Stonewalling order of the day in Navy

WASHINGTON — There has never been a successful mutiny in the United States Navy. Perhaps until now. The officers, both commanders and their subordinates, who obstructed the efforts of Navy agents investigating the indecent assaults of two dozen women at the 1991 Tailhook convention may get away with it.

David Evans

"There was major evidence of collusion and attempts to block the investigation, and that's mutiny. I'm surprised the Inspector General didn't go ballistic," said retired Rear Adm. Edward Carter III, a former Navy IG.

Tailhook is the association of naval aviators known for its rambunctious, alcohol-fueled annual conventions at the Las Vegas Hilton. As in years past, pilots at last September's gathering established the traditional gantlet in a third-floor hallway.

The call "decks afoul" warned of approaching females deemed too unattractive to warrant harassment. "Decks awash" was the call announcing the approach of an attractive female, and about two dozen of them were subjected to fondling, groping and lewd remarks. One of the gropees was an admiral's aide, whose bitter report of the incident triggered a massive inquiry.

Seven months later, Rear Adm. George Davis, the inspector general of the Navy, submitted a report citing massive resistance in the chain of command to the investigative effort.

Stonewalling was the order of the day. Worse, some squadron commanders "refused to order their officers to be photographed," Davis wrote in his April 29 report to Navy Secretary H. Lawrence Garrett III. A Navy source confided that the resistance was based on plans to photograph only black officers, one of whom the aide said fondled her in the gantlet.

Adm. Davis recommended that the Navy terminate its support of Tailhook, but he stopped short of recommending a board of inquiry. That's where the Navy's damage-control efforts began disappointing supporters on Capitol Hill.

One of them was Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., a former naval aviator and now a member of the armed services personnel subcommittee.

"With the information in the IG report about officers trying to block the investigation, we felt that was as serious as the indecent assaults at Tailhook. The Navy has actions that clearly must be taken," he said.

Adm. Carter laid out the course: "If you want to make a disciplinary case out of this you use the findings of the investigations thus far to say we ought to go with a formal board of inquiry."

In a board of inquiry, all testimony is taken under oath, witnesses are cross-examined, the board has subpoena power and a verbatim transcript is made of the proceedings.

As Carter said: "There's no more rappin' to investigators; this is grand opera. That's the difference between an IG investigation and a board of inquiry."

Instead, the Navy has dithered. On May 14, Garrett, who has since resigned in the wake of the scandal, wrote the Judge Advocate General of the Navy, Rear Adm. John Gordon, asking essentially, what are my options?

On May 22, Gordon replied, "The investigators were completely unable to identify any members . . . who lied . . . it is my opinion that any further interviews or investigation would be unproductive and lead to the same results."

Translation: Let the mutiny stand.

Gordon also recommended that the cases of those suspected of being involved in the indecent assaults be passed back down the chain of command for administrative or disciplinary action at the local level. He also has asked the Pentagon's Inspector General for an independent investigation.

The call "decks afoul" warned of approaching females deemed too unattractive to warrant harassment. "Decks awash" was the call announcing the approach of an attractive female, and about two dozen of them were subjected to fondling, groping and lewd remarks.

Action is likely to be inconsistent, however. For example, an officer in one unit might be hammered for his activities at Tailhook, while nothing happens to an officer in another outfit who did the same thing.

The mutinous obstruction of commanders, and the actions of the officers at Tailhook, are both matters that can be resolved through a board of inquiry.

It could recommend that the Navy formally censure the officers involved, effectively ending their careers.

In the meantime, the Armed Services Committee has frozen about 8,000 Navy and Marine Corps promotions, which by law cannot take place without Senate confirmation, until the Navy provides a listing of all those individuals involved in the Tailhook fiasco. In addition, the House Appropriations Committee is recommending that 10,000 Navy jobs be eliminated from the service's Washington headquarters.

That sounds like a good way to get a board of inquiry.

The senators can sit on all those promotions until a board of inquiry is convened. There's nothing so appropriate as comparable inaction to raise the price of the Navy's inaction.

'Victory' comes to an end, desert on horizon

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

Victory Focus, a 21-day training exercise for the 3rd Brigade, 24th Infantry Division (Mechanized), is history. But the lessons learned will be put to use soon, when the brigade takes to the desert at the Army's National Training Center at Fort Irwin, Calif., next month.

Soldiers from the 4th Battalion, 41st Field Artillery, said on the last day of Victory Focus, as they packed up to return to Kelley Hill from the Fort Benning training ranges, that the three weeks of training should put them in good shape for the two weeks of around-the-clock exercises at the NTC.

"Our (three) firing batteries were at different places during the day" doing individual training during Victory Focus, said Maj. Marc Miller, the battalion operations officer. "We'd get the battalion together to shoot a battalion fire mission at night."

There was a lot of live-fire. Miller said the battalion probably shot up 2,000 high explosive and illumination rounds during the exercise.

And when you're talking about shooting 155-millimeter howitzers, that's a bunch of ammunition. A high explosive round for the 4/41's 24 tracked howitzers weigh 96 pounds each.

Like it was for other 3rd Brigade elements, the battalion's work days sometimes started at 4 a.m. and ran until midnight — and without many of the comforts of home.

Indoor toilets were "out" during these three weeks, with only portable toilets available. Showers were of the "Australian" variety — hang a bag or water can in a tree, attach it to a hose and shower head and let the water dribble over you.

The average soldier might have had "four or five hours sleep a night," Miller said, and the exercise included a few 20-25 mile road marches.

Add a battalion evaluation of each firing battery, which typically started at 6 a.m. and ran until midnight, and the stress approaches what a soldier will feel during round-the-clock stints at the NTC.

Sgt. Marvin Hitson said on the last day of Victory Focus that he was looking forward to "doing a little traveling, spending a lot more time with the family" when the 3rd Brigade's 10-day leave began Wednesday.

Spc. Robert Jeckel was the "No. 1" on his crew, meaning he's the guy who actually shoots his track's big gun. He said his crew "did pretty good, this section here. The whole battalion did pretty good.

Capt. Joel Brown, the Bravo Battery commander, said the battalion "has a lot of new leadership" since its last NTC rotation and its duty in the Middle East during Desert Shield/Storm. "So it (Victory Focus) was a very good exercise, just to get out and work out the kinks and bumps."

Firepower is music to their ears

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

Rick Olson, running a company commander through a fire control exercise during Victory Focus, sounded more like a symphony conductor than a soldier keeping his men on their toes while rehearsing infantry tactics.

This lieutenant colonel, who commands the 2nd Battalion, 18th Infantry Regiment, sat in while Capt. Harry S. McCorkle, the Delta Company commander, ran though his plan for a hasty defense of a battle position, with a battalion-sized enemy unit expected to attack.

Olson's command Bradley Fighting Vehicle was controlling the exercise by determing how the "enemy" would approach the company's position, and when electronic jamming might be employed to add confusion, along with a Nuclear, Biological and Chemical (NBC) threat.

McCorkle, using a sand table drawn on the ground, pointed out the enemy's probable avenue of approach as well as obstacles along the way where his mortars and artillery, Bradleys and an M1A1 Abrams tank might best unload on the bad guys.

Field artillery fire "is the violins" of this piece, Olson said, with the mortars being the "bass viola." Mortars won't kill an enemy armored vehicle effectively, but they will "add confusion, along with smoke, and make him button up," Olson said.

"Now it's time to bring in the brass section," Olson said. The TOW missile is the trumpet, which can kill at 3,700 meters, he said. Then comes the Dragon, the Bradley's 25-millimeter cannon and the infantry squad weapons.

The firing and action "builds, it crescendos until the commander decides, 'this is where I want to kill the enemy.' "

Plane gives troops eyes above battlefield

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

Sometimes the latest in new, high-tech military gear is a bit of a throw-back.

That may be the case of the Unmanned Aerial Vehicle (UAV), a battlefield snoop that looks like a model airplane you might build from a kit, although the price tag is much higher.

It may look like a model airplane, but the UAV might be the best pair of eyes out front on any future Army battlefield.

The UAV is so new to the Army that it's still in the experimental stage. An early model was used by the Marines in Desert Storm, said one of the soldiers piloting the craft at Fort Benning last week.

UAV flights were part of Victory Focus, a 21-day exercise involving 4,600 soldiers of the 3rd Brigade, 24th Infantry Division (Mechanized).

It was the 124th Military Intelligence Battalion from Fort Stewart, Ga., that brought the plane to the Benning woods. The $15,000 plane measures 6 feet long and has an 8-foot wing span, and it looks like a miniature Stealth bomber, although it's made of fiber board. It's designed to fly across a battlefield — or out in front of a U.S. armored column, or over and around enemy armor or entrenchments. A video camera in the plane's nose provides live pictures of the battlefield.

The $15,000 plane can zip along at up to 100 mph — 130 mph in a dive — and has a practical range of about 8 kilometers.

It's cheaper than regular reconnaissance aircraft, and no people are on board to be shot at by enemy anti-aircraft guns.

The plane sends what it sees back to its "pilot" — the soldier running the remote control unit — and to one or more monitors. Commanders use the monitors to adjust his fire or just plot enemy positions.

The UAV can zip along at up to 100 mph — 130 mph in a dive — and has a practical range of about 8 kilometers, said Sgt. Dennis Addesso, who took part in the test runs here. "It uses a little two-cycle engine like a chain saw," he said. The plane is remotely controlled from two different locations — up front, or behind the battle lines.

The 124th MI Battalion will continue experimenting with the UAV until September. After that, these "test pilots" will write evaluations of the craft for the Department of the Navy, which runs the UAV program, and for the Army.

"Reaction so far has been favorable," Addesso said. "... This is designed to be expendable, at low cost. You can take Joe Average and teach him to fly it. We proved we can fly 1,000 to 1,200 feet and identify vehicles in convoy, not just see them."

Dolby saw guts, glory in Vietnam

Paying price now for heroic actions on the battlefield

By Jim Lynn
Patriot Editor

David Dolby has experienced both sides of Vietnam.

Dolby risked his life to save his platoon during a bloody four hours of the Vietnam War. For his bravery, President Lyndon Johnson shook his hand and presented him with the nation's top award for valor, the Congressional Medal of Honor. Dolby relishes the honor. He has drawn the interest of authors. He drew an emotional introduction at a Fort Benning reception recently from Benning commander, Maj. Gen. Jerry A. White. A drawing of the medal dominates Dolby's business card.

But Dolby, a Ranger veteran who lives in Pennsylvania, also suffers from post-traumatic stress disorder. At 46, he is unable to work, unable to cope effectively with his hard charging past.

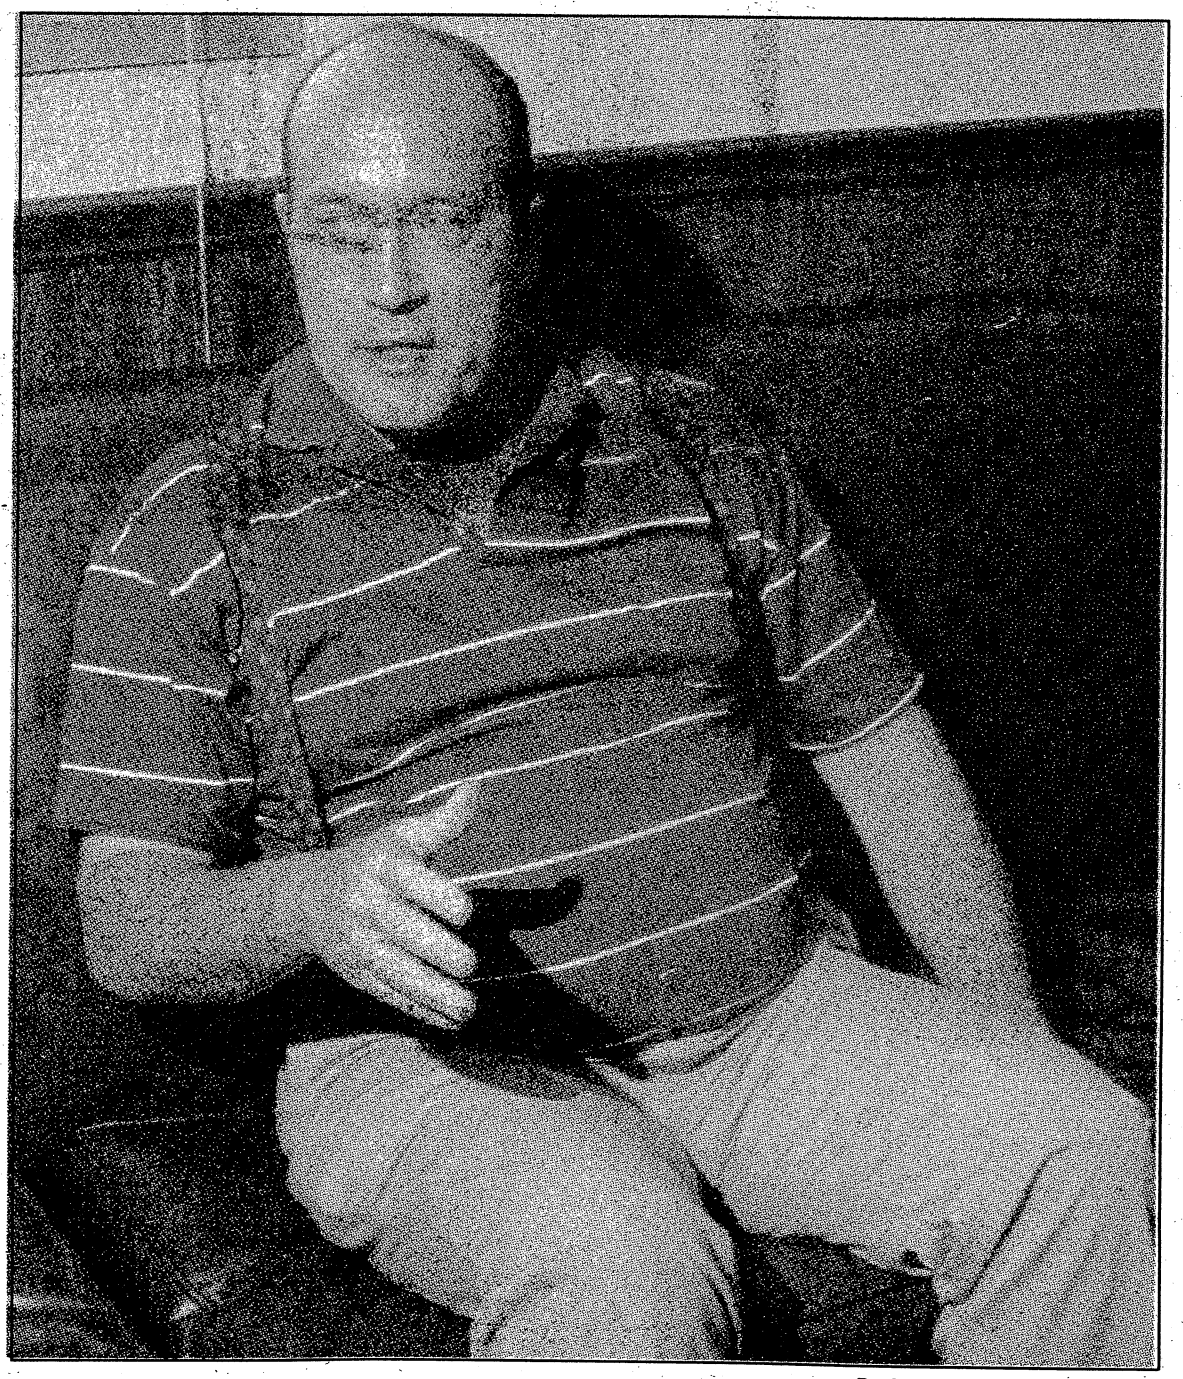
Just a week after his 20th birthday, Dolby was fighting in an area American soldiers derisively called "Happy Valley" because they could always count on catching enemy fire there. On May 21, 1966, Dolby and his platoon walked into an ambush. Dolby's platoon leader was killed, along with nine others. But Dolby made sure the 10 others in the platoon got out alive.

"They opened up on us," Dolby recalled, during a recent visit to Fort Benning. "I charged up the hill by myself three different times, knocking out three machine gunners each time because they kept re-manning their positions."

"A lieutenant died in my arms and his last words were, 'Dolby take charge, and if you have to pull out don't leave any of my men behind,' " Dolby continued. "So I got the wounded and pulled them out and repositioned able-bodied men and continued to fight.

"The only way I was able to go against the enemy machine guns was to wait until they had to put a new belt in the gun," Dolby explained. "When the belt ran out and they had to put a new belt in, I could hear them cock it. That's when I would start firing at them, and I would stand up and put them down with suppression fire and then overrun them. There were three rows of foxholes.

"The mistake I made was not taking the machine guns physically and throwing them down the hill," he said. "They re-manned on me."



By Joe Maher/The Benning Patriot

David Dolby, who won a Medal of Honor, suffers from post-traumatic stress disorder.

A company commander said pull back, and it meant leaving a wounded man behind. It was a move Dolby still regrets. "The next day he was found dead along with the lieutenant," Dolby said. "So I'll never know what happened to him."

It was dubbed Operation Crazy Horse. And Dolby did not expect to get through it.

"I didn't expect to live," he said. "The lieutenant put me in charge of the platoon, and I went around to each man and told them to pray. I told them, 'We're not going to live through this, but we're going to die fighting like paratroopers.' I told them to pray for forgiveness because we're not going to live."

Dolby was soon sent back to Fort Campbell, Ky., after being nominated for the Medal of Honor. He began a second tour in Vietnam, but was soon called back to visit the White House for the Medal of Honor ceremony.

Sgt. (Ret.)
David C. Dolby

Age: 46.
Hometown: Oaks, Pa.
War experience: Five tours in Vietnam.
Honors: Received the Medal of Honor.
Why he went back to Vietnam after receiving the Medal: "To teach other Americans how to stay alive."

"When I got to the White House, President Johnson asked me, 'What would you like to do now, Sgt. Dolby,' " Dolby recalled. "And I told him I'd like to go back to Vietnam and finish my second tour."

The comment drew a laugh from Johnson, Dolby said. The president apparently thought Dolby was joking. He had to be. Who would want to go back?

"He wanted to send me to West Point or Annapolis," Dolby said of Johnson.

But Dolby wasn't interested.

He was a young man who after graduation from a Pennsylvania high school had forfeited a college wrestling scholarship because he was tired of school. He worked construction jobs and handled hot metal in a steel mill. He figured he was about to be drafted, he said, so he joined the Army. He was eager to go to Vietnam, even though the idea was not popular with his family.

He had been eager to go to Vietnam to start with. And he was eager to return, despite receiving the Medal of Honor during his first tour.

Dolby was disappointed with Johnson's response, so he quit the Army.

Eighteen months after the White House ceremony, President Richard Nixon approved Dolby's standing request to return to Vietnam.

Dolby went to Vietnam five times.

"I liked it," said the man who shot a machine gun from his shoulder, like a rifle. "What I could do best was to teach other Americans how to stay alive," he said. "I wanted to teach other men what I learned on May 21, 1966, on the Medal of Honor action." Some of those lessons, he said, included when to fire, and when not to fire, how to patrol, how to camouflage and how to keep quiet."

"A lieutenant died in my arms and his last words were, 'Dolby take charge, and if you have to pull out don't leave any of my men behind,' " Dolby said.

"He had the discipline not to fire," said friend and former Ranger Gary Cupit, now the Infantry School's command sergeant major. "You needed to know when to fire and not to fire and keep from giving that gun position away."

But going back to Vietnam after the medal action, it just was not the same, Dolby said.

"I could see that we were going to lose the war," Dolby said. "So I was not as aggressive and I didn't require my men to be as aggressive. I put a priority on staying alive."

Dolby stayed alive. But he didn't leave five tours in Vietnam unscathed. His injuries were emotional rather than physical.

After the war, he went back to Saigon and married his Vietnamese wife, Xuan. The Medal of Honor recipient went back to work in a steel factory in Pennsylvania. But he hurt inside. He was fired from the factory job for getting drunk and "slapping the boss around." He later worked for a while at a tire plant. He's now considered 100 percent disabled by the Department of Veterans Affairs.

"I think if South Vietnam had stayed free and I could (have gone) over there and stayed over there and lived with my wife over there, I wouldn't have PTSD," Dolby said, his tough exterior crumbling, his voice cracking.

"The fact that my wife could not go back there to visit, her little brother (getting) killed and things like that, and the way the war ended up for as hard a time as I gave it, I'm just not able to cope with that."

High court to hear property tax case

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court has agreed to decide whether communities may seize property from armed forces members whose failure to pay property taxes is not caused by hardship.

The court said last week that it will hear an appeal by an Army colonel whose land was taken and sold by a town in Maine.

Bush administration lawyers supported the appeal filed by Thomas F. Conroy, who has been in the Army since 1966 and has been stationed in four foreign countries and various bases in the United States.

When Conroy was stationed at Fort Devens in Massachusetts in 1973, he bought land in Danforth, Maine, and paid property taxes on it until 1984.

He said he failed to pay taxes for 1984, 1985 and 1986 when he received no tax bills from the community. Danforth said he wrote to the city to ask about the taxes but got no reply, and dropped the matter when he was assigned to Italy in 1986.

City officials said they sent tax notices to Conroy, but the bills were returned to the city with "address unknown" stamped on them. The town then took possession of the property and sold it in December 1986.

State Judge Eugene W. Beaulieu ruled in favor of the town in 1990.

Beaulieu said the federal Soldiers and Sailors Civil Relief Act of 1940 does not protect Conroy because there is no evidence hardship prevented him from paying the taxes.

The judge said excusing tax delinquency in such circumstances would let people in the armed forces acquire land and then refuse to pay taxes for as long as they remained on active duty. That would be "absurd and illogical," Beaulieu said.

But Justice Department lawyers, in supporting Conroy's appeal, said the judge's ruling "is contrary to the unambiguous and unqualified language" of the federal law.

The government lawyers said there have been conflicting interpretations of the law by various courts, and said the justices should settle the matter.

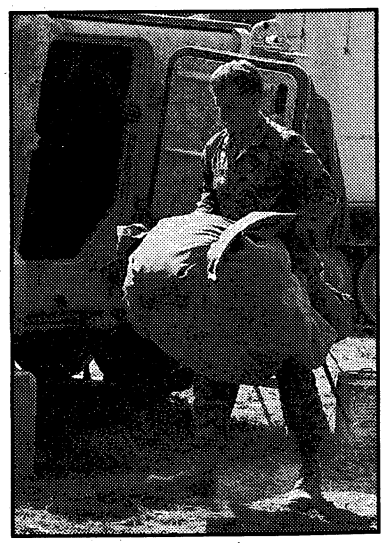
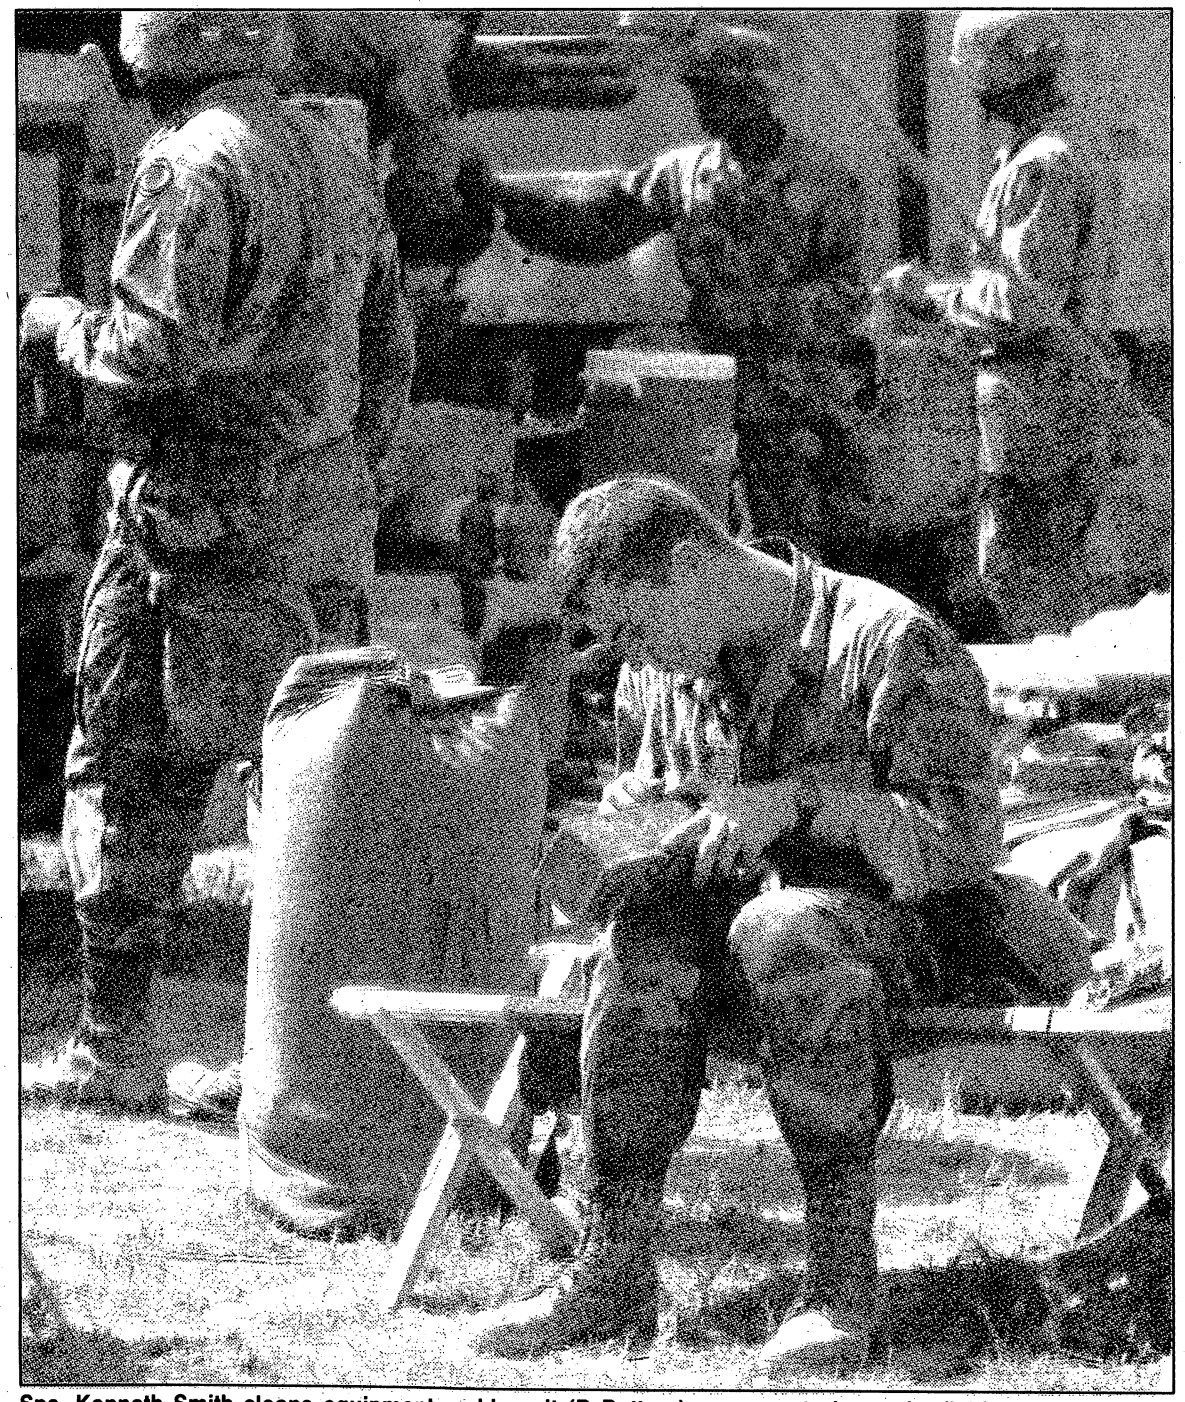
'Victory' is history

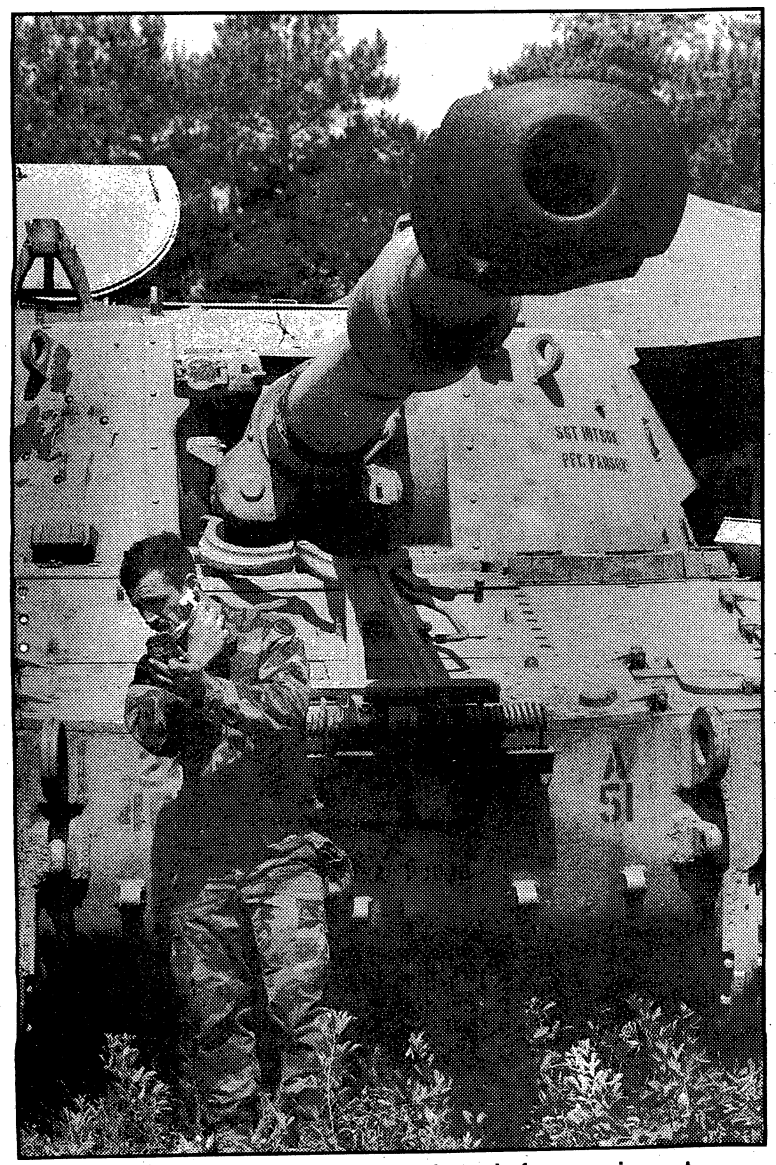
It was a very long three weeks in the field for the 4,600 troops of the 3rd Brigade, 24th Infantry Division (Mechanized). Following the Victory Focus exercise, a little rest will be in order for the soldiers before they head out next month to the National Training Center, the Army's desert training grounds at Fort Irwin, Calif. Photographer Joe Maher spent time in the remote, northeastern sections of Fort Benning to capture images of the soldiers getting ready to return to Kelley Hill. He caught Spc. Ken Henry, on this week's cover, catching a few winks on a makeshift bed — the back door of a tracked vehicle. Stories by staff writer Clint Claybrook are on pages 3 and 4.



Pfc. Brad Clinton loads up his armored personnel carrier.



Spc. Kenneth Smith cleans equipment as his unit (B Battery) prepares to leave the field.



Spc. Robert Jeckel grabs a morning shave before moving out.

Relaxing atop a Howitzer is B Battery's (l-r) Sgt. Antonio Dunston, Spc. Joseph Harper and Spc. Moses Hubbert.

A Civil War reenactment unit will hold services for Brig. Gen. Paul Semmes Sunday at Linwood Cemetery.

Columbus Guards will honor general cut down in his prime

From staff reports

The Columbus Guards, a locally based Civil War reenactment unit, will conduct a memorial service honoring Brig. Gen. Paul Jones Semmes at 1:30 p.m. Sunday at Linwood Cemetery on Linwood Boulevard.

"Last year's ceremony drew nearly 100 people to the cemetery. With the current state flag controversy and its corresponding stimulation of interest in this period of our history, a much larger crowd is expected," said Richard A. Kelly of the unit.

The Columbus Guards will serve as the honor guard during the ceremony in salute to the man who led the unit in prewar Columbus. Following a speech by John Lassiter of the W.C. Bradley Library's genealogy department, honoring Semmes, a gun volley will be fired in salute and taps will be sounded by the unit bugler.

The memorial service is hosted by the Columbus Guards Reenactment Unit, the Henry L. Benning Camp of the Sons of the Confederate Veterans and the Chattahoochee Valley Area Civil War Round Table.

Semmes was a planter/banker from Columbus who joined the thousands from the city who took up arms in defense of the South during the War Between the States. Formerly the captain of a local militia unit, the Columbus Guards, Semmes rose quickly through the ranks assuming command of a brigade of Georgia troops.

At the battle of Gettysburg, on July 2, 1863, Semmes received severe wounds while leading his men in battle. He died on July 10. When the news of the Confederate Army's defeat and Semmes' death reached Columbus, the city was shocked. At the time of his death, Semmes' military record was spotless and historians agree that he was destined for higher command.

Most early Confederate Memorial Day services in Columbus were centered around the Semmes grave site. In recent times, Semmes has been overshadowed by a fellow soldier from Columbus, Brig. Gen. Henry L. Benning. Fort Benning was named for him.

Local historians attribute this to the fact that Benning survived the war and was a prominent citizen in postwar Columbus.

Big Apple hopes greeter program boosts its image

From wire reports

To show New York's friendly side to visitors, Manhattan has started a "Big Apple Greeter" program that lets tourists spend time with residents on a one-to-one basis.

Volunteers working through the Manhattan Borough President's Office will spend two to four hours with anyone who asks for a "greeter" who can orient them to the city, answer questions and give firsthand information on what it's like to live there.

The greeters can also guide visitors to ethnic neighborhoods, specialty shops and cultural attractions.

Similar programs are in effect in the Bahamas, Denmark, Jamaica and Auckland, New Zealand.

The New York program aims to improve the city's reputation and promote tourism. New York has shown declines in U.S. tourists in recent years, partly because of a reputation of being unsafe and expensive.

Visits to New York by foreigners, meanwhile, remained strong, partly because a weakened dollar has made the city less expensive for them. The greeter program also attempts to accommodate non-English speakers.

Requests for a greeter can be made through an application two weeks before arriving, or by phone. Applications and brochures are available from Big Apple Greeter, Manhattan Borough President's Office, 1 Centre St., New York 10017; phone 212-669-2896; fax 212-669-4900.

Airline passengers will soon see changes in cabin telephones. New phones built by In-Flight Phone International use digital transmission technology and satellites to provide a clearer connection than has been available up to now.

They also will offer options such as fax and data transmission, stock quotes, electronic games — all on a display screen embedded in the seatback in front of a passenger. The company refers to them not as telephones, but as "passenger communications systems."

FlightLink phones have been installed recently in a few USAir planes under a test program. Other airlines are expected to follow.

Since 1986 another company, GTE Airfone, has had a monopoly aboard airlines. GTE has been working on improvements, too. Some analysts think the day will come when phones will be standard at all passengers seats. Currently, phone use costs $2 a minute, with a $2 setup fee.

Fireworks safety tips

- Never approach a device after it has been lit, even if it appears to be a dud.
- Attend community fireworks displays instead of doing your own.
- Read all package directions on sparklers and other legal fireworks.
- Give small children glow-in-the-dark wands and noisemakers as substitutes for sparklers and firecrackers.
- Discourage children from trying fireworks, even once.
- Call the fire department if you find firecrackers or other explosives around your home. Unknown factors such as age, moisture levels and amount of explosive material can make such fireworks unpredictable.

Fort Benning festivities

It will be a bomb-bursting, rocket-glaring Fourth of July at Fort Benning, with fireworks, music, a laser show and a booming 50-gun salute.

The festivities begin at 2p.m., with rides and game booths spread out over York Field, in front of Infantry Hall. The Infantry Band wil preform Tchaikovsky's "1812 Overture", with help from the 4th Battalion, 41st Field Artillery Regiment and its 105-mm howitzers. The Misty Harbor Band, a local oldies group, and Southeastern Music Center Orchestra, made up of students at the Columbus College summer music camp, will also perform. And AT&T will offer military personnel free phone calls.

Here's a schedule:

Staff Sgt. Bryan Newman shows off a couple of the uniforms he has collected over the years. They will stand on his front lawn Saturday.

Sergeant decorating his lawn to show patriotism on the 4th

By Sonya Boyd

Independence Day will be celebrated here and around the nation, but it will be recreated on Bryan Newman's front lawn.

Newman, a staff sergeant in the U.S. Army Clothing and Individual Equipment Office at Fort Benning, has taken his professional interest in uniform development and made a hobby of it as well.

His job means working on the Army's uniforms of the future. His hobby is collecting uniforms of the past and present, as well as other historical military artifacts.

He plans to display mannequins dressed up like soldiers from the past on his front lawn on Saturday, to celebrate the Fourth of July. Some decorate their homes for Christmas. Newman does the Fourth.

"This is an opportunity to share with the community the things that I have collected and the patriotism," he said. "People all over the country set up decorations for Christmas, and I enjoy the patriotism. Had it not been for a soldier somewhere along the line we would not have a Fourth of July. This is just an opportunity to recognize the men and women who served."

Newman will display uniforms from the Revolutionary War up to Desert Storm, he said.

His collecting hobby has taken him to what wife Ann said are "some of the world's best flea markets."

An interest in things military was a logical outgrowth of the background of both Bryan and Ann Newman. Aside from his own almost 20-year career, both Newmans come from military backgrounds. His mother was in the Women's Army Corps (WAC) during World War II. Both his father and stepfather, as well as uncles, served in the military. Newman was born in Germany.

Family pieces form the core of his collection, with photographs lining the walls of the Newman home, off Macon Road.

However, treasured though the family pieces may be, they were not the beginnings of Newman's collection.

"I am attempting to provide a safe haven for many items that would be tossed out, simply because people do not have knowledge of what they possess," he said.

Directions

Here's how to find Bryan Newman's Independence Day display.

He lives at 5351 Pine Needle Dr. Take Macon Road eastbound, turn left onto Windtree Lane and right onto Pine Needle.

Bishops in quandary over document on women

By George W. Cornell
Associated Press

A question mark hangs over the long struggle of Roman Catholic bishops to formulate their views on the rights of women. Will the result ever be acceptable? It seems caught in an odd dilemma.

As some bishops note, if they simply give up and say nothing, they'd appear to be shirking their duty to teach.

But even if they wanted to allow equal ecclesiastical status to women, Vatican policy wouldn't permit that — or what surveys indicate most Catholics favor, women's admission to the priesthood.

"In many ways we're in a no-win situation," said Bishop Michael D. Pfeifer of San Angelo, Texas. He said bishops confront an issue "about which we cannot speak and are not ready to speak."

Bishop Pierre DuMaine of San Jose, Calif., in the bishops' first open debate on the long-considered subject at their recent meeting at the University of Notre Dame, put it this way:

"We've gone about as far as we can go."

However, a growing number of bishops would like to go further, as indicated in the new book, "A Church Divided," by Terrance Sweeney, a former Jesuit priest expelled for refusing Vatican orders to suppress his data.

He says confidential surveys of U.S. bishops found those favoring ordaining women to the diaconate rose from 28 percent in 1985 to 40 percent in 1990, and rose from 8 percent to 14 percent for admitting them as priests.

Also, he says, the findings show bishops favoring optional celibacy for priests — allowing marriage for those who choose it — rose in that period from 24 percent to 32 percent.

Among U.S. Catholics generally, the latest Gallup Poll finds 67 percent favor ordination of women and 75 percent support optional celibacy for priests.

Sweeney of Los Angeles said in a telephone interview that "more and more bishops want change and more and more Catholics."

Among U.S. Catholics generally, the latest Gallup Poll finds 67 percent favor ordination of women and 75 percent support optional celibacy for priests.

For the bishops, still striving after nine years of work to produce an equitable document about women, the effort is like trying to "balance a paradox," said Bishop Enrique San Pedro of Brownsville, Texas.

In affirming full equality of women, he said that principle "affirms what cannot be affirmed" in regard to the priesthood.

Retired Bishop Charles A. Buswell of Pueblo, Colo., said the bishops by having to deny ordination to women express the "concern of the Vatican rather than the concerns of women."

Some bishops wanted to junk the whole 18,000-word proposal, stitched together over years of consultations, hearings, a Vatican intervention and three revisions. Many women's groups also wanted it scrapped.

However, by a close vote, bishops asked for still another revision, to be considered at a meeting in November.

Cardinal Joseph Bernardin of Chicago said "just to walk away" from the project and "drop it" would be a serious mistake, implying "we have nothing to say" or "don't know what to say" and "don't have the courage to be teachers."

But even with continued work, he said the results "cannot heal all the hurts, or affirm all the positions being sought," but will affirm equity for women in general and "signal that we must move in a new direction."

Auxiliary Bishop John R. Sheets of Fort Wayne-South Bend, Ind., said the sense of feminine identity and extent of women's concerns are something never "faced before in the history of mankind."

"It is difficult to reconcile with anything we know in doctrine and tradition of the church," he said.

Protestants appear to be gaining ground

By George W. Cornell
Associated Press

NEW YORK — A straw in the wind? A clue? A sign of better days to come? That's the hope for Protestants from studies that seem to show a turnaround in a longtime membership slide.

At the same time, U.S. Roman Catholicism by a statistical twist last year recorded its biggest decline, which was attributed to changed counting methods. It didn't reflect a pattern. That church has a longtime trend of increase.

"I think the increase will continue," said Episcopal Presiding Bishop Edmond L. Browning, head of a church whose membership has declined for 20 years straight.

Such growth hasn't been the experience of most older, mainline Protestant bodies. Losses have chipped away at them for two decades, steadily cutting their membership totals.

A possible turnaround first showed up, small and tantalizing, in the 5.2 million-member Evangelical Lutheran Church in America, then in the 2.4 million-member Episcopal Church.

Although slight, they were the first national membership increases for those denominations in years.

"I think the increase will continue," said Episcopal Presiding Bishop Edmond L. Browning, head of a church whose membership has declined for 20 years straight.

He said that "turning a curve" upward signals continued growth. "There is a great deal of vitality in the life of this church, an enormous amount of energy."

Besides the tiny, but pattern-breaking, upturn in those two denominations, two other major bodies, the 2.9 million-member Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.) and the 8.9 million-member United Methodist Church had among the smallest declines in 22 years of losses.

Previously, United Methodists were the country's largest Protestant body, but it was passed by the evangelical-minded Southern Baptist Convention in the 1960's, now totaling more than 15.2 million.

It, along with most smaller evangelical denominations, and the Roman Catholic Church, now totaling 58.3 million, have maintained a mostly upward membership trend through the years of mainline slippage.

This has kept overall church membership on the upgrade, the percentage gain outpacing the rate of population growth.

However, for most of the historic Protestant denominations, the picture has been one of gradual, sometimes sharp shrinkage for more than two decades, reducing membership of some of them by more than a million each.

Some analysts said the "mainline" denominations had become the "sideline" of American Christianity.

To try to stem the slide, they've put new stress on evangelism, named special teams to promote it, studied growth techniques, held rallies around the country, joined in a prolonged "Invite a Friend" campaign.

The long slide generally has slowed in the last few years, but the intimations of actual turnaround came only in recent months.

It's not known whether they're a quirk or a sign of a changed direction, but in any case, they've raised hopes.

It's "welcome news," said the Rev. Lowell G. Almen, secretary of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America, when that church last year found its 1990 total up by a bare 1,959.

But it was the first gain since the merged church began its existence in 1988, and except for minuscule gains by the largest of its three predecessors about a decade ago, they had been slipping for the 13 previous years.

"The gain ... affirms the efforts by pastors and members ... to reach out to new people," Almen said. "Many congregations face good possibilities of growth through renewed involvement of inactive members."

Benning team shooting for Olympic gold

By Guerry Clegg
Staff Writer

It's more than just a coincidence that Fort Benning's Army Marksmanship Unit holds all three spots on the U.S. Olympic trap team. It's a mission accomplished.

For nearly a decade, Todd Graves, Bret Erickson and Jay Waldron have shared their Olympic dreams with each other. Later this month, they will fulfill their dream together in the Summer Games. The games will be held July 25 through Aug. 9 in Barcelona, Spain.

"That's something we were pulling for and working for all year," said Erickson, a staff sergeant. "Five of the top six finishers at every match we shoot will be Army guys. We've been looking for a sixth person so we can have all six spots."

"Five of the top six finishers at every match we shoot will be Army guys," said Bret Erickson. "We've been looking for a sixth person so we can have all six spots."

Fort Benning will be well represented on the shooting team. There are five Army Marksmanship Unit shooters holding six of the 20 spots on the men's team, plus two alternates. Graves also is on the skeet team, becoming the first person in U.S. Olympic history to qualify for both the skeet and trap teams.

John McNally earned one of two spots on the rapid-fire pistol team. McNally is a 1974 Columbus High graduate and 1980 Columbus College graduate.

Mike Anti earned one of the two spots on the prone rifle team.

Three other Army Marksmanship shooters will be going to Barcelona as alternates — Tom Tamas and Kris Peterson in the three-position rifle and Jonathan Frazer in the rapid-fire pistol.

While all the shooters hope to earn their place in Olympic history, Graves already has. First, he qualified for the skeet team. Then he earned the third — and final — spot on the trap team despite shooting in a steady rain and wind at the trials in Colorado Springs, Colo., three weeks ago.

Graves, 29, joined the U.S. Shooting Team as a trapshooter in 1984, shortly before the Los Angeles Games. His goal was to make the Olympic team in 1988 but he fell short. Also in 1988, Graves decided to start shooting skeet as a hobby.

Waldron, 26, began shooting when he was young.

"Basically, I got into shooting because I wanted to go hunting with my dad and he didn't want me to kill anybody," Waldron said.

So Waldron learned to shoot at Sunny Dell Shooting Grounds under Coach Matt Dryke, father of Olympic shooter Matt Dryke.

Waldron won his first Washington state title when he was 15. He began shooting internationally in 1983 and by 1985 had set his goal — to compete in the Olympics.

"It's been a long time coming," Waldron said. "I've been chasing it about seven years."

Erickson, 31, began shooting competitively when he was 19. He credited his father, Blaine Erickson, for much of his success.

"I'm really happy about it because it's something I've been working at a long time," Erickson said. "You could almost call it a lifelong goal. Still, it's one of those dreams you figure will never come true."

Team feeding off pressure of firing against world's best

By Linda Bosley Dailey
Staff Writer

It may be the Olympic Games, but the competition in Barcelona this month won't be too very different for Capt. Mike Anti from any other match he has shot.

He'll still be looking through a sight, still looking at a bull's eye and still trying to hit it in the center, said Anti, a member of the U.S. Army Marksmanship Unit's rifle team.

Anti, 27, earned a berth on the U.S. Olympic men's prone rifle team.

Rifle shooting is an individual sport, and that's what Anti likes about it. There's no one to blame but yourself. "I like the pressure and the intensity of that," said Anti, who has been shooting since age 11.

But Anti isn't sure he's going to continue shooting competitively. After the Olympics, he said, it will be time to concentrate on his military career. He wants to make the Army a career, and he needs to go to schools and get a company command to progress through the ranks, Anti said.

Two other members of the AMU's rifle team are also headed to Barcelona for the Olympic Games. Unlike Anti, however, they aren't slated to compete.

Spc. Tom Tamas and 2nd Lt. Kris Peterson earned slots as alternates on the men's and women's three-position rifle teams, respectively.

A Minnesota native, Peterson, 26, learned to shoot so she could accompany her father hunting. But Peterson liked target shooting so well, and began competing so much, she never had time to go hunting, she said.

Although pleased to be going to the Olympics, Peterson still is disappointed that she didn't earn a competitor's slot on the team. She is, however, already looking ahead to the 1996 Olympics in Atlanta.

Tamas, too, is already planning for the 1996 Games. "Yeah, I'll be there — guaranteed," said the 27-year-old Columbus native and graduate of Kendrick High School.

Between now and the Olympics, Tamas will be working to train just enough — but not too much. Overtraining can bring about boredom, which can harm a shooter's performance.

Staff Sgt. Jonathan Frazer, too, is already aiming for the 1996 Olympics. "I'm definitely going to make (the team)."

Frazer, selected as an alternate for the men's rapid-fire pistol team, is disappointed he didn't earn a competitor's berth. "I feel I've let myself down," he said. Still, being selected to go to Barcelona is nice. "I'm kind of excited about going."

And another AMU rapid-fire pistol team shooter will be heading to Barcelona for his third Olympic Games.

Capt. John McNally, selected as a competitor for the 1992 Olympic rapid-fire pistol team, finished seventh at the 1988 Olympics, and 26th at the 1984 Games, according to the U.S. Shooting Team.

McNally, 36, calls Columbus home, and is a graduate of both Columbus High School and Columbus College.

NATO chief Galvin retires

From wire reports

ARLINGTON, Va. — Gen. John Galvin, supreme allied commander in Europe for the last five years, retired from the Army this week, telling a ceremony that this country doesn't yet appreciate its Cold War victory.

"Today, with all of our problems, we do not fully understand — maybe we will understand, someday — how much we won when we won the peace," the 44-year soldier said Tuesday.

Taking over as NATO commander is U.S. Gen. John M. Shalikashvili.

A veteran of the Vietnam War, Galvin seemed gratified that he stayed in the service long enough to see U.S. forces win a clear victory in the Persian Gulf War. "We were finally, finally allowed to be ready for a fight and then we showed them what we can do," he said.

GALVIN

As military chief of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, Galvin oversaw the reduction in European forces after the collapse of the Soviet bloc. In appearances before Congress, Galvin said the exact size of U.S. troop strength in Europe was less important than maintaining a presence there and sustaining a commitment to help defend the region.

"I am confident Americans will not zip themselves up in a cocoon and call it Fortress America," he said earlier this year.

Defense Secretary Dick Cheney, who attended the ceremony at the Fort Myer parade ground, just across the Potomac River from Washington, credited Galvin with negotiating sweeping reductions in both nuclear and conventional arms in Europe.

WW II 50TH ANNIVERSARY

In the Arctic, German Luftwaffe and U-Boat forces inflicted heavy damage on Allied convoy, PQ-17, 50 years ago this week. Overall, PQ-17 lost 24 of its 36 supply ships and 3,350 vehicles, 430 tanks, 210 aircraft, and 96,000 tons of miscellaneous equipment.

Here, according to research by the Military History Division at Fort Benning, were the top news stories of the week:

■ Also in the Arctic, Allied convoy, QP-13, lost four ships after stumbling into a "friendly" minefield. These losses, coupled with the failure of PQ-17, caused the Allies to withdraw from the Arctic convoy campaign for several months.

■ On the Eastern Front, the Soviet garrison at Sevastopol fell. During the seven month siege, the Germans suffered 24,000 casualties while capturing 90,000 Soviet soldiers and inflicting Russian losses too massive to estimate.

■ The Allies selected airfields in Holland as the first European targets for the U.S. Army Air Force. U.S. and British forces attacked jointly.

■ At Fort Benning, the 151st Infantry Regiment, made up primarily of Indiana National Guardsmen, used a brass bell to signal its officers to duty. The regiment had taken the bell from a locomotive which had derailed transporting the unit from Indianapolis to Camp Shely, Mississippi, in 1940. The unit kept the bell in honor of the soldiers injured on the train.

■ Fort Benning recognized the 4th of July with a 48-gun salute in honor of the 48 states. Acknowledging the hardships of the current war, units maintained the normal, rigorous post training schedule.

Time to 'See Rock City'

By Jay Clarke
Knight-Ridder Newspapers

CHATTANOOGA, Tenn. — Somehow, in four decades of vacation forays into the mountains of Georgia, Tennessee and North Carolina, I had managed to fend off its barn-roof blandishments.

No, I wasn't going to be taken in by those enormous signs painted on just about every barn roof north of Atlanta. See Rock City? No way.

Nor was I tempted by those ubiquitous birdhouses, the red ones with black roofs painted with the same "See Rock City" message.

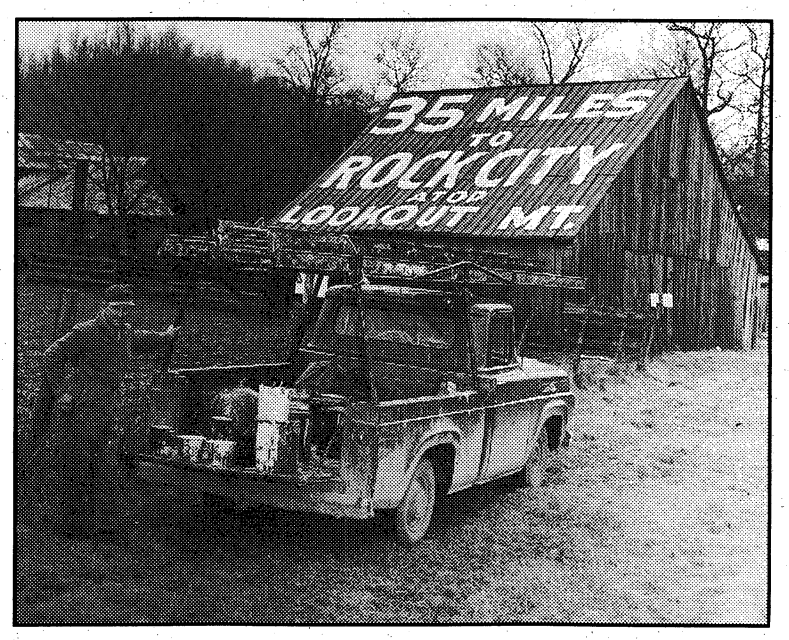
But this year, when word came that Rock City was going to mark its 60th anniversary, I decided I had to visit this durable attraction. Anything that can last that long had to have something going for it.

Visiting Rock City, I found, is like going back in time. It has changed little from the depression days of 1932, when Frieda and Garnet Carter transformed a jumble of cleft rock atop Lookout Mountain into one of America's best known attractions.

Lovers Leap, a much-photographed outcroping, still is a favorite sightseeing perch. From here, says Bill Chapin, owner of Rock City, one can see seven states.

That long-standing claim has been disputed by some, but it really doesn't matter whether one can actually spot the furthest point, Mount Pinnacle, which lies on the Kentucky-Virginia border 120 miles away. Rock City has more to offer than a panoramic view.

It's really a rock garden. The Carters built paths over, around and through the rocks. They channeled streams and created waterfalls. They walled in overlooks and constructed fairy-tale scenes inside caves. They nurtured plants and landscaped the flagstone paths.



Painter Clark Byers helped launch one of the most successful advertising gimmicks in history.

It was simple entertainment and it remains so today.

The rocks themselves are rent by deep clefts that create interesting passages and caves. Fat Man's Squeeze is one of them; it is so narrow that visitors have to walk sideways in order to pass through it. Swing-A-Long bridge sways over a rocky crevasse, and Goblin's Underpass tunnels under massive formations.

Fairyland Caverns, created in Rock City in 1946, also has changed little over the years. It takes visitors into a long tunnel lined with scenes from fairy tales lit by ultraviolet light. Red Riding Hood, Snow White, Hansel and Gretel — they and other characters glow in niche after niche. Black-light tableaus can't compare to Disney Animatronics, but there's a certain old-fashioned charm in the fairy-tale scenes.

Fairy-tale characters are featured in the attraction's annual Fairy Tale Festival the first two weekends of August.

To mark its 60th birthday, Rock City built a new entry corridor with a 15-foot waterfall and has just dedicated a Seven States Flag Court at Lover's Leap. Mounted flags and plaques honor the seven states that are visible from the site.

More than 400,000 people will see these and other features at Rock City this year, vastly more than when the Carters opened the attraction 60 years ago. The idea was really Frieda's and she was the creative force behind it, mapping the trails, naming the rock features.

To pump up business, Garnet Carter got the idea of painting advertising messages on barns along major highways. He hired a young man named Clark Byers to paint the words "See Rock City" on the roofs — and with it launched one of the most successful advertising gimmicks in history.

Rock City's barn roofs became legend. At one time, in the 1950s, more than 900 roofs from Michigan to Texas to Florida bore the Rock City message. Now only 85 painted roofs remain.

"Clark Byers last painted a barn roof about ten years ago, and that was for a television show," said Bill Chapin, president of Rock City and great-nephew of its founder. Byers, now in his mid-70s, is retired; an associate, B.D. Durham, now repaints the existing barns.

If you go

How to get there: Rock City, perched on Lookout Mountain, overlooks the city of Chattanooga, Tenn., even though it lies in the state of Georgia.

Admission: $7.50 adults, $3.75 children 3-12.

Hours: Open daily except Christmas Day, 8 a.m. to sundown in summer, 8:30 a.m. to sundown at other times of year.

Information: (706) 820-2531.

Perot trying to turn tables on Gulf War

WASHINGTON — There he was, America's Mr. Fixit, the toast of the electronic village, Texan Ross Perot, taking phone calls one morning from viewers of NBC's "Today Show."

The topic, raised by Leonard from Chattanooga, was the Persian Gulf War and U.S. policy toward Iraqi President Saddam Hussein. And, not for the first time, Perot lashed out at the conflict and the policy that led up to it.

Steve Daley

His critique, delivered in the piney-woods, matter-of-fact Texarkana tone Americans seem to find so appealing, must have chilled the bones of President Bush's political cadre.

"We need to take these things apart, put them under a microscope and say, 'Wait a minute, what happened here?' For 10 years, we created Saddam Hussein with your taxpayer money . . .," Perot said.

"Our president was sending delegations over to burp and diaper and pamper Saddam Hussein and tell him how nice he was. That's all public record.

"Then . . . our manhood was questioned, and off we go into the wild blue yonder with the lives of our servicemen at risk because of 10 years of stupid mistakes and billions of dollars of taxpayer money."

If Perot believes there is any political cost to be paid for trashing the Gulf War, he appeared eager to pay it.

Republican strategists insist that they will paint Perot as an isolationist and a man out of step with mainstream views of the gulf victory.

But they must confront the fact that, so far, Perot, a billionaire businessman from Dallas, has demonstrated perfect pitch for hearing and embracing the views of millions of Americans.

Among the fascinating aspects of Perot's assault on the yellow ribbons and postwar boosterism is that no breathing Democrat is yet willing to sign on to his hard-edged view of the war.

Arkansas Gov. Bill Clinton, who has clinched the Democratic nomination, gets downright woozy when Operation Desert Storm is mentioned.

In the past, Clinton has bathed the president in praise for his handling of the war, and the Democrat has given at least two contradictory answers to questions about how he would have voted on the congressional use-of-force resolution.

Part of Clinton's problem with the Gulf War may stem from his own reluctance to fight in the Vietnam War, a reluctance shared by millions of his fellow Baby Boomers in the 1960s.

But the Arkansas governor is also a child of the Hairy-Chested School of New Democrats, the sort who want to prove they can be as quick on the trigger as Republicans.

This crowd, which includes many of Clinton's pals in the Democratic Leadership Council, is convinced that their party will never ascend to the White House until they convince voters that they can tough it out with Republicans on defense policy and national security issues.

Mention Panama or Grenada and they wince with jealousy over the Republican facility for ginning up a low-level military conflict on short notice.

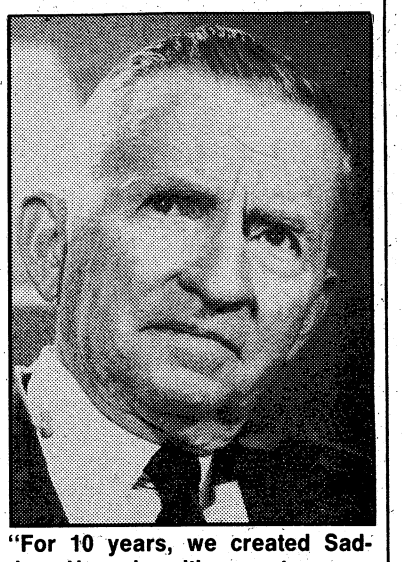
When asked about the Gulf War, the Hairy-Chested Democrats prefer to talk about the problems of the hapless Kurds and Bush's delayed reaction to that story.

To this day, they scurry from any open discussion of the decision to commit a half-million ground troops to the multi-national coalition effort in the gulf.

When Bush addressed a joint session of Congress in early 1991 to celebrate the war's end, hundreds of preening Republicans — and some Democrats — sported buttons identifying themselves as boosters.

Democrats who opposed the war hung their heads, a posture they've maintained to this day.

They had their reasons. Not six months ago, a prominent national pollster announced with considerable fanfare that "the political judgment on the war was over."



"For 10 years, we created Saddam Hussein with your taxpayer money . . .," Ross Perot has said.

Bush was triumphant and vindicated; the president's opponents were advised to hunker down and hope the voters would forget their craven and perhaps unpatriotic behavior.

In the war's aftermath, and despite a moribund economy, Bush and company planned a short, sweet re-election campaign, featuring much talk of the "New World Order" and many pictures of Gen. H. Norman Schwarzkopf.

The recession changed that, and Pat Buchanan changed that, but the triumph in the gulf appeared inviolable.

Now, it may be that Ross Perot has changed that.

Steve Daley is a columnist for the Chicago Tribune.

Cost of Comanche copter continues to climb

From staff, wire reports

WASHINGTON — The cost of the Army's futuristic Comanche helicopter has increased significantly, with the price tag now estimated at $19.1 million, congressional investigators say.

The General Accounting Office, in a recent report to Congress, found a 40 percent increase in cost since 1988 for the lightweight, twin-engine aircraft designed to replace 3,000 Vietnam-era helicopters.

The Pentagon plans to continue research and development of the Comanche, which would perform armed reconnaissance and possibly attack missions, until fiscal 1997 before going ahead with buying the helicopter.

The cost of a single Comanche has been pushed to $19.1 million, $1.4 million more than the helicopter it was designed to complement, the Apache.

The primary reason for the higher cost is the Army's decision to reduce the number it plans to buy from 2,096 in 1988 to 1,292 in 1990

That pushed the cost of a single Comanche to $19.1 million, $1.4 million more than the helicopter it was designed to complement, the Apache.

The overall cost does not include $1.9 billion for the Longbow radar and missile system, which will allow better radar performance through obscurants such as smoke and dust. Longbow will also give the Comanche a "fire and forget" missile firing system. Plans are for 430 of the Comanches to be equipped with the Longbow system.

The GAO found that the Comanche will have some features similar or better than the Apache, although the light helicopter was designed to augment it. The Apache is also being retrofitted with the Longbow system.

"This role has been blurred because the advanced attack capabilities planned for the Comanche will enable it to perform the same missions as the Apache. Moreover, the Comanche is expected to have some capabilities that will be superior to those of the Apache," the GAO said.

The superior qualities include the ability to conduct air combat using its guns or missiles, detection of targets at a 40 percent greater range and a cruise speed of 170 knots compared to the Apache's 145 knots. Army Aviation spokesman Dan O'Boyle said the Comanche was designed with "lessons learned" from the Apache in mind.

O'Boyle said the Army is sold on the Comanche.

"The Army's position is indeed that there is a need for the Comanche," he said this week. "The Apache is a pure attack helicopter, and the Comanche ... has a dual role" of reconnaissance as well as attack.

The Comanche is planned to replace the AH1 Cobra and OH58 Kiowa helicopters.

The GAO said that, based on the demise of the Soviet Union, the diminishing military budget, the increased cost of the Comanche and the blurring of the distinct role for the helicopter, the Army should rethink its planned purchases.

"These factors ... make this an appropriate time to assess the program's viability to ensure that any future decision to buy the Comanche will be appropriate," the GAO said.

By Joe Maher/The Benning Patriot

The Comanche helicopter, shown here at Fort Rucker museum, is scheduled to replace the Apache.

Fort Benning streamlines post operations

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

Maj. Gen. Jerry White's move to "create efficiencies" and eliminate some duplication of jobs has resulted in re-designating the Infantry Training Center the "Infantry Training Brigade" and placing it under the Infantry School.

Under a re-organization plan that went into effect last month, the Garrison Commander's post was also officially created — although in fact it had been in existence for several months.

Also as part of that plan, Directorate of Plans, Training and Mobilization and the Directorate of Training and Doctrine have been combined to form the Directorate of Operations and Training. That will mean the elimination of one colonel's slot. Combining the TRADOC systems managers for Fighting Vehicles and Anti-Tank Missiles will eliminate another colonel's job.

Col. Burnet Quick, the chief of staff, said the moves — effected several months after a council of colonels, which he chaired, began looking at ways of streamlining operations on post — will streamline the post's operations. Under the new set-up, the Infantry Training Brigade now reports to the deputy commanding general.

Another significant part of the change involves creation of Infantry Battle Laboratories or an Infantry War Fighting Center on post, Quick said. That operation, which may be staffed heavily with people already in the Directorate of Combat Developments, won't mean any new buildings. But it may mean new uses of people already on the payroll and new battle simulation equipment aimed at planning for "the future infantry." The IWFC "will look at the Army of the future and say what role does the infantry have in it" while other battle laboratories will be seeking the same answers for armor and the cavalry, he said.

Quick said it is unknown, as yet, how many people might be involved with the Infantry Warfighting Center or the battle laboratories or what exisiting agencies on post they would all come from. Staffing of that center is up to Gen. White, who has not approved the numbers, Quick said.

Quick, like others, said combining DPTM and DOTD to form the Directorate of Operations and Training is probably the most significant reorganization move, in part because that move will make things like coordination of scheduling range usage. "In many cases (DPTM AND DOTD) were doing similar functions" and over time that could mean some cuts in those staffs, Quick said.

No cuts are planned, at the moment, he said.

Not everybody sees the placing of the Infantry Training Brigade under the Infantry Center — it formerly reported directly to the post commander — as an easy shift.

The change means "it's going to be a turbulent time," said Lt. Col. Marcell Lettre, outgoing commander of the Airborne School and a close observer of the reorganization moves. "This is another wave in the downsizing of the Army. It's a fact that Fort Benning will have fewer military spaces and will have to make do with less."

Quick said however, that he sees virtually no change in the student population at Fort Benning next year, which means some 65,000 soldiers and would-be soldiers will continue to troop through everything from One Station Unit Training to to Airborne and Advanced Infantry Officer School next year.

The crowd enjoys a laser light show on York Field.

A fantastic Fourth

Swilling lemonade, tossing Frisbees and "oohing" at the fireworks darting across the sky, some 10,000 people packed onto Fort Benning's York Field on Saturday to celebrate America's birthday.

"If feels like the right place to be on the Fourth of July. It feels like it has more meaning here," said Nicole Allen, a Seale, Ala., woman who spent the afternoon soaking in the hot July sun with her soldier-husband and 4-year-old son.

Just across the river in Phenix City, crowds gathered through the afternoon and into the night at Idle Hour Park, listening to Elvis Presley impersonators and live bands, and waiting for the evening fireworks that have become a tradition. Up to 30,000 people were expected to visit the park before the celebration ended.

Friends bid farewell to Jewish leader

From wire reports

NEW YORK — At an interfaith service at the United Nations, there were prayers by a Hindu, Buddhist, Christian, Muslim and Jew. Momentarily, gazes of the Christian and Jew met and lit with mutual affirmation.

"That look said it all," Rabbi Marc H. Tanenbaum recalled later. "We identified with each other. The words, the cadences, the attitude of our prayers were the same. The others had a different ring.

"But we two were in the same biblical mode, dedicated to the same God of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and Jesus. In that moment, we recognized our oneness. We didn't have to say it. We just knew it in that exchanged look."

Tanenbaum, one of the 20th century's most influential builders of closer Jewish-Christian relations, often dubbed the Jewish "apostle to the Gentiles," died July 3 at the age of 66 of heart failure.

His funeral this week drew an ecumenical throng. Among about 1,000 at Manhattan's Park Avenue Synagogue were nuns, priests, bishops and ministers of Roman Catholic, Protestant and Eastern Orthodox churches as well as many noted rabbis and religious scholars.

He "worked to accomplish unity among people," making for a "peace that helped us all," said Pope John Paul II in a message read by New York's Cardinal John O'Connor.

Evangelist Billy Graham called Tanenbaum the "best friend I had in the Jewish world," and said he "did more to bring about understanding and friendship between Christians and Jews than any clergyman I ever knew."

On the wall in Tanenbaum's office at the American Jewish Committee, from which he retired in 1990, there used to hang pictures of Graham and the late Pope John XXIII, who sparked Catholic reforms of the 1962-65 Second Vatican Council.

Tanenbaum was a key Jewish voice at that council, which repudiated anti-Semitism and the Christ-killer charge against Jews and which also facilitated continued working ties with Judaism and other Christians.

Tanenbaum also had influenced earlier, similar steps by the World Council of Churches, including most major Protestant and Eastern Orthodox churches, and by the National Council of Churches.

"Improving Jewish-Christian relations is not simply a luxury or an academic enterprise of singling out the terrible old chapters of the past," he said in an interview a few months ago.

"The human condition is so fraught with perils to all of us that strengthening bonds of humanity and mutual responsibility is a necessity rather than a luxury."

He said that confronting the "dehumanization and fanaticism" in the world "requires the best minds and hearts of Jews and Christians, not only to respect each other but to trust each other in building a moral consensus to try to contain the demonization taking place."

In about 30 years with the AJC as interreligious affairs director and later as director of international relations, Tanenbaum — a lean, square-jawed, six-foot man with gray streaking his brown hair — roamed the earth to heal religious ties torn by centuries of hostility.

"Somebody had to be prepared to take the heat and get the job done," he said.

Greek Orthodoxy changing its ways

From wire reports

NEW ORLEANS — The policy-making congress of the Greek Orthodox Church of North and South America is developing a more participatory style, says a leader of a movement dedicated to that cause.

The assessment came from George Karcazes, a founder of Orthodox Christian Laity, as the church this week held its 31st Biennial Clergy-Laity Congress. About 2,000 delegates gathered in Chicago from across the country.

"The process is opening up," he said. "There's a definite feeling and mood about it, that both the laity and clergy should take a more active part in decisions of the church."

Karcazes, a Chicago lawyer, said the shift was apparent in some actions taken by the congress, including a move to share the power to select members of the Archdiocesan Council.

That council of about 140 members, varying more or fewer at times, serves between congresses as an interim advisory and governing body of the 2 million-member denomination, headed by Archbishop Iakovos.

A legislative committee approved an amendment to church bylaws that would give laity and clergy the chance to elect some council members. Iakovos would appoint the rest, rather than all of them.

Subsequent adoption of the change was considered largely a formality, not only since committee recommendations are regularly accepted, but also since this one had the backing of Iakovos.

"We're happy he endorsed it," Karcazes said. "He recognized it's something that people want, and he was ready to give it to them."

Actually, Karcazes said the change would mean a return to a past system of more diverse selection of council members.

They "used to be partially elected," with the clergy electing their representatives and laity electing its representatives, he said. But over the last 20 years, he said the New York-based archdiocese had made changes providing for the archbishop to appoint all the members.

"As a result, the process of electing representatives by the clergy and the laity has been whittled away," Karcazes said.

However, under the amendment the archbishop would appoint 31 members, the clergy will elect about 40 members and the laity about 60.

Karcazes, 53, said the change is important because many people had lost confidence in the council.

"When the system was changed to where they were being all appointed, I think they tended to be less independent," he said. "I don't think they were giving as good advice to the archbishop as they would if elected.

"The sense throughout the church and in the parishes was they were not as responsive to the concerns of the laity and of the clergy and I think what we've seen in the congress so far is a shift back to a more participatory governance of the church."

Soldier dies in gun accident

From staff reports

Pvt. Bradley C. Baker, a student at Fort Benning's Airborne School, was killed last weekend when a gun he was handling accidentally fired.

Baker, 20, of C Company, 1st Battalion, 507th Infantry, was a mortarman from Angleton, Texas, post officials said.

Baker was killed Saturday night while attending a party at Lot 31, Hilton Mobile Home Park, at 901 Joy Road in Columbus, authorities said. He was handling a .357-caliber revolver when the gun went off, said Columbus Police Detective Lt. Greg White. The bullet struck Baker in the head.

"There were several witnesses there and they said he was playing with the gun," White said of the shooting, which happened shortly before 8 p.m. Baker died at 3:10 a.m. Sunday at the Medical Center, Muscogee County Coroner J. Donald Kilgore said. He said the death was still under investigation.

McCaffrey to assist Powell

From staff reports

Lt. Gen. Barry R. McCaffrey, former commander of the 24th Infantry Division (Mechanized), has been named assistant to Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Colin Powell, the Army announced this week.

McCaffrey commanded the 24th, at Fort Stewart, Ga., until late May, when he was replaced by Maj. Gen. Paul E. Blackwell. Fort Benning's 3rd Brigade is part of the 24th.

As Powell's assistant, McCaffrey will represent Powell at certain White House and State Department meetings, congressional hearings and interagency meetings, said Col. William Smullen, Powell's spokesman.

In another promotion, William Steele, former assistant commandant of the Infantry School at Fort Benning, has been promoted from brigadier to major general, the Army announced. Steele was at Benning in 1989. Currently, he is deputy commandant of the Army Command and General Staff College at Fort Leavenworth, Kan.

TRADOC team to measure Fort Benning's quality of life

By Jerry Rutledge
Patriot Editor

Next week, the Fort Benning community is putting its quality of life into competition.

Beginning Monday, the Training and Doctrine Command Communities of Excellence evaluation team will be viewing the post and determining how life at Fort Benning measures up when compared with life at other installations like Fort Gordon, Ga., and Fort Bliss, Texas.

Other large military installations involved in the COE competition are Fort Jackson, S.C., and Fort Sill, Okla. The team will tour Fort Benning for three days.

"The COE is really focused on the total Army community," said Sarah McLaney of the Directorate of Resource Management (DRM), Resource Analysis and Documentation Division (RADD).

"They want to see our community environment and how well our people, facilities and services work together to accomplish a mission. In every area the team goes, they will be looking for total Army quality."

McLaney says the competition is geared toward improving the quality of customer services and facilities for the soldiers and their families. This year the emphasis is on customer services.

The title of best installation in the Army isn't the only thing at stake for Fort Benning and the four other installations. A prize of $1.5 million will be awarded to the winner.

The judges will be seeking excellence in 14 areas — long-range planning, family support, military personnel, civilian personnel, chaplain, logistics, engineer, housing, medical, legal services, information management, resource management and finance, care of the environment and public affairs.

The TRADOC team is the first of two teams that may visit Fort Benning. If TRADOC nominates the post after its visit, the Department of the Army will send its own team to tour and judge.

"Both teams look at the same functional areas. It's our show," McLaney said. "We show them the best that we have, the things that we do at Fort Benning that no other installation in the Army does. Or, if other installations do it, how we do it better. It's a brag-type thing on the things we're most proud of at Fort Benning."

Col. Tony Nida is the chief of the TRADOC team. He will be joined by members Byron Gibson, Richard Baker, Lynda Cascioli, Maj. Daniel Wilson, Philip Saville and Fern Bennett.

Restored version of film classic 'Casablanca' comes to theaters

From staff reports

"Even people who have never seen the film will often quote one of the many memorable lines from 'Casablanca' without even realizing where it came from," said Alan Ladd Jr., Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer (MGM) co-chairman and chief executive officer. " 'This looks like the beginning of a beautiful friendship,' 'Here's looking at you, kid' and the evolved mis-quote, 'Play it again, Sam,' are all now a part of American cultural folklore. This is because, among many additional reasons, 'Casablanca' touches the heart in a lasting way no other film has done, before or since."

"Casablanca" celebrated the 50th anniversary of its release on April 10 this year. For the special anniversary reissue, Turner Entertainment Co. (TEC), who owns the rights of the film, supplied new, pristine 35-millimeter prints struck from a new negative made from the original nitrate fine-grain master, which is on deposit at the Museum of Modern Art in New York City.

"Critics and audiences around the world still rank 'Casablanca' as one of the best and favorite films of all time, yet most people have never seen it uninterrupted on the big screen, as was originally intended," said TEC president Roger Mayer. "This 50th-year tribute will allow audiences to experience the unparalleled chemistry of (Humphrey) Bogart and (Ingrid) Bergman at their legendary best, showcased with the finest possible print and delivered to the greatest venue for movie screening — a comfortable, darkened theater."

"Casablanca" can be seen in the Screening Room at Carmike Cinema 7, 5301 Sidney Simons Blvd., today through Thursday.

At the time of its original release, "Casablanca" was nominated for eight Academy Awards, capturing Best Picture, Best Director and Best Screenplay of 1943. Hal Wallis was also awarded the Irving G. Thalberg Memorial Award in recognition of outstanding work as a film producer. Since that time, "Casablanca" has consistently appeared on "best film" lists, including the 1989 U.S. National Film Registry, where it was one of the first 25 recognized movies; the 1983 British Film Institute poll honoring "Casablanca" as the bet film ever made and the 1977 American Film Institute poll naming it the third best American film of all time, behind "Gone With the Wind" and "Citizen Kane."

'Casablanca,' starring Humphrey Bogart, can be seen in the Screening Room at Carmike Cinema 7 today through Thursday.

Even though "Play it again, Sam" is considered the most famous line in "Casablanca," it was never spoken in the movie.

In fact, there isn't a single version of the script, including the original play, in which that line is spoken. When Ilsa (Bergman) utters her request, the line is "Play it, Sam. Play 'As Time Goes By.' " Later, Rick (Bogart) says, "If she can stand it, I can. Play it!"

Some bits of "Casablanca" trivia:

■ During a European vacation in 1938, playwright Murray Burnett visited a cafe in the South of France that provided the inspiration for "Everybody Comes to Rick's." In 1940, Burnett and collaborator Joan Allison wrote "Everybody Comes to Rick's," which was submitted to Warner Bros. a year later, when director Wallis changed the title to "Casablanca."

■ After considering making Sam the piano player a woman — to be played by Lena Horne, Ella Fitzgerald or Hazel Scott — director Wallis awarded the role to Dooley Wilson, even though he couldn't play the piano.

■ The only cast member to ever visit the city of Casablanca prior to making the movie was Wilson. He played a gig there in the 1920s when his jazz band, The Red Devils, performed at a party in honor of British World War I hero T.E. Lawrence. In 1943, Bogart and his third wife, Mayo Methot, visited Casablanca as a part of a USO tour.

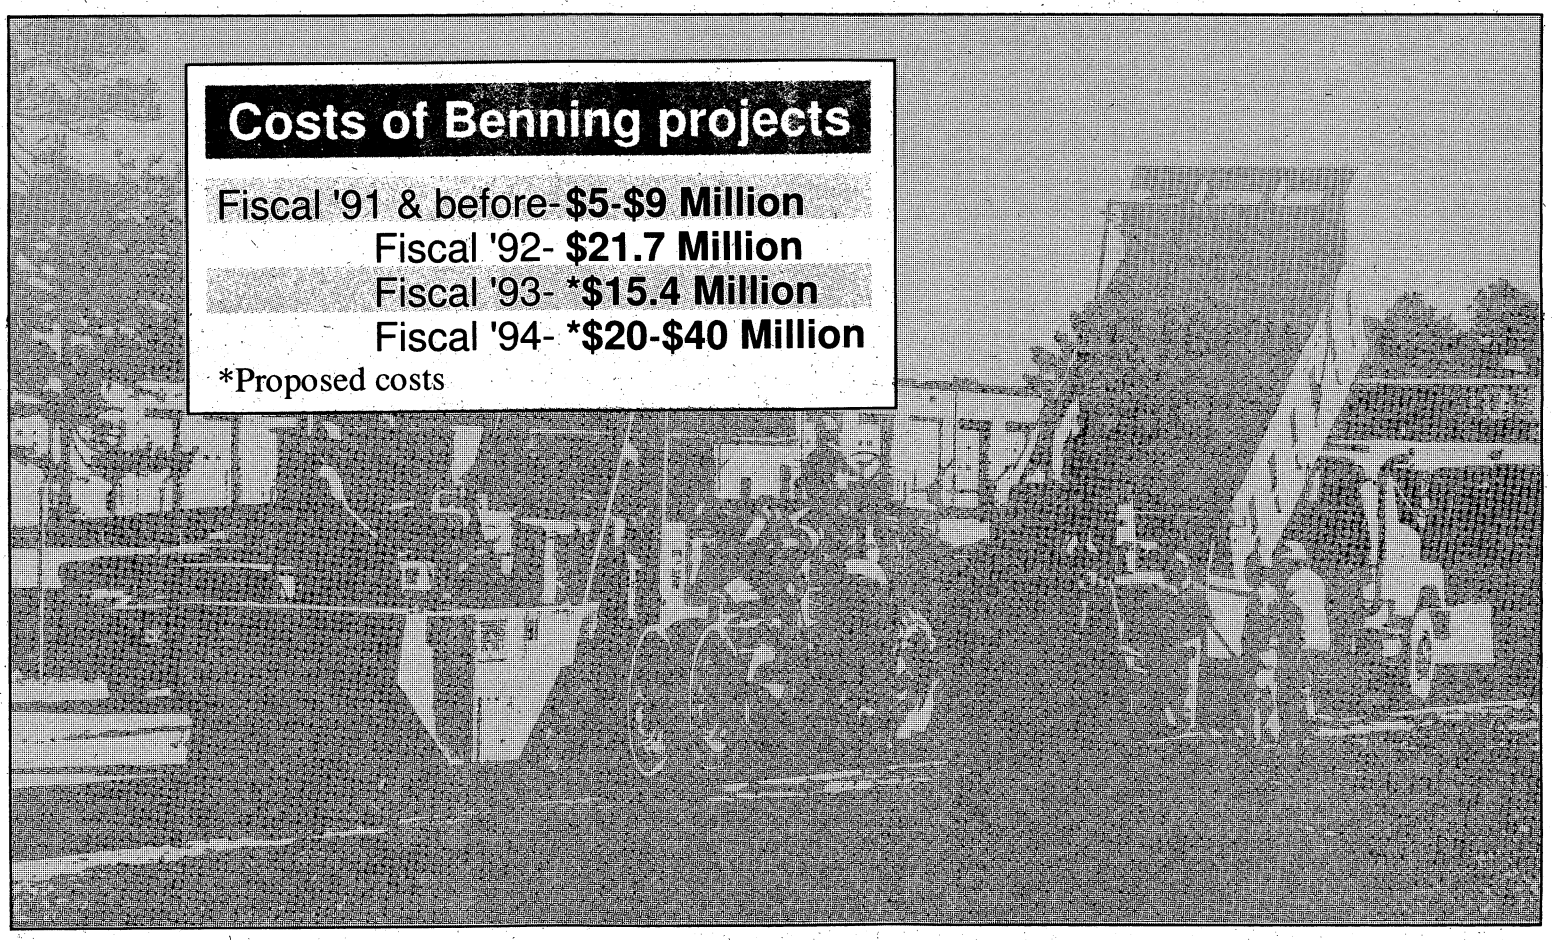
Army projects 'not going away'

Post getting its share of construction

By Linda Bosley Dailey
Staff Writer



Even as the Army is reducing its number of soldiers and closing some installations, military construction activity continues at Fort Benning and other posts that are remaining open.

"The Army is downsizing, but the Army is not going away," said Jim Parker, chief of public affairs at the Savannah District of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers. "The Fort Benning program is very healthy."

Among the projects that will get under way in coming months are three that were approved in previous years as well as five approved in fiscal 1992. The eight projects combined are worth between $26.7 million and $30.7 million.

Projects approved in previous years slated to begin soon:

■ Construction of a tactical equipment shop — a motor pool — for the 317th Engineer Battalion. The contract is expected to be let before Oct. 1. Cost: $2 million to 4 million.

■ Construction of a recreation center in Sand Hill. The contract is expected to be awarded before Oct. 1. Cost: $2 million to 4 million.

■ Installation of an Energy Monitoring and Control System at Dental Clinic No. 1 and at Martin Army Community Hospital. Already in place at some other buildings on Fort Benning, the computer-operated system controls electricity usage to help conserve energy. The $5 million contract to install the system in phases was let in 1986. This phase of the project will cost about $1 million, Parker said.

Projects approved in the 1992 military construction budget are:

■ Renovation of 291 housing units in Custer Terrace. Contractors will modernize the kitchens, add full- or half-baths and add off-street parking. Another 150 units in Upatoi Terrace will have carports added.

The contract should be awarded in September, said Kenneth Holloway, chief of the master planning branch of the Directorate of Engineering and Housing on post. Cost: $10.02 million.

■ Construction of 40 family housing units at the Rangers' Camp Merrill in Dahlonega, Ga. The Army must also acquire the land on which to build these homes, and officials will meet early next month to discuss the land purchase, Holloway said. Cost: $4.55 million.

■ Construction of a 47,435-square-foot hangar for the 3rd Battalion, 75th Ranger Regiment and the parachute riggers. The contract is expected to be awarded by April 1993, Parker said. Cost: $3.9 million.

■ Upgrade Ranger camps here and at Dahlonega. At Camp Darby here, the project includes building planning bays and a classroom, as well as paving the access road to the camp. In Dahlonega, officials plan to build a water treatment plant, water storage tank and water distribution system. Design of the project is expected to be complete in December. Cost: $2.15 million.

■ Upgrading Phillips Range. In preparation for the CISM competition — an international military competition — that will be held here this fall, the shooting range is being upgraded. The contract was let in May. Cost: $1.05 million.

While those projects have already been funded by Congress, other military construction projects remain under consideration as lawmakers work on the federal budget. Projects for Fort Benning under consideration in the fiscal 1993 budget are:

■ Renovation of 221 dwelling units in three different areas on Main Post. Because they are in historic districts, renovation of the homes will be coordinated with the Georgia State Historic Preservation Office. Cost: $8.8 million.

The project will follow the Army's Whole-Neighborhood Revitalization plan, and include improvements to the neighborhood, such as construction of playgrounds, half basketball courts, jogging paths and a community center.

■ Improvement of the parking apron at Lawson Army Air Field to accommodate more large aircraft. The project involves replacing asphalt with concrete to better support the weight of the aircraft, Holloway said. Cost: $6.6 million.

Projects proposed for the fiscal 1994 budget include:

■ Renovation of the barracks in Buildings 2811 through 2814. A separate dining facility with a capacity of 800 persons also is planned. Cost: Between $10 million and $20 million.

■ Improvements to 928 dwelling units on post. Changes here will follow the Army's Whole Neighborhood Revitalization plan, and include construction of such facilities as half basketball courts, a jogging path, playgrounds, recreation fields and a community center. Cost: Between $10 million and $20 million.

■ Construction of a squad automatic weapons and machine gun range. Cost: Less than $1 million.

Cheney criticizes effort to get more data on POWs

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — Vietnam offered to free American prisoners of war more than a decade ago in exchange for U.S. foreign aid, a key Reagan administration official is quoted as telling senators.

U.S. News & World Report says in its current issue that the unidentified official's testimony was one of the reasons the Senate voted 96-0 last week to ask the White House to release secret POW documents.

Secretary of Defense Dick Cheney argued Sunday against a wholesale release of government files on the issue, saying the Senate committee investigating the matter should "stand up and make a decision.".

"We still have a major effort under way to get a full accounting of our people that are unaccounted for in Southeast Asia," Cheney said on CBS-TV's "Face the Nation."

"If we were to reveal the names, the identities of people who have cooperated with us in confidence, we would jeopardize those ongoing efforts," he said.

U.S. News said the offer to release an unspecified number of POWs in return for billions of dollars in foreign aid was said to have been made a week after President Reagan took office in 1981.

The magazine, quoting congressional sources, quoted the former official as saying the offer was seriously considered by the senior White House staff, but no action was taken on it.

The official was quoted as saying that White House Chief of Staff James A. Baker III, who is now secretary of state, was among Reagan advisers opposing the deal because they did not wish to give the appearance of paying ransom to Hanoi.

The panel has threatened to release its own classified documents, culled from government agencies, if the administration refuses to comply with its request.

VA office may ease claims crunch

By Jim Merlini
Correspondent

MONTGOMERY, Ala. — An $8 million Veterans Administration central office under construction here may shorten the time it takes to process medical claims, the agency says.

It may reduce the claims processing time by linking computerized veterans' files directly to VA medical centers across the state and nation. The new VARO (Veterans Administration Regional Office) building will be the first permanent quarters for central office staff since 1946 when it was first located in a converted lumber storehouse in downtown Montgomery.

VA General Counsel James Endicott called the ground breaking a "historic event that will ultimately benefit 400,000 veterans and their families across this state.

"Part of the history of the VA, unfortunately, is (that) our 178 medical centers could not talk on a real time basis to the benefits office. This facility (will) talk to every medical center in the state and more quickly process claims."

Until now, Endicott said, the VA has been very paper-oriented. "The traditional thought was (to) put money into medical care and we needed to," he said. "Now the clear need is to provide benefits quicker (and) more efficiently for the families and the veterans."

VA records show 397,000 veterans known living in Alabama. Of that number, 304,000 are classified as war veterans from World War I, World War II, Korea, Vietnam, and the Persian Gulf War. The two largest groups are 125,000 from Vietnam and 123,000 from World War II.

Post's dental activity earns excellence award

Secretary of the Army Michael P.W. Stone recently approved the Army Superior Unit Award for the Fort Benning Dental Activity for "superior support provided during Operation Desert Shield and Desert Storm."

The Fort Benning Dental Activity was one of only two DENTACs in Health Services Command to receive this recognition, according to Paula Dansereau of DENTAC. From August 1990 to March 1991, dental support was provided to more than 26,000 deploying soldiers, which included the Army's largest infantry brigade, she said.

The DENTAC established, staffed and operated eight dental facilities — the largest dental mobilization activity in the Army, three in and out processing centers, and a command and control headquarters, she said.

Fort Benning commanding general Maj. Gen. Jerry White will present the award July 15 to the Dental Activity at 11:30 a.m. in front of Dental Clinic No. 1, building 9240.

Candidate to hear from veterans

Local veterans' organizations are hosting a breakfast and forum to air their concerns on veterans' issues to Democratic congressional candidate David Worley. The forum will be Saturday morning at 10:30 a.m. at the Veterans of Foreign Wars Post 665, 1824 Victory Drive in Columbus.

The question and answer session will follow a breakfast. Worley will make a brief position statement followed by Q&A from the audience. All local veterans' organizations have been invited to participate.

FYI

A child care card is required in order to enroll in any child care development service on post.

Parents may obtain a child care card at the Child Development Services Central Registration Office, Building 11302, on Custer Road. The Central Registration Office will maintain a complete listing of child care and vacancies on post and will work with families to determine which program will best meet the needs of children and family. Call 687-4038.

400 civilians could lose jobs

Benning expected to lose funds

By Jim Lynn
Staff writer

Fort Benning personnel are bracing for a cut of a little more than one-fifth of the post's primary budget this fall, which could mean as many as 400 civilian workers may lose their jobs.

A 21 percent cut is being projected in Fort Benning's largest budget category, "Operation and Maintenance — Army" (OMA), according to Army officials and documents obtained under the federal Freedom of Information Act. The cut would be for the fiscal year which begins Oct. 1.

The estimate is tentative, post officials emphasized. The OMA budget is projected to be cut from $174 million to $144 million, according to the documents.

"Quite frankly, I don't know where he can get that cut," retired Maj. Gen. Kenneth C. Leuer, a former Benning commander, said of the problems current commander, Maj. Gen. Jerry A. White, would face in handling that large a reduction. "We've been nibbling at it for quite some time." White has been unavailable for interviews since his arrival at Benning in October.

Slashing OMA means cutting everything from repairing broken water mains and replacing target mechanisms on firing ranges to sending troops to the National Training Center at Fort Irwin, Calif., and running the 29th Infantry Division, Benning's major training operation.

It's not yet clear how cutting Fort Benning's main operating budget would affect infantry training, the post's chief function. But it would be hard to avoid laying off some of Benning's 7,900 civilian workers, spokesman Rich McDowell said. That "is the main way of dealing with something like this, the biggest and best way," he said.

Secretary of the Army Michael P.W. Stone said during a recent visit to Fort Benning that layoffs were being considered. Training and Doctrine Command spokesman Bill Noxon said this week that 400 positions are tentatively slated for elimination here.

Last year, the post initially warned of 207 possible layoffs. But after unfilled positions — existing only on paper — were eliminated, 45 people lost their jobs. It might not be as easy this year, Noxon said.

"Last year, it was not so bad," he said. "This year, the job will be a lot tougher because a lot of those (unfilled) positions have already been eliminated."

In April, post Chief of Staff Col. Burnet R. Quick wrote a memo to civilian workers warning of layoffs.

"There may have to be some force reductions," Quick wrote. "The numbers and types have not been determined, but you may be assured that every effort is being made to minimize the impact on our dedicated work force."

Fort Benning's budget is being cut along with military operations throughout the nation. The Army and other services must draw down their ranks by 25 percent over the next five years, as ordered by Congress because of the easing of East-West tension and competing domestic concerns.

The proposed cut for Benning would be the largest in recent history, three times the 7 percent cut of last year.

"The budget has been going straight down," McDowell said.

Benning budget chief David Flo has refused requests for interviews over the last three months. Other officials have also declined to comment in detail about budget cuts and layoffs, saying they fear an impact on employee morale.

But Noxon said the 17 TRADOC Army posts are facing similar cuts.

"Post commanders are being told to eliminate non-essential travel, make maximum use of video conferencing, eliminate office furniture purchases and make maximum use of buildings," he said. Beyond that, it's largely up to White to decide what programs are cut.

The OMA is the largest, but not the only budget category slated for cuts.

