proponency, Brown said.

"This mission does present some challenges," Baldy said. "Fortunately, these challenges are mitigated by the proactive and detailed planning conducted by the ITB staff, Fort Benning and TRADOC. We will accomplish this mission to standard because the Army understands its importance and is prioritizing resources accordingly.

"The support from TRADOC, the Installation Management Agency and the Army staff remains outstanding," he said.

That resource prioritizing concept was affirmed by the TRADOC commander, Gen. Kevin Byrnes, during a visit to Fort Benning April 22.



"(Fort Benning cadre) will get what they need," Byrnes said. "Money, people — I'll divert whatever I have to."

There are even more challenges ahead for Brown, Baldy and the ITB cadre in the coming months, though.

The added work load will fall in what Brown calls "the red zone." Between May and September, there is a normal surge in the training load throughout the schoolhouses at Fort Benning; these 2,300 extra Soldiers complicate an already chaotic time, he said.

"Our resource challenges are being addressed by the installation staff, TRADOC and the Army," Baldy said. "The importance of this mission is evident in the prioritization of Armywide resources including the mobilization of seven Reserve companies and a battalion headquarters to support the mission."

But the sacrifices are necessary, Brown said. As a nation at extended war in multiple theaters, he said the number one priority is supporting those forces deployed overseas by giving them the manpower they need.

Infantry Officer Basic Course students practice staying alert and alive as they provide cover and security for their battle buddies who are clearing buildings along a street at the McKenna MOUT site Tuesday afternoon. The students are wearing protective gear to help lessen the impact of 9 mm "simmunition" rounds.

Infantry Officer Basic Course Class 03-04 conducted platoon battle drills this week at McKenna MOUT site.

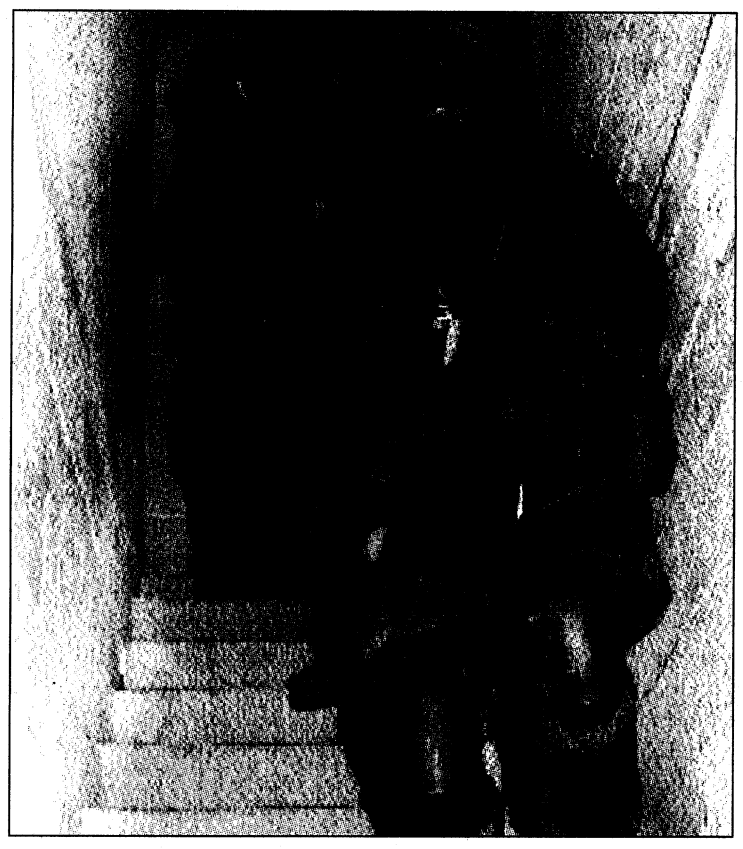
Sgt. 1st Class Vern Daley, platoon sergeant trainer for 3rd Platoon and the NCOIC of the weeklong training, said there are a few reasons why this week's training is different than most of the training IOBC has done in the past.

"This is only our third iteration using the 'simmunition'," Daley said.

Simmunition rounds have been used Armywide during the past five to six years, he said, but IOBC just recently brought the training tool on board.

Simmunition rounds are 9 mm rounds made out of colored detergent. Daley said even though the concept is the same as a standard paintball round, the effect is much more painful with the simmunition.

"When you get stung by simmunition, you know you have been hit," he said. "Pain is a great motivator to teach you what you have done right and what you have done wrong."



Daley said IOBC follows the standard operating procedures and they teach the usual infantry doctrine, but with the simunition and relatively flexible training at the MOUT site, many other important lessons are taught.

"We want to create a situation where (the students) can be flexible and adaptable," he said. "This is the best way. They are in a realistic environment facing changing scenarios with multiple strategies.

"Basically, this is probably some of the best training these guys get," he said.

Another new aspect of this cycle's MOUT training is the unique experience to work with veterans of the Iraqi Freedom operation, he said.

"We've got some guys from (C Company, 1st Battalion, 15th Infantry Regiment) out here doing some co-training," Daley said. "They are playing (opposing forces) and we are getting really good feedback from some guys who have some great experience."

A squad moves down a stairwell after clearing and securing the top floor of a building at the MOUT site.

This IOBC class also had the opportunity to train with foreign soldiers.

1st Lt. Athanasias Fourtounas, an officer in the Greek army, said training with IOBC has been a valuable experience for him.

"I have worked with Americans before, in Kosovo, and now I have seen training here," Fourtounas said. "It's good. It meets high standards.

"It is so good to have the allies training together," he said. "They get to see how I work, and I get to see how they work. We exchange tactics and techniques, go to a common school and get common training. The Greek Army goes everywhere the Americans do, so why not train with them?"

Fourtounas said he will return to Greece after the class graduates in two weeks and work as part of the security force for the 2004 Summer Olympics in Athens.

He said the MOUT training he has conducted with IOBC will come in handy, because it was so realistic and mirrored the architecture commonly found throughout Europe, the Mediterranean and the Middle East.

IOBC student 2nd Lt. Charles Simmons also said the MOUT training was useful.

"It gives us the basics," he said. "Most of us are going to go into combat in Iraq. When we go, we will be in an urban environment just like this. This is probably the most important training we can do."

2nd Lt. Vlaine Sellman, also an IOBC student, said the training was crucial for most of the students.

"It's dealing with an urban environment, so it's really important," he said. "I wish we had more time out of four and a half months; we only get three days."

Daley said the class will wrap up their last training session before graduation with a culmination event next week that will include a 16-mile road march followed by tactical training.