Maintenance of family housing units is projected to be cut 19 percent, from $15 million to $13 million, documents show. The impact is being offset, officials said, by neighborhood renovation projects funded by other budget categories.

The operations budget for Forces Command units on post is slated to drop 37 percent, from $45 million to $33 million. The 3rd Brigade of the 24th Infantry Division, 34th Medical Battalion, 36th Engineer Group, Army Marksmanship Unit and 988th Military Police Company are those combat-ready units.

Between now and Oct. 1, unit commanders and White will be negotiating with Department of the Army and TRADOC officials to lessen the cuts. It may be late August before specific cuts are known.

"Last year, it was a similar situation initially," one budget analyst said. "But there is a lot of back and forth. When we asked for more last year, they gave it to us, but it may be worse this year."

Leuer, who was in White's position in 1987, said he sees no way to make such a massive cut without shutting down whole training functions or entire areas of the post.

"Unfortunately, your quality of training drops significantly," under such a plan, he said. "You get to a point of asking what am I doing for the soldiers."

'Chaplain of 505th' recalls brave men

By Jerry Rutledge
Patriot Editor

Back home in Huntsville, Ala., the Rev. George B. Woods goes through the everyday challenges of life as a parish minister.

But he says that's only a small part of his identity. For the surviving members of the original 505th Parachute Infantry Regiment, Woods is and will always be the "chaplain of the 505th."

Woods and other veterans of the regiment's World War II campaigns were honored Monday at a ceremony commemorating the 50th anniversary of the 505th's activation. The veterans dedicated a historic marker, on Eubanks Field, honoring the unit's activation.

Rev. Woods and other veterans of the regiment's World War II campaigns were honored Monday at a ceremony commemorating the 50th anniversary of the 505th's activation. The veterans dedicated a historic marker, on Eubanks Field, honoring the unit's activation.

Nearly a dozen veterans of the unit's battles in the European theater of World War II attended the commemoration. None were more moved by the occasion than Woods, who performed the benediction for the program and is the only chaplain to make four combat jumps during WWII.

"The 505th was an essential part of my life," Woods said. "The sense of brotherhood we had is one you never find in any other relationship. And having gone the entire World War II from Africa to Berlin with them, there is an identity there I have never forgotten. I feel it's the strongest identity in my life."

Woods said he jumped into combat zones because of a sense of duty. He wanted to be there with the troops in harm's way, and the troops in turn appreciated his presence.

"They were a brave men and a courageous men doing something new in combat which required a new kind of bravery and a new kind of courage," Woods said. "There was no kind of hesitation in them and so I had to give them the same kind of example myself. I think they recognized that and that's the reason why I have been so closely identified with them."

The 505th Parachute Infantry Regiment was activated on July 6, 1942. They formed in the "Frying Pan" area of Fort Benning, an area so named, said one 505th veteran, because "it was like jumping into one." Lt. Col. James M. Gavin was its first commander.

The regiment was assigned to the 82nd Airborne Division in February 1943. It was as a part of the highly decorated 82nd that the 505th made its biggest impact, making four combat jumps and seeing battle action in Sicily, Italy, France, Belgium, Holland and Germany. It participated in six major campaigns — Sicily, Naples-Foggia, Normandy, Ardennes, Rhineland and Central Europe.

George Jacobis says the World War II experiences are still constantly on his mind. He made three combat jumps — Sicily, Salerno and Normandy. Wounded and for two weeks a prisoner of war at Normandy before being liberated by Allied forces, he remained with the unit after the war ended.

"I'm very proud of having been a member (of the 505th) here," Jacobis said. "I went through the 38th class of jumpers here on the towers and it just makes me very proud — number one, that I lived through the war with minor injuries and, number two, that I was part of this unit."

Agents have seized array of war souvenirs

Probe continues at Benning

From staff, wire reports

FORT BRAGG, N.C. — The U.S. Customs Service inspected about half a million people and 2½ million tons of cargo within about three months after the Persian Gulf War, apparently looking for illegal souvenirs of the war against Iraq.

But it still was unable to find all the illegal weapons being smuggled into the country by military personnel who considered the weapons spoils of war.

The trophies federal agents did manage to find ranged from automatic rifles and pistols to large anti-aircraft guns. They included land mines, live spotting charges, 130 rounds of howitzer shells, unmarked containers of hazardous materials, compressed gases, night vision goggles, rifle scopes and radios.

Customs Service inspectors and military police have seized more than a thousand illegal weapons in the Persian Gulf and the United States since the war ended.

More than 1,125 other pieces of equipment also have been seized.

In the Southeast, agents have made 23 seizures or "detentions," mostly in North Carolina, South Carolina and Georgia, said Customs Service spokesman Michael Sheehan in Miami. A detention is made when someone is suspected of violating the law or lacks proper documents for items.

More than 500 weapons and explosives and 600 pieces of equipment were involved. Sheehan told The Fayetteville, N.C., Observer-Times that most were Iraqi items.

One such case centered on "allegedly captured Iraqi weapons" is still being investigated at Fort Benning, a spokesman said Tuesday. The case involves an enlisted soldier in the 3rd Brigade, 24th Infantry Division, according to Al Blanchard of the post public affairs office.

He said a "Field-Grade 'Article 32' Investigation (similar to a grand jury investigation in the civilian world) has not been completed."

That, means, basically that a field-grade officer — a major through colonel — "is assigned to look at the whole case, to make a recommendation to the brigade commander as to whether the suspect should be court martialed" or a lesser punishment handed down, or whether the allegations should be dismissed.

Blanchard said he knew of no other incidents involving Fort Benning soldiers, some 5,000 or more of whom were assigned to the Middle East During Desert Shield/Desert Storm.

Other weapons seizures have been made at mail centers in Jersey City, N.J., John F. Kennedy Airport in New York City, the Los Angeles-Long Beach Harbor, and in Seattle, Baltimore, Boston, Chicago, Dallas, Portland, Maine, and Mobile, Ala.

Punishment for those guilty of possessing illegal war trophies ranges from letters of reprimand and demotions to fines. Punishment could also include a prison sentence.

Marine Corps Lt. Col. Richard Zegar was detained in Saudi Arabia last year when Iraqi weapons were found on the truck he was in, military officials said.

Authorities seized 43 automatic rifles, seven rocket-propelled grenades, more than 1,200 rounds of ammunition, 37 AK-47 rifle magazines, one hand grenade, five 7.61mm machine guns and two 50-caliber machine guns.

Zegar, who was assigned to the 2nd Marine Aircraft Wing at Cherry Point, was court-martialed in September.

He was found guilty of keeping enemy weapons in violation of military orders, attempting to bring Iraqi weapons into the United States and stealing government property, a Marine Corps spokesman said.

3 indicted in alleged pro-war scheme

From wire reports

DENVER — A former U.S. ambassador to Bahrain and two others were indicted for allegedly secretly taking $7.7 million from Kuwait to promote U.S. intervention in the Persian Gulf prior to the Gulf War.

Former Ambassador Sam Zakhem, who unsuccessfully sought the Colorado GOP nomination for the U.S. Senate this year; William R. Kennedy Jr.; and Scott Stanley Jr., are named in the federal indictment, which was unsealed Tuesday.

Kennedy is a former owner of Conservative Digest and Stanley is a former Conservative Digest editor. Kennedy was also accused in a separate indictment Tuesday of helping run a scheme that benefited the Nicaraguan contras, among others.

They are accused of failing to inform the U.S. government they were acting as agents of Kuwait when they launched a publicity campaign to promote military action against Iraq.

It also charges them with diverting $5.7 million of the money they received from Kuwait for their personal profit and disguising the payments to avoid income tax.

According to the indictment, the three operated two businesses between Aug. 1, 1990, and June 30, 1991, in an effort to generate public support for military action against Iraq.

U.S. Attorney Michael Norton said the indictment alleged the three used a number of bank accounts and the two businesses to conceal the fact they were being paid by Kuwait to promote U.S. intervention against Iraq.

According to the indictment, the first business was called Coalition for America At Risk, or COFAR, described as a group of patriotic volunteers marshaling support for President Bush's policies in the Persian Gulf.

It said the three abandoned COFAR after allegations were made linking that organization with Kuwait, and they created a second organization called The Freedom Task Force, which was incorporated in Colorado.

No challenge too great for Ryan

Relishes them in her career and leisure

By Linda Bosley Dailey
Staff Writer

By Joe Maher/The Benning Patriot

Col. Louise Ryan likes a challenge.

"Hopping" flights — riding aboard military flights with space available for a passenger — is something of a hobby for Ryan when she travels either on duty or on leave. She enjoys the challenge of finding the military flights going her way and arranging connections to the flight that will ultimately get her to her destination.

And what many would consider a travel nightmare, Ryan finds an adventure. She once journeyed from Germany to Hawaii by flying "space available," as it's called.

Four days and six stops later, she arrived.

"I like the more challenging ones (trips)," said Ryan, chief of the department of nursing at Martin Army Community Hospital. "They have all been wonderful adventures." She adds that such trips provide the opportunity to meet interesting people as well as to exercise her planning and problem-solving abilities.

Those are skills Ryan enjoys putting to use on the job at Martin Army as well. A nationwide shortage of nurses, increasing competition between military and civilian employers for nurses and a recently imposed hiring freeze in the Army's Health Service Command provide Ryan with plenty of opportunity to put those abilities to use.

Working within those constraints — while trying to maintain appropriate staffing levels, provide opportunities for professional development and enhance communication between her department and others — is just another opportunity for Ryan to meet — and beat — a problem-solving challenge.

Ryan says she sometimes wishes she could be in two places at once, to better meet all the demands. "There aren't enough hours in the day," she said.

Her days are long and full — beginning about 7 a.m. when she meets with nursing supervisors before meeting with hospital commander Col. Vernon Spaulding and other hospital officials at 8 a.m.

At age 20, Ryan became a registered nurse upon graduating from a three-year diploma program in Evanston, Ill. "I always enjoyed taking care of people," she said. "I thought hospitals were absolutely fascinating places."

As part of her effort to improve communications, Ryan routinely visits the various wards to gather information and ideas from nurses that will not only improve her department, but the hospital and patient care, as well.

And Ryan doesn't hesitate when it's necessary to push for improvements. "I'm not afraid to confront people about important issues," she said.

The ability to confront people when necessary is something Ryan considers a strength. Helping other nurses discover their professional strengths and preferences is not only important to the morale of her employees, but also a pleasure for Ryan.

"I've always had a bent for psychology," she said. "I like the career counseling part (of my job) very much." People are most productive in the work that make them happiest, she said.

When she retires from the Army, Ryan is thinking about becoming a career counselor or consultant and perhaps getting a doctorate in psychology.

But that's six years away. It's been 14 years since Ryan, then a 36-year-old registered nurse with 16 years of experience behind her, joined the Army. The opportunities for professional development, as well as for travel, were too good to pass up.

And opportunities for nurses in the Army are even better now than they were then, Ryan said, citing sign-up bonuses and opportunities to further one's education as some examples of ways the Army tries to support its nurses.

Since 1978, Ryan has risen from a major to a colonel, from head nurse at an obstetrics/gynecology clinic to chief of nursing at Fort Benning's Martin Army Community Hospital. And the Army has sent her from Denver, to Honolulu, to Stuttgart, Germany, and now to Fort Benning.

She grew up in Chicago. At age 20, Ryan became a registered nurse upon graduating from three-year diploma program in Evanston, Ill. "I always enjoyed taking care of people," she said. "I thought hospitals were absolutely fascinating places."

She later attended the University of Wisconsin at Madison and received bachelor's and master's degrees in nursing.

Ryan is married. She and her husband, David, a social worker, are the parents of two. Their son, Christopher, is attending Army flight school at Fort Rucker, and their daughter, Laura, will be a freshman at the University of Florida this fall.

During her 16 years working in the civilian sector, Ryan held a variety of jobs — from serving as a nurse at children's camp (her first nursing job), to working with autistic children, to being a courier nurse aboard passenger trains operated by the Santa Fe Railroad.

While being a courier nurse didn't provide much professional challenge — she passed out medication to passengers and babysat their children while they went to dinner — it did provide other satisfaction. That job, she said, "took care of my wanderlust."

"I've always loved to travel," she said. In addition to traveling, Ryan enjoys sewing, decorating, raising Scottish terriers, planning educational programs for nurses and addressing groups on nursing issues.

Ryan enjoys putting her problem-solving skills to use on the job at Martin Army. A nationwide shortage of nurses, increasing competition between military and civilian employers for nurses and a recently imposed hiring freeze in the Army's Health Service Command provide Ryan with plenty of opportunity to put those abilities to use.

WW II 50TH ANNIVERSARY

Adolph Hitler changed his strategic plan for the Eastern Front 50 years ago this week. He designated Stalingrad as the objective for Army Group B, while pulling the 4th Panzer Army from the group to support an operation to the north. Hitler's ill-advised alterations actually slowed the German advance.

Here, according to research by the Military History Division at Fort Benning, were the top news stories of the week:

■ The Soviet High Command appointed Marshal Scemyom Timoshenko to command the new Stalingrad Front in an effort to slow the German advance that had reached Lisichansk and Kateminovka.

■ In North Africa, British artillery, previously dispersed and ineffective, concentrated fire on Field Marshal Erwin Rommel's advancing forces south of the Ruweisat Ridge, causing heavy losses.

■ In the Mediterranean, the HMS Eagle delivered 31 Spitfires to the island of Malta in an effort to provide relief for the British forces in North Africa.

■ At Fort Benning, Maj. Samuel Woodfill, once labeled the "Number One Soldier of the American Army" by Gen. John J. Pershing, addressed officer candidates at the 2nd Student Training Regiment. Woodfill had earned the Congressional Medal of Honor during World War I for silencing 19 German machine gunners in 15 minutes.

■ The Fort Benning Guidebook reported that President Franklin D. Roosevelt visited his retreat, known as the "Little White House" in Warm Springs, Ga. As part of his battle against polio, Roosevelt exercised and bathed in the naturally warm mineral water of the springs. Throughout 1942, the president toured Fort Benning, always expressing pleasure after inspecting the largest infantry training post under his command.

Cross made by POWs comes to Georgia

From wire reports

Abandoned on a hillside in the Philippines long ago, the cross is now a memorial to the American and Filipino POWs who died at Camp O'Donnel during World War II.

ANDERSONVILLE, Ga. — The Cross of Cement is finally home in Georgia, exactly 50 years after it was crudely built by American prisoners of war from a sack of cement supplied by their Japanese captors.

Abandoned on a hillside in the Philippines long ago, the cross is now a memorial to the American and Filipino POWs who died at Camp O'Donnel during World War II.

The cross will be housed in Andersonville National Historic Site's National Prisoner of War Museum, which is under construction.

At a solemn ceremony at the site's cemetery last weekend, surviving POWs gathered to remember their fallen comrades.

About 10,000 Americans and 70,000 Filipinos were captured by the Japanese on April 9, 1942. Those who endured the 63-mile Bataan Death March, with little water, no food and frequent beatings, were herded into a small enclosure that came to be known as O'Donnel.

One survivor, retired Col. John E. Olson, called the cross a "precious piece of history," honoring 1,565 Americans who died in the prison camp from April 18 to Nov. 2, 1942.

Malaria, dysentery, diphtheria and malnutrition soon claimed the lives of 50 POWs daily.

By late June, more than 1,200 Americans were buried on a hillside beyond a barbed wire fence and 15,000 Filipinos died, mostly of thirst.

"You just had to make up your mind that if anybody's going to go back, it's going to be me," said another survivor.

Alarmed at the mounting death toll, a Japanese supply sergeant gave the American and Filipino supply officers each a sack of cement to make, "a shrine for your 'shinda,' or dead," Olson said.

A handful of "feeble, unshaven, filthy Americans" struggled to carry the cross to an open space between graves, he said, comparing their toil to Jesus carrying his cross.

"It was almost Calvary in modern times," Olson said.

The inscription read "In Memory Of The American Dead, O'Donnel War Personnel Enclosure 1942."

"No one wanted to use the terms, 'Japanese' or 'prisoner,'" Olson recalled.

After the war, the cross sat on a hillside near the abandoned prison camp until it was airlifted to Georgia. POW groups wanted the cross at Andersonville because they often compare the two camps.

Andersonville was a prison camp for Union soldiers in the Civil War, in which poor conditions and disease killed thousands of POWs.

Shaping up a must for hiking vacation

From wire reports

By Joe Maher/The Benning Patriot

Experts recommend starting a fitness program two to three months before a hiking vacation.

The most scenic hike in the world won't mean beans if your muscles are screaming or your heart and lungs are on the verge of shutdown.

So you've decided to go on a hiking vacation and are having glorious visions of traipsing over beautiful terrains. You and the scenery, together, as one.

But before you slip on those hiking boots (and we mean hiking boots, not tennis or aerobic shoes), you want to make sure your body is ready for this kind of vacation. The most scenic hike in the world won't mean beans if your muscles are screaming or your heart and lungs are on the verge of shutdown.

Any athletics-oriented vacation — whether it's hiking, biking, skiing or whatever — calls for preparation. Not being in good condition can have repercussions ranging from sore muscles to total collapse.

First, you need to be in good cardiovascular shape. Good health does not necessarily equate with physical fitness. The lungs and heart must be able to endure rigorous exercise. Hiking, especially up and down (as on mountains), and at high altitudes, puts increased stress on the entire cardiovascular system. Regular aerobic exercise (including aerobics classes, jogging, running, brisk walking, and use of stair machines, stationary bikes and treadmills) is necessary for fitness.

Second, you need to strengthen the specific muscles that are going to be used. For a hiking trip, this includes the quadriceps (upper leg muscles), lower leg muscles and gluteal muscles (in the buttocks). Strengthening the back is also important, especially if you're going to be wearing a backpack.

And third, you need to be nutritionally conscientious. A diet high in complex carbohydrates will give you extra energy. (Good nutrition is important all the time, but it becomes essential before embarking on a trip that's going to make physical demands.)

Leaders of walking tours usually will tell their vacationers to work up to hiking 8 or 10 miles a day before the trip starts.

"I tell people to start a walking program at least two or three months in advance," says Susan Eckert, head of Evanston, Ill.-based Rainbow Adventures, which offers wilderness trips for women over 30.

"They need to be able to walk at least 8 miles at a good clip before we leave. . . . 3 or 4 miles up and down (hilly or mountainous) is the equivalent of 8 or 10 flat miles, so it's important to be able to do this."

Eckert tells of a woman who had not prepared, and gave out completely while on a hike in New Zealand. "She got to the point one day where she couldn't continue. My guide and I had to bring her down (a mountain) with her arms around our necks. It was dark, we missed out on our dinner, and needless to say, no one in the group was very happy with her."

Julie Snyder, walking-trips coordinator for California-based Backroads Touring Co., recommends combining a regular program of aerobic exercise along with hiking up to 10 miles daily before a trip. Her company has hiking trips in the Canadian Rockies and Switzerland as well as Vermont and northern California.

"If you're not in shape, you're going to get winded and tired, especially at high altitudes," she said. Although conditioning can be readily accomplished on your own, Snyder also suggested getting exercise recommendations from a sports trainer if a gym or sports center is nearby.

(The change from low to high altitude can be a problem even for very fit people. Because of this, most tour guides plan fewer miles and more rest stops on the first day or two of a trip.)

John Ford, assistant fitness manager at the Downtown Sports Club, Chicago, recommends working out on a stair machine, starting at 20 minutes and working up to 30 or more, for cardiovascular conditioning as well as strengthening the major muscle groups in the legs.

"It will also increase your endurance so you don't get so winded going up hills," he said. "You also want to do some leg extensions, leg curls and calf raises. These (exercises) strengthen connective tissues around the knees and ankles — if you slip on a rock, you want to make sure those ligaments are strong."

Ford also recommends abdominal crunches to strengthen back muscles, and he stresses good nutrition. "You want lots of carbs (carbohydrates, such as pasta and potatoes) and fruits and veggies, and lots of water, at least eight glasses a day. Maybe one chocolate chip cookie occasionally."

Your hiking boots also need conditioning. Tour leaders flinch at the sight of new shoes. Boots with ankle supports should be worn until they are comfortable; the newer lightweight boots break in much more quickly than heavy boots.

Amtrak plans Miami to LA line

From wire reports

Amtrak will introduce transcontinental service in April, extending the Los Angeles-to-New Orleans Sunset Limited to Miami.

Track improvements and modifications under way in Louisiana, Alabama, Mississippi and Florida will pave the way for the new routing, which will operate three times a week, the same as the existing Sunset Limited schedule. The trip will take about 58 hours and also cross through Arizona, New Mexico and Texas. The route will use Superliner coaches — double-deckers — and the train will be equipped with showers.

It will be the first time Superliners will be used regularly east of New Orleans; their height isn't suited to Eastern tunnels and underpasses.

Amtrak said the new service would be possible because of commitments by four states to fund track improvements. The only way to go coast to coast now is to change trains in New Orleans or Chicago.

Buna: The 1st battle in Pacific

During the early months of 1942, the Japanese were on the offensive everywhere in the Pacific Ocean area and their armies seemed invincible. On Feb. 15, 1942, Singapore fell. Within a month the Netherlands East Indies (now Indonesia) were conquered.

Al Garland

Then the Japanese shifted to the southwest. From Rabaul in New Britain, which had been occupied on Jan. 23, 1942, the Japanese High Command planned to launch a two-pronged drive to the south and east. One prong was aimed at southeastern New Guinea; the other was directed through the Solomon Islands to cut the Allied supply line from the U.S. to Australia.

Neither reached its objective. The first was halted as a result of the Battle of the Coral Sea (May 4-8, 1942). Three months later, the other Japanese thrust ended when the U.S. 1st Marine Division landed (Aug. 7, 1942) in the Solomons on Tulagi, Gavutu, Florida, and Guadalcanal.

The failure of their first attempt against New Guinea did not deter the Japanese from planning another attack to secure a landing area in Papua New Guinea from which their forces could attack Port Moresby, which they wanted to use as an invasion base because it was just 340 miles from Australia's Cape York Peninsula. They first occupied Lae and Salamaua in Papua New Guinea and in late July landed at Gona, Sanandanda, and Buna on the northwest coast. In mid-August troops from those three areas began pushing southward over the Owen Stanley mountain range.

By this time, U.S. and British political and military leaders had agreed to divide the world into areas of strategic responsibility and had established the Pacific Theater as an area of U.S. responsibility. The so-called middle area, which stretched from Singapore to the Mediterranean, was considered a British responsibility. The third area, Europe and the Atlantic, was to be jointly administered by the U.S. and Great Britain.

In turn, the U.S. had divided its Pacific Theater between two major commands. One was the Southwest Pacific Area with Gen. Douglas MacArthur as its commander; it included Australia, the Philippines, New Guinea, the Bismarck Archipelago, the Solomons west of Guadalcanal, and all of the Netherlands West Indies except Sumatra.

The other command was the Pacific Ocean Area and was turned over to Admiral Chester Nimitz. It was divided into the Central, North, and South Pacific Areas. (The Guadalcanal campaign was the responsibility of the South Pacific commander.)

On new Guinea, the Japanese fought their way across the mountains and descended the southern slopes to a point within 32 miles of Port Moresby. Here, the Australian defenders finally stopped the Japanese advance. The Japanese troops, by now half-starved and under relentless Allied air attack, began a slow retreat back over the mountains.

It was at this time that U.S. Army ground combat troops entered the fray. Two infantry regimental combat teams from the 32nd Infantry Division arrived in Port Moresby from their training areas in Australia. (The third, plus one from the 41st Infantry Division, would come over later.) The 32d Division, commanded by Maj. Gen. Edwin F. Harding, had been originally intended for Europe. It was a National Guard unit from Michigan and Wisconsin, and had reached Australia in April 1942; while there it had received some jungle warfare training. It was the first U.S. Army division to see combat in World War II.

The Japanese forces facing the Australians continued their slow retreat. To Gen. MacArthur, the Japanese high commanders seemed to be concentrating on the battle for Guadalcanal, so he ordered Harding to make a secret, wide envelopment to the east and attack the Japanese left flank in the Buna area. He believed such an operation would cut off the main Japanese force then facing the Australians. Speed, of course, was of the essence.

In late October and early November, the division's combat elements, minus several left behind to support the Australian effort against Sanandanda and Gona, began moving by air and sea to a point some 23 miles from Buna. By the evening of November 18, the U.S. infantrymen were closing on their objective and the division's leaders expected to end the campaign with one quick attack. Unfortunately, they had not taken into account the stubbornness of the 2,000 Japanese defenders or the difficult terrain and weather conditions their own troops would encounter.

It was not until Jan. 3, 1943, and then with the help of the Australians, that organized Japanese resistance in the Buna area was overcome. By this time, Harding and many of his original commanders had been relieved. Overall, the division had not done well. In fact, by the end, it was no longer a combat-ready unit. It should be pointed out that for every two men who were listed as battle casualties, five were put out of action from malaria or dengue fever.

Whatever the cost, and it had been high, the Japanese toe-hold in Papua New Guinea had been broken. Too, our soldiers had learned many important combat lessons that would stand them in good stead in the campaigns ahead. And with Guadalcanal secured in February 1943, MacArthur could now focus on conducting a more aggressive phase of operations.

The 32d Division? It was withdrawn to Australia where it was rehabilitated and underwent a comprehensive training program. It would not see combat again until January 1944.

Al Garland is former editor of Infantry magazine and writes occasional columns for The Benning Patriot.

Hitting the road

By Richard Thomason/The Benning Patriot

Lots of folks thought these old armored personnel carriers being loaded on railroad flat cars at Sand Hill last week were part of the equipment going with the 3rd Brigade, 24th Infantry Division, to the National Training Center. Not so, said a 3rd Brigade spokesman. These APCs are headed to an Army junk heap or for refurbishing, he said. The 3rd Brigade is carrying newer, better equipment like M1A1 Abrams tanks and the latest edition of the Bradley Fighting Vehicle. The brigade's soldiers will be deploying between July 28 and Aug.1.

Columbus College dean chosen for Harvard program

Dr. Arthur E. Justice Sr., dean of the School of Education at Columbus College, has been selected by Harvard University to participate in its July Institute of School Law.

As one of 75 invited participants from around the world, Justice will join other school law specialists in examining recent developments in school law and their impact on students, teachers and administrators.

Participating in the institute will be school board members, school administrators, attorneys whose practices involve schools, personnel from state departments of education, and other higher education specialists in school law; and the topics to be discussed include special education, student rights, equal opportunity, religion in the schools, and free speech issues.

A well-known educator in the Southeast as well as a recognized specialist in school law, Justice has served as a consultant to school boards in eight states as well as an expert witness in school law cases. Prior to his appointment at Columbus College in 1989, he served 12 years as the dean of the School of Education at the University of South Carolina Spartanburg.

He was an invited participant in the Harvard Graduate School of Education's Institute of Educational Management in 1979.

"I am looking forward to the institute," said Justice. "It has the reputation of being stimulating, timely, and exceedingly well presented," he added.

"The content and materials are meaningful, comprehensive, and up-to-date, and I am certain it will be of benefit to me and to my students at Columbus College."

Capt. Troy Wilson (r) accepts the unit flag from Lt. Col. Dwight Durham during the activation ceremony for the 63rd Engineer Company last week.

63rd Engineers taken off shelf for duty at Benning

By Jerry Rutledge
Patriot Editor

In an era when RIF (reduction in force) and drawdown are as prominent in Army conversations as bullets and guns, the activation of a unit is a big event.

Last week at Fort Benning's Engineer Field, the big event was the activation of the 63rd Engineer Company, Combat Support Equipment. The 63rd was officially welcomed to the post during a 35-minute ceremony. Col. Phillip Anderson, the commander of the 36th Engineer Group to which the 63rd will be attached said the activation was "very significant" as the military downsizes itself.

"What we're doing is restructuring the force to make sure we've got the right mix of combat, combat support and combat service support to meet our future contingencies," Anderson said. "The 63rd plays a key role in making sure that we have sufficient engineer equipment support to support the combined arms teamed on the battlefield."

Anderson added that the role of forces in the drawndown Army is still being decided.

"As result of our experiences in Desert Storm and as the result of a continuing analysis of what's in the best interests of our nation, the Army had decided what we need to retain in the force structure," he said. "I'm just delighted that the 63rd is one of the units they have decided to retain for the future."

The beginning of what is now the 63rd Engineer Company was in December 1942 when it was constituted in the Army as the 609th Engineer Light Equipment Company. It was activated in January 1943 at Fort Jackson, S.C., then served in World War II at Normandy, Northern France, and Central Europe. The company was inactivated after WWII in Germany, then underwent three separate activations and deactivations when needed over the next 40 years before its last deactivation in August 1988 at Fort Bragg, N.C. Orders for the reactivation came in November. The task of building an engineer company from nothing fell on the shoulders of Capt. Troy Wilson, the company's commanding officer. When Wilson took command, the company consisted of just one warrant officer, seven privates and himself. It now totals 123 soldiers.

"Like in the civilian world, anytime you try to put a company together from scratch, it's strenuous work," Wilson said. "We had to collect the nickel-and-dime stuff from office space to office equipment to soldiers and people."

White has hands full at Benning

Commander's many duties keep him on the run

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

When it was learned that Maj. Gen. Jerry A. White was to become post commander at Fort Benning, the word out of Fort Ord, Calif. — his old post — was that White was a 'hands-on' kind of guy, a stickler for detail for whom golf is a passion.

His game has obviously suffered at Fort Benning. White may make it to the Follow Me Golf Course on post once a month, employees at the golf course say.

His job keeps getting in the way.

The job's pace has been the general's biggest surprise since he moved into the top position at Benning in October. Maybe that's why he hits the floor running — literally — five mornings a week.

White is 55 and not slowing down, except for when he sidles up behind one of his Army units and joins in for a little run and other physical training at about 6 a.m. every work day he's on post.

The two silver stars on his battle dress uniform cap mark him clearly as the man in charge at Fort Benning. The cap shades sometimes-squinty, thousand-yard-stare eyes and hides a hairline that he doesn't have to worry about anymore — it's given up the fight and continues to retreat.

"It's important I'm visible out there," White said. "If you're not careful, you'll get too caught up in (being in) this office."

See White at one of the post's frequent ceremonies, his ample combat boots taking turns beating out the rhythm of the Infantry Center Band's marches, and he looks a little grandfatherly.

But make him mad and look out: The belt line hasn't slipped, and the eyes can turn hard. And when White suggests he might visit and "kick everybody's (behind) down there" he doesn't threaten to bring any troops to help him do the job.

Soldiers say he's a stickler for military decorum and dress and won't tolerate sloth in either.

Last week he talked about his jobs — the three hats he wears as Chief of Infantry, Fort Benning commander and Commandant of the Infantry School. White figures he spends maybe 60 percent of his time wearing the commandant's hat and sometimes worries over spending too much time in the office. "It's important I'm visible out there," he said. "If you're not careful, you'll get too caught up in (being in) this office."

By Joe Maher/The Benning Patriot

Maj. Gen. Jerry White came to Fort Benning for a stint as commander last October.

Now White's trying to spend three hours a morning "out in the field, with the troops" — when he's home, that is. The general has been gone a lot, tied up in discussions all over the country about the downsizing of the Army, the infantry's role in the country's future wars and how Fort Benning will go about training the foot soldier of the future.

The talks with other brass include big-scale items like doctrine and strategy — will the old AirLand Battle Doctrine be sufficient for future wars?

How must strategy change as the U.S. shifts from a "forward-positioned" defense force in Europe to a "power-projected force" that's more home-bound? The effort of these discussions is to "mold the Army of the future through some intellectual change."

When the new battle concept is in place, look for it to be tested in something almost as impressive as the "Louisiana Maneuvers" that involved the biggest Army maneuvers in the last, desperate push to get ready for World War II, White suggests.

"I'm supposed to look at the infantry, how it's to be organized and trained," White said, with the infantry scheduled to shrink from some 70,000 troops at present to 48,000 by 1995. "If we're going to be a small Army, we'd better be good, and I'm very optimistic we will be," he said.

Much of what the infantry will do in future conflicts, how it will be done and how the infantry will fight with the heavier, armored forces, will be worked out in a new Battle Lab — called the Infantry Fighting Center. The IFC is already in the embryonic stages at Fort Benning and scheduled to grow a lot more and apparently swiftly.

That will involve computers and people and "a lot more simulation," White said, including integrating infantry battle scenarios with those being put together by armor units elsewhere via computer links. BattleLab activities will include keeping up with developing equipment, "to be sure we don't have any gold watches (expensive stuff that doesn't work or isn't needed, apparently) out there."

White said the old armor-infantry fights over manpower and budgets will disappear or at least diminish as cooperation becomes the key. He might have a hand in shoving the old fusses into the past, since a 'good friend' — Maj. Gen. Paul E. Funk — became chief of armor and commander of the armor school at Fort Knox, Ky., on Monday.

Look for more joint armor-infantry exercises at the National Training Center at Fort Irwin, Calif.

More changes the general suggests: Increased involvement in the active Army — and Fort Benning — in training National Guard troops. Some of that starts here next month with Operation Bold Shift, which brings guard units from various states to the local post for two-week training camps.

White's biggest surprise during his tenure to date? "I suppose what surprised most was . . . how much busier I am in this job than I was as a division commander," he said. He came here in October from Fort Ord, Calif., where he was post commander and commander of the 7th Infantry Division.

A bit of philosophy?

"My philosophy, and I guess I've had it a long time, but it's more important right now than ever before: My focus is on soldiers and taking care of soldiers, because if we over-focus on equipment and technology, those quality soldiers will get out of the Army," White said.

Maj. Gen. Jerry A. White

Job: Chief of Infantry, Fort Benning commander, commandant of the U.S. Army Infantry School.

Age: 55.

Hometown: Raven Rock, West Va.

Columbus moves to land DOD center

Accounting facility would pump jobs into area

By Jim Poole
Business Editor

If Columbus lands a Department of Defense accounting center, the face and the pace of the city will change. While that's a big if, the first stage in landing such a center has been completed.

In June, the Columbus Chamber of Commerce submitted a proposal to the Department of Defense after negotiations with the state of Georgia led to agreements on worker training and financing of an office building that would make the project feasible.

Columbus is one of more than 200 cities nationwide competing to host centers. The Defense Department plans to open three to five centers, employing 4,000 to 7,000 people each.

Columbus' proposal calls for a high-rise structure with a parking garage to be built on the old City Mills site, overlooking the Chattahoochee River at 18th Street and First Avenue. The site is in the city's long-range plans for riverfront development.

The Defense Department's accounting functions now are done at five Defense Finance Accounting Service (DFAS) centers across the country and at military installations around the world. Defense Finance Accounting Service operational centers are in Cleveland and Columbus, Ohio, Denver, Indianapolis and Kansas City.

In March, the Defense Department said it would consolidate those functions into three to five centers. It asked cities across the country to compete for the centers.

"The Department of Defense determined that the most efficient way to run its finance and accounting functions is to consolidate them into a limited number of sites running on a standard system," said Jean Marie Ward, Defense Department spokeswoman. "When they started adding up the numbers, it occurred to them that they did not have the number of existing facilities capable of sustaining the numbers they were looking at. So they determined they needed larger, consolidated sites."

On March 2, the Defense Department issued invitations for proposals.

"That basically said, 'Show us why DOD and DFAS should place one of these centers in your community.' We are most interested in the lowest potential cost, but other factors are important — the local labor force, transportation, new or newly renovated space."

The Defense Department will rank the proposals, with cost being the most important factor.

In essence, the Defense Department is looking for a cost-free building and land with a number of amenities, including on-site child care and training for employees. The department, in return, would bring in jobs and workers.

In essence, the department is looking for a cost-free building and land with a number of amenities, including on-site child care and training for employees.

The Defense Department, in return, would bring in jobs and workers.

Under the most likely scenario, the state would own the facilities and lease them to the federal government.

Through the Department of Industry, Trade and Tourism, the state of Georgia has tentatively committed to two elements that are essential in pulling off the project, and that were pivotal in Columbus even submitting a proposal.

First was a state commitment to provide training for the workers. Second is a guarantee that the state would issue bonds to finance construction.

"The state had to commit that if they chose a Georgia location that it would provide the bonds for financing the building," said F. Michael Gaymon, president of the Columbus Chamber of Commerce. "They did make that commitment, subject to legislature approval. Without the financing we didn't have a deal."

Should the Defense Department opt for a 7,000-employee complex, it would involve roughly 1 million square feet of office space at a cost of about $70 million. In perspective, that equals the amount of office space now in Columbus. A 4,000-employee complex would require 500,000-600,000 square feet of space.

And Defense Department specifications call for a facility complete with auditoriums, day care areas and a fitness center, along with offices.

While Columbus' proposal labels the City Mills site as the primary location, the city has said the center could be built elsewhere and be a campus-style complex, rather than a high-rise. Such a design would require about 150 acres of land.

"We expect them to come back when you get on the short list to be able to see if there is a better deal that would work for us and them," Gaymon, said. "Then we would be able to say we can do better."

Columbus submitted a 40-page, inch-thick proposal to the Defense Department on June 1. A task force is evaluating over 200 proposals. Meanwhile, Gaymon is optimistic about Columbus' chances of landing the mammoth deal.

"We start out sometimes with odds greater than that. I think we've got a good chance to be on a much shorter list," he said. "Then it's going to get down to, I think, just pure, plain politics. It'll be 'We're going to put seven centers somewhere and who can muster up the greatest political influence' to try to get the decision made to have it located here versus a San Antonio, South Carolina or somewhere else."

But Ward said the Defense Department wants to keep politics out of the selection process.

"We have tried to make this process as apolitical as possible. In developing the criteria, we worked for a level playing field," she said.

A "short list" of possible locations will be culled by late November, after the presidential election, and selection of the sites will come in March 1993 to coincide with the Secretary of Defense's recommendations to the Base Closure Commission, Ward said.

Gaymon put the project in perspective.

"We had a net gain of about 10,000 jobs from 1980 to 1990. So within a two- to three-year time we'd have gained 40 percent of what we did over a 10-year time," he said.

He said Columbus could handle that type of explosive growth.

"They will phase it in at about 1,500 jobs a year with about 15 percent of the workers transferring from other DOD centers," he said.

"But right now, we're in a waiting game."

Religious education courses set

The Religious Education Center will be conducting two religious education courses beginning this fall.

These programs, sponsored through the Department of the Army Chief of Chaplains' Office, are designed so that, if an individual begins the program here but is transferred before completing it, he or she may join another group at another post and continue his or her studies.

The two courses are Religious Education and Pastoral Studies. This will be a program in which the student will take 10 three-hour courses, with home study and one class per week.

One course, offered by Loyola University in New Orleans, can lead to two different master's degrees, or can be taken for a certificate instead of a degree. The other program, offered by Defiance College in Defiance, Ohio, will produce a bachelor's degree in Religious Education. This program may also be taken for an associate's degree or for a certificate.

For additional information, or to indicate an interest in either of the programs, contact Bill Putman at the Religious Education Center, 545-2366 or 545-4715.

PRE-BAPTISM CLASS: A pre-baptism class will be Sunday, Aug. 9 and Aug. 30 at 1 p.m. at the Religious Education Center, building 229.

All parents who wish to have their child or children baptized in the Catholic church are required to attend pre-baptismal instruction.

To register, call 545-2771.

CHRISTIAN MILITARY FELLOWSHIP: Meetings will resume Aug. 14. For more information, call 689-6090 or 545-2050.

COUNCIL OF CATHOLIC WOMEN: The Military Council of Catholic Women will take a summer break but will resume in the fall. Bible study will also resume in the fall.

Chaplains celebrating their 217th year

From wire reports

The Chaplains' Corps marks its 217th anniversary on Wednesday.

Anniversaries are believed by some to be a time of remembering beginnings, reaffirming purpose and celebrating common history.

Chaplains and chaplain assistants serve to provide for the spiritual needs of soldiers and their families. They are on the battlefields, in motor pools, in classrooms, by hospital beds, in chapels, beside prison cells and in administrative offices.

The Army chaplain and the chaplain assistant form the unit ministry team and are responsible for providing a comprehensive religious support program. The chaplain is the religious leader of the team. The assistant is specially trained to assist the chaplain in the religious support mission.

The title "chaplain" connotes compassion. The term comes from the legend of a fourth century soldier named Martin of Tours.

The legend describes how Martin, moved with compassion, split his own cloak in order to provide covering for a shivering beggar. This act of generosity resulted in a vision that culminated in Martin's giving his life in service of the church.

In later years, after Martin had become patron saint of France, his cloak was considered a sacred relic and was carried into battle by French kings.

The officer in charge of this sacred relic, the "cappa" or "cappella," as the cloak was called in Latin, was given the French title "chaplain" — from which came the English word "chaplain."

The unit ministry team adheres to the motto: "Pro Deo et Patria" (For God and Country) emblazoned on the U.S. Army Chaplains' official seal.

Framed in gold, the sky-blue, round seal has a white dove of peace hovering in radiance over an open book on which are presented a Christian cross and two tablets of the Commandments with the Star of David.

Just above the dove is the year 1775, when the chaplains first took to the field of battle beside their minuteman parishioners and below the book, the motto.

Study: Genetic work impinges on life's meaning

From wire reports

NEW YORK — Genetic engineering has profound religious implications, touching on the "nature of life" itself, says a new study, the most extensive yet undertaken by a church body in conjunction with scientists and other experts.

"The food we eat, the health care we receive, our biological traits and the environment in which we live are all affected by research and developments in genetic science," according to the study.

The report was drawn up by a Genetic Science Task Force headed by the Rev. Kenneth L. Carder of Knoxville, Tenn., and approved for churchwide educational use by last May's governing conference of the United Methodist Church.

Some "very serious ethical and theological questions" are involved, Carder said in an interview. He said findings could even shake up the Judeo-Christian concept of human sin.

If it is found that "freedom of choice is affected and behavior labeled sin is genetically determined, we would have to rethink our understanding of sin," he said.

He noted indications that some failings, such as alcoholism, may have such origins, and there is similar, still inconclusive evidence about homosexuality.

"It may very well turn out to be from a genetic factor," he said.

Carder, 51, active in science-religion dialogue, said the church study was used last October in a national conference of scientists, theologians, ethicists and lawyers at the Oak Ridge Center for Scientific Research.

The study was drawn up in more than three years of work by scholars in religion, genetics, law, agriculture and economics, including hearings around the country and about 400 written suggestions.

"Genetic developments in medicine and agriculture promise to alter the very nature of society, the natural environment and even human nature," the report says.

It says the potential impact on human integrity and creation itself can either promote or thwart "aspects of the divine purpose."

Genes in cells now are being altered "in plants and animals, even humans, in order to correct disorders or to introduce more desirable characteristics," the report notes.

It says that in undertaking the Human Genome Project to map the estimated 100,000 human genes "genetic science crosses new frontiers as it explores the essence of life."

The implications "force us to examine, as never before, the meaning of life, our understanding of ourselves as humans, and our proper role in God's creation."

The study insists on preserving genetic diversity, including the individually unique, often baffling mix of drawbacks and talents that make up persons in which difficulties may be the handmaiden of greatness.

"The complexity of human beings is more than their genetic makeup," Carder said. "One thing we want to resist is reducing the human to a mechanistic view, a machine with interchangeable parts.

"We're very complex beings, social, spiritual and psychological, as well as genetic, all interrelated."

Shakespeare Festival aims to make you laugh and cry

From staff reports

Alabama Shakespeare Festival artistic director Kent Thompson announced the 1992-93 ASF season lineup, which includes comedies and great American classics.

"We've expanded our performance calendar so that we can keep the theater open longer next year," Thompson said. "Also, we've staggered the openings of the two theaters to draw larger audiences so opening nights. In 1992-93, ASF will open all productions on Friday nights."

The season also marks the continuation of ASF's commitment to produce all of William Shakespeare's English history cycle of plays (begun in 1992 with "Richard II") with "Henry IV, Parts 1 and 2." England's Royal Shakespeare Company is the only other theater to have ever produced all of the English history plays chronologically, which they did in 1964 to celebrate Shakespeare's 400th birthday.

The season begins with the recent Broadway hit "I Hate Hamlet" in the Octagon Nov. 3-Dec. 13. A New York apartment with medieval decor, a frustratingly chaste girlfriend, an offer to play Hamlet in Central Park and the ghost of John Barrymore — no wonder young TV star Andrew Rally is reconsidering his urge to try the stage. A hilarious look at a classic, a legend and today's entertainment biz.

On the Festival Stage Nov. 10-Dec. 27, ASF presents the Tony Award-winning musical "Big River," based on Mark Twain's world-famous story of Huckleberry Finn. Two runaways, Huck and his friend, the slave Jim, have the adventure of a lifetime rafting down the Mississippi where they encounter storms, steamboats and scalawags. Full of side-splitting fun and rollicking song-and-dance numbers, "Big River" is a rare treat for the entire family.

In the Octagon Jan. 5-Feb. 21 is the powerful and moving American drama "A Raisin in the Sun." Cramped in a too-tiny Chicago apartment with menial jobs, the Younger family dreams and plans of better things. The first Broadway award-winner for an African American playwright, as timely today as in 1958.

Thornton Wilder's classic drama "Our Town" will run Jan. 12-Feb. 7 on the Festival Stage — the pure Americana of 1901 in Grover's Corners, N.H., as seen by George and Emily's young love.

The ASF repertory season begins in March with Bernard Shaw's famous "Heartbreak House," March 9-July 10 in the Octagon. A country house explodes with self-discovery — and 30 pounds of dynamite.

Shakespeare's most fanciful and fun-loving comedy, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" runs March 16-July 10 on the Festival Stage. Love is in the air and mischief in the works when Puck and the fairies decide to help four young lovers untangle their romantic problems.

A new play to be announced will be scheduled for March 30-July 11 in the Octagon.

The continuation of Shakespeare's English history cycle continues with "Henry IV, Part 1" on the Festival Stage April 6-July 11. Sir John Falstaff leads Prince Hall into riots and robberies from the tavern and the Percy family foments rebellion among the nobles as King Henry tries to rule an unruly kingdom.

"Henry IV, Part 2" will be presented in the Octagon May 25-July 10. The rebellion is crushed, but King Henry's imminent death brings on a greater crisis for England — what kind of king will Prince Hal, tutored by the riotous Falstaff, prove to be?

Two men named Alexandre Dumas: The father womanizes and sensationalizes a historical novel about three musketeers, while his son comes to his own tragic masterpiece the hard way — by living it in "Dumas." John MacNicholas' new comedy about the lives and loves of the famous French authors runs on the Festival Stage June 1-July 10.

New subscriptions are available now for the 1992-93 season. There are seven subscription packages available to see 10 plays. "Preview" costs $100 for pre-opening Tuesday-Thursday evenings. "Swan" is $110 for Sunday, Tuesday and Wednesday evenings. "Rose" is $130 for Thursday evening and Saturday-Sunday matinees. "Traveler" is $150 for 10 plays in four weekends. "Globe" is $160 for Friday-Saturday evenings (other than opening nights). "Opening" is $160 for Friday night openings with complimentary champagne and admission to cast parties. "FlexTix" is $180 for 10 plays on a seat availability basis.

Single tickets go on sale Sept. 21. Group discounts are available by calling (205) 272-1640.

Vagabond puppeteers to perform at the Springer

From staff reports

From California to Virginia, from the Bahamas to Saudi Arabia, the puppeteers of the world-famous Vagabond Marionettes Puppet Theater have enthralled children for 26 years with presentations of international folk stories and traditional fairy tales.

This summer, the group will open the Springer Opera House Children's Theater season with the Grimm Brothers' classic "Sleeping Beauty" on the Springer Main Stage July 31-Aug. 1 for three daytime performances.

The Vagabond production of "Sleeping Beauty" is unique in its use of rare Sicilian marionettes which includes a dazzling, fire-breathing, three-headed dragon and as well as traditional hand-carved marionettes. Each Vagabond puppeteer is a skilled artisan as well as an accomplished performer. Combining artistic skills such as sculpting, woodcarving, painting and costuming, the puppeteers contribute to the creation of the marionettes in addition to the performance of all shows.

The company's adaptation of "Sleeping Beauty" is most closely related to the first version of the fairy tale which appeared in France in the mid-17th century, relating the story from the Prince's point of view.

As part of his lessons, Prince George's teacher, Magus, tells the young man of the plight of a beautiful princess who was cursed by the wicked Grendal and has been asleep for 100 years. Armed with a magical sword, the Prince rides off in search of the girl. A vine-covered palace, a fire-breathing dragon and the wicked Raven are no match for the valiant prince who awakens the princess with a kiss and they rule their separate kingdoms together — you guessed it — happily ever after.

Performances of "Sleeping Beauty" will be presented at the Springer Opera House Main Stage at 10 a.m. and 2 p.m. July 31 and 2 p.m. Aug. 1. Tickets are $5, $4 for children.

Reservations may be made by calling the Springer box office at starting Tuesday. Season tickets for the entire Springer Children's Series, which includes "Sleeping Beauty," "Babes in Toyland" and "Winnie the Pooh," are still available for $16 before July 31.

For more information, call 324-5714.

College hosting final concert of the season

From staff reports

The final concert in the Southeastern Music Center Festival will be Saturday at 7:30 p.m. in the Columbus College Fine Arts Hall Auditorium under the direction of W. Sande MacMorran and will feature the 1992 Southeastern Music Center Concerto Competition winners.

MacMorran, the associate conductor of the Knoxville Symphony and conductor of the Knoxville Youth Orchestra, will be making his first concert appearance at the SMC. He has appeared as a guest conductor of the Appalachian Ballet and the Cincinnati Ballet. MacMorran is also a member of the music faculty of the University of Tennessee where he is tuba teacher and conductor of the University Opera Theater. He is a former member of the U.S. Army Band and was a founding member of the Army Brass Quintet.

MacMorran will prepare the orchestra to accompany the winners of the concerto competition. The 1992 competition winners are hornist Angie Jenkins, cellist Moises Molina, flutist Melissa Knight and violinist Hilarie Harp. Jenkins and Harp are students at the University of Alabama and Molina and Knight recently graduated from Florida State University.

This year, there were 21 students who competed for the honor of performing solos with the orchestra. The 1992 panel of judges were Col. Hal Gibson, former conductor of the Army Field Band and Columbus College Wind Ensemble; Lynn Whiddon, violin teacher and member of the Columbus Symphony Orchestra and Joseph Stevenson, chairman of the music department of Auburn University.

Tickets are $7; $10 for families. For more information, call 568-2465.

4 chosen for All-Army tryouts

From staff reports

When Larry Wesley says Lana Alexander is a good "all-around" player he means it literally. Alexander plays all-around — virtually every position on the diamond.

"She's played second base for me, third base, in the outfield — that shows how fast she is — and catcher. She even played a little catcher," said Wesley, the coach of the unbeaten (14-0) team that Alexander plays for. "She's a good all-around player. Lana's definitely one of the best around here."

Obviously the judges making selections for the All-Army team agreed. Alexander was one of four soldiers selected from Fort Benning to participate in the All-Army team tryouts.

The other players moving on in the tryout system are Spc. Brenda Shavers, Pvt. Pamela Yerkovich and Staff Sgt. Terence Holiman. The final tryout will be held at Fort Indiangaptown in Maryland later this month..

For her part, Alexander says she has no real preference as far as positions go. "I like to play wherever the action is," said Alexander. "If it's a team that hits the ball on a ground a lot, I like to play on the infield."

Yerkovich says she feels honored by her selection for the tryouts. "I just hope I go up there and make Fort Benning and my unit proud," she said. "I'm just going to try my best. That's what I'm going to do."

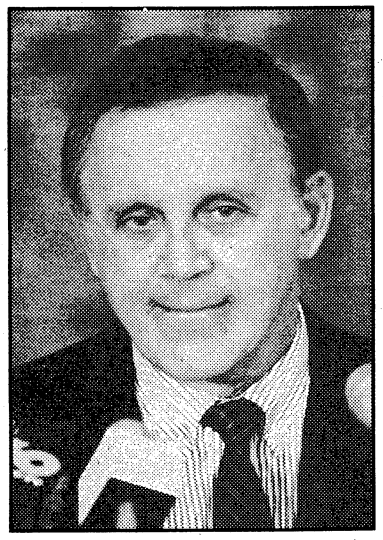
Rudman says smaller Army must maintain its quality

By Jerry Rutledge
Patriot Editor

Tighter dollars make a smaller, more economical military a fact of life, says U.S. Sen. Warren B. Rudman (R-N.H.), but it's up to Congress to ensure that the reduction in force doesn't turn into a reduction in quality.

"I've served on the (Senate) Defense Appropriations Subcommittee for a dozen years and nothing has changed my basic belief that the most important thing we have in our armed forces is our people," says Rudman, who will accept the 1992 Doughboy Award tonight at the Fort Benning Officers Club. The Doughboy Award, a chrome-plated World War I helmet, is given to an individual for outstanding contributions to the infantry.



Sen. Warren Rudman of New Hampshire will receive the 1992 Doughboy Award tonight at the Fort Benning Officers Club.

"I do not think we can ever allow ourselves to go back to the situation we had when I fought in Korea or what we had post-Vietnam," he said. "We had a 'hollow' army. If we're going to be smaller, so be it. But we had better be well-trained, well-equipped with first-rate people. That's the essential — to have good people."

Rudman says despite budget concerns, the armed forces must continue to pay people well and enhance the quality of family life for the soldier. "If the future means a smaller army, that's where we're headed, but it better be good," Rudman said.

The senator says any additional cuts in the defense budget should be in line with plans made by the Joint Chiefs of Staff. "I will fight for that in the coming months here in the Congress," he said in a telephone interview this week. "We don't want any deeper cuts, especially in personnel."

Rudman does not believe the role of the United States in world affairs will diminish.

"I think if there is a major crisis in the world that threatens the world's economy or the essential freedom of some part of the world, we will respond," he says. "Although we may not have to go it alone (in the future). I think if a Korea happened in 1992, we would have a true United Nations force. Even though Desert Storm was predominately U.S., there was certainly a much higher percentage of United Nations forces involved in Desert Storm than you had in the Korean War that, after all, was a United Nations effort.

"I believe we will have greater participation, but to a large extent I see the United States still in the lead because we are without doubt the strongest, most powerful nation in the world."

To say that Rudman has warm feelings for Fort Benning and Columbus would be quite accurate. His time at Benning in the Infantry Officers Basic Course — the summer of 1952 — was one of the hottest on record in the Chattahoochee Valley.

"I believe at that time it was the hottest," says Rudman. "My memories of Fort Benning are vivid. I lived down near the parachute towers. It was intensive training, extraordinarily difficult physically and mentally and very stimulating. And I might add, based on my subsequent experiences as a company commander in Korea, very worthwhile."

Rudman served in the 38th Infantry Regiment of the 2nd Infantry Division during Korea and was awarded the Bronze Star and the Combat Infantryman Badge.

34th Medical puts its colors away, fades into sunset

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

The 34th Medical Battalion's colors, its battle streamers stirring in the early morning breeze, were marched off into retirement last week at Fort Benning.

The 34th went out of business 50 years and a day (July 16) after it was first activated, a victim of force reduction moves and changes in how medical units will be put together for the next war.

The 34th Medical Battalion saw action in World War II and Korea in addition to Iraq.

Soldiers of the 34th treated hundreds of Iraqi prisoners and bandaged and rushed to hospitals the injured Americans of the 18th Airborne Corps in the Persian Gulf War, often while the bullets were still flying. On its deactivation day there were tears in the eyes of a few of these battle-toughened soldiers.

Maj. Gen. Jerry White, the Fort Benning commander, saluted them — and the hundreds who had already departed for new duties by the time the ceremony started. He cited the unit's "exceptional devotion to duty, frequent heroic acts and total superior performance which clearly set it above other units" in the Middle East in Desert Shield/Desert Storm. "And that is what service to your country is all about," he said. The unit saw action in World War II and Korea in addition to Iraq. Some of its units will survive as parts of other outfits, a crowd of several hundred people at the ceremony was told.

Col. Frank Novier, the 34th's last commander, is headed to the Army War College at Carlisle Barracks, Pa. Several of the battalion's subordinate units will remain at Fort Benning, assigned to the 36th Engineer Group in the future.

But the 5th Medical Detachment, along with the 261st — both of which were dispensary units — are history, along with the battalion headquarters and its staff. Those units going out of business will mean a loss of some 20 soldier slots at Benning, said post spokesman Al Blanchard.

The 498th Air Ambulance Co., previously split between Benning, Fort Jackson, S.C., and Fort Stewart, will now be headquartered here. That will mean an additional two UH-60 Blackhawk helicopters and a total of 15 stationed here, Blanchard said. The company is switching from Hueys to Blackhawks.

The 690th Wheeled Ambulance Co. is to remain here and will pick up 26 additional soldiers and four more vehicles under a reorganization plan expected to be in place by mid-September, Blanchard said.

The 2nd Mobile Army Surgical Hospital, also attached to the 36th Engineers, will be reorganized and will probably have fewer hospital beds in the future.

Those changes are scheduled to be in place by mid-December 1993. The moves will convert 2nd MASH to a mini-MASH with its present strength of 25 officers and 88 enlisted soldiers, Blanchard said.

House panel approves $7.5 billion for war, other costs

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — A House panel voted Tuesday to spend $7.5 billion to pay off what lawmakers believe are the final bills of the Persian Gulf War and pump extra funds into a collection of social programs.

The biggest chunk of the measure — $5.2 billion — would go toward paying costs left over from the war against Iraq. These include separation payments for soldiers, repair and maintenance of equipment, and the costs of keeping troops in the gulf.

The measure was approved on a voice vote by the House Appropriations Committee. The full House is expected to vote today on the bill.

To pay the war bills, lawmakers would spend the final $3 billion of the $53.8 billion that Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Japan and other U.S. allies contributed in 1990 and 1991 to the war effort.

The remaining $2.2 billion would come from $15 billion in taxpayers' money that Congress and President Bush set aside last year to pay the war's costs.

The measure approved Tuesday would return the unspent $12.5 billion portion of that fund to the Treasury.

Overall, the Defense Department has estimated the total cost of the war and the buildup that preceded it at $61.1 billion — about 90 percent of which was covered by foreign contributions.

The legislation also contains $3.4 million for the Department of Defense to complete an investigation into the Tailhook sexual harassment scandal. Last September, 26 women — half of them Navy officers — were allegedly forced to walk a gantlet of groping male officers in a Las Vegas hotel hallway.

Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., who chairs the appropriations panel's defense subcommittee, said the committee provided the extra money so military officials will "not give me excuses that it will take five or six months."

He said that with the money, the probe should be completed within two months.

Crash of Osprey clouds aircraft's future

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — The latest crash of the experimental tilt-rotor V-22 "raises serious questions" about the future of the aircraft, a spokesman for Defense Secretary Dick Cheney argued on Tuesday.

Three Marines and four civilians died Monday afternoon when a prototype plunged into the Potomac River while trying to land at the Marine Air Station at Quantico, Va.

Pending the results of an investigation into the incident, the four remaining V-22 prototypes have been grounded, Williams said. In all, six were to have been built.

Defense Secretary Dick Cheney has fought the program since 1989, arguing the V-22 — which would have cost nearly $30 billion if a full complement of 500 aircraft had been purchased — is too expensive amid current budget constraints.

Cheney "still does not think that the department can afford to move on to production on the V-22," Pentagon spokesman Pete Williams said.

"Yesterday's crash raises serious questions about the V-22 program, and significantly complicates our ability to proceed . . . until we know more about what happened," Williams said at a Pentagon briefing.

The spokesman noted that Cheney has agreed to seek a compromise with congressional supporters of the aircraft by agreeing to release $1.5 billion for its development, but that he also wants the military to look at funding a regular helicopter for the Marine Corps at the same time.

Defense Secretary Dick Cheney has fought the program since 1989, arguing the V-22 — which would have cost nearly $30 billion if a full complement of 500 aircraft had been purchased — is too expensive amid current budget constraints.

Earlier in the day, Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Sam Nunn, D-Ga., said the crash will at least slow down the program while investigators determine the cause and correct problems.

But Nunn defended the aircraft, saying, "I don't think it has an effect on the concept. I don't think anyone is saying the technology won't work."

The Marine Corps wants the V-22 to replace an aging fleet of CH-46 helicopters. They would ferry about 20 troops equipped for combat from ship to shore.

The experimental aircraft, known as the Osprey, has twin rotors that allow it to fly like an airplane at speeds of 300 miles per hour, then land without a runway like a helicopter.

The Pentagon identified the military personnel aboard the aircraft as: Maj. Brian J. James, 34, copilot, Baltimore County, Md.; Master Gunnery Sgt. Gary Leader, 40, maintenance chief, Milwaukee, Wis.; and Gunnery Sgt. Sean P. Joyce, 32, a mechanic, San Francisco, Calif.

The civilians aboard the aircraft — employees of the contractor Boeing Helicopters — were identified as: Pat Sullivan, 43, pilot, Aston, Pa.; Bob Rayburn, 34, test director, Newark, Del.; Tony Stecyk, 36, crew chief, Lester, Pa., and Gerry Mayan, 30, instrumentation engineer, Smyrna, Del., the Pentagon said.

Williams said four bodies had been seen through the windows of the submerged fuselage, and a recovery operation was scheduled to begin Wednesday.

GE enters plea of guilty in Pentagon fraud case

From wire reports

CINCINNATI — General Electric Co. Wednesday pleaded guilty to criminal charges of defrauding the Pentagon and the Israeli Defense Ministry, and agreed to pay $69 million in a settlement.

The company was accused of filing false claims totaling more than $40 million. It pleaded guilty to defrauding $26.5 million.

Prosecutors also alleged that GE gave Israeli Air Force General Rami Dotan $7.9 million to influence decisions on jet fighter engine contracts.

The company was charged with one count each of conspiracy, submitting false claims, money laundering and failure to keep accurate accounting records.

As part of a plea agreement, GE will pay $59.5 million to settle a U.S. Justice Department suit against the company. U.S. District Judge Carl Rubin also fined the company $9.5 million.

U.S. Attorney D. Michael Crites said at a news conference the case was the largest prosecuted in the government's foreign military aid program. He also said it was the first time a defense contractor was charged under the Money Laundering Control Act of 1986.

Crites said although the case against the company was settled, individuals were still under investigation. He would not identify them.

Roger Witten, a lawyer for General Electric, said the company cooperated fully with the government since the charges were filed in December 1990. "GE . . . has done its utmost to do the right thing," Witten told the judge.

Gulf War vets insist they're sick

Military says their problems stress-related

By Ed Timms and Steve McGonigle
Dallas Morning News

DALLAS — Gary Zuspann, a former Navy petty officer, has difficulty in breathing and is so weak that he can barely walk to the back gate of his home in nearby Euless, Texas.

Marine Capt. David Fournier used to run 3 miles a day and work out with weights. Then he suffered congestive heart failure. He still endures excruciating pain in the joints of his fingers, wrists and in one foot.

Army Sgt. Greg Wolf has urinary tract problems and sometimes is so tired that he can barely hold up his head. His muscles, he said, "are just Jello."

They are among dozens of Persian Gulf War veterans who are suffering from illnesses that have defied diagnosis.

Many complain of chronic fatigue, depression and pain in their joints or muscles. Some have seen their hair fall out in tufts or experienced dramatic weight loss.

Their exact numbers are unknown, and the Defense Department has not yet completed a registry that Congress ordered last year to track the possible medical effects from hundreds of oil-well fires in Kuwait.

Officially, the Pentagon has labeled their illnesses as isolated and unrelated to the Gulf War.

Stress is cited by the military as one of the likeliest causes, and many ailing vets have been sent to mental health counselors.

The Army last week released a report from its surgeon general's office that blamed stress for multiple health problems reported last spring by 79 Indiana reservists. To date, it is the largest cluster of Desert Storm vets to complain of postwar ailments.

Virginia Stephanakis, a spokeswoman for the Army surgeon general, said experience and research show that the Gulf War was a remarkable medical achievement that surprised even military medical experts.

"We knew the dangers when we sent the troops over there (and) we took extraordinary measures to minimize the risk," Stephanakis said. "We did have some people who got sick, but very, very low numbers."

The Department of Veterans Affairs has seen 60,000 "Desert Storm era" veterans at its hospitals and received 1,800 disability claims from those who served in the campaign, spokesman Terry Jemison said.

"We don't have any evidence of numerous ailments that would be related to service in the gulf that are mysterious," Jemison said.

The only discernible pattern, he said, is attributable to stress. VA officials have said 9 percent of Gulf War veterans suffered from post-traumatic stress disorders and as many as 34 percent experienced other psychological problems in the first few months after their return.

The government's view of war-related ailments is not universally shared.

Private researchers and veterans groups told the Dallas Morning News of more than 200 cases of chronically ill Gulf War vets that they have documented. That number, they said, is growing steadily.

Steve Robertson, a Washington lobbyist for the American Legion, contended that a large percentage of his 540,000 fellow Desert Storm veterans may be knowingly — or unknowingly — afflicted.

"I believe it's widespread. I really do," said Robertson, who said he, too, has suffered from an unexplained problem with fatigue since the end of the war. "I think there are a lot of people who are not coming out because of the ramifications in their career fields or whatever."

The Military Families Support Network, a private group that opposed the war, said it has compiled a database of 100 Desert Storm vets at Fort Bragg, N.C., who have reported postwar illnesses. The group claims that its figures also show an abnormally high rate of miscarriages and birth defects among families there since the end of the war.

Military medical officials dispute those conclusions, as they do comparisons of Desert Storm vets to those exposed to Agent Orange in Vietnam or the atomic tests in the 1950s.

Although the cause of symptoms in Desert Storm vets remains a mystery, numerous theories about the sources of those ailments are being discussed:

■ Some medical experts speculate that prolonged exposure to petrochemicals may be at fault in many cases. Marines and soldiers reportedly used fuels to combat infestation of their shower water; gasoline was burned in heaters designed for other fuels and the oil-well fires ignited by the Iraqi army in Kuwait spewed pollutants into the air.

■ The Army acknowledges that about 28 soldiers and sailors have tested positive for a parasite known as leishmaniasis, which can cause a variety of ailments such as skin lesions, fever, weight loss, anemia and fatigue.

Military medical officials insist that the infection, which has prompted blood banks to reject Gulf War vets as donors for two years, is not widespread. But they concede that there is no current screening test to detect the extent of the infection.

■ Several thousand service members received experimental anthrax vaccinations or took a drug that was supposed to diminish the effects of a nerve gas attack. The latter medication, pyrodostigmine bromide, was classified as "investigational" by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration.

The FDA granted a waiver for use of the drug — despite the lack of experiments that normally would precede use of such a medication — because of the grave danger that the Iraqi forces might use nerve gas against allied troops.

Several civilian medical experts said they could not exclude the possibility that Gulf War vets have contracted environmental or infectious illnesses. They warned against dismissing complaints without thorough study.

"To say, 'the government told me this is true, therefore, it must be true' is reassuring to a degree, but only to a degree," said Dr. Alan Lockwood, a neurologist at State University of New York at Buffalo.

Many of the sick vets remain angry and frustrated. They believe the military is not doing enough to learn what ails them — and does not want to learn.

"There's a lot of guys suffering," Zuspann, 32, said. "Everyone went over there to do a job, to serve their country. Now, I think we've been set off to the side. Not many people seem real interested in what's happening to us."

Before his return from the Persian Gulf, where he served aboard an amphibious assault ship, Zuspann said he had never been seriously ill. Since December, he has made four trips to an emergency room and has been hospitalized twice.

His illness has kept Zuspann from working at his restaurant job or attending drills as a reservist at the Dallas Naval Air Station. His medical bills exceed $30,000. He is facing bankruptcy and may lose his home.

For more than six months, Zuspann and his wife have unsuccessfully sought medical tests by military doctors to determine whether his ailments are related to his war service.

Civilian doctors and doctors with the Department of Veterans Affairs have been unable to pinpoint the cause of his symptoms, which include chronic fatigue, weight loss, muscle weakness and shortness of breath.

Last week, he was told he could undergo tests at Walter Reed Army Medical Center but had to provide his own transportation. But after the intervention of Sen. Lloyd Bentsen, D-Texas, the Navy has agreed to fly Zuspann to Washington, possibly this week, to be tested at Walter Reed.

"We are assured that they are moving forward on this," a spokesman in the senator's Washington office said.

Soldiers left for the Middle East healthy, but many say they came back with illnesses that defy diagnosis.

Many complain of chronic fatigue, depression and pain in their joints or muscles. Some have seen their hair fall out in tufts or experienced dramatic weight loss.

Chamberlain steps down, says 'I'll see you around'

By Linda Bosley Dailey
Staff Writer

Saying goodbye to the soldiers of the 1st Battalion (Mechanized), 18th Infantry Regiment was something Lt. Col. E.W. Chamberlain III couldn't bring himself to do at the unit's change of command ceremony Wednesday.

"I won't say 'goodbye' to you. I'll say 'I'll see you around,'" Chamberlain told the troops assembled on Artillery Field in Kelley Hill. "I do not want to leave the battalion I love so dearly."

No matter what the future brings, Chamberlain said, he will have no greater honor, nor no greater glory, than to have commanded the battalion and led it into battle during the Persian Gulf War.

In his last official act as commander, Chamberlain added the battle streamers earned for service in Southwest Asia to the company's colors before relinquishing command to Lt. Col. Roy H. Adams.

"It just doesn't get any better than this," Adams said of commanding the Striker Battalion, a unit of the 3rd Brigade, 24th Infantry Division. Adams, a Tuscaloosa, Ala., native, most recently served as executive officer of 3rd Brigade, 3rd Infantry Division, in Germany.

Adams was commissioned from the University of Alabama in 1971. He holds a bachelor's degree in management and a master's in public administration.

He has completed the Infantry Officer Basic Course, the Armor Officer Advanced Course and the the U.S. Air Force Command and Staff College. Among Adams' awards are the Bronze Star for valor with two oak leaf clusters, Meritorious Service Medal with one oak leaf cluster and Army Commendation Medal.

Adams and his wife, Amy, have two children who are enrolled at the University of Alabama.

Chamberlain is a graduate of the U.S. Military Academy, the Infantry Officer Advanced Course and the Naval College of Command and Staff. He also holds a master's degree in psychology.

He will spend the next year at Carlisle Barracks, Pa., attending the U.S. Army War College. Chamberlain's awards include the Bronze Star for valor with one oak leaf cluster, Meritorious Service Medal (three oak leaf clusters) and the Army Commendation Medal (one oak leaf cluster).

Chamberlain and his wife, Sherry, have five children, ages 3 to 15.

Polish soldier toughs it out in Ranger class

From staff reports

Ranger Class 8-92 set two records when it graduated Friday.

First, at 253 graduates, it was the largest class to ever graduate from Ranger School.

And, second, among those 253 new Rangers was the first from a former WARSAW Pact country, 30-year-old Capt. Kryzysztof Wojcik of Poland. Wojcik not only graduated, but received a leadership award from the Ranger School.

Asked what his feelings were upon graduation, Wojcik said, "relief."

He said he had a mission to accomplish, getting through the school. "It was rough and tough, no doubt. But it was my mission to accomplish and I am glad I did it."

He said he hopes to apply the training he received at Fort Benning — he also graduated from basic airborne, jump master and pathfinder courses — to his unit in Poland.

"It (Ranger training) was rough and tough, no doubt," said Wojcik. "But it was my mission to accomplish and I am glad I did it."

This member of the Polish 6th Airborne Brigade said the toughest part of Ranger school was the mountains — walking up and down, day and night for 10 days, carrying a radio and M-16 rifle.

He also noted two days in the swamp, up to his waist in water "was so tough . . . hot . . . straight from mountains without any rest . . . the whole time in field . . . one MRE (meal ready to eat) a day.

Sgt. Richard L. Cuza, 1st Battalion, 501st Infantry, from Alaska, was Wojick's training buddy. "I was proud to have him pin my Ranger tab on me," he said. "I can tell he's a good officer."

Wojick's immediate plans are to travel and see Florida.

"So far all I've seen of Florida are patrol bases, woodlines and M60 machine gun emplacements. I want to see Cape Canaveral, Mickey and the beaches.

ON POST

Flo says civilian jobs may have to go

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

After stretching next year's declining dollars about as far as possible, Fort Benning budget chief Dave Flo says civilian jobs are about all that's left to cut, unless the Army wants fewer soldiers trained here.

The post's "director of resource management" — in effect the comptroller — won't talk specifics about future moves to cut operating costs but he acknowledges there is a list of jobs to be eliminated if the operating and maintenance budget shrinks by $28 million in the fiscal year that starts Oct. 1.

Flo has seen the post's biggest budget shrink by nearly $50 million in six years on the job. He says money will be so tight in fiscal 1993 that to talk about upcoming reorganization moves or changes aimed at cuttings costs might tip off individual workers that their jobs are among the "positions" proposed for elimination.

The post has 6,900 civilian Department of the Army appropriated-fund "positions," — on paper. On May 31, however, only 5,001 of those civilians were on the job. The positions in jeopardy are those funded through the Department of the Army. There were another 2,800 contract employees or other workers paid from non-appropriated funds.

"We don't want a lot of rumors floating around, rumors can be ugly," Flo said. He acknowledges Benning officials have been more reluctant than usual to discuss budget issues this year. "That's because its such a people issue, and because we don't know the end result (yet)," Flo said.

This being an election year also may have something to do with it: Eliminating jobs has a "political impact and has an emotional impact and it has an effect on the economy as well," Flo notes.

The Pentagon has to go to the Office of Management and Budget — outside the Department of Defense realm to the White House — for approval of proposed cuts in the civilian work force. That may be the reason Maj. Gen. Jerry White, the post commander, hasn't heard from the Secretary of the Army on how many civilian jobs he can eliminate if the operating and maintenance budget comes in close to the anticipated $143 million. The White House may be reluctant to announce thousands of firings so near the Republican National Convention, Aug. 17-20, Benning officials suggest.

White said last week that the number of "positions" — as opposed to jobs — to be cut is fewer than the 400 mentioned recently in the media. He said employees who will lose their jobs should know by mid-August. The post can eliminate "positions" without firing people, by eliminating vacant jobs and shuffling people around to other jobs.

Meanwhile, Fort Rucker, Ala., told 75 DOA employees last week they face dismissal by Sept. 25 as part of a reduction-in-force that will cost the post 166 "positions." Fort Rucker, near Ozark, Ala., has 3,061 DOA civilian employees, said post spokeswoman Wanda Reynolds.

Fort McClellan, in Anniston, Ala., will have to dismiss 18 people by Sept. 18 as part of a RIF involving 75 positions, all of them to come from the post's Training and Doctrine Command slots, said post spokesman Mike Abrams. They got the word on July 13, the Army said. The post had 1,371 DOA civilian employees as of May 31, he said. McClellan will lose 47 "slots" under the RIF.

A spokesman at Fort Stewart says the post has not yet received a directive from the Department of the Army.

The post has 6,900 civilian Department of the Army appropriated-fund "positions," — on paper. On May 31, however, only 5,001 of those civilians were on the job. The positions in jeopardy are those funded through the Department of the Army. There were another 2,800 contract employees or other workers paid from non-appropriated funds.

WW II 50TH ANNIVERSARY

On the Eastern Front 50 years ago this week, an impatient Adolph Hitler moved the Fourth Panzer Army back from Army Group A to Army Group B to accelerate its advance toward Stalingrad. Hitler's ill-advised interference with the Strategic plan of his military commanders wasted time and depleted needed resources, thus, serving as a major cause of the German Army's defeat during this campaign.

Here, according to research by the Military History Division at Fort Benning, were the top news items of the week:

■ In New Guinea, Japanese forces defeated the Australians at Kokoda after three days of fierce fighting. The Allies lost the only interior airfield on the island, allowing the Japanese to occupy nearby islands to be used to support the invasion of Port Moresby.

■ British and American officials established a combined Resources Board in London to control the allocation of resources and set industrial priorities. American businessman William Averell Harriman and Oliver Lyttleton, Minister of Production for the United Kingdom, served as the board's senior members.

■ The Canadian Government announced that full conscription of able-bodied males would begin.

■ At Fort Benning, Army officials announced the formation of the 505th Parachute Infantry Regiment, under the command of Lt. Col. James M. Gavin.

■ The Infantry Journal featured an article discussing the inherent difficulties of limited visibility operations. The article offered various techniques which could be used to improve a soldier's night vision in combat conditions.

■ Fort Benning officials dispatched Army Divers to find and retrieve a sunken medium tank embedded in the bottom of the muddy Chattahoochee River. The divers successfully completed the difficult mission.

Buffalo Soldiers

Forgotten heroes finally being honored

From wire reports

RICHMOND, Va. — When Jones Morgan ran away from home in 1897 to join the Army, he signed up with a group that only now is beginning to claim its place in history — the Buffalo Soldiers.

The cavalry and infantry units, made up solely of black soldiers, are being honored at their birthplace, Fort Leavenworth, Kan., decades after they first won acclaim by helping to settle the West.

Morgan, now 109, plans to be on hand Saturday for the dedication of a 13-foot statue of a black soldier, rifle in hand and riding a horse, on a tree-lined avenue leading to the base, in sight of where the soldiers first set up camp in 1866.

It pays tribute to the 9th and 10th Cavalry and the 24th and 25th Infantry regiments, whose bravery and toughness prompted Native Americans to name them after the fiercest animals on the Plains. Later, the 92nd Airborne also was given the nickname.

The first Buffalo Soldiers guarded the Western frontier against Indian attacks, winning 13 Medals of Honor during their early campaigns.

"Indians called them Buffalo Soldiers because of the big coats they wore in winter and their curly hair. And they fought so fiercely," said Bill Hunter, member and historian of the 24th Infantry Regiment Association.

Morgan joined the 9th Cavalry at age 15, tending horses. "They used me for domestic stuff," Morgan recalled. "Anything needed fixing in the place, they sent me."

He watched as Buffalo Soldier units joined Teddy Roosevelt's Rough Riders in their charge up Cuba's San Juan Hill on July 1, 1898. But his parents found him and ended his military career after nearly two years.

Morgan's military records were lost in a fire around the turn of the century, so he receives no veterans benefits. The Army said it has no record of his service, possibly because he was underage.

"We can't find any records to substantiate his claim, but we cannot say definitively that he never served," said Mike Knapp, an archivist with the military reference branch at the National Archives in Washington.

Nevertheless, Morgan will receive the Bronze Medallion of the Order of St. George — the first Buffalo Soldier inducted into the group, said Cmdr. Carlton G. Philpot, chairman of the Buffalo Soldier Monument Committee at Fort Leavenworth.

Members are selected by the Army's Armor Branch for leadership or outstanding service in the cavalry.

The contributions of Buffalo Soldiers, who were phased out of service after World War II, are not mentioned in most history books.

"Actually, the 9th Cavalry got over (San Juan) hill first, but they didn't get the press," Knapp said.

The memorial was dreamed up about 10 years ago by Gen. Colin Powell, now chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, when he was stationed at Fort Leavenworth.

Powell "was surprised that there was nothing there to remind people that the Buffalo Soldiers had begun there," said Riley Banks of Wichita, a retired Buffalo Soldier.

About 100 Buffalo Soldiers are expected to join Powell at the memorial dedication.

The overdue honor brings tears to the eyes of retired Buffalo Soldier Elmer Robinson of Leavenworth.

"After all these years, I thought nobody cared," said the 77-year-old man. "Now I feel like a hero."

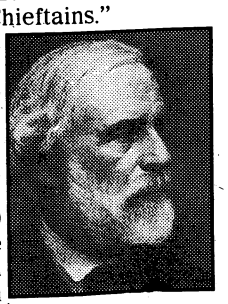
"Indians called them Buffalo Soldiers because of the big coats they wore in winter and their curly hair. And they fought so fiercely," said Bill Hunter, member and historian of the 24th Infantry Regiment Association.

Historian: Lee, Jackson were old friends

From wire reports

CHARLESTON, W.Va. — Historians have written much about the Lee-Jackson military alliance, but a new book claims to offer the first look at earlier connections between them.

"I think I put the two of them in the same place and at the same time, which others have missed," said Paul Casdorph, author of "Lee and Jackson: Confederate Chieftains."



LEE

He said he can place Confederate generals Robert E. Lee and Stonewall Jackson together 20 years before their famed collaboration resulted in their greatest Civil War victory.

The nexus is critical, he believes, because of the wide latitude Lee granted Jackson shortly after Lee became commander of the Confederate forces in Virginia in 1862, a time when a Union Army was hammering at the Confederate capital.

To keep additional forces from Union Maj. Gen. George B. McClellan outside Richmond, Lee granted Jackson a free hand to operate in the Shenandoah Valley, which resulted in Jackson's brilliant Valley Campaign.

The campaign caused Abraham Lincoln to fear for the safety of Washington, D.C., and to withhold from McClellan critical forces he said he needed to capture Richmond.

Casdorph argues that Lee was not taking a gamble when Lee gave his subordinate such flexibility because Lee had known Jackson for some considerable time, including service in the Mexican War of 1846-48, and had respect for his military judgment.

Casdorph, chairman of the West Virginia State College history department, believes the two military giants first met in 1843 at West Point, long before their May 1863 victory at Chancellorsville, Va., that led to Jackson's death.

Casdorph lays out his argument in his 498-page book, which he believes is the first dual biography of the Rebel commanders.

He spent six years researching the book, which has many tidbits of the Lee-Jackson connections prior to their meeting outside Richmond in 1862 to hold off an assault on the Confederate capital by the Union Army of the Potomac.

Casdorph said Lee visited West Point in 1843 as Jackson was completing his first year. The author said it's doubtful Jackson would have failed to note Lee, an engineering officer who was with two other officers trying to locate new cadet barracks. Casdorph believes that's when they first met.

He links their service together during the Mexican War, when Jackson served as an artillery commander and Lee as a high-profile officer on Gen. Winfield Scott's staff.

A 1951 graduate of Stonewall Jackson High School, Casdorph's interest in Southern history has led him to write a history of the Republican Party in Texas and the Bull Moose movement in the South. His book "Let the Good Times Roll" was a history of the U.S. home front during World War II.

Casdorph became interested in the legendary Lee and Jackson after he bought two small portraits of the men in Lexington, Ky.

"Lee and Jackson: Confederate Chieftains" is published by Paragon House and has a suggested retail price of $24.95.

Turn on to vacations in off season

From wire reports

Off season is no reason not to go.

About the only thing "off" most times is prices — they are lower, a good reason to rethink where and when to travel.

Fair dinkum, Australians say, implying that what is being said is true. So we report this from the newsletter Fair Dinkum: "The beaches of Queensland are balmy, the diving visibility on the Great Barrier Reef is at its seasonal best, Kakadu is lush and cool, the ski season runs until Oct. 5" and air fares are at their lowest. Certainly one of Australia's top attractions, to me at least, would be a visit to Ayers Rock, the world's largest monolith in an area with a rich Aboriginal heritage. For information on this area, call (800) 66-AYERS.

Australia's neighbor, New Zealand, offers a free 128-page book on its multitude of attractions, its people and nature. For a copy, call (800) 388-5494.

And since it is winter in South America, there's plenty of great skiing in places such as Argentina and Chili. For information on Argentina, call the country's tourist council in New York at (212) 603-0443. For Chile, call Ladatco Tours at (800) 327-6162 or Latour at (800) 624-6262. In the Boston area, Target Sports offers ski packages: Call (617) 562-1300 or (800) 832-4242.

Boston and New England are getting more and more attention internationally, but this winter this region will be recognized as never before in the Mother Land. Harrods, London's famed department store — the very store where the queen shops — will devote its windows and a storewide promotion to a "New England Christmas."

Products from more than 100 New England firms will be featured, along with a child's version of Boston shops, a tourist booth where the Greater Boston Convention & Visitors Bureau will promote Boston as a family destination, and foods from the region. The idea for the promotion came from Harrods' chairman, Mohamed Al Fayed, who said he long admired this part of America and whose brother has a house in Connecticut. The promotion is getting the all-out support of the Massachusetts Port Authority, which will be handling the shipping of $3 million worth of products to the 25-acre store, which "sets the world standard for exciting retailing" and to which "we're pleased to bring the best of New England," said Al Raine, Massport executive director. Winter is a great time to head for London, as the city is at its best with great theater, air fares are at their lowest, and Harrods has one of the best after-Christmas sales around.

The Black Ships Festival of Rhode Island held in Newport July 24-26 commemorates native Commodore Matthew Perry's historic negotiation of the first treaty between Japan and the United States in 1854. The festival gets its name from the Japanese term for foreign ships, which until 1854 had been banned from Japan for 200 years. There will be sumo workshops as well as top sumo wrestlers from Japan competing. The Candyman from Disney World will entertain the kids, and there will be a marketplace, kite flying and tea ceremonies. Call (401) 846-2720.

As part of its Connecticut Columbus 500, Short Ships will parade along the Connecticut River Aug. 1 from East Haddam to Old Saybrook. Some 250 boats — 17 to 55 feet — are expected. And this October in Cincinnati, the Tall Stacks return for the first time in four years. The largest gathering of paddlewheelers will be found along the Ohio River waterfront from Oct. 15-18. The riverboats that helped make places such as Cincinnati famous will be celebrated with parades, fireworks, tours, cruises, you name it. A great event not to be missed. Call (800) 543-2613.

For tall ships, we suggest checking out the windjammers along the New England coast. From Mystic, Conn., to Camden, Maine, there are wonderful sailing vessels for one- to six-day sails.

If you're in Denmark, check out becoming a "pretend Viking" on a four-hour sail in a replica of a 1,000-year-old vessel at the Viking Ship Museum in Roskilde, just 30 minutes by train from Copenhagen.

Lots of hotels toss in amenities, some even add a coffee. But if you've got the kids along you might want to check out this inn that includes a free petting zoo on the grounds with donkeys, llamas, pony rides, goats, sheep and baby pigs; a giant Moonwalker for the kids to jump on, and a racetrack for the young set. At the Best Western Seabrook Inn in New Hampshire, all that comes with a free continental breakfast for all, swimming pools and free Disney, HBO and ESPN cable channels. The rate is $58 a night (for up to four). The 160-room inn is handy to area attractions such as the famed Hampton Beach, and free passes are available to horse, dog and greyhound tracks. Call (603) 474-3006.

Families heading for Maine this summer will want to keep in mind the Children's Museum of Maine at Smiling Hill Farm in Westbrook. There, children can participate in an interactive exhibit on life 500 years ago. "Ktahkomig (the land in Wabanaki), Maine 1492" ranges from common items of the period such as a wigwam, to the environment. Call (207) 797-5483.

Navy looks to the future in a smaller world

ABOARD THE USS BELLEAU WOOD — For two years before her recent overhaul, there were no Marine Corps units embarked on Belleau Wood, one of just 14 of the Navy's so-called "big deck" amphibious ships. She had been reserved for exclusive Navy use as a fleet flagship.

David Evans

Earlier this month, all that changed. Belleau Wood went to sea with hundreds of Marines aboard and participated in a major amphibious exercise off California.

"There is a shift from blue-water operations," said Rear Adm. James Perkins, who commands the amphibious task force from Belleau Wood.

The Navy also is shedding its "go-it-alone" attitude, one it could get away with when the job was to fight the Soviets far at sea. In the new focus on littoral warfare, the Navy is more likely to come into contact with, and need, Air Force and Army units.

"We have got the word on jointness," Perkins said.

For example, an Army brigadier general was pulled in to act as the deputy to Vice Adm. Jerry Unruh, the overall commander aboard flagship Coronado for the exercise. Air Force F-15E fighter-bombers were employed to hit targets before the landings, and when the Marines went ashore, an Army battalion parachuted in nearby.

Five years ago, this exercise would have been a Navy-Marine Corps show, period.

If the Navy has gotten religion on jointness, it also is evidencing a new seriousness about mine warfare.

In the Persian Gulf war, the Iraqis dumped nearly 1,300 mines into the water; they severely damaged two U.S. warships and forced the rest to operate in confined areas cleared of mines.

Before Belleau Wood launched her air-cushion landing craft to make the run to the beach, minesweepers cleared the approach lanes, which had been sown with about 20 training mines.

Again, five years ago, the mine threat more likely would have been assumed away as a non-problem. Now crews have to find and disarm them.

Sea-skimming anti-ship missiles, such as the French-made Exocet, used by the Iraqis to kill 37 sailors aboard the frigate Stark in 1987, remain a big threat.

The Exocet's nose houses a radar that is turned on in about the last 15 miles of the missile's flight for final guidance to the target. The missile, which has a 40-mile range, can cover that final 15 miles in about 90 seconds, but if its radar transmissions are detected, the target ship can mount defenses.

In his only public comment after the Stark disaster, Capt. Glen Brindel, the frigate's skipper, declared that his primary system for detecting the Exocet's radar transmissions didn't work. That system is known as the SLQ-32, or "Slick 32." At the time of his November 1987 letter, Brindel said naval engineers were "working day and night" to fix the problem.

The SLQ-32 operator aboard Belleau Wood, Petty Officer 1st Class Jay Compton, said his equipment has been fixed to detect the Exocet. In this regard, the Navy is practicing the rule of "trust but verify." Electronic pods have been acquired which can be mounted on the wing stations of tactical jets. With this equipment, pilots now can simulate the low-level attack of an Exocet missile with its radar on.

Detecting airliners, however, is another matter, because Navy radar scopes do not clearly portray them as such. On the air-search console, Petty Officer 3rd Class John Wilson showed how his radar system portrays airborne targets as enemies, which appear as little upside-down "Vs," and friendly contacts, which are shown as little domes. A third category, unknowns, are represented as little half-boxes.

The symbology was adequate for open-ocean combat, where airliners weren't likely to stumble upon the scene. But watchstanders on Navy warships twice have mistaken commercial airliners for military aircraft, in part because they do not have a unique symbol on the radar scopes.

In July 1988, the cruiser Vincennes shot down an Iranian Airbus airliner, killing all 290 people aboard, and earlier this month the cruiser Cowpens mistook an Australian airliner for a hostile aircraft in an exercise off Hawaii, forcing the Navy to offer an embarrassed apology.

Technicians such as Wilson can identify airliners by the unique codes they broadcast, and indeed he demonstrated this capability with airliners flying down the California coast. But they appeared on the scope with the symbol for "unknowns."

Why permit this ambiguity, and all its potential for another Airbus disaster? If the Navy is going to be operating more often in littoral waters, closer to commercial air corridors, perhaps a new symbol is needed. It could be a little smiley-face, drifting across the radar scope to represent a non-threatening airliner.

After all, real naval power is selective, and not shooting at airliners means never having to say you're sorry.

David Evans is military affairs writer for the Chicago Tribune.

More women report abuse at Tailhook convention

From wire reports

SAN DIEGO — As many as 10 more women have told Pentagon investigators they were sexually abused by Navy and Marine Corps officers at last year's Tailhook Association convention, a newspaper reported Tuesday.

The new allegations resulted from women who went forward to the inspector general, whose office took over the Navy's troubled probe on June 18.

The allegations are among the new evidence uncovered by Pentagon inspector general's investigators looking into alleged sexual misconduct by Navy and Marine Corps officers at the group's convention in Las Vegas last September, The San Diego Union-Tribune said.

The newspaper cited Pentagon sources and Navy fighter pilots who have been questioned at Miramar Naval Air Station about the San Diego-based naval aviation booster group's gathering.

Naval investigators initially said a gantlet of drunken Navy and Marine Corps officers groped and in some cases disrobed 26 women, half of them officers, who were forced to walk down a hotel hallway.

The new allegations resulted from women who went forward to the inspector general, whose office took over the Navy's troubled probe on June 18, the newspaper quoted sources as saying.

"There are additional victims," said one source. "It could be as high as 10."

The new information pilots provided to investigators includes allegations that former Navy Secretary H. Lawrence Garrett III visited hospitality suites at the hotel where the Tailhook party has been held annually since 1963, the Union-Tribune said.

Garrett, who resigned in the wake of the scandal, has denied being in the suites, described in a Navy report as rooms where sexual misconduct and drunkenness were common.

The Tailhook Association, comprised of retired and active-duty military aviators, is named after the hook that snags planes landing on aircraft carriers.

THE GULF WAR

VA seeks program to monitor health of gulf war vets

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — The Department of Veterans Affairs said Tuesday it is asking Congress to approve a special program to keep track of the health of veterans of the Persian Gulf conflict.

The VA said changes in law are needed to permit physical examinations and follow-up consultation to veterans who otherwise lack eligibility for outpatient care.

Secretary of Veterans Affairs Edward J. Derwinski said the program "should not be viewed as a response to urgent medical risks."

"Instead, our purpose is to reassure veterans that VA will keep ahead of the science and remain committed to long-term monitoring," Derwinski said in the announcement.

If approved by Congress, VA would begin a system called the Persian Gulf Registry that it said would provide indefinite, long-term surveillance of more than 570,000 veterans of the Persian Gulf war.

The department said some veterans have been treated for respiratory conditions and have been concerned about breathing smoke from oil well fires in Kuwait.

It said surveys have shown significant stress levels among some gulf returnees and VA physicians have received a scientific advisory on leishmaniasis, a parasitic infection transmitted through sand fly bites.

Some 124 civilian workers to lose jobs at Benning

From staff reports

Some 124 Fort Benning civilian employees will be out of jobs as part of a major reduction-in-force on the post. The RIF calls for eliminating 202 jobs by Sept. 29.

Benning officials expect 78 of those jobs to be eliminated through voluntary retirements, resignations and attrition. Another 76 vacant jobs — separate from the 202 jobs — simply will not be filled.

The move will account for about $8.3 million of the $28 million the post must cut from its operating and maintenance budget next year, according to budget chief Dave Flo.

The Army said the 202 employees got separation notices on Monday. The total includes 192 Training and Doctrine Command jobs along with 10 jobs from the U.S. Army Information Systems Command (USAIC).

Civilian Personnel Director Theresa Gunter said during Monday's briefing that the number of released employees may vary from the 124 estimated, depending on the number of retirements and voluntary resignations. Gunter indicated that Benning had told TRADOC early in the budget process that the post would have to cut 278 positions if the operating and maintenance budget shrank by the numbers earlier projected.

The RIF breakdown shows the Directorate of Logistics losing 76 positions, while the U.S. Army Infantry School will lose 54. The Directorate of Engineering and Housing will lose 21 positions and the Directorate of Resource Management will lose 18. The cuts spread even to the commanding general's office, which will lost one staff position.

Gunter said the job cuts were "the largest in many years." Fort Benning cut 78 civilian jobs last year after saying initially that 207 would be eliminated.

Lt. Col. John Van Dyke, Fort Benning's public affairs officer, said it appears this will be the only RIF required this year. That could all change, however, depending on what Congress does to the fiscal 1993 Pentagon budget.

The officials said belt-tightening on post will take care of the remaining $20 million in budget cuts. "We are going to have to become more efficient," said Van Dyke.

Notices trigger resignation, pain in those losing their jobs Sept. 29

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

Monday's letters saying they'll lose their jobs triggered emotions ranging from resignation to pain among about 125 Fort Benning employees who will be dismissed on Sept. 29.

This was not a gentle cut: The post's 1981 Handicapped Employee of the Year, Tyrone Hardy, was told he's being dismissed after 17 years on the job as a payroll clerk, he said. "He's shocked, like everyone else, that he got laid off," Dorothy Hardy said of her son.

She said Tyrone Hardy suffered minor brain damage at birth from being an "Rh-Baby" and that "his coordination is not too good." She said he was honored by the city last year for his accomplishments.

"I feel kind of bad about it," Mrs. Hardy said of her son's dismissal. "Doctors said (at birth) he'd never live a productive life. But we got him trained; he graduated from high school; he's able to function. At his age now, there's really not much else for him to do."

"It really hasn't hit me yet," said a clerk typist, who said she makes about $20,000 a year.

"We just bought a house." She sighs: "Great timing, wasn't it?"

The woman, who declined to be identified by name, said she and her non-commissioned Army officer husband will use her income over the two months before her job runs out "to pay the bills and hope we won't be in a bind" when her paychecks stop.

Officials said on Monday that dismissing 124 employees, leaving some jobs vacant and eliminating another 78 by attrition will cut some $8.3 million out of next year's operations and maintenance budget.

The civilian personnel office and other agencies on post will try to help those losing jobs with things as diverse as resume writing and providing chaplains for counseling dismissed employees who need their services, officials said.

The Job Assistance Center and the Army Career Alumni Program, both located in Soldiers Plaza, offer a variety of services, from providing computers for resume-writing to setting interviews with potential employers.

Both programs were conceived by the Department of Defense for soldiers retiring or being forced out of the Army. Their services are also available to civilians and their spouses, said Thad Wilson, who works with the Career Alumni Program.

At those offices, civilians and soldiers facing unemployment can search area, regional and international listings of Department of Defense jobs, and they may be linked up with the Georgia Employment Service to find out about other jobs.

Patsy Chilcote, a counselor with the Job Assistance Center, said none of the employees who received dismissal letters on Monday had contacted the office by Tuesday night.

Gary Burkhalter, a deputy in the civilian personnel office, said employees being let go will be placed on a "stopper list" — a register of people who will have first shots at jobs coming open at Fort Benning or other posts. A person on the stopper list must be hired if he or she fits the job qualifications, post officials said.

Burkhalter said some civilians may latch on with other federal agencies under another program for those dismissed during reductions in force.

There is also a plan afoot to create a "service center" to combine programs on post to make it easier for ousted civilians to find jobs, Burkhalter said.

"A RIF (reduction in force) is a moving train. In this 60-day period, we still place people" in vacant jobs or in others that come open during the waiting period.

Lettre exits Airborne School with a rush

Commemorates the change of command with 507th jump

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

Marcel Lettre pushed some 50,000 students through Airborne School at Fort Benning in two years. He didn't sit around, in the process: This lieutenant colonel rang up 208 jumps of his own in that time, usually three with each class.

On July 23, the day he handed the reins of the 1st Battalion (Airborne) 507th Parachute Infantry Regiment and the Airborne School over to Lt. Col. Michael N. Hawrylak, Lettre — naturally, it seemed — made his 507th parachute jump.

The gods smiled. A thunderstorm seemed to hold off for an extra half-hour in the afternoon to permit Lettre's special jump.

Though the jump was far from his first, there was nothing routine about it, Lettre said — there never is: "One of my tenets as (Airborne School) commander was that there's no such thing as a routine airborne operation."

You still get the same rush of adrenalin, whether it's your first, 50th or 507th jump, he said. It starts when a jumpmaster opens the door of a C-130 and you hear the wind screaming past. The heartbeat slows, picks up again when you stand in the door, slows again when you hear the chute open and "goes back up just before you hit the ground."

Lettre hasn't always hit the ground on his jumps. A year and a half ago, a retired general was hanging around to watch a jump. A protocol officer ran him out to the Fryar Field Drop Zone in a van. Lettre told the general, "If I'm any good, I should land within 50 to 75 feet of the van."

He was better than he thought — or worse. Some 75 feet up, on his way down, a puff of wind caught his chute and Lettre came crashing down on top of the van, feet first. "I left two big boot prints on (the roof of) that van," Lettre said. "Ann Hill (the post protocol officer) has never forgiven me for that. They were big prints — inflicting some $1,600 worth of damage."

Like always, Lettre walked away. He's never had anything worse than "some sore bones," he said. During his tenure at the Airborne School, there were some 100 broken bones suffered by others. "But when you compare that to a half-million jumps (by students in that time) that's almost insignificant.

"Of course," he adds a bit ruefully, "It's significant if it happens to you."

He says he keeps jumping out of perfectly good airplanes because, "I like the rush, and I like being around soldiers who like doing that."

The colonel-to-be (his promotion is stalled in Congress) has made some jumps with the Silver Wings, the Airborne School's show team. He admits to enjoying the high-profile nature of being a paratrooper. "Not too many people come to Fort Benning to see the care and maintenance of the M-16 rifle," he told his troopers when they'd gripe a little about having to stage so many demonstration jumps.

His next assignment will allow Lettre to continue his education in a favorite subject — wine. He's going to France for two years — his second tour in that country — as liaison officer to the 1st French Army, a sort of go-between between U.S. forces and the French Army.

As part of that job, he'll probably be involved in setting up or coordinating the 50th anniversary of D-Day in 1994, perhaps with a jump into the same drop zones used by allied parachutists on that historic day. He also could be involved in coordinating joint airborne training operations between U.S. and French forces.

This week, Lettre and his wife, Mary, were packing up for their 15th Army move. They became engaged while he was at Airborne School at Fort Benning in 1969 and were married nine days after he completed Ranger School here. Six months later, Lettre was in Vietnam, where he became one of the few lieutenants to command a rifle company.

Mrs. Lettre will maintain a home in Columbus for another year while their second son, Peter, graduates from Pacelli High School, where he's captain of the cross-country team and co-captain of the soccer team. First son, Marcel III, is a junior at the University of the South in Sewanee, Tenn. Once Peter graduates, Mrs. Lettre will join her husband in Metz, France.

On Wednesday, Lettre was writing thank-you notes to the officers and noncommissioned officers who have helped him along the way here. One was going to a young staff sergeant who scoffed at the idea the "old man" could still run five miles in 35 minutes a couple of years back — until the sergeant finished behind his boss. But the "old man" had some good training along the way — including running in the Athens, Greece, marathon in 1980, where he finished in about 3½ hours.

The hardest part of his Fort Benning job?

"Having to tell some very good NCOs (noncommissioned officers) that they aren't good enough for the Army of the 1990's." Eight of his NCOs lost their jobs as part of the drawdown of the Army. An Army board of officers and NCOs had to go back nine years to find a "screw-up" by one of those sergeants — back to when he was a private — to kick that soldier out, Lettre said. Another sergeant got the boot over two DUI tickets in the last couple of years.

If his officers and men hoisted a glass to speed him along his way, it is likely they did it with their own "Airborne" wine — a special label he helped create and get imported from France.

Last thoughts on his job here?

"It's been a great job, one of the premier jobs for a lieutenant colonel in the Army."

His next assignment will allow Lettre to continue his education in a favorite subject — wine. He's going to France for two years — his second tour in that country — as liaison officer to the 1st French Army.

TRAINING

Electronics to assist umpires in August war games in Texas

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

If you don't like folks looking over your shoulder, stay away from the Army's National Training Center at Fort Irwin, Texas. What trainers at this isolated, desert training center can't see electronically, they get through observers' eyes.

From the moment the 3rd Brigade, 24th Infantry Division hits the "box" — the desert training areas some 35 miles from of Barstow, Calif. — on Aug. 8, they'll be under almost-constant scrutiny.

Troops will be airlifted to the NTC beginning Saturday. There'll be some 3,000 from Fort Benning, 1,500 from the 101st Airborne at Fort Campbell, Ky., 600 from Fort Stewart and 60 from Fort Bragg, N.C., involved, the Army said. The 1st Battalion, 18th Infantry won't be making this trip because light infantry units from Fort Campbell are involved. Some 380 railroad cars carrying the brigade's tanks, Bradley Fighting Vehicles and other equipment left several days back.

This is not a cheap undertaking. It will cost some $8.5 million including some $1.9 million for the 101st Airborne's expenses, officials said.

If a company commander goofs while briefing his platoon leaders and sergeants on how to fight an upcoming desert battle, his words will come back to haunt him — and it won't take long either. There will be a checklist waiting at the end of the fight showing what he did right or wrong.

Observers — the umpires of the war games the brigade will fight here for two weeks — will be able to see much of those fights in the 'Star Wars Building' where just about every battlefield mistake will be electronically recorded by electronic sensors. After-the-fact electronic scrutiny of battlefield performance is just part of the training here in the Mojave desert, where the average summer daytime temperature is 104, and it falls only to 78 or so at night.

"After action reviews" of every fight, whether it's company- or brigade-level, are part of the training tools here. Observers and controllers will go over in minute detail every aspect of each fight, even down to whether a unit's reconnaissance is properly done.

That's part of what the 5,000 soldiers of the brigade and its attached units will undergo in the desert during "Operation Desert Hammer IV." There are other parts: 14 days in the field away from telephones and junk food, two or maybe even three MREs (Meals, Ready to Eat) rations a day, and sometimes 23-hour days, although commanders can get docked for "poor sleep schedules" during these maneuvers.

"This is the closest thing to war" when it comes to training, says Maj. Ron Bradstreet, the brigade intelligence officer.

Benning recruits to start giving DNA samples

By Linda Bosley Dailey
Staff Writer

Recruits at Fort Benning next month will begin providing blood and cell samples to be used should DNA testing ever be needed to identify their remains.

The program is part of the Department of Defense-wide project to have DNA samples of every service member on file within the next five years, said James J. Canik, administrator of the DNA Identification Laboratory in the Armed Forces Institute of Pathology in Washington, D.C.

Canik was at Martin Army Community Hospital at Fort Benning earlier this week to help train laboratory technicians on the process.

DNA, or deoxyribonucleic acid, is the part of a cell that contains genetic information. With such samples, medical examiners will be able to identify bodies — even if they lack fingerprints or teeth — by matching genetic information from the remains with the samples on file, Canik said.

"The lethality of the modern battlefield is a real problem for us," Canik said.

The Pentagon is beginning the program by collecting samples from recruits as they enter the service at those installations where they take basic training, Canik said.

The rangers of the 5th Ranger Training Battalion will have their annual open house Aug. 1 from 9:30 a.m. to 5:30 p.m. at Camp Frank D. Merrill, home of the Mountain Ranger Camp in Dahlonega, Ga.

The open house will consist of equipment displays and demonstrations including mountaineering, tactical operations, helicopter rappelling techniques, hand-to-hand combat and a special parachuting exhibition by the Fort Benning Command Exhibition Parachute Team, the Silver Wings.

Refreshments will be available, and there is no admission fee.

For information, contact Jamie Jarrard at (706) 864-3327 or 864-3357.

RTB TO CHANGE COMMANDERS: The Ranger Training Brigade will conduct a change of command ceremony Aug. 11. The ceremony will take place at 9 a.m. at Victory Pond. Col. John J. Maher will be relinquishing command of the brigade, while Col. Alan H. Maestas will assume command.

OCS PLANS HALL OF FAME INDUCTIONS: The Officer Candidate School plans a Hall of Fame induction ceremony for 11 a.m. Aug. 14.

The ceremony will take place in Marshall Auditorium and will be conducted by Maj. Gen. Jerry White, Fort Benning commanding general.

The ceremony honors past OCS graduates who graduated from the Fort Benning Officer Candidate School or Fort Riley Ground General School and have either attained the rank of colonel (active duty or Reserve), been awarded the Medal of Honor, or served in a position of prominence in state or national government.

Last year, 126 persons were inducted during the 50-year anniversary induction ceremony. The Officer Candidate School Hall of Fame presently has 21 Medal of Honor recipients, 996 colonels, 103 brigadier generals, 94 major generals, 20 lieutenant generals, three generals, 20 lieutenant generals, three generals and 81 prominent civilians who have graduated OCS.

This year's ceremony includes 71 approved inductees: one retired major general, 1 brigadier general, 66 colonels and three distinguished civilians.

OCS TO DEDICATE HQ: The Officer Candidate School will dedicate its new battalion headquarters building Aug. 7 at 9 a.m. in honor of 2nd Lt. Robert M. Viale.

Viale, an OCS graduate, was awarded the Medal of Honor for "conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity above the call of duty."

The new battalion headquarters is located in building 2757.

A reception will be in Wigle Hall immediately after the dedication ceremony.

MAINTENANCE DIVISION CHANGES HOURS: The duty hours for all shops in Maintenance Division will be 7 a.m. to 3:30 p.m. The change in hours will be in effect until Oct. 1 because of hot-weather conditions.

Discipline and Dedication

OCS crucible requires liberal doses of both

By Linda Bosley Dailey
Staff Writer

Winter or summer, the climate never changes at Officer Candidate School. It's always one of strict discipline.

For the 14 weeks candidates spend in the 3rd Battalion, 11th Infantry Regiment (Officer Candidate School), their training is not just an education but also a way of life.

So regimented are candidates' lives, they cannot go to sleep early, even if they have completed their duties and finished studying. "There are procedures for going to bed," said Capt. Gary Brito, a TAC, as instructors are nicknamed for their duty to teach, assess and counsel.

"Everything's procedural," said Basic Officer Candidate Timmy Thornton.

From 5 a.m. to 10:30 p.m., candidates' activities are tightly scheduled and strictly regimented. They barely have time to accomplish the tasks assigned them.

Candidates aren't permitted to have any books except those required for a class. "There's no time for that," said Capt. Marc Taylor, Company A's senior TAC. He said if candidates have time to read, they read the manual of required knowledge, known as the Branch Immaterial Officer Candidate Course manual.

"It's mentally and physically demanding," said Maj. Thomas Towle, the battalion executive officer of OCS.

But candidates understand the purpose behind the push to perform. They must learn to lead.

Instructors give candidates an overload of tasks to see how well they manage their time and use even the very few minutes between assignments, said Basic Officer Candidate Laura Moore. With so much to do in so little time, candidates also learn to set priorities to get as many things done as possible and accomplish the most important things first, she said.

The course is tough even for those who come prepared to endure the physical and mental demands. For the unprepared, the experience is particularly difficult. "For some, it's a nightmare," said Taylor.

The course is tough even for those who come prepared to endure the physical and mental demands. For the unprepared, the experience is particularly difficult. "For some, it's a nightmare," said Taylor.

Attrition ranges between 18 and 33 percent, and averages about 25 percent, said Lt. Col. Kevin Shea, commander of the 3rd/11th, who graduated from OCS in 1973. Only four others in the battalion are OCS graduates, he said.

Of the approximately 600 candidates who enter the school each year, about 360 active-duty officers and 120-130 reserve officers get commissioned annually, or about 10 percent of the Army's officers, Towle said. OCS, a course open to soldiers from all branches of the Army, runs four active-duty classes and one reserve class each year. About 14 percent of candidates are women. The battalion's two companies have a cadre of about 22.

The discipline and dedication it takes to be an officer comes easily to candidates. But leaving the NCO in them behind is the hardest thing for candidates to learn, said Brito, explaining that it's difficult for candidates to stop doing everything themselves.

Instead, candidates must learn to delegate and supervise, said Capt. Samuel Beasley, commander of Company A.

Photos by Joe Maher/The Benning Patriot

OCS students John Townsend, left, and Benjamin Rowe spend some class time in the woods on the Yankee Land Navigation Course.

Although they need to be able to do the things their subordinate soldiers do, it's crucial that officers are able to make decisions and delegate properly because they can't do all the duties themselves, Towle said. As the TACs tell them, officers can delegate the authority, but they can't delegate the responsibility. But much of what candidates must learn — ethics, integrity, initiative, sensitivity and judgment — is not learned from textbooks, but through their experiences. Thus, OCS' emphasis is on leadership rather than academics. TACs give candidates opportunities to lead and provide counseling on their performances.

"It teaches you a lot about yourself. It makes you do a lot of soul-searching," said Thornton, an OCS candidate. But candidates also learn important lessons about human behavior, in general, and "how people function under stress," he said.

But the stress is beneficial, Basic Officer Candidate Michelle Jackson said, because "when the pressure comes (on the job), it's not foreign."

"They've got to really want this," Beasley said. "They've got a lot at stake here." Many candidates even took a pay cut to enter OCS, he said. A candidate earns the salary of an E-5.

But because of the particular rigors of becoming an officer through OCS, Beasley, an ROTC graduate, said, "I can't help but think they value their commission a lot more than an ROTC grad or a West Point grad."

WW II 50TH ANNIVERSARY

Frustrated by the Eighth Army's minimal success in proportion to resources allocated, Prime Minister Winston Churchill and Gen. Sir Alan Brooke went to Egypt to evaluate the situation firsthand. Churchill reacted to the findings of his investigation by naming Gen. Sir Harold Alexander commander of the Middle East forces and giving Gen. W.H.F. Gott tactical control of the Eighth Army.

The Infantry Journal analyzed the Red Army's 1942 stock of weapons. The detailed analysis included a discussion of the use of Soviet tanks, artillery, and anti-tank weapons and their relevance to the development of U.S. Army infantry tactics at Fort Benning.

The Infantry Journal also featured an article discussing German tactics used in the recent defeat of a formidable Allied fortress at Eben Emael, Belgium.

Army rejects family's efforts to clear Mudd name

From wire reports

His name is still Mudd.

One hundred and twenty-seven years after a military commission found him guilty of conspiracy in the assassination of President Abraham Lincoln, Dr. Samuel Mudd's conviction stands, the Army said July 24.

Acting Assistant Army Secretary William D. Clark rejected the Mudd family's longtime efforts to clear their ancestor of the charges that he helped Lincoln's killer, John Wilkes Booth.

Clark also ignored an Army board's recommendation that the conviction be set aside because the military commission that found Mudd guilty had no jurisdiction over civilians.

"My denial of that recommendation should not be taken as a determination of either the guilt or innocence of Dr. Mudd," Clark said in a memorandum released by the Army.

"It is not the role of the (Army board) to attempt to settle historical disputes."

The Army's action came as a great disappointment to Dr. Richard D. Mudd, 91, a grandson of Samuel Mudd, who has tried to exonerate him for more than 70 years. His ancestor's role in the tragedy gave birth to a peculiar American epithet, "Your name is Mudd."

"I got a call one minute before 12 and it spoiled my lunch," Richard Mudd, a retired Saginaw, Mich., physician, said in a telephone interview July 24. "I didn't feel the full effect of the whole thing for a couple hours. Justice has not been done.

"In a democratic country, the rights of a single person are extremely important and Dr. Mudd's rights have been violated. I'm extremely disappointed."

But Mudd said he would continue his fight.

"We're going to appeal it to the secretary of defense, and if we get no satisfaction there, we'll appeal to the president," he said. "If we get no satisfaction there, we'll appeal to the Supreme Court."

Maj. Rick Thomas, an Army spokesman at the Pentagon, said Mudd has exhausted the appeal process within the Army.

"From the Army's standpoint, this is the end," he said.

Guns take away from fun in Wayans' 'Mo' Money'

By Lawrence Toppman
Knight-Ridder Newspapers

REVIEW

Why is it that comedians never want to keep making us laugh?

Jackie Gleason insisted on playing a deaf-mute waif in "Gigot." Charlie Chaplin waxed philosophic in sound-era films, rambling on once he found a voice. Eddie Murphy became a cold-eyed leading man in "Harlem Nights."

Now Damon Wayans has decided that being the funniest person on TV's "In Living Color" is insufficient. He made his leading-man debut last December in "The Last Boy Scout," an atrociously inane and violent action film, opposite another jokes-aren't-enough guy named Bruce Willis.

He has followed it with "Mo' Money," an uneven but ingratiating movie with about as many laughs as smashed cars and crumpled bodies. When it's full of fun, it's a cool breeze. When it's full of guns, it's stale hot air.

Wayans and younger brother Marlon (in his movie debut) play Johnny and Seymour Stewart, who rip off suckers who want to buy stolen merchandise. Their late cop father once saved the life of gruff Lt. Walsh (Joe Santos), so he takes a paternal interest in their none-too-promising futures.

When Johnny meets an executive for a credit-card company (Stacey Dash), he gets an honest job in her firm's mailroom. But when he decides he'll need money to woo her, he steals a card and runs up a bill buying presents. The company's head of security (John Diehl) finds out but doesn't tip the cops; instead, he blackmails Johnny into helping with a million-dollar embezzlement.

The plot eventually goes haywire, culminating in an auto-slamming chase performed to slashing funk music and a rock 'n' roll editing style that gets dull fast. Wayans' impossible heroics, many performed with a couple of bullets in key places, are laughably silly.

Before the movie disintegrates, though, it generates low-down laughs. Most come from set pieces that let Damon Wayans do riffs on controversial characters developed on "Living Color," such as a nodding junkie or effeminate jewelry buyer. With his light-bulb head, foppish little mustache and sly features, Wayans resembles a naughty child trading on infantile charisma. Marlon isn't in his league yet, but he has a lot of energy.

None of the roles are complex, but three actors do solid work: Santos as the Columbo-esque cop, Dash as the fiery career woman (though her figure is wedged into miniskirts and low-cut tops at the office) and Almayvonne as a voracious co-worker hot for Johnny.

Damon Wayans stars in 'Mo' Money,' a script he wrote.

Diehl, meanwhile, is the best thing in the movie, a cheerfully ruthless killer who regrets murdering business partners because it interrupts profit-making ventures.

Damon Wayans (who wrote the fragmented script) and director Peter MacDonald can't leave well enough alone, though, so they turn him into a Terminator-like machine who yells "Are we having fun yet?" and "Peekaboo! I see you!" while trying to blow somebody's head off. The belly laughs and bullets don't go together.

Madonna single not on soundtrack

From wire reports

When record-buyers learned that Madonna's new hit single, "This Used To be My Playground," was mysteriously left off the soundtrack from a "A League Of Their Own," they were understandably confused.

After all, how often does a top film drop its most identifiable song from the soundtrack?

The reason for "Playground's" omission is simple: Madonna is a Warner Bros. Records artist. The "League" soundtrack is a Sony/Columbia release.

Q & A with Cheney

Here are excerpts from Defense Secretary Dick Cheney's remarks at Fort Benning last week.

Cheney: "I don't get as much opportunity to get out with the troops as I would like, but it's important to try to get around and Benning, of course, is a major facility for us. (They) do a lot of very important work here so I wanted to stop by and see how things are going."

Q: How safe do you think Fort Benning is in this era of military cutbacks?

Cheney: "Well, we've laid out a base force plan that was submitted to Congress. Congress hasn't approved it yet. They are currently involved in trying to cut the defense budget below what we think is necessary. The Senate Armed Services Committee has been marking up a bill — Sen. (Sam) Nunn is chairman — that cuts us below what we requested, what we think is necessary to maintain today's force.

"Long-term, I think it's absolutely vital to maintain an adequate military capability. What that means for any one installation or organization will depend a lot upon what happens to overall funding levels. Clearly, Fort Benning has been a vital part of the Army for a long time, a major training facility. I think it will continue to be a vital part of our Army. No one has proposed to me any fundamental changes. That doesn't mean there won't be steps taken in the future to find ways to save money . . . to do our business more efficiently."

Q: In light of the drawdown, do you see an increased domestic role for the military?

Cheney: "U.S. military, I think, already plays a significant domestic role in many respects. All over the country, we've got people who automatically participate as volunteers in the community. I don't know a single community where there's a major military installation that we aren't already actively involved in the community.

"Whether we ought to expand our domestic role, I think, really depends on what kind of judgment you make about our ability to perform our basic mission. Our first responsibility is to be prepared to fight and to win when called upon to do so, and therefore I'm a little reluctant to see us take on major new responsibilities unless those responsibilities help us maintain our readiness and our capability in terms of our basic fundamental responsibilities."

Q: What about the possibility of the United States getting involved in Yugoslavia?

Cheney: "We have made a decision — the president has made a decision — that we're prepared to use air and naval assets to support the international effort to get food and medical supplies into Sarajevo. We have not gotten involved in the notion that we ought to put U.S. forces on the ground in Yugoslavia. We try to avoid that. Yugoslavia is a difficult situation. It's a terrible tragedy what's going on there. But it's extraordinarily complex, and it's not clear that there's any role for U.S. military forces in Yugoslavia. So we've been reluctant, and I think properly so, to take a step that could get us bogged down in what some would describe as a quagmire."

Q: The Wall Street Journal mentioned you as a possible replacement for Dan Quayle on the Republican ticket. How do you respond to that?

Cheney: "I don't do politics. I'm in the military business. I am secretary of defense. I've stayed away from getting involved in the campaign. Vice President Quayle is a good friend of mine. I think he is doing a good job under very difficult circumstances, and I don't pay a lot of attention to speculation I read in newspapers."

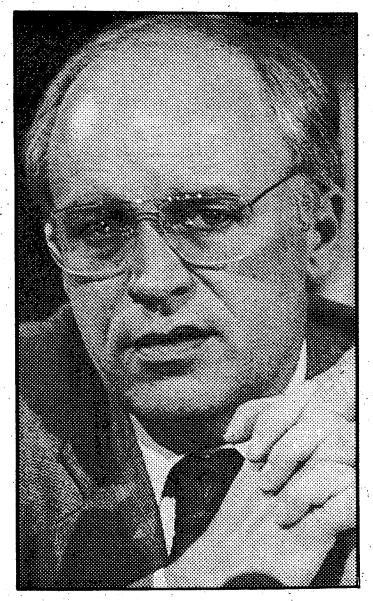
Clearly, Fort Benning has been a vital part of the Army for a long time, a major training facility. I think it will continue to be a vital part of our Army. No one has proposed to me any fundamental changes.



Secretary of Defense Dick Cheney visited Fort Benning July 24.

Soldiers comment on threat of more action in Persian Gulf

By Clint Claybrook and Linda Dailey
Staff writers

Several Fort Benning soldiers last week said they were ready to go back to Iraq and finish the job if Saddam Hussein continues to thwart implementation of U.N. resolutions dealing with the end of the Persian Gulf war.

Their comments came during a July 24th visit by Defense Secretary Dick Cheney, who toured Benning following an appearance in Atlanta. He said at the time that the U.S. had made no decision on whether to use force — again — against Iraq.

The threat of immediate air strikes to force Hussein's hand disappeared over the weekend when Iraq agreed to allow a U.N. inspection team — minus Americans — to enter their Agriculture Ministry.

Still, several GIs said it was time to go back and 'finish the job' — that is, completely remove Saddam from power in Baghdad. Sgt. Sedrick Tucker, a drill sergeant, was a mortar section leader with the 101st Airborne Division during the gulf war. He made it as far as the Euphrates Valley during the drive into Iraq. "A lot of things were left undone in the first place. . . . These soldiers as well as this cadre are ready to go back over there and take care of it," Tucker said, adding that the time to act is now.

"In my opinion, I think we should have just continued (into Baghdad)," he said.

"I kind of knew that (a return to gulf hostilities) might be a possibility when I joined up. If that's what has to be done for my country, I'll do it," said Pvt. Thomas Jones, in his sixth week of basic training. Jones said having Cheney visit his platoon on a rifle range last week "was a rare pleasure, a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity."

"We should have cleaned house while we were over there," said Pvt. Christopher Mikels of Casper, Wyo. Mikels' half brother, Spec. Mike Starnes, was in Germany on standby when the war ended.

"I thought it was a great honor to meet someone so high up in the political party," said Mikels, who, like Jones, was finishing his stint on the M-16 range.

"If it came down to having to go, I'd go gladly," said Pvt. Jode Parsons, another Casper, Wyo., native. "I believe we have to finish the job there for our country."

Cheney, visiting with trainees on Malone Range 18, said he was unsure whether military action would be required to force Saddam back into compliance with U.N. resolutions agreed on at the end of the war.

The defense secretary spoke over the staccato sounds of M-16 fire while visiting with trainees.

He spent about half an hour on the range and then made a 25-minute stop at the Collins Training Center, where he listened to a couple of briefings on conduct of fire and maintenance training on the Bradley Fighting Vehicle.

"He really didn't say too much," said Sgt. Michael Brown of the secretary's visit to Collins. Brown was one soldier who knew Cheney better than most — he voted for him during one of Cheney's congressional campaigns.

The briefings must have been a success — Sgt. 1st Class Lawrence Davis and Staff Sgts. Richmond Lauval and Davis James each received the Army Achievement Medal for their presentations.

A lot of things were left undone in the first place. . . . These soldiers as well as this cadre are ready to go back over there and take care of it.

Sgt. Sedrick Tucker

Watching from a helicopter, Cheney craned his neck to watch Airborne trainees work at Eubanks Field. He canceled his visit with those troops because of a heavy rain that began about 3:50 p.m. Before his arrival, some airborne students said the secretary needed more time on post to truly get a handle on the work there.

The troops also had their own ideas on how to deal with Iraq. "Personally, I think it (a return to the gulf) is good, because I don't think we finished the job the first time through," said Cpl. Christopher Malin.

"It's our job," said Pvt. Clarence Toussaint. "It's what we do. So, if we gotta go, we gotta go. No way to avoid it."

The U.N. agreement made the comments moot — at least, temporarily. As the week ended, the possibility of action against Iraq was still within the realm of possibility.

Saddam likely to feel more pressure soon

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration is moving quickly to provoke another confrontation with Saddam Hussein to keep pressure on the Iraqi leader and force him to comply with terms of the Persian Gulf cease-fire.

"This chapter isn't closed," warned a senior administration official this week as he outlined plans for U.N. inspectors to seek prompt access to another Iraqi facility to look for evidence of weapons of mass destruction.

"The administration is not looking for an opportunity to use military force," said this official. However, he urged the new confrontation with Saddam "as soon as possible" to assure that the Iraqi leader will not continue to block weapons inspections.

With the threat of imminent war lifted by Saddam's agreement to let the U.N. team inspect his agriculture ministry for weapons data, Bush met Tuesday with congressional leaders of both parties who were generally supportive of the president.

"The question is, are we willing and anxious to work together on key U.S. foreign policy and defense issues and the answer is yes," said House Speaker Thomas Foley, D-Wash.

The president told the congressional leaders he is not out to eradicate Saddam. Senate Minority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., quoted Bush as asking the congressional leaders, "Whose son is going to volunteer to do this? Whose son are you going to send over to get Saddam Hussein?"

On Capitol Hill, Defense Secretary Dick Cheney said, "I sense people are ratcheting this up a little bit more than it deserves in the sense that there is some sort of imminent action. That is not the case."

Nonetheless, Dole, White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater, and others left open the possibility of military action against Iraq later.

"He (Saddam) would be making a serious mistake to misjudge America's will in this matter," Fitzwater said. Emerging from his meeting with Bush, Dole suggested that military confrontation was almost inevitable.

"I think it's pretty predictable; it's probably going to happen. But we don't know when. It doesn't have to happen if Saddam Hussein will play by the rules."

Tips on traveling safely with young children

From wire reports

Here are some suggestions on traveling safely with young children. Also, ask your doctor for advice, particularly if you're traveling to the Third World or isolated areas.

FIRST AID

Whenever you travel, keep these things handy:

■ Painkiller. Ask your doctor for a recommendation; many parents use children's Tylenol. Don't forget to take along the dropper or medicine spoon to measure the correct dose.

■ Bandages and antibiotic cream or ointment.

■ Syrup of ipecac. Used to induce vomiting if something poisonous is ingested; use only after checking with medical authorities.

■ Tweezers (for removing bee stingers or slivers).

AUTOMOBILE SAFETY

■ Keep infants and young children secured in a child-safety seat at all times, and use it according to the manufacturer's instructions. Once your child is too big for a child seat, use seat belts at all times. If your kids need to stretch, pull over at the next rest area — don't let them out of their car seats or seat belts.

■ Secure all luggage safely so a sudden stop won't send it flying around inside the car. If you have a station wagon or van, make sure loose cargo is tied down.

■ Never leave children unattended in the car. Kids can start the car or release the brake. And in summer the temperature inside a parked car quickly can climb as high as 130 degrees.

■ Make sure your car is fit for a long trip so you don't get stranded. Always carry extra food, drink and blankets in the car in case you do get stuck with car trouble.

AIRPLANE TRAVEL

■ Find out what the airline's policy is on child-safety seats. If you've purchased a seat on the plane for your child, you'll be able to take a car seat on board. Even if your child doesn't have a plane seat (children under 2 can sit on an adult's lap and fly for free), the airline may let you take the child-safety seat on the plane in case an extra seat is available.

■ Relieve pressure on a baby's ears by offering fluids or a pacifier. Remind an older child to swallow. Changes in cabin pressure occur on both take-off and landing.

■ Offer your child extra fluids during the flight since it's easy to get dehydrated in the plane's dry air.

OTHER PEOPLES' HOMES

When you visit relatives' or friends' homes, be aware of possible hazards:

■ Watch out for small objects that a child could put in his mouth and choke on.

■ Make sure that medications and household cleansers are stored safely out of reach.

■ Rearrange chairs or coffee tables if they have sharp edges or corners that could hurt a toddler.

■ Take some plug covers to insert in electrical outlets.

■ Check the temperature of the hot water in the sink; children scald easily.

■ Ask your host to rent a new crib or take along your own portable crib. Some old cribs have slats that are too wide, and a baby's head can get caught between them.

Most adult beds are not safe for infants; they can roll off.

SAFE MOTEL STAYS

If you're staying in a hotel or motel, apply the same safety criteria as above. In addition:

■ Never leave a young child unattended in a hotel room, and review the fire-safety information posted on the inside hotel room door.

■ If there's a pool, be vigilant all the time your child is outdoors. Even if the pool is fenced, gates sometimes are left unlatched and children can wander in.

CAMPING/HIKING SAFETY

Keep in mind that camping with an infant or young child means paying even closer attention to your child than at home:

■ Keep your child away from a camp fire, poisonous plants, bees, and other insects. In tick-infested areas, check your child daily for ticks (be sure to check the child's scalp and behind the ears).

■ Be alert that your child doesn't wander into the woods. A young child can get lost quickly or fall into a lake or stream.

■ On hiking trips, consider providing your child with a whistle to blow in case she or he gets lost; the noise carries further than a human voice.

■ Take along your own bottled drinking water for an infant. If you do gather water at a campsite, boil and cool it before use or use other water-purification methods (such as a filter).

■ Boating requires special precautions. There should be at least one swimmer for each non-swimmer, and everyone should wear an approved life jacket.

IN BRIEF

ANTIQUE SHOW HOTLINE: The Antique Show Hotline is a new pay-per-minute number that gives updated reports on major antique shows and flea markets around the country. Callers can pick from four regions and listen to a rundown at the rate of $1.49 per minute. The line's organizer, Lou Zimet of Montrose, N.Y., said that most calls ran three to four minutes. The line carries about 100 shows each week, and the information is updated weekly. The hot line number, which can be used with tone or rotary phones, is 900-903-7469.

FREE BRITAIN INFO: "Amazing Britain: How to Have an Amazingly Affordable Holiday in Britain This Year" is a free 112-page booklet available from the British Tourist Authority, 40 W. 57th St., New York 10019.

COMPUTER ADAPTATION: Travelers who carry lap-top or notebook computers to foreign countries can be stumped if they try to hook up their modems with standard U.S. phone cable. The phone jacks overseas usually won't accept the modular clips customary in the United States. The solution? An array of phone adapters for countries all over the world is found in the Magellan's travel catalog. The adapters cost about $10 apiece. For a catalogue or to place an order, call the Santa Barbara, Calif., firm at 800-962-4943.

'SUPER' TICKETS: So you're tired of the hassle of procuring Super Bowl tickets? Well, get this: They're already within your reach for the 1993 contest at the Rose Bowl in Los Angeles. More than 1,000 two-ticket packages are available — "No waiting, no problem," touts the host committee. What's the catch? The packages are $3,500 each.

For that price, you also get preferred parking close to the Rose Bowl, a pregame "chalk talk" by "one of America's most respected professional football coaches," an invitation to pre- and post-game parties and a Super Bowl poster and pin. Call the host committee at 310-288-0804.

FREE LUNCH: Balsam House, restored 100-year-old Victorian inn in century-old Adirondack Park, offers free lunch to couples who stay two or more consecutive nights, Sunday-Thursday. Inn hasn't raised prices in three years — $115-$135 midweek, $135 weekend, both per couple, including breakfast and dinner. 1-800-441-6856.

FLORIDA DEALS: The 19 Florida Marriott hotels and resorts offer "Super Summer" discounts up to 65 percent through Sept. 7. Kids 8 and under eat free when dining with registered guest. 1-800-228-9290.

EARLY BIRDS: SuperClubs Jamaica offer $150 discount on winter vacations booked before Aug. 31 at any of five all-inclusive resorts. 1-800-858-8009.

Crossing denominational borders now more common

Associated Press

Among Protestants, the smaller, more conservative groups were the most likely to receive those who switched, followed by Methodists, Southern Baptists and Presbyterians.

NEW YORK — Jumping denominational borders has become a Christian habit, a sort of roundabout ecumenical blending process. Recent findings show a lot of it goes on nowadays.

About a fourth of present-day church members have switched denominations at least once from the denomination in which they were raised, says the Princeton Religion Research Center.

It also reports these other trends:

■ A gradual increase to 58 percent in adults saying religion is "very important" to them, up from 53 percent in 1987. Another 29 percent term it "fairly important."

■ A "religion index," a combined measurement of key attitudes and practices included to determine the overall vigor of religion in America, has halted a long-term decline and started edging upward.

■ Christian religious preference, such as whether persons are Protestant or Roman Catholic, no longer seems to have much bearing on whether they're Democrats or Republicans.

Catholics are only a tiny bit more likely to be Democrats and Protestants just a jot more likely to be Republicans.

■ Biblical literalism — belief that the Bible is God's actual, word-for-word composition, to be taken literally as fact — has declined steeply over the last 25 years.

It used to be the predominant view of Americans, held by 65 percent of them as recently as 1963. But now only 32 percent regard the Bible as coming verbatim from God.

Nevertheless, most still hold the Bible conveys God's inspired truth, although the prevalent view is that not all accounts should be interpreted literally.

These and other religious tendencies, based on surveys by the Gallup organization, are summarized in recent issues of the research center's Emerging Trends.

On the denomination-hopping phenomena, a national sample of 1,002 adults surveyed in April found that 23 percent have switched from one denomination to another at least once.

The possible margin of error was plus or minus 3 percent.

Overall, the crisscrossing seems numerically to benefit Protestants, since 81 percent of those who switched ended up in Protestant churches, while only 9 percent had moved into Roman Catholic churches.

Among Protestants, the smaller, more conservative groups were the most likely to receive those who switched, followed by Methodists, Southern Baptists and Presbyterians.

The main reason given for changing denominations was intermarriage, with 24 percent of the switches made to match religious affiliation of a mate.

Among other reasons, 14 percent cited preference for another denomination, 10 percent cited influence by friends, relatives or children, and 7 percent said they found perspectives of former denominations lacking.

Five percent said a moving "religious experience" caused them to switch.

The center's "religious index," based on measurements of eight religious factors in society, was found to have risen slightly over the past three years, to 656.

A perfect score would be 1,000, a goal unlikely in the present human condition of attainment, since it would require full commitment to God by everyone. Its peak, in the Gallup organization's 50 years of taking the American religious pulse, was 745 in 1960.

It declined through the social upheavals of the 1960s and 1970s and televangelist scandals of 1980, hitting lows of 651 in 1989 and 1990.

Study: Gene manipulation impinges on life's meaning

From wire reports

NEW YORK — Genetic engineering has profound religious implications, touching on the "nature of life" itself, says a new study, the most extensive yet undertaken by a church body in conjunction with scientists and other experts.

"The food we eat, the health care we receive, our biological traits and the environment in which we live are all affected by research and developments in genetic science," according to the study.

The report was drawn up by a Genetic Science Task Force headed by the Rev. Kenneth L. Carder of Knoxville, Tenn., and approved for churchwide educational use by last May's governing conference of the United Methodist Church.

Some "very serious ethical and theological questions" are involved, Carder said in an interview. He said findings could even shake up the Judeo-Christian concept of human sin.

If it is found that "freedom of choice is affected and behavior labeled sin is genetically determined, we would have to rethink our understanding of sin," he said.

He noted indications that some failings, such as alcoholism, may have such origins, and there is similar, still inconclusive evidence about homosexuality.

Carder, 51, active in science-religion dialogue, said the church study was used last October in a national conference of scientists, theologians, ethicists and lawyers at the Oak Ridge Center for Scientific Research.

The study was drawn up in more than three years of work by scholars in religion, genetics, law, agriculture and economics.

MIA relatives say it's politics as usual with both parties

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon last week released thousands of previously classified documents dealing with the 2,266 Americans still missing in Southeast Asia. But it wasn't enough to satisfy members of the National Alliance of Families, who aren't happy with responses from either President Bush or Democratic presidential nominee Bill Clinton.

"It's politics as usual in Washington by both political parties," researcher Tom Ashworth said at a news conference called by the alliance to renew its call for the release of classified POW-MIA documents. "Have you seen Clinton really stand up on this issue?"

Members of the alliance wore buttons reading, "Shut up! & sit down!!! Bush POW policy 1992."

Alliance members heckled the president during a July 24th speech here to the National League of Families. The alliance, many of whose members also belong to the league, is concerned with the missing from other wars besides that in Southeast Asia.

Bush ended the heckling by asking sternly, "Would you please shut up and sit down?"

Sue Scott, chairman of the board of the league, also pleaded for quiet and said the majority of those present wanted to hear the president.

At the announcement of the declassification of the papers, Pentagon spokesman Pete Williams called the collection a "hodgepodge," saying they were the first installment of a planned release of more than 1.3 million pages of documents — some dating back to 1973 — that will be made available over the coming months.

The release followed President Bush's order to executive departments and agencies to make available all POW-MIA documents and files, except those that would invade the personal privacy of people involved.

Earlier this month, the Senate unanimously demanded the release of the secret documents "expeditiously."

Williams said the released material includes:

- 1,800 reports of supposed "live-sightings" of Americans missing in action.
- Several internal Pentagon reports about how the administration has handled the search for the missing.
- Intelligence reports and summaries of reports and drawings gathered by intelligence officials about MIA-POW cases.

Williams said much of the material "doesn't plow any new ground" because it has been made available to the Senate Select Committee on POW-MIA issues on a classified basis.

The newly released material will be made available to family members and to the select committee, Williams said.

However, the names of individuals have been removed from the material for privacy reasons, so the case documents at first glance will mean little.

Earlier in the same day, some family members held a news conference on the steps of the Pentagon to complain about the Defense Department's handling of the POW-MIA issue, in particular a photo that the families say portrays three Vietnam-era American servicemen still in captivity in Indochina.

Pentagon officials say they believe the photo is a doctored version of a photograph that appears in the December 1989 Khmer-language issue of a magazine called Soviet Union.

The families argue that the magazine, which the Pentagon said was found in the National Library in Phnom Penh, Cambodia, may be a forgery, and that the Pentagon is lying about the photograph they believe portrays their loved ones.

"You are not hearing the whole story from the Pentagon," said Deborah Bardsley, the daughter of Col. John L. Robertson, one of the men said to be in the photo.

"There's every possibility that it could be (a forgery)," Bardsley said about the magazine.

Asked whether the release of the classified documents, Albro Lundy III called the Pentagon move "too little, too late."

"I want them to release all the documents," he said. Lundy's father, Maj. Albro Lundy Jr. of the Air Force, was also said to be in the disputed photograph.

Benning wrestler wins Olympic bronze medal

From staff, wire reports

BARCELONA, Spain — Hard work paid off in the form of an Olympic bronze medal for Fort Benning wrestler Rodney Smith Tuesday.

Smith, an Olympic rookie, won America's first Greco-Roman wrestling medal of the day, earning the bronze with a 6-3 decision over Cuba's Cecilio Rodriguez at 149.5 pounds.

"The opponents I faced didn't know how aggressive I have been working in the wrestling room," Smith said. "This was the best match I've had in my career. I feel great."

Smith said he may compete in the 1996 Games in Atlanta for another chance at the gold medal.

"I'm disappointed that I didn't win the gold, but it still feels great," he said. "Something will probably coax me back out for 1996, but I don't want to make a commitment at this time. I don't want to commit to something I may not be able to fulfill."

Smith trailed 3-0 in the match before winning with a furious rally. Smith scored the winning points on a three-point move with 35 seconds remaining in the match. He had tied the score, 3-3, on a three-point move with 1:41 remaining.

The gold medal in Smith's division went to Attila Repka of Hungary, who edged two-time world champion Islam Duguchiev of the Unified Team by one point 38 seconds into overtime.

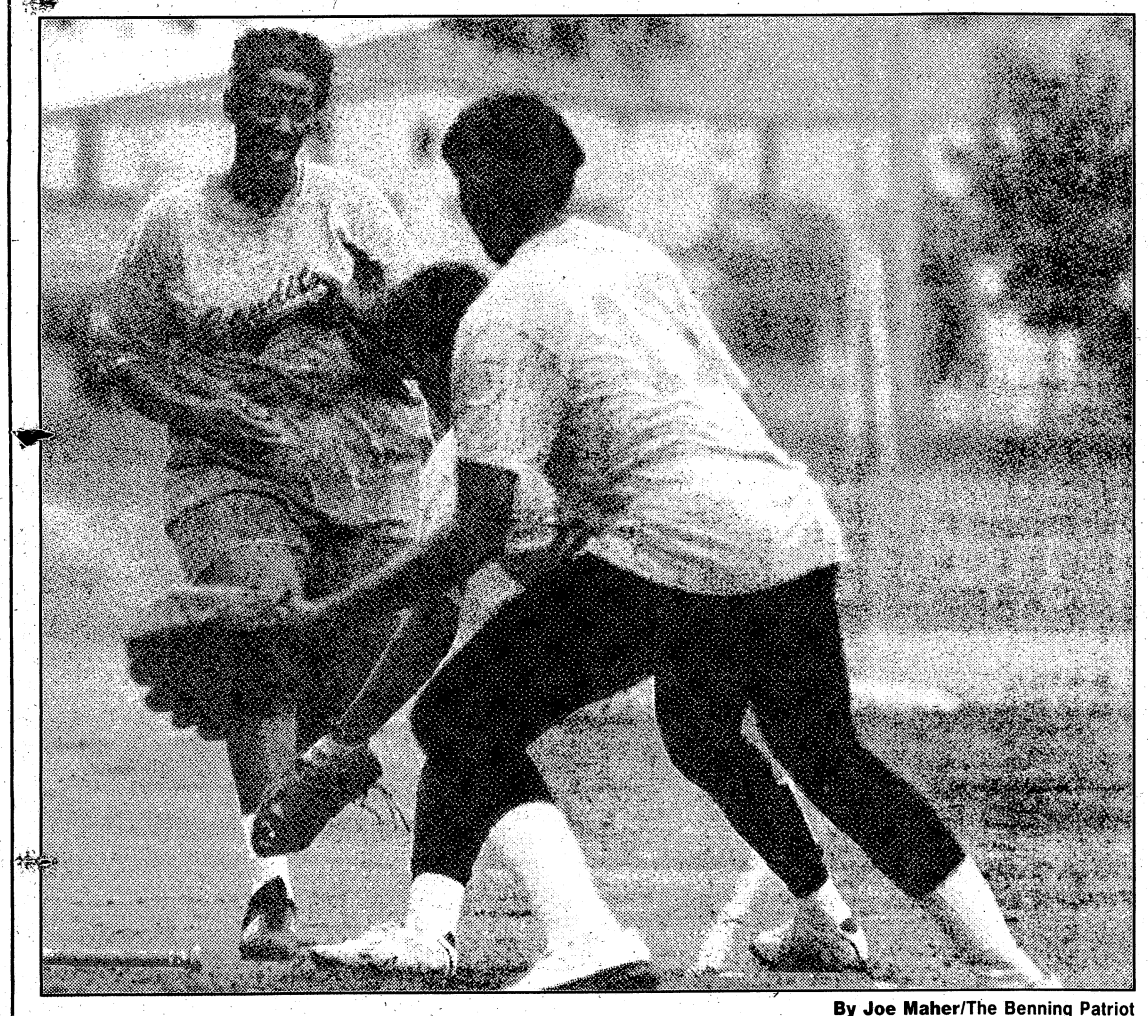
Play at the plate



By Joe Maher/The Benning Patriot

The Bandits' Beatrice Burton (blue jersey) is tagged out at the plate by Tuff-E-Nuff pitcher Carmen McDowell as catcher Freddie Allen (No. 17) looks on. Tuff-E-Nuff won the game and eventually took the championship of the Ft. Benning Women's Softball Tournament.

3-on-3 Basketball Challenge scheduled

From staff reports

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — Soldiers at 11 Forces Command and Training and Doctrine Command installations will compete in a special nationally sponsored military intramural Saturn 3-on-3 Basketball Challenge during August and September, according to U.S. Army Community and Family Support Center marketing officials.

Registration for the Fort Benning 3-on-3 Challenge, an August event, can be made at the Sports Office at Doughboy Stadium.

Saturn Corporation, a division of General Motors, is sponsoring the competition in conjunction with a Saturn test-drive program. Each host installation will receive $2,000 in cash plus a $500 voucher to purchaseathletic equipment needed to support the event.

In addition, Saturn will provide more than $7,000 worth pf promotional materials including posters, fliers, banners, T-shirts, championship jerseys, registration forms and trophies.

At each location, Saturn will host an auto display for two days at the height of the competition and will pay each installation's morale, welfare and recreation fund $5 for each qualified test drive taken (up to $1,100).

The double-elimination basketball competition is open to men and women 18 years of age and over. Based on installation demographics, local sports directors may specify additional age or level-of-play categories to increase participation.

Challenge teams are limited to four players: men, women or co-recreational. The first 300 participants at each installation who register and show up for their first games will receive free T-shirts.

Post pools reopened

The Custer Terrace swimming pool has reopened and is open for swimming Friday through Tuesday. It is closed Wednesdays and Thursdays for maintenance.

Carey swimming pool, located behind the Main NCO Club, has reopened. It is open for lap swimming from 6 to 8 a.m. and 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. Monday through Friday, open for recreational swimming from 1 to 8 p.m. Wednesday through Sunday, and closed Mondays and Tuesdays for maintenance.

Benning school registration Aug. 4-21

Registration will be conducted at all eight Fort Benning schools Aug. 4 through Aug. 21 from 8:30 to 11:30 a.m. and 1 to 3 p.m. each day. School starts Aug. 25. All students — whether new or returning — must register for the 1992-93 school year. Also, children who preregistered during kindergarten roundup in May will need to complete the registration process.

A child must be 5 on or before Sept. 1, 1992, to enter the Fort Benning Schools. Birth certificates or other proof of birth will be required for children to be enrolled in either kindergarten or first grade unless they attended kindergarten at Fort Benning during the previous school year.

Pupils registering at Fort Benning for the first time will be required to present a record of immunization at registration. Immunization requirements are:

- DPT (diphtheria, whooping cough and tetanus) completed and booster, if indicated.
- Polio series completed or begun with booster, if required.
- Measles, mumps and rubella vaccine.

All pupils except entering kindergartners must have report cards or grade placement records.

Physical examinations are required for all students entering school for the first time in either kindergarten or first grade. A certificate of eye, ear and dental examination should be presented to school officials in August. Martin Army Community Hospital will set up a schedule for these physicals to be administered during the summer months. Information concerning school physicals can be obtained by calling 544-3862. Children who have attended school locally or in other systems will not require a physical.

It is not necessary for parents of students who attended the Fort Benning schools last year to bring any forms to the school, but they will need to sign registration forms there.

All new and returning students with learning disabilities, behavioral/emotional disorders, or speech-language disorders may register in their assigned schools.

Returning students who are physically or mentally disabled may register at their home schools. Parents of new students who are physically or mentally disabled should call the Special Education Office at 545-5520 after Aug. 10. Parents of preschool handicapped children at least 3 years old may call the Special Education Office at 545-5520 after Aug. 10.

Registration and attendance at Fort Benning Schools are limited to those students living on post and those students whose sponsors have a billeting slip indicating availability of quarters within 90 school days.

Fort Benning students in grades 9 through 12 who did not attend a public school in Muscogee County last year and who have not already preregistered for the 1992-1993 school year should report immediately to the Columbus Roberts Center at 539 Brown Ave., Columbus, to preregister and receive a school assignment. The phone number at the center is 649-0626.

Students entering sixth, seventh and eighth grades should register at Faith Middle School.

Elementary students should register at the schools indicated below according to the areas where they live:

McGraw Manor (off Custer Road), grades K-3: McBride School; grades 4-5: White School.

Bouton Heights (north of Nash Court), grades K-5: Loyd School.

Bouton Heights (south of Roark Court), grades K-1: Patch School; grades 2-5, White School.

Davis Hill (accessible from Pruden and Kawamura streets), grades K-5: Loyd School.

Upatoi Terrace, grades K-5: Loyd School.

Custer Terrace, Battle Park and Old Officer Capehart, grades K-5: Wilbur School.

Indianhead Terrace, grades K-5: Wilson School.

Block 9, McDaniel Manor and officers' quarters, grades K-5: Dexter School.

All other main post areas except those defined above, grade 1: Patch School; grades K and 2-5: White School.

These school assignments are subject to change.

For further information regarding registration in the Fort Benning Schools, please call the school administration office at 545-2500.

RECYCLE

U.S. familiar with Russian affairs, Persian Gulf

On at least four occasions during this century the United States has found itself enmeshed in Russian affairs. (I use the terms Russia and Russian in a generic sense).

Today, of course, we find ourselves working with other countries to "save" Russia from its serious internal problems. Much earlier in the century, in 1905, our president, Theodore Roosevelt, arbitrated a peace treaty between Russia and Japan to end the 18-month old Russo-Japanese War.

Al Garland

Then, between 1918 and 1920, U.S. troops were sent into north Russia (1918-1919) and into Siberia (1918-1920). The north Russian force, some 5,000 men under British command, suffered heavy casualties while guarding war supplies and communication lines. The Siberian force of about 10,000 men encountered some difficult moments in its attempt to rescue Czech troops and curb Japanese expansionism.

It was during World War II, however, that the U.S. became more deeply involved than ever in Russian affairs. From the day Germany invaded Russia on June 22, 1941, until the end of the war some four years later, U.S. and British political and military leaders followed a policy of giving the Russians all the assistance they could, even at times, to the detriment of their own operations. Unfortunately, getting the supplies delivered while satisfying outlandish Russian demands required the Western Allies to make some extremely difficult decisions.

One of the most important of these, reached during the summer of 1942 turned over to the U.S. Army control of the movement of supplies and munitions to Russia through the Persian corridor and assigned that project the highest priority. To the Western Allies, it was most important that Russia stay in the fight against Germany.

Actually, prior to this action, there had been three main routes designed to get aid to Russia. One crossed the north Atlantic and ran around the coast of Norway to north Russian ports. The second crossed the Pacific Ocean to Vladivostok, ports. The second crossed the Pacific Ocean to Vladivostok, following a route north of the major Japanese islands. The third followed the coast of Africa to the Persian Gulf and then crossed Iran to the Soviet border.

In reality, as events proved in 1942, the Persian Gulf route was the only one relatively free of serious enemy interference. Unfortunately, in early 1942, the Iranian ports were underdeveloped and the Iranian state railroad running north had only a limited capacity to transport supplies.

Although the British had tried in 1941 and early 1942 to develop Iran's highway and rail transport facilities, they simply did not have the needed man power or materials, given their own precarious position in the Middle East at the time.

Even after the U.S. entered the war in December 1941, it did not have the large numbers of service troops to send to Iran to upgrade the facilities there. In May 1942 the U.S. did send a military mission to the Gulf region and promised to speed up the shipments of supplies. Even though Iran was under British strategic control, on 1 October 1942 the U.S. established the Persian Gulf Service Command to carry out the mission assigned by the leaders of the Western Allies. The Army not only took over the railroad system, it also assumed responsibility for four Iranian ports and agreed to operate a large fleet of trucks to supplement the on-going British effort.

Even then, continual problems plagued the new command and it was not until well in 1943 that it was in a position to send forward even more cargo than it was required to do. By 1944, the Persian Gulf Command had almost 30,000 U.S. troops under its control and the route was the single most important Allied-operated lend-lease route to Russia. (In early 1945, the Black Sea route was opened and a number of the units from the Persian Gulf Command were sent to Odessa to operate the port facilities there.)

Overall, the U.S. effort in the Persian Gulf area, our first major military commitment to any area in the Middle East, an area long dominated by European powers, was success by any logistical standards. The delivered supplies helped the Russians, who never acknowledged their value. Those U.S. soldiers and civilians who served in the Persian Gulf Command and labored so mightily deserve far more recognition than they have been given. Perhaps those U.S. soldiers who served in the Gulf region during Operations Desert Shield/Desert Storm will better understand what those Command members went through than many of us old-timers who knew little of the happenings in that far off region of the world.

Al Garland is former editor or Infantry magazine and writes occasional columns for The Benning Patriot.

Post getting ranges ready for CISM

By Linda Bosley Dailey
Staff Writer

Construction at Fort Benning to build and improve three shooting ranges is under way as the post prepares to host an international competition in early November.

CISM, as the Counseil Internationale du Sports Militaire is popularly known, is an international competition among members of the world's armed services.

Servicemen and -women from as many as 102 countries may participate in the annual competition, which is held at a different location each year. They were last held at Fort Benning in 1983, said Sgt. 1st Class Jimmie McCoy, non-commissioned officer in charge of the international pistol team.

"We've been trying to get that (range) built for several years," said Lt. Col. Bob Aylward, executive officer of the U.S. Army Marksmanship Unit. "These ranges will be used for CISM, . . . but that's going to be about 1 percent of their life expectancy. The rest will be for training soldiers . . ."

New electronic targets have been installed at Hook Range, the rifle range. Phillips Range, a pistol range, was razed and is being rebuilt at a cost of about $1 million.

And a new, as-yet-unnamed indoor range for rifle and pistol, located next to Hook Range, is nearly finished.

"We've been trying to get that built for several years," said Lt. Col. Bob Aylward, executive officer of the U.S. Army Marksmanship Unit. "And we will use it greatly for CISM. The operations center will be there. The briefing center will be there. The ladies' events will be shot in there," he said.

"These ranges will be used for CISM, . . . but that's going to be about 1 percent of their life expectancy. The rest will be for training soldiers . . ." Aylward said. And eventually, the AMU's international rifle and international pistol teams each will have an office at the new indoor range.

While marksmanship unit teams will use the new range most of the time, reserve and national guard units also will train there, as will some active duty soldiers, Aylward said.

Construction on the 20,000-square foot indoor range began last fall, and is scheduled to be complete by Aug. 15.

"This was on the books," Aylward said of the new indoor range, adding the Phillips Range, which is being replaced, was a decades-old wooden structure that had deteriorated.

Improvements to the ranges may have been made even if CISM were being held elsewhere this fall, but the competition helped get the improvements done now, said Maj. Harold Groomes, CISM project officer with the AMU. "Obviously, the improvements needed to be made, he said.

The new indoor range will replace three other indoor ranges — one inside the Hook Range building, another in Soldier's Plaza and a third, a converted World War II mess hall that was closed several years ago.

Just adjacent to the indoor range is Hook Range, at which a new electronic target system was installed late last month.

Replacement of the electronic targets at Hook Range was prompted not just by the CISM matches and the need for targets that meet international shooting standards, but also because it was difficult to find parts for the system, Aylward said. The previous targets were installed when the range was built a decade ago.

In addition, said Staff Sgt. Ronald McCarty, the AMU's range maintenance technician, "Electronics changes a lot in 10 years."

Microphones embedded in chambers in the target frames mounted permanently 300 meters downrange determine the location of the bullet's hit by sound triangulation, and the information is relayed electronically to monitors inside the range building. A target on the monitor, which shooters and spectators watch, displays a mark to show where bullet struck the target. The computerized system also provides a print out.

The Phillips Range building was torn down about six weeks ago. Workers are scheduled to have a new building complete by Oct. 18 for the pistol events. "This is going to be a world-class shooting range," McCoy said.

Retirement ceremony will be held Aug. 18

The monthly retirement ceremony will be Tuesday, Aug. 18 on York Field at 9 a.m. In case of inclement weather, the ceremony will be in Marshall Auditorium in Infantry Hall.

Cab companies land contract for post business

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

Two cab company owners, who previously had said creating a monopoly pick-up taxi service for Fort Benning was anti-free enterprise and may force some weak companies out of business, have won an exclusive contract.

A joint venture between American and Independent Cab companies was awarded the contract, which costs the owners $50 a month for each cab operating on post every month, said Cal Gray, owner of American and Radio Cab companies.

He and Vince Middlebrook, owner of Vets and Independent Cab companies, went after the business together. They waited until "one minute before the deadline" for bids on July 13 to submit a bid, Gray said. "Co-op (Taxi Co.) bid about 12 minutes before the deadline," he said. "I think if they hadn't bid, they (the Army) wouldn't have gotten a single bid."

"I was against it," Gray said, "but it was a forced deal. If we hadn't bid they (Co-op) would probably have gotten it."

Under the contract, Middlebrook will be allowed to run only Independent taxis for on-post pickups and Gray will use only his American cabs for pick-up calls to Fort Benning. Gray also owns Radio Cab Co.

How much for a ride?

Here's how zoned fares for taxi service on post will work effective Monday (Aug.10). Each zone has a set fare for one passenger:

Zone 1 (Anywhere on main post): $3. Plus $1 for each additional passenger.

Kelley Hill (Anywhere in Kelley Hill): $1.

Sand Hill (Anywhere in Sand Hill): $1.50.

Main Post to Uchee Creek (or reverse): $8.

Sand Hill to main post: $5.

Kelley Hill to Main Post: $4

Mini Mall to Main Mall: $4 or $2 each for two people.

Van fares to and from Columbus Airport:

One person: $20.

Two people: $11 each.

Three: $9 each.

Four people: $8 each.

Five or more passengers: $7 each.

Six or more passengers: $5 each.

- Metered rates apply to off-post trips and area on Fort Benning not in a zone. Fares, including metered rates, are to be divided by the number of passengers.
- There will be no charge for baggage or luggage.
- No charge for children under age 12 with an adult.
- If you need a cab to wait for you, ask about the charge — there is a cost for waiting.
- Taxis approved for on-post pickup: American (689-3567) and Independent (689-1234).

As Gray understands the deal, if a soldier calls any cab other than American or Independent from Infantry Hall for a ride downtown, that driver cannot come on post to pick up the GI. But a soldier can choose anybody's taxi for a ride onto the post. It is 'on-post' pickup service that after Monday will be forbidden to other companies.

Gray and Middlebrook agreed to have a minimum of 100 cars ready to serve Fort Benning by Monday. Under the contract's terms, most on-post runs will be at flat rates — non-metered. Their on-post taxis "will have a 20-minute response time and we can't have no complaints," Gray said.

The post can dictate the colors and also when and how the monopoly cabs will be inspected. But Gray said Independent taxis will be light blue while his American cars will remain dark blue and white.

What does he think about the monopoly business now that he's a part of it?

"It's going to clean up the cab business and run some undesirables out," Gray said. "It's going to be good for the customers, good for Fort Benning and Columbus. And drivers who stay in the business are going to make more money."

He said the post "is going to demand that we do what should have been done all along" about the cleanliness of taxis and seeing to it that soldiers aren't ripped off.

The contract will pump some $60,000 a year into the Directorate of Community Activities' coffers. Part of the money will go to oversee inspections and deal with the paperwork generated by the taxi operation, post spokesman Rich McDowell has said.

Tom Ryan, a co-owner of Co-op Taxi, said his firm offered $130 per car per month, nearly $8,000 a month more than the winning bid. But it was rejected because "we didn't give them resumes on our dispatchers" and because "our financial statement didn't meet what they wanted."

Ryan said he believes he was suckered into bidding a high per-car rate "just so it would look good to Fort Benning" and just so there would be more than one bidder.

House panel says up to 400 Panamanians died in invasion

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — Between 300 and 400 Panamanians were killed in the U.S. invasion two years ago that ousted dictator Manuel Noriega, a House Armed Services subcommittee said Tuesday.

Probably fewer than 100 of those were innocent bystanders, the panel said, with the rest being military troops, members of Noriega's irregular "Dignity Battalions" or looters. The figures include those killed by both U.S. and Panamanian troops.

The death figures, arrived at through an independent look at lists of names and interviews with officials and others in Panama, are far lower than some estimates that came out in the wake of the invasion President Bush named "Operation Just Cause."

Other figures have ranged as high as 7,000, a number which came from Noriega's own political party. But subcommittee investigators said the larger numbers were the result of guesswork, rumor or speculation.

The panel's investigations subcommittee computerized lists of names compiled by two Panamanian groups — the Institute of Legal Medicine, roughly comparable to a coroner's office, and the Panama Committee for Human Rights.

Interviews were conducted to come up with numbers of those still missing. Initial claims of large hidden burial sites have not been verified two years later, the panel noted in a report.

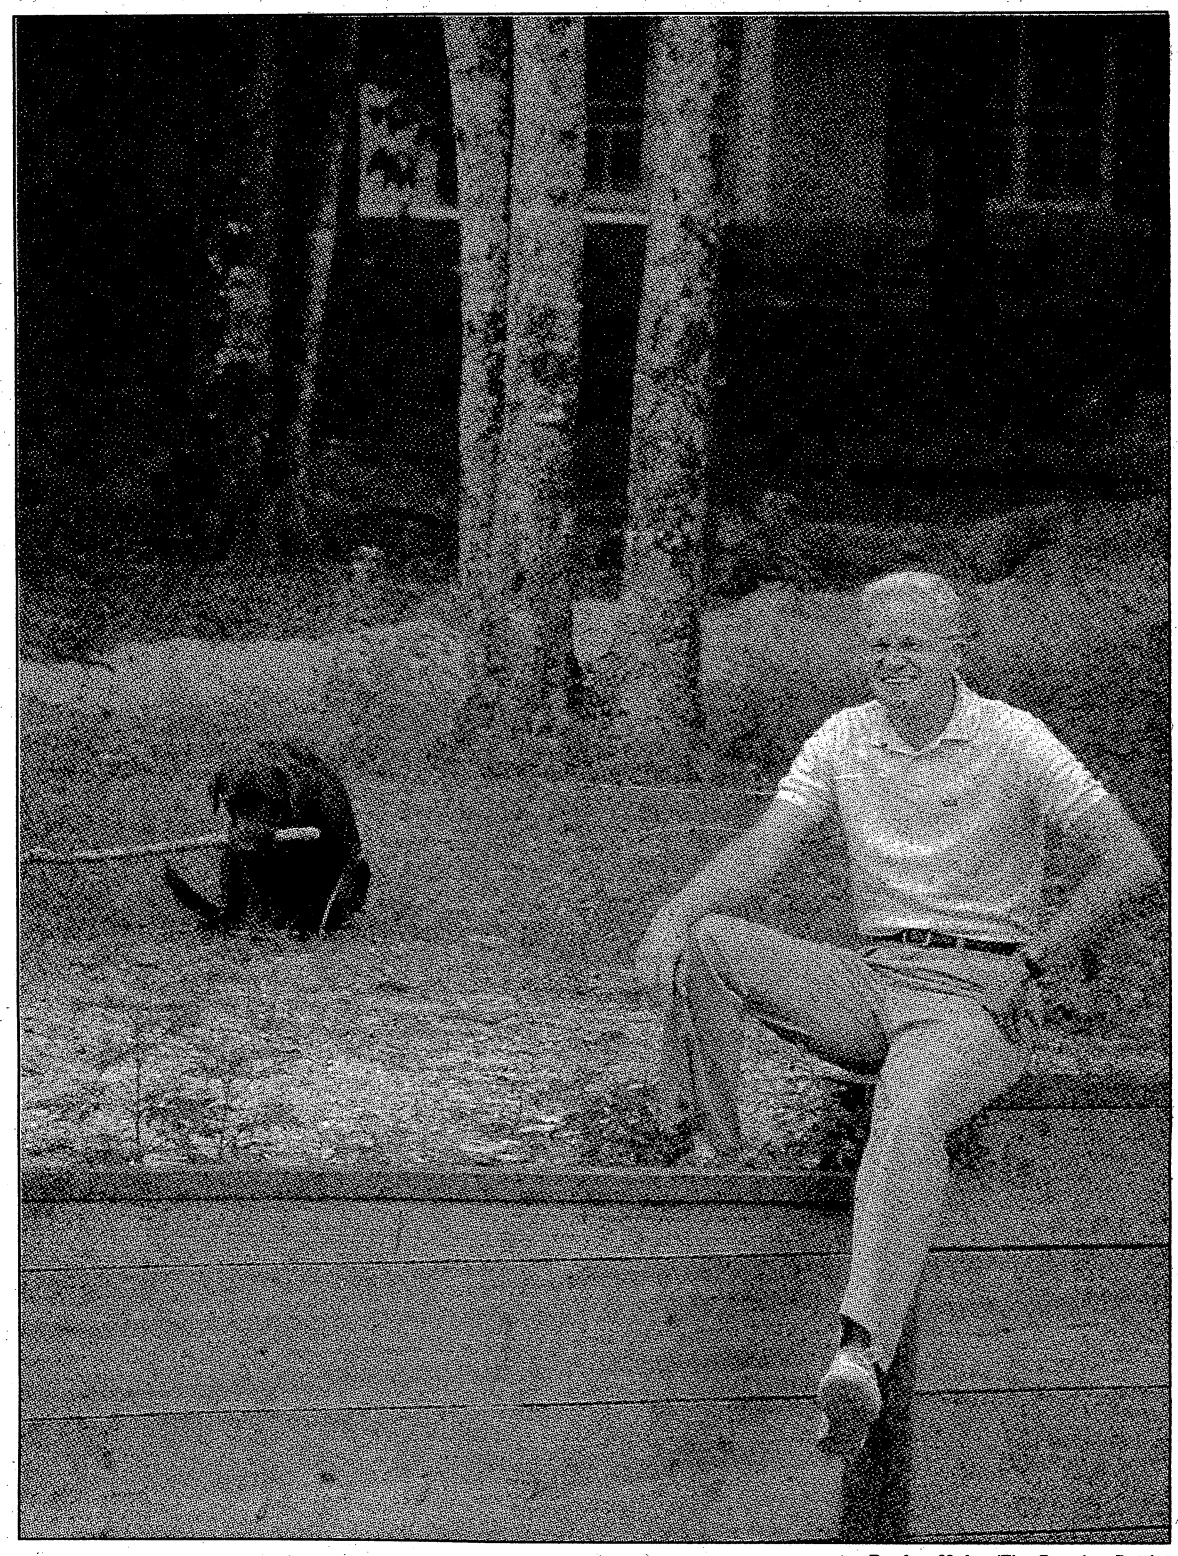
Snap decision created a general eager to lead



By Joe Maher/The Benning Patriot

Retired Lt. Gen. Jack Farris relaxes at his Eufaula, Ala., home with his dog 'Jake.'

By Linda Bosley Dailey
Staff Writer

Jack Farris decided in a day to become a soldier.

But that quick and certain decision led to a military career that lasted 32 years.

During that time, Farris rose from 2nd lieutenant to lieutenant general — from an armored rifle platoon leader to deputy commander in chief of the U.S. Pacific Command — before retiring in Eufaula, Ala., 14 months ago.

Farris decided to enter the military during his senior year in high school, after hearing a guest speaker's address.

World War II veteran Mark Clark, then president of The Citadel, the military college in South Carolina, so impressed Farris with his discussion of commanding troops and leading soldiers that Farris decided that day to enroll at The Citadel and make the military a career.

"I went home and told my father, and he almost dropped dead," said the Charlotte, N.C., native. Farris had intended to study aeronautical engineering at Georgia Tech — and had even already paid some initial fees to the college.

But to The Citadel Farris went, graduating with a bachelor's degree in political science and getting his commission in 1958.

Sixteen years later, the Army sent Farris to Fort Benning to serve as director of the leadership and tactics department in the Infantry School. Then in 1975, he activated the First Advanced Infantry Training Brigade at Sand Hill and served as its commander until 1977.

As commander of the AIT brigade — which evolved into what is now the Infantry Training Brigade — Farris set high standards and took care of his soldiers, said Jim Gallagher, an Army retiree who served as Farris' command sergeant major there.

Farris required drill sergeants to do anything and everything they asked their soldiers to do. "You lead by example, and you don't do it any other way," Farris said.

And because power can corrupt, Farris said, he recognized that drill sergeants, with their absolute authority over recruits, needed to be monitored.

"I had made up my mind that I had to keep a very, very close eye on the brigade. So I did. They never knew when I was going to show up," Farris said. But that meant that he worked nights and weekends, too, dropping in and checking on how his soldiers were faring.

Consequently, he wound up working long hours at the brigade — longer than at any other job he had in the Army — and also had to work at maintaining a balance between work and home.

"You've got to be very careful achieving that balance," Farris said. He and his wife have one daughter. But, he said, he achieved that balance by spending all his free time with his family. "I have a very understanding wife," Farris said, who is familiar with the demands of Army life because she is the daughter of an Army officer herself.

And the Army, too, should strive to take good care of its soldiers and their families, Farris said.

"You've got to genuinely care for the soldier and his family — can't in any way give it lip service," Farris said.

While commanding the AIT Brigade, Gallagher said, Farris attended chapel with his soldiers and took time to talk with them after the services. Then, in the afternoon each Sunday, Farris visited any of his soldiers who were in the hospital.

And if a soldier invited Farris to his wedding, Gallagher said, Farris went. "He never let a soldier down," Gallagher said.

Farris left the AIT Brigade in 1977 and subsequently served with the 4th Infantry Division and the Joint Deployment Agency before being named deputy commanding general of the XVIII Airborne Corps at Fort Bragg.

It was while he was stationed at Fort Bragg that Farris was given command of United States Forces, Grenada, just after the island nation was liberated.

Outspoken and direct, Farris has been candid with his criticism within military circles of the way the liberation was carried out. "It wasn't well done, at all," Farris said. "I would classify that operation and the way it was conducted amateurish. It succeeded because there was just not much of an enemy there."

But Farris was criticized for criticizing the operation. Still, he thought there were many lessons to be learned from the experience. "I did it because in the military we always try to determine what the lessons learned are from things that we do in order that we don't make the same mistakes again."

His comments may have stung, but Farris said, "I've never been accused of being a diplomat."

"He has a lot of integrity," said Gallagher of his friend.

But being retired doesn't mean Farris isn't busy. He's just able to control his own time, and he likes that, he said.

Farris is helping build a room onto his house and volunteers with area historic preservation groups.

He's also looking for a job teaching international relations, a subject in which he holds a master's degree. His undergraduate study of political science as well as his graduate work in international relations served him well in his military career, Farris said.

Serving as deputy commander in chief in the Pacific, his last post before retiring, was one of the most important jobs he held during his career, Farris said.

"In that job, we were responsible for security relations with over 40 countries. And the command spread from the west coast of the United States to the east coast of Africa and pole to pole — half the surface of the earth," Farris said.

Jack Farris

Family: Wife, Diane, and daughter, Marianne, 15.

Education: Bachelor's degree, The Citadel; master's degree, Florida State University.

Hometown: Charlotte, N.C.

Activities: Fishing, hunting, playing golf and tennis, refinishing antiques, working with the Eufaula Heritage Association and the Fendall Hall Committee.

On retirement: "I like being able to control my own time."

On his plans to teach and write: "I just think you need to remain engaged intellectually in something."

On leadership: "You lead by example, and you don't do it any other way."

On being outspoken: "I've never been accused of being a diplomat."

On the invasion of Grenada: "It wasn't well done at all."

On impatience, his greatest weakness: "I want to do it now and I want it done now."

Many soldiers say sex without condoms worth risk of AIDS

From staff, wire reports

About one in six American soldiers surveyed said sex without condoms is worth the risk of getting the AIDS virus, according to a study reported late last month.

The U.S. Army study, conducted by Dr. Lydia Temoshok of the Henry M. Jackson Foundation, surveyed 1,872 men and women at seven army bases in 1991. It found that 16 percent believed that "sex without condoms is worth the risk of possibly getting HIV or AIDS."

Nearly half said they were squeamish about asking their partners to get an AIDS test before having sex with them.

The results are not really surprising, says Sherry Kellman, an AIDS counselor at Fort Benning. "The perception of invulnerability is high among young military people. They often discount the risks and take the chance of having sex without the protection. They don't realize the risk is life or death."

Kellman added that attitudes about sex, both in the military and in the civilian world, has not helped the cause of AIDS education for young people, including soldiers.

While the survey, made public during an AIDS conference in Amsterdam, Netherlands in late July, was limited to the military, Temoshok said, it studied an "ethically and geographically diverse" group of people and thus reflected attitudes in the general U.S. population, and could help predict the actual number of people who are exposed to HIV, the virus that causes AIDS.

The study noted that:

- More than a third said they had sex with at least one person in the past year without knowing whether the person was infected.
- Some 16 percent said they had looked for new sexual partners in "risky" places, such as brothels or strip joints.
- Among those who had "one night stands," 40 percent said they never used condoms. One fourth said they never used condoms with prostitutes.

Post has the power to switch off cool air

By Linda Bosley Dailey
Staff Writer

According to a rate agreement Fort Benning made five years ago with Georgia Power, the Directorate of Engineering and Housing workers must cut the post's energy usage when the utility's electricity demand climbs above a certain level.

Workers stationed in a computer-filled room in a building on Main Post can turn the air conditioner off in homes and offices all across post — and they may do so on the doggiest of the dog days this summer.

According to a rate agreement Fort Benning made five years ago with Georgia Power, the Directorate of Engineering and Housing workers must cut the post's energy usage when the utility's electricity demand climbs above a certain level.

But that agreement means the post will save an estimated $1.1 million this fiscal year because of the lower rate for electricity Georgia Power charges Fort Benning in return for its participation in the peak-shaving program, said Mark Fincher, acting chief of DEH's energy branch.

Energy branch workers first turn off non-essential equipment, such as pumps or motors, then turn off the air conditioners in offices before shutting down air conditioners in housing areas, according to DEH documents.

The DEH workers have two systems by which they can control the air conditioners on post.

In on-post housing, air conditioners are equipped with receivers to detect the radio signal DEH transmits when it must curtail the post's energy demand. But in homes where someone with a medical problem — such as asthma or a heart condition — lives, DEH disconnects the receivers so air conditioners can remain on during curtailment periods. Authorizations to exempt homes from the air conditioning cut-off come from Martin Army Community Hospital, Fincher said.

Within office, administrative and industrial areas, a multimillion dollar computerized Energy Monitoring and Control System allows workers to turn air conditioning units on and off as either a curtailment period or the work day begins and ends, Fincher said. And the system also allows workers to monitor the units' performance so problems are quickly detected and fixed, Fincher said.

About 100 buildings on post, or approximately 6 million square feet, are monitored under the EMCS. Martin Army Community Hospital and Dental Clinic No. 1 will be added to the system early next year, Fincher said. The system will be used at the hospital to turn off appropriate heating and cooling units when the offices are unoccupied, but won't be used when energy use must be cut under the peak-shaving agreement. The hospital is exempt from the cooling cut-off requirements, Fincher said.

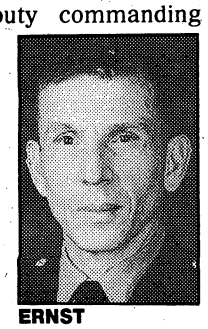
So far this year, DEH has had to cut energy usage four times by turning off air conditioners for as long as four hours, Fincher said. He expects that DEH may need to cut electrical usage two or three times more.

Fort Benning, Georgia Power's 12th largest customer, is one of about 250 customers that participate in the utility's peak-shaving program in exchange for a lower rate on electricity, Fincher said. Fort Benning also participates in a similar program with its natural gas supplier, United Cities Gas Co., he said.

Hendrix replacing Ernst as Benning's deputy CG

Fort Benning is getting a new deputy commanding general and assistant commandant of the Infantry School.

Brig. Gen. John W. Hendrix, executive officer to the Supreme Headquarters Allied Powers, Europe, in Caseau, Belgium, has been selected to succeed Brig. Gen. Carl F. Ernst as Fort Benning's deputy commanding general and assistant commandant of the U.S. Army Infantry School.



ERNST

Hendrix is scheduled to assume his new duties here Monday during a 9 a.m. ceremony on York Field. Ernst will become an assistant division commander of the 82nd Airborne Division, Fort Bragg, N.C.

Prior to his current position, the 49-year-old Hendrix was an assistant division commander of the 1st Armored Division, serving with that unit during Operation Desert Storm.

Hendrix has bachelor's degree in electrical engineering from Georgia Institute of Technology and a master's degree in history from Middle Tennessee State University.

Hendrix is a graduate of the Infantry Officer Advanced Course, Command and General Staff College and the Army War College.

During the Vietnam War, Hendrix served as a communications officer, company commander in the 1st Battalion (Airborne), 506th Infantry, 101st Airborne Division, earning two Silver Stars for his actions against enemy forces.

His only previous assignment to Fort Benning was as ranger instructor at Mountain Ranger Camp from May 1966 to June 1967.

Hendrix's other awards and decorations include two Legions of Merit and three Bronze Stars plus the Combat Infantry Badge, Airborne Badge, Army Aviation Badge and Ranger Tab.

Hendrix and his wife, Cheri, have two children.

Troops face intense scrutiny at Irwin

Desert exercise will cost Army $8.5 million

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

If you don't like folks looking over your shoulder, stay away from the Army's National Training Center at Fort Irwin, Calif.

What observers — also called controllers — at this isolated desert training center can't see electronically, they get through observers' eyes.

From the moment the 3rd Brigade, 24th Infantry Division hits the "box" — the desert training areas some 35 miles north of Barstow, Calif. — on Saturday, they will be under almost constant scrutiny.

The last of the brigade's troops left Fort Benning by plane on Monday. There will be about 3,000 from Fort Benning, 1,500 from the 101st Airborne at Fort Campbell, Ky., 600 from Fort Stewart and 60 from Fort Bragg, N.C., involved in this exercise, the Army said. The 1st Battalion, 18th Infantry won't be making this trip because light infantry units from Fort Campbell are involved. Some 380 railroad cars carrying the brigade's tanks, Bradley Fighting Vehicles and other equipment left several days ahead of the troops.

Soldiers were expected to be involved in drawing equipment — from food to hummvees — through today, getting ready for the move to the field on Saturday.

This is not a cheap undertaking. It will cost about $8.5 million including $1.9 million for the 101st Airborne's expenses, officials said.

The entire operation is under intense scrutiny. If a company commander goofs while briefing his platoon leaders and sergeants on how to fight an upcoming desert battle, his words will come back to haunt him — and it won't take long. There will be a checklist waiting at the end of the fight showing what he did, right or wrong.

Observers — the "umpires" of the war games the brigade will fight here for two weeks — will be able to see much of those fights in the "Star Wars Building" where just about every battlefield mistake will be recorded by electronic sensors.

In the Mojave Desert the average summer daytime temperature is 104. It falls to an average of 78 at night.

By Don Coker/The Benning Patriot

After-the-fact electronic scrutiny of battlefield performance is just part of the training here in the Mojave Desert, where the average summer daytime temperature is 104. It falls to an average of 78 at night.

"After action reviews" of every fight, whether it's company- or brigade-level, are part of the training. Observers will go over in minute detail every aspect of each fight, even down to whether a unit's reconnaissance is properly done.

That's part of what the 5,000 soldiers of the brigade and it's attached units will undergo in the desert during "Operation Desert Hammer IV."

There won't be much slack time — 14 days in the field away from telephones and junk food, two MREs (Meals, Ready to Eat) a day and sometimes 23-hour days — although commanders can get docked for "poor sleep schedules" during these maneuvers.

There will be about 3,000 from Fort Benning, 1,500 from the 101st Airborne at Fort Campbell, Ky., 600 from Fort Stewart and 60 from Fort Bragg, N.C., involved in this exercise, the Army said.

"This is the closest thing to war" when it comes to training, said Maj. Ron Bradstreet, the brigade intelligence officer. He'll be responsible for keeping Col. Robert St. Onge, the brigade commander, updated on weather and terrain in battle areas. It's his job, too, to tell combat leaders where the enemy is, what he's like, and what he's likely to do in various battle scenarios.

The "OPPFOR," the "enemy" here, is made up of U.S. soldiers skilled in Soviet tactics and doctrine. And the Red Star will be much in evidence on uniforms, T-72 tanks and other "Soviet" gear.

The 3rd Brigade soldiers will be returning to Fort Irwin's 'Dust Bowl' — a staging area for troops headed to the desert or toward home — on Aug. 22. Return flights to Lawson Army airfield begin Aug. 26. The last flight home is scheduled for Aug. 29, the Army said.

Part of this deployment involves exercising the "chain of concern" that's part of the rear-detachment operation, Bradstreet said. St. Onge wants to be sure that spouses left behind will have the assistance they need in dealing with family problems, whether it's broken vehicles or sick children.

St. Onge's first order for the operation? "Safety first!" Bradstreet and others said.

U.S. to track Gulf War-related illnesses

From wire reports

In an effort to avert a controversy like that surrounding Agent Orange, federal officials plan a Persian Gulf Registry to address questions about health problems being attributed to the Kuwaiti oil fires and other illnesses being reported by scores of Gulf War veterans.

The Department of Veterans Affairs has asked Congress to create the registry and appropriate about $1 million to track the health of those who served in the gulf.

"It's a way for us to monitor," said Terry Jemison, a VA spokesman.

The VA and other federal agencies are already compiling data about troop movements and air quality in different regions of the gulf to help determine which troops faced the greatest potential exposure to toxic fumes. Officials said that is the kind of critical information missing in the investigation of Agent Orange, a defoliant used during the Vietnam War that has been linked to cancer, birth defects and other health problems.

A range of health problems have been reported since the Gulf War ended early in 1991. Some veterans have reported vague symptoms, such as continuing fatigue, that they attribute to inhaling smoke from burning oil wells or fumes from diesel fuel. Others have reported suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder, and some have linked miscarriages to vaccinations given to troops before they were sent to the gulf.

The Department of Defense and other federal agencies say they are investigating reports thoroughly but have found little evidence of adverse health effects.

Spokesmen at the American Legion's headquarters in Washington say they have received complaints from at least 35 people who served in the gulf about mysterious illnesses with nonspecific symptoms. Some of the callers blame their problems on exposure to fumes and smoke from the 611 oil wells the Iraqis set on fire during the war.

"The symptoms are very broad," said Steve Robertson, lobbyist for the Legion. "One common symptom everybody has is fatigue." Those who served in areas where the smoke was heaviest also suffered respiratory problems, he said.

Robertson said he is "very optimistic" the Defense Department will be willing to bring in private environmental health specialists to assess the complaints about toxic fumes.

Robertson, a National Guardsman, is among those who attribute persistent fatigue to his service in the war.

"I was very athletic prior to deployment. I was playing in two basketball leagues at the same time," he said. "Now, I have to cut my yard in segments. Monday, I was cleaning out the garage and my 5-year-old daughter asked me to show her how to jump rope. I jumped rope for two minutes and I ended up having to sleep for three hours. You're talking about a guy who was a jock ever since he was born."

A Defense Department spokeswoman said the department has conducted studies and continues to study reports of smoke exposure and other clusters of health problems that may be gulf-related, ranging from post-traumatic stress disorder to a parasitic infection called leishmaniasis, from possible higher rates of miscarriages to multiple symptoms reported by 120 Indiana reservists. In all, 570,000 troops served during the Gulf War.

"The Department of Defense is very concerned about the health of soldiers, both during the war and after the war," said spokeswoman Susan Hansen.

A Navy study of 2,700 Marines found no serious health effects as a result of smoke from oil well fires, although it did find slightly elevated levels of respiratory symptoms among those who were closest to the fires.

About 9 percent of Gulf War military personnel have reported symptoms of post-traumatic stress disorder, and as many as 34 percent appeared to experience other forms of psychological stress after their return, according to the Department of Veterans Affairs. Those with the most combat exposure reported the more severe symptoms.

Congress puts brakes on Star Wars

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon's "Star Wars" program, battered by technical and political setbacks, is being brought back to earth by a Congress that has tired of spending billions of dollars on ambitious projects that never seem to materialize.

Faced with reports from Defense Department insiders that building the shield against a nuclear missile attack would be riskier and more expensive than Congress was told less than a year ago, lawmakers who funded several bold schemes for nearly a decade have hit the brakes.

"Reality's finally caught up with them," said John Pike, director of space policy for the Federation of American Scientists and a longtime critic of the administration's Strategic Defense Initiative.

Sen. Sam Nunn, D-Ga., chairman of the Armed Services Committee and architect of a compromise that kept the program intact last year, engineered the slowdown after contending that administration officials had misled Congress when they said they could build the first antimissile system by 1996.

The final shape of the scaled-back program must await further legislative action expected this fall, but it has become clear in recent days that both the House and the Senate want less Star Wars rather than more. And the sense of urgency that drove them last year to push for early deployment has nearly vanished, practically guaranteeing that no system will be operational before the turn of the century.

The cutback will represent a defeat for President Bush, who has sought to increase spending for SDI even while cutting back most other items in the defense budget.

In the warm afterglow of the Persian Gulf War, when U.S. Patriot missiles were hailed for thwarting Iraq's Scud missile attacks, Congress was quick to approve a new fast track for deploying the ground-based elements of SDI's antimissile system by 1996. It was spurred on by Iraqi President Saddam Hussein's efforts to build weapons of mass destruction, which bolstered those who argued the United States needed to protect itself against Saddam or another renegade Third World leader.

Those concerns were heightened by the dramatic breakup of the Soviet Union.

How things have changed in less than a year.

The actual effectiveness of the Patriot during the war has been called into serious question by outside specialists who say the military failed to show that the missile actually destroyed or diverted more than a handful of incoming Scuds. The Pentagon now acknowledges that its original assessment of stunning success was overblown.

In testimony before Congress, CIA Director Robert M. Gates said he does not foresee any new Third World country developing an intercontinental ballistic missile capable of hitting the United States for at least a decade.

But the most serious setback came when respected Pentagon analysts who examined the plans in detail said that to meet the 1996 deadline, the missiles would have to be produced and installed before they could be fully tested.

That signaled to Congress that it was embarked on a high-risk crash program to build and deploy weapons that are on the very edge of existing technology — perhaps even beyond the abilities of current science — and that, once built, they might not work.

'Unforgiven' shows the evolution of Eastwood's cynical gunslinger

By Dave Kehr
Chicago Tribune

With "Unforgiven," Clint Eastwood has created an adult Western that can stand with the great accomplishments of the genre's golden age — John Ford's "The Searchers," Howard Hawks' "Rio Bravo," Anthony Mann's "Bend of the River," Budd Boetticher's "The Tall T."

This dark, melancholic film is a reminder — never more necessary than now — of what the American cinema is capable of, in the way of expressing a mature, morally complex and challenging view of the world.

Dedicated to the two filmmakers who shaped Eastwood's early career as an actor — Sergio Leone ("A Fistful of Dollars," "The Good, the Bad and the Ugly") and Don Siegel ("Coogan's Bluff," "Dirty Harry") — "Unforgiven" also functions as a retrospective of Eastwood's life in movies, as his image has evolved over the years from cynical young gunslinger, to middle-age icon of law-and-order anxiety, and finally to this current, rich period of sunset reflection and reconsideration.

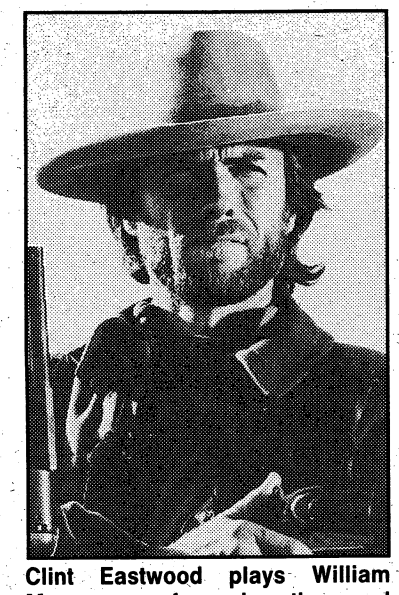
Eastwood, more gaunt than ever and his gray hair cropped close, plays William Munny, a reformed outlaw and hired killer whose attempt to start a new life as a farmer and family man has suffered a severe setback with the death of his wife.