Soldiers duke it out with pugil sticks

Training boosts Soldier confidence

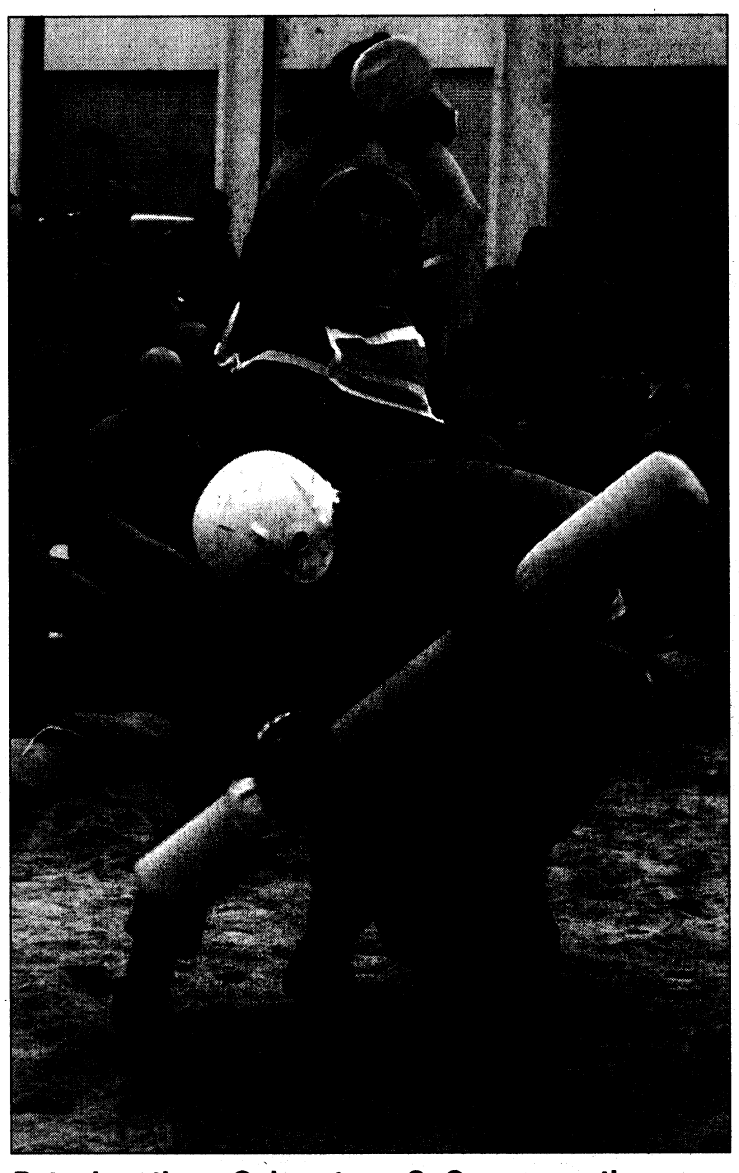
Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

Hand-to-hand combat isn't taken lightly in the Army.

With the increasing frequency of face-to-face fighting with insurgents in Iraq and Afghanistan, Soldiers in 1st Battalion, 29th Infantry Regiment, are preparing themselves with pugil stick bouts, another form of hand-to-hand combat.

"Pugil stick bouts help give the Soldiers confidence," said 1st Sgt. Jeffrey Cutty, B Company, 1st Bn., 29th Inf. Regt. "If they can go into a bout while training and be confident in their abilities, then if they're faced with that situation later on down the road when they're deployed, they should have no problem."

Although these Soldiers won't deploy with the 29th, a non-deployable unit, many of them will PCS to units that do deploy.



"We have the chance to develop these Soldiers' mental toughness," said Command Sgt. Maj. Michael George, battalion command sergeant major. "When they do deploy with a unit, we know they'll have the confidence to kill the enemy."

George held a pugil competition between the battalion's four companies at Collins Training Area April 30.

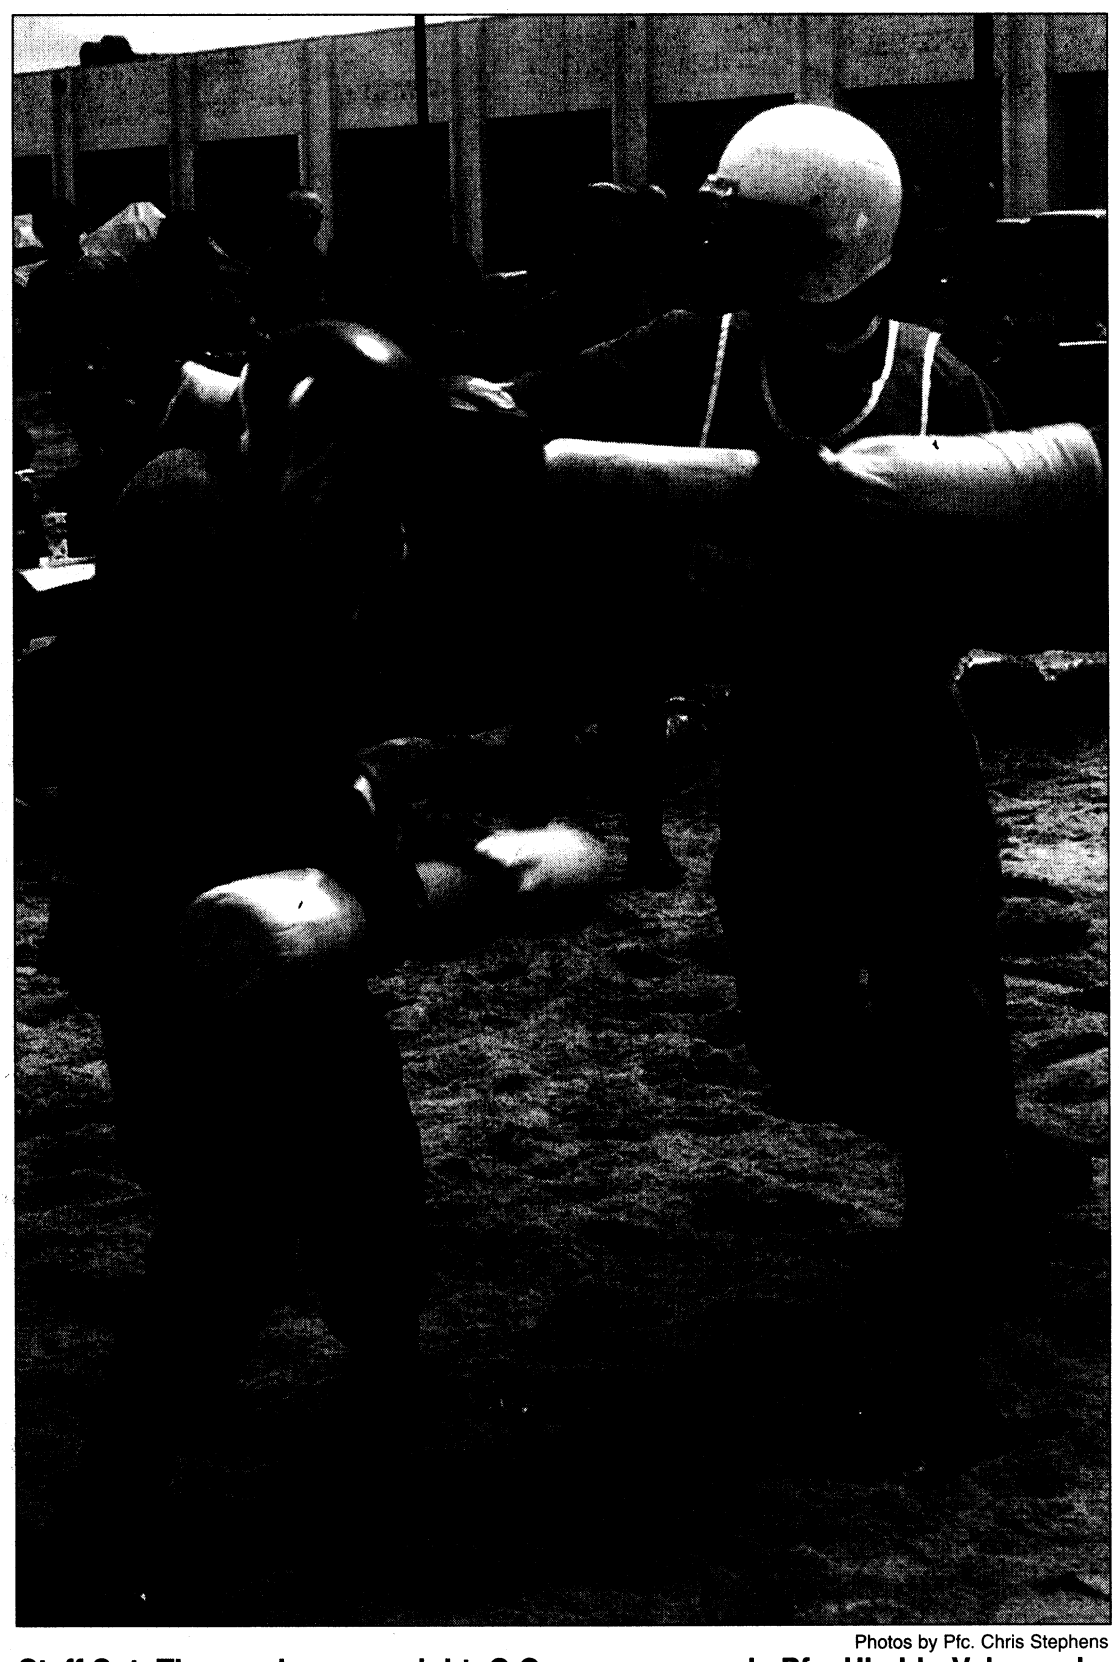
"Many of these Soldiers say their unit is the best — well, this is their chance to prove it," he said. "We want to see who has that warrior spirit."