When an apprentice gunfighter, the fresh-faced, self-styled "Schofield Kid" (Canadian newcomer Jaimz Woolvett), comes to him with news of a freshly posted bounty, Munny gives in to his restlessness and rides off with the eager young man, leaving his two children in the care of a neighbor.

Though the task sounds simple — kill a pair of cowhands who beat up a prostitute in the town of Big Whiskey, and collect a $1,000 reward posted by the prostitute's angry colleagues — Munny insists on enlisting the help of an old associate, the now peaceably settled Ned Logan (Morgan Freeman). Reluctantly, Logan signs on.

Arriving in Big Whiskey, the three men encounter some stiff competition — from the local sheriff, a corrupt lawman (Gene Hackman) who has let the two cowhands off in return for a trivial fine, and a flamboyant bounty hunter, English Bob (Richard Harris), who has arrived in town with his official biographer in tow, newspaperman W.W. Beauchamp (Saul Rubinek).

It's basic situation established, "Unforgiven" unfolds through a series of moral comparisons and contrasts among the characters, developed through a complex use of parallel cutting of simultaneous action (a Siegel technique that Eastwood has ably adapted).



Clint Eastwood plays William Munny, a reformed outlaw and hired killer whose attempt to start a new life as a farmer and family man has suffered a severe setback with the death of his wife.

As the moral relativism mounts, it becomes clear that the situation is not so simple — that one of the cowhands may, in fact, be innocent; that the punishment demanded by the prostitutes may not be justice, but revenge; that killing no longer comes so easily to William Munny, now that he has known a family.

Photographed in dark shadows and dimmed colors by Eastwood's regular collaborator, Jack N. Green, "Unforgiven" comes to resemble a film noir more than a Western. This is a claustrophobic Western, which takes place chiefly at night, in cramped, shallow spaces. The camera, generally pitched at a slightly downward, ironic angle, skeptically measures the actions of the characters, as the violence escalates and its senselessness becomes more apparent.

Munny wants out, but there is no escape once the wheels have been set in motion. Captured and severely beaten by the sheriff's men, Munny suffers wounds that transform his face into a death's head; he becomes a ghostly, implacable figure, the humanity he has so painfully earned slowly draining away.

His public image to the contrary, the attitude toward violence in Eastwood's work has always been ambiguous, troubled. His character is no Arnold Schwarzenegger, joyfully and unthinkingly exercising his power over others, but a man in the grip of a destructive urge, a violence that is directed as much inwardly as outwardly, the expression of a profound uneasiness with himself and his place in the world.

"Unforgiven" is no complacent fable of moral redemption. Though Munny begins as one of the best adjusted and most socially integrated heroes of Eastwood's career, he ends as a monster, as a barroom confrontation turns into an appalling massacre. The motivation is no longer profit but loyalty, though such nuances no longer seem to matter. Violence is as devastating to its perpetrator as to its victim, regardless of its justification.

The film effectively reverses the trajectory of Eastwood's other great accomplishment in the genre, "The Outlaw Josey Wales" (1976), the story of a gunslinger who becomes the leader and protector of a community of outcasts.

This is not an artist whose vision has mellowed with the years. At a time when American movies appear to have abandoned all ambition, Eastwood seems more passionately engaged with his medium than ever.

Rating: R. Violence, adult situations.

Ripley's museum in Orlando has that sinking feeling, look

From wire reports

ORLANDO, Fla. — A building has fallen and it can't get up . . .

Well, not exactly.

For the past few weeks, tourists on Orlando's International Drive have been lining up to take pictures of the strange-looking structure at No. 8201 I-Drive.

No, the building has not fallen into a sinkhole. It only appears sunken.

It is the newest addition to Central Florida's attractions world: a Ripley's Believe It or Not! museum with an only-in-Florida sinkhole theme.

The oddities museum opened for business July 25.

The 8,900-square-foot building has been constructed with the illusion that it is sinking — but inside, of course, it is level.

While the outside is strange, the approximate 200 exhibits inside range from the hideously bizarre to the merely odd.

Consider: a stuffed full-grown cow with a hoof growing on its back. ("People think these things are so strange, but these sort(s) of animal abnormalities happen a lot more than people think," said Sandi Jones, director of sales and marketing.)

Heads made out of wax feature a man with two pupils in each eye, a woman with a series of rings stretching her neck to giraffelike proportions, a man with a candle burned into the top of his scalp and a man contorting his lips to fit two discs.

This $2 million Ancient City Entertainment Ltd. venture is the first Ripley's franchise in Florida.

The museums of the weird owe their existence to Robert L. Ripley, who, Jones said, traveled the world collecting oddities. Besides the exhibits, the museums incorporate video presentations, illusions, animation and music.

But does Central Florida really need another attraction? Are people really clamoring to see a "Mona Lisa" made of toast?

Yes, according to Jones.

"We are at a perfect location. Plus, we have what no other attraction has: People learn something by touring the museum and they also have a lot of fun."

Sgt. 1st Class Michael Trinkle demonstrates use of the Nautilus equipment at the Army Physical Fitness School.

Fitness School has fighting chance

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

Lt. Col. Samuel G. Pride says if it weren't for Arnold Schwarzenegger, he probably wouldn't be here at Fort Benning.

Neither, for that matter, would the Army Physical Fitness School, the newest school at Fort Benning.

The school was about to be terminated in 1991 when Schwarzenegger wrote letters to President George Bush and Gen. Colin Powell, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, urging that it be kept open. The budget cutters were after the school in full gallop.

Schwarzenegger, apparently an expert on termination after the 'Terminator' movies, gave its proponents a shot in the arm by getting involved to stop that move.

The actor, known for bulging muscles he admits were built with the help of steroids — substances he now says he hasn't used in at least 10 years — and the little dialogue in his movies, is chairman of the President's Council on Physical Fitness and Sports.

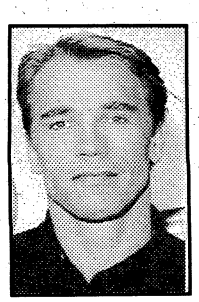
The muscleman's letters obviously grabbed somebody's attention, Pride said. "I'm convinced it was his letters that saved us," he adds.

Well, actually, Schwarzenegger was only half-successful. On Oct 1, 1991, the school's 34-member staff was cut in half.

It has a top-heavy staff today. There's the commandant, Lt. Col. David D. White (soon to be colonel) and not yet aboard at Fort Benning; Pride; three majors, two captains, a first sergeant, two sergeants first class and one staff sergeant. Three GS-12s, one GS-11 civilian employee and three civilian clerks complete the roster. The staff is so top heavy that "if something needs to be done, you'd better do it yourself," said Pride.

The staff formulates and writes Army doctrine dealing with physical fitness training. The school also runs two courses for commanders or trainers. Until last year, the courses were held at Fort Benjamin Harrison, Ind., at that time home to the school. Junior-grade officers and mid- to upper-level NCOs came from all over the world to learn how to teach fitness training — or how to teach others to do it.

But when the latest budget cuts came, the school's funding was so decimated that the resident school for the four-week Master Trainer's Course and one-week Exercise Leader's Course were discontinued. Fort Benjamin Harrison is being shut down. Last fall the decision to move the school here was announced, and the staff's advance party arrived in April. There are still a couple of staff members not yet here.



SCHWARZENEGGER

"I'm convinced it was (Arnold Schwarzenegger's) letters that saved us." — Lt. Col. Samuel G. Pride

Operating on tight money, the staff now takes the course to the field — which could be anywhere U.S. troops are stationed. One- to four-man teams fly around the country — at the expense of the people who need their expertise — participating in conferences aimed at making sure commanders and fitness trainers — active Army, Reserve or National Guard — live by Army regulations when it comes to training programs.

The Master Trainer's and Exercise Leader's courses are also now taught on this "mobile training basis" — wherever a post or commander will pick up the tab.

They also teach instructors how to run specific programs for specific objectives: Too many knee problems? Maybe a change in required exercises is the answer.

Are your artillery crews great runners who have to struggle lifting 155-howitzer rounds? Maybe there's too much running and not enough strength-building exercises in their PT programs. These guys can fix it, but they don't go around saying, "This is what you're supposed to do," Pride said. "I give them general guidelines within which they can best spend their time . . . It does them no good to be great runners if they can't lift 95-pound (artillery) rounds."

Fitting a PT program to a unit's battle tasks is what the school calls "battle-oriented" physical training — give the troops a well-rounded program that's keyed to making them best-prepared for their combat roles.

Another role for these trainers is teaching other physical fitness gurus that you don't have to have a gymnasium to have good fitness programs. Pride likes to show off a photograph of a soldier doing curls with two ammunition boxes filled with sand.

These trainers aren't just on-the-job qualified. Only one of the officers less than a master's degree. Three have taught physical education at the U.S. Military Academy, and there are a couple of doctorate degrees among the school's civilians.

"We know of what we speak," says Pride. "That's the reason our product (people and training programs) is respected around the world."

Take a tour of memorable Monroe sites

From wire reports

LOS ANGELES — Wednesday, July 29, marked the 30th anniversary of Marilyn Monroe's death, and yet public fascination with the troubled blond actress continues unabated.

Last year, the nephew and brother of the late Chicago mob boss, Sam Giancana, wrote a book claiming that Monroe was killed with a lethal suppository by Giancana's minions. This year, actress Susan Strasberg published a memoir about Monroe. In all, about two dozen books have been written about MM by authors ranging from Norman Mailer to Gloria Steinem.

And hardly a week goes by without a television program questioning the circumstances of her death. Was it a suicide? An accident? Murder? After three decades, the debate still rages, still titillates.

Meanwhile, Marilyn's mug can be found on T-shirts, posters, ashtrays and countless other items.

If you're among those suffering from Marilyn mania and you're planning a trip to Los Angeles, you can spend a day conducting your own tour of memorable Monroe locations. The following guide will get you started.

■ The Job Corps Training Center, operated by the YWCA, 1215 Lodi Place, Hollywood.

This was once the Hollywood Studio Club, which served as a home for young starlets for nearly 50 years. The club was built in 1916 and moved to this working-class neighborhood in 1926; its name still can be seen on the adobe-colored building.

Marilyn lived in Room 334 in 1948. Other notable residents included actresses Kim Novak, Donna Reed, Dorothy Malone, Nancy Kwan, Ann B. Davis and Sally Struthers, and author Ayn Rand.

■ The Mediterranean-style mansion at 141 Carolwood Drive, Beverly Hills.

Located on a small cul-de-sac off the famed Sunset Strip, and called Owlwood, this is one of the most impressive estates in Beverly Hills. In 1948, it was home to 70-year-old Joseph Schenck, a co-founder of 20th Century-Fox. And in the guest house, reputedly at Schenck's beck and call for sexual favors, lived, briefly, the 22-year-old Marilyn.

File photo

The life and death of actress Marilyn Monroe still fascinates the public.

That same year, according to some accounts, Marilyn was signed to a six-month contract at Columbia Pictures after Schenck pulled some strings. Marilyn told an interviewer in 1954 that she always had been attracted to older men.

"Older men are kinder, and they know more, and the ones I've known were important in the business, and have tried to help me."

After Schenck died, the owners of this mansion included Sonny and Cher and Tony Curtis.

Years later, at the other end of the cul-de-sac, in the pink, two-story mansion with a heart-shaped swimming pool on the corner of Sunset Boulevard, lived muscleman Mickey Hargitay and his wife, actress Jayne Mansfield. Throughout her career, Jayne was Avis to Marilyn's Hertz.

■ Rainbow Bar & Grill, 9015 Sunset Blvd., Beverly Hills.

Marilyn met baseball icon Joe DiMaggio here on a blind date in 1952, when it was called the Villa Nova restaurant. Marilyn was only vaguely aware of who DiMaggio was and was not enthusiastic about the date. She showed up two hours late.

They were married on Jan. 14, 1954, in DiMaggio's hometown of San Francisco.

■ The house at 508 N. Palm Drive, Beverly Hills.

This was the honeymoon home of Marilyn and DiMaggio. They were divorced nine months after they married. A throng of reporters convened at the house to interview the couple when the news got out.

Another blond screen idol, Jean Harlow, lived two doors away at 512 N. Palm Drive in an earlier era.

Try to visit Palm Drive in the spring, when the jacaranda trees lining both sides of the street are in spectacular purple bloom.

■ Peter Lawford's former beach house, 625 Palisades Beach Road, Santa Monica.

Between 1960 and 1961, Marilyn had several secret trysts here with President John F. Kennedy.

It's a Spanish-style house with a red tile roof and a pool in the rear near the beach. A sign warns would-be trespassers to beware of an attack dog. Access to the beach is a few doors to the south — just beyond 705 Palisades Beach Road, the home in which Douglas Fairbanks Sr. died in 1939.

■ The house in which Marilyn died, 12305 Fifth Helena Drive in Brentwood.

This is the last house on the left on a short and narrow dead-end street that looks like a posh alley. Getting a glimpse of the bungalow is tough: There is a 6-foot wrought-iron rolling gate in the driveway with canvas stretched across it. There is no house number on the gate. Marilyn bought the home for $75,000 shortly before her death.

After her fling with President Kennedy, Marilyn began an affair with his brother, then-Attorney General Robert Kennedy. He was in California the weekend she died and there is evidence he visited Marilyn at her home — perhaps to end their relationship — the day before her death.

■ Westwood Memorial Cemetery, 1218 Glendon Ave. in Westwood.

It is here that Marilyn Monroe is entombed in an outdoor crypt. She once told a writer that an appropriate epitaph might be: "Here Lies Marilyn Monroe — 38-23-36." But the inscription simply reads: "Marilyn Monroe. 1926-1962."

DiMaggio, Marilyn's second husband, handled the funeral arrangements and did not invite her friends in the film industry that he so detested.

For 20 years, DiMaggio had six red roses placed outside Marilyn's crypt three times a week. Without explanation, he stopped the ritual in 1982. Thieves once tried in vain to break into the vault.

Marilyn's final resting place is hard to find. Westwood Memorial is near the UCLA campus and perhaps no more than 20 yards off Wilshire Boulevard, one of Los Angeles' busiest thoroughfares. Amid the high-rise office buildings at Wilshire and Glendon is the tiny Westwood cemetery.

Preacher challenges urban youth to reject gang life

From wire reports

BALTIMORE — "Come and stand right in front," says the Rev. Frank M. Reid III, beckoning the youngest members of the "men's" Bible study group to the front of the church.

They're boys ranging from 3 to 16 years old. "Give them a big hand, give them a very big hand," the preacher encourages the congregation.

Reid, pastor of Bethel African Methodist Episcopal Church, has developed a ministry that targets the problems of black men, from youngsters up.

Reid tells the young men in his Bible study group that real respect is earned from getting a job, attending church and making a positive contribution to the community.

Standing in the pulpit of the Gothic-style church situated in one of Baltimore's tougher neighborhoods, he challenges them to reject the status symbols of ghetto life: luxury cars, gold chains and drug money.

"When one looks at the destruction that exists in our streets and neighborhoods today — the young men . . . that are intrinsically good and know that robbing and stealing and selling dope is wrong, but somehow because everyone else is doing it they go along," Reid preaches.

"And look what they've gotten by going along. Communities that are divided, children that are killing each other, men that are in jail, women that are prostitutes, middle-class black folks that have things but have lost their integrity."

Bethel, one of the oldest and largest AME churches, has 8,000 members and is packed on Sundays. Members are sometimes forced to view Reid on closed circuit television in two overflow rooms. Reid's sermons also are carried on cable and a local television station.

When Reid, 40, became pastor of Bethel three years ago, he looked out and saw pews mostly filled with women. Since then, the number of men attending Bethel has nearly doubled.

Draped in colorful African cloth, Reid begins his sermons softly but builds to a powerful message.

"Why is it so easy for people to go along with the crowd?" he asks his parishioners. "Are you willing to dare to be different?"

Reid tells the young men in his Bible study group that real respect is earned from getting a job, attending church and making a positive contribution to the community.

In a recent interview at his church office, Reid said he has no intention of being the only one to get the message across. His office is adorned not only with pictures of Jesus, but photographs of Malcolm X and the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.

"I don't want to become the surrogate father to these children in the community because I'm just one man," said Reid, who holds degrees from Harvard Divinity School and Yale University. "I see my role as training the men and the men doing."

Reid has 24 volunteer ministers who run more than 50 programs at Bethel, including an all-male choir, an all-male worship service and the all-male Bible study group.

Dale Clark, who heads the all-male ushering board, said to reach young people today it is necessary to offer them something better than gang life.

"There is a culture out there that says your manhood can be measured by the size of your gun, the size of your bank account or the size of your home," he said.

Black pilots recall Truman's fight for them

From wire reports

OSHKOSH, Wis. — Chauncy Spencer figures he and hundreds of other black pilots flew combat missions in World War II because Harry Truman was willing to fight old prejudices.

Spencer, recalling his experiences among the blacks known during the war as Tuskegee Airmen, attended the Experimental Aircraft Association's 40th annual exposition where a special salute to the war's black pilots was held Tuesday night.

Truman was a senator from Missouri when he heard about the opposition facing blacks who tried to enlist in the Army Air Corps, Spencer said.

The future president urged Congress to appropriate $3 million to train black pilots at Tuskegee Air Field in Alabama, he said.

Spencer said he flew to Washington, D.C., to campaign for blacks and accidentally ran across Truman in an underpass that connected federal buildings.

The senator later viewed Spencer's plane which he said had survived a crash during the trip to Washington. He recalled Truman saying: "If you've got the guts to fly this thing I'm looking at, I've got the guts to fight for you."

An estimated 996 blacks earned their wings at Tuskegee. They flew more than 15,000 sorties in P-39s, P-47s and P-51s, manning combat and bomber escort missions from southern France to the Balkans.

Records show 66 were killed and 32 were captured by the enemy.

The EAA's seven-day convention opened Friday and attracts thousands of aircraft and spectators from throughout the world. It established a Tuskegee Airmen exhibit at the show grounds near Oshkosh's Wittman Regional Airport.

The 332nd Fighter Group was credited with downing more than 250 enemy planes. German Luftwaffe pilots called its members Black Birdmen while grateful U.S. bomber crewmen dubbed them the Black Redtail Angels.

"I've met people to this date — I'm speaking mostly of black Americans — who say to me: 'I didn't know they had blacks flying in World War II,'" Felix Kirkpatrick of Chicago, a retired brewery worker, said.

Kirkpatrick, 77, logged 70 missions escorting B-24 and B-17 bombers. He was awarded the Distinguished Flying Cross and Air Medal with five clusters. He left the Air Corps as a major.

Prejudice followed the Tuskegee Airmen to Europe, Col. Charles McGee said.

"Segregation was strictly enforced," Kirkpatrick said.

After completing a mission, McGee said, he wasn't allowed to use the same rest camp as whites. He was harassed if he went into a pub, he said.

But the Tuskegee pilots' contributions helped convince the newly created Air Force in 1947 to integrate officially, a year before President Truman ended segregation in the military by executive order.

McGee later flew combat missions in Korea and Vietnam.

Buffalo soldiers honored

From wire reports

PHILADELPHIA — Small U.S. flags fluttered last week in the Philadelphia National Cemetery over the graves of 61 Buffalo soldiers, members of black Army units originally formed to fight on the Western frontier.

While their units were segregated, the flags were the only thing that distinguished their graves Tuesday from those of the thousands of other members of various ethnic and racial backgrounds who are buried in the cemetery.

"It is important to keep alive the memory of these brave individuals who gave so freely in the defense of our nation," said cemetery director Dee Blake. "We are proud to play a part in this special recognition of these special soldiers."

The flags, which decorated the graves from Friday through Tuesday, were the Philadelphia cemetery's response to Saturday's dedication of a monument to the Buffalo Soldier units at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., by Gen. Colin Powell, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Blacks fought for the United States in the American Revolution and in the Civil War. But they didn't get a chance to make the military a career until 1866, when Congress created the 9th and 10th Cavalries and all-black infantry units that formed the 24th and 25th Regiments.

The black cavalry soldiers fought along the frontier in the Indian Wars. The first was against Cheyenne tribes along Kansas-Pacific Railroad lines.

"They engaged the Cheyenne in a series of skirmishes and firefights, and won the respect of the Indian warriors," said William Trower, Philadelphia cemetery director trainee.

"Reportedly, the Cheyenne gave them the name Buffalo Soldiers because of their ferocity in battle and their hair and dusty coats reminded them of the buffalo's mane. The men of the 10th accepted the term as a badge of honor."

WW II 50TH ANNIVERSARY

U.S. Marines landed on Guadalcanal 50 years ago this week, overrunning the Japanese airstrip and renaming it Henderson Field. A Japanese cruiser squadron decisively defeated an Allied force in a night battle near Savo Island causing the Allies to withdraw transport ships because of the Japanese threat. This move prevented the planned Japanese attack at Lunga Point. It also left the Marines on Guadalcanal with dramatic shortages of heavy equipment and supplies.

Here, according to research by the Military History Division at Fort Benning, were the top news items of the week:

■

In North America, Gen. Bernard Montgomery assumed command of Britain's Eighth Army after its previous commander, Gen. W.H.F. Gott, died from wounds suffered when his plane was shot down on a flight to Cairo.

■

In the Mediterranean, the Allies launched Operation Pedestal which featured two battleships, four carriers, seven cruisers, and 32 destroyers, escorting 14 merchant ships. Despite the loss of the carrier, HMS Eagle, a destroyer, nine firefighters and the cruiser, HMS Manchester, the convoy successfully reached Malta with vital supplies.

■

President Franklin D. Roosevelt and Prime Minister Winston Churchill agreed that Gen. Eisenhower would lead the invasion of French North Africa, known as Operation Torch. Churchill visited Moscow to apologize to Joseph Stalin for not opening a second front as planned in 1942.

■

Sir John Grigg announced the creation of a Palestine Regiment in the British Army, consisting of separate Arab and Jewish battalions. Arab and Jewish soldiers gained valuable experience which aided postwar efforts to establish control of Middle Eastern territory.

■

In the U.S., the Army announced the organization of a unique combat unit composed of men skilled in all types of offensive warfare to include parachute, amphibious, mountain, and desert operations it was designated as the First Special Service Force, trained at its own camp established at Helena, Montana.

U.S. kicks off maneuvers in Kuwait

From wire reports

KUWAIT CITY — The last time William Sheridan saw Kuwait City, it was ablaze.

Oil wells were spewing smoke that blocked the sun's rays, and glutinous slicks coated the sea as the young U.S. Marine hopped off a helicopter expecting to die and found 1,500 famished Iraqi soldiers waiting to surrender to the Desert Storm victors.

Tuesday, sunshine bounced searingly off skyscrapers, and fishing boats and cargo carriers laden with new cars plied serene aquamarine waters. The Iraqis were gone, sent home in humiliation.

Only the Marines participating in a military exercise looked the same, as in a time warp: their chocolate-chip desert uniforms soaked with perspiration stains under flak jackets weighing heavy in 120-degree weather; their M-16s tucked between their legs as they rode in Humvees and tanks painted the color of sand; their faces almost unbearably young and earnest.

"I figured a lot of things hadn't been settled," said Sheridan, 24, from Council Bluffs, Iowa, as he smoked a cigarette while riding a landing craft to the shore of the city he last saw 17 months ago. "So I thought we would have to come back someday."

Someday arrived sooner than expected Tuesday, with the kickoff to a series of three "training exercises" the United States hopes will telegraph a warning to Iraq's Saddam Hussein.

Desert Storm has not been followed by a desert calm, but by Eager Mace, Native Fury and Intrinsic Action. Over the next two weeks, the three exercises will bring at least 7,500 Americans from all military branches back to the scene of what had been billed as victory.

But it seemed more like a job unfinished to many of the 1,900 Marines landing Tuesday. More than half were here before, during Desert Storm.

On the surface, this is no more than a routine joint training program with the Kuwaiti military, three more exercises to add to at least eight held here in the last year. The arrival of American troops has become so commonplace here that few Kuwaitis even bothered to wave or raise their heads when convoys of Marines fanned out through the country Tuesday.

"This continuing series of exercises demonstrates our commitment to the stability and security of the region," said Navy Capt. Braden Phillips, commander of the exercise, aboard the USS Tarawa a mile off the Kuwaiti coast.

Eager Mace, with 4,200 troops, and Native Fury, with a force of 900, have been planned since last year.

Intrinsic Action, with 2,400 troops, was scheduled for September. But it was bumped up as the regime of Saddam Hussein grew more aggressively prickly in the last month, repeatedly restating its claim to Kuwait and defiantly challenging U.N. weapons inspectors. A U.N. bus in Baghdad was stoned Tuesday. U.N. officials and guards have been spit at, stabbed and fired upon in the last month.

The regime's actions against its own people are even more brutal.

There are reports the Iraqi army is indiscriminately bombing villages in the south of the country where soldiers fled into the marshes to escape the eight-year war against Iran during the 1980s. A videotape has been circulating purportedly showing the prime minister ordering several generals to "wipe out" three Arab tribes in Iraq's southern marshes.

Dozens of merchants are reported to have been arrested and executed on the suspicion of profiteering.

Most of the Marines landing Tuesday, briefed by their superiors not to venture opinions in the presence of reporters, said they expected no further action beyond a training exercise. Much of their combat equipment was left behind when they sailed from Camp Pendleton, Calif., on May 28.

"We know we have to be here, to make a stand for the United States," said Cpl. Gilbert Charles, 22, of Sacramento, Calif., who spent seven months in the Persian Gulf during Desert Storm.

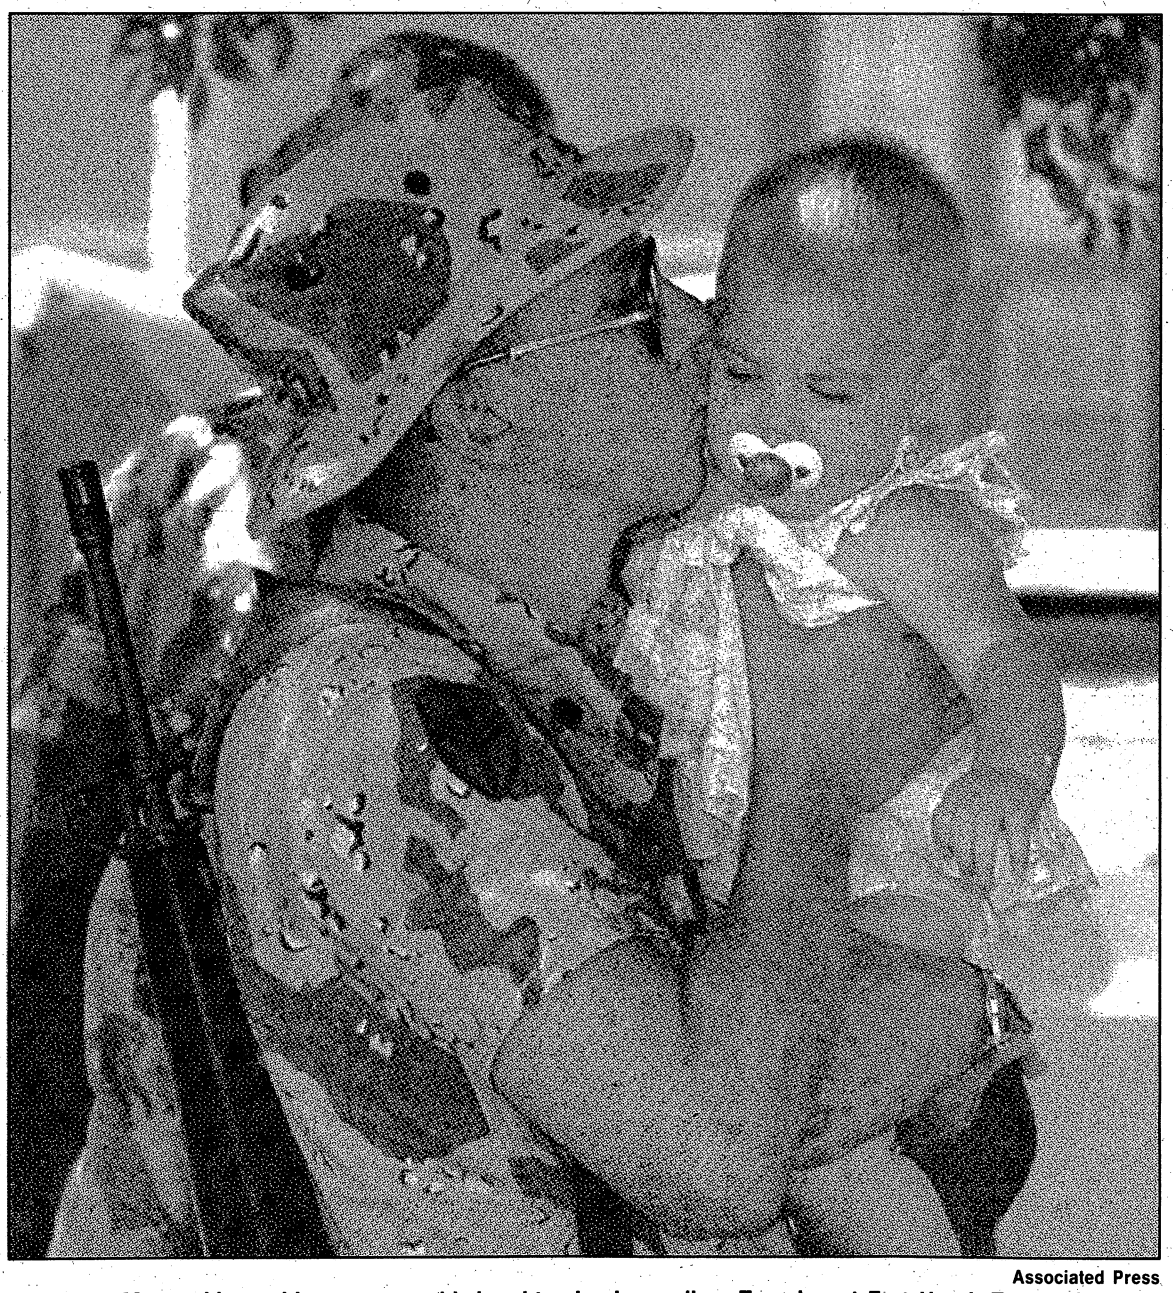
For the moment, at least, the tension is in check. There are jokes about the Marines. There are long discussions about women in the military following recent seminars on sexual harassment.

But when the news about U.N. weapons inspectors in Baghdad was broadcast over the shipboard radio en route to the gulf, the silence crackled.

"We were all relieved when we heard the crisis over the Agriculture Ministry was over," said First Lt. Jerry McCann, who was among the Marines who pushed into Kuwait and pursued the fleeing Iraqis in February 1991.

As usual, there is impatience to do the job, and get home:

"I just hope we're not here seven months again," McCann said.



Associated Press

Spc. Matt Means kisses his one-year-old daughter Leah goodbye Tuesday at Fort Hood, Texas. Soldiers from the central Texas post departed later in the afternoon for a training exercise in Kuwait.

Desert Storm has not been followed by a desert calm, but by Eager Mace, Native Fury and Intrinsic Action. Over the next two weeks, the three exercises will bring at least 7,500 Americans from all military branches back to the scene of what had been billed as victory. But it seemed more like a job unfinished to many of the 1,900 Marines landing Tuesday.

Texas troops leave their families again

From wire reports

FORT HOOD, Texas — Capt. Luis Vega gave his 10-year-old son a pair of combat shoes and told him he is "the man of the house" while his father is away.

Vega said the boy, also named Luis, cried because he feared his father might get hurt during military exercises in Kuwait. But the elder Vega responded, "It's a job. We have to do our job."

Similar scenes were repeated Tuesday in many other homes on this Army post in central Texas, which last year sent more than 20,000 soldiers to the Persian Gulf War.

Three hundred soldiers left on Tuesday for Kuwait and 1,600 more are expected to leave within the week. Soldiers said they they hope the reason for their departure doesn't change: to show the flag to Iraq's Saddam Hussein and take part in training exercises.

"It's just a training mission," said 25-year-old Sgt. William Riggs, who left his wife and three children. But if war erupts, "I feel we are ready."

But many said they are prepared if fighting breaks out.

"It's just a training mission," said 25-year-old Sgt. William Riggs, who left his wife and three children. But if war erupts, "I feel we are ready."

The United States began military exercises with Kuwait on Monday, a day after the second anniversary of Iraq's invasion of Kuwait.

"I made it through one time, I can make it again," said Spc. Curtis Jones, who said goodbye to his wife, Terri, and 22-month-old daughter, Amanda.

Most of the soldiers at Fort Hood did not want to comment on the political implications of President Bush's decision to send troops to the region again. Some critics have said the move is an attempt to bolster Bush's sagging re-election campaign.

"He's the commander in chief. Whatever he says, those are the rules," said Spc. Julian Gonzalez, 22, of San Antonio.

Among the soldiers in the 13th Corps Support Command and the 1st Cavalry Division are two women, who are making their first overseas trip in the Army and leaving their children behind with their grandmothers.

Veterans swelling homeless ranks

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — Twenty-five years ago, Army Sgt. Larry Presher was dodging bullets as he led convoys in Vietnam.

These days, Presher is hustling apples on a Washington street corner and living in a homeless shelter.

"For some reason we're falling through the cracks," said the 47-year-old veteran from Gainesville, Fla. "I don't know why there are so many veterans in the streets. There are a lot of guys out there like me."

On any given night, about 600,000 people are homeless in America, and a recent study by the federal Task Force on Homelessness shows that roughly a third of them are veterans. The number could be much higher: no one is sure how many more are sleeping under bridges, in cars and on park benches.

Veterans groups and homeless advocates expect the numbers to keep rising because of cuts in military personnel and a slumping economy that's swelling the ranks of the jobless.

Wayne Smith, director of development at the Vietnam Veterans Memorial Fund in Washington, says the number of homeless veterans is unparalleled.

"Most have readjusted and come home from the war," Smith said. "Homeless vets have not come home from the war . . ."

Smith said while attention has focused on MIA issues, "some (soldiers) are missing in America. They're right here. People step over them every day."

The plight of homeless veterans has only recently begun to attract national attention.

While there are programs to serve the homeless, few are geared to veterans, many of whom suffer from post-traumatic stress disorder, effects of the herbicide Agent Orange, and alcohol and drug addiction.

The Department of Veterans Affairs has several programs to help homeless veterans. They range from drop-in centers to drug and alcohol rehabilitation programs. But officials say they are having a hard time meeting the demand for services. Many of the VA programs for the homeless have waiting lists.

"The government and Congress have been slow in reacting to homeless veterans," said Rep. Lane Evans, D-Ill., co-sponsor of a bill that would provide $48 million to expand services to homeless vets.

Evans' bill cleared the House on Monday, but Senate action remains uncertain. In the past, such legislation has remained bottled up in the House Veterans Affairs Committee, at least in part, critics say, because its members include several World War II veterans who have shown little concern for the homeless of other wars.

This year, for the first time, the bill would provide grants directly to community groups that serve the homeless, tapping a ready-made network.

"We're out in the trenches, we already exist," said Ralph Cooper of the National Coalition for Homeless Veteran Service Providers, a group of community organizations across the country. "What we need the VA to do is help us."

A central problem for many veterans, said Cooper, is that they leave the military with few job skills they can use in the civilian world.

"What they know how to do is kill people," said Cooper. "That is not a very good transferable skill."

For their part, many homeless vets are bitter and frustrated, resentful at having put their lives on the line for their country only to find there's no support when they're down and out.

"You spend all of this time in the service ... and when you come back people look at you like you're crazy," said Ben Littlejohn, who slept on grates behind the White House for two years.

"Lots of vets feel like the government let us down," said Littlejohn, a Brooklyn native who did two tours in Vietnam and now lives in a Washington shelter.

For Larry Presher, life fell apart about two years ago when he was without a job, without money and living under a bridge in New Orleans.

"I was terrified," he recalled. "This was stuff you saw on the news."

Local VFW chief earns national honors

Hubert E. Swecker of Columbus has been named an All American Post Commander of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States. This honor will be presented at the VFW National Convention in Indianapolis by VFW Commander-in-Chief Robert E. Wallace.

Wallace said, "Commander Swecker is one of only 180 VFW Post Commanders selected for All American status. This honor is based on his outstanding achievement in membership growth, Buddy Poppy sales and other VFW programs that benefit veterans and their communities. The title of All American Commander is one of the most prestigious honors given by our 2-million member organization.

Swecker, Commander of Post 665, Department of Georgia, will be honored at a luncheon ceremony on Sunday, Aug. 16, during the 93rd VFW National Convention, Aug. 14-21.

The Veterans of Foreign Wars is a national organization of more than two million overseas wartime veterans. It was founded in 1899 and is today the oldest major veterans group in the nation.

Cash begins flowing into VA center

The podiatry section at the Tuskegee VA Medical Center has received the first $14,000 of a $136,000 grant from Health Services Resource Administration, Department of Health and Human Services. This three-year grant will be used to establish a primary care podiatric residency program.

Carmen Beverly, D.P.M. and director of the Tuskegee VA podiatry residency program, reports that currently there are four residents in her clinic. "Fully implementing the goals of the primary care residency program will require additional staff," says Dr. Beverly, "and we've already begun to recruit."

The medical center has used the first installment of the grant, received in July, to partially offset the salary of another full-time podiatrist, who is expected to join the staff in the Fall. Two more podiatry residents will be added. This staff expansion will allow each podiatry clinic patient to be assigned to the same podiatrist for follow-up care. More staff will reduce the need for often lengthy waits between appointments.

Dr. Beverly is confident that this grant will have great impact, not only on the Tuskegee VA, but for veterans in other communities which the medical center serves. Plans are already in place to establish satellite podiatry clinics at the medical center's Community Services Program located in Columbus, Georgia, and at the Bill Nichols State Veterans Home in Alexander City, Ala.

Another innovation is development of a high risk podiatry clinic for veterans who have been identified as

Investigators allege POWs held in underground prison

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — Several separate sources alleged as recently as 1988 that American prisoners of war were being held in an underground prison next to the Hanoi tomb of Vietnamese leader Ho Chi Minh, a member of a Senate investigating committee said Tuesday.

But Defense Intelligence Agency officials said there is no credible evidence such a prison ever existed. They said the water table in the Vietnamese capital is too high to permit such a facility to be built.

And, they said, some of the sources proved to be untruthful.

"The likelihood they are holding Americans in that environment is low," said DIA analyst Robert DeStatte, who recently spent 10 months in Vietnam.

But Sen. Robert C. Smith, R-N.H., said a "cluster" of individual sources reporting over a 15-year period "have filled in details concerning the construction and operation of this underground detention facility at the Citadel," the headquarters of the Vietnamese armed forces in north-central Hanoi.

"The story of American POWs in these areas long after the war sounds like something out of a Tom Clancy novel," said Smith, a member of the Senate Select Committee on POW-MIA Affairs. "But these reports are not from fictitious people. They are real people telling us what they have seen."

COMMENTARY

Challenge is matching supply with demand on battlefield

PALO ALTO, Calif. — American troops in the 1991 Persian Gulf War never ran as low on ammunition as British troops in the 1982 Falkland Islands war, who at one point were observed crawling among the dead and wounded, "relieving them of spare ammunition," according to a British account.

David Evans

Although the British were dealing with a different supply problem in the South Atlantic than the one faced by American-led forces in the Saudi desert, Army Lt. Col. Kenneth Privratsky suggests that the Falklands campaign remains "highly pertinent" to American military planners contemplating operations in the Third World.

There is a saying in the military that "amateurs talk tactics while professionals talk logistics," and Privratsky used his recent time here at the Hoover Institution to complete his research into the British logistical experience in the Falklands.

"I met in England with several of the important commanders. There were tremendous problems in the Falklands that we did not have to surmount in Desert Storm, although we were operating on a much larger scale," he said.

For example, the British were faced with the daunting task of seizing a lodgment.

"They didn't have a port. They didn't have an airfield. They had to establish a beachhead before they could go forward," Privratsky said.

Indeed, Lt. Gen. William "Gus" Pagonis, the man who directed logistics in the Gulf War, points out in his forthcoming book, "Moving Mountains," that "... from the logistician's perspective, if Saddam (Hussein) had seized control of the major Saudi ports and airfields, any subsequent effort to retake the Arabian peninsula would have been immeasurably more difficult and costly."

"They (the British) didn't have a port. They didn't have an airfield. They had to establish a beachhead before they could go forward," Privratsky said.

In the jargon of the trade, the difference was an "in-port" versus an "in-stream" offload. In this latter case, the ships are anchored off the beach, in the middle of the stream, as it were.

As Privratsky notes, an in-stream landing requires self-sustaining ships with the cranes and equipment to offload their cargo into small craft for transport ashore. Ramps on commercial roll-on/roll-off ships don't always lower far enough to reach the decks of lighters, as the British discovered.

"They learned that there is no substitute for logistics ships designed for military purposes. When it came to putting equipment ashore, commercial ships averaged only 20 tons per hour compared to 90 tons per hour for military vessels," Privratsky said.

In fact, when the Falklands war broke out, two of the most capable amphibious ships in the British fleet had been listed for disposal.

America's amphibious fleet is similarly disappearing, through neglect. The Navy is not budgeting any money, for three years running starting in fiscal 1993, to replace dozens of aging "amphibs" slated for retirement.

A June 30 Marine Corps point paper warns that without replacements, today's force of 60 amphibious ships "will decline to 21 ships."

Supplies piled up on the beach are of little use to front-line troops, and in both the Falklands war and Desert Storm there are reports of combat units' running short amidst the general plenty.

"There is a big difference between wholesale logistics and retail, getting supplies to the soldier," Privratsky said.

Some British artillery positions were down to six rounds per gun at the time of the Argentine surrender, but there was enough 105mm ammunition in the system "to blow up the whole island," according to a British account.

In his book, Pagonis declares that "a huge amount of supplies" was brought forward but, again, the customer may offer a different perspective.

Lt. Col. Harry Emerson was an artillery battalion commander in the 1st Infantry Division (Mechanized) during the Gulf War. Writing in the August 1991 issue of Military Review, he itemized major problems:

- "We had outrun the capability to push fuel forward ... at one point I used captured Iraqi oil for servicing ... trucks."
- Ammunition resupply "was anything but a smooth operation."
- "I deployed with 100 percent of my (spare parts) . . . At the announcement of the cease-fire, I was at 95 percent zero balance . . ."
- "Quality of rations and bottled water availability seemed to increase as the level of headquarters increased."

There's a constant for you: The troops at the cutting edge always seem to have the least to get the job done.

Pagonis argues strongly in his book for a U.S. Army equipped with more trucks, which would improve tactical resupply.

However, the British faced a campaign on a primitive island where paved roads didn't exist to use the trucks they did have.

As such, the Falkland campaign is a likely "worst case" metaphor for future American challenges. And, unlike the recent situation in Saudi Arabia, we may not be invited in next time.

David Evans is military affairs writer for the Chicago Tribune.

New OCS headquarters bears name of WWII hero

By Linda Bosley Dailey
Staff Writer

The Officer Candidate School dedicated its new headquarters last week, and named the newly refurbished building Viale Hall in honor of a heroic OCS graduate.

"Lt. Robert Viale epitomized the essence and spirit of the Officer Candidate School and the infantry's motto, 'follow me.' He was a soldier's soldier and a leader's leader," Col. L.K. White Jr., commander of the 11th Infantry Regiment, said in his remarks at the dedication ceremony.

Second Lt. Robert M. Viale died Feb. 5, 1945, during the battle for Manila in the Philippines. With nowhere to throw an armed grenade without injuring some civilians or members of his own platoon, Viale curled his body around the grenade and absorbed its blast.

White's father, Col. (Ret.) L.K. White Sr., was Viale's regimental commander at the time. White Sr., in a statement read by his son at last week's ceremony, said Viale had distinguished himself as a platoon leader.

White Jr. learned of Viale's heroism in 1972 in Vietnam, when he wrote home and mentioned his company had a new commander, a captain named Chuck Viale. White Sr. replied that the captain was the son of a hero, the 11th Infantry Regiment commander said.

Viale's son, Col. Charles R. Viale, currently serving as assistant division commander of the 6th Infantry Division in Alaska, attended the ceremony to dedicate Building 2757 in his father's honor.

"To those who enter through its doors, I hope that Viale Hall will represent the role of leadership and its responsibilities," Col. Viale said. "For those who pass through on the road to becoming officers, may it remind them of the selfless sacrifice in peacetime and in war that is required to be true soldiers and professionals."

Col. Viale has previously served at Fort Benning as commander of the Infantry Training Center and as an instructor in the Infantry School.

71 will be inducted into the OCS Hall of Fame

The Officer Candidate School will induct 71 officers into its Hall of Fame this morning in Marshall Auditorium, Infantry Hall. Maj. Gen. Jerry A. White, commanding general, is scheduled to be the speaker.

The 11 a.m. ceremony honors past OCS graduates. Selection of Hall of Fame candidates is based on the following criteria:

The officer must have been commissioned from the Officer Candidate School at Fort Benning, or the Ground General School at Fort Riley, Kan, and accomplished one of the following: Awarded the Medal of Honor (regardless of rank); attained the rank of colonel while serving on active duty in a Reserve component; been elected or appointed to an office of prominence in national or state government; or been recognized and recommended by the commander of the Infantry School for outstanding service.

The OCS Hall of Fame has inducted 21 Medal of Honor recipients, 996 colonels, 103 brigadier generals, 94 major generals, 20 lieutenant generals, three generals, and 81 prominent civilians who have graduated from OCS. This year's ceremony includes one retired major general, one brigadier general, 66 colonels, and tree civilians.

Wigle Hall, which houses the Hall of Fame, was dedicated in June 1958 to honor graduates of the Infantry OCS program who have distinguished themselves in military or civilian pursuits. It is named for 2nd Lt. Thomas W. Wigle, a 1943 graduate of OCS and a Medal of Honor recipient.

VA cuts mortgage rates to 7.5%; lowest in 19 years

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — The Veterans Affairs Department said Tuesday it was cutting the maximum interest on VA mortgages to 7.5 percent, the lowest level in 19 years.

The VA said the rate reduction, the second in less than two months, will take effect Wednesday.

The latest reduction means that the monthly payment on a typical VA loan of $86,000 will now be $602, a savings of $121.26 from the $723.26 that loan would have cost a year ago at the then-prevailing VA rate of 8.5 percent, officials said.

The VA announced it was also lowering the interest rate on other VA-guaranteed loans by one-half percentage point, with graduated-payment mortgages falling to 7.75 percent; home improvement loans dropping to 9 percent and mobile home loans falling to 10 percent.

VA Secretary Edward Derwinski, who announced the rate change, said it will mean that more veterans will be able to take advantage of lower rates to refinance existing VA mortgages.

There are still 1.5 million veterans with VA-guaranteed loans at interest rates of 9.5 percent or higher who could recognize significant savings by refinancing, the VA said.

Maher hates to leave his Rangers

Benning has special place in Georgian's heart

By Jerry Rutledge
Patriot Editor

The special feeling Col. John J. Maher has for Fort Benning and the surrounding area is natural. Maher is a native Georgian who feels comfortable with the people and the surroundings.

He is also an infantryman and a Ranger. Maher, commandant of the Ranger Training Brigade since Sept. 1990, feels there is no more special place for both than this post.

"I really regret leaving Fort Benning," said Maher, who left Fort Benning this week to join the staff of former post commander Lt. Gen. Carmen Cavezza at Fort Lewis, Wash. There he will become plans and operations officer for I Corps.

"Fort Benning's mission and its physical layout is home to me. I guess the infantry is very important to me and, certainly, the Rangers are," he said. "It hurts to leave because of the wonderful community, the great Georgians and the people I'm used to working with. It's been a great assignment."

Other than the 75th Ranger Regiment, where Col. David L. Grange is commander, there are no Ranger assignments at the colonel level other than the Ranger Training Brigade. "I've had four Ranger assignments and I don't guess I'll have another," Maher said. "So it's with great remorse that I am leaving Fort Benning."

Fort Lewis won't be foreign territory for Maher, however. He spent two tours of duty at the post near Tacoma, first as commander of Company B, 2nd Battalion (Ranger), 75th Infantry and later as commander of 2nd Battalion.

And despite remorse at leaving Benning, Maher is happy with the challenge his return to Fort Lewis presents. "I guess I'm going back to my home away from home," Maher said. "Fort Lewis is a great post. I'm looking forward to joining Gen. Cavezza and helping him prepare I Corps for the challenges it will face in the future." As he leaves, Maher says he is happy with where the Ranger School is now in terms of course quality, numbers of Rangers produced and the school's role in the "modern" Army.

"What's been done in the course for about 40 years is about the same. It really is," he said. "Six years ago, the course size doubled but we didn't get the return in the numbers. We worked very hard modernizing the course and progressing and protecting our students and worked hard for the field to tell them what they needed to do to prepare.

"I'm very proud of the quality of training that the Rangers are receiving and the NCOs are giving them. I'm happy with the standards we are enforcing and elated that the number of Ranger students we can return to the field is what it is. We've been able to reduce our level of attrition."

The decrease in the attrition level has been remarkable. Traditionally, Ranger School attrition has been measured after the Ranger diagnostic test and after the course has been started. About one-third of the Ranger students are lost in the diagnostic test. One-fourth of those who actually begin the course are usually lost.

"Last year, we had a tough year," Maher said. "There was Desert Storm and we had to support the effort there. We also has some rough winter weather. Our attrition rate was about 48 percent. We're at between 27 and 28 percent attrition right now and I'm real pleased especially in light of the larger number of students.

"We've got more people in the course and we've found a way, finally, to get more of them graduating. The key is preparation. Those who don't make it through our assessment have been afforded an opportunity to stay here and retrain without instructors and re-enter the course with our next class and they have a very good success rate. It's better than putting them on a plane and sending them back home. If they want to stay. The key is we won't let him go forward and hold everybody else back."

"I'm very proud of the quality of training that the Rangers are receiving and the NCOs are giving them," said Maher. "I'm happy with the standards we are enforcing and elated that the number of Ranger students we can return to the field is what it is."

The role of the Ranger School in the modern Army continues to grow. Maher says Ranger-qualified leaders will be necessary in all areas of the military, especially in light of current military doctrine. "The Army now has become much less of a forward defense-type force," said Maher. "We have become much more of a forward presence but CONUS (continental United States) based. More of a CONUS-based force with world-wide contingencies. It's important that our forces are prepared to go in not just one direction but in several. We have to be ready to go as we are."

And he believes Ranger qualified leaders best fit this need. "Whether its an engineer unit, or armored, or artillery, a leader that has been trained to deal with a wide range of conditions will be needed," said Maher. "There is the role of the 75th Ranger Regiment. The rangers that we train to go into the ranger regiment comprise only a small portion of the Rangers that we train. But they clearly have a role as we train their emerging leaders. They have an increasing role wherever there is a requirement for forced entry into an area of operation."

Nunn: Enthusiasm for Star Wars has waned as defense bill stalls

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — A standoff over funding levels for the Strategic Defense Initiative has at least temporarily derailed the Pentagon budget bill for next year.

"The odds are opposed to this bill being approved this year," Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Sam Nunn, D-Ga., said Monday, suggesting the Pentagon may have to fall back on a separate appropriations bill or a stopgap spending measure.

NUNN

But lost would be a $1.2 billion initiative to help defense workers, industries and communities adjust to defense budget cuts, he cautioned.

Opponents of the ballistic missile defense system, also called Star Wars, had won a tentative victory Friday when the program's supporters fell short in an attempt to head off a further $1 billion in cuts.

Sens. James Sasser, D-Tenn., and Dale Bumpers, D-Ark., believed that 49-43 vote in their favor was a clear expression of Senate desire to trim the program to $3.3 billion next year, instead of the $4.3 billion that had been called for in the bill.

But SDI supporters refused to go ahead with a final vote that they knew they would lose. Sen. Malcolm Wallop, R-Wyo., stood in the way when Senate leaders sought to schedule the vote for Tuesday.

Nunn, who is an SDI supporter, acknowledged that the consensus forged last year for the program "started to unravel this year," in part, he said, because of the Bush administration's heavy emphasis on technologically complicated, space-based systems at the expense of more modest ground-based missile interceptors.

Others said they believed the eroding support for Star Wars reflected a new rush to find savings in the Pentagon's budget, and that it also could spell trouble for other expensive programs such as the B-2 stealth bomber.

Veterans believe oil fire fumes making them sick

From wire reports

"Every time I take a shower, I lose hundreds of strands of hair," Fournier said. "Right now, I suspect it might be hydrocarbon poisoning from the oil fires."

RALEIGH, N.C. — Marine Capt. Dave Fournier spends most of his time in a chair or in bed, too tired to do more. His sleep is interrupted by nightsweats. He's been hospitalized at Camp Lejeune with pneumonia and heart problems.

He's also rapidly going bald. All of this began occurring since the 41-year-old Fournier returned 16 months ago from the Persian Gulf War.

Doctors can't identify the cause.

"Every time I take a shower, I lose hundreds of strands of hair," Fournier said. "Right now, I suspect it might be hydrocarbon poisoning from the oil fires."

Fumes from the Kuwaiti oil well fires set by Iraq are blamed by Fournier and other war veterans for mysterious and lingering ailments.

When Indiana reservists complained of such symptoms, an Army study of 79 war veterans resulted in a military finding that stress may be the cause of their post-war fatigue, aches and breathing problems.

But last week, doctors found high levels of hydrocarbons in the blood of a Navy veteran in Texas.

Also last week, military officials acknowledged more study is needed of the effects of inhaling fumes from burning oil wells.

"This is a significant issue," said Terry Jemison, a spokesman for the Department of Veterans Affairs in Washington. The VA and the Pentagon are working to "flush out the state of scientific knowledge" on such health problems, he said.

The VA says 17,000 gulf veterans have visited its hospitals since the war ended Feb. 29, 1991, but few have filed smoke-related disability claims.

At Fort Bragg, a private group called the Military Family Support Network has a file of 100 soldiers who it says have suffered an unusually high number of illnesses, birth defects and miscarriages.

Charles Weatherman, a Marine veteran from Waynesville who suffers from stomach pains, cramps, shortness of breath and hair loss, hopes they hurry.

"I'm just about bald on top and I had a full head of hair when I went to the gulf," Weatherman said. "It seems like nobody wants to talk about it, nobody wants to do anything. I have fatigue all the time and I'm 22 years old."

Ernst: Army must not let guard down

General heading to Bragg

By Linda Bosley Dailey
Staff Writer

The Army should keep its infantry ready to fight the enemy at close range, despite the military's ability to wage high-tech war from afar, Brig. Gen. Carl F. Ernst said Monday at his farewell ceremony.

Ernst, who was assistant commandant of the Infantry School and deputy commanding general of the Infantry Center here, will become assistant commander of the 82nd Airborne Division at Fort Bragg, N.C.

But before departing Fort Benning, Ernst cautioned listeners to heed the lessons learned in previous conflicts.

Even though technological advances in weaponry in the last half-century have caused some to predict that there would be "no more close fights," each subsequent conflict has proved them wrong, Ernst said.

And the need remains for a force prepared to fight the enemy hand-to-hand — "... the kind of fighting where you look your opponent in the eye before you kill him, and then you kill him," Ernst said.

And the need remains for a force prepared to fight the enemy hand-to-hand — "... the kind of fighting where you look your opponent in the eye before you kill him, and then you kill him," Ernst said.

For example, infantrymen assigned to clear Iraqi trenches during Desert Storm discovered that "a lot is the same although it's changed a great deal" since their fathers, grandfathers and great-grandfathers fought.

But the Army faces challenges in maintaining readiness at a time when the military is shrinking.

"I think the challenge is to keep the standards high. We are bringing in the best and the brightest young men and women our nation has to offer. ... We have to keep the standards up and challenge them both intellectually and physically ...," Ernst said in a brief interview after the ceremony.

"And they have to see that it's a quality Army, or we won't get them. And the number one resource of a great army is great soldiers. ... So go the soldiers, so goes the Army. So goes our Army, so goes the nation," Ernst said.

Ernst, a New Orleans native, came to Fort Benning in April 1991 after having served as deputy chief of staff and operations officer of the Third Army Forward Command Post in Desert Storm and the restoration of Kuwait.

"Coming here from Desert Storm, he brought keen insight into how our infantry should be organized, equipped and trained," said Maj. Gen. Jerry White, the post's commanding general and the Infantry School's commandant, during his remarks at the ceremony.

"Remember, this is the home of the infantry," White said, addressing Ernst. "It is your home, and you will be back. And when you come back, your address will read Riverside (the commanding general's quarters)," White said.

"If he could make that happen, I'd be delighted. I love Fort Benning. If the Army would send me back to Fort Benning, Carl and Linda Ernst would be in hog heaven," Ernst said, referring to his wife, after the ceremony.

Ernst will be succeeded at Fort Benning by Brig. Gen. John W. Hendrix, who reports for duty next week.

In concluding his address at the ceremony, Ernst stressed the importance of the Infantry School's mission.

With a world full of "tigers," Ernst said, the Infantry School must continue producing soldiers "who make the U.S. infantry the most capable tiger-slayer in the world. And maybe we can keep the crazy bastards in their cages."

DEFENSE

Defense contractor says it's scaling back operations

From wire reports

ST. LOUIS — McDonnell Douglas Corp. said Monday that Pentagon cutbacks are forcing it to consolidate its six government aerospace businesses into two, seek a partner or buyer for a helicopter company and close a large Ohio plant.

The nation's leading defense contractor said the moves were designed to reduce costs, improve efficiency and respond to upheaval in the aerospace industry.

The Senate is considering a $275 billion defense budget for the fiscal year beginning Oct. 1. It would be the lowest level of spending in years and is $6 billion less than President Bush requested. The Senate plan must be reconciled with a separate House version before the budget wins final approval.

"Our strategy is to concentrate on businesses where we are — or can become — the No. 1 or No. 2 company worldwide," said John F. McDonnell, chairman and chief executive.

The restructuring, effective immediately, marks a major shrinkage for McDonnell Douglas, which has been struggling as Pentagon contracts dried up.

Company officials said the plan to consolidate its six military businesses into two companies in St. Louis and California had been in the works for several months. The businesses produce such high-profile products as the F-15 and F-A-18 fighters and the AH-64 Apache attack helicopter.

The moves will have no effect on Douglas Aircraft Co.'s commercial aircraft operation, McDonnell said.

Senior executive John Capellupo said he expected savings in the hundreds of millions of dollars. He would not speculate whether the restructuring would involve more layoffs.

Rep. Dick Armey, R-Texas, is looking into a Fort Benning soldier's claim that he was kept waiting 4½ hours in the field while his wife was having emergency surgery, and was disciplined for arguing with an officer over the delay.

Armey, of Texas' 26th District, is investigating the June 20 argument between Spc. James A. Giglio and Lt. Alvin Williams of Echo Company, 2nd Battalion, 18th Infantry Regiment. Giglio received an Article 15 disciplinary action, resulting in a 90-day suspended sentence that included reduction in rank from E-4 to E-1, loss of $700 pay over two months and 45 days extra duty.

GIGLIO

The company was taking part in the 3rd Brigade, 24th Infantry Division's "Victory Focus" training exercises in the field at Fort Benning.

The congressman's office wouldn't comment, but Deborah Giglio, Spc. Giglio's wife, said Armey has questions about the propriety of the discipline. She has received written notice from Armey's office of the inquiry.

The argument occured after Giglio was delayed from going to Martin Army Community Hospital, where his wife had been taken for emergency treatment.

No one in the chain of command involved — Lt. Col. Eric Olson, Capt. Gilbert Chavez, Lt. Williams — responded to a request for an interview. The unit has been at Fort Irwin, Calif. since Aug. 2, training in desert conditions at the National Training Center.

However, a Fort Benning spokesman said Giglio "went berserk in front of everybody. You just can't let that happen. The battalion commander (Col. Olson) made a swift judicial decision and the sentence was tough but fair under the circumstances."

Mrs. Giglio believes events occuring a week before her illness and the argument had a bearing on the situation. Needing help to move into new quarters on post, she sought permission from battalion commander Lt. Col. Eric Olson for her husband to return home.

On the advice of Dumloe, Mrs. Giglio sought Olson's permission directly and got it during a June 13 family day for the 2/18th in the field. But Mrs. Giglio said she also drew the anger of Echo Company commander Chavez. "He was visibly angry," she said. She also said the company chain of command didn't speak to Spc. Giglio for most of the next week. Mrs. Giglio was hospitalized with abdominal pains on Friday June 19. A message was sent from a neighbor to her husband's unit's rear detachment. Giglio was notified of the emergency situation, sought transportation back to main post, but ran into repeated delays. After a delay of 4½ hours, he finally made it to Martin. But, in the meantime, an argument with Echo Company's executive officer — Williams — had taken place. Witnesses feel Williams provoked Giglio. "The way he came out and the way that he said 'What's the matter, isn't the deuce and a half (2½-ton truck) fast enough for you' (was provocative)," said Cpl. Maurice Booth. "That in itself, to somebody in the frame of mind that Spc. Giglio was in, would definitely be enough to set somebody off." A statement quoting Booth repeating Williams' remarks were misattributed in Monday's Ledger-Enquirer.

Boat tour is best way to see Chicago

By Bob Dyer
Knight-Ridder Newspapers

CHICAGO — It's probably too late to do anything about it now, but Chicago should have been named Phoenix.

No other American city ever rose more dramatically from a pile of ashes — including San Francisco following its devasting 1906 earthquake.

Soon after the infamous cow kicked over the infamous lantern to start the infamous fire of 1871, the nation's premiere architects swarmed into what was left of Chicago with aspirations of leaving their mark on the reconstruction.

And atop the rubble of an inferno that had burned at a rate of 65 acres per hour, they assembled what many view as the prototype of the modern city. It was in Chicago, in fact, that the very term "skyscraper" was coined.

During the warmer months, perhaps any Midwestern city seems more attractive, more accommodating. But downtown Chicago offers a special magic few other places can match.

As the third-largest metropolis in the United States, the not-so-windy-in-the-summertime city has most of the advantages of a town like New York without the frenetic pace and the hostile populace. And Chicago's downtown seems to have far more architectural cohesion.

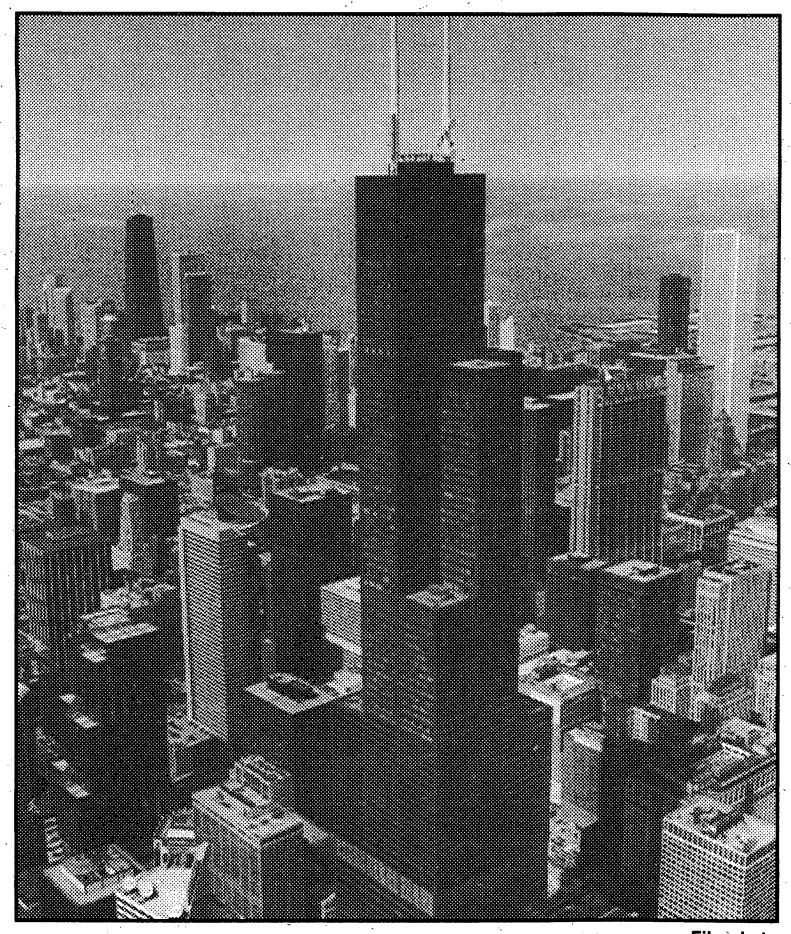
There's so much to see that no fewer than 50 tours operate regularly. You can gawk by car, by bus, by bike, by Nike. But the best way for a first-time visitor to absorb Chicago is by taking a boat tour on the Chicago River, which winds through the heart of the city.

The best version of the best mode may well be the one that shoves off four times daily from North Pier, a funky collection of shops and restaurants carved into an ancient (1905) warehouse.

At $15, tickets for the Architectural River Cruise seem a bit pricey — until the trip begins. By the end of the 90-minute journey, $15 seems like a bargain.

Classical music greets the tourists (a surprising number of whom are Chicagoans) as they file onto a 200-seat, double-deck boat, the Fort Dearborn, named after the structure that stood guard over the community from 1803 to 1812. Come aboard early enough and you'll get a choice of sun on the top deck or shade below.

Complimentary muffins, coffee and lemonade are served.



File photo

Chicago's massive skyline is dominated by the Sears Tower.

There's also non-complimentary beer on the lower deck. Appropriately, the lower deck also offers public "heads." (That's boat talk for bathrooms.)

The narrator on this particular trip is a retired museum official, Bruce Mitchell, who is a member of the Chicago Architectural Foundation, a group that sponsors a number of architectural and historical tours. Every once in a while he'll be rolling along, describing a skyscraper, talking about the architects, and suddenly he'll forget a building's name.

"I just can't remember it now," he'll mutter into the microphone, partly amazed and partly perturbed by his failure. It's nice to hear a real person for a change, rather than one of those slick, generic Disney automatons.

Mitchell seems to remember all of the important stuff, such as the unique construction characteristics of the world's tallest inhabited structure, the 1,454-foot Sears Tower. Seems it was engineered as nine smaller buildings, each 75 feet square, all banded together to form a "bundle tube," thereby giving it exceptional strength.

Good thing. About 16,500 people work in the Sears Tower each day.

Another highlight is the Chicago Tribune building, surely the most intriguing newspaper office in the cosmos. Built in 1925 after a worldwide design competition that attracted 264 sets of blueprints, the building is noteworthy not so much for its height — 36 stories — as for its Gothic design, which reminds you of an ancient European cathedral.

It's fun to compare the headquarters of the Tribune and the rival Chicago Sun-Times, visible a few blocks away, because the buildings match the newspapers' personalities: Whereas the Tribune is a stately, conservative, old-fashioned publication, the Sun-Times is a brassy tabloid. Its non-descript, rectangular building features big yellow plastic letters trumpeting its name.

Overall, the skyline is a remarkable blend of seemingly conflicting styles that all hang together. You float past the Hancock Building ... the Lyric Opera House ... the Mercantile Exchange ... the Wrigley Building ... the IBM Building ... After a while, unless you are an architecture major, the names begin to run together. Was it Burgess Johnson and Bruce Graham, or Burgess Graham and Bruce Johnson?

No matter. The magic is in the overall scene, which on one sunny weekday afternoon included a group of school-age kids waving at the passing boat, downtown office workers eating bag lunches and pleasure boaters soaking up rays.

The water is pretty, but you probably wouldn't want to take a dip. The color is sort of a metallic aqua — unless you arrive on St. Patrick's Day, in which case the river will have been dyed green. If neither of those colors sounds particularly appetizing, you should have been around in the second half of the 19th century.

From about 1850 to 1900, the river was used as a communal septic tank. The sewage that was dumped into it ran out into Lake Michigan, all the way to the drinking-water intakes two miles off shore. That resulted in periodic typhus epidemics that lasted for a year or so. Eventually the populace decided there were better uses for the river.

These days, the water flows in the opposite direction, a change forced by man at the turn of the century. But the river still can cause serious problems. As you probably remember, in April a hole developed in an underground tunnel once used to transport coal around the city, and much of the downtown business district was flooded, causing $1 billion in damage. Basements in the tony department stores in "the Loop" were inundated.

The accident also temporarily messed up the boat tour, preventing it from venturing up the north branch when the river splits about a mile from its mouth. Officials feared the vibrations from boat propellers might damage the still-setting repair work.

Even with that temporary detour, though, the journey was fabulous. The Chicago River goes through the heart of the downtown business district and is the focal point of the entire city.

Although modestly billing itself as the Second City, Chicago still is a world-class player.

Networks focus on life's realities

Say others are 'out of touch'

From wire reports

NEW YORK — Two interfaith cable TV networks are joining forces to offer something that they say is lacking in the world of television — realistic depictions of American life.

Both use everything from dramas to documentaries to stress rudiments of everyday living, its problems, perils, opportunities, failures, strengths and potentialities.

"Most TV networks are out of touch with where American people are and what we do is bring that reality into the homes of viewers," said Nelson Price, president of VISN, the Vision Interfaith Satellite Network.

Owned by a coalition of 54 faith groups, it and another religiously based network — the American Christian Television System, or ACTS — last week signed an agreement to share the same 24-hour channel.

This will greatly expand their reach to about 20 million households and a projected accessible audience of 50 million, making it the biggest, broadly diversified faith-and-values TV operation going.

"We try to deal with life as it really is, including its spiritual side, which hardly gets noticed on network television," said Richard McCartney, executive vice president of the denominational agency which owns ACTS.

"Religion is a regular part of ordinary American life instead of a sideshow as most networks treat it when they do at all," he said. "With us, you won't see ministers and priests typified as wimps but as real people."

Even on many ostensibly religious televangelist shows, "religion is distorted" and its image harmed, he said in an interview from ACTS headquarters in Fort Worth, Texas.

He said the objective is to reflect "the full dimensions of spiritual values" and ethics in ordinary life, along with the difficulties, questions, sorrows and joys that people face.

For the new partnership, which goes into effect Oct. 1, both participants uphold some distinctive guidelines — no on-air fund solicitation, no proselytizing and no maligning of other faiths.

To be called VISN-ACTS, the Faith and Values Channel, it will not involve merger of the two, but shared time on one channel. VISN will present 16 hours of programming each day, and ACTS will offer 8 hours of programs.

Although the two networks will maintain their own identities and program resources, the new arrangement calls for implementing some close interchange and cooperation.

"It will mean a considerable amount of coordination," McCartney said. This will involve not only program scheduling but a joint uplink and sales of advertising for which both will be served by VISN's agency, VISN Group Inc.

"Religion is a regular part of ordinary American life instead of a sideshow as most networks treat it when they do at all," said Richard McCartney, executive vice president of the denominational agency which owns ACTS. "With us, you won't see ministers and priests typified as wimps but as real people."

In the past, some rivalry existed between the two networks as they competed for local channel carriage. This sometimes resulted in neither being carried to avoid offending religious groups involved on both sides.

"We were competitors in the sense that cable operators usually don't have space for both networks and had to make a choice," Price said. "Now we're joining forces to bring communities one broad-based channel."

VISN, reaching nearly 13 million households on 712 cable TV systems, had gained strong coverage in the Northeast, the northern tier of central states and Western states.

ACTS, reaching 8.2 million households through 604 cable TV systems, has been concentrated mainly in the South and Southwest.

The combination extends both nationally.

The increased scope and accessed audience access, expected to climb above 25 million households in a year, also was expected to attract more advertisers concerned for family and values.

"Now we'll have the numbers to interest them," Price said. He noted that criteria for advertising insist it be in good taste for products of solid value. Alcohol and tobacco are excluded.

VISN, launched in 1988, represents mainline Protestant, Roman Catholic, Eastern Orthodox, Jewish and evangelical traditions. Ecumenical in approach, it carries a wide variety of programs — drama, call-in shows, documentaries, town hall-type sessions, comedy, worship and music.

ACTS, started in 1984 by the nation's largest Protestant body, Southern Baptists, also features productions of other denominations, Catholic and Protestant. It specializes in family oriented, inspirational, informational and entertainment programming, some of an evangelical tendency.

John Malone, president and chief executive of Tele-Communications, Inc., among the largest cable operators, said the VISN-ACTS move was a "sound business decision for these two outstanding religious networks."

It also is "good news for viewers seeking broad-based quality interfaith programming," he said, adding that TCI systems anticipated expanding carriage of it.

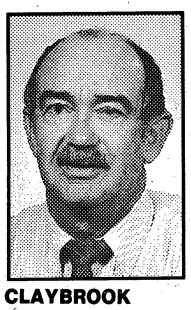
Good guys battle bad guys at Whale



CLAYBROOK

EDITOR'S NOTE: Ledger-Enquirer military writer Clint Claybrook has traveled to Fort Irwin, Calif., home of the U.S. Army's National Training Center, to cover the 3rd Brigade, 24th Infantry Division's field exercises in desert warfare.

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

FORT IRWIN, Calif. — Sporadic artillery fire thumps around The Whale, one of the significant terrain features here in the desert training areas just north of Fort Irwin.

A tank makes a mad dash toward a cluster of dug-in vehicles.

Trails of dust flare through "Red Pass," some 13 kilometers away.

Five companies from 2nd Battalion, 69th Armor and 2nd Battalion, 18th Infantry are hunkered down near "Whale Gap," a passage around The Whale, which got its name because it looks like one of those sea behemoths from the air.

The task force's M1A1 Abrams tanks and Bradley Fighting Vehicles are dug in, expecting the worst.

The "bad guys" are coming — a regiment of Soviet troops, M-72 tanks and the Soviet version of armored personnel carriers, along with artillery and air cover. The bad guys are actually OPFOR troops — U.S. Army soldiers trained in fighting tactics used by what used to be the Soviet Army.

They've been getting ready for this fight some 36 hours. These Fort Benning troops are the defenders in this big-time battle, which will involve some 130 mock Soviet vehicles.

Artillery fire intensifies, and as it turns out, is highly effective. These long-range big guns, coupled with a few rounds of "chemical" shells effectively fix one of the task force's companies in place, removing it from the fight, according to an observer who was preparing a report for visiting dignitaries.

This California "wasteland" is one of the few places in the country where battalions, much less brigades, have enough room to maneuver during force-on-force engagements, and these Fort Benning troops are out to test their tactics against the NTC's notorious "Opposing Force" — and to learn.

The Fort Benning troops are concentrated along a route they expect the OPFOR to take, down a valley behind The Whale. They think the enemy will come from right to left, then attempt to buzz off through "The Valley of Death," which could take them to the enemy's objective some 20 kilometers away.

Soviet-style tanks appear to be assembling for a frontal assault on the Fort Benning troops: It doesn't happen. They will peel off, go to the south and east of the dug-in 3rd Brigade forces, some of the Red fighting vehicles driving straight over the tough, steep ridge that makes up the backbone of the whale.

Sgt. 1st Class Willie Dillard, a Bradley platoon sergeant, is hidden, along with his crew, behind Furlong Ridge. They see the attack coming and realize that the enemy isn't accommodating the defenders — he's going off to the south. Dillard and his crew race up a steep-sided wadi (a washed out gully made by the infrequent heavy rains in the desert), then down into another, then move forward to slide down into the cover of another wadi, the Bradley's front hidden, but its 25-millimeter cannon covering another route of approach.

From this spot his crew will kill eight Soviet machines before being knocked out by an A-10 aircraft that is part of the Soviet armada.

The Soviets are on a roll. Artillery effectively takes another of the defenders' companies out of the fight. The Soviets sweep over The Whale — and some, apparently, so far east that these dug-in Fort Benning troops can't get to them, an observer says. A mounted rifle battalion sweeps through and around the defenders — mostly around defensive positions — and speeds away.

On-site OPFOR observers say it appears the "good guys" have knocked out maybe 50 percent of the attacking force. Another observer, charged with preparing summaries of these desert battles later puts Soviet losses at 30 percent, and "Blue Force" or good-guy losses at around 70 percent in an hour of fighting.

But that is before this observer obtains printouts from the Star Wars Room, which will give him actual figures. Artillery continues to fire. Tanks rush to plug holes left by early losses. An F-16 buzzes the battlefield, dropping flares that simulate bombs or other munitions.

The Red armor includes artillery shells containing anti-personnel mines that scatter when the shell explodes above the battlefield. After 30 minutes, the "writing is on the wall," one observer says. In an hour, the battle is done.

A 3rd Brigade reserve force has stormed up, but can only take out some of the Soviet vehicles at the end of the Opposing Force's lines, an observer points out. There are two main impressions to infrequent observers: How quickly this battle proceeds and how far it is scattered over the landscape. There's none of that huge, massed in one place fight like you see in the movies. The sheer power of the opposing forces is awesome, but it looks diluted from maybe 1,400 meters away.

Chief Warrant Officer Timothy Smith gives his overview of the battle, while the defenders are evacuating their wounded and preparing for another fight, another day. He said, "The OPFOR probably lost 50-60 percent of its forces, but they're still combat effective" since the remaining forces can move on to the OPFOR objective, where its job is to set up a hasty defense.

Early reconnaissance, he says, was the key to the OPFOR's success here. "We were able to pretty effectively get in and get eyes on them" from the surrounding hills, mostly the night before, Smith said. "We were able to find most of their positions. That enabled us to quickly push through," he said. "But this is not a win-or-lose thing, it's training and some days you do better than others."

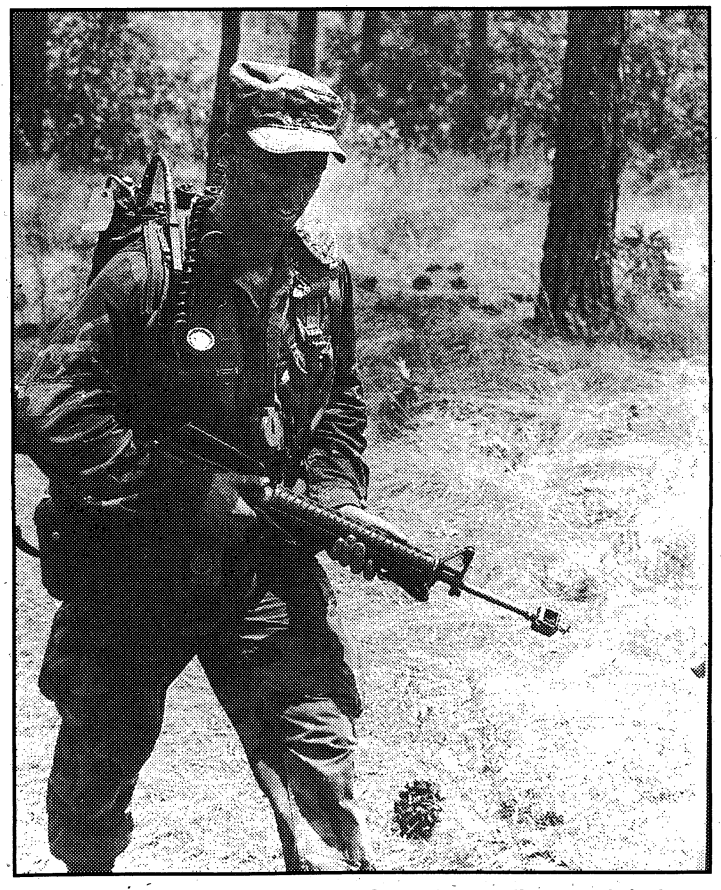
Now observer-controllers will sit down together with the Blue Force and try to lead them through everything they did so maybe next time they'll be winners. Sgt. 1st Class Dillard, too, is philosophical. "We're dead," he said. "But we didn't do too bad. We got into a killing frenzy and killed about eight of them (Soviet vehicles or tanks). We learned a few things, and learned to brush up on some things you forget if you don't do them every day.

"The observer-controllers like to go over our mistakes. And, of course, we like to pat ourselves on the back, so we will point out what we did right, too."

1st Lt. Patrick Howard, Dillard's platoon leader, who was responsible for three Bradleys in this fight, says, "I think we did well, except that we died."

The after-action-review, which will start at platoon level shortly, and proceed tomorrow to the task force after-action review, "is the real reason we're out here," the lieutenant says. "We get our real teaching from the observer-controllers. The thrust is on education. We can learn a lot about being good soldiers out here, which is the real need."

On the prowl



Cadet Roy Robert Trumble IV of Columbus walks patrol during a recent field training exercise at advanced camp, a rigorous six-week Army Reserve Officers' Training Corps (ROTC) summer training program at Fort Bragg, N.C. Trumble, a senior at Columbus College, is one of more than 2,700 ROTC cadets from across the nation attending the camp at Fort Bragg.

Study may keep McClellan alive

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — An Air Force study has concluded that chemical warfare training for airmen likely would be enhanced if it were conducted at the Army's Fort McClellan in east Alabama, lawmakers from the state said last week.

Rep. Glen Browder of Jacksonville and Sens. Howell Heflin and Richard Shelby said in a joint statement that the study, prepared by the Air Force secretary's office, should bolster their ongoing battle to keep Fort McClellan open.

"The prospects of a joint chemical training center in Anniston is a giant step in providing a significant new mission for Fort McClellan ... as a new round of base closings approaches," Browder said.

Defense Secretary Dick Cheney last year recommended that Fort McClellan be closed, but the Base Closure and Realignment Commission voted to keep it open, largely because the installation is the only place where U.S. personnel can receive training with live chemical agents.

The second round of base closing initiatives from the Defense Department will come next year.

Heflin, who initiated the request for the study, said a decision to move the Air Force chemical training program to the Army base "could effectively remove Fort McClellan from future consideration for base closure."

The Air Force now conducts chemical warfare training at Lowry Air Force Base in Colorado, which the base closing commission last year ordered shut down.

The Air Force had been planning to move its chemical training program to Lackland Air Force Base in Texas, but the new report said the Air Force now will do a comparative analysis of the cost of moving the chemical training to Lackland or Fort McClellan. That analysis is expected by Sept. 1.

WW II 50TH ANNIVERSARY

After successfully landing more than 10,000 men on Guadalcanal 50 years ago this week, U.S. Marines secured Henderson Field, forming a defensive perimeter around the airstrip. Believing that the American force numbered less than 3,000, the Japanese countered, unsuccessfully. Henderson Field began receiving Allied aircraft as 31 fighters from the escort carrier USS Long Island landed.

Here, according to research by the Military History Division at Fort Benning, were the top news items of the week:

■

Allied troops launched a major raid, landing 6,000 men on the beaches of Dieppe in northern France. The raid proved to be a disaster as the combined Canadian and British force lost 3,600 men, 106 aircraft, 30 tanks and 33 landing craft, while reaching none of its predetermined targets. The failures of the landing, however, provided valuable lessons concerning beach landings, preliminary bombardments, and the inherent difficulties of capturing a defended port.

■

On the Eastern Front, the German Sixth Army continued to advance through the Soviet Union, plowing through Russian resistance to seize power stations in the Caucasus Mountains.

■

Also on the Eastern Front, Hitler reacted to intensified partisan resistance by granting more power to the SS Special Units. This led to increasingly harsh treatment of the already brutalized partisans.

■

The Allies selected the French city of Rouen as the first European target for a raid conducted entirely by American bombers. This raid served as the first of 1,546 missions flown over Europe by the United States' Eighth Air Force in 1942.

Duo pulled some strings to perform at The Loft

By Sandra Okamoto
Staff writer

The Loft co-owner Buddy Nelms saw Andrew Hyra and Kristian Bush "way back in May when we were playing the Georgia Theater in Athens."

At the end of the show, Nelms introduced himself and "bought a CD out of the back of our car," said Bush. "He said he was starting The Loft and wanted us to come and play. We said, 'Sure.' Lots of people say things like that to us. Then we totally forgot about it."

"Two or three months later, we heard from Gary (Hatley, who books talent for The Loft). He said, 'We'd like to book you.' And he filled up our calendar."

Hyra and Bush have performed in The Loft twice, the first time at the grand opening in early July. "And that's how it got started," said Bush of the relationship between the duo and The Loft.

When the duo first played at The Loft, the stage was set along the south wall and sound wasn't quite what they liked. When they came two weeks ago, the stage had been moved to the southwest corner of the room.

"The stage is fixed much better," said Hyra. "The Loft has a great feel to it."

Both musicians were impressed by Nelms' efforts to showcase original music.

"It's really great," said Hyra, "to hear original music in a town not especially known for it. When we were sitting outside during a break, people kept coming up to us and saying how much they really liked it."

Kristian Bush and Andrew Hyra played at The Loft's grand opening in July.

"It's a nice place," concurred Bush.

Hyra and Bush have been performing together for 18 months. They're also part of a quartet called The Wagon Wheels, which will perform next weekend. "The four-piece Wagon Wheels was a joke we put together," said Bush. "It's real loose," said Hyra.

If you heard Hyra and Bush both times they played here before, don't expect the same performances next week. "We keep something different going on all the time," said Bush. "Otherwise, it would be the same old thing."

"You gotta get a spark going," said Hyra. "Or there's no fun in it."

The duo's new album, "St. Christopher's Crossing," is on Cool Beans Music. The songs are published by Honest Harry Music, named for Harry Hyra, Andrew's dad.

Hyra has a degree in history from Tulane in New Orleans, while Bush received his degree in English from the University of Georgia. They play acoustic rock, playing 12-string guitars, a mandolin, harmonica and bongo drum.

"It's music from the heart," said Bush. "It's music you just can't hate."

Genealogy class is Saturday

From staff reports

The Muscogee Genealogical Society will present a free four-hour workshop on beginning genealogy Saturday. The workshop will be in the Columbus College Davidson Student Center's Columbus Room from 9 a.m.-1 p.m.

It is intended for those who would like to trace their roots, but don't know where to begin. The program will consist of short presentations by various members of the genealogical community on major issues in genealogy.

The first presenter will be Callie McGinnis, president of the MGS, who will define genealogy and family history and will explain the various forms used by the genealogist.

Society treasurer Debra Wisenall and recording secretary Linda Kennedy will speak on the initial gathering of information and interviewing family members.

The subject of obtaining vital courthouse records will be addressed by Sylvia Horner, the society's second vice president, while local genealogy instructor Sandra Stratford will discuss the importance of visiting cemeteries and seeking out church records.

One of the best sources of genealogical information, the federal census, will be discussed by McGinnis. The society's first vice president, John Lassiter, will speak on accessing local libraries and archives for genealogical information.

Finally, Chris Schmink, a volunteer at the Mormon Family History Center on Reese Road, will provide information about the resources available at that facility.

Following the presentations, there will be a question-and-answer session.

For more information, call Horner at 561-5831.

Wrestler gets a hero's welcome

The wrath of Cuba was savage but grew weary.

Like a ravenous wolf, I gorged myself on his fatigue.

In the end, I had devoured him completely. — Excerpt of a Rodney Smith poem written at the Olympics after defeating Cecilio Rodriguez of Cuba for the bronze medal in the 149.5-pound division in Greco-Roman wrestling.

By Mark Rice
Staff Writer

Rodney Smith didn't attend the Olympics opening ceremonies in Barcelona. He had something more important on his mind.

He skipped the ceremonies to prepare for the Greco-Roman wrestling competition, which was beginning the next day. Looking back, he said he regrets not attending, but. . . .

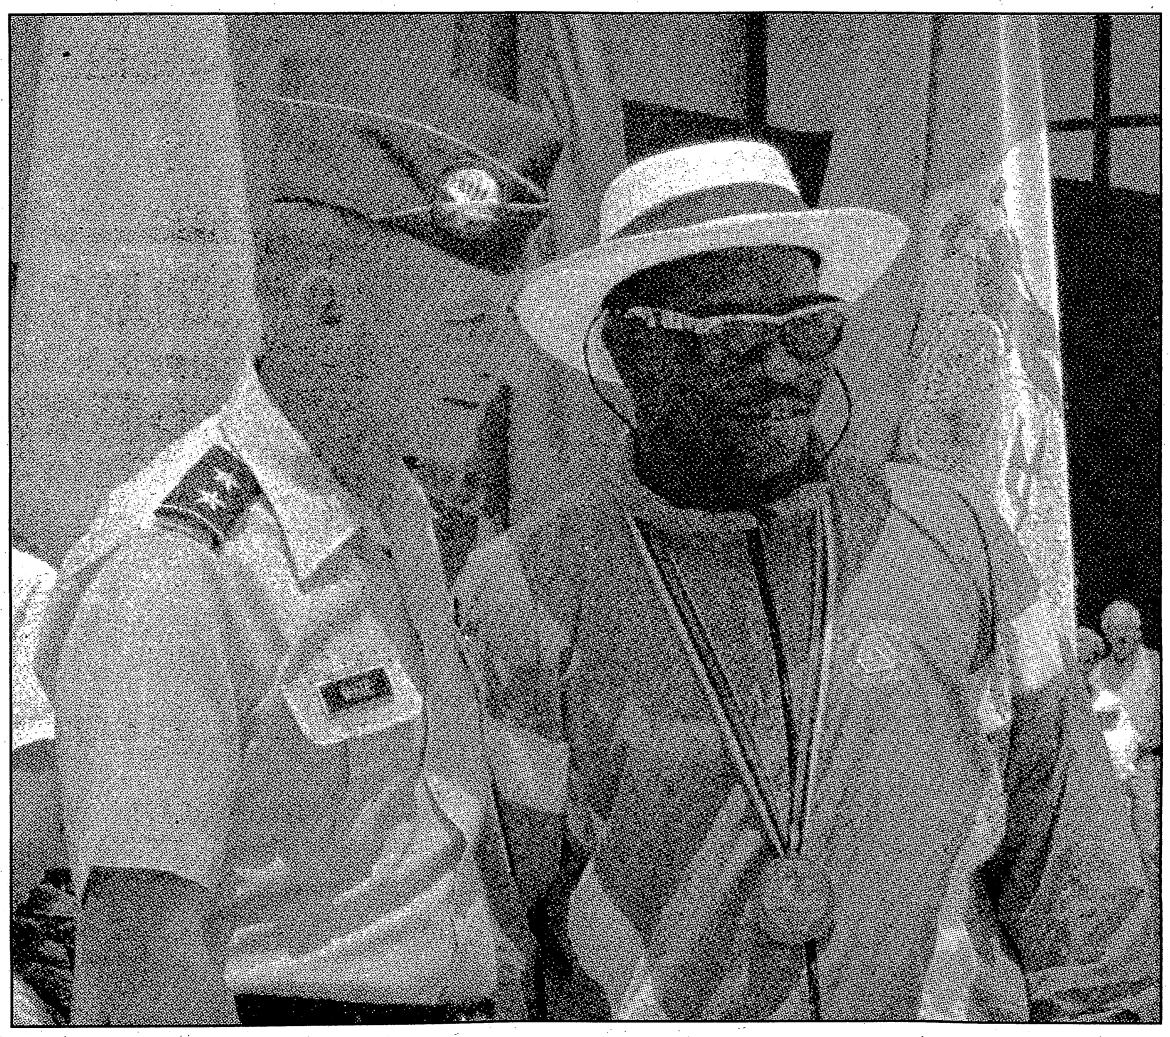
"But this makes up for it," Smith said with a smile, holding up the bronze medal draped around his neck.

Smith, a specialist with the 29th Infantry Regiment at Fort Benning, returned to a hero's welcome Sunday afternoon at the Columbus Metropolitan Airport. As the band played the theme from "Rocky," Smith walked across the tarmac and was greeted by a festive array of friends, family, flags and food.

Wearing a pastel-colored sweat suit, white wide-brim hat with a blue band, flip-flops and sunglasses, Smith basked in the warm welcome.

"I'm elated," he said. "A lot of people think I would be surprised (winning a medal). But with the support I've gotten from my teammates and Fort Benning, I'm not surprised."

Smith wasn't favored to win a medal in the 149.5-pound division, but there were those who believed in him.



Benning Patriot
Post commander Maj. Gen. Jerry White greets Olympic medalist Spc. Rodney Smith at Columbus Municipal Airport Sunday afternoon.

"I knew he would be in the top three," said Spc. Derrick Waldroup, a member of the Army wrestling team. "In Rodney's situation, it was just a matter of his progression and his tenacity. Sports Illustrated didn't pick him, but I knew he'd get a medal. The difference was his mental attitude."

"He's a real idealist," said Sgt. 1st Class Tony Thomas, the Army wrestling coach in the World Class Athlete Program at Fort Benning. "He believed he would make the Olympic team. I guess he had to do some soul searching. When you tell him he can't do something, he performs. He's a strong-willed kid. He's hardheaded. He's different."

As different as an Olympian who doesn't attend the opening ceremonies. As different as a wrestling poet.

"Poetry is a big part of me and my attitude on the mat," Smith said. "I'm able to vent my feelings through writing."

"I'm elated," Smith said. "A lot of people think I would be surprised (winning a medal). But with the support I've gotten from my teammates and Fort Benning, I'm not surprised."

Smith's wrestling story began in Springfield, Mass., where he won high school titles and became a Division III All-America at Western New England College.

"Since high school, he always told me he was going to the Olympics," said Smith's mother, Arlene. Smith's family was flown in by the Association of the U.S. Army as a surprise to greet him at the airport. "Rodney worked on that goal and achieved it. He wanted to win the gold. He was disappointed he didn't, but he knew to come out with any medal is something."

"I didn't expect all of this," Smith said of the airport reception. "But this is typical of Fort Benning. They've always been there to support me and provide a trouble-free atmosphere in which to train. I was a contender in my mind and in my teammates' minds, but in the world-scope, I wasn't."

Although at 26, Smith would be nearing "over-the-hill" in most Olympic sports, the prime age for Greco-Roman wrestlers is considered around 30. That's exactly how old he'll be in 1996, when the Olympics come to Atlanta. Will he be there?

"Well, I have to take one step at a time," Smith said. "The bronze medal is an honor to win, but my goal is gold and a world championship. If it leads me to Atlanta, we'll see."

Atlantans don't take 'Whatizit' to heart

From wire reports

ATLANTA — The mascot for the 1996 Summer Olympics may have a hard time winning the hearts of Atlantans.