Each of the companies selected 10 combatants to fight in two-minute bouts.

"This is what we wanted," said Spc. Kurtis Smith, A Company. "We had to prove we are the best company and I think we did that."

Pvt. Jonathan Oxley, top, C Company, throws a vicious hit on Pfc. Jeremy Lederhaus, B Company.

As the bouts progressed, the intensity grew, and the smallest mistakes proved costly.



"The hardest things were keeping your balance and having enough energy for the whole fight," said Spc. Jason Roark, Headquarters and Headquarters Company. "You didn't want to make the first mistake, because if you did, then it would be a long two minutes."

The fact that each Soldier had to compete three times added another degree of difficulty.

"It's tough, because in one bout, the guy you're fighting fights in a different style than the guy you fought before," Roark said. "It's something you have to adjust to or you're going to be on the wrong end of some very vicious hits."

The Soldiers agreed the pugil stick bouts were a great way to boost their morale.

"Most of the time, our mission prevents us from doing fun events like this," Smith said. "It's a great way to build camaraderie and to have fun with everyone outside of the motor pool."

Staff Sgt. Thomas Lemons, right, C Company, pounds Pfc. Ubaldo Valenzuela, B Company, during their bout Friday at the Collins Training Area.

At the end of the day, when C Company was declared the winner, all the competitors congratulated each other on hard-fought matches.

"That's what it's all about," George said.

"If we can challenge them competitively and bring them closer together as a unit, then I feel that our training was successful."

MPs' training stresses ethics, values

Jim Garamone
American Forces Press Service

WASHINGTON — American military police receive training in the ethical treatment of prisoners, detainees and refugees, officials at the Military Police School at Fort Leonard Wood, Mo., said.

While all service members receive training on the Geneva Conventions and the rules of war, these aspects are particularly stressed in training military police, officials said. MP officers are confounded that some MPs allegedly abused and degraded detainees at the Abu Ghraib prison outside Baghdad.

To a person, they express shock and revulsion at the acts. Six soldiers have been charged with abuse, and six more received letters of reprimand. The Army has conducted five investigations, and some continue.

MP officials said that from the beginning, new Soldiers — enlisted and officer — receive a strong ethical base. Instructors at the school stress the Army's core values: service, respect, loyalty, integrity, honor, duty and courage.

"Nowhere in there do you see anything that would allow MPs to abuse prisoners," said an MP officer.

Gen. George W. Casey, Army vice chief of staff, said the Army is a value-based organization, and photos of alleged prisoner abuse that have been broadcast and published recently do not reflect the service's values.

"What you see in those pictures is not indicative of our training or our values," he said following a meeting with the Senate Armed Services Committee. "It is a complete breakdown in discipline."

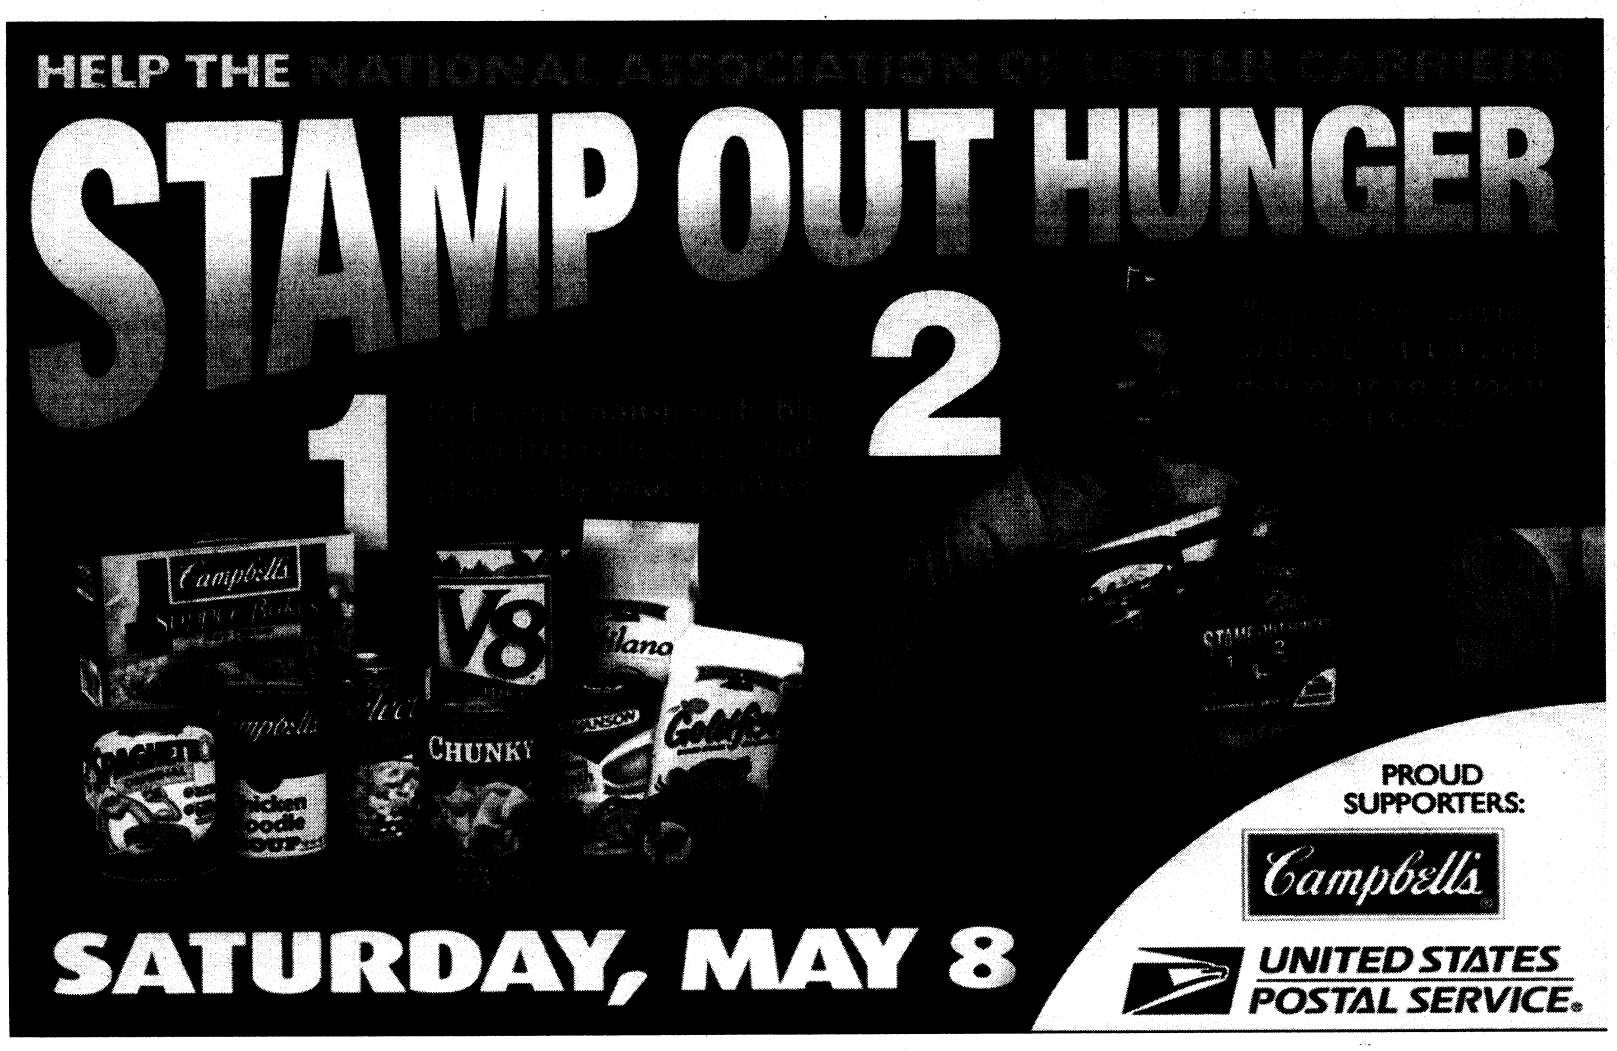
Casey said the Army will continue investigations and will punish those found guilty under the Uniform Code of Military Justice.

Military police are responsible for the safety and security of detainees and those around them, officials said, and they're trained to follow specific protocols. MPs speed detainees to places of safety once captured, they question and classify detainees, and they then place them in the appropriate holding areas, officials said. They restrain when appropriate and necessary, officials added, and they treat detainees according to the Geneva Conventions and in accordance with the rules of war.

Military police do not conduct interrogations, nor do they "soften up" detainees for military intelligence personnel, officials said. In the Army, the basic combat support MP has a military occupational specialty designation of 31 Bravo. Corrections specialists have 31 Charlie and criminal investigation specialists are classified 31 Delta. All receive instruction in ethical handling of enemy prisoners of war, detainees and refugees, officials said.

Availability of the Final Environmental Impact Statement for the Digital Multi-Purpose Range Complex at Fort Benning, GA

AGENCY: Department of the Army, DOD.



ACTION: Notice of availability.

SUMMARY: The Digital Multi-Purpose Range Complex (DMPRC) would provide gunnery training facilities for the Bradley Fighting Vehicle (BFV) and the Abrams M1A1 Tank System (Tank), providing the capability for both active and reserve components to train to required standards under realistic conditions. Fort Benning proposes to construct, operate, and maintain a DMPRC. The DMPRC would provide a state-of-the-art range facility to meet the Army's training needs for soldiers to conduct gunnery courses in a realistic training environment by expanding the Installation's training capacity. The current ranges on Fort Benning do not meet modern gunnery standards and are inadequate to support full gunnery training and qualifications, requiring training to modified standards. The project would include construction of the firing and target area, installation of fiber optics, construction of support facilities, upgrading and construction of associated roadways, installation of utilities to support the site, construction of a helipad, construction of other related equipment and facilities, and operation and maintenance of the DMPRC.

DATES: To be considered in preparation for the Record of Decision (ROD), comments must be received not later than 7 June 2004.

ADDRESSES: Please direct written comments or requests for copies of the Final Environmental Impact Statement (FEIS) to Mr. Richard McDowell, Public Affairs Officer, U.S. Army Infantry Center, ATTN: ATZB-PO, Fort Benning, GA, 31905-5122 or email to mcdowellr@benning.army.mil. Post theater group to take stage

California Suite to 'keep audience laughing'

Spc. Eliamar Castanon
Bayonet staff

Benning's Backstage is at it again, this time with Neil Simon's classic comedy California Suite.

The four-scene production follows the lives of four groups of people who occupy Suite 203 in a California hotel.

It will keep the audience laughing from beginning to end, said Peggy Cornwell, play director, producer and actress.

"It's the best theater show in town," Cornwell said.

The play features a well-rounded cast of professional, amateur and first-time actors, including Soldiers, military spouses and retirees, Cornwell said.

"It's a wonderfully talented cast," Cornwell said. "They come to rehearsal prepared — it's a director's dream."

The first scene, Visitor from New York, introduces divorced couple Hanah (Gettys Nelson) and Billy (Sgt. Bobby Hollingsworth.) Their 17-year-old daughter runs away from Hanah and goes to stay with her father in California. Hanah follows her daughter to California and meets with Billy to fight to get her child back. Will Hanah get her daughter?

In scene two, Visitor from Philadelphia, Marvin (Eugene Dixon) is in California for his nephew's bar mitzvah. His brother surprises him with a prostitute, Bunny (Latanya Wiggins) in his hotel room. His wife, Millie (Sgt. Kizzy Armstrong) surprises him the following morning. Will Millie stay with Marvin?

In scene three, Visitors from London, Diana (Cornwell) is an actress visiting California as a nominee for an Oscar. She brings along her husband, Sidney (John Lee) for the ride. Diana is very nervous, as this is her first Oscar nomination, gets drunk, throws up and makes a fool of herself in front of everybody. Not only does she lose the the Oscar, but she also finds out her Quick — look at your watch. If it's after 9 a.m. but before 1 p.m. (Friday), put down your paper and go — run — to Kinnett Stadium. You are quite possibly missing one of the best experiences I've discovered in Columbus, the Special Olympics.

If it's too late now, you may as well stick around and find out what the heck I'm talking about.

Now, before you wrinkle your nose at the thought of volunteering in your free time, think about it. When's the last time you did something special for someone? Something that really helped them out in some way and gave you that feeling that only a good deed can give.

Now think about all the people in your life who have done something like that for you. Something as small as taking the time out to come support you in something you love.

Maybe you can't repay everyone who's ever helped you out, but I'm a big believer in "paying it forward." One of the greatest things you can do in life is pass on the kindness you've been shown to someone else who needs it.

And the Special Olympics is one of the greatest ways you can do that.

There was a time I would've been hard to sell on the idea — it's depressing, right? All these people who suffer from mental retardation and other physical challenges?

Think again. The first time I went out to an S.O. event was exactly one year ago, and I couldn't have been more wrong (OK, ignorant) if I'd tried.

ITB troops clean up McGraw Manor

Pfc. Chris Stephens
Bayonet staff

Weekend mornings in McGraw Manor are usually quiet.

But Saturday was a different story. The Infantry Training Brigade sponsored a cleanup in the housing area, putting Soldiers from its battalions to work to beautify the neighborhood.

"We want these Soldiers to understand the importance of giving back to the community," said 1st Lt. Moises Ortiz, brigade assistant supply officer. "They are all new to the Army, and they need to understand about taking care of the Army family.

"Many of these Soldiers will be deploying to the Middle East when they finish training, and they need to know that the Army and its Soldiers will take care of their families while they are gone."

As part of the clean-up, families picked out flowers and pinestraw, provided by Shaw Infrastructure to help beautify their yards.

The families also used the opportunity to edge their walkways and clean up inside the house.