The president of the city's Olympic committee is confident it will in time.

PAYNE

The mascot drew little reaction from a sellout crowd of 43,297 at a baseball game Tuesday night shortly after receiving a smattering of applause from onlookers when it was presented for the first time in Atlanta at an airport news conference.

Called Whatizit, the mascot has been widely criticized since its introduction Sunday during the closing ceremonies of the 1992 Games in Barcelona, Spain.

"It's going to take some time for folks to get used to it, but everybody's going to love it," said Billy Payne, president of the Atlanta Committee for the Olympic Games.

"We have chosen a futuristic mascot, a computer-generated, three-dimensional mascot as we look forward into the future," Payne said. "Children are crazy and wild about it. We don't have to defend it. It is our mascot."

There were more boos than cheers when Whatizit first appeared on the field before the Atlanta-San Diego game Tuesday night. It drew more cheers when it gave a few tomahawk chops. The animated version was roundly booed when it was shown on the DiamondVision screen during Monday night's game against the Los Angeles Dodgers.

Payne says the mascot will have more merchandising than any mascot in Olympic history.

He said 3,700 T-shirts bearing Whatizit's likeness sold in the first two hours they were available, more than the number of Atlanta Olympic shirts that sold in the same period after the city was announced as the site for the 1996 Games.

"It looks like we may have hit a home run on the marketing side," Payne said.

Payne said the mascot won't speak until the opening ceremonies four years from now.

Payne, who said he had been awake for 24 hours, had spent 32 days out of the city. He and about 100 other ACOG members were studying how Barcelona put on its Olympics.

"We will spend the next 30 days, perhaps even the next 60 days, evaluating the very extensive information and notes that we received," Payne said. "We want to adopt the best parts of the Barcelona plan."

He said that while Atlanta can't match the seacoast setting of Barcelona, which he called "a newly discovered 1,000-year-old city," it does have geographic beauty and plenty of trees.

He said one thing the city must do is create a place for people to gather when the games are over each day.

"I think you'll see some very positive developments in the next couple of months," he said.

Benning official insists weapons weren't smuggled from the post

By Eileen Zaffiro
Staff Writer

It's almost impossible that any weapons slipped outside Fort Benning illegally and unlikely any large amounts of munitions were smuggled off post, a Benning spokesman said Tuesday.

In an unusual move, Fort Benning officials held a news conference to discuss allegations that Benning soldiers are supplying Alabama-based white supremacist groups with machine guns, ammunition and explosives.

"We're saying no military weapons left the post," Public Affairs Officer Lt. Col. John Van Dyke said at the press conference. "We can't prove that the other stuff didn't leave post. If it did, we're talking a small amount."

Federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms agent Gary Jones said investigators have determined that some equipment was stolen from the military.

"There was military stuff found," Jones said. "But what base it came from hasn't been determined."

Five Fort Benning soldiers were detained and questioned Friday after federally-led raids in Columbus-area warehouses and a home turned up stolen military hardware. The troops were tracked down through letters, also unearthed during the raids, between reputed Birmingham supremacist leaders and some of the soldiers.

On Tuesday, a federal magistrate ordered one of those leaders, Aryan National Front organizer Bill Riccio, held without bond until his trial on weapons charges. Another, supremacist group member Ken Collins, will be released on $5,000 secured bond.

In the meantime, Fort Benning officials say all the evidence on their soldiers is not yet in.

Rigorous safeguards ensure military superiors would "know immediately" if a weapon was missing, Van Dyke said.

"In the arms room you could tell if something was missing off the rack," he said.

Moreover, serial numbers are attached to weapons and lot numbers to explosives, and the number of grenades a soldier is issued has to match the number of pins returned, he said.

Federal investigators say they should be able to say with certainty from where the machine guns came. But they may be able to identify munitions only as stock that could have come from any military base, Van Dyke said.

"The ammunition and explosives possibly could have come from Fort Benning," he said, noting things such as souvenir bullets are occasionally carried off training fields.

But even with that uncertainty, Fort Benning has no plans to overhaul its safeguards against weapon theft, Van Dyke said. Efforts now are to make sure current rules are being enforced, he said.

"We feel the existing methods are adequate," he said.

Also found in Friday's raids was evidence identifying three of the soldiers as being card-carrying members of supremacist groups.

While none of the soldiers have been charged with any crimes, proof of their being members of groups such as the Aryan National Front or Confederate Hammerskins could mean reduction in rank or booting out of the Army, Van Dyke said.

Four of the five soldiers were confined to their barracks over the weekend, but that restriction was lifted Monday.

H & R BLOCK INCOME TAX COURSE
STARTS SEPTEMBER 14

Thousands of people learn how to prepare income tax returns from H & R Block and then earn money as income tax preparers. H & R Block, the world's largest income tax preparation service, offers its Income Tax Course starting September 14, 1992. Morning, evening, and Saturday classes are available.

Experienced instructors teach tax law, theory, and application. Classroom discussion and practice problems provide students with a thorough understanding of each tax topic included in the course. Students learn how to handle increasingly complex income tax situations as the course progresses.

Ideal for people who want to increase their tax knowledge, the course teaches students how to save money on their taxes and also prepares them for a rewarding career.

The affordable fee includes textbooks and supplies. Graduates receive Certificates of Achievement and continuing education units (CEUs). Qualified graduates of the course may be offered job interviews with H & R Block but are under no obligation to accept employment.

Those interested in more information about the H & R Block Income Tax Course may contact the H & R Block office at 2511 Airport Thruway, Columbus, Georgia. You may also call (706) 324-5603 or 1-800-TAX-2000.

RECYCLE

Secrecy system frozen in Cold War paranoia

WASHINGTON — Buried way down inside the government's growing mountain of classified documents are three dated April 15, 1917, regarding U.S. troop movements during World War I.

David Evans

These vintage War Department items are perhaps the oldest examples of widespread overclassification uncovered by Steven Aftergood of the Federation of American Scientists. For the past two years Aftergood has been sole author of the organization's "Secrecy & Government Bulletin." His goal is to build the case that the government's secrecy system is overdue for overhaul.

"If their classification were to be taken seriously, disclosure of these 1917 documents 'reasonably could be expected to cause damage to the national security,' according to current secrecy criteria. If 'national security' is to have any meaning, this inference is patently absurd," Aftergood said in a recent interview.

If anything, "national security" has been weakened by excessive secrecy, Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan, D-N.Y., writes in the spring issue of The National Interest.

"You lose your liberties that way . . . liberty in the sense of easiness with ideas, awareness of options, sense of opportunities. The secrecy system has done this to us," he declared.

Moynihan, a former member of the Intelligence Committee, urged that a "Democratic president (Republican also) could do no greater service to the nation . . . than to set about an energetic, determined, public dismantling of the secrecy system."

Among his reasons, Moynihan argued that the system "is itself a kind of secret."

"We have an annual report on secrets produced by the Information Security Oversight Office. Last year we created 6,797,720 of them. But the secret of the report on secrets is that it only counts up to Top Secret. All the real secrets are higher than that with code names I am not at liberty to reveal," Moynihan noted.

Aftergood's bulletins, though, offer a glimpse into a system where rich ironies abound.

In some cases, only American citizens are being kept in the dark. For example, last April the U.S. Air Force maintained its usual silence about the launch of a reconnaissance satellite, but details about the date, location, type of rocket and purported mission were announced by Tass radio in Moscow two days beforehand. As Aftergood noted, "With subtle irony perhaps, the information was broadcast in English."

In his confirmation hearing last year, CIA Director Robert M. Gates suggested that disclosing the intelligence budget might be one way of recognizing "that the mentality of the Cold War has changed . . . that there is an appreciation of a new day."

Gates' new day is long in coming. According to Aftergood, "The CIA has actually increased its secrecy by classifying the budget for intelligence community management staff."

The Senate simply ignored the CIA action and published the figure anyway ($10.5 million in fiscal 1993). The House Intelligence Committee groused in its recent report, "The (CIA) decision is . . . unfortunate since it has the effect of making the intelligence budget even less open to public review now than it was at the height of the Cold War . . . contrary to the spirit of openness" declared by Gates.

Indeed, the classifiers seem to be busier than ever. The latest government accounting shows the number of secrets going up, from Moynihan's figure of roughly 6.8 million to more than 7.1 million classification actions. New secrets are being made now at the rate of more than 19,000 a day.

What is to be done? As a "pathetically modest" start, Aftergood suggests publishing the intelligence budget. In this regard, Moynihan told his fellow senators last February, "The American people would be baffled if they knew the true size and extent of the intelligence budget. Boggled."

Of course, people might then start to ask if an intelligence bureaucracy that was publishing "Soviet Military Power" at the same time the Soviet empire was collapsing is worth the estimated $30 billion a year.

Above all, Aftergood said, "We need to limit the scope of what is classifiable."

There are legitimate secrets. Aftergood cited a few examples: details of advanced weapons designs, the identities of intelligence sources, military plans and records of ongoing diplomatic negotiations.

Nor should these items remain sealed forever.

"There has to be a limit on duration," Aftergood said. He proposed a "drop dead date" for bulk declassification. Aftergood recalled that in 1972 President Richard M. Nixon suggested that most "Top Secret" material should be declassified after 10 years.

It's time for such streamlining. After all, the Cold War is over — and so is World War I.

David Evans is military affairs writer for the Chicago Tribune.

"We have an annual report on secrets produced by the Information Security Oversight Office. Last year we created 6,797,720 of them," Moynihan noted.

We must give infantrymen pride, resources back

Dear Col. (Al) Garland:

I am writing in reference to your recent article, "Army needs to stop jerking infantry around."

I agree very strongly with what I believe is your major point. "The line infantry is the Army's poor relation in peacetime and suffers from neglect. And yet, when battle is joined, the line infantryman is expected to be fully trained and ready to go into battle with all the flags flying and guns at the ready."

We are "guilty," so to speak, of shunting the infantryman aside — of trying to relegate him to the trash heap of history. Part of the reason, as you stated, is that the infantry is not glamorous and it is a place where a lot of people are killed. However, when the result is that "his numbers are reduced, his units emasculated, and his training time and resources almost zeroed out," we are guilty of criminal shortsightedness. Unnecessary casualties are the result.

As you noted, it is hard to glamorize what is basically an extremely dangerous, brutal job. The Army has taken some steps to enhance the prestige of the infantry. The Combat Infantryman Badge (CIB), the Expert Infantryman Badge (EIB), and the blue shoulder cord were significant innovations. Those outward trappings, however, will not in themselves result in high esprit.

I believe that pride and esprit come from within oneself. They are based on several beliefs — that I have a tough, important mission; that I am well trained and capable of accomplishing that mission; that I have competent leaders; that I belong to an outstanding unit; that I had to meet high standards (the rites of passage) to be accepted into that unit; and that others recognize these facts about me.

Certainly there is no tougher, more dangerous, or more important job than that of the infantryman. We will be hard pressed to find anyone who disagrees with that statement!

Convincing the infantryman that he is well trained should not be hard; just train him well. He knows when he is good at his job. Train him to be all he can be. There is no reason — there can be no excuse — for settling for anything less.

Getting competent leaders is the next criterion. From my recent limited contacts with the infantry at Fort Benning, I am very favorably impressed. Those contracts with regimental commanders on down convince me that they are the best I ever saw. The Army is certainly focusing on the task.

I believe that Ranger training is the best preparation for combat leadership of small infantry units. There can be little doubt that the graduate has improved his knowledge of small unit tactics because of the emphasis on tactical problems. However, what he has learned is much more important. He has had to get people to perform difficult tasks under very severe conditions of fatigue, emotional stress, sleep and food deprivation, and physical and weather hardships. One of the most important lessons is that he can go just as far as his guts and brains will take him; because of the very great physical, emotional, and mental demands placed on him he has learned that he has great, if not unlimited, potential within himself if he is just willing to pay the price. Consequently, he knows, also, that his men have great potential; therefore, he will set his standards high. The Army should increase the number of Ranger graduates while maintaining the current high standards.

How do we convince the infantryman that he is in an outstanding unit? Not as easy as the previous tasks, in my opinion. I agree with some of your remarks pertaining to the demise of the regiment; we need that "home" which a regiment provides. We need the tradition which goes with it.

Our young officers recognize the importance of unit pride. I recently visited Lt. Col. Mark Gerner, Commander of the 1/11, one of the training units at Fort Benning. As I entered the battalion area, I was greeted by signs proclaiming the glories of the combat history of that battalion and its parent regiment. When I entered the battalion headquarters, I saw more of the same. I was so impressed by the emphasis on tradition that, at first, I thought that I was mistaken about the mission of that battalion. Was it to train individual soldiers or was this the headquarters of a combat ready infantry battalion? I was impressed, and, yes, I could feel the sense of pride which permeated that headquarters and the soldier I met. Our leaders are making the best of a difficult situation.

We can have esprit and it can/should be based on a valid appraisal of the unit's capability. You cannot fool soldiers; they'll know if they are in a lousy organization. You don't have to tell them they are good either (although it helps). They'll know that, too.

What about the rites of passage? Basic training and advanced individual training are the first steps. Certainly enlightened leaders can elicit the last ounce of effort from young men wanting to prove themselves Men! Any person who successfully completes this training has every reason to be proud. His leaders will ensure that he is reminded often of his success. When he reports to his tactical unit, the process continues.

Every tactical unit commander should aspire to the highest standards. Why not be all that you can be? Why not aim for having every infantryman qualify for the Expert Infantryman's Badge? That's not a manifestation of "badge disease" which you decry. That aspiration places a very high, yet attainable, goal as the target. The badge is a concrete, visible symbol of excellence. Ask any one who has the EIB if he is proud of it. You better believe it!

The last criterion is getting others to be aware of the importance of the infantryman's job and the high standards required to be an infantryman. We haven't done too well here. Certainly we can do better. Maybe we ought to take a look at the Marines. No matter how much one may criticize them for their emphasis on public relations there can be no doubt that they are masters at convincing every Marine of the importance of the Marine Corps.

The line infantry is the backbone of our Army. It has the toughest, most dangerous mission. As a consequence, the infantryman has to be in outstanding physical condition. He has to be highly skilled in the tactics and techniques of the individual soldier. His squad, platoon, company, battalion, and brigade have to be smoothly functioning, highly efficient fighting machines. He has to believe that he and his unit are the best that our Army has to offer. And he has to know that others recognize his accomplishments.

We can achieve all those goals. When we do we'll have infantrymen who can accomplish any appropriate mission no matter how tough. We'll also have infantrymen who are proud of themselves and their job. They'll be "fully trained and ready to go into battle with all flags flying and guns at the ready." They'll know that they don't have to take a back seat to anybody — no, not any Marine nor any paratrooper nor any Ranger!

Allies deliver ultimatum to Saddam Hussein

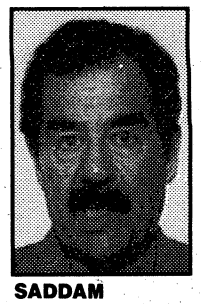
From wire reports

WASHINGTON — President Bush announced Wednesday that the United States and its allies have given Saddam Hussein a 24-hour deadline to stop flying warplanes over southern Iraq and end his "harsh repression" of Shiite Muslims.

Bush's formal "no fly zone" announcement that Iraqi warplanes — both fixed-wing aircraft and helicopters — will be shot down if they fly below the 32nd parallel came after days of warnings.

"Twenty four hours from now, coalition aircraft, including those from the United States, will begin flying surveillance missions in southern Iraq," Bush said in a brief White House news conference.

BUSH



SADDAM

He said he was "prepared to take additional steps" if Saddam's attempts to repress Shiite civilians and insurgents continues.

At the United Nations in New York, Iraqi Ambassador Abdul Al-Amir Alanbari was summoned to the French U.N. mission to receive a "communication" about the prohibited zone in southern Iraq from the U.S., British, French and Russian envoys.

Bush denied that he was motivated in any way by domestic politics. He said National Security Adviser Brent Scowcroft had notified Democratic nominee Bill Clinton of the decision.

Clinton has voiced support for Bush's widely anticipated action while criticizing the president for not protecting the Shiites immediately after the war.

"I support the allies' decision to establish a no-fly zone in southern Iraq," Clinton said in a statement Wednesday.

"As I have consistently said before, Saddam Hussein should not be mistaken about the resolve of all Americans on this issue. He should understand clearly that even in this election year, we are united behind strong efforts to ensure his full compliance with all U.N. resolutions."

Despite some tough rhetoric from Baghdad, Saddam appeared to be maneuvering to avoid a clash over the latest confrontation.

In advance of Wednesday's announcement, Iraq withdrew most of its fixed-wing aircraft from the region. State Department spokesman Joseph Snyder said some Iraqi helicopters remained in the area.

The Pentagon stood ready to carry out Bush's order. About 24,500 U.S. military personnel remain in the Gulf region and surrounding waters.

In announcing the allied ultimatum against Iraq, Bush said: "We have heard and seen new evidence of harsh repression from the government of Saddam Hussein against the men, women and children of Iraq."

"We seek Iraq's compliance, not its partition," Bush said, seeking to address Iraqi concerns that such a move would fragment the nation.

The president cited "further graphic proof of Saddam's brutality" against the Shiite population.

Bush said that Saddam continues to violate U.N. cease-fire resolutions, including one demanding that he end the oppression of the Iraqi people.

"Saddam has sought to prevent the world from learning of his brutality. It is time to ensure that the world does know," Bush said.

In March 1991, U.S. fighter jets downed two Iraqi attack planes for violating the provisional cease-fire agreement against putting warplanes in the air.

A senior administration official said Wednesday no Arab country had protested the plan.

The official said a delegation of Iraqi Shiites had disavowed any such intention in a recent meeting at the State Department and that the Bush administration was "categorically opposed" to partition.

"If Saddam is wise he will respond to the no-fly zone by stopping his repression of the Shiites in the south," said the official, who spoke to reporters at the White House under rules that shielded his identity.

Hendrix is man with a mission

General says he is committed to turning out the world's best soldier

By Jerry Rutledge
Patriot Editor

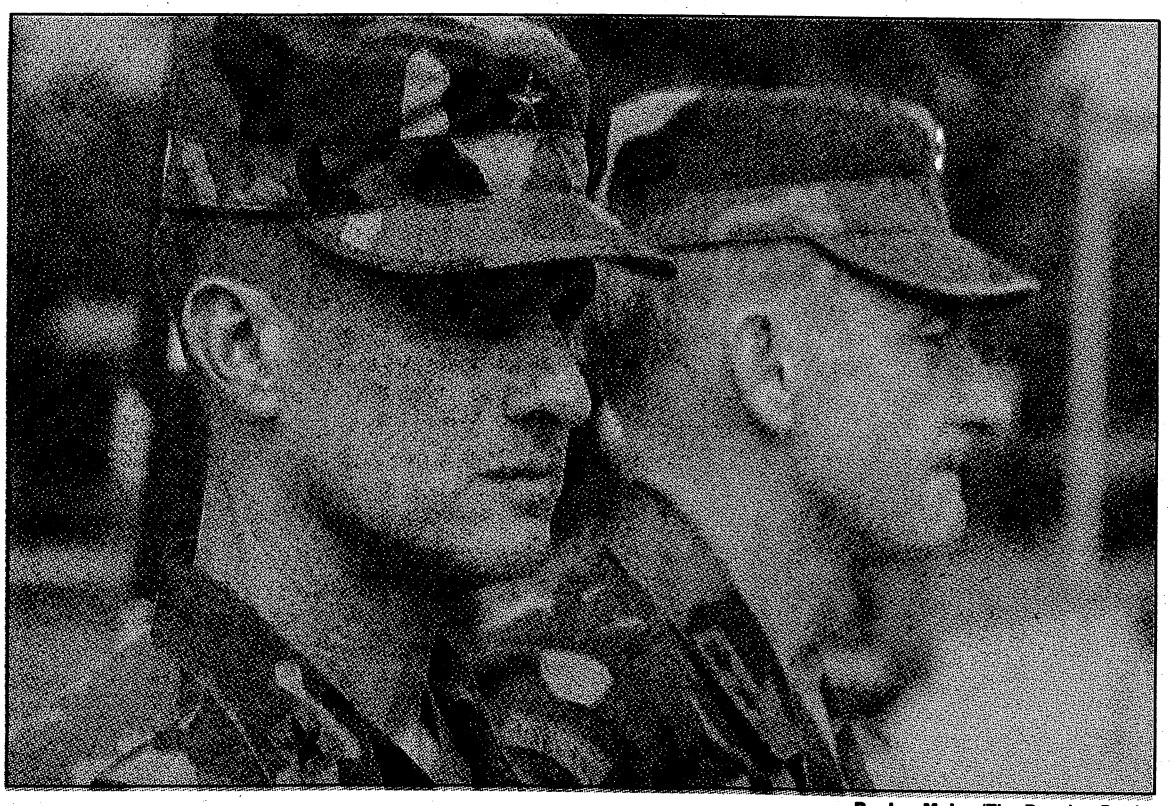
Living in the heat and humidity of Columbus may take a little getting used to for Brig. Gen. John W. "Jay" Hendrix. The weather on the European continent, where Hendrix has spent the last five years, is decidedly more temperate.

"I'm older than I used to be, so it takes a little bit of time (to get acclimated)," said Hendrix. "But I've already started that."

He's also started getting acquainted with his new duties at Fort Benning. Hendrix replaced Brig. Gen. Carl Ernst as deputy commanding general and assistant commandant of the U.S. Army Infantry Schools after serving as executive officer to the supreme allied commander, Supreme Headquarters Allied Powers, Europe, in Casteau, Belgium.

Hendrix had previously served as assistant division commander of the 1st Armored Division. Ernst left Fort Benning two weeks ago to begin his new assignment as an assistant division commander of the 82nd Airborne Division at Fort Bragg, N.C. Hendrix, who described himself as "not a fast learner, but not a slow one either" during his welcome ceremony last week, hit the ground running, quickly getting acclimated to his new job. He feels Fort Benning and its mission fits his career objectives perfectly. "When I decided to stay in the Army (early in his career), I decided to stay to do those things that I do best," said Hendrix. "Those things are done here at Fort Benning.

"I am dedicated to having good soldiers and good units and this (Fort Benning) is a key part of how they do that in the Army. I am not a genius. I am not an Einstein. I am not the next Chief of Staff of the Army or anything like that. I'm just a simple guy and this is what I want to do — prepare our soldiers to be the best soldiers they can be. For my career, for my objectives in the Army, there isn't a better place to be than here at Fort Benning."



By Joe Maher/The Benning Patriot

Brig. Gen. Jay Hendrix (l) and post commander Maj. Gen. Jerry White attend the ceremony welcoming Hendrix as Benning's new deputy commanding general.

While Hendrix has spent most of the last five years abroad, including a tour in Southwest Asia with the 1st Armored Division in Desert Storm, he is certainly not foreign to the Columbus area.

Both he and his wife, Cheri, are native Georgians — Hendrix being from Statesboro and his wife hailing from Atlanta. The ties also extend locally — the general's parents once lived in Columbus for five years while his father served as a minister at Rose Hill Baptist Church.

Hendrix has had one other assignment at Benning, serving as a ranger instructor at the Mountain Ranger Camp (in Dahlonega) from May 1966 to June 1967.

"Although we've been out of the states for a long time, we've never completely severed our relationships," said Hendrix. "I've been back and forth for some visits. We've always liked this area and we're looking forward to resuming some old relationships and getting reacquainted with the area and its people."

Maj. Jerry A. White, in his welcoming speech to Hendrix and his family, said the new post deputy commanding general was "an infantryman and a good one."

"If I could have picked — and I did not — any general of the Army to become assistant commandant, it would have been Jay Hendrix," White said. "He has experience and a broad background of assignments with both light and heavy units that is so essential in this very, very critical position."

White said that the drastically changing times in the world had brought changing challenges for the nation and the military.

"What we do or what we fail to do in the next couple of years here at Fort Benning will have far reaching impact on the combat effectiveness of our army," he said. "It is therefore an imperative that we tackle the right issues and make the right decisions for the Infantry Corps." Hendrix says the challenge of meeting this new "challenge of change" is what excites him most about the opportunity to return to Fort Benning and the Infantry School.

"We have many challenges for the future — for the infantry, for the Army and for our country," he said. "These are exciting times and demanding times, to be sure. And I'm looking forward to being a part of that."

By Joe Maher/The Benning Patriot

Hendrix says Fort Benning and its mission of training the best soldiers in the world fits his career objectives perfectly.

Brig. Gen. John W. 'Jay' Hendrix

Age: 49.

Hometown: Statesboro, Ga.

Family: Wife, Cheri and two children.

Past: Was executive officer to the supreme allied commander, Supreme Headquarters Allied Powers, Europe, in Belgium.

Present: Deputy commanding general and assistant commandant of the U.S. Army Infantry School at Fort Benning.

"I am dedicated to having good soldiers and good units and this (Fort Benning) is a key part of how they do that in the Army," said Hendrix.

Said Hendrix, "I am not a genius. I am not an Einstein. I am not the next Chief of Staff of the Army or anything like that. I'm just a simple guy and this is what I want to do — prepare our soldiers to be the best soldiers they can be. For my career, for my objectives in the Army, there isn't a better place to be than here at Fort Benning."

Academy officials hope controversy behind them

From wire reports

ANNAPOLIS, Md. — Before there was Tailhook, there was Gwen Dreyer.

Just before Christmas 1989, Dreyer — a 19-year-old, second-year student from Encinitas, Calif. — was dragged from her room at the U.S. Naval Academy and handcuffed to a urinal as men jeered and took photographs.

LYNCH

Dreyer, whose father and grandfather attended the academy, quit four months later, disgusted by the leniency of the punishments meted out against her tormentors: Two midshipmen lost leave time and were issued demerits, while six others received written reprimands.

It was a precursor to the Tailhook incident, when current and former naval aviators gathered for a Las Vegas convention last year forced dozens of women to run a gantlet, groping them and tearing their clothing.

The Navy is still struggling to overcome the Tailhook scandal. But observers say the service's academy — under the leadership of Adm. Thomas C. Lynch, who arrived as superintendent in June 1991 — has made great progress in resolving its own problems.

"We're going to have some problems here ... but nothing that I as a superintendent or you as a taxpayer need to be concerned about," Lynch said in a recent interview.

"I personally believe that our problems ... are minuscule compared to any other school in the country," he said.

"I think there's no question that Tom Lynch has ... made sexual, ethnic and academic problems very much high profiles on his agenda," said Rep. Beverly Byron, D-Md., a member of the academy's Board of visitors and chair of the House Armed Forces Committee's personnel subcommittee.

"I've been looking for any flaws. So far, I'm not familiar with any that have come up," she said.

The Dreyer incident was only one of a series of problems that had vexed the academy prior to Lynch's arrival.

Two months after Dreyer was assaulted, faculty members complained that they were ordered to increase grades because too many midshipmen were failing electrical engineering courses or getting low grades.

The following July, a report by the Navy's inspector general said 59 percent of midshipmen surveyed believed the academy's honor code was not administered consistently or effectively.

And a report by the General Accounting Office complained of unacceptable hazing of freshmen by upperclassmen.

Two years later, calm has returned to the Annapolis campus. There have been no new incidents of sexual harassment, no controversies over grades and honor code violations, no reports of abusive hazing.

New programs — some begun before Lynch arrived — were instituted to put the academy on the right course.

Rep. Tom McMillen, D-Md., said Lynch "has done a lot to reinvigorate the honor code" by requiring midshipmen to monitor violations and recommend punishment.

Word has gone out that sexual harassment will not be tolerated, and the system for handling sexual harassment complaints has improved.

The academy also added a six-hour seminar for freshmen on leadership rights and responsibilities that focuses on racial and sexual harassment. And midshipmen spend 51½ hours during their four years at the academy in a Navywide program, Command Management Equal Opportunities.

"What this has done is raise the level of awareness of midshipmen on the sensitivities of women and minorities ... to remarks that white male midshipmen may or may not have known were offensive to other people," said Andrea Lindenberg, a senior from White Park, Fla.

"That's really changed the climate a lot," she said.

Actor's star shining bright with band The Pipefitters

By Sandra Okamoto
Staff writer

Lou Diamond Phillips was very reluctant to allow his name to appear as a featured member of The Pipefitters.

"That would be the easy way" of selling his band's music, he said in a telephone interview from the Colorado State Fair where the group was appearing. "We were billed without using my name at first," he said. But the manager and booking agency convinced Phillips that by using his name, more people would come listen to the band.

Phillips agreed, but insisted that his name come after The Pipefitters, rather than before. The billing is now The Pipefitters With Lou Diamond Phillips.

He says the music has been described as "Southern-fried rock" and the band has been compared to everyone from The Stray Cats to early Rolling Stones to George Thorogood.

More than 80 percent of the material are originals written by Phillips and bass player and lead singer Chris Lindsey. "It's basic rock-pop with roots flavor and Texas swing."

The actor, who became a household name after starring in 1987's "La Bamba," the biographical story about rocker Ritchie Valens, had never sung professionally before this venture. He's also appeared in both "Young Guns" movies, "Stand and Deliver," "Renegades," "Ambition," "Dakota," "Disorganized Crime" and "The First Power."

Phillips admits that many people come to see him just because he's a famous actor. But after a performance, he says people "go away pleasantly surprised."

Some friends of his from Texas performed as a blues band in a play called "The Pipefitters." He went to see the play and got reacquainted with his buddies. "When the play closed, they began to rehearse at my house." This was in 1989 and little by little, Phillips began getting involved with The Pipefitters — the play closed, but the band kept the name.

Soon, he was singing harmony and writing songs with Lindsey. "My songwriting and singing has improved. I'm gaining experience."

The Pipefitters With Lou Diamond Phillips will be performing at the Chickasaw Saturday night.

The others in the band are guitarist Sherman Allen, lead guitarist Mitch Ljewski, saxophone player Randy Boase, harmonica player Bill Allen and Scott Kay.

"They are old, old friends of mine," Phillips said.

For the past two months, Phillips has been on the road with The Pipefitters, putting his acting career on hold. While filming a movie with Scott Glenn tentatively called "S.I.S.," he had "to find all the nooks and crannies in my schedule" to gig with the band. "We were shooting five-day weeks and on weekends, I'd fly out and meet the band. The day we wrapped, I hooked up with them."

Several record companies have expressed an interest in the group, which has several songs, including the title track to "S.I.S."

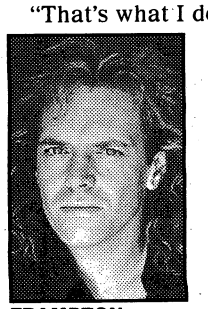
Frampton's back thanks to exercise, classic radio

By Sandra Okamoto
Staff writer

Although Peter Frampton has been recording for 30 years, and performing even longer, he says he's still having a lot of fun on the road.

"That's what I do," he said in a telephone interview last week. "I like to play live."



FRAMPTON

But before he began this tour earlier this year, it had been five years since he was last seen. And that was as a guitarist for David Bowie during the 1987 Glass Spider Tour.

"I was a guitarist for a year," Frampton said of his employment with Bowie. "It was pretty much a reaffirmation for me." A reaffirmation that his fans were still out there, he said, as well as his ability to perform.

What: Peter Frampton; Slick Lilly opens.
Where: Columbus Iron Works Convention & Trade Center, 801 Front Ave.
When: 8 p.m. Monday.
Tickets: $10.
Information: 327-4522.

Now that he's once more out on the road fronting his own band, he's finding an audience of people who listened to him from the Humble Pie days in the late 1960s, as well as a whole new generation of younger people.

"The hard-core audience will always be there," he said. "I do a survey every night and if I see someone of a questionable age, I ask. I'm finding a lot of people in their very early 20s and some who are 18 or 19. That, to me, is terrific. Thanks to classic radio," the younger audience is developing.

He says he'll see an older sibling bringing a younger brother or sister to a concert or parents bringing children.

"People tell me things like, 'I saw you 15 years ago.' Or 'I've been waiting to see you for 15 years.' "

A double CD package, called "Shine On — A Collection," on A & M Records will be released in October, featuring 30 tracks, including two brand new songs with ex-Humble Pie mate Steve Marriott.

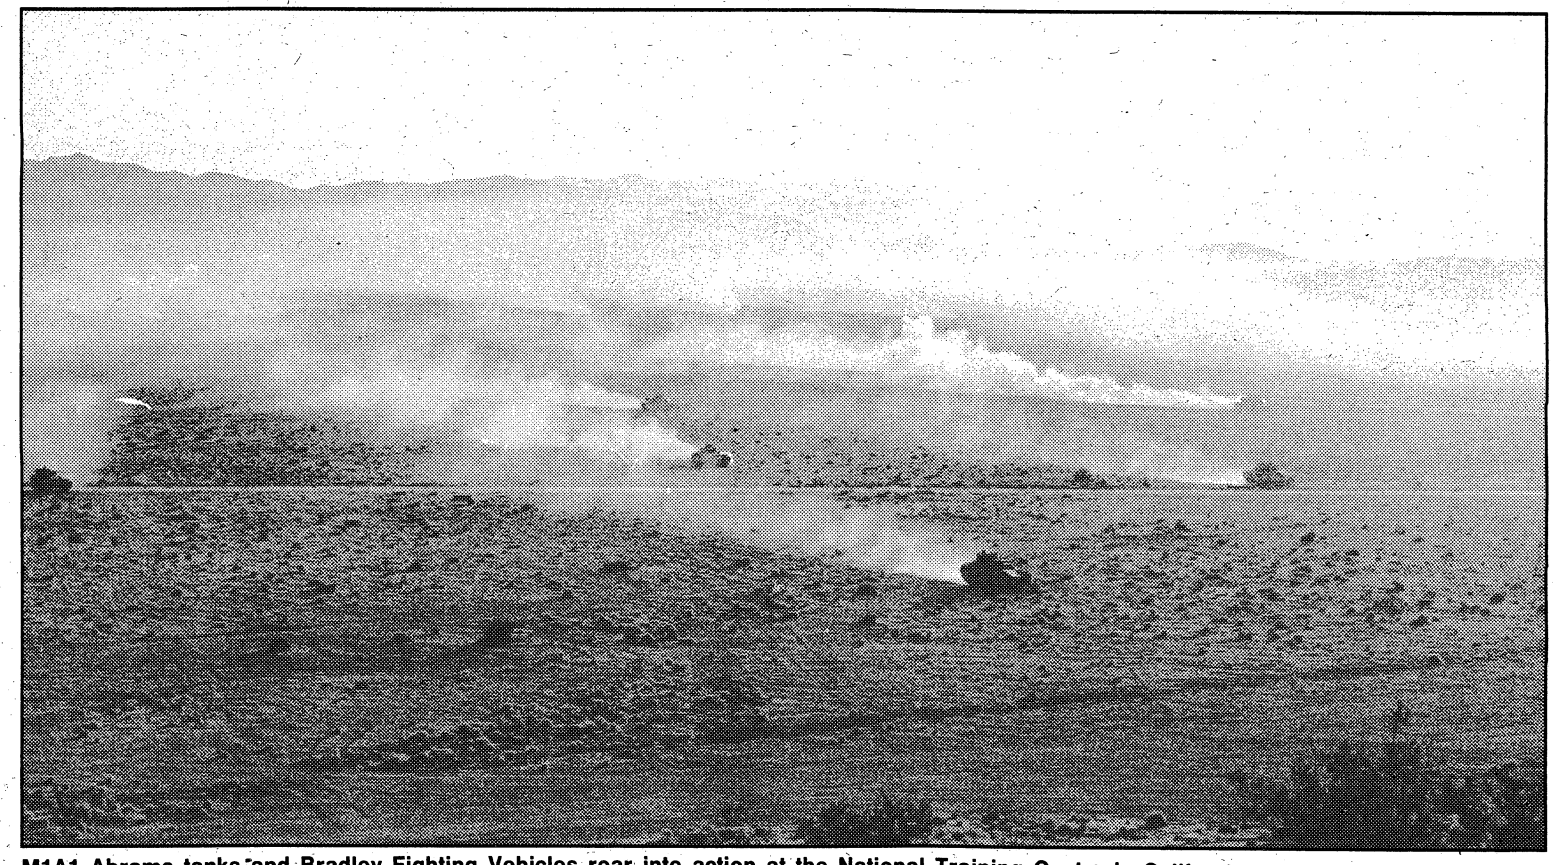
And in the spring, there should be a new album out. Several record companies have expressed an interest in releasing it.

Frampton, now 42, looks much the same as he did in 1976 when his double live album, "Frampton Comes Alive" became the top-selling live album ever. "I have a portrait in the attic," he laughed, alluding to the Dorian Gray tale of a man remaining young while his portrait aged. "I look after myself. I went through that debauched period in the '70s like everyone else. I do a two-hour workout every day. I eat right and really try to stick to it. I stopped smoking and changed my diet."

Frampton's tour ends just after Labor Day and he'll take two months off, going to a "desert island and pretend I'm Robinson Crusoe."

Troops wind up 'Ph.D.-level' training

Desert action invaluable to the soldiers



M1A1 Abrams tanks and Bradley Fighting Vehicles roar into action at the National Training Center in California.

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

FORT IRWIN, Calif. — There are few easy lessons at the National Training Center, the "world's biggest classroom" as it is sometimes billed by the U.S. Army.

What other classroom would require 1,702,500 pounds of ice to keep its students functional for two weeks?

In what other classroom would the students use up some 484,000 gallons of diesel fuel, gasoline and JP-4 helicopter fuel in half a month? Or consume 356,574 meals, even if most of them were of the dreaded Meals, Ready to Eat variety?

That's how much ice was supplied to troops to help cool water in desert temperatures up to 117 degrees and how much fuel the 3rd Brigade, 24th Infantry Division's tanks, Bradley Fighting Vehicles, trucks and humvees consumed here.

The lessons learned here can be invaluable and the brigade brought some of them home on videotape.

There are several 7-minute "after-action reviews" in what the NTC calls its "take-home package." These are highlights of various force-on-force battles and live-fire exercises the brigade's units performed during the two weeks of desert training that ended here last Saturday.

The brigade's planners and combat commanders can use these tapes made at the NTC's Operations Center along with longer films of brigade units in action as training tools long after soldiers have shaken the last of the Mojave Desert sand from their boots.

Couple the tapes with computer print-outs made during various stages of battles and a commander can sometimes see exactly which tanks or Bradley Fighting Vehicles — and, in some cases, individual infantry squads — did good or bad during an exercise.

Commanders can see — on some tapes — exactly where a battle fell apart, or the key correct actions or initiatives that led to victory.

The training in the so-called "box" — the 1,000 square miles of sprawling, tough desert that comprises the NTC's training areas — can't be surpassed anywhere in the U.S., said Maj. Gen. Paul E. Blackwell, the 24th Infantry Division commander.

"This is Ph.D.-level work," Blackwell said, where the 3rd Brigade can exercise all its options. That means, in part, that there's enough space here for the 4,000-plus men and women involved in this training rotation to stage a brigade-sized operation like the concluding battle on Saturday.

Back home at Fort Benning and Fort Stewart, Ga., a tank battalion commander, for example, is pushed to conduct even a company-sized exercise, strictly because of space limitations, Blackwell pointed out.

The general said fighting the NTC's "Opposing Force" troops, skilled in Soviet doctrine and tactics, is also important for the 3rd Brigade. "Soldiers like a challenge. It's not much fun charging up a hill and taking it if there's nothing (that can shoot back) there," said Blackwell.

Here, GIs as well as the Opposing Force troops, are equipped with MILES (laser) gear, which records "hits" by every weapon from the infantry officer's 9mm pistol to the Abrams tank's 120mm main gun.

Exercises here also give commanders an almost-unique opportunity for real life training sessions whereas many of those back home are done via simulations, the general said.

Troops wind up desert training

There is also room at NTC for combined "heavy/light" operations such as those employing the 3rd Brigade's "heavy" (tank and artillery) forces alongside light-infantry units like those from Fort Campbell, which can be helicopter inserted during mock battles — a practical impossibility at Benning.

A trip to the NTC also provides a test of the brigade's deployment abilities — training in how to efficiently mobilize a force this size.

Being prepared to move in a hurry may be more important once the brigade becomes part of the 18th Airborne Corps' "ready brigade" rotation in September.

Under that setup, Blackwell said, the brigade will — during its "ready" mode — be required to keep a company ready to go "wheels up" and off to a hot spot anywhere in the world in 18 hours.

The movement to Fort Irwin by rail and air involved the shipment of nearly 5,000 troops — including some from Fort Campbell, Ky., and Fort Bragg, N.C. — 101 tracked and 1,253 wheeled vehicles, said Capt. Catherine Wilson, the brigade's comptroller.

"Lessons learned" have to be relearned and new skills developed. Turnover in outfits like the 3rd Brigade may have been 40 percent since these soldiers went to war in Iraq and the turnover will continue, due in part to the continuing drawdown of the Army.

So it will be back to the NTC again for most of the brigade, come April.

'Female soldiers' had no problems

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

FORT IRWIN, Calif. — "Female soldiers," as Army women call themselves, say they had few problems with life in the desert during a three-week stay at the Army's National Training Center here.

Women in camouflage battle dress uniforms held jobs ranging from ambulance driver to brigade comptroller. In rank, they ranged from Pvt. Carrie Heath, a medic and ambulance driver who's only been in the Army since January to Capt. Catherine Wilson, who manages the brigade's purse strings.

The rosters of combat outfits like the 2nd Battalion, 69th Armor and 2nd Battalion, 18th Infantry, contain no names of women. Female soldiers are banned by Army policy from combat roles and combat units.

But outfits like the 324th Support Battalion, which was part of the rotation to the National Training Center, have their share of female soldiers.

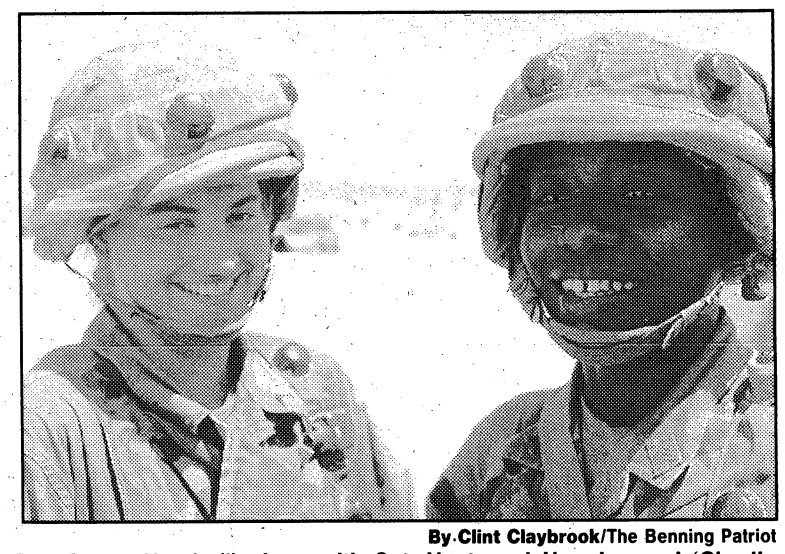
About 40 percent of the soldiers who answer his roll call are women, said Lt. Col. Robert Dail, the 324th Support Battalion commander. "And we're probably a better outfit because of how we (his three companies) are made up."

His female soldiers are truck drivers, medics, nurses and administrators like Staff Sgt. Anna Ruiz, who helps out with communications and works in the battalion's tactical operations center.

"I don't think there's much difference" in how men and women live and survive in the desert, Ruiz said.

"It's hard work for everybody. But we work just as hard as the guys, and some of these women work harder than some of the men."

"We crash (and sleep) where we can when we can, but for personal female things we need, we have our own shower set up out here. The commander saw to that."



By Clint Claybrook/The Benning Patriot

Pvt. Carrie Heath (l) chats with Sgt. Vantessel Huggins and 'Charlie Med's' camp in the desert.

As for getting "hit on" by the men she works beside everyday, Ruiz said, "We don't have time for that. We're a pretty cohesive unit and we don't have problems like that."

Heath said, "Most of the guys in the company are our friends and we haven't had any problems."

The desert can be "a lot of fun. A lot of it's like M.A.S.H., the TV show," she said.

"I don't have a problem with" living elbow-to-elbow with the men in her outfit, said Sgt. Vantassel Huggins, on her second trip to the NTC.

"But my first priority when I get home is to get into a tub. We have a shower here, but I'm more like a 'bath' woman."

"I can hardly wait to get in my kitchen, cook something for myself and drink a nice, frosty beer," said Ruiz.

Crews shore up bridges crossing twisting Upatoi

By Jerry Rutledge
Patriot Editor

For Capt. Bill McKay, it was the perfect project to end his military career on.

The Army engineer assigned to the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, Savannah District, office at Fort Benning was on short time, less than six months away from civilian life, when the opportunity to help repair erosion damage under the North and South bridges over Upatoi Creek on Fort Benning Drive came across the desk.

"It was good because I'd never done anything like this before . . . to handle erosion control to this extent," said McKay. The experience turned into a successful endeavor for the Corps and Phenix Mechanical Contractors, Inc.

The erosion work on the Upatoi bridges began May 4 and ended July 31, on time and as bid at $258,439. The southbound bridge was built in 1934 by the U.S. Army Quartermaster Corps. The northbound bridge was built by the Corps of Engineers, Savannah District, in 1952. The bridges are historical landmarks on Fort Benning.

The erosion work on the Upatoi bridges began May 4 and ended July 31, on time and as bid at $258,439.

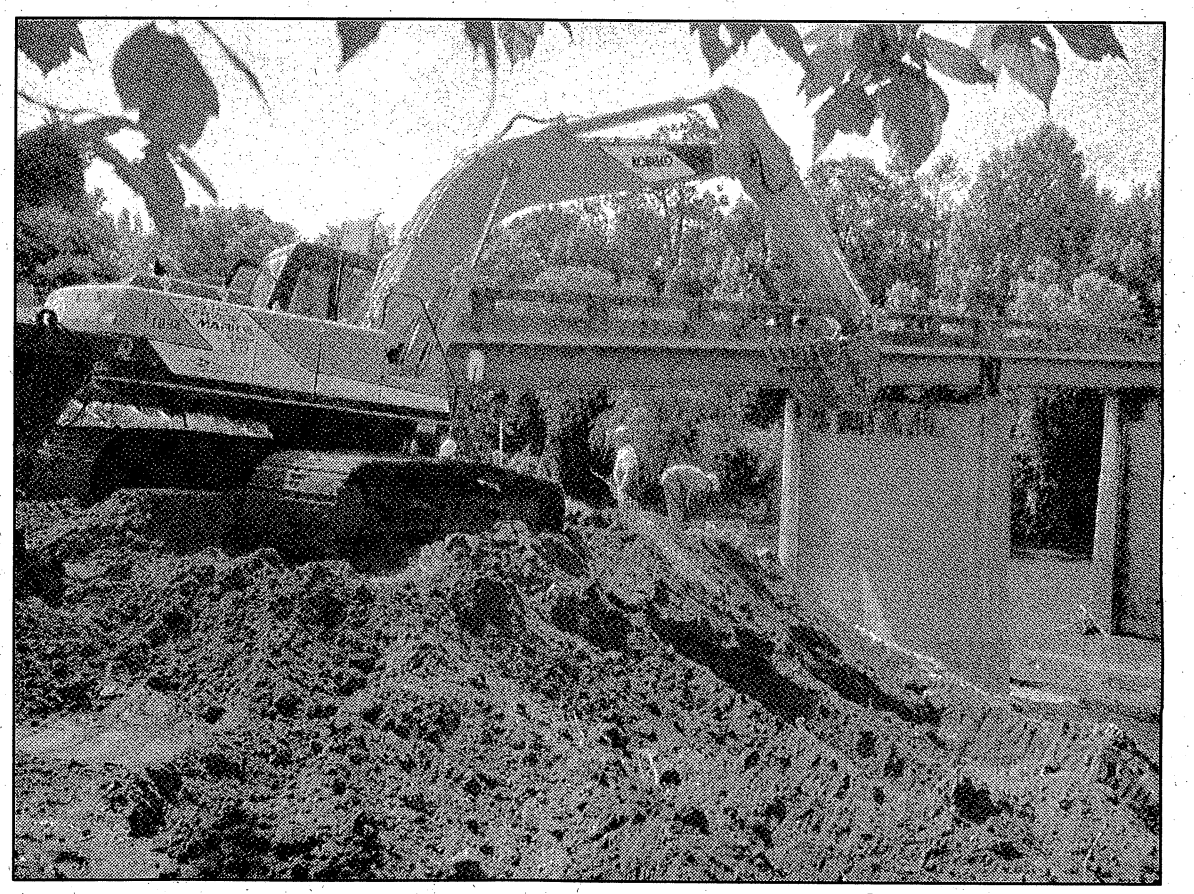
The project, like the Upatoi, went through a number of twists and turns before its conclusion, but none that proved to be insurmountable by McKay or Phenix Mechanical.

The erosion under the bridge, forced by the rapid flowing Upatoi, was much more extensive than at first believed. Sections of the concrete support and steel pilings were exposed to the air, setting the stage for a dangerous situation in the future if allowed to continue.

The engineers and contractors also found that the course of the Upatoi, as charted during a 1989 study, had shifted. This forced an adjustment in the plan of action in arresting the erosion.

The basic contract required Phenix Mechanical to place and compact as much as 1,500 cubic yards of soil under each bridge to replace soil that had been washed away over the years.

The contractor, to prevent the soil from eroding again, covered the newly placed soil with gabions. Gabions are wire baskets filled with stone, that allows water to flow through but not the soil. The gabions were wired together side-by-side and end-to-end, to form a continuous blanket of stone, and staked to the soil.



By Joe Maher/The Benning Patriot

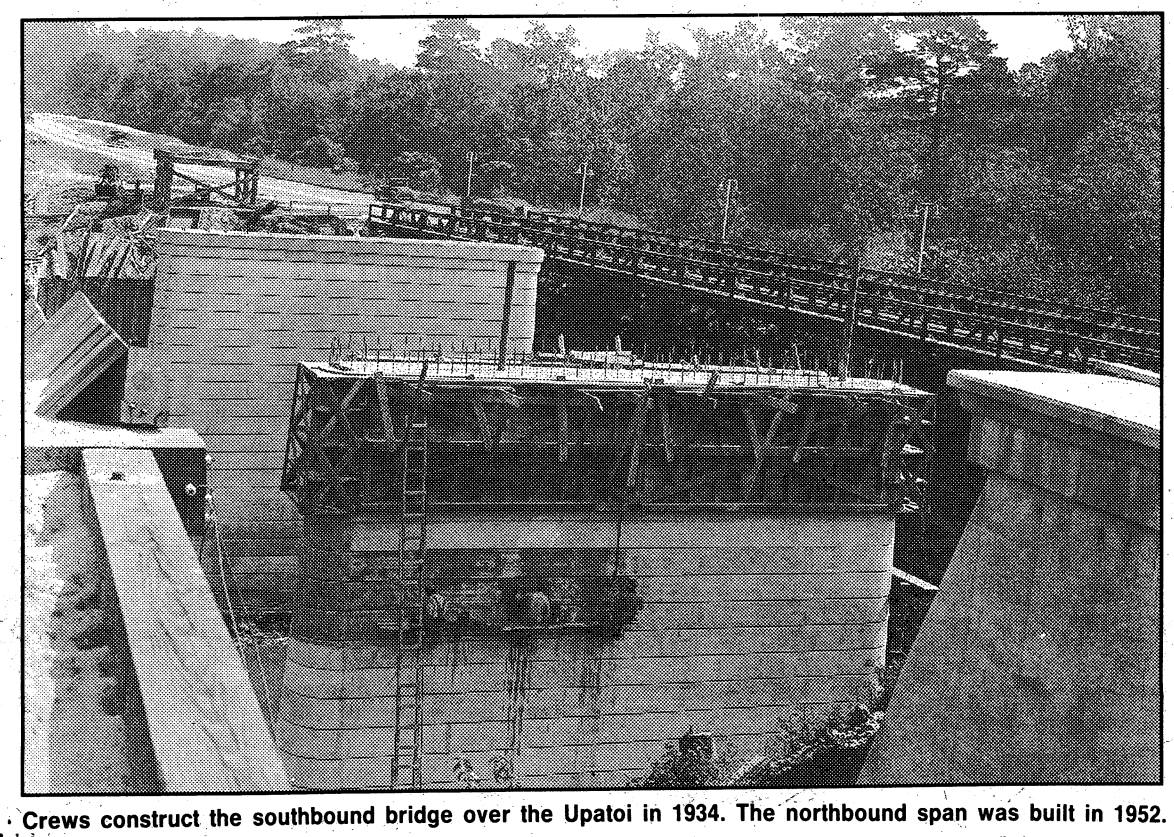
The erosion work began on May 4 and was completed July 31.

Another complication was the 1969 Clean Water Act, which says that the amount of solids suspended in the water could rise no more than 300 points up to 600 feet down the stream from the dump site. In other words, precious little of the soil added to the creek bank could be allowed to fall into the stream.

"The challenge was moving all the dirt around close to the water and not getting any of it in," said McKay. "We had reshaped the slope, removing all the vegetation from the area and making the new soil susceptible to being washed into the creek. When we were trying to get the gabions down, we were also fighting the battle of showers sending water down the slope and into the creek."

To ease the possibility of erosion into the river, McKay put down approximately 850 feet of silk fence to ease erosion into the creek.

The work was scheduled around peak traffic hours in the mornings and afternoons at the main gate. Little if any traffic disruption was noticeable.



Crews construct the southbound bridge over the Upatoi in 1934. The northbound span was built in 1952.

Americans singing greenback blues

Dollar's strength dives overseas

From wire reports

BONN, Germany — Denise Holmes of Philadelphia was standing in the lobby of a Frankfurt hotel feeling like she'd just been robbed.

"I bought a Herald Tribune and a bag of popcorn this morning and it cost six bucks (8.40 marks). The guy took the money and didn't even smile," she said.

Wherever you go in Western Europe, you'll hear Americans singing the greenback blues.

The U.S. currency has slumped to an all-time low. Visitors can now buy only 1.40 marks for a dollar, compared to more than 3 marks in 1985. In July 1991, a dollar bought 1.84 marks.

The U.S. currency has slumped to an all-time low. Visitors can now buy only 1.40 marks for a dollar, compared to more than 3 marks in 1985. In July 1991, a dollar bought 1.84 marks.

That translates into major sticker-shock for Americans who venture across the Atlantic, and for dollar-paid GIs and their families living here.

In Paris, a Coca-Cola in a sidewalk cafe can cost $4.34; economy-minded travelers who decide to get a Coke from a machine will pay $2.18.

A single compact disc purchased at a German store will reduce your bank account by about $25.

In Paris, a small hotel room can cost $200.

While waiting for a train at London's Victoria Station, Liz Beck, a 32-year-old graduate student from Pittsburgh, and Diane Doherty, 42, who works at the Georgetown Medical School in Washington, D.C., were griping about the cost of vacationing in England.

"We've just spent $22 for the worst fish and chips we've ever had," complained Ms. Beck. One British pound is worth about $2.

Ruth Taylor of Palm Springs, Calif. was wandering through London's Harrods department store, eyebrows lifted in astonishment.

"One little golf towel for 9 pounds — that's $18," she exclaimed.

"We always thought things were much higher in Palm Springs," said Mrs. Taylor. "They are much higher here. We are welcoming all tourists to come and spend money in the United States."

European businesses that cater to Americans also are feeling the squeeze.

Jutta Zimmermann operates a Kentucky Fried Chicken franchise in Darmstadt, Germany. She is accustomed to serving American soldiers piles of pullet, feasts of french fries, a surfeit of sodas.

"But with the dollar so low, Americans might come in and buy two pieces of chicken, and that's it," she lamented.

Comprehensive figures are not yet available to show whether the dollar's dive is putting a big dent in tourism from the United States.

But the year-end results could be depressing.

Rudiger Emich runs Frankfurt's oldest travel agency, the Reisedienst der Wirtschaft, and deals mainly with American tour groups, sending them to Heidelberg Castle, to the annual Munich beer festival, and the Bavarian Alps.

But he said his business has dropped off as much as 50 percent.

"Usually there are 40 to 45 people in a group. Now that is down to 20 to 25," Emich said. "American tourists feel it is too expensive."

But travel agents who book West Europeans heading in the opposite direction are all smiles.

Travellers of the World, a Paris travel agency, says its traffic to the United States jumped 38 percent for the first eight months of this year over the same period last year.

Germans have also been flocking to the United States.

Amtrak trip turns into vacation nightmare

By Jean Allen
Fort Lauderdale Sun-Sentinel

Q. Something that has been rankling and pestering me for years came to a head because of your column about Amtrak.

Three years ago, my wife and I decided to journey north. We would take Amtrak from here (Florida) to Penn Station in New York City, and the trip would be first class at a premium price. Not knowing any better, we booked a round trip.

Northbound: We were not notified when dinner was served. As usual late diners, we went to the dining car at about 7 p.m. Service was cafeteria style, on line with all the train riders (first class)? Of the three main courses in the steam table, only two were left, and neither was palatable. The table was plastic-covered, with plastic utensils and a plastic flower in a plastic bud vase. Beverages were served in plastic cups. During the evening the air conditioning broke down. Arrival in New York City was two hours late.

The return trip from New York to Florida was a nightmare for any kind of food service, mainly because of additional cars on the train that remained until Jacksonville, where some were removed to make their trip on to Tampa. However, there was only one dining car to handle all the additional riders. Can you imagine the number of people on line for cafeteria service? And again they ran out of food.

The only distinction for first-class fees in this whole mess was that the compartment was private. The seats were soiled, the windows were filthy. The area above the water closet was full of dustballs and wadded paper.

All in all, it was a terrible experience, and our friends and family have all been warned away from Amtrak.

I wrote on our return to two leading travel magazines and also to the president of Amtrak relating our experiences. I received no replies.

The situation is really a shame. This country should certainly be in a position to offer alternative travel options to those who would avail themselves of same. —

Amtrak officials tout their double-deck Superliners, which offer full-service dinners and deluxe bedrooms.

H.H., Boca Raton, Fla.

A. I decided to let Patricia Kelly, Amtrak's communications manager, answer this letter. This is what she says:

"All of Amtrak's long-distance overnight trains to Florida — the "Silver Star," "Silver Meteor" and "Auto Train" — are equipped with buffet line dining cars. Passengers select entrees and side dishes while in the line, and after they pay for their meal, a waiter carries their tray to a table and offers additional assistance.

"The Florida trains have the buffets for two reasons:

"1. Passenger loads are so great that it is the only way all passengers who want to eat in the dining cars can be served in a timely fashion.

"2. There are not enough conventional dining cars to equip all of Amtrak's eastern trains.

"The Florida-train buffet cars, like nearly all of Amtrak's diners, currently use disposable tableware, plastic cloths and paper napkins.

"Moreover, Amtrak's director of quality assurance and food service spent a lot of time working on a recently introduced menu that is appealing to both the palate and the eyes. The new selections are currently being served on all Florida trains, and comments have been favorable.

"Late trains do occur, especially when heavy passenger loads require extra time for boarding and unloading passengers and baggage, special assistance, etc. The systemwide on-time performance hangs right around 80 percent; the Florida trains were approximately 60 percent on time during March 1992.

"Also, the well-used equipment sometimes is taxed, although it is maintained on a regular basis. If there are equipment failures, Amtrak's lack of backup equipment can wreak havoc with a schedule while a replacement is found, the same situation as with the airlines.

"(This letter writer's) irritation with the dust is understandable, but there is a new train manager for the Florida trains who is working hard to improve both their appearance and operation.

"(H.H.) might appreciate the first-class amenities of the "Auto Train," and I would recommend he try that if he ever gave the company another chance. "Auto Train" has two dining cars. Coach passengers receive the standard buffet service; first-class sleeping car passengers have exclusive use of a dome lounge-diner that has fabric tablecloths and napkins, ceramic dinnerware, glassware and waiters offering full service. The "Auto Train" first-class diner was added last year and sounds like it might be more to (his) liking than the buffet car.

"Or he might want to give the new "Sunset Limited" a try when it starts this October. It will use the double-deck Superliner equipment that operates on long distance trains in the West. Superliners have full-service diners and deluxe bedrooms that might appeal to him.

"The recession has stalled Amtrak's plans to buy new sleeping cars for the eastern routes, but there is still hope that an order for Viewliners (single-level sleepers, coaches, diners, etc.) may be placed late this year."

(The "Sunset Limited" train Kelly mentions now operates between Los Angeles and New Orleans. Amtrak plans to extend the route eastward through Gulfport, Biloxi, Mobile, Pensacola and Tallahassee to Jacksonville and then south to Miami. The October start-up is tentative. Its Superliner equipment includes a domed car for viewing the scenery as well as a full-service dining car and a separate lounge offering sandwiches, beverages and snacks.)

Prison lifer finds solace in studies, Judaism

From wire reports

KINCHELOE, Mich. — The young man stood nervously as the friend seated in front of him readied the razor-sharp surgical steel and said, "You can relax."

"Right," the uncomforted, young man responded with his trousers open for his briefly painful, slightly bloody entry into Judaism.

Douglas Burgess said he had studied and yearned for "three years, eight months and 12 days" to reach this day, when he would become an Israelite. "It's something I've wanted so long."

Burgess, 27, had done it mostly by mail from a lifer's cell at Kinross Correctional Facility, 20 miles south of Sault Ste. Marie, Mich. The trim ex-Marine, who works as a pattern cutter in the prison garment factory and heads Kinross' Free Spirits running club, is believed to be the first convict in Michigan's prison system to go through formal conversion.

During eight years' imprisonment for conspiracy in the murder-for-hire of his father, Burgess has earned a university degree with honors while meeting the standards of a rabbi.

"Judaism is such a strict, ethical, monotheistic belief, so straightforward, so positive," Burgess said at his conversion. "There are no gray areas."

The ceremony inside Kinross consisted of a symbolic berit milah, or circumcision, followed by a mikveh, a ritual bathing. Finally, the convert submitted to a bet din, a court of Jewish law assembled to question him about his religious convictions.

Burgess, who was born in Bay City to a family whose faith "I don't even know," said his mother divorced when her identically twin sons, Aaron and Douglas, were 5. She became a Roman Catholic when she remarried seven years later.

"I was always Jewish," Douglas Burgess said of the years he spent exploring religion. "I just didn't know I needed to be Jewish."

In a letter to Rabbi Bruce D. Aft during his instruction, Burgess wrote:

"If you're thinking that my interest in Judaism is a way of repentance over my father's death, that is mistaken. True, Judaism has helped me shoulder my share of the blame, but my interest in Judaism isn't as an avenue for repentance; Christianity offers a much easier method for that, and, besides, I wouldn't have wasted two years' worth of my and others' time."

The murder plan, he said, began as idle talk between Burgess, a lance corporal, and another bored Marine at the Bangor, Wash., submarine base. "We had talked about a murder," Burgess said. "I didn't think he was going to do it ... Surprisingly, he did, and I've been making up for it ever since."

Prosecutors say Burgess offered his buddy Keith Fischer $15,000 to kill Douglas Wayne Burgess Sr., who was shot fatally while the two Marines were on leave in Bay City in May 1984. Police believed the motive had to do with the elder Burgess' apparent harassment of his ex-wife, court records show.

Looking back, he said, "I was 19 when they locked me up," so it is hard to tell how his adult life might have been different. His married brother, Aaron, finished second last month in a class of 38 at the Detroit Metropolitan Police Academy. So "I can gauge myself, I guess," Douglas Burgess said.

"When I came to prison, I really didn't have structured morals. I decided after a whole lot of thought, after a whole lot of self-examination, there was something horribly wrong."

His April 1989 inquiry into conversion reached the desk of Rabbi Aft, who at the time directed Midrasha-College of Jewish Studies and was principal of Community Jewish High School, in Southfield, Mich. By October 1990, Aft wrote to Burgess, "I think that your interest is a sincere one."

Finally, Aft agreed to perform the ancient ceremony.

Because Burgess had been circumcised as a newborn, the berit required taking only a drop of blood from behind his glans penis.

Gil Cymbalist, a religious volunteer at the prison and president of Congregation Beth Jacob in Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario, used a large hypodermic needle ("Probably larger than he wanted," Cymbalist would say later.).

During eight years' imprisonment for conspiracy in the murder-for-hire of his father, Burgess has earned a university degree with honors while meeting the standards of a rabbi. "Judaism is such a strict, ethical, monotheistic belief, so straightforward, so positive," Burgess said at his conversion. "There are no gray areas."

Discharged vet says there is no justice

Ex-sergeant struggling to clear his name, get on with life

By Jerry Rutledge
Patriot Editor

Henry Gaillard spends his afternoons hanging out around the neighborhood just off Victory Drive near Fort Benning's main gate. There he does odd jobs — a little mechanic work here, a little carpentry work there — anything for the money. Anything to maintain even the paltriest of existences.

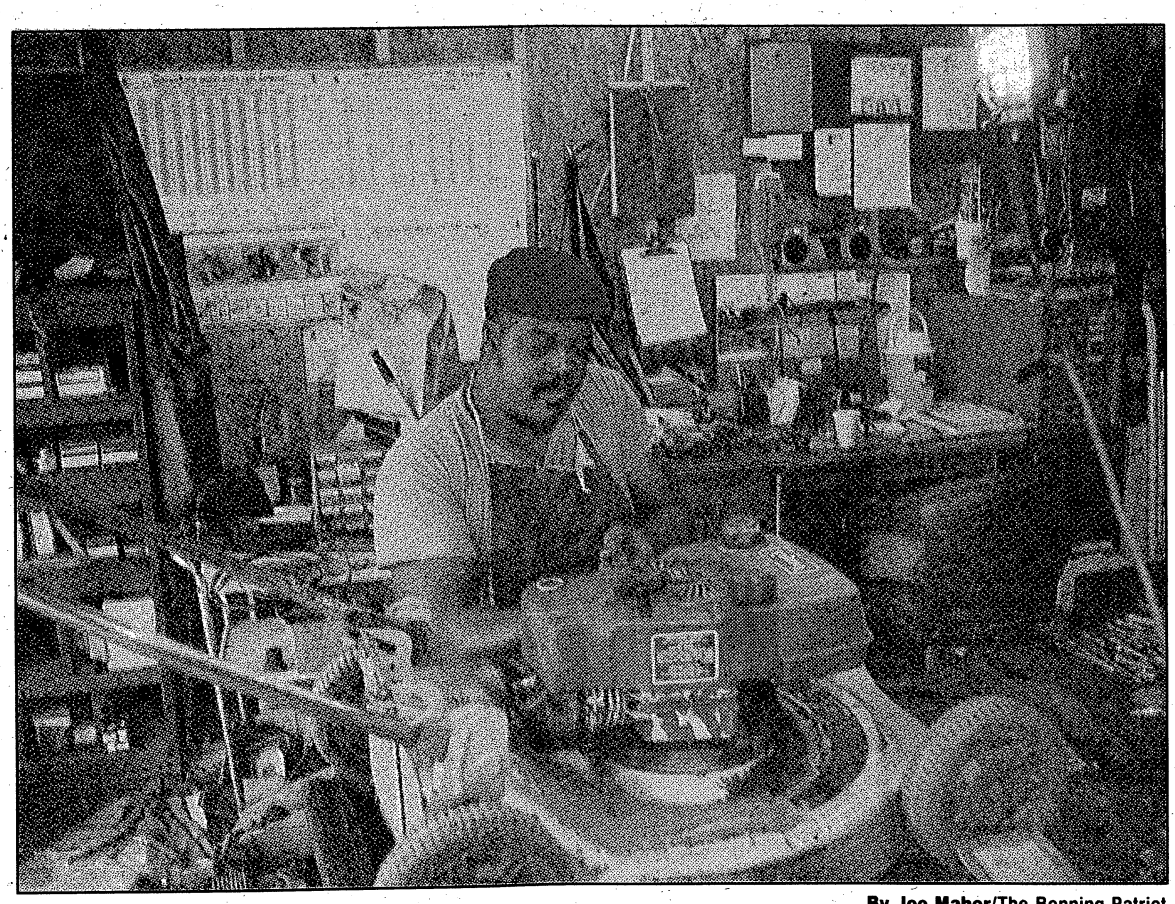
Henry Gaillard is a homeless, jobless Vietnam-era veteran.

And he is angry — bitterly angry.

Gaillard feels the system he gave 13 years of his life working to uphold is the reason for his plight. "I'm mad. I fear for my future," said Gaillard. "And I get nothing but the runaround from the system. Every avenue I take runs into a dead end, but I have too much dignity inside me to quit. I want justice done."

Gaillard's story is at times complex. His early military career was solid. He enlisted in the Army during the mid-70s and advanced to the rank of staff sergeant. After a tour in Frankfurt, Germany, in a "special security" office, Gaillard was assigned to Fort Sill, Okla. It was here that his career went awry. A disputed drug test put Gaillard's future into rapid descent.

Gaillard was honorably discharged, despite being charged with gross misconduct. He pressed the issue legally and won a settlement, which provided for a return to active duty as a staff sergeant (E-6), back pay and allowances, removal of the drug test from his record, payment of attorney's fees and assignment to a post other than Fort Sill with duties equal to his abilities.



By Joe Maher/The Benning Patriot

Henry Gaillard says after 13 years serving his country, he's now reduced to doing odd jobs to survive.

But, according to Gaillard and an investigator in the Department of the Army's Office of the Inspector General, the military didn't fully comply with the settlement. After returning to the service at Fort Benning — his wife's mother was seriously ill in Phenix City — and working as an assistant inspector general on Kelly Hill, Gaillard was removed because of the drug accusation, still on his record despite the settlement.

Gaillard moved to a job at Martin Army Community Hospital, but money problems — including a 60-day lapse in pay due to clerical error — eventually led to a second discharge, a general discharge for financial instability.

Gaillard doesn't dispute the legal basis for his discharge — just the circumstances leading to it.

"My mother begged me not to re-enlist, but I didn't listen," said Gaillard. "If I had known the Army would put me in a position to fail, I never would have come back." Finding civilian jobs equating his military experience has been a problem, especially in light of his less than honorable discharge status.

Gaillard has written President Bush three times. Each letter got a response, not from Bush directly but from the Department of the Army.

"I write the President because the Secretary of the Army, a cabinet-level official, signed the settlement," Gaillard said. "The President likes to talk about family values, but here I am an example that he cares nothing about family values." The problems forced the breakup of his marriage and estrangement from his family in South Carolina.

Leonard Leavell, a military veteran and president of the Columbus office of the NAACP, says cases like Gaillard's are becoming increasingly common. The transition from military to civilian status for soldiers — especially minority soldiers — has been a problem.

"We have a lot of people getting out of the military and having problems adjusting to civilian life," said Leavell. "Under this scale-down of the military, they're having a very hard time. The conditions under which some are being terminated are sometimes questionable.

"Maybe they were wrong, but blacks have this misconception that because a white soldier has done the same thing, they are allowed to slide by. Like Gaillard here. It seems the Army programmed him for failure after they discharged him, accepted him back in and then, two years later, take the same thing they accepted him back in for and discharge him again. They never gave him a chance to rehabilitate himself. It seems there is a double-standard in the way the Army treats whites and blacks."

Since his second discharge in 1988, Gaillard has sought help in a variety of ways, taking a variety of avenues. He's sought help from the NAACP, the ACLU, congressmen, senators — even President Bush. He has praise for most — "Richard Ray's office has tried to help every time I asked for it" — but the net result has still been zero.

"I'm a strong person," said Gaillard. "I found a mental strength I didn't know I had. I'm mad and I won't be happy until I clear my name."

Women say 'lesbian-baiting' used in harassment cases

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — Army Reserve Lt. Victoria Hudson says her boss constantly propositioned her and asked her to "write him erotic letters."

But when Hudson, who served with a military police unit in Saudi Arabia during the Gulf War, complained, it was she who came under investigation.

"They thought I was a lesbian," Hudson told the New York Daily News recently.

Her complaint went nowhere, and she feels she "basically got blackballed" for future assignments in reprisal for accusing the major.

Women vets call it "lesbian-baiting," and say it's an all too common — and potentially career-ending — response to charges of sexual harassment in the military.

Homosexuality is grounds for discharge from all the services. The governing Defense Department directive says the presence of homosexuals "adversely affects the ability of the military services to maintain discipline, good order and morale."

"If you protest (a serviceman's advances) as a woman, you're apt to have to deal with the charge that you must be a lesbian," said Rep. Patricia Schroeder (D-Colo.).

"It's a way of fighting back" for a male accused of harassment, Schroeder said. "They're saying to the woman: 'How could you turn down my advances? You must be gay.' "

Col. Adelaide Quebodeaux, director of human resources at Headquarters Marine Corps, said that "we have to insure that the system is reprisal-free."

"You're talking about a male-dominated society — play hard, drink hard. Well, it's not that way anymore," she said. "That kind of conduct which used to go on is no longer acceptable in the Corps."

Schroeder, a senior member of the House Armed Services Committee, has sponsored legislation to give whistleblower protection to women who say servicemen have propositioned and abused them.

The bill is one of several aimed at ending discrimination against women and gays in the military.

Such legislation has gained support since reports of last year's infamous Tailhook Association convention in Las Vegas, where 26 women — 14 of them Navy or Marine officers — were groped and forced to run a gantlet of drunken fliers.

Schroeder said the pervasive fear among servicewomen bringing harassment complaints is that "the person she was accusing could immediately step forward and accuse her of having a different sexual preference than that permitted by the military."

From 1980 to 1990, the military discharged 16,750 enlisted personnel and 169 officers for being gay or bisexual, according to Congress' General Accounting Office.

Schroeder said eight times as many women as men are investigated for being gay. The GAO report, dealing only with actual discharges, concluded that servicewomen "were discharged for homosexuality at a rate consistently ranging two to three times higher than their rate of representation."

There are no figures for how many of those discharges were the result of investigations begun after the women complained of harassment.

Airborne division marks 50 years in sky

From wire reports

WILLOW GROVE, Pa. — The C-141s came in from the north with the weight of history and the lightness of air.

Pvt. Mike Junio of nearby Philadelphia was fifth in line, in the first plane, on the first pass over Willow Grove Naval Air Station.

At that moment, 800 feet above the ground in a windowless airplane, the 20-year-old paratrooper wasn't thinking about the 50 years the Army's 82nd Airborne Division has been doing operations like this; wasn't thinking about the World War II campaigns in Sicily, Salerno, Anzio and Normandy, or the Tet Offensive in Vietnam, or Grenada, or Panama, or, most recently, the Desert Storm operation in Iraq.

Junio was concerned with what paratroopers of every era think about before taking the leap of faith into air and pure gravity.

"Every time it's like the way it was the first jump," Junio said. "The chute always opens, but suppose it doesn't?"

In a sky of luminous blue, every chute opened last week, and the troops drifted down to celebrate the 50th anniversary of the 82nd's designation — on Aug. 15, 1942 — as the Army's first airborne division.

More than 2,000 veterans and active members of the division called "America's Guard of Honor" were holding their 46th convention through the weekend at the Valley Forge Convention Center, and the jump by 450 paratroopers drew thousands of spectators to the roads rimming the sprawling naval air facility.

The paratroopers did not disappoint, though two who tangled in midair gave spectators a breathless several seconds as one chute "stole the air" from the other and they plummeted toward unforgiving asphalt below.

About 100 feet from the ground they separated just enough to manage a rough but safe landing.

Pvt. Junio knows asphalt.

On his jump, the 5- to 9-knot northeast wind failed to give him enough push to clear the runway, and he hit it dead center — the only one to do so among jumpers in the first plane.

"They landed me right in the middle," he said later, none the worse for wear. "I just tried to land on the balls of my feet and look at the horizon."

"Most people prefer to jump at night," said Sgt. Terry Hynes, who is retiring from the 82nd this year after 20 years in the Army. "In the daytime, they see that ground coming and they say, 'Oh, that's going to hurt.' "

"You feel how small you are, once you go out," said Pvt. Roger Gabriel, 19, who grew up near Scranton, Pa., and recently celebrated one year in the 82nd. "Up there, you're swept in the wind like a paper cup."

Still, the experience can be spectacular — and humbling, as well.

"You feel how small you are, once you go out," said Pvt. Roger Gabriel, 19, who grew up near Scranton, Pa., and recently celebrated one year in the 82nd. "Up there, you're swept in the wind like a paper cup."

Said Junio: "It's like a vision. You can see everything; you can see the horizon; at night you can see the lights of the city."

The 82nd Airborne Association had hoped the jump would be held at Valley Forge National Historical Park, where a similar operation had been staged in 1989. But park officials this year decided to reject the association's request for a repeat performance, forcing the shift to Willow Grove.

Daniel Campbell, 58, the association's executive secretary for the last 10 years, said some local veterans were upset that the request was turned down, but he says his group accepted the decision.

"There's no heartburn," he said. "We were proud to jump into the national park in 1989, but the division accepts that it was logistically more sound to jump at Willow Grove."

There certainly was no disappointment when, promptly at 10 a.m., the first of four C-141s approached dark and low from the north, distinguishable by the twin lights trained on the ground and the faint plumes of four whispering jet engines each.

Each plane made two passes, disgorging paratroopers into the bright morning sun, which caught the seams of the chutes and lit them like stars.

Ground personnel scanned each trail of jumpers as they left the planes, searching for chute failures or midair tangles.

Tiny figures quickly became soldiers as they dropped, in less than 10 seconds, to the ground.

The 82nd convention gives the young paratroopers a chance to share heritage and history with old-timers.

"We'll have people from 18 to 80," said Campbell, who served in the Army 21 years. "Next to actual combat, the bonding you make with a fellow paratrooper is something that's hard to describe."

Maestas steps down as Ranger commander

From staff reports

Less than a month after being named to head the Ranger Training Brigade, Col. Alan Maestas has stepped down from the job, Fort Benning spokesman Rich McDowell said Sunday.

Maestas cited personal reasons, which could not be learned Sunday, when he stepped down during a Friday meeting with Fort Benning's Commander, Maj. Gen. Jerry A. White, McDowell said.

Maestas, who came to Fort Benning from the U.S. Army War College at Carlisle Barracks, Pa., replaced Col. John Maher as Training Brigade commander earlier this month.

It is not known if Maestas will be transfered or stay at Fort Benning in another job, McDowell said.

Lt. Col. Clyde Newman has been named acting commander of the training brigade.

Before attending the War College, Maestas commanded the 2nd Ranger Battalion at Fort Lewis, Wash. He commanded the unit during Operation Just Cause (Panama), earning a bronze star for his Master Parachutist Badge, denoting a combat jump.

Maestas is a graduate of Kansas State University.

Army had hand in taking Guadalcanal

As I have mentioned before, the battle for Guadalcanal is usually considered to have been an all-Marine and all-Navy affair. And it was, at first, from the initial landings on Aug. 7, 1942, when the Army's 164th Infantry Regiment from the Americal Division landed on the island. In fact, it arrived just in time to help the Marines fight off the last major Japanese ground attack.

Al Garland

That regiment was soon followed by the 147th Infantry Regiment, a separate unit, and by early November 1942 most of the Americal's units were in place. More Army and Marine troops were on their way and would soon be on the island.

The Americal Division was then commanded by Maj. Gen. Alexander M. Patch, and he assumed command of the island on Dec. 9. By this time, the 1st Marine Division was more than ready to leave Guadalcanal. Its Marines had fought magnificently against great odds and a determined Japanese enemy. Although the Marine division had not suffered heavy battle losses, more than 5,700 of its men had been overtaken by malaria and another 500 had been laid low by gastroenteritis.

Soon after Patch assumed command, he welcomed the arrival of the Army's 25th Infantry Division, commanded by Maj. Gen. J. Lawton Collins, and the 2nd Marine Division. Patch was then moved up to corps command (the XIV Corps) and was succeeded as Americal Division commander by Brig. Gen. Edmund R. Sebree.

In mid-December 1942, Patch launched the first of his attacks against the stubbornly resisting Japanese defenders. This marked a distinct change in the nature of the fighting on the island. Until now, the Japanese had been the attackers; from this time until the end of the campaign, they would be the defenders. By this time, too, U.S. air and naval power had almost, but not completely, isolated the Japanese troops on the island. Though weakened from hunger and disease, the Japanese soldiers were not disposed to surrender and continued to fight with great bravery and skill.

From mid-December on, then, the U.S. forces conducted a series of strong attacks against the stubborn Japanese. Soldiers from the 25th Division would long remember such names as Mount Austen, the "Galloping Ghost," the "Sea Horse," the "Gifu," and the "Snake." As they moved on an inland track, the Marines and the Americal Division's soldiers drove along the coast.

By Feb. 9, 1943, Patch could report that all organized Japanese resistance had been overcome. Unfortunately, some 13,000 Japanese soldiers (by Japanese count) had submarines operating under the cover of darkness for four consecutive nights. The Japanese commanders had finally decided they had lost enough men, planes and ships at Guadalcanal.

The U.S. victory gave the Allies a well-situated base from which to continue their offensive against the major Japanese base at Rabaul and against other Japanese forces in New Guinea and at other locations throughout the southwest Pacific area.

The victory also had helped to take the initiative away from the hitherto victorious and seemingly invincible Japanese military machine, a process that had been started by U.S. and Australian forces in Papua New Guinea, an operation reported in a previous column.

U.N. inspectors get down to business

From wire reports

MANAMA, Bahrain — The first U.N. weapons inspectors to arrive in Baghdad since the West banned Iraqi military aircraft from southern Iraqi skies set off to work Tuesday, U.N. officials said.

"We assume that because we have not heard of any problems that there aren't any," Doug Englund, Bahrain-based regional chief for the U.N. Special Commission, said after speaking with team members in Iraq.

The commission is charged with eliminating Saddam Hussein's weapons of mass destruction under the cease-fire agreement that ended the Persian Gulf War.

The 21-member nuclear weapons team, led by Italian Maurizio Zifferero, arrived in Baghdad on Monday and is to stay until Sept. 7.

It is the first group to start new work since the United States, Britain and France threatened to shoot down Iraqi aircraft flying over southern Iraq, were Iraqi forces had been on the offensive against Shiite Muslim rebels.

A 15-person U.N. chemical weapons team has been in Iraq, and 14 more chemical experts flew into Baghdad with the nuclear team.

Englund said the chemical team was preparing to destroy 40,000 chemical weapons at the Muthana facility outside the Iraqi capital. But he would not name the site the nuclear team planned to visit Tuesday.

More than 40 U.N. teams have visited Iraq since the cease-fire. In July, Saddam denied weapons inspectors access to the Agriculture Ministry in what turned into a 21-day standoff. Iraq finally backed down, but only after the West threatened to use military force.

Zifferero has said he did not expect the inspections would be adversely affected by the flight ban because the two issues are unrelated.

But Iraqi officials have suggested they might retaliate by ending cooperation on the weapons inspections or by hindering U.N. guards and relief workers from operating in northern Iraq.

Saddam has accused the West of trying to dismember his country and destabilize the Arab world in order to wrest control over the region's oil.

The West put minority Kurds in northern Iraq under its protection after Saddam suppressed a postwar rebellion there.

Escalating attacks against Shiite Muslims, whose own postwar rebellion was similarly crushed, provoked the United States, Britain and France to commit aircraft to patrol Iraq south of the 32nd parallel.

Since the "no-fly" zone went into effect Thursday, American and British planes have been flying more than 100 missions a day.

Monday, France sent four Mirage warplanes to Saudi Arabia, the base of operations for the patrols, said Gen. Vincent Lanata, chief of staff of the French air force.

France has pledged about 10 planes to the mission, and four more planes are due to leave France on Thursday, French military sources said.

U.S. pilots on the aircraft carrier USS Independence said Monday that they suspect Iraqi fighters are flying closer and closer to the line

Iraqis steer clear of zone

From wire reports

ABOARD THE USS INDEPENDENCE — Radar tracks from all aircraft patrolling southern Iraq indicate Iraqi pilots have not violated a "no-fly" zone imposed by Western allies, a U.S. Navy Air Wing commander said Tuesday.

"They are not allowed to fly below (parallel) 32 north, and from the information we have . . . we have no validated, correlated tracks that they have been doing that," said Capt. Arthur N. Langston, 47, of San Diego.

But pilots under Langston's command in Carrier Air Wing Five say the Iraqis have been growing bolder in their flights north of the zone.

One squadron 'eader, Cmdr. Dan Cain, 48, of Pensacola, Fla., said Monday that some Iraqi fighters might have furtively crossed the line between gaps in the allied air patrols.

Langston would not comment on whether the time between overflights was sufficient to allow a plane to dart across and back without getting caught. He also declined to give specifics on what the Iraqis were doing with their planes north of the zone.

Pilots suspect Iraq's top jet fighters, including Mirage F-1s or MiG-21s, are testing the line.

But part of the increase in radar activity is due to the fact that several Iraqi airfields lie within 20 miles of the 32nd parallel and the pilots sometimes take off in the direction of the line.

32nd Infantry to honor former troopers

From staff reports

Two former members of the 3rd Battalion, 32nd Infantry Regiment, Infantry Training Brigade will become honorary members of that unit in a ceremony Thursday, Sept. 10, at 10 a.m. at building 3345, Sand Hill.

Retired Commander Maj. Gen. John M. Hightower and 1st Sgt. Robert R. Rogers will be introduced as the honorary regimental colonel and the command sergeant major during the ceremony by Battalion Commander Lt. Col. John M. Dykes.

Both Hightower and Rogers served with the 32nd Infantry more than 40 years ago.

Rogers was assigned to the 32nd Infantry Regiment, 7th Infantry Division at Hachenohe, Japan, deploying with that unit to Korea as part of the Inchon Invasion in 1950. He served with the division during the recapture of Seoul, South Korea.

Hightower joined the 7th Infantry Division in Korea in 1951, as commander of the 32nd Infantry. After his battalion command, he was promoted to colonel, and in 1952, he was assigned to Fort Benning as the Director of Instruction, The Infantry School.

The 3rd Battalion, 32nd Infantry Regiment traces its history back to 1916, when the unit was first organized. Throughout the years, the unit has gone through several inactivations and activations and participated in World War I, WWII and the Korean War.

School named after war hero Stowers

From staff reports

The Fort Benning school system has named its new elementary school, which is currently under construction, for Cpl. Freddie Stowers, a World War I soldier who was posthumously awarded the Medal of Honor last year.

The Freddie Stowers Elementary School is scheduled to open at the beginning of the 1993-94 school year.

While serving as a squad leader in Company C, 371st Infantry Regiment, 93rd Division more than 70 years ago, Stowers lead an attack on a German machine gun placement and enemy trenches in France. The original recommendation for the medal, however, was lost, according to the school system. A 1988 investigation discovered the error. President George Bush presented the medal to Stowers' surviving sisters in 1991.

Stowers School will accommodate 650 students in kindergarten through the fifth grade who live in the Bouton Heights and Davis Hill housing areas. With 62,000 square feet, the school will contain 30 general purpose classrooms, two special education classrooms, a computer lab, a room each for art, music and speech and language instruction, a media center, an office complex, a kitchen and a cafeteria.

Schools plan open houses

Fort Benning's schools will host open houses in coming weeks so parents can meet educators, visit classrooms and learn about curriculum and school guidelines.

Faith School — 7 p.m. Wednesday, Sept. 9.

Loyd School — 7 p.m. Thursday, Sept. 10.

Dexter School — 6:30 p.m. Sept. 15.

White School — 7 p.m. Sept. 15.

Patch School — 7 p.m. Sept. 17.

Wilson School — 7 p.m. Sept. 17.

Bank on Fuller speaking his mind

Outspoken colonel running First Union branch on post

By Jim Lynn
Staff Writer

If you think John Fuller has left Fort Benning, think again.

The eloquent, always outspoken, sometimes controversial Fuller, recently retired as the post's chief of staff, is back. He took over this week as manager of First Union National Bank's Fort Benning branch.

As military man, Fuller helped lead Benning through Operation Desert Shield/Desert Storm. He helped lead the 7th Infantry Division through the invasion of Panama. He ran the task force that brought the Bradley Fighting Vehicle to Benning. He's commanded the 29th Infantry Division, which he helped create, and he's even taught ROTC.

As money man, he's taken on his new career with fervor. He talks of banking with the smoothness of a television advertisement.

"Banking today is so awfully competitive that it's not just a matter of differentiation in interest rates," he said. "You've got to have good people, and people who are genuinely interested in helping people."

With little prompting, he'll tell you how exciting the traditionally stuffy profession really is. He seems to relish the friendly banter that comes with the turf, striking up conversations with customers and introducing a coworker as one inevitably to be bank president some day.

"Quality of life — to me that's the major issue for the army of the future, not training," said Fuller. "Quality of life, taking care of people."

Fuller officially retired in March. But he left the sixth floor of Infantry Hall in January, taking advantage of built-up leave. He spent the last few months learning how to be a banker, shuttling between Columbus and Charlotte, N.C., where First Union is based.

But though he's traded battle dress for pin stripes, Fuller still has strong feelings about Fort Benning. He professes endearment for the post and the Army, and he said he worries that enough attention is not paid to basic needs.

Top among his concerns, he said recently, is that not enough money is being spent on repairing the aging infrastructure at Benning.

"I think with our inattention to fixing the basic infrastructure of Fort Benning, we are bankrupting the future of the installation," he said. He spoke late one afternoon recently at one of the bank's Columbus branches, in a lengthy interview long after the last check had been cashed for the day.

"I don't think we have adequate concern," Fuller continued. "... Our sewage and our pipe systems in the Main Post area are all over 50 years old. You've got a water treatment plant that's over 50 years old. You've got a sewage plant that's over 50 years old."

His comments are not just blunt rhetoric, he says, but a warning about the well-chronicled $200 million backlog of capital improvement projects on post, a list he doubts ever will be significantly whittled down. He describes the condition of Benning's undercarriage as "terrible." But it's a problem that's developed over many years.

"The thing that most disturbs me is the Army, their absolute failure to provide significant dollars to take care of the physical plant," he said. "I think there ought to be fenced monies (dedicated funds) that an installation commander can't rip off and put into training, but must spend for plant repair."

Benning has begun spending millions on renovating housing areas. And post spokesman Lt. Col. John Van Dyke said "the current chain of command is very concerned about these issues."

In a time when the only argument is how much to cut the defense budget, Fuller says infrastructure and quality of life issues must be paramount.

"Quality of life — to me that's the major issue for the army of the future, not training. Quality of life, taking care of people."

Fuller is harshly critical of the Army Communities of Excellence (ACOE) program — and the officers who push it — as an example of how the wrong message is sent to soldiers about concern for their quality of life on post.

"The reason they want to win ACOE is for the publicity that will accrue, not because it will do a soldier any good to have flowers planted in front of the (building) or that it's going to raise the psychological, feeling-good aspect of working at Fort Benning because they've got five azalea bushes in front of the building," Fuller said.

"I like the ACOE. But ACOE in and of itself is not going to improve the quality of life. I'm sorry. I just don't believe that."

Fuller acknowledges that he was criticized by Army brass for not emphasising ACOE while chief of staff. But Fuller said he did not feel it would have been appropriate to focus on aesthetics during the Gulf War period.

Benning officials expect to hear soon, perhaps next week, whether they won this year's competition for best looking post. Van Dyke said no one has kept up with the money that was spent on preparing for the team of reviewers that inspected the post recently. But he said he believes the expenditures to be nominal.

Bah, humbug, Fuller fumed.

"Infrastructure and quality of life, genuine money and concerns need to go into that," he said. "Even if you close training down for half a damn year, you've got to put money into those types of programs."

Fuller's strong talk doesn't surprise anyone who knows him. His reputation for speaking his mind is legend on post. Soldiers, like Van Dyke, who served with Fuller at the 29th, regard him as tough. Civilians, who Fuller praises profusely, regard his tenure as "laid back," as one senior civilian staffer put it.

Fuller speaks forcefully in a community that by its nature is prickly about frank, critical talk in public.

But Fuller has his fans.

Cadets stick with academy despite cuts

From wire reports

Cadets had the option of quitting after the academy announced in July that it would send only 225 graduates to pilot training each year. In the past, everyone who was qualified — from 600 to 800 seniors — could go. But military cutbacks mean there are fewer planes to fly.

COLORADO SPRINGS, Colo. — A prestigious diploma and a guaranteed job apparently are enough to keep the vast majority of cadets at the Air Force Academy who officials feared would drop out in droves because of deep cuts in pilot training.

"What could have been a tidal wave turned out to be a mere ripple," an academy official said of those who've quit. "We're relieved."

Cadets had the option of quitting after the academy announced in July that it would send only 225 graduates to pilot training each year. In the past, everyone who was qualified — from 600 to 800 seniors — could go. But military cutbacks mean there are fewer planes to fly.

Some predicted that hundreds of cadets who were practically promised a flying career would walk out in protest.

But as of this week, only nine cadets have resigned — four seniors, four juniors and one freshman just out of basic training. Although cadets have until Sept. 15 to decide, academy officials don't expect a last-minute surge of resignations.

"I could be wrong, but I don't anticipate a drastic change," said Lt. Col. Rollie Stoneman, associate director of admissions. Classes started two weeks ago, and it's almost too late to switch to another school, he said. "Most cadets who wanted to leave have done it by now and are getting on with their lives."

Although some cadets initially felt angry, disappointed or betrayed, they've had time to put it in perspective, said Col. Bud Stokes, deputy commandant for operations.

"People who predicted mass departures underestimated the maturity of cadets," Stokes said. "They've obviously looked at their options and decided the academy is a pretty good place to be — whether they become a pilot or simply an officer."

On a clear day last week, single-engine T-41s buzzed around the 557th Flying Training Squadron at the academy. This is where senior cadets get their first taste of regular pilot training. They learn basic maneuvers, including takeoffs and landings, and find out whether they can handle the pressure.

This year, that pressure includes knowing that only 1 of 3 will be selected in January to attend Undergraduate Pilot Training after they leave the academy.

"I worry a lot more about the competition," said senior Brian Williams of Oklahoma. "Nobody is sure about their chances now; nothing is guaranteed."

A survey of this year's graduating class — taken when they first came to the academy — showed that 68 percent wanted to become pilots. More than 12 percent also said they would leave the academy if they couldn't fly.

Yet several seniors going through the flight program this fall said they never seriously considered quitting.

"It just wasn't realistic, financially or otherwise," said David DeLisle of Florida. Seniors would have to pay back $11,250 for one semester or serve two years enlisted active duty or four years with the Reserves.

Even juniors, who have no pay-back obligation if they quit now, feel that once they've put in two years at the academy, they're over the hump and have invested too much to give up now.

"It's a question of sticking it out and graduating with an academy ring on your finger and an academy diploma on your wall," said Jason Mills of Texas.

Cadets are realistic enough to know that a free education and a guaranteed job are good benefits.

A recent survey of the freshman class found that 91 percent chose the academy because graduates get good jobs: five years as an Air Force officer and a potential career. The academy's academic reputation and full financial assistance were the next most important reasons.

But for some cadets, dedication to the academy is reason enough to stay.

"They've trained us for three years; I think we should give the Air Force a chance," said senior Hassan Siddiqui of Oklahoma City.

Bank on John Fuller speaking his mind

"John Fuller . . . is very bright, very smart and very articulate," said Lt. Gen. Carmen Cavezza, who was commanding general of Fort Benning during most of Fuller's tenure as chief of staff. Cavezza is now commanding general of Fort Lewis, Wash., and a man Fuller considers "boss" and friend.

"He is a man of high moral standards and considerable integrity, and I placed considerable trust in him," Cavezza added. ". . . He didn't get a lot of recognition that he should have."

Fuller was rejected for promotion to brigadier general by a board of senior officers. He retired a colonel, and the reason for his not being promoted can only be guessed at, since the promotion process is held mostly secret.

"You ask yourself the question, 'why not me?' " he said. "I'm not sure I'll ever know the real answer to it."

Fuller said he guesses at several possible reasons.

First, he had been a training battalion and brigade commander, rather than a leader of a tactical unit. The Army has a well documented bias against promoting commanders of training (Table of Distribution and Allowances) units. A recent Army Times study showed that no TDA commanders were promoted to brigadier general in 1991, while 100 tactical (Table of Organization and Equipment) commanders were promoted.

Second, he never received assignment to work in Washington, D.C., and was not well known outside the infantry.

And third, he believes his divorce and remarriage may have been frowned on by some generals.

But Fuller says he's not looking back.

"My mother has a saying that if it wasn't meant to be, it wasn't meant to be for all the right reasons," he mused.

Fuller entered the Army right out of college, in 1965. He served two tours in Vietnam, and was shot up so badly in one confrontation that he could "see my heel where my toes normally were."

He considered leaving the Army after Vietnam, but he was "reinvigorated" by service at the Ranger school.

And since that time, he grew more attached to Fort Benning and the Army, despite sometimes strong opinions about how things might be run differently.

"It was a good time," he said. "I have no regrets, and I enjoyed every minute of it."

Some see good coming from sex abuse cases

From wire reports

NEW YORK — Good, in the biblical view, can come out of evil. In "everything God works for good," wrote the missionary-apostle Paul. It's a recurring paradox. Hints of it are being seen in a modern blight in churches.

Grievous and hurtful as are the recently disclosed cases of clergy sexual abuse of children, a priest-psychologist says a helpful aspect is that an old malignity is now being brought into the open.

"I don't want to downplay the damage that is done," the Rev. Stephen J. Rossetti said. "The damage is severe and very painful. But we believe in the Christian tradition that even this tragedy can yield moments of grace by God's power."

Rossetti of Chestnut Hill, Mass., is a specialist in treating both victims and perpetrators of child sexual abuse. He said such cases have gone on in the churches and society "for centuries but nothing was done about it."

"We're now putting the world on notice that it will not be tolerated," he said in an interview.

He said the change is "very helpful to children and for society." He said children and adults recalling such episodes are being encouraged to "speak up," and it's being made clear to perpetrators they can't get by with it.

A "movement toward the rights of children has taken off in the 20th century," said the Rev. Stephen J. Rossetti, with greater attention to them and their care, including early labor laws protecting them.

Such twisted behavior itself is "nothing new," he said. "Children have always been molested. But the old thing was that children were to be seen and not heard. They were treated as property, as women used to be."

But a "movement toward the rights of children has taken off in the 20th century," he said, with greater attention to them and their care, including early labor laws protecting them.

"It could almost be called the age of the child," he said. "This is a very positive development."

It's also why so many cases of child sexual abuse are turning up," he said. "For the first time, we're willing to listen. People are telling about it, even afterward as adults. They're more open in revealing it.

"This is an important step in the healing process, bringing it out in the open and being received with compassion."

Rossetti has directed a new study for Twenty-Third Publications of Mystic, Conn., finding that the recently disclosed spate of clergy-child sexual abuse has seriously damaged trust in the priesthood and church.

"It's the most heinous crime people can think of," he said. "Even in prison, a child molester is considered the lowest of the low. Add to that it involved a sacred office.

"It's an enormous contradiction — a holy symbol of the priesthood juxtaposed with a heinous and unspeakable crime."

Nevertheless, he said, even that jarring of the exalted view of priests can be helpful toward seeing them in truer perspective as fellow, fallible human beings, subject to failings.

"It can make for a better, more realistic understanding of the humanity of priests," Rossetti said. "That's healthier for priests and healthier for people."

The new national study, involving questionnaires completed by 1,810 active Catholic lay people and clergy members, found child sexual abuse cases had caused a "significant decline" in confidence and trust in the priesthood.

Survey tests political pulse of churches

From wire reports

NEW YORK — Evangelicals, that huge bloc of doctrinally conservative, mainly white Protestants who until the 1960s mostly voted Democratic, now are solidly in the Republican camp.

Oddly, they've become political bedfellows with mainline Protestants, also largely Republicans, despite different nuances of belief. Jews mostly still back Democrats. So do black Protestants. Roman Catholics are in the middle.

These are among preliminary findings of a broad survey of the political leanings of America's religious groups. It's termed one of the most detailed and thorough such studies ever made.

"What's surprising is that Evangelicals now match mainline Protestants in their Republican inclination," said John C. Green, a political scientist with the University of Akron in Ohio, who directed the study.

The study, also examining levels of religious commitment, concluded that "Americans are a very religious people." Among other findings:

■ Evangelicals, who emphasize an infallible Bible, personal born-again conversion, persuading others to faith and belief that Jesus is the only means of salvation, make up the country's second largest voting bloc.

Included in this category were the big Southern Baptist Convention, Assemblies of God and various smaller, conservative denominations that have split from mainliners. They make up 23 percent of adults, about 43.1 million.

They mostly voted Democratic until the 1960s, when a gradual shift began. Now they're strongly Republican. In 1988, 77 percent voted for President Bush; 68 percent say they will this time.

■ Mainline Protestants, those in historical denominations such as United Methodist, Episcopal, Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.), Evangelical Lutheran Church in America, American Baptist and United Church of Christ — total 39 million, or 21 percent of adults.

Seventy-two percent voted for Republican Bush in 1988 and 63 percent say they will again, indicating some wavering from the mainliners' usually more prevalent Republicanism.

■ Roman Catholic make up 23.5 percent of the adults, or 43.5 million, the largest religious bloc. They backed Republicans until 1932 when they turned Democratic behind Franklin D. Roosevelt's New Deal. But lately they've moved back toward the GOP.

■ Black (African-American) Protestants make up 9.6 percent of U.S. adults, or about 17.8 million. While evangelically conservative in theology, they're much more liberal on social policies than white evangelicals.

Only 19 percent backed Bush in 1988.

Drop in Jewish population predicted

From wire reports

JERUSALEM — The world's Jewish population is shrinking, largely because of intermarriage, and will drop by about 1.8 million in the next 30 years, a researcher said recently.

Sergio Della Pergola, a Hebrew University professor of contemporary Jewry, projected 12 million Jews in the world by the turn of the century and 11 million by the year 2020.

He was quoted as saying the world Jewish population is about 12.8 million now. Other estimates are higher, up to more than 17 million. Della Pergola said figures were hard to pin down, because of questions of definition and because data is not available for all countries.

Besides intermarriage, Della Pergola linked the projected decline to the continuing effects of 6 million Jewish deaths during the Holocaust and an aging population.

Della Pergola's projections were given to the demographic committee of the World Zionist Congress, which is meeting in Jerusalem.

He said Israel, which has a modest population growth, was the exception. Israel has almost 4.2 million Jews, along with about 900,000 Muslims, Christians and Druse. The Druse faith is an offshoot of Islam.

Benning troops move out to help hurricane victims

By Linda Bosley Dailey
Staff Writer

Serving in southern Florida to help in the hurricane relief effort is all in the line of duty for Pvt. John Caito.

Caito, who got married in May, leaves behind — for a month or maybe more — his wife who, he said, just arrived here.

"It's my job," said the soldier in the 608th Ordnance Company.

"I'm glad to see we're helping our own," said Spc. Timothy Pate, another soldier in the 608th, of the efforts to aid Americans affected by Hurricane Andrew.

About 500 soldiers from Fort Benning have left for southern Florida in the last week to participate in the relief work there.

Caito and Pate were among the 62 soldiers who left Monday for a 2½-day convoy ride to the Miami area. That contingent included soldiers from the 608th, as well as the 533rd Transportation Co. and the 598th Maintenance Co.

Those soldiers, all from units within the 13th Supply and Services Battalion, will assist in the distribution of goods shipped there for victims of Hurricane Andrew, said Capt. James Braswell, commander of the 533rd who will also command the contingent in Florida. They expect to be there about 30 days, he said.

Among the equipment they took with them were 23 tractor-trailers, four forklifts and two wreckers.

The 43rd Engineer Battalion, the 535th Engineer Detachment, 675th and 676th Medical Detachments, 586th Engineer Co., 988th Military Police Co. and the Headquarters and Headquarters Co. of the 36th Engineer Group also have deployed to Florida to aid victims of Hurricane Andrew.

The soldiers from the 43rd who went to Florida will help clear debris, said Fort Benning spokesman Al Blanchard. Soldiers from the 535th took four 750-kilowatt generators and two-500 kilowatt generators with them to provide power to the Miami water treatment plant, he said.

The medical detachments will run dispensaries — similar to outpatient clinics — for military personnel and their dependents. The 586th will help distribute goods, and the military police will help control traffic and guard military equipment.

Military swings into action

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon will tailor its Hurricane Andrew relief force in Florida by dispatching radio technicians, engineers and supply officers to help local officials organize their recovery effort, the Army's top general says.

"They need a backbone, a skeleton" to build on, Gen. Gordon Sullivan, the Army's chief of staff said earlier this week in an interview after meeting with local officials in Homestead, Fla., and viewing its devastated streets by helicopter, car and foot.

A major problem has been a lack of communication and dispersal of information about the relief effort because of the absence of working televisions, telephones and local radio stations.

The Army is sending in 10,000 portable radios — with batteries — for local residents and hopes to get the local stations back on the air soon.

"If the radio station needs a generator, we'll get them a generator," Sullivan said during a meeting with officials in Homestead.

The four-star general said he intends to see to it that the military force dispatched to Florida by President Bush is properly configured to do the jobs local officials want done.

"The supplies are flowing: the food, the medical items, the building supplies. ... Now the question is distribution and we will give them helicopters, trucks and vehicles to get the job done," he said.

In a sometimes heated session, city, county and state officials told Sullivan they needed to identify which military officers have been sent to help them, that traffic jams had become a major impediment to the relief effort and that some residents were fearful looters would raid their damaged homes if they left to get food and water.

"We lost our infrastructure, totally," said Homestead City Manager Alex Maxo. "We have 75,000 homes destroyed."

Sullivan introduced the military's point man in the relief effort, Lt. Gen. Sam Ebbensen, and told them to "funnel your requests through him."

The military, which expects to have some 20,000 troops in the state by midweek, will attempt to establish major depots at the Miami International Airport, at Tamiami Airport and, possibly, at Homestead Air Base, said Lt. Gen. Leo Pigaty.

Sullivan flew south with a team of the Army's top operations, logistics and supply commanders to assess the military's four-day old effort in southern Florida.

Many of the generals, who were veterans of both Vietnam and Desert Storm, appeared grim-faced after seeing the havoc the hurricane left behind.

Their Blackhawk helicopters swooped over miles of farms, business and homes that appeared flattened as if by a giant rolling pin, with trees snapped off and houses crushed. Several trailer parks were only mounds of twisted metal and wood, with some naked concrete slabs swept clean by the deadly winds.

"The devastation was worse than I expected in its intensity and the number of houses destroyed," said Gen. Edwin Burba, the four-star commander of all U.S. Army troops in the continental United States.

Sullivan said that while the Pentagon is willing to send thousands more troops to the recovery effort, his visit showed him that organization is what is needed most.

He said he wants to put an officer in every neighborhood so the military can act as a liaison with local officials and the volunteer national relief groups trying to help the storm's victims.

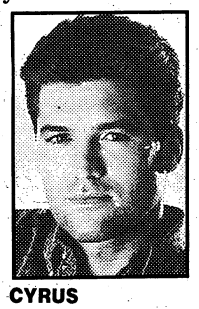
New Achy Breaky dance becoming hit at the clubs

From staff, wire reports

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — Amid the current rage in country music dance clubs, Billy Ray Cyrus has emerged with a hit: "Achy Breaky Heart," a song which has inspired a dance — the Achy Breaky.



CYRUS

The Achy Breaky is right up there with the Tush Push and the Cotton-Eyed Joe at the nation's 1,200 country music dance clubs. The number of such clubs has doubled in the past 18 months. In Nashville, there are three such clubs in a one-mile stretch — including one that was a disco until a few months ago.

Many clubs offer dance lessons. A few even have brought back the mechanical bulls that were popularized in the movie "Urban Cowboy" a decade ago.

The Achy Breaky was created by Melanie Greenwood, the ex-wife of country singer Lee Greenwood, who was hired by Cyrus' record company to come up with a dance to help promote the song.

"It's kind of a tush push," she says. "It's got those hip movements. You can get down and get funky. It's a country way of cutting loose."

She describes the dance as hips going left, then right, then to the left again to four counts of eight.

"It's kind of a swing motion. It reminds me of an old Elvis move. I give it a 95, just like they would on 'American Bandstand.' "

Cyrus, in fact, has been called "the new Elvis" by some publications. An unknown in April, he has since sold 3 million copies of his album, "Some Gave All," which contains the bouncy "Achy Breaky Heart."

Greenwood, a one-time TV country dance instructor, credits Cyrus with helping stir interest in dancing. "He's a natural mover, a natural dancer. People love to see him dancing. People listen with their eyes and he gives them something to look at."

The Achy Breaky is a line dance in which people form a line to dance. Because such dances do not require a partner, they are especially popular with females who can dance with friends of the same sex. This in turn attracts single males to the clubs because they know females there will be plentiful.

The most popular dances are featured on The Nashville Network's "Club Dance," a daily 60-minute show that is country music's version of rock 'n' roll's old "American Bandstand."

Shakespeare Festival receives $1 million grant

From staff reports

The Alabama Shakespeare Festival has received a $1 million grant from the Lila Wallace-Reader's Digest Fund to expand its recent efforts to increase cultural diversity at the theater. The grant will support a comprehensive, five-year initiative to include more African Americans in all aspects of ASF — as audiences, artists, board and staff members and students.

Although much of the funding is targeted specifically for audience development, funds will also be used to expand many of ASF's artistic and educational programs, including the Master of Fine Arts programs, Theater in the Mind and the Southern Writers' Project.

"We are delighted by this extraordinary grant from the Lila Wallace-Reader's Digest Fund," said ASF artistic director Kent Thompson. "Without undermining our commitment to Shakespeare and the classics, ASF is turning more attention toward plays that reflect the cultural, religious and social issues of our home — the South.

"In addition, the Lila Wallace-Reader's Digest Fund grant will help us build on the positive community response to 'All God's Dangers,' 'Fences' and 'Miss Evers' Boys' which were produced in the last three seasons. Most importantly, this funding allows us the opportunity to include more of the African American community in the State Theater of Alabama. This, we believe, will allow ASF to better serve all the citizens of Alabama and the South."

The Lila Wallace-Reader's Digest Fund promotes the vitality of the arts nationwide.

Fun in the sun

The order for the day was to have fun. For the staff and family of Fort Benning's U.S. Army Medical Department Activity unit, this was an order eager to comply with. The young and the old alike had an enjoyable day as MEDDAC celebrated its Organization Day last month at the Uchee Creek Recreation Area on the post's southwest edge in Alabama.

Plenty of good food, happy people and exciting games for the adults and the children marked the occasion. And, for some, the opportunity to just sit back, kick the feet up and commune with nature in the relaxing setting next to the Chattahoochee River made it a special day.

Turnout is light for business conference

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

A key planner for the "Feeding and Clothing the Soldier Conference" in Columbus on Tuesday said he was disappointed that only "20 or maybe 25" business people showed up.

Roy Leggett, acting director of the Columbus College Center for Procurement Technical Assistance, said he'd expected "50 to 55" area business people interested in "posturing themselves" so they could do business with the Department of Defense procurement agencies.

"The conference was not about how to do business with the government, but how to posture themselves (businesses) so they could do business with the government," Leggett said.

The center and the Columbus Chamber of Commerce co-sponsored the event, which brought several ranking Army procurement specialists to the city.

What the conference attendees did hear was that the government is getting away from sealed bids, in many cases, and negotiating contracts in which quality and previous performance on government contracts carry more weight.

Brig. Gen. Richard E. Beale Jr., commander of the Defense Personnel Support Center, told the crowd that the defense department spent some $6.2 billion on clothing and textiles, medical equipment and supplies and subsistence for men and women in uniform in 1991.

He told the business men and women at the conference that the department is going to long-term contracts with flexible ordering schemes and that the military will be looking at "simplified commercial buying practices" in the future. That should mean better quality, increased competition (for government business), lower prices and shorter lead times on things like uniforms and food, he said.

Beale said the Army is looking at clearing out various warehouses, shutting them down and entering into "quick-response" contracts that will eliminate the need for much of the government's presently owned warehouse space.

He said the Army will be looking at establishing regional contractors for such things as medical supplies, which are now mostly bought at the local level.

The conference also included an introduction to the "Soldier System" of the future — the futuristic uniform that Fort Benning soldiers may be waring by the year 2,000 — and a brief rundown on the military's search for better ways to feed the troops.

There was little specific information, however, about what parts of the future uniform are already contracted for and practically no details about the Army's search for replacements for Meals-Ready-To-Eat.

Officials did spell out, however, the requirements the future uniform must meet — such as being impervious to chemicals — and some of the characteristics of soldier's meals of the future, including that they must more closely resemble "home cooking" than do today's MREs and tray-ration meals.

Vet says he was fired because he wasn't disabled

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — An Army veteran has sued the Paralyzed Veterans of America, claiming he was unfairly removed from his job because he was not disabled.

Blake C. Ortner was hired as associate sports director for the group in 1991, but was soon replaced. Executive Deputy Director John Bollinger, who uses a wheelchair because of a spinal cord injury, said Ortner is "very qualified," but lacked the disability necessary for such a visible position.

Bollinger said the associate sports director must be a role model for other disabled people. He said Ortner was insensitive to try to save his job.

"Sports and recreation is the door through which (paralyzed people) can gain access to mainstream America," Bollinger said. "From sports, they can go into employment, politics, anything, but sports is the initial vehicle."

In depositions filed in District of Columbia Superior Court, officials of the group said Ortner was hired because he was more qualified than any of the disabled applicants. The associate director organizes nationwide events for the disabled, including wheelchair races, wheelchair basketball and swimming.

Stephen M. Kohn, Ortner's attorney, said the group's action violated the D.C. Human Rights Act, which prohibits an employer from discriminating against a person on the basis of personal appearance.

Bernhardt K. Wruble, a lawyer representing the veterans group, said the federally chartered organization has "tremendous freedom" to give preference to disabled people when hiring.

Ortner said most of the executive and administrative workers at the group's headquarters are able-bodied. His predecessor had no disability.

The group has kept Ortner, 32, on staff as an administrative assistant at his former pay level.

The case is scheduled for trial on Sept. 21.

VA rules on mustard gas testing

From staff reports

The Department of Veterans Affairs has made its final ruling on establishing service connection for exposure to mustard gas.

The VA had announced last year that World War II veterans who were exposed to mustard gas testing during military service and who suffer from certain long-term effects would become eligible for disability compensation.

Based on the final ruling, service connection is established for World War II veterans who participated in full-body, field or chamber experiments to test protective clothing or equipment during world War II, and who suffer from chronic forms of laryngitis, bronchitis, emphysema, asthma, conjunctivitis, keratitis or corneal opacities.

Any affected veteran who has not filed a compensation claim should contact the nearest VA regional office for information and assistance. Veterans in Georgia should call 1-800-827-2039; veterans from Alabama should call 1-800-827-2046.

Claims denied under previous regulations will be reviewed under the new rule. And claims put on hold pending the final ruling will be processed.

Marines 'truly regret' leading woman to think brother alive

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — Sorry isn't good enough for Pat Plumadore.

Hopes that her brother missing in Vietnam might still be alive were raised and then dashed by the now-apologetic Marine Corps.

"I'm just mad," said Plumadore, of Syracuse, N.Y.

"They'd like me to believe Kenny was killed that day and his remains disappeared or were commingled" with others who died in a fierce firefight.

"Well, I'm not gonna give up," she said. "A Marine was captured in that incident. I still think it was Kenny."

Her doubts and pain are emblematic of the agonies suffered by families of the missing who have either been denied access to classified information on their loved ones or been given unverified information without warning or explanation. In a recent letter to Plumadore's congressman, Rep. James T. Walsh, R-N.Y., the Marines admitted making a big mistake in the case of Lance Cpl. Kenneth Plumadore.

Lt. Gen. M.T. Cooper said it was wrong for the Corps to send Pat Plumadore a letter last May suggesting that her brother might have been captured.

"I truly regret the renewed grief Ms. Plumadore has experienced as a result of this information," Cooper said.

He said the Marines believed that the original listing of Kenneth Plumadore as "KIA/BNR" — killed in action, body not recovered — was still valid, but he allowed that "questions remain" regarding the case.

Plumadore, then 19, was among 15 Marines from the 2nd Battalion, 4th Marine Regiment, who were believed dead when the unit withdrew after a heavy engagement with the North Vietnamese near Con Thien on Sept. 21, 1967.

Nearly three weeks later, the unit returned to the area to recover the bodies. The Marines said later that 14 of the 15 bodies were recovered, although the battalion commander and platoon commander have told the New York Daily News that 15 body bags were returned.

In 1986, the Vietnamese returned remains of a serviceman they said was captured in a battle near Con Thien on Sept. 21, 1967, and died in one of their hospitals.

The Pentagon determined that the remains were not those of Plumadore, and they have never been identified. Plumadore's sister was not told of the development at that time, which was "not in keeping with our policy," Cooper wrote, adding, "I regret the difficulties the Plumadores have experienced as a result of our error."

WW II 50TH ANNIVERSARY

Field Marshal Erwin Rommel attempted to clear the British from Egypt 50 years ago during the week of Aug. 29-Sept. 3. Hindered by poor intelligence information concerning British defenses and minefields, the Afrika Korps sustained heavy casualties and withdrew from Alom Nayil and the Alam Halge Ridge. The new commander of Britain's Eighth Army, Field Marshal Bernard Montgomery, wisely allowed the Germans to withdraw. British artillery and the Royal Air Force played a major role in Rommel's defeat.

Here, according to research by the Military History Division at Fort Benning, were the top news items of the week:

■

In Guadalcanal, Japanese forces received reinforcements carried by a destroyer flotilla known as the "Tokyo Express." The American air group also reinforced the Allied position, landing 18 more fighters and 12 dive bombers at Henderson Field.

■

In Guinea, having lost more than 1,000 men, Japanese Gen. Haruyoshi Hyakutake decided to evacuate his troops from Milne Bay to support the invasion of Guadalcanal. The evacuation signaled the first major setback suffered by the Japanese in the ground war.

■

On the Eastern Front, fierce fighting continued as the German advance through Russia reached the suburbs of Stalingrad. Additionally, German and Rumanian forces landed on the Taman Peninsula.

■

The Agriculture Secretary, Claude Wickard, warned the nation of the likelihood of the rationing of meat, necessitated by the war effort. President Franklin D. Roosevelt spoke of the possibility of introducing a meatless day.

■

Japan's Prime Minister, as well as War Minister and Army Chief of Staff, Gen. Hideki Tojo, claimed the vacated position of acting Foreign Minister after Shigenori Togo resigned from the office.

■

At Fort Benning, the 29th Infantry Regiment continued to serve in its dual role of demonstration unit for the Infantry School and test unit for the Infantry Board.

WW II 50TH ANNIVERSARY

Britain's Eighth Army, lead by Field Marshal Bernard Montgomery, made significant gains 50 years ago this week by winning The Battle of Alam Halfa and forcing Germany's Afrika Korps to withdraw. Fully realizing that the British had the momentum, German Commander Field Marshal Erwin Rommel elected to prepare a sophisticated fixed defense as the Eighth Army regrouped for its attack on Rommel.

Here, according to research by the Military History Division at Fort Benning, were the top news items of the week:

■

On Guadalcanal, Gen. Haruyoshi Hyakutake accompanied Japan's 2nd Infantry Division as it landed at Tassafaronga as part of the continuing enemy effort to reinforce its troops on the island.

■

Elsewhere on Guadalcanal, 600 U.S. Marine Raiders landed and attacked the Japanese base at Taiuv, successfully disrupting enemy preparation for a counterattack against American positions.

■

Near Guadalcanal, Japanese forces sunk two aging American destroyers serving as transports.

■

In New Guinea, Japanese attacks forced the Australian defenders in the Owen Stanley Range to withdraw from their position near Efogi.

■

In a continuing series of impatient, meddlesome moves on the Eastern Front, Adolf Hitler removed Field Marshal Wilhelm List as Commander of Army Group A in the east and took it over personally.

■

In France, Vichy authorities dismissed Gen. de St. Vincent, the Governor of Lyons, in retaliation for his refusal to support the unjust arrests of the Jewish people in Lyons.

■

At the Infantry School at Fort Benning, instruction included lessons concerning anti-tank tactics and weapons for rifle platoons in anticipation of the intense ground warfare to come against Germany's powerful armor forces.

Southern pounds pavement to win the Midnight Express

From staff reports

Fort Benning's Curtis Southern, 32, was the overall winner in a field of 1,250 runners in Columbus' premier road race — Country's Midnight Express, run last weekend. His time of 15:54 over the 5,000-meter (3.1 miles) course was 14 seconds better than runner-up Duane Robinson.

Connie Robertson made it a perfect seven-for-seven in the race. The Hapeville, Ga., runner coasted to victory in a course-best time of 17:44 in the 5k race Saturday night to win the women's prize by almost a minute.

Masters (over 40) awards went to Lilburn's Dan Lasseter (16:36) and Snellville's Sue Norwood (21:20) while Albany's Benny Wade (18:00) and Columbus' Susan Emerson (25:27) captured the Grand Master titles.

The results in each age group follow:

Navy looking to earn back its prestige

Knight-Ridder Newspapers

ABOARD THE USS INDEPENDENCE IN THE PERSIAN GULF — The day last week that Lt. Andy Barker flew over southern Iraq for the first time, he said, he felt he carried the battered prestige of his Navy on his wings.

"This is a chance to pull up all of us in the Navy," said Barker, 29, a native of St. Louis who has been a Navy pilot for five years. "A lot of great people in the Navy have been tarnished unfairly."

These have been tough times for the Navy. It has been embroiled in a series of scandals, the most recent involving allegations that a bunch of drunken Navy aviators sexually assaulted Navy women at the pilots' Tailhook Convention last year. As national outrage grew, heads rolled, promotions were delayed and budgets were cut by Congress.

Things have been little smoother at sea, where crews have all attended the Navy's new mandatory sexual harassment seminars even as they were preparing for another conflict with Iraq. Pilots in particular — the type of men who wear medals of St. Michael, the patron saint of bravery, around their necks — say they have been demoralized by the scandal and the nation's seeming loss of admiration for them. Top guns are starting to feel like underdogs.

"I used to be proud to say I was a naval aviator," said Lt. Dave Bentley, 33, a father of three. "Now it doesn't have the prestige, the respect it did before. A few people do something. Then this negative image came out of nowhere and chopped us off at the knees."

With the cloud of Tailhook hanging over it like the mist clouding the horizon on a summer afternoon in the Persian Gulf, the Navy is hoping that Operation Southern Watch will lift its tattered prestige.

To help accomplish that, it has invited journalists aboard the Independence and granted them extraordinary access to pilots after realizing Navy restrictiveness during Desert Storm allowed the Air Force to garner the lion's share of the publicity. They want and need their story told more than they ever imagined two years ago.

"Unfortunately, with the hard judgmental atmosphere in the States, we could use a boost," said Will Thierbach, 28, a fighter pilot from Scotch Plains, N.J. "I wouldn't call it redemption. Perhaps exoneration. If anyone had any doubts and ill feelings about the Navy, maybe they will learn it isn't merited and all the popularity we used to enjoy was deserved."

It is particularly galling for men in the Navy who feel proud of being the first branch in the service to put women into the cockpits of combat planes as instructors.

"Sure, it affected us," said the Independence's captain, Carter Refo. "You can't help but be sort of a combination of angry, ashamed, the whole gamut of emotions. The feeling is, let's get to the bottom of it and get on with the program."

The new policy toward sexual harassment, developed after all the public opprobrium over Tailhook, is summed up in just two words: zero tolerance.

The main weapon the Navy has decided to employ in combating sexual harassment is the seminar.

The night after the sexual-harassment seminar on the USS Acadia, a repair ship with 400 female and 1,000 male crew members, the mood was unusually pensive. As if at a junior high school dance, men and women who worked together and usually dined together drifted to segregated tables.

Women on ships have few complaints about their professional opportunities, other than the ban on combat duty.

"The younger males think it's totally appropriate to say, 'Yo, baby, honey,'" said Mess Management Specialist Jennifer Dinwiddie, 33, who in giving her rank proudly adds the initials "SW," signifying she has earned her surface warfare qualification. "They need to grow up and realize women don't appreciate it."

Women slowly gaining acceptance on ship

Knight-Ridder Newspapers

ABOARD THE USS INDEPENDENCE IN THE PERSIAN GULF — Lisa Cooper stalked the catwalk, alone as usual.

She was an outsider, shunned like the only other woman among 5,200 men aboard.

Some told her openly that she had no business being there. Others refused to sit with her at chow. She still seethed over one sailor's offhand remark as she cleaned her room: "That's what a woman should be doing — sweeping the floor."

She wondered whether it had been worth coming to sea to further her career.

"It'll all work out," came the reassuring voice of a sympathetic colleague who had walked up behind her. "You're going to be in the Navy, and you're going to be at sea."

Four months later, he has been proven right.

Cooper and Victoria Washington, both petty officers, are experiencing the excitement and career enhancement that accompanies serving on an aircraft carrier in a combat zone. They remain curiosities to a degree, but they are accepted and valued. And they are the wave of the future.

Their assignment to the Independence, the ship launching Navy planes to enforce the no-fly zone in Iraq, is only temporary.

Paradoxically, a 1948 federal law still prohibits women from serving on combat vessels while Congress has repealed a law banning women from flying in combat. But Cooper's and Washington's skills as cryptological technicians were needed, so it was determined that being lent to the ship was not the same as being assigned.

When they were first offered the assignment, they were thrilled, the two women said, sitting in a ward room dressed in work shirts and Navy pants with their names printed on the hip pockets.

"It means everything to me," said Cooper, 24, a native of Bath, Maine. "I compete against guys in my job. As far as making chief, I need time out here in combat, sea time, to back me up."

Both feel they are establishing a principle.

"It's important to show we can do the job at sea," said Washington, 40, a native of Louisville, Ky. "There are questions in some people's minds."

Including their families.

Cooper's parents still worry about their daughter's safety among so many men.

"That's the civilian side of my mother," she said. "If I were in a city surrounded by a bunch of men, all sorts of things could happen. I feel more protected here."

Washington's husband, a chief petty officer himself, understands the discipline of Navy life and expressed concern only about the facilities. The two women share a private room, a necessity that has made some sailors feel they are getting special privileges.

Shopper wants to hang out in Paris

By Jean Allen
Fort Lauderdale Sun-Sentinel

Q. We will be in Paris soon, and I hear there are no shopping bargains there at all. I wonder if that is true. I'd surely welcome your suggestions on places to shop for bargains and also some out-of-the-way things to see and do, as well as reasonable bistros or other places to eat.

We hate tourists (of course that's exactly what we'll be!) and like to keep away from all the tourist traps, hanging out where the locals go. — B.S., Boca Raton, Fla.

A. I'm not a good authority on shopping, since about the only places I shop in Europe are food stores, which I find fascinating, especially the hypermarkets — king-sized supermarkets. I also like the food halls in big department stores, something lacking in the United States. But I wouldn't disagree with what you heard about there being "no shopping bargains at all" in Paris. I can tell you where to get help on shopping and dining. But first, let's go to your questions about out-of-the-way things to see and do.

I have some favorite Paris places which I enjoy, even though some are admittedly touristy. I travel around by Metro, which is very easy to use. A pack of 10 tickets, called a carnet, now costs about $8.40, or 84 cents a ride. Each ticket will take you as far as you want to go, including transfers.

On Sundays I ride the Metro to La Cite and climb the steps into the middle of a sidewalk bird market, where Parisians are busy purchasing gourmet bird-food and elaborate cages, or shopping for a bird among the dozens of exotic species, in every color, that are chirping away.

After inspecting the birds, walk over to Notre Dame Cathedral, a couple of blocks away. To get away from most of the tourists, walk through the garden to the left of Notre Dame and cross the Pont St. Louis to the Ile St. Louis, second of the mid-city islands in the Seine River.

Strolling around the Ile past elegant old homes on serene, tree-lined streets is like stepping back into the 17th century. The Ile St. Louis has many charming restaurants and (according to Air France) the best ice cream in Paris, at a cafe called Berthillon.

When I get exhausted from walking in central Paris, I like to spend time sitting on a bench in the Tuileries Garden, a stretch of tree-shaded park between the Louvre Museum and Place de la Concorde.

File photo

The Arc de Triumph is one of the many interesting things to see and do in Paris.

This was once the garden of the Tuileries Palace, which was destroyed during the revolution. It is used mostly by Parisians, who wheel strollers, walk dogs, play ball with their children or — like me — just sit and watch everyone go by.

At the west end of the Tuileries are two small museums: Jeu de Paume, which displayed the Impressionists before they were moved across the river to the Musee d'Orsay; and the Orangerie. Remodeled Jeu de Paume now has contemporary exhibits, while the Orangerie displays some of the Impressionists.

If you visit the Musee d'Orsay (well worth it), be sure to step out on the terrace near the museum restaurant for a wonderful view of Paris.

It's crowded and touristy, but I enjoy visiting the area of the Pompidou Museum and the old Les Halles. Take the Metro to Chatelet/Les Halles and you emerge at the handsome old 19th century iron-and-glass halls, site of Paris' biggest food market for more than a hundred years. Now it houses the Forum shopping mall, full of shops, none with bargains.

I don't linger long there, but walk up the two-block stretch leading to the Pompidou Center, a tacky street lined with fast-food outlets including McDonald's and Burger King. The courtyard in front of the museum is fascinating: Mimes, musicians and jugglers entertain the crowds. Although the burger places and restaurants on the main streets here are not what you or I are looking for, there are some nice restaurants, with mostly French patrons, just a block or two away.

Place de la Bastille used to be a dreary square with a line of stones on the pavement outlining the location of the old prison. But the new Bastille Opera House has changed all that, and I found many nice-looking cafes and shops in the blocks around it.

I like visiting, though not for bargains, the stores along the Boulevard Haussman, just behind the old Opera House, including the sprawling Printemps and Galeries Lafayette department stores. West of this lineup of big stores, at Place de la Madeleine, is Fauchon's, the famous gourmet food store.

For advice on shopping and dining, you might also visit the Paris Convention and Visitors Bureau at 127 Avenue des Champs-Elysees, open daily from 9 a.m. to 8 p.m., offering information and a room reservation service.

Free trade will drain defense industry

MOUNTAIN VIEW, Calif. — "These people are piloting the ship of state looking through the rear-view mirror," Michael Closson groused about the Bush administration's fixation on past economic glories.

David Evans

Closson, director of the Center for Economic Conversion here, sees two big problems on the road ahead for California workers, with dire implications for the entire country — ever more layoffs in the defense industry and further job losses to Mexico under the proposed North American Free Trade Agreement.

Result? "A potential disaster in the making," he fears.

Ironically, it was California, home of the nation's anti-public-spending ideology, that received the largest share of fat Pentagon contracts.

In the go-go spending days of the 1980s, California received 20 percent of all Pentagon procurement contracts, Closson said. Fully half of those contract dollars poured into Los Angeles County. It was the belly of the military-industrial beast.

Now the feast is over, and the beast is dying: 40,000 defense workers laid off in the past year alone, said Closson.

There's worse to come. According to the recently published "Aerospace Task Force Report: An Economic Plan for the Los Angeles County Aerospace Industry," California could lose somewhere between 210,000 and 420,000 more defense jobs over the rest of this decade.

Sherrie Connelly participated in this study, and she added that "most of these job losses will be in L.A. It could be 1 in 7 jobs if nothing is done."

So far as economic disaster relief is concerned, Closson declared, "The federal role in fostering conversion planning has been totally inadequate."

Almost two years ago Congress appropriated a measly $200 million for economic adjustment assistance, but the Pentagon didn't release the funds until earlier this year.

"An insufficient amount of money was authorized for the massive problem at hand, and it was much too slowly allocated," Closson griped.

If Los Angeles County is getting clobbered by defense layoffs, the looming North American Free Trade Agreement could exacerbate the flight of manufacturing jobs south of the border.

Just ask Randy Robinson, a Canadian who until recently was the public education coordinator for the Action Canada Network, a coalition that made free trade a big issue in his country. Robinson described the impact of the 1989 free trade agreement between Canada and the United States thusly:

"You are high above the clouds in a passenger jet, and suddenly the engines stop. Only the whistling of the wind shivers the silence as passengers and crew absorb the new reality — you are going down."

"This is the way a lot of Canadians feel about free trade," Robinson wrote in an article last year and which he reaffirmed in a recent telephone interview.

"Under free trade, both Canadian companies and U.S. multinationals with plants in Canada have transferred operations to the U.S. (and in some cases to Mexico, already) with a furious intensity," he said.

Canada has suffered a net loss of more than 500,000 manufacturing jobs.

"Multiply by 10, Americans," Robinson warned.

In his 1991 article, when the estimate was "only" 435,000 manufacturing jobs lost, Robinson wrote, "This will happen to the U.S. in a Free Trade Agreement with Mexico. The cost difference between doing business in Canada and doing business in the U.S. is relatively small — perhaps 20 percent. In contrast, the cost difference between the U.S. and Mexico is huge — in the hundreds of percent. . . . There will be a steady erosion of the U.S. domestic economy and its tax base."

If Los Angeles County is getting clobbered by defense layoffs, the looming North American Free Trade Agreement could exacerbate the flight of manufacturing jobs south of the border.

Back to the plummeting airliner. The engines start again, but elation disappears when passengers realize the controls are frozen. The captain has locked himself in the cockpit and refuses to pull the plane out of its rapid descent.

"This is how most Canadians feel about Prime Minister Brian Mulroney, who has cut funding for national unemployment insurance, among other programs, which are viewed as unfair trading practices by U.S. administrations," Robinson said.

Defense cutbacks are unavoidable, but the free-trade covenant with Mexico can be deferred. The second shock to Americans is entirely avoidable.

Instead, the United States seems to be in an economic suicide dive toward free trade with Mexico. It looks as if Captain Bush and crew have locked themselves in the cockpit, oblivious to the screams of passengers who know all about the crash in Canada.

Youths have fun with safety at rally

Military police from Fort Benning, under the direction of Col. Jim Crockert, participated in the first FBI Public Safety Youth Rally last month at the Columbus Municipal Auditorium.

Lt. Walker Jackson set up a display ("Dare Program" and military police vehicle) and Staff Sgt. Steven Wagner along with Sgt. Patric Ogan performed a drug dog demonstration for more than 1,000 young people from the Chattahoochee Valley area.

The Lower Chattahoochee Valley Public Safety Youth Program is a combined effort by law officers and firefighters from the Columbus-Fort Benning-Phenix City area to meet the needs of young people through a long-term educational program.

Junior police safety members receive classroom instruction from a Georgia certified public safety officer on a regular basis and participate in outside activities (basketball, football, car washes, block parties, skating, dances, etc.). A Junior Public safety training center (29th Street Gym) has been established to accommodate those individuals who excel in an upper level program involving the Boy Scouts (Explorer Post).

After high school, those Junior Public safety members who have advanced in the law enforcement/firefighter areas will be eligible for scholarships to the police academy or a local college, or possibly both.

The potential for the Lower Chattahoochee Valley Public Safety Youth Program is enormous. Plans are under way to expand the program into a national program known as the "National Public Safety Youth Program."

More than 1,000 young people attended the safety rally at Columbus Municipal Auditorium last month.

Program targets school dropouts

The Combined Communities of Southeast Columbus is asking for volunteers from all segments of the community for their Saturdays program to help prevent dropouts.

The CCSC volunteer school year tutorial program is located at Eastway School on Buena Vista Road across from Wal-Mart. Each instructor will be asked to tutor from 1-4 weeks on Saturdays from 10 a.m. until noon. Instruction will be core-type education from second through eighth grades. Aides are defined as high school graduates, seniors, juniors and college students. Teachers are needed in reading, mathematics, science and other fields.

Trial in woodpecker case postponed

By Linda Bosley Dailey
Staff Writer

The trial of three Fort Benning civilian employees, indicted last January on charges of violating the Endangered Species Act, was postponed so the prosecution can study new-found evidence that requires a "re-evaluation" of charges against the defendants.

Carl A. Divinyi, Christopher Dunn Jr. and Robert K. Larimore face criminal charges of conspiring to conceal the presence of the endangered red-cockaded woodpecker and to permit logging that damaged its habitat. They were scheduled to go on trial this week in U.S. District Court in Columbus.

But Assistant U.S. Attorney G.F. Peterman III filed a motion Friday asking for the delay because "the United States has come into newly discovered information, the nature of which mandates a re-evaluation of the present charges in the interest of justice." U.S. District Judge J. Robert Elliott granted the continuance.

Peterman, though, would not say what the prosecution learned that prompted it to request the delay. Nor would Peterman say how long it will take the government to evaluate that information.

The endangered red-cockaded woodpecker nests in living, but diseased, pine trees that are between 60 and 100 years old.

Defense attorneys, though, doubt the strength of the prosecution's case and wonder if the matter will go to trial at all. Robert L. Wadkins, the attorney defending Divinyi, said he thinks it possible the prosecution may dismiss the charges.

Peterman said he could not comment on the possibility of the charges being dismissed or amended.

"The proof is not there that these men have committed any crime," said John C. Swearingen Jr., who represents Dunn. "If it goes to trial," he said, the case would be heard probably no sooner than early 1993.

Peterman, too, said he doubts the case will go to trial before next year.

"We were ready to go. We wanted to go," Wadkins said of the now-postponed trial.

Each defendant faces one count of conspiring to violate the Endangered Species Act between Jan. 1, 1985, and Dec. 31, 1989. Each also faces at least one count of making a false statement.

Larimore could face 36 years in prison and a $650,000 fine if found guilty on all eight counts he faces. Dunn could be sentenced to 31 years in prison and fined $640,000 if convicted on all seven charges he faces. And Divinyi could receive a sentence of six years in prison and a fine of $110,000 if found guilty of both counts he faces.

The three are employees of Fort Benning's Directorate of Engineering and Housing.

The trial originally was scheduled to begin during the U.S. District Court's March 1992 term, but had been delayed until the court term that began earlier this month.

The indictment of the defendants followed an investigation into destruction of the bird's habitat, which the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service began in 1989. Earlier that year, three environmental groups had threatened to file suit over the alleged destruction of the bird's habitat. The red-cockaded woodpecker nests in living, but diseased, pine trees that are between 60 and 100 years old.

There's no stopping Ben Register

Ex-general is AUSA's new leader

By Jerry Rutledge
Patriot Editor

When Lt. Gen. Ben Register retired from the U.S. Army five years ago, he didn't retire from public service.

Register hit the ground running. He returned to his hometown of Columbus and immediately began a second career in public service, this time as a mover-and-shaker in the business and services sector in the Chattahoochee Valley community.

"My time is a lot less structured. And it's sometimes not as focused," said Register, the new president of the Association of the United States Army (AUSA).

"Of course, when you are going to a position of (military) leadership, the mission is very clear, the responsibilities are very clear and your relationships in terms of authorities and coordination and such are well-defined. This makes for a good opportunity, especially if you are in a position to make decisions.

"But now this (retirement) is less structured. I spend a awful lot of time now doing different things. It doesn't mean we didn't do volunteer work in the Army. I was president of a school board in Stuttgart (Germany) with two high schools and 12 elementary schools and at the same time, this went with my job as commander with about 10,000 troops over there.

"You do those things as part of the Army, but you have help. Here I don't have any infrastructure at all, except through the organizations I work with. I've enjoyed retirement and I've enjoyed those things that I've been able to do. The main part of it is to make a contribution and see something happen. It makes it much more rewarding."

Bob Poydasheff, a friend of Register's and his predecessor as AUSA president, said the retired general is a tireless worker, a person who lends his time and expertise to a variety of organizations.

"I have deep regard for Ben. He's a man of dedication and great foresight," said Poydasheff, a former staff judge advocate at the U.S. Army Infantry Center at Fort Benning and now a local banking official. "He was my first vice-president with the AUSA and he was an invaluable asset. Ben is one of the most capable individuals I know." Register left the military as deputy chief of staff for logistics, the branch in charge of the purchase, the transportation and maintenance of Army equipment and the transportation and reassignment of troops.

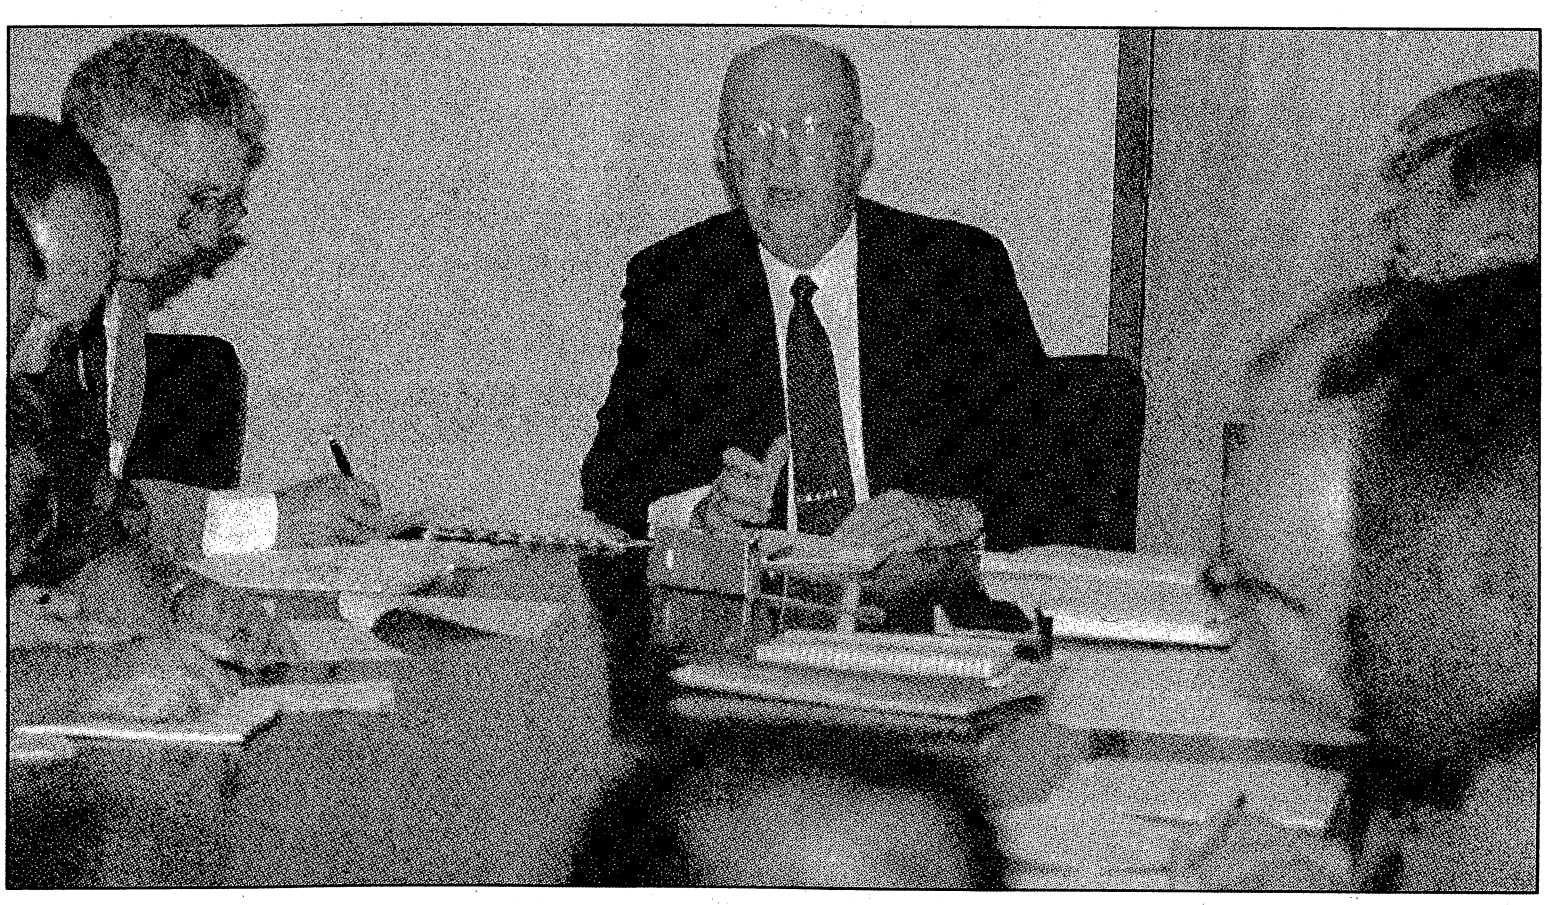
Other than the AUSA, Register's new "missions" include a new business that is preparing a new golf computer for market and serving on the Columbus Chamber of Commerce's Defense Contractors Committee as well as an advisory board for the Center for Procurement Technical Assistance.

The business — SportTech Innovations — was incorporated last November and Register is busy developing and producing the new technology, hand-held golf computer.

"We are going through product development now. We have a prototype now and we're going through product development tests," said Register, with all the pride of an entrepreneur. "It's a hand-held golf computer you take out on the course with you. It keeps scores — you can play Nassaus and all the games that you want to. You can keep your tendencies, how you are hitting the ball with each club, and course data. You can also get some shot tips out of it." The computer should hit the market next spring.

Register believes the retired military community is making a large contribution to life in the community, but there is still plenty of ability and expertise left untapped.

"We have a lot of very skilled people — not just in technical skills, but in management skills — who spent a lot of time in very key responsibilities that are involved in local activities but many more who could be," said Register. "And I don't mean just in volunteer organizations. I think they offer a great deal to an employer because of the responsibilities they have had. I believe there was a study which said that at one time 80 percent of the majors in Army and above had a master's degree. And today, among the junior officers, I think it's about 100 percent now. They must have an undergraduate degree."



By Joe Maher/The Benning Patriot

AUSA President Ben Register says he enjoys his retirement from the military — when he has the time.

Register says the retired military is a large reservoir of talent in organizational, technical and management skills that can be an invaluable aid to both the public sector and private sector of the local economy. The problem is linking the reservoir to the area where it's needed.

Register says the retired military is a large reservoir of talent in organizational, technical and management skills that can be an invaluable aid to both the public sector and private sector of the local economy. The problem is linking the reservoir to the area where it's needed. He says a lack of awareness of the opportunity, on both sides, keeps the connection from being made.

"I think the ACAP program (Army Career and Alumni Program) over here (Fort Benning) is doing a great job trying to marry up job opportunities with skills, especially as the military draws down," Register said. "I think most businesses are looking for good people. And I hope they give some of these people the opportunity to show what they can do."

Register, of course, was long retired from the military when the hostilities began in the Persian Gulf. An expert in logistics, he believes the public is not fully aware of the size and complexity of putting a fighting force into action in southwestern Asia.

"The Persian Gulf War probably presented the biggest logistic challenge of any part of the world for two reasons," said Register. "One was source of supply and the other was the political situation almost precluded prepositioning.

"Even when I was in place, we had some prepositioning of ships in Diego Garcia in the Indian Ocean, which was really a different scenario. Who would have even thought of a 550,000-man force in southwest Asia in the time frame we talked about. Given the time, the distance, the amount of tonnage we had to move, I think we did a marvelous job. Moving the troops and equipment from Europe was quite a task. No one envisioned outward movement from Europe of supplies. It was quite a challenge and I think the job done was really spectacular."

Lt. Gen. (ret) Benjamin F. Register, Jr.

Age: 62.
Hometown: Columbus, Ga.
Family: Wife, Betty; mother Anne; daughter Anne; sons Jeffrey and Richard.
Past: Former Deputy Chief of Staff for Logistics, U.S. Army.
Present: Local president, AUSA; civic leader; and businessman.

On retirement: "I've enjoyed retirement and I've enjoyed those things that I've been able to do. The main part of it is to make a contribution and see something happen. It makes it much more rewarding."

Candidates injecting religion into politics

Chicago Tribune

WASHINGTON — References to the Almighty are getting mighty common in this election.

George Bush literally embraces fundamentalist preacher Jerry Falwell and quotes from the Book of Proverbs. Bill Clinton campaigns often from church pulpits and repeats Isaiah's words.

And no candidate dares to miss Sunday morning services.

For a nation intent on keeping church and state separate, the presidential campaign is making religion and politics all but inseparable.

If God has seemed more in the political picture, perhaps more than any other time since the turn of the century, it is not because of divine intervention.

Instead, political strategists see religious and cultural values as a unifying theme among voters, and by November the race might be so close that both parties will be working at every margin of support.

In the campaign in key states, that means the candidates are playing the religion card, so to speak, and this is often entwined with other positions from abortion to school voucher proposals and calls for a return to "family values."

Clinton and his running mate, Sen. Al Gore of Tennessee, might be picking up votes from some of their fellow Southern Baptists, for instance, so Bush has to put extra effort into shoring up the Republican base, especially in the South.

To offset any losses there, Bush must also try attracting a few more urban voters in the Northeast and the Midwest, many of whom are Roman Catholic.

Since their respective nominating conventions, where Bush gave evangelist Pat Robertson the podium to preach and Clinton declared the Democrats' "New Covenant," both candidates have added a strong religious note to their political pitch.

"It is no slogan to say that America will always occupy a special place in God's heart," Bush claimed recently, relying less on theology and more on nationalism for his argument. "But that is true only as long as we keep Him in a special place in our hearts."

If he has an Episcopal reserve in his public prayers, the president does not hesitate to talk about his religious mentors, usually the pastors from his churches in Washington, Texas and Maine, and a host of others he has met or corresponded with over the years.

"We are proud to celebrate our country's Judeo-Christian heritage unrivaled in the world," Bush said at a fundamentalist religious conference, as if faith were a competitive event.

In one sense, it was. But now that the Cold War is over, there are few opportunities to rally voters against the evil of "godless communism," a term that Harry S. Truman popularized.

The candidates are comfortable presenting their religious views as if they were giving testimony to other believers. But Clinton has worn religion more lightly.

"I'm a Baptist, so I believe in deathbed conversions, but this is amazing," Clinton said last Thursday when criticizing the president's reversal on handing out farm subsidies and selling fighter jets to Taiwan.

Like Bush, Gore has also used scripture. In his acceptance speech at the Democratic convention, he said: "In the words of the Bible, 'Do not lose heart. This nation will be renewed.'"

Historian Garry Wills, author of "Under God: Religion and American Politics," sees the religious theme this year as a natural because "Americans in general are more comfortable with theists."

This is not lost on the candidates. "This country today has the highest percentage of churchgoing people in the world," said David Carney, political affairs director of the Bush-Quayle campaign.

Church is 'safe island' from storm's destruction

From wire reports

MIAMI — A small boy with an incredibly skinny kitten wandered into the hurricane relief center at St. Joachim Catholic Church and asked if the volunteers had anything to save his cat.

"I gave him some baby formula and told him to mix it half-and-half with water," said Nancy Hogan, an associate professor at the University of Miami School of Nursing who is working as a volunteer at St. Joachim.

"I hope to God that's good for kittens. I don't know if it is or not. We don't have anything for kittens. But that little boy needed that."

The small church and its adjacent hall in a poor, largely Spanish-speaking area of South Miami have developed into an anchor for many whose roots were torn up by Hurricane Andrew's devastating wind.

"This community has a sense that we are here," said Hogan. "We provide a kind of way station, some hard-core evidence that people are here for them. It centers people again. We are a safe island."

The Rev. Antonio Silio, the portly, gray-bearded pastor, describes his flock as middle-to-low class, "a lot of hard-working people. There are a lot of illegals, but illegals who work like maniacs."

The relief effort at St. Joachim's is entirely private. The parish has been adopted by St. Rita's church in posh Palm Beach County north of Miami. The private University of Miami School of Nursing has taken over the clinic.

"These people are beautiful," said Jim Wardle, a deputy sheriff from Martin County, about 100 miles north of Miami, working here as a volunteer. "They haven't felt sorry for themselves. They are thankful that people responded in their time of need."

The Rev. Dan Kane of St. Rita's was in the Oakland diocese during the 1989 San Francisco earthquake. He said he is observing the same things now here as he did then.

"We seem to be changing from the physical to the emotional aspect of the crisis," he said. "Post-traumatic stress is setting in. People are realizing what they have lost." The big need now, he says, is crisis counseling.

St. Joachim's is serving 4,500 families a day, said Kane.

Two weeks has made a great difference at St. Joachim's. A well-organized relief station has emerged from a chaotic struggle to dispense aid under incredibly difficult circumstances.

Hospital chief earns his first star

Spaulding reflects on achievements of his 'team'

By Jerry Rutledge
Patriot Editor

The signs are all over Martin Army Community Hospital, from the placard adorning the information desk at the building's main entrance to the big silver star on the handsome brown chair at the commander's desk.

The signs are congratulatory, lauding hospital commander Col. Vernon C. Spaulding's imminent promotion to the rank of brigadier general. The promotion orders were recently signed by President Bush and await confirmation by the U.S. Senate.

Spaulding is understandably pleased. "It feels good," he said. "It's always an honor to be recognized for a job well-done, if you will, because you always hope that you're promoted because you've done a good job.

"I think the hospital here has performed very, very well and I've been lucky to have a good staff. When a person is recognized it's usually not what they've done but what the team has done. Here we have a real good team and I've been fortunate to have had a good team.

"It is a humbling experience. There are not many of us (colonels) who get the opportunity to move up to the next level. So many colonels are qualified who have done all that you need to do to be promoted. Like everything else in life, there is a certain amount of luck and being in the right place at the right time. Certainly I'm honored to be given that opportunity."

Spaulding, a native of Los Angeles, has been in the military for 25 years and commander at Martin Army since June 1990.

Of the things the hospital staff has accomplished during his tenure, Spaulding lists the adjustments made by Martin Army during the Desert Shield/Desert Storm mobilizations, the hospital's high accreditation rating and the shift to a managed care concept as the biggest.

"We had to make a lot of transitions during Desert Shield and I think the hospital did them very well," said Spaulding. "Our staff had changes and shifted but we were still able to take care of patients. We got help and support from the community and I'm proud of the way that went."

Earlier this year, Martin Army went through the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Healthcare Organizations inspection and passed with commendation.

"We were in the best 5 percent of hospitals in the country and I'm very proud of that," said Spaulding. "The staff did just a tremendous job making that accomplishment, especially in light of the deployment and everything else that was going on."

Spaulding said Martin Army stands in the forefront of the Department of Defense's plan to shift to a managed care concept. "That's kind of a HMO (health maintenance organization) concept," the colonel said. "The Army has called this program 'Gateway to Care.' We were one of the original Gateway managed care sites."

Spaulding said Martin Army has been going through organizing this managed care concept for the last year and has been recognized by its higher command as a leader in this transition.

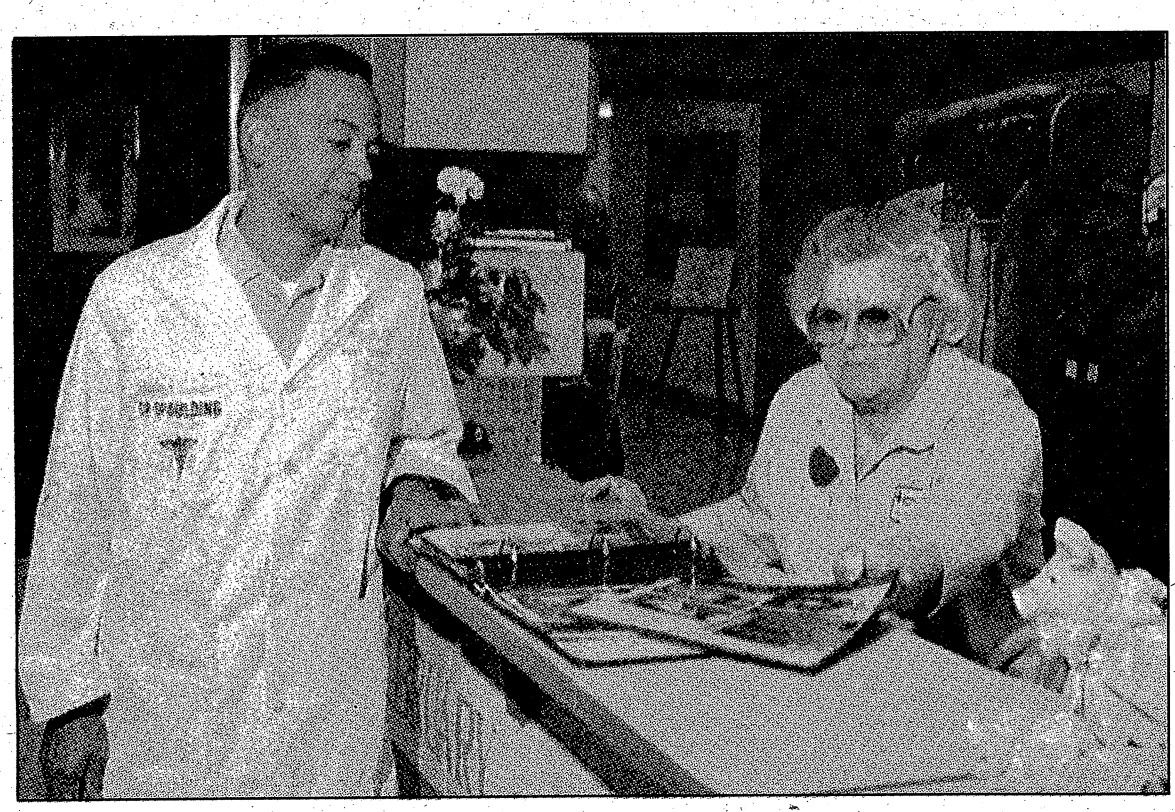
The colonel said frustrations at Martin Army have been "primarily the same of any large unit in a bureaucracy."

"I think we're moving in the right direction but never fast enough," Spaulding said. "Your bureaucratic hurdles — the budgeting, the staffing — you never feel you have enough money or staff to do the things that you want to do. That has been a challenge."

He said a new hospital is needed, with Fort Benning's size and continued role in the military's future. "As we move into the year 2000, this hospital is getting old, although it still looks nice on the outside," Spaulding said. "There is a lot of technology which has expanded and in order to stay up with things, we really need a new hospital."

Fort Benning was tentatively approved to get a new hospital in 1998 several years ago, but those plans lost priority with the tightening military budget. "We essentially have to start all over again in getting approval," Spaulding said. "I'm concerned about how that will pan out. As we well know, there's going to be a continued push for defense cuts and whether our new hospital will survive all that I don't know."

Spaulding said the down side to any promotion is having to move, leaving friends and associates behind. "You develop real close friends and real close ties — it's just like losing family," he said. "I am going to miss the close ties. But I'm in my 25th year (in the Army) and this is my 14th or 15th move. We've gone through this before and every time we do it, it's hard. It doesn't become any easier to move."



By Joe Maher/The Benning Patriot

Col. Vernon Spaulding talks with Orba Smith at the main entrance to Martin Army Community Hospital.

"I think the hospital here has performed very, very well and I've been lucky to have a good staff," said Spaulding. "When a person is recognized it's usually not what they've done but what the team has done. Here we have a real good team and I've been fortunate to have had a good team."

Report criticizes Army's lean, mean standards

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — The Army needs to learn that overweight soldiers can be good soldiers and that there is a physical difference between men and women, according to a report by the Institute of Medicine.

The Army system fails to recognize that a slightly overweight person may outperform a lean person in the type of jobs that soldiers actually do, according to an institute report released last week.

It also said current standards for body fat and weight-to-height ratios used by the Army put women at a disadvantage.

The U.S. military services now base physical requirements for both recruitment and retention of personnel on height-weight restrictions and on traditional measures of physical fitness, such as running, push-ups and sit-ups, the report said.

Such tests do not reflect the actual work of combat soldiers, which often includes lifting, carrying and moving heavy equipment.

"Moderately overweight individuals performed reasonably well in load-carrying ability," the report said. Tests such as running and sit-ups favor smaller, lighter individuals who actually may not do as well at lifting and carrying, said the report.

Body fat standards in the military "appear to discriminate against women," the report said.

Though the Army recognizes that women have a higher percent of body fat than men, the report said, "standards for women allow less excess over ideal weight" than for men.

In addition, the current weight and physical performance standards are based on the norms of white males and do not take into account the diverse body types of different racial and ethnic groups, the study said.

The current military system restricts the permitted amount of weight based on the height of the individual, the study said. This fails to take into account the ratio of fat to muscle. As a result, a person who is extremely muscular could actually not meet the current military restrictions.

As an example, the report said that many professional football players would not be eligible for recruitment or retention by the military under these height-weight ratio standards.

The IOM committee recommended that the military devise physical performance tests that more directly measure a person's ability to handle jobs required in the services, such as lifting and carrying heavy weights. The committee said that the services should also consider establishing minimum standards that measure the lean-to-fat ratio in individuals.

IOM is an affiliate of the National Academy of Sciences, a private organization chartered by Congress that acts as an adviser to the federal government.

WW II 50TH ANNIVERSARY

Fifty years ago this week, reinforced Allied forces in New Guinea initially fell back before taking advantage of their recently gained air superiority, halting a Japanese attack approximately 30 miles short of its objective, Port Moresby.

Here, according to research by the Military History Division at Fort Benning, were the top news items of the week:

On Guadalcanal, Allied forces relied on effective U.S. artillery support to repel a series of major Japanese attacks at "Bloody Ridge." The Japanese withdrew after sustaining 1,200 casualties.

■

South of the equator, the German U-boat U-156 sank the oceanliner Laconia which carried Italian prisoners and the families of Allied servicemen. The U-board commander surfaced to help the survivors and sent radio messages to the Allies as to his intentions; however, Allied planes still attacked the U-boat. Consequently, German Adm. Karl Doenitz issued an order prohibiting further rescue attempts in similar situations. After the war, prosecutors at the War Crimes Trials in Nuremburg used this decision against Doenitz.

■

A "wolfpack" of 13 U-boats attacked Allied convoy ON-127, sinking 13 ships while suffering only minimal damage.

■

In North Africa, British units from the Long Range Desert Groups raided airfields at Benghazi and Barce. Additionally, Allied forces attempted a landing at Tobruk only to suffer heavy casualties in a failed effort.

■

In the Pacific, the Japanese submarine I-19 sank the destroyer USS Wasp and damaged the battleship USS North Caroline off the Solomon Islands.

■

Fort Benning contributed to the wartime metal salvage drive by intensifying post efforts. Post officials issued orders mandating the clearing of all war relics that had no definite historical value.

Experts to talk about young children

Discipline, self-esteem and learning styles of young children will be among the topics in a five-part free lecture series sponsored by the Fort Benning Schools.

Talks About Young Children will feature programs about children from infancy through age 5. Fort Benning parents, care-givers and educators may attend any or all of lectures, but a reservation for each session is required because space is limited. Children are not permitted to attend.

The first lecture of the series, "Emotional Development of Young Children and Discipline for Them," will be held 7-8:30 p.m. Wednesday, Sept. 23, at Dexter School. Dr. Barbara Howard, who opened last year's series, will discuss the emotional stages children go through.

She also will provide practical advice on discipline for young children. This advice includes ways to talk and listen to them and to promote children's understanding that they are lovable and capable.

Howard, a pediatrician, is an assistant professor of pediatrics at Duke University Medical Center in Durham, N.C.

Reservations, which will be taken from 8 a.m. to 4 p.m. through Friday, Sept. 18, or until the session is full, should be made by calling the schools' administration office, 545-2500.

This is the second year the Benning schools have sponsored the Talks About Young Children series. It was developed to address the national educational goal that children entering school be ready to learn.

CARDIAC AND DIABETIC GROUP: The Cardiac and Diabetic Support Group meeting will be held Monday, Sept. 21, at 6 p.m. in the Baugh Conference Room at Martin Army Community Hospital.

A bowling outing is planned for 5:30 p.m. on Sept. 22. For information contact Thomas E. Valitzski at 561-3077.

TABLE TENNIS TOURNAMENT: The Columbus Parks and Recreation Department will hold an annual Severn County Table Tennis Tournament on Saturday at the Pop Austin Gym on the Beallwood Connector.

The round-robin tournament will be broken down into three divisions: open, senior (over 45) and junior (under 18 or high school). The open divisions will award prize money of $100 first, $50 for second and $25 for third. The Senior division will award prize money of $50 for first, $25 for second and $15 for third. The junior division will award trophies to the top three finishers.

Entry fees are $8 for open division and $5 for senior division.

'Beverly Hillbillies' turns 30; joke was on television critics

From wire reports

NEW YORK — Another fall in TV Land. Shows premiere, reviewers call the new season the worst in memory, audiences squirm, and the schedule is in tatters by Groundhog Day.

It's a ritual so familiar it scarcely needs recounting.

But as the TV do-si-do kicks off for the 1992-93 season, it's worth recalling a footloose little sitcom from 30 seasons ago.

Premiering the week before Johnny Carson took over "The Tonight Show," this new CBS comedy was about a poor mountain family that scored a fast $25 million and split for the West Coast.

From the first twangs of its bluegrass title ballad, "The Beverly Hillbillies" sent critics into orbit like John Glenn.

"Too absurd to be even slightly amusing," sniffed one of them with the same dismay that snobby Mrs. Drysdale, the banker's wife, displayed toward the nouveau riche bumpkins who had landed in the estate next door.

Another critic glumly forecast that this, "the worst of the new season's entries," would be "the biggest hit of the lot." He was at least half right. That year this surprise smash was TV's No. 1 series, and would remain a hit for nearly its entire run. In fact, seven out of the 50 highest-rated TV programs of all time are "Beverly Hillbillies" episodes.

Meanwhile, the show, like the Clampetts' 1921 flatbed truck, will run forever in reruns. Some 274 half-hours' worth are currently syndicated in 55 cities, and the series is parked on the TBS schedule at 7:05 p.m. EDT Monday through Friday.

Now, on its 30th anniversary, "The Beverly Hillbillies" remains among the funniest, most inspired of all TV comedies — and yet one that even its fans still watch down their noses.

Sneer all you want to, you closet Jedheads. The lofty stature of a show as vilified as this one can hardly be in doubt. A series that in nine years never won an Emmy Award can't be all bad.

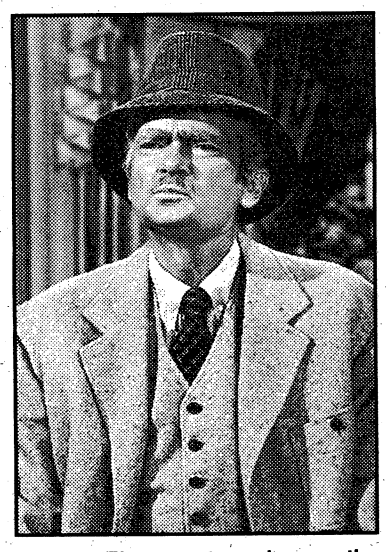
Granted, "The Beverly Hillbillies" is generally dismissed as a video synonym for "bleccchhhh."

Granted, even the man who put it on the air didn't like it.

"I HATED it," says Michael Dann, who 30 years ago was CBS vice president for programming. "After screening the pilot, I don't think I ever watched another segment."

But "The Beverly Hillbillies" is attuned to its times — then and now.

When the show premiered, public confidence in science and technology was literally sky-high. Progress was society's passion, and self-worth was gauged by the wheelbase of the family car. No wonder the Clampetts moved to Beverly Hills. With its luxury, glitz, and sprawling lawns, this was the ultimate expression of the American Dream.



Buddy Ebsen starred as the down-home family patriarch who didn't let his money go to his head.

But rather than a rags-to-riches story, here was a rags-AND-riches story. When the Clampetts reached the land of "swimming pools and movie stars," these scruffy newcomers enjoyed their wealth on their own simple, incorruptible terms.

Although boy-lug Jethro (Max Baer Jr.) was susceptible to Tinseltown's temptations, patriarch Jed (Buddy Ebsen) kept him and the rest of the family on a firm moral course. With her folk remedies and occult beliefs, irascible Granny (Irene Ryan) anticipated '90s currents ranging from alternative medicine to New Age crystals. And shapely tomboy Elly May (Donna Douglas) upheld gender equality before anyone ever heard of Gloria Steinem.

In retrospect, they seem downright progressive, those counterculture Clampetts. So was their show. Much more than gags about possum innards and fishing in the "cee-ment pond," "The Beverly Hillbillies" continues to tweak a foolish modern world that the Clampetts occupied without losing their souls.

Smirk if you must, but the Clampetts look smarter with every passing season. More than ever, the joke is on the rest of us.

Rangers learn to hang tough

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

Ranger training isn't all slithering around in the "jungles" of Florida or humping it through desert training in Texas. Rock and mountain climbing and learning how to patrol in the mountains also makes up roughly a third of a soldier's Ranger School education.

The mountain phase, taught at Camp Merrill in Dahlonega, Ga., starts out with the basics, taking up most of two days, learning to tie the knots necessary to making it up and down mountains, crossing streams and maneuvering in the high country, said 1st Lt. James Jarrard, the 5th Ranger Training Battalion's civil affairs/public affairs officer.

It's first things first at Dahlonega. Would-be Rangers spend nine or 10 hours here first, learning the knots that go with climbing, hauling cargo uphill and building rope bridges across rivers or streams, Jarrard said.

Building one and two-rope bridges takes a full day before these soldiers take to the rock faces and cliffs they must learn to maneúver to complete this 14-day phase of training.

The rope bridge results from a team operation that involves getting one or two ropes rigged across a stream so other team members can either walk or monkey-crawl across, keeping their weapons and gear — and hopefully, their bottoms — dry.

Only the first and last team members across the stream are permitted to get their bottoms wet. The first man over has to swim the stream, carrying the rope that will be secured to a tree or post on the other side as the first step in putting together a rope bridge. The last man across brings the rope with him, Jarrard said.

Knots are a big part of the initial phase of mountain training, and soldiers will spend about 12 hours learning that task so well that on the third day they should pass a "knot test" by successfully demonstrating the 12 knots they're required to know.

Yes, Jarrard said, some Ranger students get a "no go" on the knot test and have to go back and repeat that part of the mountain training cycle. They get two shots at knot-tying.

"Each (training) cycle we average 47 academic recycles out of about 264 people (in each class)," Jarrard said. "But the number has dropped since Lt. Col. (Brian) Pentecost came on board (as the battalion commander) in March."

In the accompanying photographs, Benning Patriot photographer Joe Maher records a Ranger School team's successful completion of a rope bridge and crossing of a creek at Camp Merrill.

Cpl. Earl Owens, the last man in his Ranger team to make it across the creek, has to do it on a one-rope bridge.

Duty in gulf turns into 'dull roar'

From wire reports

ABOARD THE USS INDEPENDENCE — U.S. naval and air force officers on this aircraft carrier said Tuesday patroling southern Iraq has become routine enough to warrant scaling back the operation, but that will take a political decision.

"We are in a dull roar. It's settled down in a nice routine," said Capt. Carter B. Refo, the commanding officer of the ship cruising the Persian Gulf.

Officers citing an unusual number of sloppy landings said many pilots were tired and bored after uneventful flights of up to seven hours.

Pilots from the Independence were flying over 105 missions during the first days of the operation after the air exclusion zone was declared Aug. 27 over southern Iraq to protect Shiite Muslims there from air attacks.

In Washington, the Pentagon said daily sortie rates ranged from 91 to 169 for both the Air Force and Navy. Officers have said it would drop when either the Air Force based in Saudi Arabia or the Navy pilots take a day off as each did over the weekend.

Officers said the Iraqi pilots probing the line had come within 5 miles but none of their actions appeared threatening.

"There are no high-speed dashes at the border that turn back," said Air Force Lt. Col. Thomas M. Jeffcoat, 41, of Phoenix, on the crew of an E-3 AWACs early warning and command aircraft.

Asked if the job could be done with just one AWACs and half the number of planes, Jeffcoat said, "I would hope so but that's a political decision."

He was aboard the Independence with eight Air Force colleagues for a day of meetings with their Navy counterparts.

Navy pilots said they are getting used to the rhythms of the extended flights of six or seven hours. But the flights have taken their toll both physically and in some landings.

"It feels like sitting in a Victorian rocking chair for six hours," said Cmdr. Perry D. Maxwell, 43, of Almira, Wash., the executive officer of an F/A-18 Hornet fighter-bomber squadron.

Officers said a number of pilots especially at night were causing warning lights to go off on the deck, indicating they were straying from the normal landing path.

Relief may come for the USS Independence in the form of the USS Ranger, an aircraft carrier due in the Persian Gulf by Sept. 15 at the latest. In the absence of any hostilities with Iraq, most officers expect the Independence will be allowed to sail for its home port of Yokosuka, Japan, but an official decision has not been announced.

6,500 troops to take part in Reforger

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — About 6,500 soldiers from the United States will participate in an annual exercise to practice moving troops and equipment to Europe, the Pentagon announced last week.

The exercise, "Reforger '92," will be held from Sept. 17 to Nov. 15.

Troops will deploy to Belgium, Luxembourg and Germany "to demonstrate U.S. resolve to meet NATO commitments and exercise the reception of equipment and personnel," a Pentagon statement said.

Units deploying from the United States include: the 1st Infantry Division Mechanized in Fort Riley, Kan., the 30th Separate Armor Brigade of the Tennessee National Guard and the 3rd Brigade of the 7th Infantry Division Light, Fort Ord, Calif.

A follow-up exercise, dubbed "Certain Caravan," will make use of long-distance computer simulation and will include German, British, and French units, who will square off against U.S. soldiers located at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., the statement said.

Women who served in Vietnam to be studied

Reproductive disorders reported

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — The government last week approved a study of reproductive disorders among the 9,000 women veterans who served in Vietnam.

A private company to be selected by the Department of Veterans Affairs will interview thousands of nurses and other women veterans in an attempt to pinpoint the reproductive health consequences of serving in Vietnam.

"We're going to look at the incidence of stillbirths, miscarriages, birth defects, cancer and other diseases," said the VA's Dr. Susan Mather, assistant chief medical director for environmental medicine and public health.

There have been lengthy delays in the project, which was mandated by Congress out of concern over potential Agent Orange contamination in Vietnam and "the effects of military service in often-exotic lands," said Mather.

Plans for one study were scrapped. It would have duplicated much of the work of earlier surveys of men and women Vietnam vets.

In its place, researchers studied deaths among groups of women Vietnam vets and women veterans who hadn't served in Vietnam.

They found women Vietnam vets had twice the death rate from cancer of the pancreas and uterus as women vets who hadn't served in Vietnam.

That pointed out the need for the new study. A third study is under way of post-traumatic stress disorder among women Vietnam vets.

Monitoring the work on reproductive histories of the women will be the VA Advisory Committee on Women Veterans, chaired by Shirley W. Menard of the University of Texas nursing school.

She and her husband were the first married military couple to serve together in Vietnam — she as a field hospital nurse and he as a mess sergeant.

A 1985 VA-commissioned survey found that women veterans — not just those who served in Vietnam — have twice the rate of cancer of the general adult female population.

And subsequent studies suggest women veterans have five times the rate of ovarian, cervical and uterine cancers, a finding that John F. King of the Vietnam Veterans of America calls "extraordinary ... it has all of us concerned and we need answers."

Persian Gulf veterans being monitored

From staff reports

To provide long-term monitoring of the health of Persian Gulf War veterans, Department of Veterans Affairs medical centers nationwide have begun a health surveillance program.

Desert Storm veterans concerned about the long-term health effects of serving in southwest Asia may visit any VA medical center to add their names to the Persian Gulf Registry and to get an examination. Veterans need not be experiencing any symptoms.

To schedule a visit at the Tuskegee, Ala., VA Medical Center, call (205) 727-0550, ext. 3140. Ask for an appointment to complete the Persian Gulf Registry. Appointments are scheduled at 8 a.m. (Central Time) Monday through Friday in Ambulatory Care, Building 83.

Soldiers protest cuts in Belgium

From wire reports

BRUSSELS, Belgium — About 3,000 career soldiers marched through the capital Monday to protest plans for a sweeping reduction of the Belgian army.

The government, seeking to reduce costs after the Cold War, decided in July to cut the army roughly in half, to an estimated 40,000 career soldiers by 1997. The move included the abolishment of conscription starting in 1994.

Unions fear the cuts will also force about 15,000 career soldiers to look for other jobs.

Museum exhibit pays homage to 'American Women in War'

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — Maj. Rhonda Cornum fractured both her arms during the Gulf War when her helicopter was shot down over Iraq and she was taken prisoner. In a photograph taken just after her release, she wears a bright yellow POW uniform and a sling on her left arm.

Both the uniform and the sling are now on display at the National Museum of American History in a small exhibit that marks the museum's first real attempt to call attention to the role of women in wartime.

The cavernous Armed Forces Hall two floors away documents America's military history in case after case of uniforms, weapons and military memorabilia. But women barely get a mention.

Their absence upsets curator Margaret Vining, who put together "American Women in War."

"Women's services have always been used during wartime," said Vining an expert in military history. "But their role hasn't always been recognized."

The new display is tucked far away from the rest of the military collection, in a dark and cluttered corner near Archie Bunker's chair and other popular TV memorabilia.

But Vining plans to change all that.

"I hope one day when we exhibit our different military uniforms, women will be right there alongside the men as they should be," she said.

Photographs of military women from World War I nurses to modern-day cadets line the walls of the display case, which also includes a Navy boatswain's maternity uniform and a Vivandiere uniform made for women who sold supplies to the troops during the Civil War.

That blue-and-red wool uniform, with its skirted jacket and trousers, was often worn by wives and daughters of Union volunteers at ceremonial parades. But one woman who wore it, Mary Tepe, accompanied her husband right to the front lines, where she witnessed 13 battles while distributing whiskey to the soldiers from a small keg strapped around her neck.

Tepe was awarded the Kearny Cross for her bravery in battle after she was wounded in Fredericksburg, Va., in 1862.

"The perception of women as always being protected and needing to be protected is not always true," said Vining. "In fact, the opposite has often been true."

Women did many behind-the-scenes jobs in the Civil War, from laundry to sewing to cooking, Vining said. In World War I, some were sent to France to serve as wartime telephone operators near the front. Others were members of the Army Nurse Corps, a permanent part of the Army since 1901.

Military relishes its mission of mercy

From wire reports

Secretary of Defense Dick Cheney said, "This has become a normal kind of activity for the military. We can do things that nobody else can do, and it's an activity we're happy to do — the troops enjoy it. . . . We are a disaster-relief agency."

MIAMI — Hurricane Andrew, the bully of South Dade, has given the U.S. military a fresh and welcome mission.

With the shrinking of the Soviet threat, the Pentagon's ability to aid those wracked by natural disasters has grown in importance, say defense experts.

"The Defense Department is not as busy as it used to be," said Lawrence J. Korb, the Pentagon's top logistics official during the Reagan administration. "It's a win-win situation. The military goes in, it helps people and builds up a lot of good will."

One day last week, U.S. Marine Pfc. Angelo Cruz came face-to-face with the new mission. As Cruz rounded a corner between two rows of tents, he spotted Crescencio Ruiz, a tearful 2-year-old trailing the rest of his family on its way to a new home made of canvas.

"Hey, little guy, what's the matter?" Cruz called out, kneeling and holding out an arm to the sobbing youngster. The child took a few tentative steps forward. "It's OK, now," Cruz cooed softly to the toddler. "It's OK."

Secretary of Defense Dick Cheney said, "This has become a normal kind of activity for the military. We can do things that nobody else can do, and it's an activity we're happy to do — the troops enjoy it. ... We are a disaster-relief agency."

The Pentagon has dispatched 22,000 troops, a Navy fleet, dozens of cargo planes and millions of pounds of food, medicine and supplies to South Dade.

It is deploying rock groups and Dixieland bands to strategic locations to lure scared survivors from their crumpled homes into safer, albeit temporary, Pentagon-supplied tents.

By all accounts, the Pentagon's effort here is the biggest non-combat U.S. military venture ever, eclipsing the 18,285 troops sent to aid the Kurds in northern Iraq last year. It has been so massive, and so successful, that some in Congress have proposed that the military take charge of all domestic emergencies.

"It is a new role, yet it's amazingly similar in many respects" to waging war, said Army Maj. Gen. Steve L. Arnold, commander of the 10th Mountain Division from Fort Drum, N.Y., who is running the Florida rescue operation from Homestead. "Instead of an enemy out there, there are people who need help," he said.

But Cheney and other Pentagon officials warn that it remains only a tiny part of their role. "We can't lose sight of the fact that our basic mission is a military one, and that military mission is the security of the country," Cheney said. "You don't want to do anything that detracts from that."

The 22,000 federal troops make up the largest military presence in South Florida since the tense days of the Cuban missile crisis a generation ago and constitute a force smaller than the one that invaded Panama in 1989 in Operation Just Cause.

The troops dispatched to South Dade represent less than 1 percent of the Pentagon's total personnel, and only about 5 percent of the American commitment to Operation Desert Storm.

Surprisingly, the Pentagon — whose procurement blunders of the 1980s generated a never-ending stream of jokes — now is being viewed in some quarters as a savior.

Sen. Barbara Mikulski, D-Md., who heads the Senate panel that funds the Federal Emergency Management Agency, suggested last week that the Pentagon might do a better job than FEMA of helping disaster-battered areas get back on their feet. "It is time for the confusion and chaos to end," she said.

But Korb is leery of any such plan. "You might end up with a general who sees a hurricane coming and has the 82nd Airborne dropping out of the sky even before the governor asks for help," he warned.

Medical unit goes to Florida

From staff reports

Eight members of the 926th Medical Detachment, a preventive medical unit, departed Fort Benning at 9:40 a.m. on Friday for the southern Florida disaster area. The 926th makes sure no diseases are present in an area — by killing bugs, inspecting meats, checking produce, etc.

Authorities on post anticipate no additional troop departures this weekend, but added that "anything is subject to orders."

The 926th Medical Detachment is a part of the 2nd Mobile Army Surgical Hospital at Fort Benning, which operates out of the 36th Engineer Group.

RECONSIDERING MEDIA #2

"We're discovering new ways to compete more effectively"

Making Newspapers Work Harder

Innovations in format and position result in success

By Wendy Falk Barsky

Frustrated!

That's how we felt about using newspapers as part of our media mix. Ad positioning and format restrictions made it about as flexible and exciting as a high school calculus teacher. Still, the demographics, time spent reading, editorial environment, timeliness, cost effectiveness and local environment were all hard to ignore.

Whether it be in media strategy meetings or creative brainstorming sessions, great ideas were whittled down to less-than-great executions as a result of newspapers' restrictions.

Often, alternatives to newspapers were used as a way to preserve innovative formats and positioning ideas. While we never sacrificed our media goals, we were let down to know we were missing out on some of the inherent advantages to newspapers.

We decided to find a way to make the medium work harder for us. We used our local paper, The (Louisville, Ky.) Courier-Journal, as our test situation. We went through a week's worth of papers and critiqued ad positioning, determining how it could work better for us. At the same time, we identified new areas that could be exciting places for ads.

We didn't let the format of the paper get in our way. Instead, we offered suggestions on how pages might offer various advertising opportunities.

Additionally, we contacted the American Association of Advertising Agencies and the Newspaper Advertising Bureau and received articles written on the subject of ad positioning. These stories led us to various newspapers, whose ad sales staffs were more than willing to share their tricks of the trade.

We spoke to Mike Kelley, promotions director at The Courier-Journal, to gain some additional insight into the newspaper business.

Armed with this information, we contacted Jim Marchal, vice president, advertising, at The Courier-Journal. To effectively present our ideas to him we needed to answer the question that was sure to loom in his mind: "'What's in it for me?"

We positioned ourselves as advocates for creativity and innovation whose ideas would spark excitement for current and potential advertisers. We challenged the newspaper to match the flexibility of TV and radio stations to meet advertisers' needs. Marchal seemed very receptive to our unconventional suggestions. We thought it would be some time before we knew whether any of them had a chance.

Our ideas included:

1) Franchise positions. This is often a key advantage for smaller fractionals. These positions often necessitate an upfront frequency commitment and an ad size restriction if one advertiser hopes for exclusivity. Because the space is continually an advertisement, the reader becomes aware of that particular spot. A successful experience with this format is the long-running Tiffany's ad, on high-profile Page 3 of The New York Times.

2) Islands. These positions possibly offer the advertiser the ultimate in creative flexibility. The island position in the middle of the New York Stock Exchange tables, pioneered by the Newspaper Advertising Bureau, is an exciting opportunity. Additionally, islands set up as a diagonal on a page, or simply floating amid editorial (perhaps across the middle of the fold), are always attractive to the advertiser.

3) Strip ads. While USA Today has done well with this concept on its weather page, we knew it could extend to other areas of The Courier-Journal, such as comics or main news.

4) Consecutive pages. While many advertisers (other than retail accounts) may not run two full pages or fractionals on one date, it would be worthwhile to offer the option of consecutive pages to facilitate the advertiser's creative needs and, quite possibly, extended dollars.

To our delight, Marchal not only responded to our proposals promptly, but also positively. While The Courier-Journal, a Gannett newspaper, has some standards to which it must adhere, it allowed the majority of our ideas to become reality.

To respond to this newfound freedom, we took several steps. First, we scheduled meetings with the account and creative groups to let them know the newspaper had just made a huge stride for local advertisers in Louisville. Second, we set up an agency intra-media department trafficking system to keep all department members abreast of developments and agreements with the paper. Third, each media team recommended new ways for their respective clients to use newspaper. Finally, we implemented a position-tracking report to remain current on how the program was working.

We found ways to facilitate our clients' needs through newspaper. For example, First National Bank of Louisville was the first advertiser to appear in an island position on the stock page.

The bank's CD campaign, in which newspaper was the only medium used, had to be cut short as a result of an unprecedented increase in sales—in just weeks. Another client, Churchill Downs, was able to run in the newspaper five days out of the week by using the cost-effective strip ads.

As time went on, many advertisers were taking advantage of The Courier-Journal's flexibility. Coincidentally Marchal left several months later to head the advertising efforts of all Gannett newspapers. We were ecstatic to see someone of his responsiveness rise to the top.

Excited!

That's how we feel about newspaper advertising in Louisville now. We're finding unconventional places for strip ads, zany ways to dress up the comics page and, most importantly, discovering new ways for our clients' businesses to compete more effectively through newspaper advertising.

Fast action. That's what you get when you advertise in newspapers. Only newspaper advertising gives you next day results — more traffic, more customers, more sales. When you want to move fast, make a fast move to newspapers.

You Can Find It All In Classified

FURNITURE

Mrs. Brown bought most of her furniture through the classifieds (except for the bunk beds left behind by Mr. and Mrs. Zorn when they moved to Mozambique).

CAR

The classifieds are the best place to shop for all kinds of automobiles. Mrs. Brown was happy to find that her new car was actually much larger than the attractive picture in the paper.

PET

The classified section is more than a directory —it's a zoo! When Mrs. Brown was searching for the perfect miniature horse, she found it in the classifieds (it was purely coincidental that Widget's coat happened to match the living room couch).