"It's nice that all of this stuff is being provided for us free of charge," said Spc. Shannon Paulson, Headquarters and Headquarters Company, U.S. Army Infantry Center. "It really makes us want to help with keeping the area clean."

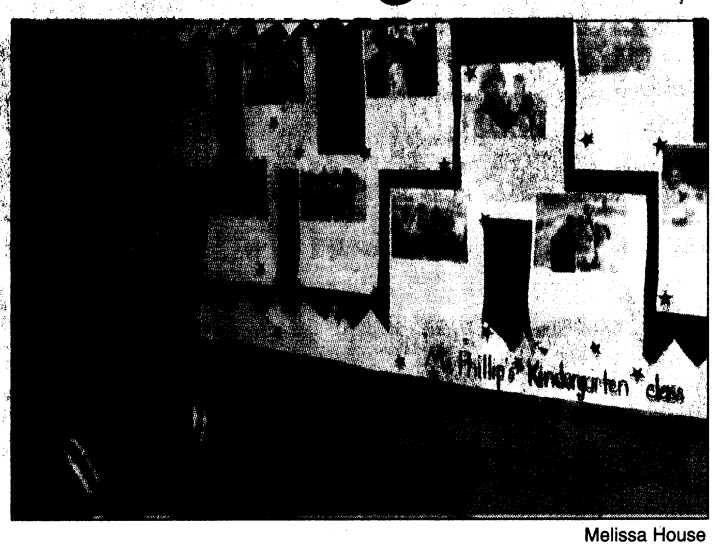
Meanwhile, each battalion was given a specific area of McGraw Manor and was in charge of edging, cutting grass, picking up trash, tree-trimming and cleaning up the playground area.

The main objective for the Soldiers working in the playground area was to fill in sand around the equipment.

Some of the Soldiers considered it an honor to be helping post families.

"I think it's a great thing to help families on post," said Pvt. Sean Ellefsen, B Company, 1st Battalion, 19th Infantry Regiment. "Some of their Soldiers are deployed, and they can't do a lot of the things that we can. It feels good knowing you did some good in the community."

ITB sponsors two clean-ups each year for Fort Benning, one in the spring and one in the fall.



"It's all about taking care of the Army family," Ortiz said. "Anything we can do to help, we are more than happy to do it."

Joel Turner looks at the wall of letters Soldiers from the 1st Infantry Division have sent back to his class.

Melissa House
Bayonet staff

Dear May,

Thank you for all your support and the support of your family and friends. It's always nice to get letters from you guys. It puts a smile on our faces.

Spc. Steven Bennett

It's the kind of letter that brings tears to your eyes. It's the heartfelt thanks of a Soldier overseas to his pen pals in Carolyn Phillips' kindergarten class at White Elementary School.

Although many relationships may fizzle over time, Phillips' students are dedicated to keeping in touch with their pen pals from 1st Battalion, 16th Infantry Regiment, in the 1st Inf. Division normally stationed at Fort Riley, Kan. The Soldiers now live and work right outside of Fallujah, one of the Iraqi cities frequently in the news.

Kindergartner Joel Turner has a special relationship with Command Sgt. Maj. Joe Leggette, and that's what started the whole project. Less than a year ago, Joel's dad, Lt. Col. Tony Turner, commanded the "Iron Rangers."

"They're called the Iron Rangers because they carry lots of equipment and have big, heavy tanks," Joel said. He likes writing to them because, "they are protecting us over there and it's where we don't want to be."

Phillips said the Soldiers kept writing and asked the children to keep writing because it made them feel good.

She's incorporated the letter-writing in their classroom routine, usually during their writing lessons. The

Unit hosts Spring Fling, boosts morale

Maj. Curtis Crum, 2nd Battalion, 29th Infantry Regiment, executive officer, goes down in the dunk booth. Crum was just one of many of the battalion leadership to get dunked by children of battalion Soldiers.

Pfc. Chris Stephens

The 2nd Battalion, 29th Infantry Regiment's schedule doesn't leave a lot of breathing room, but that didn't stop the unit from organizing a "fun day" for its Soldiers.

The battalion held a Spring Fling Saturday to help bring the unit closer together.

"This battalion works Monday through Saturday, 50 weeks a year," said Lt. Col. Gregory Kane, battalion commander. "Even with this day going on, some Soldiers had to fulfill their mission requirements supporting the Basic Combat Training Brigade and the Infantry Training Brigade."

But those Soldiers were still able to participate in some of the day's activities.

"We put some of those Soldiers on a rotation with others so they could come out here and enjoy themselves at least some of the time," Kane said. "It's great to see all of these Soldiers step up and take their place so they could come have some fun."

As part of their Spring Fling, the companies competed against each other in tug-of-war, volleyball and horseshoes.

"The competitions are great," said Sgt. Sterlin Richardson, Flight Company. "The games get really competitive, and it gives you the opportunity to see how you stack up against everyone else in the battalion."

Richardson, along with other Soldiers in his company, are new to the battalion and said the Spring Fling was a great opportunity for them to meet the other Soldiers in the battalion.

"As the brand new company here, we don't know many people in the battalion," Richardson said. "This is a great way for us to introduce ourselves to everyone else and make some friends within the battalion."

There was also a moon walk and a dunking booth for children to enjoy.

"I like the dunking booth," said Jacob Prather, 6. "I like to get people wet who are up there."

Although the games and competitions were fun for everyone, the main focus of the event was for the Soldiers to spend time with their families.

"Families are important," Richardson said. "A married Soldier isn't complete without his family, and I think it's great that the command team decided to include them in on this day."

For some Soldiers, family time is rare because of the battalion's mission, which is to support ITB and BCTB Soldiers in training.

"It's very hard to get quality time with your family," said Spc. John Marion, Headquarters and Headquarters Company. "This event shows how much our leadership cares about the Soldiers."

Overall, the day was considered a success.

"Where else can you go and have this much fun," Marion said. "This is a great team building thing and our unit will be much stronger because of it."

Theater: Brings excitement

husband is gay. What will Diana do?

The final scene, Visitors from New York, introduces two couples who vacation together in California. Mort and Beth (Spc. James Lee and Ashley Diedrich) and Stue and Gert (Clay Cranford and Jennifer Trippe) have been friends for a long time, but after vacationing in California for three weeks, things go sour.

"This scene is pure physical comedy," Cornwell said. "It's the shortest scene in the play, but it's the most slapstick."

Cornwell recommends the play for adults and teenagers.

The doors open at 6:30 p.m. May 21, 22, 28 and 29 at the Kelley Hill Recreation Center. Dinner will be presented by the Officers' Club and includes a salad, an entree, dessert, coffee or tea and a glass of wine, Cornwell said.

Not only will there be dinner and a show, but Benning Backstage will also offer pre-show entertainment:

• May 21 — Chaplain (Maj.) Jimmy Ward, 1st Battalion, 29th Infantry Regiment, will perform as an Elvis impersonator.

• May 22 — Spc. Mike Stoner, of the Infantry Band, will play the piano.

• May 28 — Sgt. Joseph Nagele, of the Infantry Band, will play the guitar.

• May 29 — Reneé Doyle will sing while Bill Putman accompanies her on the piano.

Tickets are on sale now and can be purchased through Omega World Travel or at the Fort Benning Officers' Club.

Prices are $19 for adults and $12 for children 12 and younger.

Groups may reserve tables for eight by calling 682-1120.

GOH: Pay it forward to someone else, volunteer

S.O. events are all about giving these athletes a place to compete in sports they love and have a great time.

I thought I would feel badly for them, having a fully able body and mind, but I was the one at a disadvantage. The athletes are having a ball doing what they love with the support of their families, friends and strangers from the community who come just to make sure they have a good time.