APPLIANCES

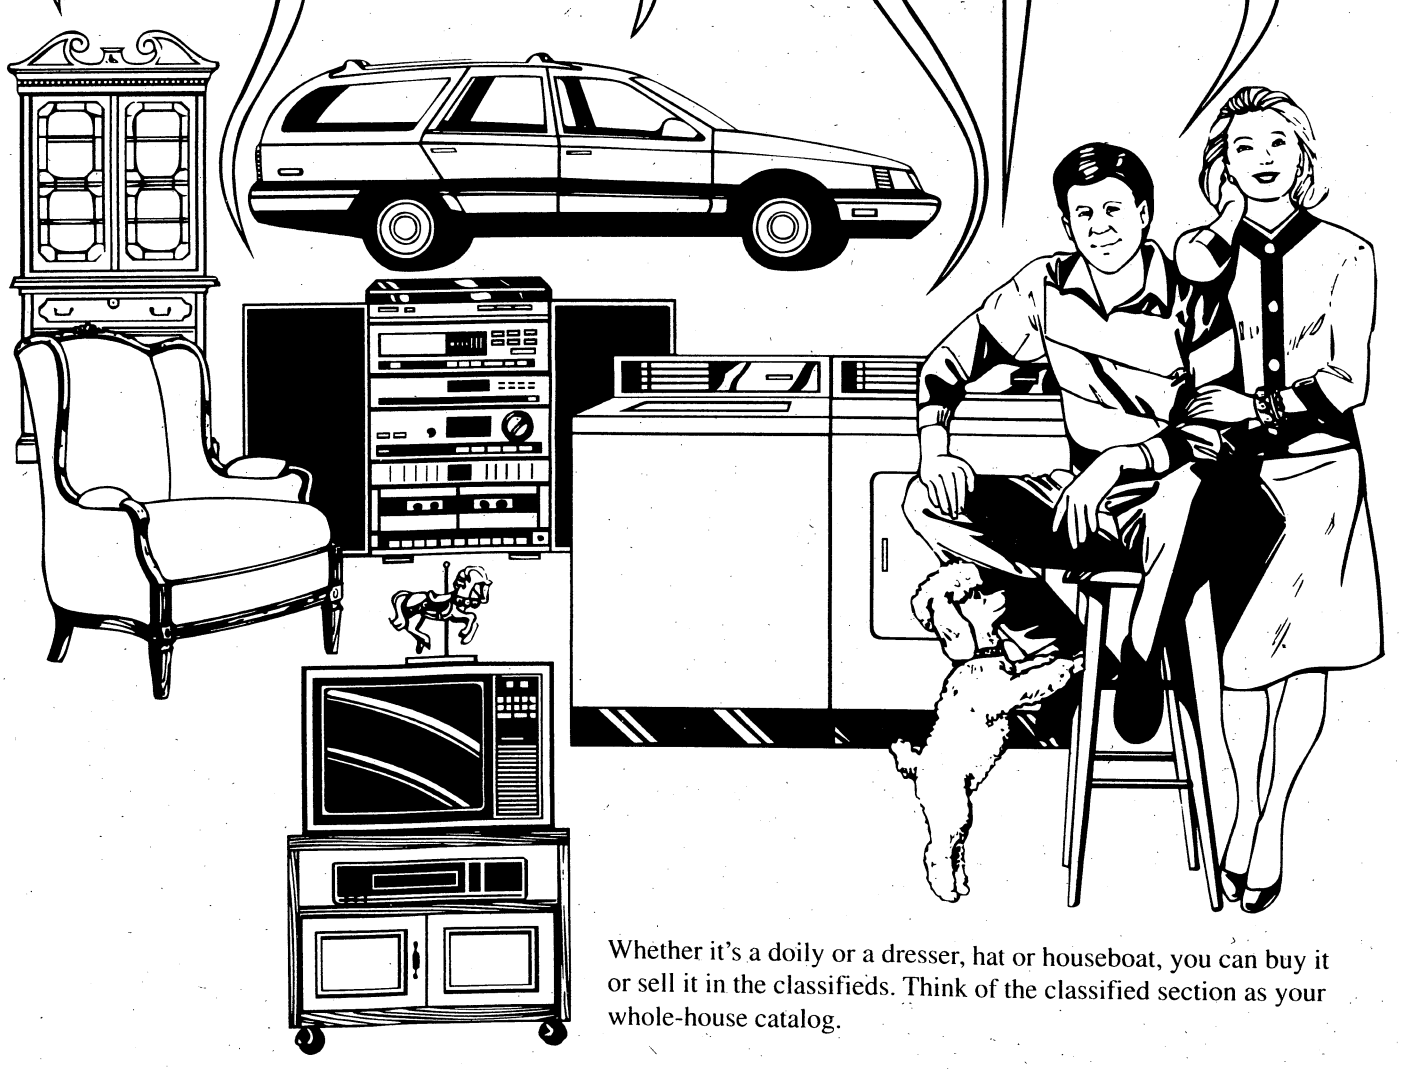
When Mrs. Brown wanted to trade her scooter for either a washer or dryer, she took a spin through the classifieds.

ELECTRONICS

Cameras, stereo components and more—they're all in the classifieds. Prices are so reasonable that Mrs. Brown has set a new goal for herself—to buy one television for each cable channel.

HUSBAND

When Mrs. Brown read her husband's personal ad in which he mentioned his fondness for Bach, bagels and boats, she knew it was true love. Neighbors now refer to them as the Fugue, the Round . . . the Marinas.



Whether it's a doily or a dresser, hat or houseboat, you can buy it or sell it in the classifieds. Think of the classified section as your whole-house catalog.

Gas-hog Americans ignoring lessons of war

WASHINGTON — "Desert Storm" may have been the official title of the campaign to liberate Kuwait and its 500 oil wells, but unofficially it was dubbed "The First Oil Crusade" by the troops.

David Evans

"We are here because of the failure of our country's energy policy," remarked an officer of the 197th Mechanized Infantry Brigade as we stood in the blazing sun at the port of Dammam, Saudi Arabia, watching his outfit's armored vehicles drive ashore. That was in the buildup phase, in the fall of 1990.

Among his gripes: the resurgent popularity of eight-cylinder engines in American autos.

Why not? Unleaded regular gasoline that sells for $1.19 a gallon in this area is cheaper than the $2.84 price for a gallon of major-brand soda pop. Unlike cola, ever more of the crude oil for gasoline is imported.

"We are losing control of our destiny," declared Joseph Romm, a scientist at Rocky Mountain Institute, an energy think-tank in Snowmass, Colo. For details, read his book out this month, "The Once and Future Superpower," where Romm makes a strong case that energy, the environment and jobs are not in conflict. It's a myth that hazards all three, he asserts.

You get the short version of his thesis here. In a telephone interview, Romm said that before the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait, the U.S. was importing about 2 million barrels of oil daily from the Persian Gulf.

"In the seven months prior to the gulf war our total imports (worldwide) reached 50 percent of consumption, the highest ever," he said.

Today, America imports about 1.8 million barrels a day from the Persian Gulf, and its overall dependency on foreign crude is a shade over 50 percent.

The annual fuel bill is about $45 billion, about $10 billion of which flows to the princes of Araby. They live in palaces veneered with marble on the outside, while potholes here have become the jarring symbol of a nation deep in hock.

Under the Bush energy strategy, America's dependence on foreign oil grows to around 60 percent by the end of this decade. This could be "best case."

"The Bush plan assumes that the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge (in Alaska) is open for exploration and that oil is found," Romm said.

If so, the imported-energy bill grows less slowly, to "only" $80 billion a year in scarce capital siphoned out of the country. For the total diversion of resources, add another $60 billion per annum for the cost of military forces earmarked for Persian Gulf contingencies.

"It is a grotesquely inefficient strategy," said Romm.

If we think of America as a person with a heart condition, the plan is to ream out the arteries every so often to keep the pipelines open, but the patient is never urged to change his diet.

In fact, all talk of an energy diet has been dropped. Romm pointed out that in February 1991, then-Secretary of State James Baker highlighted the need for reduced American dependence on foreign oil among the five big challenges he saw for the postwar new order.

In President Bush's victory speech to Congress a month later, he listed just four post-gulf-war challenges.

Romm said, "The fifth challenge — reducing energy dependence — had quietly vanished."

We must begin somewhere, and Romm suggested a gas tax of 25 cents a gallon to encourage conservation and fuel efficiency. Income taxes could be slackened to compensate. Romm's proposal seems positively modest compared to the dollar-a-gallon hike suggested by a recent Carnegie Endowment agenda, pointedly titled "Changing Our Ways," to stimulate greater energy productivity.

The annual fuel bill is about $45 billion, about $10 billion of which flows to the princes of Araby. They live in palaces veneered with marble on the outside, while potholes here have become the jarring symbol of a nation deep in hock.

Productivity includes wasting less. For example, Romm said the Energy Department could establish School Energy Banks to fund energy retrofits. He cited the case of the Iowa school district that recently invested $44,000 in energy improvements and saved $23,000 the first year — enough money to hire another teacher.

Government-funded research could be accelerated to develop more energy-efficient appliances, machines and autos. That could stimulate private capital, where a $1 million investment to manufacture these products would generate nine jobs, compared to 1.4 jobs for the same money invested in the oil and gas industry, Romm estimated.

The extra tax money paid at the pump stays here, funding the re-establishment of American scientific and manufacturing leadership, which in 1980 led the world in every renewable energy technology, and now leads in none. Zero, according to Romm.

Absent such steps, the price of soda pop relative to gasoline suggests that Americans value caffeine more than energy security, and they're prepared to fight the Second Oil Crusade to prove it.

Your military paper has exceeded our expectations

Al Johnson

The Benning Patriot is one year old. Actually, the newspaper is one year and almost two weeks old.

The period between September 6, 1991, and today has been exciting and challenging. Employees of the Columbus Ledger-Enquirer and The Benning Patriot have met and gotten to know many people — readers and non-readers, advertisers and non-advertisers, news sources and subjects — in the Fort Benning community.

This seems an appropriate time to briefly recap the year and to thank you for accepting the newspaper.

We have witnessed and written about many events. We have introduced readers to many newsworthy and interesting personalities. We have examined many issues.

To mention some of the stories:

■ We met Staff Sgt. Eddie Smith, a scout platoon sergeant with the 1st Battalion, 18th Infantry, who decided to stay with the Army longer than expected after some rewarding experiences during Desert Storm.

■ We followed the departure of former post commander Maj. Gen. Carmen Cavezza and the arrival of current commander Maj. Gen. Jerry A. White. Later, we published an interesting and extensive interview with Gen. White.

■ We examined the issue of maintenance and repair backlogs on post amounting to $200 million.

■ We introduced to you Mary Renteria, information program officer with the International Student Training Detachment of the U.S. Army Infantry School, and told you of her efforts in coordinating a program designed to educate foreign soldiers about America.

■ We told you of the civilian employees who lost their jobs at Fort Benning because of the reduction-in-force program.

■ We sat in on demolitions training conducted by the Combined Arms Division of the Combined Arms and Tactical Directorate.

■ We kept you informed about a local veterans group's push for improved medical services.

■ We profiled Cpl. Tracy Moorman, a clerk who was named Noncommissioned Officer of the Year for 1991.

■ We dropped in on retired Col. John D. Fuller, the former outspoken chief of staff who is now manager of First Union National Bank's Fort Benning branch.

■ We traveled with troops from the 3rd Brigade, 24th Infantry Division as they underwent exercises at the Army's National Training Center at Fort Irwin, Calif.

■ We kept you informed during the Rangers' 50th anniversary, celebrated by nearly 250 Ranger veterans of battles from World War II to Desert Storm.

Last September, we promised you that The Benning Patriot would be informative and entertaining, and that the newspaper would offer the most complete and comprehensive report of military news available in the region.

We think we have met that promise. Your comments and reactions indicate we have hit the target.

We have been pleased with the support received from you, our readers. We sincerely appreciate that support. We appreciate also the suggestions and feedback you have offered, and the challenges you have issued.

We also have been pleased with the support from local businesses, our advertisers. The responses of businesses to the tabloid have been, in a word, outstanding.

Dick Stone, Ledger-Enquirer advertising director, says:

"Our retail and classified advertising success has been extraordinary for a new product. We have exceeded our expectations throughout the first 12 months of The Benning Patriot.

Stone adds:

"The excellent news for the advertising community is that The Benning Patriot works. We have had many testimonials from advertisers who have found the newspaper an excellent source to reach not only the military market but the civilian Columbus and Phenix City markets as well.

"Our delivery through 150 rack locations throughout the community, home delivery in South Columbus, distribution on post and home delivery via mail on post has made The Benning Patriot an excellent product — one that is well read and one that the advertisers believe in."

We are not resting with our success. We will continue to grow.

We will continue to deliver the best and most complete offering of news about issues that affect military personnel and retired military personnel, profiles of military people, reports of military actions and government actions affecting the military, news about military benefits and pay, reports of training, news about education on post, coverage of entertainment on and off post and sports and recreation reports.

We invite you to let us know when we fall short of expectations.

We invite you also to let us know of stories you would like to see in The Benning Patriot. We welcome comment on issues through letters to the editor.

We want the newspaper to be one in which you, our readers, participate.

Al Johnson is executive editor of the Columbus Ledger-Enquirer.

Benning still in running for quality award

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

Fort Benning and Fort Sill, Okla., have been selected as the two top "extra large" Training and Doctrine Command posts still in the running for a $1.5-million award from the Department of Defense.

Those posts, rated at having populations in excess of 30,000, are among 26 posts still contending for the Army's "Community of Excellence Award." If the local post finishes only among the top seven, to be named by next summer, it will still mean $1 million in cash for Fort Benning. The money would go to "quality of life" and "customer service" functions on post, officials said.

The award is based largely on how well the post is serving its "customers" — Army troops, dependents, taxpayers and retirees in the area, said Gene Cottle, chief of the Resource Analysis and Documentation Division under Fort Benning's Directorate of Resource Management.

Fort Benning and Fort Sill were among five "extra large" TRADOC posts in the competition. The others were Fort Knox, Ky., Fort Bliss, Texas, and Fort Gordon, Ga.

Cottle's office oversees the Communities of Excellence programs, and Sarah McLaney of that office is the installation coordinator.

She said Fort Benning was named one of TRADOC's best big posts in 14 categories, ranging from family support services to Morale, Welfare and Recreation activities, following a July visit by a TRADOC evaluation team.

Team members looked at everything from how well the Follow Me Golf Course serves enlisted soldiers compared to officers to how well the public affairs office does its job and how smoothly the civilian pay office operates.

They also saw a lot of "fluff and buff" that was added in the last few days before the visit, but McLaney said the team really wasn't interested in how pretty new grass was or how much had been recently cut. "What they really wanted to know is 'what are you doing for the soldier?'" she said.

"They said show us your best" operations and best ways of doing things, and Fort Benning did, McLaney said.

Now she has to sit down and do a 31-page packet aimed at trying to convince an all-Army evaluation team that Fort Benning "has a lot of great things going on" and should be among the top finalists.

She'll find out by Oct. 1 what the TRADOC team found particularly outstanding about Fort Benning operations, McLaney said. But she and Cottle have already been told that the post ranked high in its of use of volunteers in various efforts and in "strategic planning" for the future.

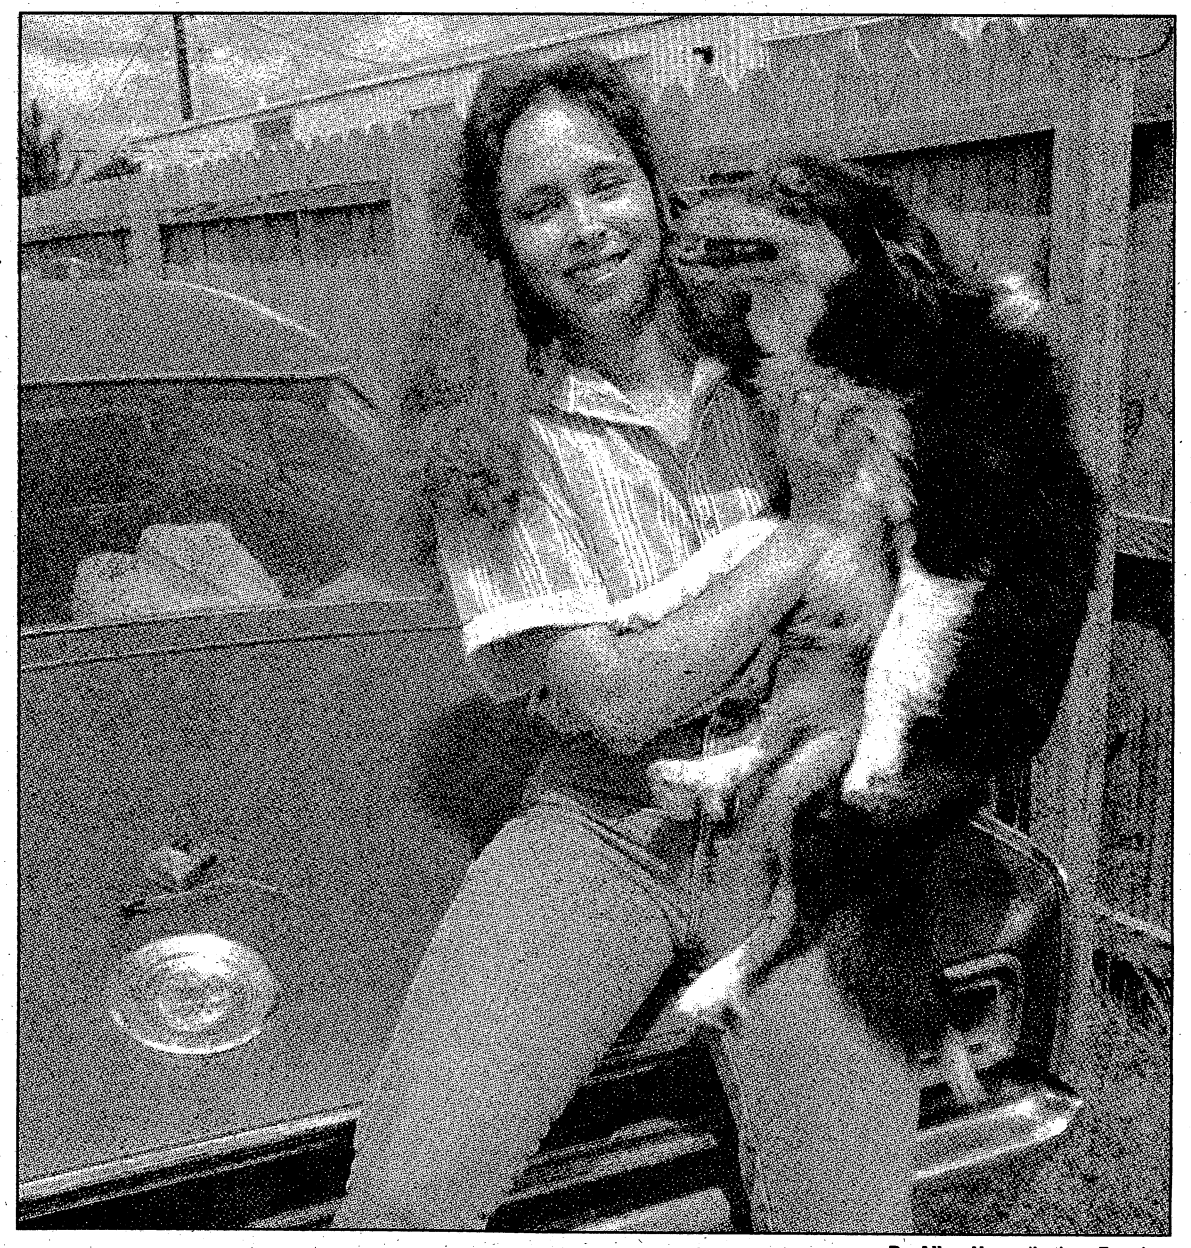
Medic pictures herself caring for the animals



By Allen Horne/Ledger-Enquirer

Hollie Vallance has gone from duty in Desert Storm to plotting an Army career in veterinary medicine.

By Linda Bosley Dailey
Staff Writer

Sgt. Hollie Vallance's new patients probably won't be able to tell her where it hurts as clearly as have those she's treated in the last four years.

After four years of being an active duty Army medic and caring for humans, Vallance is preparing to go to school to become an animal health care specialist — that is, a veterinary assistant.

Vallance is a member of the 324th Forward Support Battalion of the 3rd Brigade, 24th Infantry Division, and served in Operations Desert Shield and Desert Storm. She deployed to southwest Asia with her unit in August 1990, just seven weeks after giving birth to her first child, a daughter, Cheyenne.

Vallance's name may not be well-known, but her image may be familiar. A picture of her saying goodbye to her daughter just before the 324th deployed to southwest Asia was published around the world.

The picture, shot by Ledger-Enquirer photographer Allen Horne, captured Vallance in her battle dress uniform, helmet on her head and rifle on her shoulder, holding the baby tightly against her chest and pressing her lips against the top of the infant's head. Her husband, Anthony Kirk, looks on.

Vallance made it home safely from the war. And their daughter — "a monster," Vallance laughingly calls her, — is now 2 years and 2 months old.

But the picture has not brought her lingering fame. "Nobody recognizes me," she said. And the appearance of Vallance in uniform that day — with long brown hair tucked under her helmet and wearing glasses — differs markedly from her appearance in civilian clothes — hair loose and wearing slim-legged blue jeans and contact lenses.

For Vallance, veterinary training is a way of merging her civilian and military interests. She's long been interested in veterinary medicine, but she wants, too, to make the Army a career.

"I've always wanted it (a career in veterinary medicine). When I first came in the Army, I didn't know that they had veterinary assistants. Then when I found out that they did, I've been trying to change my MOS (military occupational specialty) ever since then," she said. When she finally got the approval last spring, she re-enlisted for three years.

Vallance begins the nine-week school at Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington, D.C., on Oct. 2. From there she will be assigned to Fort Monmouth, N.J., for two years, she said.

Becoming a veterinary assistant may also be the first step toward another career goal — becoming a veterinarian. She hopes to begin taking college courses while at Fort Monmouth so she can first complete a bachelor's degree and later pursue a doctor of veterinary medicine degree.

Still, she'd like to make the Army a career. If she can become a veterinarian before she retires, she'll be able to get a direct commission as a captain and stay in the Army for 30 years, Vallance said.

Already, she has four years of active duty service behind her, all of which has been spent at Fort Benning.

Vallance joined the Army Reserve in 1986. Two years later, she went active duty and was assigned to Fort Benning.

On her first leave after getting assigned to the 324th, Hollie Vallance went home and married Anthony Kirk.

A native of Galien, Mich., a small farming town in the southwest part of the state, Vallance, 23, grew up on a farm where she had many opportunities to exercise her interest in animal medicine.

"I've delivered everything from pigs, cows, horses, dogs, cats. I've stitched up rabbits, taken stitches out of my horse. I give my dog his own shots," she said.

But as an Army medic, Vallance has never treated any American soldiers for combat wounds. While at war in southwest Asia, she treated Iraqi prisoners of war and civilians, she said.

Only two soldiers out of the 3rd Brigade were wounded during combat, she said, but she didn't treat them.

Vallance advanced with the 2nd Battalion, 69th Armor Regiment, and once got close enough to the fighting to see the tracer rounds flying through the night sky. And the next morning she saw Iraqi vehicles still burning from the battle.

"I learned not to take my freedom for granted after being over there," Vallance said. "You learn that you're not immortal, too," she added.

"Once the (ground) war was over, and it only lasted two or three days, it was hard to believe we'd been through that," she said. But the brevity of the war strengthened her confidence in the U.S. military.

"It gave me a lot of faith in our armed forces — (the way they) kicked butt," she said.

Vallance's name may not be well-known, but her image may be familiar. A picture of her saying goodbye to her daughter just before the 324th deployed to southwest Asia was published around the world.

Leaving her daughter at 7 weeks of age to go to war, though, was "absolute hell," Vallance said, and she cried every night the first month she was in Saudi Arabia.

But if she ever gets called to war again, Vallance thinks she'll handle it much better than she did before. "You hate to go but you have to go," she said.

Leaving her daughter and husband for a month at a time is something to which Vallance has had to adjust. Just this summer, she spent one month in the field for Victory Focus training here at Fort Benning, and another month training in the California desert at the National Training Center.

Overall, Vallance said, she likes the Army. And if her daughter someday wants to become a soldier, she said, that's fine with her.

Sgt. Hollie Vallance

Age: 23.

Hometown: Galien, Mich.

Job: Medic, 324th Forward Support Battalion, 3rd Brigade, 24th Infantry Division.

On her prior experience in animal health care: "I lived on a farm (growing up). I've delivered everything from pigs, cows, horses, dogs, cats. I've stitched up rabbits, taken stitches out of my horse. I give my dog his own shots."

On being transferred to Fort Monmouth, N.J.: "I'm looking forward to it. It's up north. I'm from the north. I'm looking forward to the weather and winter and a white Christmas. I miss snow in the wintertime a lot."

On getting a stateside assignment after school: "We got lucky on that."

On going to war: "I learned not to take my freedom for granted."

On the brevity of the ground war in Iraq: "It gave me a lot of faith in our armed forces — (the way they) kicked butt."

Volunteers tutor a precious resource

By Jerry Rutledge
Patriot Editor

The effort, said Kathy Cray, is a matter of taking care of a valuable resource for the future. In this case the resource isn't a precious metal — it's children. Cray, the wife of Lt. Col. John Cray, commander of 2nd Battalion (IOBC), 11th Infantry Regiment, led a group of second lieutenants' wives with her Saturday to help out in the Combined Communities of Southeast Columbus' tutorial program.

"The children are our most precious resource," said Cray. "If we can help keep one child in school when he or she otherwise would have been a dropout, we will have accomplished a lot."

Cray's group was part of a very diverse group of volunteers who tutored children from pre-school to eighth grade at Eastway Elementary Saturday morning. The tutors ranged in background from the officers' wives to members of a black fraternity, Alpha Phi Alpha, to elders from the Mormon Church to teen-agers from Columbus high schools like Carver and Pacelli.

"If we can help keep one child in school when he or she otherwise would have been a dropout, we will have accomplished a lot," said Cray.

Lonnie Jackson, who founded CCSC a decade ago and coordinates the program, says the diversity is intentional.

"Our program brings people together for a common goal," said Jackson. "We have people from all over town — blacks, whites, Chinese, Korean, Indian, we try to bring them all in. If people work together and get to know each other, maybe we can eliminate misunderstandings between races and different cultures."

The mix is different each week. Fraternities and sororities rotate, as do other groups and volunteers. The basic program, however, remains the same — intensive help with educational needs with a taste of cultural diversity. Jackson said the program tries to include an hour and 45 minutes of education (math, reading, writing) with 15 minutes of language such as Korean or even a little Russian.

Tonya Douglas, a senior at Carver High School, said helping young children gives her a lot of satisfaction. "Education is so important. It makes you feel really good to see someone make progress with your help," she said. Douglas added that young tutors are very helpful. "Sometimes it's easier for them to relate to someone closer to their own ages."

Cray, an elementary and kindergarten teacher who decided not to work when her husband took command of the 2nd Battalion, 11th Regiment, said the work helped her sharpen her skills.

"I can't think of a better way to spend my time," she said. "We try to encourage the wives of officers in the battalion to get out and do work in the community. The time we invest in programs like this is like making an investment in our future. That's very rewarding."

Most of Georgia's bases feeling budget pinch

From wire reports

VALDOSTA, Ga. — While Hurricane Andrew has given Moody Air Force Base a boost, other military installations in Georgia are battling cutbacks.

Moody is one of a handful of Georgia's 13 military installations to get good economic news in this era of defense budget cuts.

Other posts, and defense contractors, have started laying off workers in an industry that brought in $5.78 billion last year to the state.

Fort Benning announced last week that it anticipates losing 14,000 troops in the next 18 months. Fort Stewart and Hunter Army Airfield near Savannah have already lost 234 civilian jobs.

And Hughes Georgia Inc., which makes infrared guidance systems for the discontinued Maverick air-to-surface missile, has already eliminated 150 jobs at its LaGrange plant.

Other defense contractors, including Marietta-based Lockheed Aeronautical Systems Co., are not optimistic about the future.

"The next five years have considerably farther to go in reductions in the defense budget," said H. Bard Allison, Lockheed's executive vice president.

"The next five years have considerably farther to go in reductions in the defense budget," said H. Bard Allison, Lockheed's executive vice president.

At Moody, however, Georgia's southernmost military base in Valdosta, business is about to boom again following the destruction of Homestead Air Force Base in Florida by Andrew.

Two squadrons of F-16 jets and their support personnel from the 31st Fighter Wing at Homestead were temporarily assigned to Moody.

President Bush has pledged to rebuild the south Florida base, but Valdosta officials are hoping the two wings will become a permanent addition.

"There's lot of speculation whether the Air Force will rebuild Homestead Air Force Base at a time when the defense budget is being cut," Barnett Banks economist Mark P. Vitner said.

Eighteen months ago, the Valdosta area faced the loss of 5,000 jobs and $100 million from the local economy when the Pentagon announced plans to close Moody. But a community effort persuaded defense officials to spare the base and its wing of F-16s.

Now Moody is getting another reprieve — 42 jets worth $14 million each, 1,144 Air Force personnel and as many as 1,500 dependents from Homestead, bringing as much as $17 million to the area.

The biggest impact will be on housing and schools.

On-base housing won't be able to handle the influx of people, who already have started arriving, said W. Parker Greene, deputy director of the Moody Support Committee that lobbied to save the base.

"We're looking for housing as far out as 50 miles," he said.

An additional 1,000 students will enter Lowndes County schools, said Superintendent Leon Pate. That may mean hiring new teachers, he said.

Local businesses are being urged to resist price gouging and to help the new arrivals, many of whom lost everything in the storm, said Gil Harbin of the local Chamber of Commerce.

"The test of the character of this community is rising to meet the challenge without being gleeful about it," Harbin said.

Georgia's other posts also are trying to expand their operations.

Robins Air Force Base is the new main operating base for sophisticated radar planes first used in the Gulf War, bringing $124 million in construction and 1,500 new workers to the Macon area.

Kings Bay submarine base houses five Trident submarines and Congress has appropriated funds to add one more during each of the next five years. Employment has doubled since 1989, said spokesman Bob Steller.

"On a case-by-case basis, depending on the military's needs, the realignment may in fact see increases in troop strength" in Georgia, said Patrick O'Brien of the Pentagon's Office of Economic Adjustment.

Jobs in the defense sector have dropped by a million

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — The number of Americans employed in the defense sector has dropped by nearly 1 million since 1985, the peak year for Pentagon spending, according to a congressional report Tuesday.

The General Accounting Office said that defense employment, from its zenith of more than 6.4 million uniformed, civilian and contractor workers in 1985, will drop to about 5.5 million by next year.

"Everyone loves the peace dividend except defense workers," said Rep. Curt Weldon, R-Pa., who released the report. "For them, the peace dividend is a pink slip. . . . We must not cut too far, too fast."

In 1985, the Pentagon had 2.2 million men and women in uniform and employed 1.1 million civilian workers, the GAO said, citing Defense Department figures. Defense-related employment in private industry totaled 3.1 million that year, the agency said.

Using projected spending figures for fiscal 1993, which begins Oct. 1, the GAO said the Pentagon will have 1.8 million personnel in uniform and 958,000 civilian workers. Defense-related industrial jobs will total about 2.7 million, the report said.

The GAO said its figures do not include employment by defense subcontractors.

Defense spending authority has fallen from $376 billion in 1985, the peak year of the Reagan administration's defense buildup, to a requested $268 billion next year.

First American GI in Europe for WWII relives arrival

From wire reports

BELFAST, Northern Ireland — The first American soldier to arrive in Europe for World War II retraced his steps in Northern Ireland last week, and another GI repaid a debt of cookies in England.

"I can still remember that cookie to this day. It was as big as my hand and tasted great."

Milburn Henke, 74, was officially designated the first American soldier to join the war when he disembarked in Belfast on Jan. 26, 1942, and was hailed by a British official as "a gloomy portent" for Hitler.

Hugh O'Neill, the chairman of the Northern Ireland Tourist Board, which is sponsoring Henke's visit, welcomed him back Sept. 11.

"On a misty day 50 years ago elements of the U.S. 34th Infantry Division came ashore at Pollock Dock and Dufferin Dock.

"The first 3,900 GIs, led by Pfc. Milburn Henke, from Hutchinson, Minn., disembarked to the tune of 'The Star-Spangled Banner,'" O'Neill said.

Henke said it was just chance that a lieutenant on board his troop ship, the Strathaird, chose him to go ashore, where he was photographed and interviewed.

When the thousands of other GIs finally disembarked they were met by Sir Archibald Sinclair, the British secretary for air. "Your safe arrival here marks a new stage in the world war," he told the soldiers. "It is a gloomy portent for Mr. Hitler."

Meanwhile in northern England, former combat engineer Basil Giameo, 70, of Concord, N.H., repaid a debt incurred in 1944 in Nantwich, 160 miles north of London.

Giameo said a clerk in a bakery refused to sell him cookies because he did not have a ration coupon.

"A little old lady at the back of the queue said, 'You can have mine, Yank.' I was taken aback by her kindness," said Giameo, who handed out 5,000 cookies at senior citizen homes on Friday. "This is my way of repaying her generosity.

"I can still remember that cookie to this day. It was as big as my hand and tasted great."

Man finds Army buddy he thought died in battle

From wire reports

DOUGLASVILLE, Ga. — After 47 years, a Douglasville man has been reunited with an Army buddy he thought had died in the Battle of the Bulge during World War II.

"When you live in a hole with a person, you get to know him pretty well," Joseph McBurnett said of his old foxhole partner, Cramer Sexton. "But I tried to put it out of my mind because I knew he was dead."

McBurnett was on a snowy Belgian mountain during a battle with the Germans when he thought he saw Sexton die.

Moments later, with what he thought was his best friend's blood on his jacket sleeve, McBurnett was captured.

Until last week, the 65-year-old had stifled memories of the war and prison camp. Then Sexton tracked him down, traveling from Boise, Idaho, to see his old buddy.

"I never gave up looking for him," Sexton said. "I wasn't gonna ever be satisfied until I found a document that pronounced him dead. I got a list that said he was taken prisoner, so that gave me more hope."

The two attended jump school for the 82nd Airborne Division together. McBurnett was only 16 but told Army recruiters he was 18 because he needed a job.

They were sent to join Gen. George Patton's offensive in Belgium.

Normally, Sexton helped McBurnett load the firearms and McBurnett took aim. But on Jan. 7, 1945, Sexton was pinned down by machine-gun fire several feet away. McBurnett didn't have time to look at the man who was helping him load, and when that man was shot, he assumed it was his friend.

Sexton didn't know it, but his friend was captured and thrown into a German prison camp, where he spent five months before escaping.

A few days later, Sexton was severely injured in a mine field.

"A piece of shrapnel went through my knee. I saved myself when I put a leather belt around my leg," he said.

Sexton was rescued and flown home. As soon as he recovered, he began searching for McBurnett.

Sexton had called the Army, and found out only that his friend had been captured.

But through the years, his search was repeatedly frustrated. McBurnett's file at the Veterans Administration had been destroyed in a fire. Sexton took out repeated ads in veterans publications, to no avail.

Then, two weeks ago, a friend of McBurnett saw one of the ads and called Sexton. He arrived in Douglasville last week.

NCO Academy may face changes

Regular Army could take over training

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

It takes some people longer than others to make it through the Army's various noncommissioned officer academies.

It may take U.S. Army Reserve and National Guard members a year to get through courses required by the 2nd Army NCO Academy at Fort Benning, says Sgt. Major Larry D. Martin, the academy's director of instruction. Command Sgt. Maj. Thomas B. Jackson is the commandant.

Most of the instructors are Army Reservists and National Guard noncommissioned officers, but that could change with the drawdown of the Army and more emphasis on keeping Reserve and National Guard units trained closer to regular Army standards.

That's Martin's opinion, and he's the man that runs the course of instruction here. There are 79 slots allotted to this training cadre and 20 of those are active-duty guardsmen or reservists. There's only one regular Army slot on the staff. The others are "Weekend Warriors" who spend their two weeks of annual training doing the teaching at this school which sits back in Fort Benning's woods near the Ranger Training Brigade.

Sometimes that's like using "summer hires and Christmas help" for training, Martin acknowledges. The school runs on a budget of about $2.25 million a year, but still basically has to scrounge for transportation. "We essentially do our own transportation (by borrowing from other units) or we walk," he said.

This is one of five academies across the country where Reserve and National Guard troops get intensive instruction in subjects ranging from map reading to how to handle inspections or conduct physical training drills. Those are among the courses that will qualify soldiers for promotion to sergeant. Some may have already reached the E-5 pay grade by the time they arrive here for the basic course, but that's supposed to change for Reserve and National Guard troops next month.

There are a variety of courses taught here, the most basic being the Primary Leadership Development Course, now a requirement for specialists before they can achieve the NCO ranks. "The courses are very intense here," says Martin. The PLDC, for example, is crowded into 15 days for these citizen-soldiers. For regular Army types, it takes four weeks.

But there are also upper level courses for NCOs as advanced as first sergeant, for example, on mounted land navigation and what mid-to-upper-grade NCOs must know to fill different staff jobs, ranging from personnel to training, which means students here can range in age from the early 20s into their mid-50s.

"There's a great effort going on at the highest levels of the Army looking at reserve training," Martin said. "It's a continuing problem to train the Reserves to have the kind of proficiency you want them to have when they only have 50 something days a year to train." One solution that's being looked at is the Regular Army taking over Reserve training, Martin said.

One of the things that's being looked at locally is consolidating reserve and regular Army NCO training under the active duty academy here, he acknowledges. Such talk is "a lot of rhetoric right now," Martin said, "but I would suspect you'll see a lot of changes (by fiscal 1994) in how we'll run reserve component training."

This academy pushes through 2,000 to 3,000 weekend warriors a year from the southeastern states which make up the 2nd Army's geographical area — the 81st Army Reserve Command at East Point, Ga. — and that's who this Benning tenant unit answers to. You can tell it's a tenant unit when you sometimes see sergeants first class and master sergeants cutting the grass and cleaning out from under the wooden barracks that house the academy's students, Martin points out.

Courses here "cover the same material (as new regular Army noncommissioned officers get at their NCO schools), but the duration is shortened and they are extremely intensive," Martin said.

The courses are tailored to be crammed into Guard and Reservists' two-week annual training. But that doesn't mean a reservist can finish the NCO course in two weeks — that may take a year, with most of the training coming during weekends at a training center near a reservist's home. After that "we try to do the performance evaluation part of it here," Martin said. "We have the training areas to take them to the field to do their training exercises and that part of it."

Martin has nine years in the Reserves to go with the 11 years he spent in the Regular Army. "I'll probably retire out of here," he says.

There's talk about consolidating his academy with the Regular Army's Henry Caro NCO Academy for active-duty soldiers at Fort Benning. Martin says that's a move that "from a fiscal aspect certainly makes a lot of sense."

He predicts some of the country's five Reserve NCO academies may be shut down. But he doesn't expect his school to be among those getting the ax. "Facility-wise this is the best around," Martin said. "We've pumped a lot of money into there, we've got access to the proper type of training areas. Plus, this being a TRADOC (Training and Doctrine Command) installation, there's a hell of a lot of instructional expertise here."

Martin says there's been some change in Reserve and National Guard soldiers since Desert Shield/Desert Storm, when some citizen-soldiers were economically hard hit by a year overseas and others were surprised by actually being "called up" rather than just drawing a check and spending, basically, a weekend a month and two weeks in the summer on active duty.

"The Reserve component speaks a different language," he says. "They don't have the same commitment, in some cases, to the Army ... They're soldiers secondarily in their lives, not primarily ... Their civilian jobs come first."

That, to a degree, has affected the makeup of the Reserve and National Guard, meaning there are fewer weekend warriors whose prime motive for wearing Army green is money, he said.

"Those who don't want any more of it (duty like Desert Shield/Desert Storm) have got the hell out, already," said Martin.

Foes of homosexuality ban believe change on the way

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — Opponents of the military's ban on homosexuals and lesbians in uniform are more confident than ever that the prohibition will fall.

It's just a matter of time, they say, pointing to a confluence of signs, including:

■ The introduction of legislation to kill the policy;

■ Release of a congressional study showing the high cost of drumming gays out of the military;

■ A promise by Democratic presidential nominee Bill Clinton to repeal the ban if he is elected;

■ The scandal surrounding the Tailhook Association's 1991 convention.

"We've never been at this juncture before," said Tanya Domi, legislative director for the National Organization of Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Veterans. "We have a presidential nominee who has said he would repeal the policy, a bill in the House, a bill in the Senate. . . . It is really, really remarkable in terms of the history of the issue just how far we have come."

The change could happen in several ways: An act of Congress, the opinion of a high court or an executive order signed by the president. And while opponents don't agree on how or when, they do concur that the change is coming — even if Clinton loses.

"The momentum is increasing as every gay service member and every lesbian soldier comes forward, and we believe more members of Congress are personally moved by their stories," said Robert Bray, spokesman for the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force. "It is imminent that this policy will fall."

The Defense Department policy, which began during World War II, states simply that "homosexuality is incompatible with military service" because it undermines the armed forces' ability to maintain good order and morale. The Pentagon offers no studies or research to support the policy.

"The momentum is increasing as every gay service member and every lesbian soldier comes forward, and we believe more members of Congress are personally moved by their stories," said Robert Bray, spokesman for the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force. "It is imminent that this policy will fall."

Soldiers and sailors can be dismissed not only for homosexual conduct but also if they "demonstrate a propensity to engage in homosexual conduct," according to Pentagon policy.

Some have fought their discharges in court, arguing that the policy is unconstitutional, but only one soldier, Army Sgt. Perry Watkins, has ever won.

The appeals court in Watkins' case reasoned that he had been candid about his homosexuality from the start of his career and the Army had continued to re-enlist him. The U.S. Supreme Court refused to hear the Army's appeal and Watkins subsequently agreed to retire.

The Supreme Court has never accepted a homosexual discharge case for review.

A recent study by the General Accounting Office found that the federal government spent almost half a billion dollars between 1980 and 1990 to kick homosexuals out of the service. The costs included recruiting, training and replacing personnel.

Approximately 1,500 soldiers and sailors are discharged annually for homosexuality, the GAO found.

Some 10 percent of the population is believed to be homosexual and the military, despite its anti-gay policy, is probably no different, the report said.

Rep. Patricia Schroeder, D-Colo., introduced a bill in May that would overturn the ban. Last month, Sen. Howard Metzenbaum, D-Ohio, introduced it in the Senate.

With only a few weeks remaining in the 102nd Congress, Schroeder, a senior member of the House Armed Services Committee, said she doubts there will be hearings on the bill in 1992. The measure has 72 House cosponsors and seven in the Senate, but has virtually no chance of passing in an election year.

"We obviously haven't had any votes on any issues like this, in either the House or the Senate, so it's hard to know where the middle is," Schroeder said.

"The main attacks on it have come from the Dornans and the Cunninghams and people like that," she said, referring to Reps. Robert Dornan and Randall Cunningham, both conservative California Republicans and members of the Armed Services panel.

But the measure's strongest advocates say the bill's mere existence constitutes one more weapon in a growing arsenal that will be used to topple the ban.

"What it does is it serves as a very real club," said Rep. Ted Weiss, D-N.Y., a longtime gay-rights supporter. "It tells the Defense Department that if you don't do it (overturn the ban), there is the strong possibility that Congress will mandate it. I don't think any agency likes to be in that kind of position. I think that they will be reviewing the policy."

Banning gays discriminatory, but key to trust, unit morale

By David Hackworth

ANALYSIS

Rep. Pat Schroeder of Colorado wanted to give women "equality and opportunity" by making them rucksack-toting grunts. Now she aims at putting homosexuals in the foxholes to "end the final bastion of discrimination."

I cannot think of a better way to destroy fighting spirit and gut U.S. combat effectiveness. My credentials for saying this are over four decades' experience as a soldier or military reporter.

Despite the ban on service by homosexuals, gays have long served in the armed forces, some with distinction. Many perhaps felt no sexual inclination toward their heterosexual fellow soldiers. If they did, they had their buddies' attitudes and the Uniform Code of Military Justice hanging over their heads. Still, I have seen countless examples of inappropriate and morale-busting behavior.

In Italy, for example, in the postwar occupation, a gay soldier could not keep his hands off other soldiers in my squad. He disrupted discipline, mangled trust among squad members and zeroed out morale. In the same unit, the personnel major was gay. He had affairs with ambitious teen-age soldiers in exchange for kicking up their test scores. This corrupted the command's promotion system and led to the commissioning of William Calley-like lieutenants not fit to lead combat soldiers.

During my second tour in the Korean War, a gay commanding officer gave combat awards to his lovers who had never been on the line. In Vietnam, a young captain in my unit was asked by the commander to go to bed with him. This almost destroyed the esprit of a fine parachute unit.

These are not isolated incidents: During my Army career I saw countless officers and NCOs who couldn't stop themselves from hitting on soldiers. The absoluteness of their authority, the lack of privacy, enforced intimacy and a 24-hour duty day made sexual urges difficult to control. The objects of their affection were impressionable lads who, searching for a caring role model, sometimes ended up in a gay relationship they might not have sought.

A majority of American citizens, according to polls, support Schroeder's bill. Many people look at the armed forces as they do the post office, the Bank of America or General Motors — an 8-to-5 institution where discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation is against basic freedom, human rights and the American way of life. If these polls are true, a lot of people don't understand what war is about.

Sure, banning gays from defending their country is discriminatory. But discriminations are necessary when a larger public purpose is being served. Civilian standards of fairness and equality don't apply down where the body bags are filled.

On the battlefield, what allows men to survive is combat units made up of disciplined team players, who are realistically trained and led by caring skippers who set the example and know their trade. When all of these factors are in synch, a unit has the right stuff. It becomes tight, a family, and clicks like a professional football team. Spirited men who place their lives in their buddies' hands are the most essential element in warfare. The members of such combat teams trust one another totally.

One doesn't need to be a field marshal to understand that sex between service members undermines those critical factors that produce discipline, military orders, spirit and combat effectiveness. Mix boys and girls, gays and straights in close quarters such as the barracks or the battlefield, and both sexual contact and the consequent breakdown of morale are inevitable.

Many bright people are pushing for the ban to be lifted. I suspect that few if any have been down in the trenches, but I have no doubt their psychological/sociological/political clout will have considerable influence even if they don't have a clue what combat is about.

Unfortunately, most of the top brass won't sound off. They duck and weave and offer hollow and spurious Pentagonese double-talk reasons for continuing the ban — reasons that only fuel the pro-gay argument. But they have told me in the "G" ring of the Pentagon that they're "against it, but sounding off would be the kiss of death, like opposing women in combat — a career killer, you know."

Infantry Museum celebrates Columbus

By Joe Maher/The Benning Patriot

This display is the National Infantry Museum's contribution to the local celebration marking the 500th anniversary of Christopher Columbus' discovery of the New World.

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

Fort Benning's contribution to the local celebration marking the 500th anniversary of Christopher Columbus' discovery of the New World is in place. The exhibit shows there was a lot of military activity in the Chattahoochee Valley long before there was a Fort Benning.

The Military History of the Chattahoochee Valley is shown in a series of displays at the National Infantry Museum that includes capsules detailing how three Columbus men won the Medal of Honor from World War II through the Vietnam War. Other exhibits point to the early Spanish explorers and the weapons they brought into the area along with the Christian cross.

Loaned exhibits from the Columbus Museum touch on the Indian civilization in the area, with a few good examples of pottery and art. Loaners from the Confederate Naval Museum point to the Civil War and there's a fair sampling of weapons, an excellent Confederate Flag complete with its circle of stars, unlike the Confederate Battle Flag with its St. Andrews Cross.

There are excellent examples of Civil War-era weapons, from the lances or spears Confederate cavalrymen carried early in the war before there were enough rifles to go around, to the Spencer Repeating Carbines that helped the invading Yankee cavalry sack Columbus in only seven hours on April 16, 1965 — a full week after Gen. Robert E. Lee had surrendered for the South at Appomattox, Md.

Andrew Jackson's role in the death of the Creek Indian nation and the slaughter of 900 braves at Horseshoe Bend in Alabama is pointed out here again. Fort Mitchell's role in the early 1800s is pointed out with a few artifacts from the old fort on display.

The role of Columbus as a manufacturer of the materials of war — the Civil War — is highlighted, with examples of the pistols, rifles and swords that were made here.

The museum is open from 8 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. Monday through Friday and from noon until 4:30 p.m. on weekends. It's closed only on federal holidays that fall on Mondays and for Thanksgiving, Christmas and New Year's Day.

DEFENSE

U.S. troops begin desert drills

From wire reports

KUWAIT — Kuwaiti and American troops Tuesday started the main phase of joint maneuvers designed to train Kuwaitis and reinforce the U.S. commitment to defend the emirate.

"This is a message to the despot of Iraq ... The road to the Kuwaiti borders is not as easy as you expect," said Maj. Adel al-Haquan, standing atop his tank at the opening ceremony of the exercises, 25 miles from the disputed Kuwaiti-Iraqi border.

Al-Haquan commands 550 Kuwaitis participating with 1,100 Americans in this phase of "Intrinsic Action," part of a series of joint maneuvers that started Aug. 4, two days after the second anniversary of Iraq's 1990 invasion of Kuwait.

Lt. Col. Joseph Fil, commander of the American troops, said the aim of this phase of the exercises was to refine desert maneuvering and communications.

U.S. officers stress that the exercises are part of a cycle of training outlined under a 10-year defense pact signed with the United States last year.

But they say they are also in Kuwait to block any potential threat from Iraq in the showdown with the United Nations over enforcing the Gulf War cease-fire terms, including its failure to renounce its claim to the emirate.

American troops, mostly from the Army's First Cavalry Division based in Fort Hood, Texas, will use 28 M1A1 tanks in the exercises. Their Kuwaiti partners will use 20 T-72 tanks.

There is no set date for the end of "Intrinsic Action," but it is expected to go into October.

Pentagon unsure what downed jet

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon said Tuesday that military historians may never know whether it was an Iraqi plane, rather than ground fire, that downed a Navy jet in the first days of the air war in Iraq.

"We just don't know," Pentagon spokesman Bob Hall said as to why the F/A-18 jet exploded into a fireball on Jan. 17, 1991, killing Lt. Cmdr. Michael S. Speicher.

Hall was responding to statements by Navy intelligence officer Capt. Carlos Johnson, appearing in a New York Times opinion page piece Tuesday, that the jet was shot down by a Iraqi MIG-25.

That contradicts Pentagon records showing that U.S. aircraft shot down 28 Iraqi planes with no U.S. planes lost in air-to-air combat. Thirty-eight U.S. planes were shot down from ground fire or surface-to-air missiles.

But Hall said the final Pentagon report on the Persian Gulf War left open the question of what happened to Speicher's aircraft.

Initial reports from American warplanes at the time were that they were facing intense anti-aircraft and ground missile fire as well as enemy planes, he said.

The spokesman said U.S. officials have been unable to check the wreckage, because the plane was shot down near Baghdad and was blown apart in mid-air.

He said Pentagon officials had talked Tuesday morning with Johnson, the Navy intelligence officer quoted in the Times.

TRAINING

Reserve drill sergeants get back to basics with OSUT

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

If Drill Sergeant Frank Ayres hadn't been putting Army recruits through their paces at Fort Benning on Monday, he would probably have been at work in Charlottesville, Va., helping make telephones.

He is one of those "citizen-soldiers" — an Army reservist — who normally spends one weekend a month training at an armory back home. However, for the last two weeks he's been one of the 13 Reserve drill sergeants helping push One Station Unit Training soldiers in Bravo Company, 2nd Battalion, 54th Infantry, through their initial stages of training at Fort Benning.

Ayres is part of a "training base expansion" that has brought dozens of reservists from the 80th Infantry Division, headquartered in Virginia, to Fort Benning since late July to carry out the mission the division would have in case of a full-scale call-up of the nation's Reserve and National Guard troops — training new infantry soldiers.

In what is called a displacement-type operation, these Reserve soldiers and officers have been furnishing a battalion commander, a deputy battalion commander and the staff necessary to handle three companies of Army recruits from these embryonic soldiers' first days in Army green.

These reservists will continue rotating through Fort Benning, two weeks apiece, until these three companies and two 2nd Battalion companies being run by regular Army drill sergeants, officers and other NCOs, graduate in November.

Lt. Col. David A. McDonald, the regular Army liaison officer between these reservists and the regular Army, says this is an unusual training opportunity in that these reserve soldiers and officers, who make up the entire training cadre for "their" three companies, have been able to see OSUT soldiers through their entire basic training regimen.

But the reserves are not on their own. Regular Army drill sergeants and officers keep watch over these "weekend warriors" throughout the training cycle. About half the drill sergeants who would be working with these three companies serve as evaluators of the reservists' work. The others help keep up with the recruits' records and ensure that there is a smooth transition from one two-week set of drill sergeants to the next, McDonald said.

"A drill sergeant at weekend training is like a school teacher without students," McDonald said. "You can only call trees to attention so many times."

McDonald said this may be as good as training gets for the drill sergeants and other leaders in the 80th Division, since there's no "real" basic training scenarios back home for these trainers to run. "A drill sergeant at weekend training is like a school teacher without students," McDonald said. "You can only call trees to attention so many times."

"A displacement operation like this gives the Army Reserve component the opportunity to practice what they actually train for," he said.

The young would-be soldiers these Reservists are putting through their paces will see several different sets of battalion, company and platoon-level officers and NCOs during their 13 weeks of OSUT training. But regular Army officers and NCOs are working alongside the reserves to ensure continuity of training for the basic soldiers in the three companies the reserves are running.

Don't think, McDonald cautions, that this is an experiment and don't think it's something cooked up on the spur of the moment. "We've been in constant touch with the 2nd Battalion, 54th Infantry since October '91," he said, putting together how the training cycle would be run.

The 80th Division is even furnishing soldiers from its training support brigade to help the 29th Infantry Regiment teach basic rifle marksmanship, nuclear, biological and chemical training and individual tactics to these soldiers.

When this training cycle is complete Nov. 1, the division will have supplied some 1,200 soldiers from eight battalions to oversee the training of the approximately 600 soldiers who'll graduate at the end of their overseers' "summer training."

Thousands greet Olympic flag here

From wire reports

COLUMBUS, Ga. — A crowd of 10,000 was on hand Sunday in downtown Columbus as the Olympic flag arrived aboard the New Georgia Railroad excursion train, heralding the coming of the 1996 Olympic Games in Atlanta.

The train is touring nine Georgia cities. It began on Sept. 9 in Savannah and will arrive at the Georgia Freight Depot in Atlanta today.

The crowd milled around Olympic exhibits, lined up for autographs from Olympic athletes and posed for photographs with Whatizit, the 1996 Olympic mascot.

"Well, it makes a little more sense now that I've read this," said Virginia Pearson of the toothy, bug-eyed blue mascot with three rings on its upturned tail after looking at a chart which explained the mascot's shape.

"It's very different but I like it — it's more of a modern approach," said Sid Harden. "A nice change."

Cheney says he's against Michigan tank plant project

From wire reports

DETROIT — Secretary of Defense Dick Cheney said Monday that Congress is forcing him to spend money on an upgrade of the M1A1 tank that will save jobs at the General Dynamics tank plant in Warren, Mich.

CHENEY

"I asked Congress to rescind the funding," Cheney said in a speech at the Economic Club of Detroit. "I lost the debate ... Therefore, I have to spend the money, and I'm prepared to follow through.

"I am interested in keeping facilities in business, but only if we can afford it," he said.

Two weeks ago, the upgrade was announced as "welcome news" for the Warren plant by Vice President Dan Quayle during a campaign visit to Macomb County.

Cheney said the Defense Department will invest $260 million in the upgrade, but he doesn't think the money is being spent wisely. He said he didn't know the Army's timetable or specific plans for the tank project.

The last tank rolled off the assembly line a year ago. The plant's work force has dropped to 200 employees from 2,100 in the mid-80's. The future of the plant and another in Ohio has been on hold.

Cheney said he tries to stay out of political debates although "I do have views on the election."

He said that if President George Bush loses and a Democratic administration forces further cuts in military spending, it could "destroy overnight" a force that took decades to build.

Cheney said the Defense Department is making steep budget cuts, shutting down or reducing operations at more than 800 plants and bases worldwide.

But not every step is based on military or economic necessity.

Cheney said the decision to rebuild Homestead Air Force Base in Florida, which had been scheduled to close when it was destroyed last month by Hurricane Andrew, was "personally, specifically and directly made by the president" to salve wounds left by the storm.

"If it hadn't been for the hurricane, this decision would not have been made," he said.

VA to offer group therapy to victims of sex harassment

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — Sexual harassment in the military has been so pervasive — and left such deep scars — that the Department of Veterans Affairs plans to offer group therapy to female veterans for the first time, a top VA physician said Monday.

Meanwhile, congressional investigators reported Monday that because of a long history of tolerating sexual harassment, it could take the military as long as five more years to create an environment that doesn't threaten women.

Mather said the number of women seeking help is on the rise, largely because of the furor surrounding the Tailhook affair.

That study, issued by the House Armed Services Committee, indicated that the Pentagon has only begun to get serious about dealing with the problem since last year's Tailhook Association convention in Las Vegas where at least 26 women were fondled and mauled by drunken Navy aviators.

Dr. Susan H. Mather, the VA's assistant chief medical director for public health, said in a Monday interview that the VA hoped to launch the group counseling sessions in its storefront centers soon to treat women suffering the effects of such harassment.

Mather said the number of women seeking help is on the rise, largely because of the furor surrounding the Tailhook affair. The requests led the VA to establish a task force to develop treatment plans.

Sexual harassment has caused a growing number of cases of traumatic stress disorder among female veterans, Mather said. The disorder usually is associated with soldiers who have endured combat.

"There's an inability to build intimate-type relations, to trust people, flashbacks of the actual trauma, an inability to concentrate, those sorts of things," she said.

Mather said the problems of former service women are compounded because of the military's macho attitude and its tendency to blame the victim, and heightened even further by a sense of treachery.

"There is a sense of betrayal when you're assaulted by somebody you're working with, either in the chain of command or a colleague," she said. "It's different than being grabbed (by someone you don't know) when you're walking down the street."

Mather said the military must stop protecting harassers in its ranks. "When a women makes an accusation that she's been sexually assaulted, and the assaulter can rely on his comrades to put forth a wall of silence, it's very difficult to combat that," she said. "But I think the military has at least now accepted that there is a problem."

The House report agreed, and said the Pentagon was on a path that should eliminate most sexual harassment over the next five years.

For the first time, the military services have made it clear that harassment will not be tolerated, and that promotions of uniformed personnel will depend on their sensitivity to the issue, according to committee chairman Les Aspin, D-Wis., and Rep. Beverly Byron, D-Md., chairman of the personnel subcommittee.

The report likened the military's struggle with sexual harassment with its earlier battles to wipe out racism and illegal drug use in its ranks.

"The real effort to stamp out drugs and the real effort to stamp out racial discrimination occurred only when they affected people's promotions," Aspin said. "When it's that kind of commitment, then you see the change."

Congressmen praise progress on harassment

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon has committed itself at the highest levels to rooting out sexual harassment in military ranks and is on a path that should lead to success within five years, two key members of Congress said Monday.

"We believe we have a program in place that will deal with it," said Rep. Les Aspin, D-Wis., chairman of the House Armed Services Committee.

For the first time, the military services have made it clear that sexual harassment will not be tolerated and that the career advancement of uniformed personnel will depend on their sensitivity to the issue, said Aspin and Rep. Beverly Byron, D-Md., chairman of the panel's personnel subcommittee.

After more than a decade of halting efforts to deal with the problem, the Pentagon was forced to get serious by the embarrassment of last year's Tailhook convention of naval aviators at which women were grabbed and partially disrobed by drunken servicemen.

Byron said, however, that the issue will not be settled until individuals involved in the Tailhook incident are identified and prosecuted. A preliminary report to the House committee is expected from the Navy by the end of this month. The Pentagon's inspector general is investigating the matter, but his report on specific wrongdoing isn't expected to be completed until December, sources said last week.

Aspin's panel issued a report comparing the development of the sexual harassment issue to the military's successful efforts in the past to deal with racial discrimination and drug abuse.

As in those cases, attitudes toward women are part of "a certain cultural attitude in the military that needs to be changed," Aspin said.

Top commanders in all services have instituted instructional programs, counseling and penalties aimed at changing the culture that tolerates sexual harassment, he said.

But vigilance will be needed to ensure that change comes about, he said. In the cases of drugs and race, it was clear to top leaders that those problems threatened the military's effectiveness and even its survival.

"There is not that kind of pressure here on the women issue," Aspin said. "There is not this kind of knife at their backs."

The matter also is clouded by the continuing controversy over the ultimate role of women in the military services, and whether it includes participation in combat.

Non-disabled man loses suit over job

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — A D.C. Superior Court judge has upheld the right of an organization for disabled people to remove a man from a job because he was not disabled.

Blake C. Ortner, 32, had been associate sports director of the Paralyzed Veterans of America, in charge of organizing wheelchair sports events, for about three weeks when he lost that position in 1991.

Ortner sued the organization last year alleging that the veterans group had violated the D.C. Human Rights Act, which prohibits an employer from discriminating on the basis of personal appearance or physical handicaps.

Sale of F-15s to Saudi Arabia good news for local businesses

By Jim Poole
Business Editor

President Bush's approval of the sale of 72 sophisticated F-15 fighter jets to Saudi Arabia is good news for Pratt & Whitney in Columbus.

The $5 billion transaction — which defense contractors say will save thousands of jobs across the country and about 1,000 in Georgia alone — will help preserve the jobs of the nearly 1,000 Pratt & Whitney workers in Columbus. The defense contractor makes compressor blades and disks for commercial and military jet engines at its plant here.

"This will certainly be very helpful to us," said Gene Demonet, plant manager at the Pratt & Whitney facility in Columbus. "This represents about 2,000 of our disks ... the equivalent of two months work over the term of the contract. It's going to be very helpful to us."

For months, "U.S. Jobs Now," a coalition of aerospace companies and suppliers involved in the production of F-15s, had lobbied Washington for approval of the sale. Pratt & Whitney, which builds the F-15's jet engines, Hughes Aircraft, which supplies radar systems, and McDonnell Douglas, the primary contractor of the fighter jet, were the leading companies in the coalition.

Don Colby, manager of external relations at the Columbus plant has said that the contract means "that 40,000 Americans in 47 states will keep their jobs through 1997."

Demonet said Bush approved the sale because it was the right thing to do to save defense industry jobs.

"As I understand, the Israelis didn't object to it," Demonet said. "He (Bush) sees it as the right thing to do."

Defense contractors reasoned that a U.S. refusal to sell to the Saudis wouldn't have prevented them from getting the aircraft. Instead, the business would have gone to another country.

In 1986 the U.S. government rejected the sale of 48 F-15s to Saudi Arabia. In turn, the Arabs bought 100 Tornado fighter bombers from Great Britain in a $29 billion deal.

The same thing would have likely happened again had Bush not approved the deal, Demonet said.

"There's no doubt they would probably have bought somebody else's plane," Demonet said.

And he said business remains stable at Pratt & Whitney.

"We don't anticipate any major changes in that (employment) as we go into 1993," Demonet said.

HISTORY

WW II 50TH ANNIVERSARY

Fifty years ago this week in New Guinea, severe shortages of much need supplies altered the Japanese plans calling for continued attacks, instead forcing a withdrawal from formerly secured positions. In the meantime, American reinforcements continued to land without resistance at Port Moresby. Allied leaders formulated plans for a counterattack with theater commander Gen. Douglas MacArthur selecting Australian Gen. Thomas Albert Blamey to command the effort.

Here, according to research by the Military History Division at Fort Benning, were the top news items of the week:

■

On Guadalcanal, six transports landed the 7th Marine Regiment increasing American strength on the islands to 23,000 well-supplied men.

■

Field Marshal Erwin Rommel left North Africa, returning to Germany to seek medical treatment. Gen. George von Stumme became the acting commander of the Afrika Korps during Rommel's absence.

■

On the Eastern Front, Soviet forces, under the command of General Vasill Chuikov, mounted a small counterattack northwest of Stalingrad, facing fierce German resistance.

■

The liberty ship Stephen Hopkins, armed only with a single 4-inch gun, attempted to resist an attack by the German raider ship Stier, which had already claimed four ships. Both ships sank in the ensuing battle.

■

Fort Benning Post Exchange officials reacted to wartime realities by adopting a "pay as you go" plan, forcing customers to pay on a cash basis only. Additional changes prohibited the use of coupons.

Labor Department seeks grant to retrain departing soldiers

By Ben Wright
Staff Writer

Thousands of soldiers are expected to leave the Army over the next year, and many of them are going to need retraining for civilian jobs.

An estimated 14,000 troops are expected to leave Fort Benning in the next 12-18 months, officials with the Georgia Department of Labor and the Army Career and Alumni Program (ACAP) announced Thursday. And the Labor Department is looking for federal help to retain the estimated 3,500 who will need skills to find jobs in the Columbus-area civilian job market.

The Labor Department is seeking a $9 million grant to help pay for retraining programs in the Columbus area, said Bob Davis, a state jobs coordinator.

"As far as I know, it will probably be one of the first in the area," Davis said of the federal grant program if it wins approval. It normally takes 60 days to get an answer on such grants but Davis expects to get a decision much sooner.

The grant totals $15 million but the rest of the money will serve soldiers and civilians losing jobs at Fort Stewart, in Hinesville, Ga.

From the total of soldiers expected to leave Benning, half said in an ACAP survey that they plan to stay in the area after leaving the military, Davis said. That would be a 7 percent increase in the Columbus civilian labor force, estimated now to be 100,000.

"That's quite an infusion," said Columbus College economist Mike Daniels. "If you look at just the growth over the last 10 years, you'd be pressed to find that sort of growth." Daniels said even if the soldiers are retrained, it's unlikely they will all find jobs in Columbus.

From the total of soldiers expected to leave Benning, half said in an ACAP survey that they plan to stay in the area after leaving the military, Davis said. That would be a 7 percent increase in the Columbus civilian labor force, estimated now to be 100,000.

The result will either be higher unemployment, Daniels said, or many of the former soldiers looking for jobs outside Columbus. Another impact could be less growth in wage rates, as more job-seekers compete for employment, he said.

The Labor Department estimates that 3,000-3,500 soldiers with primarily infantry skills would seek retraining.

Approval of the federal grant would make funds available for free job training programs at Columbus Technical Institute and other schools. Davis said he doesn't expect one school to handle all the retraining. "we are also looking at trying to set up military people to train," he said.

Many of the soldiers losing their jobs are career people with eight to 10 years of service. The department hopes to get the soldiers retrained while many are still living on their severance pay, Davis said.

"What we are (doing) is sitting on pins and needles waiting on these folks to give us the official word so we can move here on post," said Benning ACAP Director Ted Craig, who will direct interested soldiers to the program if it wins approval.

A survey of 1,380 discharged soldiers at Fort Benning showed that 56 percent hold no skills sought in civilian employment.

Several jobs are in demand at the training school, said Mary Goodman, director of placement at Columbus Technical Institute. They include computers, management, appliance repair, health care, clerical, mechanics and some welding.

Survey eyes effects of child abuse by priests

By Michael Hirsley
Chicago Tribune

The subject of child abuse has been increasingly part of the rhetoric in Catholic dioceses across the country. The U.S. bishops devoted a closed-door session to the subject at their most recent national meeting last June.

But one priest who has discussed the subject at length — as a psychotherapist who counsels victims and abusers, conducts workshops, and has authored a book on child sexual abuse by priests — recently decided it was time to listen.

The Rev. Stephen Rossetti, who wrote "Slayer of the Soul: Child Sexual Abuse and the Catholic Church" last year, was surprised that he couldn't find any research on how the incidents were affecting the people in the pews.

This year, he did his own research. Assisted by Twenty-Third Publications, a publisher of Catholic materials and books, including his, Rossetti sent questionnaires to active Roman Catholics in the U.S. and Canada, where there have also been highly publicized cases of sex abuse by priests.

Responses from more than 1,000, mostly in the U.S., convinced Rossetti that "the effect among parishioners was even worse than I imagined."

Even at first glance, that was true. Although the random mailings did not target parishes in which there had been sexual-abuse allegations, "we found that 10 percent fell into that category," Rossetti said. "We knew the intensity of these cases, but we thought they were more isolated than that."

"They don't believe we will police our own ranks," Rossetti said. "Clearly, the mandate from this survey is to deal with problems more aggressively, and be more open with your response.

Rossetti's survey is being reported in the September and October issues of "Today's Parish," Twenty-Third Publications' national monthly. Among key findings:

■ Though half of the Catholics in parishes that had no immediate experience with accused clergy felt the church would safeguard children in its care, that confidence dropped to 28 percent in parishes where priests had been accused.

■ In parishes without abuse-case experience, 59 percent felt priests were trustworthy. That dropped to 44 percent in parishes with such experience. There was an even more dramatic drop, from 69 percent to 34 percent, when those in the two categories were asked if they were satisfied with priests.

"That's an astounding statistic," Rossetti said. "This should be an alarm ringing for church leadership. There's incredible anger out there."

It should be noted that Rossetti, in his dual roles as priest and therapist, is sympathetic to his church's dilemma in reconciling pastoral guidelines with legal requirements; and in trying to help both victims and abusers, many of whom were themselves victimized as minors, he says.

And he praises Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Chicago Cardinal Joseph Bernardin for "providing leadership for many other dioceses by apologizing for, and trying to correct, mistakes."

But, he said, the confidence level among parishioners has sunk so low that much more must be done. His survey found that, regardless of experience with abuse cases, 70 percent of respondents wanted the church to make all such allegations public, 62 percent felt inadequately informed about them and 58 percent felt the church was not adequately dealing with the issue.

"They don't believe we will police our own ranks," Rossetti said. "Clearly, the mandate from this survey is to deal with problems more aggressively, and be more open with your response.

"Basically, people want to know what's going on. They feel they've been kept in the dark on this issue."

Church leaders often point out that child sexual abuse is a disease that afflicts the rest of society as much as, or more than, it does the priesthood.

But if they feel the criticism and notoriety given to priest cases is inordinately high, that priests are not being treated like ordinary men, they must also acknowledge the dark side of that assertion: When it comes to morality, priests have traditionally been treated like extraordinary men.

They have been accorded a public trust, viewed as human shelters during storms of inhumanity. Some were literally idolized by the children they subsequently abused.

And though the church asserts that relatively few priests have been accused, the extent of their abuse remains unknown. Studies have reported that hundreds of children may be the victims of a single child molester.

The media and the courts "have taken the bull by the horns on this issue," Rossetti said, "and that should be our role.

"Part of a Gospel-based church's responsibility is to take the side of the wounded, the vulnerable. . . . We're supposed to become the voice of the victims."

Motorhead is comprised of (l-r) Mikkey Dee, Phil 'Zoom' Campbell, Wurzel and Lemmy.

Motorhead back in high gear with drummer Mikkey Dee

By Sandra Okamoto
Staff writer

Some guys may think Mikkey Dee was in an enviable position. He was tapped to replace Phil "Philthy Animal" Taylor as drummer for Motorhead, a notoriously loud rock and roll band. Taylor had left the band once before, but this time, about six months ago, it was a permanent leave-taking.

It was a traumatic time for the band, for lead "howler" Lemmy Kilmister and Taylor had been band-mates since 1975 when Lemmy began Motorhead. Nine years later, he added guitarists Wurzel and Zoom, which meant this lineup had been together for eight years.

Dee, who up until earlier this year, was with Don Dokken, said he'd known Motorhead for years. "I've known these guys for a very long time," he said sleepily during a telephone interview from a Little Rock Holiday Inn earlier this week. When he was with King Diamond in 1987, the group opened for Motorhead.

Motorhead had wanted Dee as a drummer for several years, but he said the timing was never right until now. "I haven't had any problems," he said. "Motorhead is a professional band and they've been together a long time."

Dee had been in Los Angeles when he got the call and went to work immediately with no rehearsal time. He said he knew the songs. "Of course, it was tough, but it's easier now."

"I had just left Dokken two weeks earlier when Lem called me up," Dee said. He was originally asked to work on tracks for the movies "Hellraiser III" and "Encino Man." The cut from "Encino Man" was never used, but co-star Pauly Shore said he'll use it in his next film.

A video for "Hellraiser" was filmed a few months ago. "It's very hard work," he said about making videos. "It's fun, but it's really tough."

Right now, the band is out with Ozzy Osbourne until Oct. 10, when they play Los Angeles. On Oct. 12, Motorhead is set to appear on "The Tonight Show." "We'll play two songs and do an interview and everything."

After that, they'll fly to South America for two weeks of shows. "Then we might be going out with Black Sabbath. Then we fly to Europe."

The band will be doing shows until Dec. 23., when they take a break and go back out the beginning of January. "We have to go to Australia and Japan sometime in the spring."

Unlike a lot of rock groups who rush from the tour bus to the stage and off again, Motorhead likes to spend as much time as possible talking to fans and signing autographs.

Find your 'treasure' at the antiques 'Extravaganza'

PERRY, Ga. — With the summer fun fading from view, the kids back in school, and the holidays looming near, what can you do with your family the weekend of Oct. 30, 31 and Nov. 1? You can take them on a "great adventure" through the intriguing world of antiques and collectibles at the semiannual Georgia National Antiques Extravaganza.

There is nothing quite as exciting as searching for a special antique or collectible item and being able to bring it into your home, to be treasured by your family for years to come. Dealers will be bringing the very best of their collections from buttons to linen presses from 19th century homes. If you haven't discovered the many joys and sheer excitement of "collecting" you need to make that discovery in Perry.

Financial analysts have proclaimed antiques and collectibles as positive investments for the 90's, as much for their lasting value as for the fact that their value appreciates each year.

One of the major markets for antiques and collectibles, the Southeastern Antiques & Collectibles Market, has been successfully producing monthly markets in Georgia for two years. This semiannual event will be held at the Georgia National Fairgrounds and Agricenter, off I-75 at exit 42 in Perry.

Promoters Linda and Alphie Spears, who produce the monthly markets, have established a reputation of providing the best possible shopping atmosphere for their customers. The Extravaganza will feature set-up for dealers and Early Buyer day on Thursday, Oct. 29 from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. Those attending the Early Buyer day will be able to get first choice of the selections of the 500 plus dealers. The Extravaganza show hours also will be 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. Friday through Sunday.

For dealers, Perry offers the best of both worlds — a convenient, economical location for lodging and a climate-controlled, well-publicized market place in which to show their wares to the public. Dealer booths are $50 for the weekend with nominal charges for services such as electricity and tables. Accommodations can be arranged in Perry for $19.98 (including tax) and eating establishments are plentiful and nearby. There also are 90 on-site fully-serviced RV spaces.

Located in the center of the state,Perry is 111 miles from Atlanta and Hartsfield International Airport.Special air fares and shuttle service are available from the airport. Carlson Travel Network can assist with any travel needs and can be called toll-free at 1-800-476-5711.

Admission is $3 and all 13,000 on-site parking spaces are free. The Extravaganza will offer something for everyone, from the dealer to the avid antiques collector to those that simply want to begin the treasure hunt of a lifetime.

For more information, contact Alphie or Linda Spears at (912) 994-9882 or during show hours at (912) 987-2774.

Andersonville Fair to be held Oct. 3-4

The Andersonville Historic Fair will be held Saturday and Sunday, Oct. 3 and 4 in the Civil War Village of Andersonville, Ga.

There will be two Civil War battle re-enactments, craftsmen demonstrating their arts, country music, folk music, bluegrass music and military bands performing.

For more information, call (912) 924-2558.

From wire reports

LOS ANGELES — The Robert Redford caper film "Sneakers" raced past the box office competition to take in $10 million during its debut weekend.

"Honeymoon in Vegas," in its third week brought in $3.8 million, a sharp decline from $9.2 million that had kept it in first place the previous weekend.

The demonic "Hellraiser III" earned $3.2 million, followed by the Clint Eastwood Western "Unforgiven" in fourth place with $2.6 million.

University kicking off its 'Masters' series

From staff reports

The University of Georgia Center for Continuing Education opens its autumn Masters Hall Performances series Friday and Saturday, Oct. 9-10, with a concert by vocalist Stephanie Nakasian and pianist Hod O'Brien.

Their presentation, "Great Ladies of American Song, features renditions of songs made famous by legendary American singers. Nakasian recreated the style of the original performers, recalling such stars as Helen O'Connell, Kay Starr, Sarah Vaughan and Lena Horne.

Nakasian and O'Brien are regular performers on the circuit of jazz clubs, restaurants and hotels in the Northeast. They have appeared in popular entertainment spots, including Micheal's Pub, Fat Tuesday's and the Blue Note in New York City. In addition, they have toured throughout Europe and the Orient and have been featured entertainers on Caribbean cruise ships.

String-bassist Steven Venz and Morris have appeared in a number of Georgia Center programs and are well-known in the Athens-Atlanta jazz performance community.

In addition to launching the fall season at the Georgia Center, this performance marks the grand reopening of the newly renovated Hugh B. Masters Hall. The seating and stage have been expanded, acoustics have been improved and a more pleasing general appearance has been achieved.

Also slated for the fall season is a concert featuring Tony Deaton and Jacque Culpepper in "Thank You, Mr. Hammerstein," Nov. 13-14. Deaton has made several Georgia Center appearances, one of which, "An Evening with Cole Porter," was filmed and broadcast on public television stations across the country last spring.

The Georgia Center's annual holiday production, Dec. 18-19, is "A Christmas Musicale" with the Athens Chamber Singers, directed by Brenda Poss. This production will present a mix of traditional and contemporary music, staging and costumes.

All Masters Hall Performances begin at 8:15 p.m. and are preceded by an optional dinner buffet in the Savannah Room, starting at 6 p.m. The cost of the buffet is $13.50 per person.

Individual tickets are $8.25; season tickets for all three performances are $15.50, and will be available through Oct. 9.

Entertainment and dinner reservations may be made by calling the Georgia Center's Office of Special Events are (706) 542-9496.

Fine arts programs can help keep many students in school

From staff reports

AUBURN — Music, art, drama and other fine arts programs can make the difference between staying in school and dropping out for many students, says an Auburn University education researcher who is studying the effects of the arts on "at-risk" children.

"Programs such as band, chorus, dance, drama and art have the power to interest and motivate at-risk students and reduce the drop-out rate," said Nancy Barry, an assistant professor in the department of curriculum and teaching who is examining why the arts encourage students.

"Educators throughout the nation are challenged to meet the needs of students whose circumstances place them at a disadvantage — students at risk of failure in school and society," Barry said. "Low self concept is frequently associated with the at-risk student's problems."

A new study by Barry found that participation in fine arts programs causes significant improvements in children's self concept, as well as their happiness, anxiety level, feelings about school and confidence in their physical attributes. Another study showed that interest in high school fine arts program is the reason that many at-risk students remain in school.

"Through arts experiences, at-risk students may experience success for the first time in their academic careers," she said.

Barry directs Project ARISE, or Arts Restoring and Increasing Self Esteem, which examines how participation in the arts affects at-risk elementary school students' self concept and tries to identify which creative activities are most effective. ARISE participants are enrolled in a special day care facility for low-income families in Auburn.

"Many students may be unable to relate to traditional instruction," she said. "This factor is particularly true of minority students and disadvantaged students whose home environment, values and use of language may differ greatly from that of their teachers and classmates.

"The reason students most often give for dropping out is, 'I didn't like school'," Barry said. "But involvement in art, drama or music could make the difference, because they appeal to different learning styles."

Intelligence has been defined in several categories, such as musical, spatial, verbal/linguistic, logical/mathematical and others. Students can be competent in different categories, but traditional education tends to focus on language ad math skills.

"Exclusion of the other types of intelligence may be a key element in the lack of success that many students experience," said Barry. "Everyone can't be expected to thrive under the same instructional program.

"If you keep failing, after a while you're going to give up," she said. "But if you get a hint of success, that may be enough to spur you on.

Citadel drops male veterans from classes

From wire reports

CHARLESTON, S.C. — The Citadel announced recently that instead of admitting women veterans to all-male day classes with cadets, male veterans will no longer be allowed to attend.

The decision was met with surprise and disbelief by the male veterans, some of whom moved to Charleston to attend the classes.

"This is the only electrical engineering program in this area of the state," said Ted Blumstein, who left a job at a nuclear power plant in North Carolina to attend the day program. "I have nowhere else to go."

Ron Gaskins, the school's administrative dean and registrar, told a group of the male vets the school believes it can defend its position in court.

Three women veterans sued in June. They didn't want to join the military college's all-male corps of cadets, just attend classes with them.

Male veterans attended day classes with the estimated 2,000 corps members but didn't take part in the military routine or live in barracks. Women may attend evening and summer classes.

Green Wave pounds Manchester, 27-7

From staff reports

MANCHESTER — Andre Lacy got Spencer High off and running last Friday with a 75-yard return of the opening kickoff, lighting the fuse to the Green Wave's explosive 27-7 victory over Manchester High at Memorial Stadium.

Lacy's return set up Maurece Williams' 7-yard scoring run four plays later and Spencer never looked back in running its record to 2-0. Manchester fell to 0-2.

Williams, considered the top college prospect in Columbus, finished the game with 207 yards on 24 carries and three touchdowns. He added a 15-yard scoring run later in the first quarter and broke loose for an 86-yard scoring burst in the third quarter.

Lafayette Bostick returned an interception 48 yards in the fourth quarter to cap the scoring for Spencer. Defensively, the Green Wave held Manchester to a 1-yard Lenward Bentley scoring run in the third period for its only score of the night.

Spencer will play Carver tonight.

Nunn wants enlisted musicians to play last notes at academies

By Nolan Walters
Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — If Sen. Sam Nunn, D-Ga., has his way, Army cadets at West Point soon will be marching to their own drummer.

They won't have a choice.

Taking on one of the military services' ingrained traditions, Nunn wants to stop paying enlisted musicians to perform at the three military academies.

"Midshipmen and cadets should be encouraged to form their own bands," says the 1993 military authorization bill that Nunn is now trying to get the Senate to approve.

"In doing so, they would contribute directly to manpower economies, and to the spirit and morale at the military service academies," the bill says.

NUNN

Nunn himself has been ducking interviews on the subject, but his proposal would shift about $10.3 million from bands to combat units.

That's a tiny part of the bill's $274.5 billion total. But it is symbolic of Congress' desire to get the most military might out of the new, shrinking Pentagon budget. It is only one of several proposals to increase the efficiency of the military academies.

Still, the plan has sounded a sour note of historical proportions at the academies, particularly at the U.S. Military Academy at West Point, where the band dates back, some say, to the Revolutionary War.

"I think this whole action-pending kind of snips away at your sense of pride," said Sgt. Maj. Joseph Horvath, the drum major of the 98-person West Point band. "I think a lot of people are infuriated because he just doesn't know what we do," Horvath said.

Lt. Gen. Howard Graves, the superintendent at West Point, was scheduled to fill Nunn in on particulars at a meeting Thursday.

The West Point Band makes 1,700 appearances a year, said Lt. Col. Frank Dubuy, the director. Along with playing for football games and serenading reviews of the corps of cadets, the band entertains visiting dignitaries, puts on public concerts and even provides music for important military funerals.

Members and supporters of the service academy bands say that it is unrealistic to suggest that cadets themselves take over the musical duties. Their schedules already are full, and many of the bands' performances occur when the cadets and midshipmen are out of town.

"It does a world of good in the community and the region," said Tom Roskelly, the spokesman for the mayor of Annapolis, Md., Alfred Hopkins, who has made saving the Naval Academy band a personal crusade.

Nunn's committee staffers, however, observe that the cadets' and midshipmen's schedules are not too tight to prevent them from finding time to play intercollegiate sports.

Putting the band controversy in perspective, they also note that the bill would eliminate only the bands at the Army, Navy and Air Force academies. Altogether, the Pentagon paid for 103 military bands in 1991. They had 5,054 members, played 54,000 concerts and cost $191 million, according to the Defense Department.

Musicians must win fiercely competitive auditions for available slots, but if they do get in, music is all they do. They tend to be older, have families and have settled in the area. Horvath, a saxophone student at Kent State University during the famous anti-Vietnam War protests there, joined the band in 1972 because he was about to be drafted.

"I never dreamed I'd be doing something like this," said the 43-year-old drum major.

Senate panel trims budget request for SDI, ditches Osprey aircraft

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — A Senate subcommittee Wednesday approved a 1993 Pentagon spending bill that cuts President Bush's request for the Strategic Defense Initiative by $1.6 billion and eliminates money for the V-22 Osprey tiltrotor aircraft.

The $250 billion measure for the year that begins Oct. 1 also provides $2 billion to ease the pain on defense-sector workers who lose their jobs as a result of continuing cuts in military spending.

It also would impose a sharp cut in overall funding for development of next-generation tactical aircraft. The panel provided $3.4 billion for programs for which the Pentagon had sought a total of $4.1 billion, in effect forcing competition among the Comanche and Apache helicopters, the F-22 advanced fighter, the new versions of the F-18 and the AX long-range bomber.

For the SDI program, also known as "Star Wars," the Appropriations defense subcommittee allocated $3.8 billion for the coming year, compared with Bush's request for $5.4 billion. The level was $500 million below the amount endorsed in the House version of the defense spending bill, and $500 million above the level the Senate voted last month in a still-unfinished Pentagon authorization measure.

The cut came as the General Accounting Office reported program officials have repeatedly exaggerated the success of tests of the antimissile system.

Four tests undertaken between January 1990 and March 1992 were not as successful as SDI officials contended in news releases, briefings and reports to Congress, the congressional investigating agency said in a report released today.

One of the experiments involved the only full space test thus far of "Brilliant Pebbles," a missile interceptor program that is the Bush administration's favored approach to SDI, GAO said.

SDI officials reported the test as 90 percent successful, when in fact it had failed to meet many of its initial goals. The 90 percent success rate was justified only after program officials rewrote their test goals to bring them more in line with the outcome of the test, GAO said.

In fact, the agency said, a sensor failed to collect useful data, a gyroscope did not operate properly and the interceptor failed to maneuver properly or accurately track its target.

Some $27 billion already has been expended on the program, the Pentagon's largest research project, over the last nine years. It is intended to come up with a family of weapons that can destroy incoming missiles by colliding with them at high speeds, either in space or at lower altitudes.

Congress starts hearing to study desert illnesses

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — As Congress began hearings Wednesday on the mystery illnesses being reported by some veterans of Operation Desert Storm, a group of environmental physicians says it is poised to supply some answers.

A committee headed by Dr. Al Johnson of Dallas is developing diagnostic guidelines to help physicians identify whether Desert Storm vets are suffering from "multiple chemical sensitivity," a type of allergic reaction.

The nine-member panel, formed two weeks ago by the American Academy of Environmental Medicine, is focusing on three environmental exposures in the Persian Gulf region: oil well fires, leaded gasoline and pesticides.

> "What we want to do is confirm this as an environmental illness or exclude that (diagnosis)," said Dr. Charles Hinshaw, president of the 500-member Academy of Environmental Medicine, the Wichita, Kan., pathologist.

Military medical officials have said they have found no evidence of any widespread environmental disease among Desert Storm vets, although they insisted they have not ruled out any cause for the reported illnesses.

A group of Army physicians was expected to report those findings to a subcommittee of the House Veterans Affairs Committee Wednesday.

The panel was to hear from officials of several federal government agencies involved in studying the possible adverse effects on the health of the 570,000 troops who served in the Persian Gulf War.

"We see sickness. It is unusual and seemingly a widespread condition. We want to know what they believe is causing it and if they believe it's connected with service in the Gulf," said Jim Holley, a subcommittee spokesman.

The hearing will also include testimony on the need for Congress to authorize the Veterans Affairs Department to create a medical registry of Desert Storm vets to track any medical problems.

The subcommittee is not scheduled to hear from any veterans or the dozen environmental physicians who have reported seeing Desert Storm veterans with illnesses that other government doctors have not been able to diagnose.

At least two physicians, including Johnson of the Environmental Health Center of Dallas, have concluded that Desert Storm vets they examined were suffering from an adverse reaction to hydrocarbons or petroleum products.

Pete Esker, a spokesman for the Army surgeon general, said both physicians were contacted about their diagnoses but were not invited to a meeting held last month in the Washington area to discuss petroleum exposures. The conferees' preliminary conclusion was that petroleum had not caused the reported ailments, the spokesman said.

Dr. Charles Hinshaw, president of the 500-member Academy of Environmental Medicine, said he set up the study panel because he was concerned that the federal government was not aggressively testing for environmental illnesses.

"What we want to do is confirm this as an environmental illness or exclude that (diagnosis)," said the Wichita, Kan., pathologist. "Either way, I think that's good information for doctors to know."

He suggested military doctors may be misdiagnosing veterans because they lack expertise in environmental medicine.

Senate OKs $8.2 billion in hurricane aid

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — The Senate voted Tuesday to give Florida an estimated $8.2 billion in hurricane recovery aid, but it clipped the wings of Homestead Air Force Base by settling on only $66 million to restore its airfield.

The money for Florida was the major part of a $10.5 billion Senate package — by far the largest federal disaster-relief bill ever considered. It would help South Florida and Louisiana recover from Hurricane Andrew, help Guam rebuild after Typhoon Omar and aid Hawaii after the ravages of Hurricane Iniki.

The Senate bill would give Florida officials virtually all they seek for housing money, school aid, business loans, help for farmers and economic redevelopment.

But the $66 million for the base represents a tactical retreat for the Floridians, who had hoped for at least $480.6 million to start full reconstruction.

Florida's senators and Gov. Lawton Chiles accepted the money gratefully, however, as the best deal they could get for now. They said it would at least clear the way for re-creating a functional aviation facility. Attempts to restore Homestead as a full military base will have to wait until the federal base-closing commission meets next year.

In the eye of a storm of swirling numbers and legislative maneuverings, Florida leaders pronounced themselves generally satisfied with the Senate's work. They expect House and Senate leaders, who still must meet to settle on a final bill, to approve something similar to the package passed Tuesday.

"I think some serious immediate dollars are going to be available for the process of rebuilding the economy of south Dade, the Air Force base, agriculture and small business," said Sen. Bob Graham, D-Fla.

The money provided in the bill must be shared with Louisiana, Guam and Hawaii, but Graham estimated that about $8.2 billion of the total $10.5 billion would go to Florida. The exact distribution was impossible to determine because much of the money would be spent at the discretion of agencies that will work in all four disaster areas, and loan programs are available to residents and businesses in each of them.

Chiles, who has spent several days lobbying his former colleagues in the Senate, concluded: "The package comes up to the numbers we were talking about when we first came up here. It allows us to really get an opportunity to rebuild."

The Senate passed the emergency money bill 84-10 after approving the Air Force base financing by voice vote. Most differences already had been settled through compromises reached in back-room negotiations.

Both Graham and Sen. Connie Mack, R-Fla., voted for the bill.

After realizing they could not get full financing to restore Homestead Air Force Base, Graham and Mack sponsored the $66 million proposal. A larger amount ran into strong resistance from senators concerned about other base closings and defense spending cutbacks.

"I know they would have preferred to have the full restoration, but I think they have made the best possible constructive step at this time," said Sen. Sam Nunn, D-Ga., chairman of the Armed Services Committee.

The $66 million would pay for restoring the runway, control tower, fuel facilities, utilities and structures needed to support aviation. Graham said it would save 3,500 jobs and allow the Customs Service and other non-military federal agencies to operate on the base site.

Mack, who noted that the Senate action came on the 50th anniversary of the base, said the money would at least begin the process of restoring south Dade's economy.

But the Senate action appeared to doom immediate attempts to restore Homestead to its pre-storm status as a major base for F-16 jets and a tactical unit of service personnel.

News of the restoration money was greeted warmly by Homestead officials.

Benning shooters sweep match

Lawton sets two running target records

By Linda Bosley Dailey
Staff Writer

U.S. Army Marksmanship Unit shooters swept the 1992 Interservice Running Target Championships held last week at Fort Benning, winning every event, both team and individual.

AMU running target shooter Sgt. Troy Lawton set two national records during the competition. He also placed first in every individual event, and was a member of the AMU teams that won every team contest at the match, which pitted members of the various branches of the U.S. armed services against each other.

Separately, the AMU International Rifle Team also hosted a national rifle championship match at Fort Benning within the last week. The U.S. International 300-meter Shooting Championships, a national competition for shooters of international events, concluded Monday.

A national record was set during the rifle championship, as well, in the team Free Rifle Prone contest by Capt. David Erickson, Maj. Boyd Goldsby and 2nd Lt. Matt Suggs.

It was in the individual 10-meter Olympic Run match at the Running Target championships that Lawton set the national records — both breaking marks Lawton himself had set in February, according to Karen Mutka, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Shooting Team.

Lawton scored a 584 during the course of fire, breaking his record of 576.

The 584 Lawton scored in that event is, in fact, higher than the world record score, but does not set a world record because the match was not a world-level competition, according to Mutka. The world record for the course of fire is 582, she said.

Lawton's total score for that event — the sum of scores earned during the course of fire and a shoot-off — was the second record he set last week. His total of 677 surpassed his mark of 669, Mutka said. But it probably will be a couple of months before the National Rifle Association, which sanctioned the event, processes the scores and makes the records official, she said.

In the 10-meter Olympic Run match for two-man teams, Lawton and Sgt. Martin Edmondson won first place. In that match for three-man teams, Lawton, Edmondson and Sgt. 1st Class Mike Delk took top honors.

Lawton also took first in the individual contests for 10-meter Mixed Run, 50-meter Mixed Run and 50-meter Olympic Run event. Edmondson took third in the individual 10-meter Mixed Run event and second in the individual 50-meter Mixed Run match.

Lawton and Edmondson teamed up to win the two-man matches in the 10-meter Mixed Run, 50-meter Mixed Run and 50-meter Olympic Run events.

During the rifle team's separate match, record-setters Erickson, Goldsby and Suggs scored 1,792 in the team Free Rifle prone event, taking first place. Another AMU team, made up of Sgt. Tom Tamas, Capt. Glenn Dubis and 1st Lt. Rob Harbison, placed second.