Now that's special. And I loved every minute of it, cheering for them while they sprinted to the finish, talking with them after they finished their events, the hugs and laughs and smiles.

It's cliché and cheesy, I know, but even the biggest tough guy would be touched. So today's your chance. The Special Olympics Summer Games are going on from 9:30 a.m. to 1 p.m. at Kinnett Stadium by Shaw High School.

The volunteer staff is pretty much set, but you never know when another volunteer will come in handy. And there is always room for more people to cheer the athletes on at one of the few sporting events they can compete in all year.

Be the one on the sidelines showing your support for some of the kindest, most wonderful people out there. Be the one to pay it forward to people who probably deserve it more than anyone else, because I would bet every dollar I have that they would be there for you.

If you missed it today, call up the S.O. office at 653-6050 and talk to Bill Pilcher. He'll fill you in on upcoming events.

And don't abandon that sudden inspiration just yet. There are dozens of places in Columbus and Phenix City and even here on post that could use a little help. Crack open the phone book, look up social services organizations in the Yellow Pages and see where you're needed.

students write and draw pictures — very patriotic ones. A bundle of letters waiting to be sent featured a lot of red, white and blue.

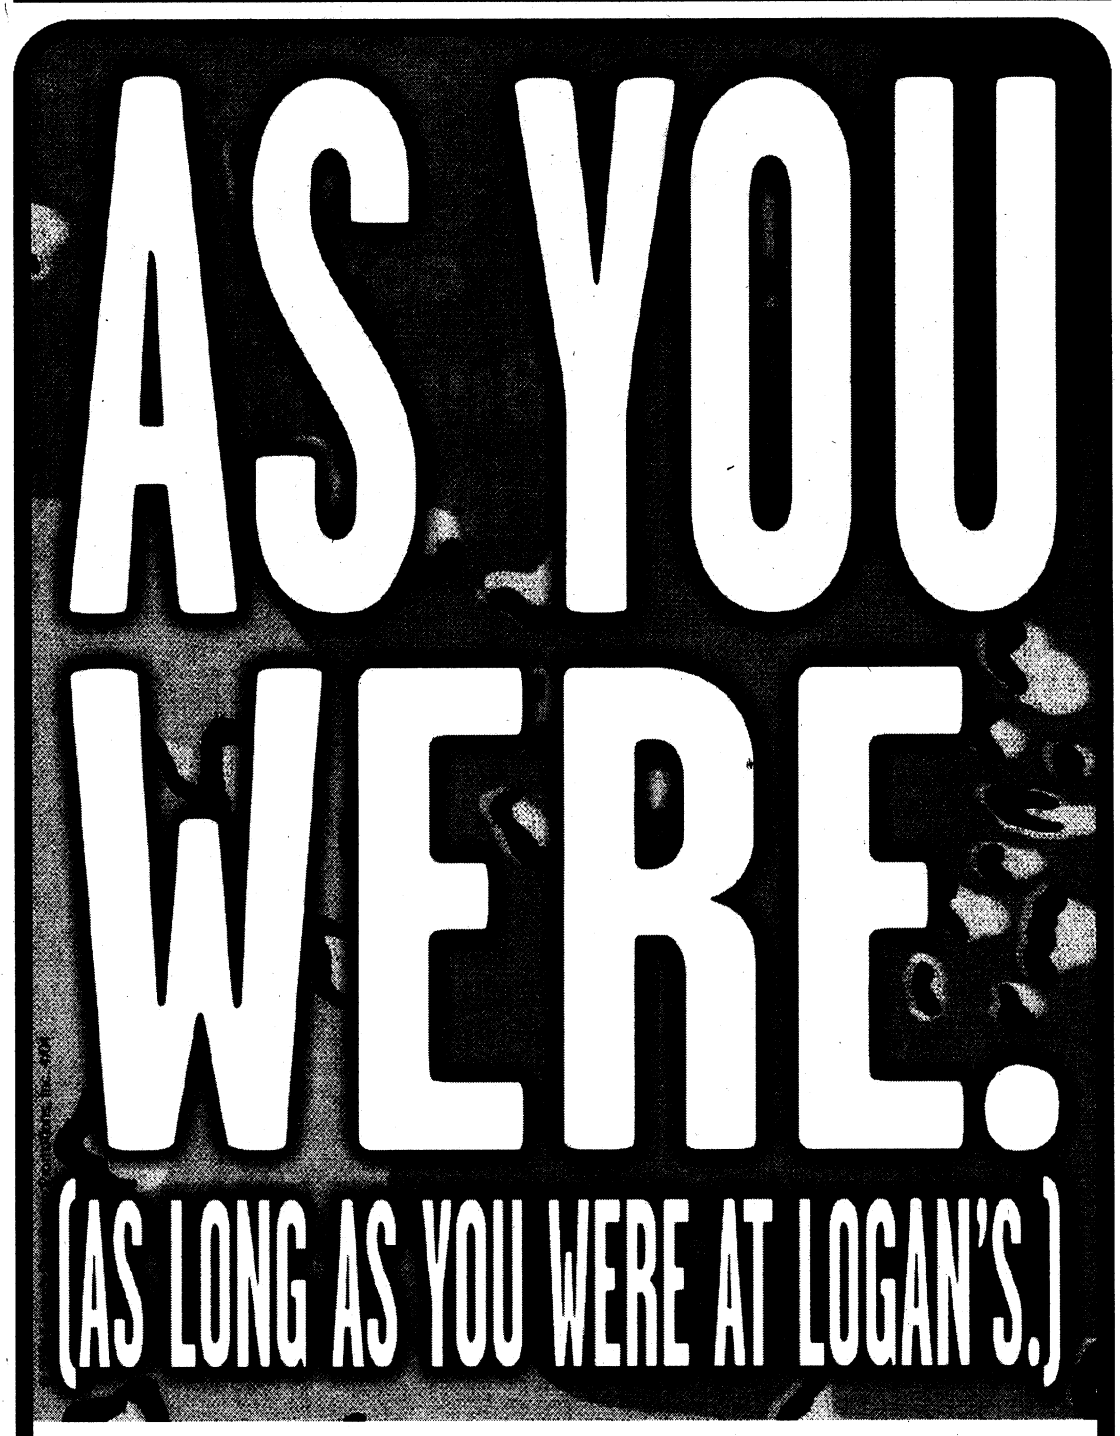
Sara Bailes said she writes to help the Soldiers.

"When they get these letters, they'll be happy," she said. "And they're helping kids in Iraqi schools."

The Iron Rangers are in the schools and among the Iraqi children every day. With the letters they write the students, they include pictures of boys and girls just like them, eating lollipops and playing soccer.

Chloe Hoffman said the Soldiers are putting their art on the walls of the Iraqi school and on the doors of their offices. And when Takoda Parker thinks about what she can send to the Iron Rangers, she "just thinks and thinks" until she gets it right.

The care package they're working on will have gum from Jonah Hansen, Skittles from Christian Bower and, as Dante Lawson said, "candy because they write back to us and give us certificates."



Phillips said the writing project has been beneficial for her students.

"It's been good for their handwriting," she said, "and they get so into what they want to say and forget they're working."

But for Hannah Ivester, it's not about school at all.

"I like to write because I think they're in Iraq doing important stuff."

The 197th Ranger Training Battalion will be conducting an open house and training demonstration Saturday at Camp Frank D. Merrill in Dahlonega, Ga.

More than 650 students and teachers from Stowers Elementary School joined children around the world in Project ACES — All Children Exercising Simultaneously — Wednesday. The group sang songs and cadences as they walked several loops around the school. Becky Archilla, a Stowers PE teacher, took the lead in organizing Wednesday's annual event, which is designed to prompt children to exercise.

Stowers kids get active

Event designed to encourage active lifestyle

Chamblee Johnson gets plenty of exercise on her backyard trampoline, shadow-boxing with pillows and chasing her three younger brothers out of her bedroom.

Maybe that's why the 8-year-old second-grader didn't break a sweat Wednesday during Stowers Elementary School's participation in the world's largest exercise class, an international event sponsored by the Youth Fitness Coalition.

Stowers' entire student body, more than 650 students and their teachers, joined students around the world in Project ACES — All Children Exercising Simultaneously. The students walked around the school for 20 minutes.

The activity made Johnson think "mostly all the little kids in the world probably get enough exercise."

Not so, according to the Youth Fitness Coalition. Lack of exercise contributes greatly to heart disease, and heart disease is a leading cause of death for children in America.

That's why Len Saunders, a physical education teacher from New Jersey, started Project ACES in 1989 — to increase awareness about the health benefits of exercising early in life.

In 1989, 240,000 children participated in the class. Last year, more than 400,000 participated in Michigan alone.

The event, which is always scheduled in May, National Health and Fitness Month, gives PE teachers the freedom to choose an activity that suits the local climate.

Becky Archilla, Stowers PE teacher, chose to lead her students on a long walk. They circled the school several times marching and singing cadence.

"I simply wanted to get them all up and moving," Archilla said. "The whole idea was to promote youth fitness, and hopefully they'll take that home with them and encourage their families to get outside and walk or do something active together."

Magic exists in every mother and grandmother

Chaplain (Maj.) George G. Gonzalez
Infantry Training Brigade

REFLECTIONS

I've never met a mother who didn't have a certain mystical power. All children know about it. Even some fathers know the secret, for I've often heard them exclaim in utter frustration, "Go see your mom."

Yes, it's true and it cannot be denied. "Mothermagic" exists.

I guess we first encounter it when we are still tiny tots. No one has to tell us that those unreasonable fears about what is lurking under the bed or waiting to lunge from darkened closets can be banished with just a look from mother.

Somehow her presence causes all evil forces to flee. Only benevolent mysteries surround mother — like the Sandman and the Tooth Fairy and Santa's helpers.

There is no doubt about it; Mothermagic is mighty strong stuff when it comes to banishing the powers of the dark.

And then there are its healing properties. Everyone knows how a mother's kiss can heal the worst bump on the head or bang on the knee.

Or how only mother can apply the antiseptic and bandage so it won't hurt when you pull it off. And is there any cooler hand than mother's when she strokes a fevered brow? It's Mothermagic, pure and simple.

Somehow mothers always know what's going on too. Ever notice how a mother can tell not only who stole the cookies, but exactly how many the culprit took?

Or how mothers always seem to have eyes in the back of their heads and are able to detect the least disobedience without even looking? And the way a mother can look into your eyes and see right through to your brain, detecting the smallest lie or even a mere exaggeration!

There is no other way to explain it. It must be Mothermagic.

When I was small, I didn't really understand Mothermagic. It was sort of there, like the sun and the stars and clean sheets every week. But then when I was about 10, I began to consider this strange phenomenon. How was it that my mother could make a costume for the class play or Halloween, even when I forgot to tell her I needed it until that very morning before school?

How was it she always knew what made me sad or happy, where my lost socks were, and answers to my questions like why does it rain?

When I left home to go to the seminary, I found I didn't need Mothermagic much more.

I was really pretty smart myself, due to her "magic." Besides, it was always available if I got into any really big trouble. That's the great thing about Mothermagic — it's there whether you need it or not.

When I grew up and was still curious about this magic stuff, I found out that my mom inherited it from my grandma. My grandma inherited it from God. God so loved the mothers and grandmothers that he blessed them all with that magic touch that makes all us children of God.

Happy Mother's Day.

Handle time pressures with ease

Chaplain (Maj.) Jeffrey Hawkins
Chaplain Family Life Center

Hey, if you haven't heard, we're having a blast with young Soldiers and young families over at CrossRoads Contemporary Chapel. It's on Kelley Hill, but it's for anybody and everybody ... and it's definitely not your ordinary chapel. To prove it, we've got nine awesome, straight-out-of-the-crate, gorgeous motorcycles that will be props all month during our series, "For The Ride Of Your Life." In fact, we hope to give one of those mean machines away May 23. You can register for it each Sunday you're at chapel.

This past week, Chaplain Murray did a great job talking about something that seems to pop up in the military quite a bit: "How do you handle having more to do than time to do it?" Whether it's getting ready for deployment, coming back from deployment or dealing with either end of being on deployment, there never seems to be enough time to handle the tasks, does there?

Hawkins

It never ceases to amaze me just how practical the Bible is. Did you realize Jesus had to deal with the same feelings of having more to do than time to do it? In fact, there's a scene from a particular day when he'd almost been mobbed and thrown over a cliff in his hometown, then hustled away to heal a girl whom others had left for dead, then was up for an all-nighter with a steady stream of people who needed answers to their problems. By sunup he was shot and at the end up his rope.

What did he do? The same thing you and I need to do when we're maxed out:

• He prayed. When things got tough in Jesus' life, he realized "he was too busy not to pray."

• He prioritized. In prayer, Jesus could get clear on his values — and so can we! It's our values that really drive our priorities. What are the top five values in your life? How will that impact your priorities this week?

• He passed. What I mean by this is that sometimes we have to let go of good things to enjoy the best things. You can't win at everything, so decide what it is you're really playing for and understand what you're going to take a "pass" on.

Interested in "How To Keep Things Together When Everything Is Falling Apart?" That's this week's topic at the casual and creative CrossRoads Contemporary Service at Kelley Hill Chapel.

It's open to everyone, just like The Chaplain Family Life Center, located in Building 2606 in Soldiers' Plaza. For more information on CFLC, call 545-1760.

The Columbus/Fort Benning Rugby Football Club, better known as the Cruise-a-Matics, in the black jerseys, scrum down with the D.C.-area Karma's pack during the team's third game of the USA Rugby Military Club Championships Saturday. The Cruisers came in second to Karma in the championship game Sunday.

Cruisers take second in tourney

Resting in the shade, waiting for their next game, one thing was clear — these ruggers didn't come to taste defeat.

Nursing concussions, swollen knees and ankles, black eyes, stitched foreheads, crushed ribs, strained muscles and sore bodies, the Columbus/Fort Benning Cruise-a-Matics were ready to fight for the championship game of the USA Rugby Military Club Championships.

Their challenger? Karma, a combined services team from the Washington, D.C., area. Drawing from a pool of the military's most skilled ruggers, Karma remained undefeated during the two-day tournament, and you could count on one hand how many times the team was scored against.

Meanwhile, the Cruisers, a mix of civilian and military, young and old, inexperienced and veteran players, were one of the underdogs in the tournament, which pitted six military-affiliated rugby clubs against each other.

Last year, the Cruisers entered the tournament with enough players to man the field — many of them inexperienced — and less than a handful of subs, vital in a game where injuries are frequent. They left the tournament two for two.

This year, the team showed up with 25 players suited up and ready to go — players who have practiced and competed together leading up to the tournament, said Roy Krueger, the team's captain.

"We had a month before the tournament to practice and get some games in together," he said. "So we did much better than last year. We were more organized, more rehearsed, and we had our heads in the game."

Saturday, the team beat out a combined services team from Europe and the team from Fort Stewart, Ga., then suffered a disappointing loss to Karma.

Sunday morning, the team triumphed again in a game against Fort Campbell, Ky., and found themselves in the finals for the first time in 10 years.

The Cruisers' ranks were significantly thinned out Sunday morning, and even more so after their game against Campbell, during which they lost two players to concussions and another to a rib injury.

Stepping on to the field for the championship game, the team had only two subs and one last-resort, emergency player. During the game, they lost two more players, including Tarrol "Petie" Peterson, who tore his achilles tendon.

From the opening kickoff, Karma dominated the field, racing out to a 40-0 halftime lead. The Cruisers broke through early in the second half, scoring a try and a conversion to put seven points on the board. Despite their best efforts, Karma walked away with the win, 54-7.

Although Karma left the field with the title, the Cruisers left knowing they had played their best.

"We may not have won, but we played a game we could be proud of against a tough team," said Cruisers back Rob Snow. "We did well."

"It was a clear win on Karma's part," Krueger said. "But I'm very pleased with how the team held up.

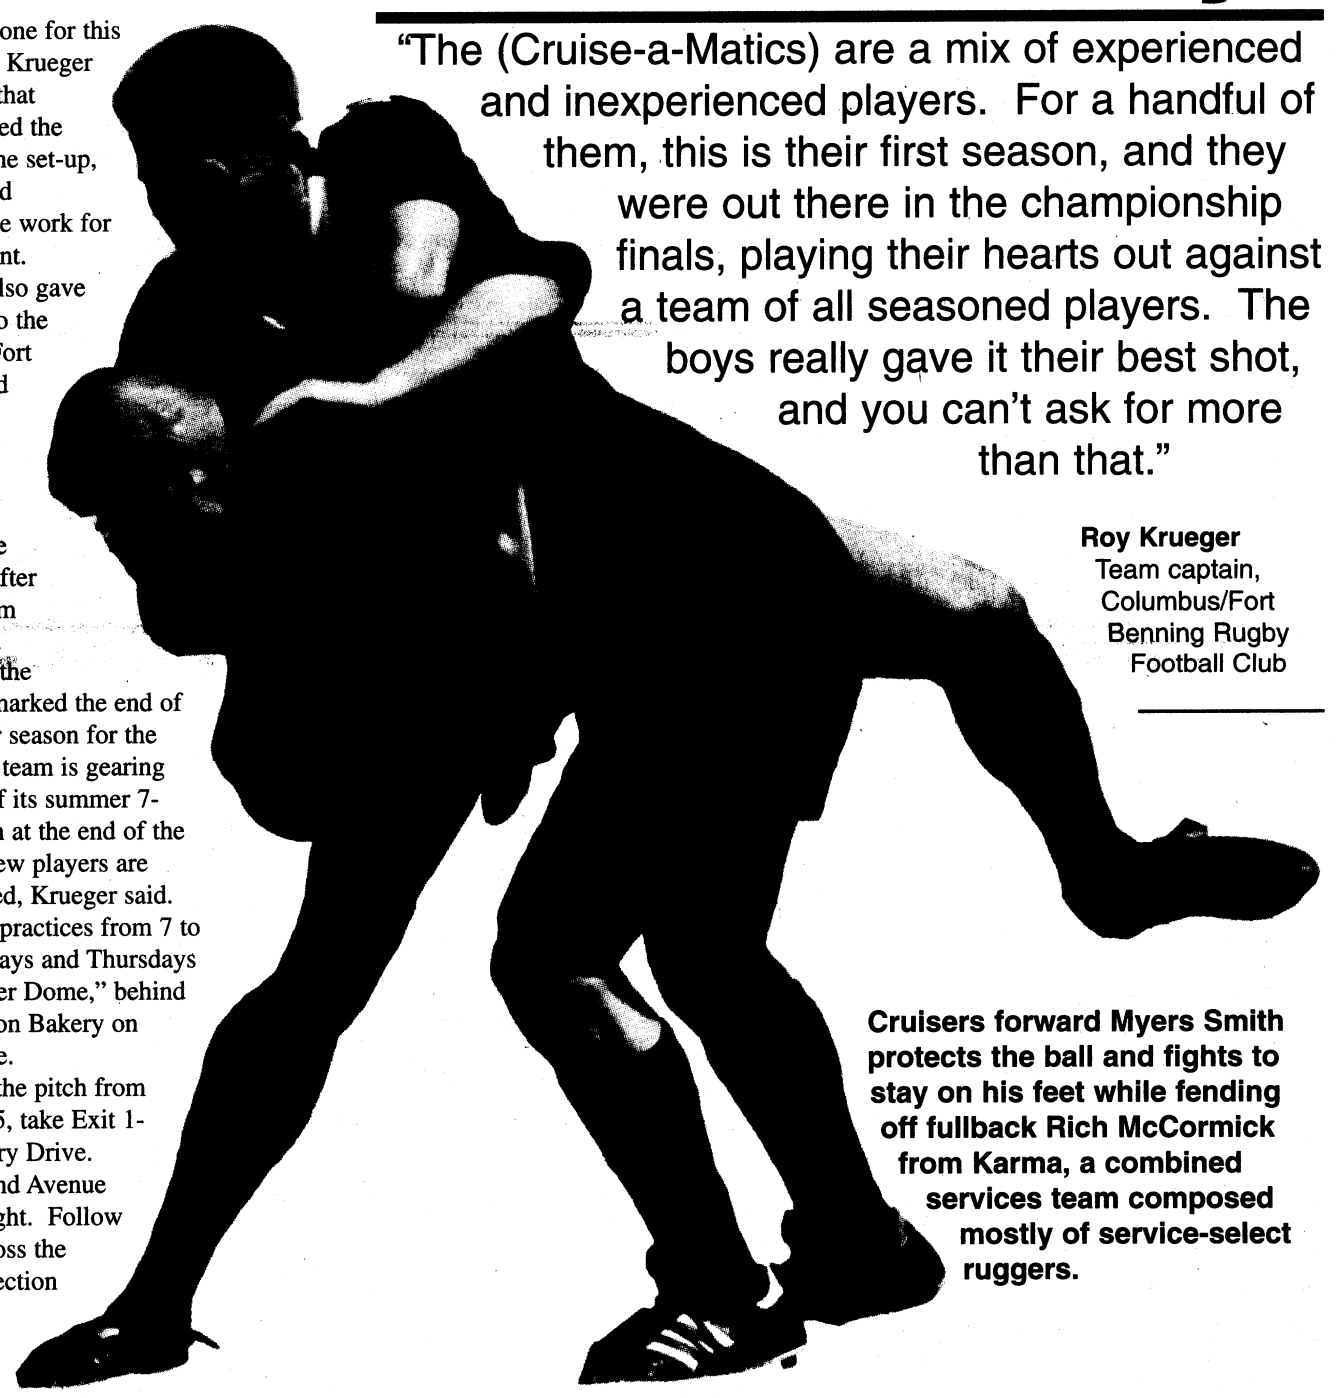
"The (Cruise-a-Matics) are a mix of experienced and inexperienced players. For a handful of them, this is their first season, and they were out there in the championship finals, playing their hearts out against a team of all seasoned players," he said. "The boys really gave it their best shot, and you can't ask for more than that."

Besides, Krueger added, the tournament wasn't about winning.

"We were there to play rugby," he said. "Most of us know the players from the other teams, and we were all there for a good game. We got that, and it was a successful weekend."

A weekend that couldn't have happened without the club's alumni.

"They were the behind-the-scenes backbone for this tournament," Krueger said, adding that they performed the majority of the set-up, tear-down and administrative work for the tournament.



Krueger also gave recognition to the teams from Fort Campbell and Fort Stewart. Both teams went to great lengths to make it to the tournament after returning from deployments.