Goldsby won the individual Free Rifle Prone match, while Tamas finished second.

In the Free Rifle 3x40 event, Tamas placed second and Dubis third.

AMU teams swept the top three spots in the team Free Rifle 3x40 event. The Dubis, Harbison and Tamas trio took first place. Suggs, Capt. David Chesser and Erickson placed second, while Capt. Mike Anti, Capt. Stephen Goff and 2nd Lt. Web Wright III placed third.

In the team event for the CISM Standard Rifle, Dubis, Harbison and Suggs placed first. Wright, Maj. James Meredith and Chesser took third.

Dubis won the individual standard rifle, followed by Harbison in second place.

Browder seeks to stall nerve gas incinerator

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — An Alabama congressman has called for a delay in the Army's plans to begin construction next summer of a chemical weapons incinerator at Anniston Army Depot.

Rep. Glen Browder, a Jacksonville Democrat and member of the House Armed Services Committee, said construction should not begin until all questions have been answered about the condition of the nation's chemical weapons and about whether incineration is the best way to dispose of them.

"It simply makes good sense to me to delay construction of the Anniston facility for a while until we get full information on some of the questions that have been raised," Browder said in a statement.

The Anniston facility is one of nine chemical weapons incinerators that the Army plans to build, at a total cost of $7.9 billion. Construction of the first, at Johnston Atoll in the Pacific, has been completed, and Tooele Army Depot in Utah and Anniston are next on the list.

Congress instructed the Army to incorporate "lessons learned" during construction and testing of the Johnston Atoll facility in the design and construction of the Anniston facility.

BROWDER

Browder said, however, that because of delays in the construction and testing program at Johnston Atoll, the Army's window of opportunity for incorporating any lessons learned into the Anniston facility design is "closing rapidly."

Browder said he wants to make sure that all questions about the Army's chemical demilitarization plan are fully answered before any actual construction begins on the Anniston facility.

"It is absolutely critical that we avoid a situation where the Anniston facility is constructed and other sites canceled, thereby leaving the possibility of our being considered as a regional incinerator," he said.

The Army originally planned to build only two incinerators, in Utah and Anniston, to incinerate the chemical weapons, but rejected it because of concerns about dangers posed by transporting such weapons to regional sites.

Two Alabama groups held news conferences last Friday in Birmingham and Huntsville to warn that there may be efforts under way in Congress to resurrect the regional disposal idea.

The Alabama Conservancy and a Calhoun County group, Families Against Nerve Gas Incineration, said language in the Senate version of the fiscal 1993 defense authorization bill asks the Army to determine if it's realistic "to transport chemical agents and munitions" from depots in Maryland, Indiana and Kentucky to other locations for destruction.

Pat Byington, executive director of the Alabama Conservancy, said Anniston is not mentioned in the bill as a regional disposal site, but, "I want to make sure that we are focused on the possibility of Anniston becoming the regional facility for the east."

Browder said the Alabama congressional delegation would be united against any such effort. And he said he intends to work to get language in the final version of the fiscal 1993 defense authorization bill that would delay construction of the Anniston facility.

Sen. Howell Heflin, D-Ala., also released a statement last Friday opposing use of the Anniston base as a regional incinerator for chemical weapons. Heflin said last year's Pentagon budget forbids the Army from even considering moving chemical weapons, and said there was no bill currently in congress to reverse that requirement.

Lockheed to produce new missile

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon has awarded a $688 million contract to a team of contractors headed by Lockheed Missiles and Space Co. for developing the first stages of a new mobile, ground-based ballistic missile defense system.

The system is intended to be a vast improvement on the Patriot anti-missile missile used in the war with Iraq last year. Known by the acronym THAAD, it is formally called a Theater High Altitude Area Defense.

With wide support in Congress, the new missile would become the cornerstone of the Strategic Defense Initiative Organization's theater missile defense program.

The Patriot destroyed an incoming missile through an explosion from its warhead as they neared each other. The THAAD system is envisioned as a "hit-to-kill" weapon, ramming its rams its target so fast that the impact would destroy it.

The total cost for developing and producing two fielded battalions of the weapons is expected by the Pentagon to exceed $6 billion.

The Patriot system was used in Israel and Saudi Arabia to counter Iraq's Scuds during the Persian Gulf War. Originally it was designed to protect small areas from cruise missile attacks. But it was upgraded to also shoot down short-range missiles.

AIDS-infected soldier sentenced for failing to practice safe sex

From wire reports

FORT STEWART, Ga. — A soldier infected with the AIDS virus has been sentenced to three years in an Army stockade for failing to practice safe sex with several partners.

Spec. April Patterson, 24, who was stationed at Fort Stewart in southeast Georgia, was convicted last week on charges of aggravated assault and disobeying a superior. She was transferred to the stockade at Fort Lewis, Wash., and demoted to the lowest military grade, Army officials said Tuesday.

One of Patterson's former sex partners, also a Fort Stewart soldier, has tested positive for HIV, the AIDS virus.

"He testified that he is certain he contracted it from her," said Fort Stewart spokesman Dean Wohlgemuth.

The Army has tried a number of such cases since it began pursuing AIDS-related prosecutions in 1988, a Department of the Army spokesman said. HIV-positive soldiers at Fort Sam Houston, Texas, and Fort Sill, Okla., have been confined or discharged for failing to practice safe sex, said the spokesman, Maj. Rick Thomas.

Thomas said soldiers who test positive for HIV receive counseling and are ordered to practice safe sex, which includes using condoms and informing partners of their condition.

A former sexual partner brought the charges against Patterson, and several other partners later came forward with similar charges.

Prosecutors claimed Patterson, who was diagnosed as HIV-positive in 1986, continued having unprotected sex despite orders from three commanders that she use condoms. She also was ordered to inform her partners that she was HIV positive.

Former partners testified that Patterson failed to tell them she carried the AIDS virus and didn't insist on using condoms.

The military panel that heard Patterson's case rejected the prosecution's request that she be dishonorably discharged. The panel also recommended that she be required to enter psychiatric counseling to help her deal with the disease.

Warheads are just part of community's life

From wire reports

GOOSE CREEK, S.C. — Private researchers call this the nuclear warhead capital of America, with more than 2,200 warheads stored at a military base. But that didn't seem to bother townsfolk interviewed recently.

"There are a lot of things more pressing than worrying where the nuclear warheads are," said Rosemary Seal, who runs a consignment shop just off U.S. 52, the four-lane highway that is the town's main street.

Researchers William Arkin and Robert Norris estimated the number of warheads from searching public records. They said Wednesday the number on U.S. soil is increasing as they are moved back from overseas as a result of disarmament.

The Charleston Naval Weapons Station and adjacent Polaris Missile Facility Atlantic have the most warheads of any U.S. site, with 2,258, the researchers said.

The Navy isn't saying anything.

"We're not even confirming or denying the presence of nuclear weapons," Lt. Cmdr. Max Allen said.

But if there are 2,258, that's almost one warhead for every 10 people in Goose Creek, a suburb of strip shopping centers, fast-food restaurants and video stores about 20 miles north of Charleston.

About all an outsider sees of the weapons station is a chain-link fence and an occasional tree-shrouded building on 16,557 acres — an area bigger than Charleston — along the Cooper River.

The only indication that the complex handles warheads are five white-and-black submarine ballistic missiles on one side of the entrance.

The center provides jobs for 2,135 Navy and civilian workers and has an annual payroll of $45 million.

"I'd say the economy worries people more than the bombs do," said Shirley Elrod, a clerk in a school supply store. "There's danger in everything. You could slip and fall in the bathtub."

But she does worry that in event of war the weapons station would be one of the first targets for enemy missiles.

"We've been a military community for a long time," City Administrator Dennis Harmon said. "With that goes a certain understanding and acceptance of what is there and the mission they are carrying out."

The Naval Weapons Station was built during World War II. The city annexed it in 1978.

"I have never in my life ever heard anybody express any concern about the weapons," said Democratic state Rep. Jack Williams, whose district includes Goose Creek.

"I would rather they were storing nuclear weapons rather than nuclear waste," he said. "If you hauled all the weapons out of there today you would have a clean area. You wouldn't if you had nuclear waste."

Just up the road from the weapons station, at the Goose Creek United Methodist Church, the Rev. William Kevin Coole said the weapons station and nuclear warheads are a part of life.

"I haven't encountered anybody who sees it as an evil in any way. Necessary, yes, but not evil," he said.

Top pilot lives to fly out in front of the pack

From wire reports

ABOARD THE USS INDEPENDENCE — Capt. Arthur N. "Bud" Langston believes in being first: He is the top pilot on the Independence, the only aviator qualified to fly all three Navy attack aircraft and he commanded the first mission over southern Iraq.

After 24 years in the Navy, with more than 300 combat missions in Vietnam and the Gulf War under his belt, Langston said he knows what it takes to be successful in battle.

"If we're going to have to fight, then I certainly would want to be the one up front leading," he said.

But Langston, 47, the commander of Carrier Air Wing Five, is far happier that the 70 aircraft and 115 pilots on the Independence are doing quiet patrols over southern Iraq without, so far, having to fire a shot.

"I think we're saving lives every day," he said. "And as long as we fly over them, the Iraqis are intimidated and they're not going to do the kind of horrors to their people that we felt was going on before."

The United States, Britain and France began patrolling the "no-fly" zone below the 32nd parallel on Aug. 27 to protect Shiite Muslims sheltering there.

On the face of it, Iraqi President Saddam Hussein is showing no sign of militarily challenging the air exclusion zone.

Still, there have been reports from Iraqi dissidents and the U.S. Pentagon of continuing Iraqi ground action against the Shiites, many of whom fled to the marshes after a failed uprising last year.

While Navy pilots routinely fly two attack aircraft and do precision-demanding night carrier landings only in one, Langston can do night landings in all three — the A-6 Intruder bomber, the FA-18 Hornet fighter-bomber and the F-14 Tomcat fighter.

He also can fly every other aircraft on the carrier, including the E-2C Hawkeye early warning plane and the EA-6B Prowler which does electronic warfare, and has notched up more than 5,000 flying hours and over 1,100 carrier landings.

Born in San Diego, Langston was a student at San Diego State University at the height of the Vietnam War in 1967 and knew he was going to get drafted. He beat them to the punch and enlisted. He wound up doing two tours in Vietnam, flying A-6s.

He flew bombing missions over Iraq and Kuwait from the USS Saratoga two weeks into the air war.

Post pumping money into general's home

By Jim Lynn and Jerry Rutledge
Staff Writers

Riverside, the historic mansion used as the home of Fort Benning's commanding general, has new curtains.

Fort Benning has spent $14,200 this year on new curtains and mini-blinds for Riverside, the home of Maj. Gen. Jerry A. White.

The post also has spent $12,300 in the first two quarters of fiscal 1992 on keeping the grounds around Riverside in shape. That's 26 percent more for lawn upkeep than the $9,800 spent in all of last year and almost double the $6,500 spent in fiscal 1990.

WHITE

Directorate of Engineering and Housing officials say the drapes were in bad shape and needed replacing. The new ones are good quality and should last at least 15 years. The grounds were not well maintained in the last few years and needed some work, according to Col. Pat Kenny of the DEH and Housing chief Ken Hankins.

But money is tight at Fort Benning this year. And some on post say that with budget cutting and talk of layoffs, regardless of the needs at Riverside, the spending fuels concern about post priorities.

"That's a lot of money," one soldier's wife remarked this week.

The spending data were obtained by the Benning Patriot under the federal Freedom of Information Act. White has declined to be interviewed on the subject. He also declined a request to view the renovations.

In the first two quarters of fiscal 1992, covering the period Oct. 1991-March 1992, $60,418 has been spent on repair and renovations at Riverside, or "Quarters One," as the home is officially designated.

In all of 1990, the post spent $75,900, the bulk of which included $42,700 to replace the roof and $17,100 for painting. In 1991, the post spent $24,530, the biggest single item being $7,000 for new carpet.

Kenny and Hankins said in a recent interview that the home had been allowed to deteriorate, and was in need of repairs. Built in 1909 as a summer home for Columbus businessman Arthur Bussey, Riverside is listed on the National Register of Historic Places. That makes it a particularly tricky — and expensive — home to renovate, Kenny and Hankins said.

"Everything you do in that house is difficult because it's old," Kenny said. "That's what makes that house different from others."

By Joe Maher/The Benning Patriot

Riverside, the home of the post commander, is listed on the National Register of Historic Places.

In 1983, Army officials decided to renovate the home instead of razing it and building a new commanding general's house, former Benning historian Albert Garland said.

The draperies needed replacing both because they were worn out and because the style was outdated, those familiar with the project said.

"I've been here 15 years, and the drapes have never been replaced since I've been here," Hankins said. "They were old, they were rotten, and it was time to replace them."

The project involved installing 13 sets of drapes and sheer curtains 53 inches wide by about 10 feet tall. The "Empire style" window treatments were designed free of charge by Gwendolyn Brownlee, the wife of former Benning garrison commander Col. William Brownlee. The roughly 5,000-square foot home includes five bedrooms and three bathrooms.

"And the quality of the drapes, you wanted them to be high quality, and they should last another 15 years," Kenny said.

As with the draperies, the same holds true for the entire home, Kenny and Hankins said.

"Right now we're playing catch up," Hankins said. "A lot of this work should have been done years ago, but some of the previous general officers said, 'not on my watch,' and now we're playing catch up."

The grounds work has involved a lot of shrubbery replacement, among other items, DEH officials said.

"That's a big place," Kenny said of the 10.5-acre grounds. "If there was any fault there, it's probably on the part of DEH, rather than anybody else, in that we didn't do a real swift job of how we were taking care of that place."

Riverside is used for entertaining guests and for official receptions, Benning officials said. It needs to be a showplace, so a good image of Fort Benning is given dignitaries as well as incoming officers, Benning spokesman Al Blanchard said.

"Young officers get to see how the general lives, and it instills a sense of tradition," Blanchard said.

But of a dozen Benning residents interviewed at random this week, 11 said they wonder if the image is a good one.

"My husband's an E-5 in the Army and we've lived on a lot of posts," one soldier's wife said. She spoke, like others, on the condition her name not be used. "This is one where the housing is run down, and when they do fix things, they just do the minimum. You know if they fix something down there, it's top notch. In my opinion, $14,000 for something like that is out of the question."

World War II: The atomic era begins

By Albert N. Garland

The United States Army played a key role in the formation and administration of the Manhattan Project, the World War II organization that produced the atomic bombs that not only contributed decisively to ending the war with Japan but also began the atomic era.

Al Garland

Officially, the Army did not become responsible for the atomic energy program until June 18, 1942. But this action grew out of developments that had begun with the outbreak of the war in Europe in September 1939.

On the morning of Oct. 11, 1939, President Franklin Roosevelt met with Alexander Sachs, one of his informal advisors. Sachs was familiar with the subject of atomic energy and had become convinced of the possible military application of that energy if it could be harnessed.

Sachs had with him a letter signed by Albert Einstein addressed to the president with an attached memorandum from Leo Szilard, a well-known physicist who was then at Columbia University experimenting with achieving a chain reaction in uranium. Both documents urged the president to support continuing research in the field, research they felt could possibly lead to the construction of a new type of extremely powerful bomb.

After Sachs summarized the problem for the president, and after pointing out the amount of nuclear research then going on in Germany, he urged the president to give his full support to the research efforts then going on in this country and to the establishment of a liaison effort between the government and the scientists. At a second meeting with Sachs the next morning, Oct. 12, the president was convinced of the need for immediate action.

The first reaction from the Army to the military potential of atomic energy was not generally enthusiastic. Its representatives questioned whether nuclear research had advanced far enough for the government to support it with any reasonable hope of success.

The first group formed to oversee the government's role in the program was the President's Advisory Committee on Uranium, established the same day the president gave his approval to the program. By early 1940, government money began to flow in small amounts to the various researchers.

Developments in May 1940 in the laboratories and in Europe brought further justification for additional funds for nuclear research. This began a two-year period of rapid growth in the research program to exploit atomic energy for military purposes. During these years the government left development of the new energy source to civilian organizations, and Army participation, which had been limited at best, ceased almost completely.

The first reaction from the Army to the military potential of atomic energy was not generally enthusiastic. Its representatives questioned whether nuclear research had advanced far enough for the government to support it with any reasonable hope of success.

By early 1942, the program had grown into a large research and development enterprise, with civilian scientists working at a number of sites across the country. In March 1942, the president became convinced that the atomic energy program had to have better organization and more funds, and he now wanted an all-out effort to develop an atomic bomb as soon as possible.

The president also decided the Army would have the primary responsibility for attaining that goal. At the same time, he directed that there should be a complete interchange of information with the British. Final plans for the Army's takeover of the program — using its Corps of Engineers as its primary agent — were approved on June 17, 1942.

Initially, the Corps created the Manhattan District with Col. James C. Marshall as the district commander. The district had no territorial limits but its headquarters were first set up in New York City. As one of its first actions, the district selected the Tennessee Valley region as the prime location for its needed large-scale production plants. Several other locations were selected for smaller operations.

It soon became apparent that a district organization would not suffice and Brig. Gen. Leslie R. Groves, an aggressive and hard-driving engineer officer, was assigned to head the atomic effort, now referred to as the Manhattan Project, and almost immediately faced a number of seemingly insurmountable obstacles. Eventually, he and the project's scientists would develop the world's first atomic bomb. But more of this later.

Al Garland is former editor of Infantry magazine. He writes columns for the Benning Patriot occasionally.

Economy key issue for backers at Clinton rally

By Jerry Rutledge, Clint Claybrook and Ben Wright
Staff Writers

CLINTON GORE

Byron Evans is a banker. Young and upwardly mobile, Evans has his own clear ideas about what is best for the future of Columbus and the rest of the United States.

He came into the Columbus Iron Works Convention & Trade Center believing in Democratic presidential candidate Bill Clinton's ideas on reshaping America's economy and defense. Nothing Evans heard Wednesday morning changed his mind.

"I came here for three basic reasons," Evans said. "One being my strong support for the Clinton-Gore campaign, two being because I am very displeased with the lack of social and economic progress the country has made under President Bush and three being because this is a part of history. I think Clinton has spoken strongly to the issues.

"We've had 12 years under the Reagan-Bush type trickle-down theory and it just doesn't work."

Evans' comments supporting Clinton were typical of many in the strongly partisan crowd, estimated at 3,500 people, that ventured out to see Clinton and his running mate, Albert Gore Jr., at the Trade Center.

"What we have now hasn't worked so far," Dawn Symuleski said of the nation's economy. "I think anything is going to be better."

Symuleski and her 11-year old daughter, Shannon, rode a bus with 47 Clinton supporters from Auburn, Ala. She said she and her husband, a sailor, know about waste in the military. She served in the Navy before entering graduate school.

Lillian Leonard, a single mother of two, said she supports Clinton's economic proposals, such as cutting some defense spending in favor of spending on social programs. "As a single parent, I need health-care benefits, child-care benefits and a better education," added Leonard, a 25-year-old hospital employee.

Like most people in the crowd, Dr. Delmar Edwards of Columbus said the economy is the number one issue. He repeated Clinton's view that America can't be strong abroad and weak at home. "We've got to get the economy back on track and then turn our attention to the (budget) deficit," Edwards said. "Until you turn the economy around, there is nothing you can do about the deficit problem. I think they are exactly on track."

The crowd — a mixture of businessmen, retired military men, wives, students and surprisingly few soldiers — mostly discounted the draft issue that has dogged Clinton.

They said they believe Fort Benning would remain viable under Clinton's defense policy, despite proposed budget cuts that would likely decrease military and civilian personnel levels. Most in the crowd also endorsed Clinton's economic plan to partially retrain soldiers and defense workers discharged in the military drawdown. They would perform service jobs — like teaching or law enforcement — and earn credit toward military retirement.

Offering those types of jobs to soldiers would be good for national pride, said Eli Gardner, a retired Army officer.

"Being a retired military person, I'm glad to see someone is interested in what will happen to some of these people displaced because of the cutbacks," said Carlton Smyrer, a 25-year Army veteran. "When you start reducing services and everything, that's a lot of people being unemployed."

Smyrer said he feels Fort Benning is safe from any major cuts despite the shrinking military budget. The fiscal 1993 budget forced the involuntary separation of at least 134 post civilian workers, with troop cuts a possibility in the future. "I believe Fort Benning is in a position to remain strong because of its mission," he said.

Ex-soldiers an asset to Southeast, leaders say

ATLANTA — Hiring soldiers left jobless by the nation's massive defense cuts will help the Southeast rebound from the recession, military and economic leaders said Tuesday.

BURBA

"Our soldiers learn about responsibility and leadership very early on," said Gen. Edwin H. Burba Jr., head of the U.S. Army's Forces Command, based at Fort McPherson. "They're intelligent, disciplined people with leadership experience who can learn to succeed in a variety of settings."

Burba addressed about 200 government, education and business leaders who met in Atlanta for a forum on how ex-soldiers can fit into the civilian business world.

About 500,000 soldiers are expected to be left jobless over the next five years because of defense cuts. Many reside in the Southeast, long a stronghold for the nation's Defense Department.

Textile and other industries have made the Southeast a region known for low-paying, low-skill jobs, but now those types of jobs are going to other countries, where labor is even cheaper, said Robert P. Forrestal, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta.

To rebound from the recession and recover its economic base, the Southeast will have to increase its education levels, diversify the work force, and increase its amounts of exports and entrepreneurs, Forrestal said.

"In each of the four areas ... the military seems to have been training its people well," he said.

Soldiers are skilled not just in fighting but in computers, and also know from experience the importance of continued on-the-job training, he said. Thus they could work in various businesses, start their own or teach, Forrestal said.

As minorities make up more than 35 percent of Army personnel, soldiers are used to the diversified workplace the Southeast needs to cultivate, and their Army travel gives them the cultural understanding needed for export markets, he said.

Triplett has a lofty view of world

She's only fifth woman to jump with Silver Wings

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

By Joe Maher/The Benning Patriot

Silver Wings team leader Sgt. 1st Class Dave Wilmot (r) checks Pfc. Kellie Triplett's parachute before a jump.

Kellie Triplett is the self-acknowledged "black sheep" of her family after opting for the Army when her grandfather, father and her brother Nathaniel had all joined the Navy to see the world.

Now, however, Pfc. Triplett, only the fifth woman to jump with the Army's Silver Wings parachute team at Fort Benning, can look down on those sea-going men — like from 10,000 feet straight up — while she is doing back flips and gliding from side to side, "almost flying," waiting for her parachute to pop open.

How did this Pittsburg, Kan., soldier get to this point in her Army career, which began with her enlistment on May 23, 1991?

"I needed a break from college, I wanted to do something different, I needed a job (paying) more money. I wanted to do something interesting, and I wanted to do something because the (Persian Gulf) war was starting," she said.

Maybe she was driven by strange yearnings, Triplett acknowledges. "I've always wanted to jump out of an airplane, and I finally found someone who'll pay me to do it," she said.

The Airborne attraction started before she even signed on the dotted line for a three-year stint in the Army. "I was with a recruiter and I saw a poster about the Airborne. He said, 'You don't want to go Airborne.' I said, 'Yeah, I do.' "

So, at age 22, she's a parachute packer by trade — assigned to the 1st Battalion, 507th Parachute Infantry Regiment at Fort Benning, with 22 static line and 16 free-fall jumps, the kind the sky diving Silver Wings members do, behind her.

Triplett says static line jumps have become "boring," while free-fall jumps like the one she did last week for practice with about a dozen other Silver Wings members in two flights in a UH-1 Huey helicopter over Fort Benning some two miles away from the landing zone still produce that adrenaline kick that makes you feel like your heart's going to explode in your chest about the time you go out the chopper's door.

She'll never forget the first free-fall jump, Triplett said. "I was standing up in the aircraft looking down at the world, and the world was an awful long distance away.

"I was so scared I couldn't remember my name," she said. "When I exited the aircraft, my heart stopped ... Free-falling is the closest thing you can get to flying without wings."

Triplett says she "only got interested in the Army because they have a veterinarian corps (the Veterinarian Service). As soon as I get out of the Army in 1994, I'm going right back to vets school." Triplett was in her third year at Kansas State University when she opted for what she calls a "long vacation" from the books.

Although she's only the fifth female to jump with the Silver Wings, Triplett is now only one-third of the female contingent and could become the third to jump as part of demonstrations. Pvt. Jolie Jesensky and Cpl. Chris Jim are the others. Free-fall jumps are addictive, Triplett says, "When I don't get to do it for a while, I get withdrawal, I get real cranky."

Sgt. 1st Class Dave Wilmot, Silver Wings team leader, says there's no special consideration given his female jumpers: "They do everything the guys do. I told them, 'You're going to basically be one of the guys. We don't have enough personnel to let some (soldiers) get off with not doing what everybody else does."

You won't see Triplett or the other females doing demonstration jumps yet, "I don't have enough jumps to do demonstrations yet, but I work with all the demonstrations, though," running the radio that keeps folks on the ground in touch with the jumpers, or whatever." It could take another six or eight months for her to qualify for those precision-jump demonstrations.

Landing within a handful of feet from a target like the Silver Wings do takes a lot of practice. Last week Jesensky, who looks like she might weigh 100 pounds, if that, caught a stout wind on the way down and was blown maybe a mile and a half off target, landing near Lawson Army Airfield instead of near an Airborne memorial marker behind Infantry Hall.

What does a parachutist think about when she stands in the door, ready to leap out into nothingness? "I just say I love to fly," Triplett responds.

Silver Wings looking to bring more women aboard

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

Sgt. 1st Class Dave Wilmot, noncommissioned officer in charge of the Silver Wings, says the demonstration parachute team is "trying to get more women involved" in this elite outfit that jumps from shore to shore and just about everywhere they're wanted during a year's time.

In a year, the Silver Wings will do 300 to 500 jumps and if the team ever goes two weeks without a demonstration jump, it's back to training jumps — just to keep skill levels high. After all, when a Silver Wings parachutist leaps from an aircraft at maybe 10,000 feet, looking to land within 10 feet from a buddy on the ground, some two miles away, he — or she — has almost no room for error.

That's why it takes at least 100 free-fall jumps to make an on-post demonstration team and 200 to qualify for the team that travels around the country bailing out in support of various anti-drug campaigns, recruiting drives or fund-raisers. Two weekends back, there were 14 jumps from Friday through Monday.

Wilmot typically has 14 team members, but has 18 at the moment, three of them women. "The number of women wanting to jump versus those qualified makes it looks like we're anti-women, but we're really not," he said.

At 36, Wilmot is waiting for his master sergeant stripes and will probably leave the Silver Wings job for a first sergeant slot somewhere in the 507th Parachute Infantry when he gets the new chevrons.

He has about eight years with the parachute team and somewhere near 580 jumps. Looking back that far, he says, "This is not for everybody. There (are) people who want to do it, they just don't have the required natural ability. They sometimes find out it's just not their cup of tea."

Wilmot tries to keep the number of dropouts down by warning would-be team members that "this requires that something extra. I try to make it sound as ugly as possible.

"(But) we don't do a lot of fun jumping. There's a lot of difference between demonstration jumpers and just being a sky diver," he said. "Every time we jump, we're doing some kind of training."

There's no special treatment of females, he said. "If they have the desire, we have the ability to make it go and give them the ability to be demonstration jumpers."

Delta offers airfare break for those traveling on emergency leave

By Jim Poole
Business Editor

Delta Air Lines has introduced a more flexible fare program for emergency leave by active military personnel and their dependents.

The new program replaces special military leave fares that were eliminated in mid-April by the restructuring of airline fares.

Now, with orders specifically marked "emergency leave," military personnel and accompanying dependents will be eligible for lower, seven-day advance purchase rates with restrictions waived.

"We felt it important to recognize the special needs in last-minute leave situations of the men and women of our armed forces — men and women who perform an important and admirable role for our country," said Robert W. Coggin, Delta's senior vice president of marketing.

Military passengers must present an active duty green ID card and a copy of leave orders specifically marked "Emergency Leave." Any dependents accompanying the passenger must travel to the same destination and must be ticketed at the same time.

The fares included are Delta's seven-day advance purchase excursion fares. The fare program is good for travel within the United States, Puerto Rico, and the U. S. Virgin Islands.

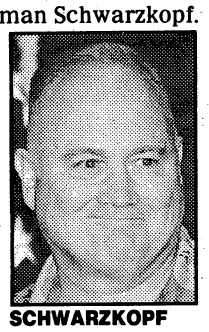
Schwarzkopf defends Baghdad decision

Associated Press

NEW YORK — Invading Baghdad to topple Saddam Hussein would have bogged down the United States in a quagmire "like the dinosaur in the tar pit," according to Desert Storm commander H. Norman Schwarzkopf.



SCHWARZKOPF

"The legitimacy for what we were doing was the United Nations resolution which called for us to kick the Iraqis out of Kuwait," the retired four-star general said in an interview for "Newsweek on Air" carried by The Associated Press radio network.

"We never considered going to Baghdad. . . . We'd accomplished our mission."

Schwarzkopf also defends the decision in his forthcoming biography, "It Doesn't Take A Hero." He also complains in the book of being pressured by Bush administration "hawks" he said had seen too many war movies and wanted to rush coalition forces into battle before they were ready.

"The increasing pressure to launch the ground war early was making me crazy," he wrote. "There had to be a contingent of hawks in Washington who did not want to stop until we'd punished Saddam. We'd been bombing Iraq for more than a month, but it wasn't good enough. These were guys who had seen John Wayne in 'The Green Berets,' they'd seen 'Rambo,' they'd seen 'Patton,' and it was very easy for them to pound their desks and say, 'By God, we've got to go in there. Gotta punish that son of a bitch!' Of course, none of them was going to get shot at."

Schwarzkopf doesn't identify the administration hawks or say whether they were reflecting the wishes of President Bush, whom he praises.

His book will be released later this month by Linda Grey-Bantam publishers in New York.

In the radio interview, Schwarzkopf said going to Baghdad would have splintered the fragile 28-member coalition that ejected Iraq. And he said the cease-fire saved American lives.

Schwarzkopf also discusses the cease-fire's timing in his book, excerpts of which appear in the Newsweek issue available on newsstands today.

In a phone call with Gen. Colin Powell, chairman of the joint chiefs of staff, Schwarzkopf said he wanted to keep going on the advice of his commanders.

"I want to continue the ground attack . . . drive to the sea and totally destroy everything in our path," Schwarzkopf told Powell. "In one more day we'll be done."

But when Powell called back and told him the White House wanted to stop the ground war after 100 hours, Schwarzkopf agreed. The Iraqi army was in full flight from Kuwait, and U.S. pilots were bombing convoys along an escape route called the "Highway of Death."

"I'd have been happy to keep on destroying the Iraqi military for the next six months. Yet we'd kicked this guy's butt, leaving no doubt in anyone's mind that we'd won decisively, and we'd done it with very few casualties. Why not end it? Why get somebody else killed? That made up my mind," he wrote.

The book also tells of disagreements with Powell, frustration over the sluggishness of a commander to attack Iraq's Republican Guard, and, from his early years, he says his mother was an alcoholic.

Schwarzkopf had fueled second-guessing over the cease-fire when he told interviewer David Frost that he wanted "to continue the march." He later apologized and said he agreed 100 percent with President Bush.

But in his book, Schwarzkopf said he "felt irritated" that "Washington was ready to overreact, as usual, to the slightest ripple in public opinion" over the bombing of the fleeing convoys.

"I thought, but didn't say, that the best thing the White House could do would be to turn off the damned TV in the situation room," Schwarzkopf wrote.

But part of Washington's thinking was formed by Schwarzkopf's "mother of all briefings," in which he told the world that the coalition had effectively destroyed the Iraqis by the fourth day of fighting.

He also said leaders in Washington knew some Republican Guard units would escape with their top-of-the-line T-72 tanks. "The White House now understood that some tanks would get away and had decided to accept it."

At bottom, Schwarzkopf defended the outcome of Desert Storm, even if U.S. forces are now back in the Persian Gulf enforcing a "no-fly" zone of Iraqi aircraft.

"Had we taken all of Iraq, we would have been like the dinosaur in the tar pit — we would still be there, and we, not the United Nations, would be bearing the costs for that occupation," Schwarzkopf said.

Attending festivals while leaf watching not bad idea

By Jean Allen
Fort Lauderdale Sun-Sentinel

Q. We've made a last-minute decision to take a week off in October and take a driving trip to see the autumn leaves somewhere in the South. But we have no idea where to go, except that we would prefer a place where there is a festival or outdoor event going on. And where the leaves would be pretty. Any suggestions? — W.N., Hallandale, Fla.

A. Timing depends on weather, rainfall and altitude, but autumn leaves in the South are generally at their brightest from about the second week in October through the end of the month.

Of the many October events in areas of good fall color in the South, I consider the following most worth driving to see:

National Storytelling Festival, Jonesborough, Tenn., Oct. 2-4. This year marks the 20th anniversary of the event that features top storytellers from all over the nation, so more tale tellers than usual will be there. Call 1-615-753-2171 or write NAPPS, P.O. Box 309, Jonesborough, Tenn. 37659.

Gold Rush Days, Dahlonega, Ga., Oct. 19-20. Visitors can pan for gold and gemstones in this former gold-rush town where gold was found years before the California gold strike.

Fall Color Cruise and Folk Festival, Chattanooga, Oct. 24-25 and Oct. 31-Nov. 1. Two weekends of music, dance, crafts and other entertainment include cruises through the "Grand Canyon" of the Tennessee River during autumn-leaf season. Contact Rayford McLaurin at 1-615-238-4626.

Pfc. Patrick Grover wrestles with the twists and turns of a butterfly knot.

KNOTS can mean life or death

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

"It's dangerous hanging from 40 feet at the end of a rope. So you need to make sure you tied it right." That's as good an explanation as any for why Ranger School students, during the mountaineering phase of their training spend up to 15 hours learning the dozen knots they must master before taking on rock faces and the mountains at Camp Merrill.

On the third day of their Dahlonega, Ga., stay, each would-be Ranger must prove his proficiency at the knots that might spell the difference someday between life and death or the success or failure of a mission.

"He gets 45 seconds to two and a half minutes, depending on the complexity of the knot," said 1st Lt. James Jarrard, the 5th Ranger Training Battalion's civil and public affairs officer. Like other "go, no-go" stations along the way, a flunked knot test can send a soldier back to the start of mountaineering training, Jarrard said.

These are not everyday knots. The "bowline on a coil" for instance is described as a tie-in knot that climbers use on two-party climbs, the knot used to tie each guy's rope around his waist, so that if one falls the other should be able to keep him from crashing off a cliff.

There are others with catchy names, like the single butterfly knot, which Jarrard said is used when a loop is needed in the middle of a rope, such as in the case of construction of a rope bridge. The knot allows Ranger students to take the slack out of the bridge by pulling against the knot in the middle.

Benning Patriot photographer Joe Maher caught these Rangers at work on their knots during a visit to Camp Merrill.

1st Lt. David Northridge, a Ranger student, finds the figure 8 knot can be a bit of a tongue twister, too.

Ceremony pays tribute to all POW/MIA soldiers

By Jerry Rutledge
Patriot Editor

Harmon Okay Parker brought the POW/MIA question into stark and vivid reality Friday afternoon with his speech during Fort Benning's annual Prisoner of War/Missing in Action Recognition Day at Marshall Auditorium in Infantry Hall.

The ceremony paid tribute to all former American soldiers who were held prisoner by enemy forces, soldiers missing in action and their families. Parker, a resident of Columbus, was captured during the fall of the Philippines in World War II and was held prisoner under the harshest of conditions for three years in POW camps on those islands and in Japan. He was finally liberated by Allied forces in 1945.

The soldiers who packed the auditorium to capacity listened to Parker describe the hard work, the brutality of the guards, the lack of nourishing food and the mental pain of watching "friends I was very close to die" because of the conditions.

By the time Parker was liberated, he weighed only 100 pounds. "They kept us for a month, feeding us, before they returned us home," Parker said. "They didn't want (our physical condition) to scare anybody." After that month, Parker's weight was 150 pounds.

Before the former prisoner's speech, Fort Benning commander Maj. Gen. Jerry White told the soldiers in attendence that if they were to be captured and held prisoner, the Army "would exhaust every effort to liberate" them. White honored Parker with a commendation while the audience responded with a standing ovation.

Parker, a Bainbridge, Ga. native, retired in 1978 after serving as deputy clerk for the U.S. District Court for a quarter century. He also served as a U.S. magistrate.

Kissinger blasts POW allegation

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — Henry Kissinger on Tuesday denounced as "a flat-out lie" the allegation that he and others knew U.S. servicemen were left behind when the war in Southeast Asia ended two decades ago.

Two people who made such suggestions Monday were Kissinger's colleagues from the Nixon administration — defense secretaries James R. Schlesinger and Melvin Laird.

KISSINGER

But the former secretary of state and national security adviser acknowledged that even as he negotiated peace with the North Vietnamese, he recognized they had not provided an adequate accounting for missing Americans.

And in a sometimes hostile exchange with members of a Senate committee, Kissinger didn't rule out the possibility that some Americans survived after U.S. soldiers were withdrawn from the jungles of Southeast Asia in 1973.

"I think it's improbable any are alive today," Kissinger said. "I have always kept open the possibility in my mind there were some in Laos."

Kissinger's intensely defensive, sometimes combative testimony came under oath before an extraordinary hearing by the Senate Select Committee on POW-MIA Affairs.

The bipartisan panel is trying to answer lingering questions about the fate of missing soldiers and airmen two decades after the conclusion of the Vietnam War, which divided the nation.

Kissinger testified a day after other former Nixon officials, including Schlesinger and Laird, said they believed some American prisoners were still in Vietnam or Laos after the withdrawal of U.S. troops and the 1973 release of more than 591 prisoners of war. The former defense secretaries cited reliable reports of more POWs, particularly in Laos, than were released.

Kissinger said neither man ever expressed those views at the time.

"If we had known, if we had heard this, we would have acted on it," Kissinger said.

He bitterly disputed suggestions "that when President Nixon announced that all prisoners were on the way home, he or his aides knew that many were left behind."

"The allegation is a flat-out lie," Kissinger said, blaming the assertions on "leaks that could only have come from this inquiry."

Kissinger acknowledged receiving "some reports alleging that live Americans were still in Indochina," and said they "were taken seriously" by U.S. officials.

The Senate committee room was crowded with spectators, some Vietnam veterans wearing camouflage jackets and war decorations. Some were relatives of men still unaccounted for, such as Collene Shine of Arlington, Va., whose father, Air Force Lt. Col. Anthony Shine, was downed Dec. 2, 1972 on the Lao-North Vietnam border.

"The families have been lied to," she said. "We have been victims of lies and a lack of effort."

Kissinger challenged the committee's chairman, Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass. He said Kerry's anti-war efforts at that time contributed to the political climate that made it impossible for the administration to obtain a fuller accounting from North Vietnam, even after one was required by the Paris peace accords.

"It is totally inappropriate for whose who prevented any sort of military action to blame those of us who wanted to enforce the agreement," Kissinger said.

A decorated Vietnam veteran, Kerry turned against the war in 1970, testifying before Congress and helping found the Vietnam Veterans Against the War.

"Look, I didn't ask for this job," Kerry told Kissinger. "I'm here because 20 years later the questions still confound America."

Emotions flow as World War II tank unit reunites

By Jerry Rutledge
Patriot Editor

When Frank Lumpkin talks about the 709th Tank Battalion, his voice quivers with the emotion of his memories.

Lumpkin, who served as executive officer of the 709th during the unit's World War II campaigns, says occasions like last weekend's reunion brings such memories into clear, sharp focus.

Almost 200 former members of the 709th journeyed to Columbus from all parts of the United States for last weekend's reunion. The event was highlighted by the dedication of a monument to the unit on the grounds of the Infantry Museum at Fort Benning.

"It was a great occasion for everybody. We had people who had not seen each other for 20, 25 or 30 years meet each other again," said Lumpkin. "And it was just like we'd seen each other yesterday."

The 709th Tank Battalion was activated from the 3rd Battalion, 40th Armored Regiment, 7th Armored Division in Sept. 1943 at Fort Benning. Early on, the battalion was used by the Infantry School to train in tank infantry tactics after the battalion had gone through intensive desert training.

Other units gave the 709th quite a bit of ribbing because of that, Lumpkin said. "But we ended up landing at Normandy ahead of them," he said. "We were activated in September, 1943 and landed on the beach in July 1944. That's a pretty good record of moving fast."

"It was a great occasion for everybody. We had people who had not seen each other for 20, 25 or 30 years meet each other again," said Lumpkin. "And it was just like we'd seen each other yesterday."

The 709th would earn battle streamers for campaigns in Normandy, souther France, the Rhineland, Ardennes-Alsace and central Europe. The battalion was decorated with the Presidential Unit Citation (Army) for action in the Hurtgen Forest during Nov. 21-28, 1944.

Lumpkin is especially proud of the monument outside the museum.

"I was asked to help with the monument and I thought Fort Benning would be the perfect place for it," he said. "It was going to be built somewhere else but Fort Benning was best.

"It was going to be square, but I thought it should be a triangle since it's an armored unit," Lumpkin added.

Troops begin returning from hurricane-ravaged area

By Linda Bosley Dailey
Staff Writer

About 35 soldiers from Headquarters and Headquarters Company of the 36th Engineer Group returned to Fort Benning Tuesday after serving in the relief effort in hurricane-ravaged southern Florida.

They are the first of approximately 1,000 Fort Benning soldiers serving in the Hurricane Andrew relief effort to return. Soldiers from the 586th Engineer Company returned on Thursday while the 43rd Engineer Battalion and the 63rd Engineer Company are also expected to return later this week, said 1st Lt. Earl Lucas, acting group adjutant.

Troops and trucks all performed superbly in Florida, allowing the 36th's HHC to return sooner than expected, said 1st Sgt. Roger Denny. Initial estimates indicated the unit, which left Sept. 2, would be in Florida until the end of October, he said.

"We got down there and got the job done," Denny said, and as civilian contractors increasingly assumed the tasks the military engineers had been performing, the unit got approval to head home.

The 36th's HHC worked in the Joint Task Force office at the Miami International Airport, commanding and controlling Army, Air Force, Marine and Navy engineers, as well as Canadian military engineers, who participated in the relief work, said the company commander, Capt. Larry Mayfield.

Although the company's duties centered on tracking the progress of work, collecting information and making reports on the relief efforts, the soldiers did see the devastation the storm wrought.

"It was really massive damage," Mayfield said, adding that pictures and videotape fail to show how badly the area was devastated.

"It was good just to be able to help the people of our country," said Spc. Margot Rohrssen, a veteran of the Persian Gulf War. "It's the best side of the Army — to be able to do something for the people. ... I mean, this wasn't war this time."

Dedication for Meloy Hall will be Monday morning

From staff reports

Meloy Hall, the new administrative building adjacent to Infantry Hall, will be officially dedicated Monday at 10 a.m.

The building will be dedicated in memory of former Fort Benning commander Maj. Gen. (ret.) Guy S. Meloy. In addition to the building dedication, there will be a commemorative designation of two areas within the building in honor of George E. Heberling and Ray S. Miller.

Construction began on Meloy Hall in July 1989. The 107,000 square-foot structure houses administrative personnel in the Directorates of Logistics, Civilian Personnel and of Engineering and Housing.

Meloy was born in Lanham, Md., in 1903 and graduated from the United States Military Academy at West Point, N.Y., in 1927 as an infantry second lieutenant. Meloy was appointed assistant commandant of the U.S. Army Infantry School from October 1951, until January 1953, when he became the commander of Fort Benning and the Infantry Center. He awarded the Distinguished Service Cross for heroism in action during the Korean conflict.

Heberling, born in 1917 in Quincy, Ill., retired as the director of resource management at Fort Benning in January 1983 after 34 years of government service.

Miller, born in 1891 in Red Sulfur Springs, W.Va., retired as ordnance engineer at Fort Benning in 1961 after 43 years of government service. Following service as an aviator during World War I, he entered civilian service in 1919 at Fort Meade, Md., where he developed the first high speed tank.

Sportsouth added to post's cable lineup

Sports fans subscribing to CVI of Fort Benning now have even more programming available to them with the addition of Sportsouth to the company's full service line up recently.

"As the first regional sports network for the South, Sportsouth features the teams closest to the hearts of our customers," said CVI general manager Alan Levy. "We know they will welcome the wide variety of professional and college sports it delivers," he continued.

Sportsouth features at least nine hours of programming on weekdays and 16 hours per day on weekends. The network offers Atlanta Braves games not available on Superstation TBS, Atlanta Hawks and Charlotte Hornets basketball and live NFL coverage, including the a full slate of auto races, among them at least 15 NASCAR events.

"College sports coverage is regular fare on Sportsouth," Levy said. "With over 100 college football games, 140 college basketball games, 30 college baseball games and a host of conference championships, Sportsouth has something of interest to every sports fan."

Sportsouth appears on CVI's Cable Channel 33, part of the company's full service package of 26 channels.

CVI serves over 4,000 customers at Fort Benning.

Weary of the strife, Episcopal bishops return to roots of Bible

From wire reports

In the pews of the 2.5 million-member church, where attendance has thinned considerably over the last generation, people are confused by the infighting, some bishops said.

After years of strife over issues such as the ordination of homosexuals, Episcopal bishops have turned back to their Bibles.

At a meeting in Baltimore earlier this month, the House of Bishops set aside their social policy swords and ruminated over different approaches to Scriptures and its role in the contemporary church.

And a funny thing happened on the way to the Bible. Staking out turf on issues such as whether to ordain homosexual priests seemed to have lost some of its urgency, some bishops said.

"What the message is is not the answers to these questions, but a different way of being the church," said Bishop Alden M. Hathaway of the Diocese of Pittsburgh. "It's going to be more of a conciliar thing. Where we cannot decide, we will not decide. ... The guidance will wait on the Holy Spirit.

"Then, we'll be able to speak with a different kind of authority, one we haven't had in a long time," Hathaway said.

The Bible has always been beneath the surface of many of the most contentious church debates. For example, on the issue of homosexuality, those who favor abandoning old strictures against homosexual practice have portrayed their opponents as being blindly tied to a literal approach to the Bible that ignores contemporary culture and modern scholarship. In turn, those who favor a ban on the ordination of homosexuals have accused their opponents of being indifferent to biblical passages condemning the practice.

The conflicting movements are visible in the formation of a separate traditionalist Episcopal Synod of America in protest of "liberal" trends in the church. On the other side, New Jersey Bishop John Spong has ordained an avowed homosexual and speculated in a book that the Apostle Paul was a self-hating, repressed homosexual.

At last year's churchwide convention in Phoenix, the discussion of a proposal to allow homosexual priests turned into an angry debate that Bishop Frank Allen of Atlanta called "a crisis of leadership and trust and the way we do business with one another as bishops."

In the pews of the 2.5 million-member church, where attendance has thinned considerably over the last generation, people are confused by the infighting, some bishops said.

"They were perplexed that the so-called fathers of the church were not able to live with each other," said Bishop A. Heath Light of the Diocese of Southwestern Virginia.

In backing up from controversies on social policy statements, the bishops took the unusual step of devoting a large part of their meeting to reflect on what the Bible says to the church today. The format they chose was to study four papers from scholars arguing for approaches varying from a literal understanding to a liberation theology approach.

Bishop Frederick H. Borsch of Los Angeles, head of the bishops' Theology Committee, said most bishops affirmed a middle-ground stance taken in papers by Charles P. Price of Virginia Seminary and Richard A. Morris Jr. of Union Theological Seminary.

The approach recognizes the Bible is not a rule book on issues such as sexuality, but also states the Bible is to be taken seriously as central to the life of the church.

In Price's terms, Jesus is the word of God absolutely and the Bible is the word of God relatively.

"Church and Bible are found to be in a continuous and never-ending dialogue," he wrote.

In the end, there was no consensus on any one way the Bible speaks to the world today, but there was a greater appreciation of the seriousness which all parties in social policy debates take the book, some bishops said.

Light called it "a rediscovery of a sense of community within the House of Bishops ... which allows us to disagree without an undiluted sense of vitriol."

Mayoral election to be held next week

USAIC Public Affairs Office

Fort Benning residents will get a chance to elect community mayors in a postwide election Monday through Wednesday.

According to Darlene Perry, Community Life officer, residents within each of the six communities have volunteered as candidates for mayor or vice mayor.

"Mayors need to be strongly committed to enhancing the quality of life for Fort Benning residents and to devoting time and energy to that task," said Perry.

"Mayors are key members of the Fort Benning community who enjoy privileges shared by few others," she continued. "They participate in community development and facilitate master planning. As members of the Mayors' Council, they meet regularly with representatives from each of the staff agencies to explore ways to improve the quality of life within their communities."

For more information on the mayors program, contact your Community Life noncommissioned officer in charge of Perry at 545-5931 or 545-5246.

Spencer quarterback Jerry Price dives over Carver's Chris Gilliam (27) and Ronald McDougald (48).

Spencer holds off determined Carver to remain undefeated

From staff reports

A key defensive stand in the game's waning moments helped Spencer High School stay unbeaten with a 14-13 victory over archrival Carver last Friday night.

A jarring tackle by the Green Waves' Maurece Williams and Kermit Walker forced Tiger quarterback Glen Ford to inside the Spencer 5 to preserve the 1-point win, the unbeaten Green Wave's third of the season.

Carver held Williams, the Green Waves' star running back, to just 64 yards on the ground, far less than the 232 yard average he carried into the game. But Spencer found offense in other ways — in Vincent Thorton's 82-yard rushing performance and in the option mastery of junior quarterback Jerry Price.

Thorton's 19-yard run, after a tricky 32-yard option pass from Williams to Richard Hogans, gave Spencer a 6-0 lead in the second quarter. But Carver answered the Greenwave score with one of its own, coming back late in the quarter to take a 7-6 halftime lead on Reggie Newsome's 4-yard run and a successful conversion.

Price guided Spencer on a 70-yard scoring drive early in the fourth quarter to re-take the lead. Williams got the touchdown on a 15-yard run. Price ran for the two-point conversion and a 14-7 Greenwave lead.

But again Carver came back. The running of Newsome and teammate Chris Gilliam helped the Tigers march 80 yards for the apparent tying touchdown. Newsome got the score on a 3-yard run with 6:40 left to play. But Carver faked the extra-point, but Ford was swarmed under by the Wave.

Spencer failed to score on its next possession, setting up Carver's final and unsuccessful bid for a winning score.

Karate team gets its kicks at All Stars Open

The Fort Benning Sidekicks display the trophies they won at competition in Fort Lauderdale, Fla.

By John Davis
Correspondent

The Fort Benning Sidekicks made a strong showing for the third straight year at the All Stars Open International Karate Championships.

The annual All Stars Open was held last Saturday at the Greater Fort Lauderdale-Broward County Convention Center in Fort Lauderdale, Fla. Although the majority of the participants came from the Miami/Fort Lauderdale area, four states and seven countries were represented.

Under the supervision of Ron Ziss, the Yoshukai karate student participants included: Rebecca Davis, 8 years (brown belt); Michael Brister, 9 years (green belt); Ricky Davis, 12 years (green belt); Steve Digilio, 13 years (green belt); Brian Guy, 16 years (green belt); Luz Torres, 14 years (green belt); Larry Archambeault, 8 years (blue belt); Ricky Gaspar, 9 years (yellow belt) and Bill Johnson, 8 years (yellow belt).

Tournament events included karate weapons, forms and fighting. Participants were grouped by division and category and competed in the events of their choice. Youth divisions were generally based upon age (7-8 years-old, 9-10 years old, 11-12 years old, etc.) Skill categories were then established within each division — advanced categories were comprised of brown and black belt holders, intermediate categories consisted of blue and green belt holders and beginner categories included white and yellow belt holders.

Trophies were presented to the first through fourth place winners and medals were presented to fifth through eighth place winners of each category.

In the final standings, Brian Guy placed first in fighting and second in forms; Rebecca Davis placed second in fighting and fifth in forms; Steve Digilio placed third in fighting and fifth in forms; Ricky Gaspar placed third in fighting and Ricky Davis placed seventh in weapons.

Yoshukai karate is one of the many activities provided by Fort Benning's Dependent Youth Activity.

Post preparing Gateway to Care

By Linda Bosley Dailey
Staff Writer

The Army's Gateway to Care plan is part of a Defense Department-wide effort — called Coordinated Care — to manage beneficiaries' care and to control rising health care costs. Martin Army is one of the first 11 Army hospitals selected to implement the managed-care program.

Military retirees next month can begin signing up for Gateway to Care, the Army program designed to improve patients' access to health care while cutting the cost of that care.

During October, Gateway to Care officials from Martin Army Community Hospital will hold six briefings to explain the plan, answer retirees' questions and register them for the program, said Lt. Col. Charles Bottoms, chief of coordinated care at the Fort Benning hospital.

The sessions will be held 6-7:30 p.m. at the auditorium in Infantry Hall on Oct. 13, 15, 20, 22, 27 and 29, and retirees may attend any briefing that suits their schedules, he said. More briefings for retirees will be held later, but have not yet been scheduled, he said.

Hospital officials, too, are continuing to offer families of active duty soldiers the chance to join, Bottoms said. Unit by unit, Gateway to Care representatives are working their way through Fort Benning to explain and market the new health care program. Registration of active duty family members should be completed by the end of fiscal 1993, he said.

The Army's Gateway to Care plan is part of a Defense Department-wide effort — called Coordinated Care — to manage beneficiaries' care and to control rising health care costs. Martin Army is one of the first 11 Army hospitals selected to implement the managed-care program.

Retirees and soldiers' family members are not required to join, but officials hope the Gateway to Care plan is too attractive to resist.

All those who join the program will be assigned to a family practice clinic, which will provide their primary medical care as well as any necessary referrals to specialty clinics, other military hospitals or civilian health care providers, Bottoms said.

"This will provide continuity of care," Bottoms said. Assigning beneficiaries to a family practice clinic allows them to repeatedly visit the same team of medical professionals who can thus become familiar with patients' histories and all their treatments.

For retirees, getting assigned to a family practice clinic markedly changes the way they and their dependents receive treatment through Fort Benning's health care system.

Because of a lack of resources and staffing, almost all retirees have been denied assignments to family practice clinics, Bottoms said. Instead, they have had to seek care at "treat-and-refer" clinics — such as the outpatient or PRIMUS clinics — that do not provide on-going treatment.

To accommodate the inclusion of retirees in family practice care, the PRIMUS clinic, currently a walk-in clinic in central Columbus, will be converted to a family practice clinic after its contract expires on Jan. 31. That will be the family practice clinic to which most retirees will be assigned, Bottoms said.

At the PRIMUS Family Practice Clinic, as that facility will be known after Feb. 1, the mix of patients will be evenly divided between retirees and active duty family members, Bottoms said, and will have about 16,000 patients assigned there. That clinic will be staffed by civilians, he said.

The conversion of the PRIMUS clinic will bring to five the number of family practice clinics in Fort Benning's health care system. In addition, the hospital will add staff to its outpatient clinic in October to allow the clinic to operate every evening and weekend, Bottoms said.

Those who choose not to participate in the Gateway to Care program will have to visit the outpatient clinic, or the emergency room if the condition warrants, for treatment. The family practice clinics will be limited to treating the patients assigned there.

There is no penalty for choosing not to participate in the program, nor is there any penalty for halting one's participation after signing up, Bottoms said. Choosing not to participate only makes the beneficiary ineligible to receive the benefits that are provided to those who do participate, Bottoms said.

For example, those who don't join won't have access to family practice clinics and the continuity of care they can provide. Nor will they be eligible to receive the lower rates charged by the group of 65 area civilian health care providers who have joined Martin Army's list of preferred providers.

But those who do join, when they must visit a civilian health care provider, are restricted to seeing one of those preferred providers.

"They have nothing to lose and everything to gain," Bottoms said.

Retirees will be asked to make their decisions whether or not to join the program at the briefings, he said. If they choose next month not to join, it may be the beginning of fiscal 1994 before they get another chance to sign up, Bottoms said. Officials plan to offer the program to all eligible groups of beneficiaries once before returning to previously counseled groups to offer another registration opportunity.

■ Schedule of events/Page 21

From staff reports

The Panama City Indian Summer Seafood Festival is scheduled for Oct. 9-11. Founded in 1981, this year's festival is expected to draw 50,000 seafood and music lovers.

The seafood festival takes place at Aaron Z Bessant Park (formerly Wayside Park) across from Dan Russell Fishing Pier. Fishing is at its peak this time of year and open-air booths offer samples of fresh bounty from the sea that includes grilled shark, broiled shrimp, fried shrimp, fried shark tidbits, fried snapper, oysters on the half shell, shark on a stick and fried mullet, fish chowder, and Apalachicola oysters.

Seafood is the main attraction, but the Indian Summer Seafood Festival always features nationally known recording artists in concert each day. This year's festival features Sammy Kershaw, Oct. 9; Stacy Dean Campbell and Lorrie Morgan, Oct. 10; and Joe Diffie, Oct. 11.

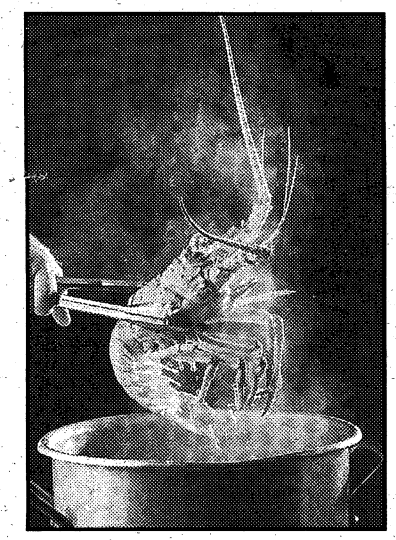
Throughout the weekend there will be performances by the Gadsden State College Band, sky diving and karate exhibitions, bluegrass bands, and the strolling comedians from Orlando, Fla., the SAK Theatre Street Players.

Nearly 100 vendors will be operating arts and crafts booths, displaying everything from handmade quilts and pottery to jewelry and paintings. There will also be special exhibits and rides for children.

The festival's opening ceremonies take place the morning of Oct. 10, just after the festival parade. Immediately following Saturday night's performances, there will be a fireworks display over the Gulf of Mexico.

Three-day tickets are $10 in advance; $12 at the gate; and $5 daily. Children younger than 12 are admitted free.

For more information call 1-800-PCBEACH.



Florida lobster will be among local delicacies served at the fest.

The festival will feature grilled shark, broiled shrimp, fried shrimp, fried shark tidbits, fried snapper, oysters on the half shell, shark on a stick and fried mullet.

Senate OKs bill slashing SDI request

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — The Senate on Wednesday approved a $250 billion Pentagon spending bill for the coming year that sharply cuts President Bush's request for the Strategic Defense Initiative.

Endorsed on a vote of 86-10, the measure now goes to a House-Senate negotiating committee to work out differences between the two chamber's versions.

The total Senate spending figure is a cut from this year's $270 billion, and from the $261 billion President Bush had requested for the year beginning Oct. 1. The House bill provides $251 billion.

Among provisions in the Senate version:

■ $3.4 billion for a group of tactical aircraft programs for which the Pentagon had sought a total of $4.1 billion. The decision effectively will force competition between the Comanche and Apache helicopters, the F-22 advanced fighter, the new versions of the F-18 and the AX long-range bomber.

■ For the Strategic Defense Initiative, $3.8 billion, compared with Bush's request for $5.4 billion.

WW II 50TH ANNIVERSARY

Fifty years ago this week in New Guinea, the increasing Allied presence in the area, coupled with severe supply shortages, forced the Japanese to continue to withdraw. The Allied theater commander, Gen. Douglas McCarthur, ordered operation commander Gen. Thomas Blamey of Australia to advance on vacated or weakened positions, as well as cut off the Japanese retreat down the Kokoda trail.

Here, according to research by the Military History Division at Fort Benning, were the top news items of the week:

■

On the Eastern Front, German forces, under the command of Gen. Friedrich Paulus, continued to advance through Russia, gaining ground in the Orlovka sector of Stalingrad. Despite this, Soviet forces, led by Gen. Vasili Chuikov, successfully crossed the Volga River.

■

In Europe, British and American bombers spearheaded the continuing Allied air offensive, flying round-the-clock missions over target cities in Germany, Italy and France. Allied planes dropped more than 4,400 tons of bombs in the following month alone.

■

The Maritime Commission, in Washington, D.C., issued a report announcing that 488 cargo ships had been built in the United States in the last year. This claim reflected the national production boom caused by the war effort.

■

Fort Benning complied with the wartime policies requested by the federal government by continuing to enforce the strict rationing of fuel oil. Residents kept driving to a minimum outside of necessary work-related mileage. These sacrifices corresponded with those made by most of the country.

BEWARE OF MIRACLE CURES IN YOUR FUTURE!

Don't be victimized by those professing miraculous health "cures" for the sick or simple remedies to beautify the imperfect body and prolong youthfulness. Medical quackery is a concoction of mysticism, sensationalism and empty promises that captivates the unwary consumer and preys on the desperate and hopeful. While some unproven products pose little or no serious health risk, others can be harmful by causing you to delay seeking qualified medical attention.

BEWARE of bracelets that "cure" arthritis, potions that "melt away" fat, creams that eliminate baldness, "natural" drugs that cure cancer ... enchanting as they may seem, the only treatment you will receive is on your pocketbook.

RECYCLE

Admiral just may have used Clinton

WASHINGTON — Two weeks ago, retired Adm. William J. Crowe Jr. stood up in Little Rock, Ark., and endorsed Gov. Bill Clinton for president.

"My decision was not taken lightly and only after considerable soul-searching," he wrote this correspondent last week to explain his action, which dismayed a number of military officers who thought Crowe would never permit himself to be used as a prop by the Clinton campaign.

David Evans

On the podium, Crowe said that the controversy over Clinton's draft status is just a "divisive and peripheral issue" that diverts attention from the Big Stuff. The danger here is that when defending a tap-dancer, one's own ballroom skills may come under scrutiny.

When military officers sally forth to dance with politicians, they cannot help but drag their institutions into partisan politics. The unfortunate precedent was set last March, when Gen. P.X. Kelley, a former Marine Corps commandant, appeared in a television spot attacking presidential aspirant Patrick Buchanan on behalf of the Bush campaign. Now Crowe seems to have disproved the smug talk heard after the Kelley foray that admirals are smarter than Marine Corps generals.

For one thing, Crowe may be retired in name, but he remains a four-star admiral, drawing reduced pay for reduced service. He is liable for recall to active duty. As such, Crowe's endorsement of Clinton was tantamount to saying, "I wish to participate publicly in the selection process of my commander-in-chief."

That's the view of one retired senior officer, who lamented that Crowe's political activity marks a subtle erosion of civilian control of the military.

Crowe doesn't see it that way. "I believe that a retired officer is entitled to free speech, whether he is endorsing a presidential candidate or writing a newspaper column," he wrote.

CROWE

This statement, at least, is more straightforward than his recent public comments on a strictly military matter. That was on July 21, when he testified before the House Armed Services Committee in response to news reports that the cruiser Vincennes had barged into Iranian territorial waters when she shot down an Iranian Airbus airliner four years ago.

In its current issue, the prestigious magazine Armed Forces Journal International declared Crowe's performance that day was "one of the more artful bits of tap-dancing seen recently on Capitol Hill . . . Crowe adroitly deflected legislators' questions about why the American public hadn't been informed that the Navy's Aegis cruiser Vincennes had been in Iranian territorial waters when it shot down an Iranian airliner on July 3, 1988, killing all 290 . . . on the civilian plane. Crowe's cavalier answer, put simply, was that no one had ever asked the right question."

Crowe never mentioned that Capt. Will Rogers, commander of the Vincennes, had been racing north toward Iranian waters for 30 minutes beforehand, and that he passed two Iranian gunboats, both floating idly in the water, without firing a shot.

At 9:39 a.m. Rogers asked for permission to shoot at another group of gunboats roughly 8,000 yards distant. According to the so-called "rules of engagement," he did not need permission to fire if his ship was under attack or in imminent danger.

Nevertheless, Rogers was granted permission to engage by Rear Adm. Anthony Less, the joint task force commander, two minutes later, at 9:41 a.m.

Moments later, Rogers opened fire. The outgunned Iranian gunboats did not turn to return fire until 9:42 a.m.

That time is the one, the only hard datum in all of Crowe's voluminous testimony. It is the smoking gun taken right off the Vincennes data tapes which reveals beyond doubt that Rogers started the fight.

The sequence of events is no great mystery, yet Crowe hastened to tell the congressmen, "I won't confuse you with these times and so forth."

Instead, Crowe steered away from specifics, as he did four years ago when he approved the investigation report of the Airbus shootdown with a five-page endorsement that transformed a badly run surface operation into a grand act of self-defense.

After the hearing, there were vows from the chairmen of the House and Senate armed services committees for further investigation. Those calls suggest a more subtle motive for Crowe's endorsement of Clinton. The committee chairmen are Democrats, and they will be loath to probe further into the testimony of the one senior military officer who endorsed their party's candidate for president.

Call me cynical, but if there's a grain of substance to this interpretation, "Slick Willie" Clinton just got used by an even smoother Crowe to forestall further embarrassing inquiry into the Vincennes affair. Maybe it's true after all — admirals are smarter than Marine generals.

David Evans is military affairs writer for the Chicago Tribune.

Patriot missile performance takes more shots

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon, which once bragged that its Patriot missile destroyed every Iraqi Scud targeted during the Persian Gulf War, has hard evidence that only 9 percent of the Scuds were obliterated, congressional investigators reported Tuesday.

After the war, Patriot boosters cited its near-perfect performance to justify building a costly "Star Wars" system designed to protect the United States against missile attack. Since then, the Patriot's effectiveness has been steadily downgraded.

The latest investigation shows the Patriots destroyed only 4 of 47 targeted Scuds, said aides to Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich. Conyers is chairman of the House Government Operations Committee and a persistent Patriot critic.

The latest investigation shows the Patriots destroyed only 4 of 47 targeted Scuds, said aides to Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich.

Because the Pentagon has been so eager to use the Patriot as evidence that the multi-billion dollar "Star Wars" program would work, critics over the past year have demanded proof that the Patriot worked as billed.

But as a new General Accounting Office report makes clear, the Pentagon's estimate of each missile's performance was, at best, flimsy.

Many assessments were made months after the war, consisted of eyewitness accounts that were "often unverified and sometimes contradictory," and involved studying Scud impact sites where "the craters had often been filled and missile debris removed."

"We have watched the claims for this missile drop from 100 percent during the war to 96 percent in official statements to Congress, to 80, 70, 52, 25 and now we're under 10 percent and dropping," Conyers said.

The Patriots' dwindling performance record has weakened Capitol Hill support for "Star Wars," according to an aide who works for a House Democrat who favors the anti-missile plan. Congress is expected to slash the Bush administration's $5.4 billion request for "Star Wars" in 1993 to $3.8 billion — a 30 percent cut — in the defense bill now being hammered out by House and Senate negotiators, he said.

Pentagon spokesman Pete Williams did not quarrel with the new Patriot performance figures.

"We gave the best assessment we had at the time," he said. "There was a lot of confusion about how effective Patriot was."

Williams noted that the Patriot was designed to protect only a small area from aircraft attack, and the Army stretched its capabilities in trying to defend larger areas against the smaller and faster Scuds. "It was intended to shoot down something that's a lot bigger and flies a lot slower," he said.

The ground-based Patriots are designed to explode when their fuses detect the presence of the target missile. If they explode close enough, the enemy missile is destroyed, but if they detonate more than a few yards away, the incoming missile may only be deflected or may escape damage entirely.

Investigators found what they called firm evidence of Scud destruction in only a handful of cases: Scud warheads peppered with Patriot fragments, or computer tapes showing the disintegration of a Scud following a nearby Patriot explosion.

The Army counted it as a kill if a Patriot exploded near a Scud, even though the Patriot's top engineer told the GAO the missile's fuse is so sensitive it could be set off well outside the lethal range.

"The Patriot's fuse can sense its target and detonate at up to six times the required miss distance, resulting in an extremely low or no probability of kill," the report said. "However, the system would still record a kill."

Nunn sees military helping civilians more

By Linda Bosley Dailey
Staff Writer

U.S. Sen. Sam Nunn anticipates the nation's armed services will play a bigger role in civilian projects in the future, Georgia's senior senator said Monday.

The Democrat lawmaker visited Columbus this week to speak at Mayor Frank Martin's prayer breakfast. Nunn's speech addressed the meeting's theme of "building bridges" among various community groups in an effort to improve society.

Asked after his speech, about bridging the gap between the civilian and military communities, Nunn, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said a proposal in this year's pending defense bill would increase the opportunities for the military to participate in civilian projects.

NUNN

The plan, he said, would give the Department of Defense authority "to branch out in many different innovative ways to use our active and reserve and guard military to carry out a lot of civic purposes, consistent with the mission. That's the key. The first mission is protecting the country."

In a speech before the Senate in June, Nunn had said, "The force will still need a basic amount of combat and operations training to sustain maximum proficiency as well as readiness. But there will be a much greater opportunity than in the past to use military assets and training to assist civilian efforts in critical domestic areas." Still, Nunn continued in his Senate speech, the armed forces' primary focus on national defense is "compatible with enhancing the military's ability to assist in meeting domestic needs."

The military's participation in the Hurricane Andrew relief effort, Nunn said this week in Columbus, is an example of such a mission. So, too, is the use of Army medical helicopters from Fort Benning to transport patients needing emergency treatment to hospitals. Nunn added that officials are considering letting National Guard units around Georgia participate in similar programs.

Another way Nunn would like to unite the civilian and military communities is to get more service members — especially the military's 400,000 blacks and 90,000 Hispanics — involved in their communities and to serve as role models to school children, for example.

Asked also about the cuts in military funding and personnel that presidential candidate Gov. Bill Clinton supports, which are about 5 percent greater than those President Bush proposed, Nunn said the biggest effects of the drawdown have already been felt.

"The additional difference between Clinton and Bush will have only a marginal effect. The main effect is the cuts that are already taking place — the 25 percent reduction in our military forces. And I think it'll probably, over a period of time, be up to around 30-, 35-percent reduction from where it was in, let's say, 1990. My effort has been to spread that out over a period of time so that the adjustments can be made, both preserving our military strength and also taking care of the people who served our country. And I think Clinton's 5 percent will simply add to the margin of that challenge, but not appreciably."

The Army has done better than other branches of the armed forces in helping soldiers make the transition into civilian employment, Nunn said. Army officials also have helped channel soldiers into certain critical fields, such as education and law enforcement, he said.

One proposal Nunn believes important is another defense bill initiative that would allow service members to retire after 15 years of service, rather than 20. The offer would be available for only a limited time and only to those in military occupational areas that have a surplus of personnel, Nunn said.

Then, Nunn said, if the 15-year retiree enters a "critical" civilian profession, such as teaching math or science, he or she can earn the other five years of retirement.

But the economy is weak, and there have been few jobs created recently, Nunn said. "We ought to go slow. We should not do it all at once. This military build-down has got to occur over four, five, six, seven years; not over one or two years," he said.

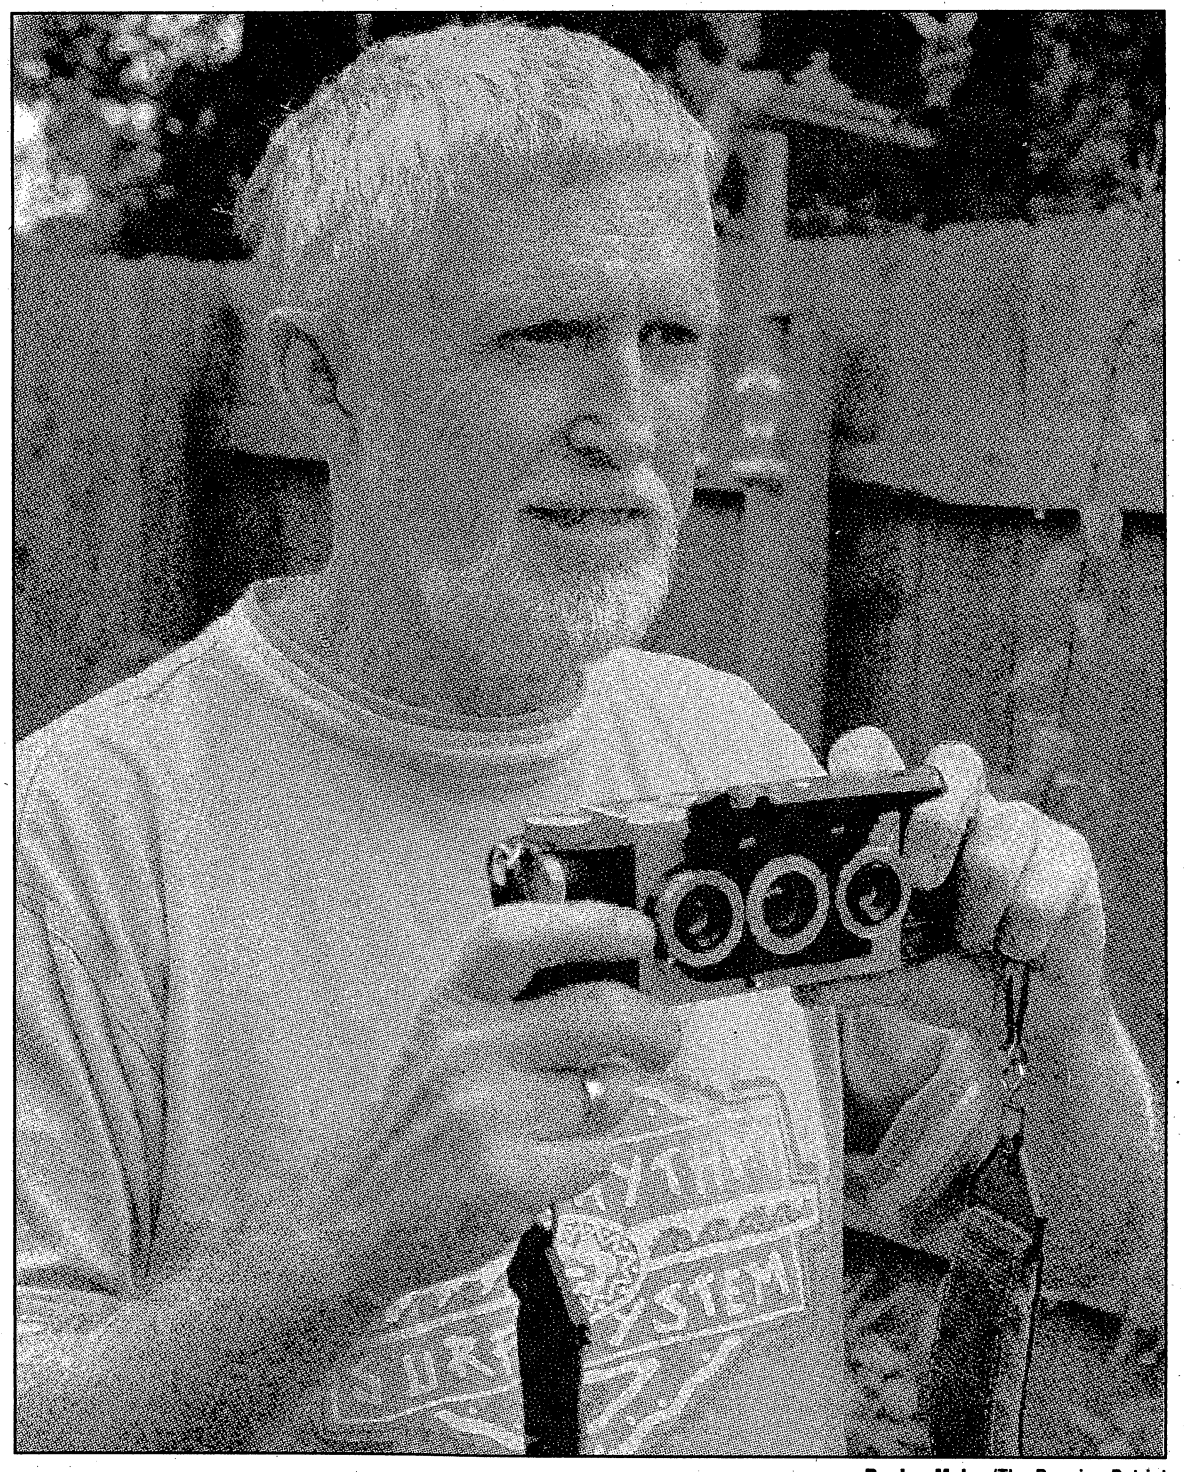
By Joe Maher/The Benning Patriot

Kryss Walton, Bill's wife of 37 years, views 'stereo' photos at the couple's Columbus home.

He's focused on 'stereo' photography



By Joe Maher/The Benning Patriot

Bill Walton has been interested in stereoscopic photography for nearly two decades.

By Richard Hyatt
Senior Writer

Most people's ears perk up when they hear about stereo. Not Bill Walton. Say the secret word and his eyes begin to focus.

That's why he had four distinctly different cameras dangling around his neck last week when he went to see Bill Clinton — a governor from the same small Southern state he is.

One of them had two lens; another had four. All of them will produce a three-dimensional image, the same kind of 3-D which requires a movie-goer to wear those flimsy glasses and the same kind of photograph kids used to view through 10-cent gadgets at the fair.

"I've got a photo with a bayonet that will stick you right in the gut," said Walton, retired as an Army helicopter pilot and retired from Fort Benning's public affairs office.

For nearly two decades, ever since he found a stereoscope at a flea market, he has been interested in this type of photography. He had known about it as a boy in Arkansas and after he got back from Vietnam in 1968, he became reacquainted with it. He needed a scope to view the photographs and once he found one at a bargain price, he started taking pictures.

Not that stereoscopic photography is new. The first stereo-camera was invented only a few years after the first regular camera. It operates on the same principle as the eye which does not look straight ahead but to the right and left.

Walton demonstrates by forming a window with his hands. If you shut your left eye, you see more to the right of the frame. Shut your right and you see more to the left. This is the same way a stereo-camera works with the two lens placed 2½ inches apart — the same distance as a person's eyes.

Such photography was popular around the turn of the century. Many homes had the viewers which through the magic of the lens help a person's brain bring the two side-by-side images together.

Schools used them through the 1920s. And families also used them to open up the world. "You could take a set of cards and take a trip anywhere in the world," said Walton, who used a scope in the public library when he was a boy.

"They were your television and it was radio and TV that put them out of business," he said.

Since 1973, he has taken 1,800 views. His specialty is black-and-whites, which is his favorite photography. "They last longer. Color only lasts maybe 30 years," he said, producing some valuable stereo views of downtown Columbus that he believes were taken in the 1860s.

But while he enjoys black-and-white, he also takes some shots in color and some slides. He became more interested in the stereo-slides five years ago after he and Kryss, his wife of 37 years, had spent a few hours at the Junior League Attic Sale.

"I found a stereo-slide projector. I thought it was just a box for one and I would have paid $5 for the empty box. When I opened it and there was a projector inside I got so excited that Kryss had to calm me down. I thought I would have to have it worked on, but when I got it home all I had to do was clean it up and plug it in. I paid $5 for it and it was worth $500."

A friend also gave him a slide hand-viewer that the man's father found in 1951 at the Columbus YMCA.

"The fellow who left it there was a salesman. He sold ottomans so there was a set of 40 stereo-slides of ottomans. It had gone to Texas and back," Walton said.

Only a Soviet manufacturer now makes stereo-cameras so parts and repair for the old units can be a problem. But the same effect can be made by using a conventional camera and moving 2½ inches to the side between shots. Walton processes and prints his own black-and-whites, but he sends slide film to a processing house in Minnesota that specializes in stereoscopic photography.

Walton is secretary of the Stereoscopic Society of America. He invites anyone interested to contact him at (706) 687-5914. The SSA is a group that exchanges photography, swaps ideas and also includes collectors of old stereographic scenes.

"We had one fellow pay $500 for a view of Abe Lincoln. He's a collector. I'm one of the makers," he said.

His group always has an envelope full of photography in the mail. They even exchange stereoscopic Christmas cards. He showed a guest a Christmas card of him and his wife with Santa Claus mugs extended. It seemed like the mugs were going to stick a viewer in the eye.

"I've had children want to stick their fingers behind the cup," he said.

An illness slowed a stereo book on training at Fort Benning that Walton has been working on for years. By the time he had recovered the Army had changed helmets so he had to re-shoot the pictures. He currently is at work finishing the text. When he is finished, he hopes to do a picture book on Columbus.

"I've got a photo with a bayonet that will stick you right in the gut," said Walton, retired as an Army helicopter pilot and retired from Fort Benning's public affairs office.

Guard units to field Patriot, Avenger systems in '95

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — Army National Guard units will get their first Patriot and Avenger air defense systems in 1995, the chief of the National Guard announced Monday.

A Patriot missile battalion will be activated with 502 members in Huntsville, Ala., while a 360-member Avenger missile battalion will be located in Newton, Miss., according to an announcement by Lt. Gen. John Conaway.

Both are scheduled to activate on Sept. 1, 1995, the announcement said.

The two units are located near the Army Missile Command's Redstone Arsenal in Alabama, which is responsible for the development and maintenance of both air defense systems.

The Patriot missile, which the Army has touted as playing a key role against Iraqi Scud missiles in Operation Desert Storm, is a high and medium altitude air defense system used against aircraft and ballistic missiles.

The Avenger is used to counter low-flying, high-speed aircraft and helicopters. The system has Stinger missiles and 50-caliber machine guns mounted on the four-wheel drive vehicle known as the HMMWV.

As well, Conaway said, the Army National Guard will also be getting a new Hawk missile battalion, which will be located at Las Creces, N.M. A new maintenance company will be located at White Sands Missile Range, N.M. The units, with a total of 496 members, will be activated Sept. 17, 1995, the announcement said.

Three other National Guard units already have Hawk missiles, which offer surface-to-air protection against aircraft. It was operated by both Army and Marine Corps units during Desert Storm.

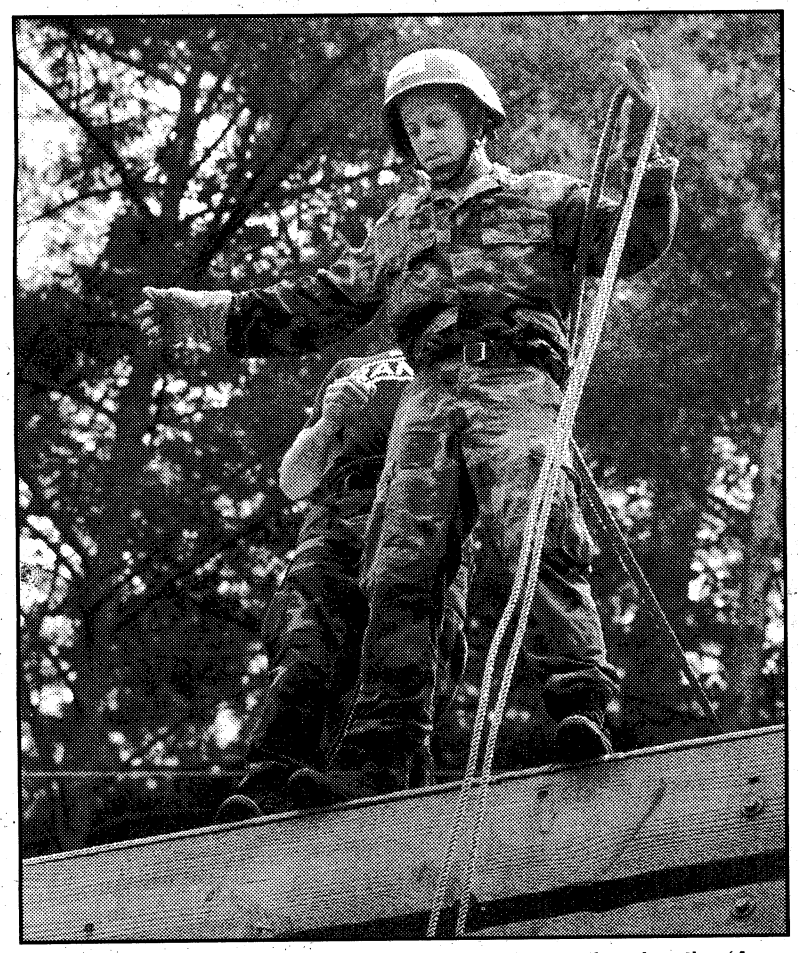
Rangers have mountains of fun

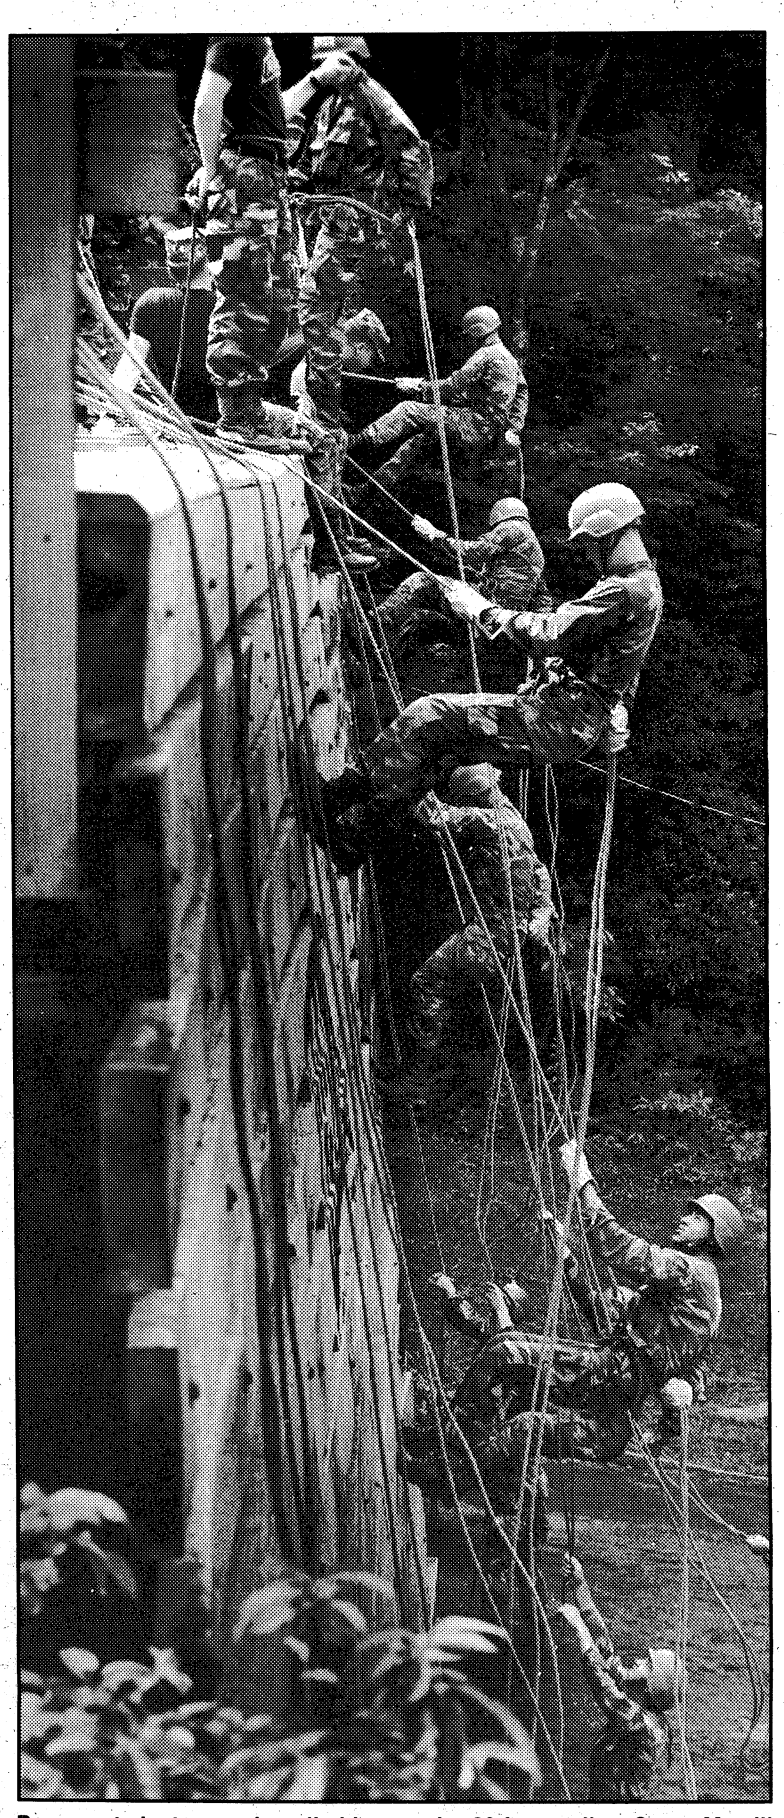


2nd Lt. Robert Otto is a bit apprehensive about performing the 'Australian Rappel' face first down the wall.

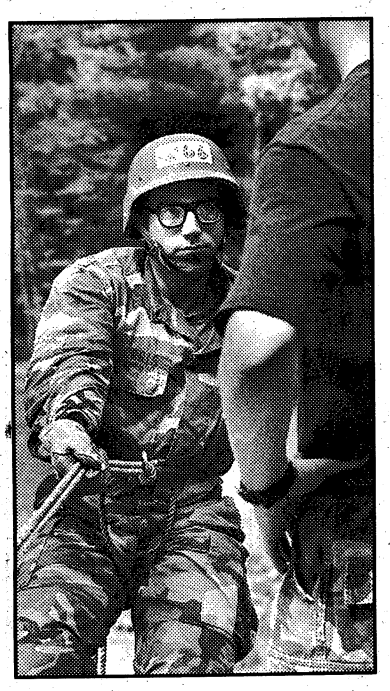
No mission too difficult, no obstacle too great.

For students of the 5th Ranger Training Battalion at Camp Merrill in Dahlonega, Ga., learning to adapt and survive while doing duty in mountainous regions is of primary importance. The students learn a myriad of different ways to overcome obstacles encountered on a mountain mission. One invaluable skill in mountain training is rappeling, the use of ropes to climb up or down steep obstacles like a wall or a cliff.

In these photos, Ranger students learn to put their newfound knowledge to practical use by rappeling down a 30-foot wall during training in Dahlonega. It's tough. It's strenuous. And they thrive on it.



Ranger students practice climbing on the 30-foot wall at Camp Merrill in Dahlonega, Ga.



Sgt. Victor Norris gets last-minute advice before moving down the wall.

Students to discuss their 'Faith' in DARE

Faith Middle School is sponsoring a Drug Abuse Resistance Education Parents' Evening on Thursday at 7 p.m. in the school's cafeteria.

The special DARE meeting will give sixth-grade students an opportunity to meet the instructor, Lt. Col. W.L. Jackson, and hear some of the Faith students talk about what they have learned in their classes. DARE is sponsored by the Military Police Activity and Benning schools.

This is the fifth year for the program which has been used in the elementary and middle schools. DARE emphasizes developing the student skills to recognize and resist the social pressures to experiment with alcohol, tobacco and drugs. Classes include lectures, videos and role-playing in which students express their views on peer pressure and substance use. The purpose of the program is to get students to help and support each other with the difficult decisions they face every day.

DARE Parents' Evening is an important part of the DARE program, according to school officials. Students learn they can depend on the "triangle-of-care" which is School-Police-Parents. Parent support can make all the difference in helping students resist experimenting with substances that can harm them, and the DARE Parent Evening is a good chance to get involved with your child's education, they said.

Spencer's Maurece Williams (10) picks up some of his 188 total rushing yards against Central last Friday.

Central defeats Spencer

From staff reports

Maurece Williams' 188-yard rushing performance wasn't enough to keep the Spencer Green Wave unbeaten Friday night against the Phenix City-Central at Garrett Stadium.

Williams was the leading rusher, but the Red Devils took home the big prize — a 28-12 victory.

Williams' running wasn't enough to offset Central's 1-2 punch of quarterback Tab Barber and running back Elvin Miller. Barber threw two touchdown passes (an 18-yarder to Alonzo Pipkin in the second quarter and an 85-yarder to Shedrick Dixon), ran for a touchdown and kicked four extra-points for the Red Devils. Miller ran for 106 yards on 14 carries including a 13-yard scoring run in the third quarter.

Spencer took a quick lead in the game when Williams ran 19 yards for a touchdown early in the second quarter. Central matched the touchdown just before the half on Barber's scoring pass to Pipkin. His extra-point gave Central a 7-6 lead, an advantage it would not relinquish.

The Red Devils had pulled ahead by a 28-6 margin in the fourth quarter before an 80-yard scoring pass from Jeffrey Price to Richard Hogans set the final score.

The loss dropped Spencer to 3-1 going into Saturday night's contest against the Jordan Red Jackets. Kickoff is at 7:30 p.m. at Memorial Stadium. The Red Jackets enter the game with a 2-1 record after losing its first game of the season 21-14 to Perry last week.

11 Army shooters chosen for CISM competition

From staff reports

Eleven members of the U.S. Army Marksmanship Unit have been selected to represent the United States at an international military shooting championship to be held at Fort Benning Nov. 2-6.

Six rifle and five pistol team members will compete at the Conseil Internationale Du Sport Militaire — or CISM, as it's known.

CISM, founded in 1947, is one of the world's largest sports organizations. Based in Brussels, Belgium, CISM annually holds championships in more than 20 military-oriented sporting events, including skiing, cycling, fencing, track and field, wrestling and basketball, as well as shooting.

Pistol shooters Sgt. James Henderson, Capt. John McNally, Spc. Ed Suarez, Capt. Rhonda Barush and Pfc. Amy Freouf, as well as rifle shooters Capt. Glenn Dubis, 1st Lt. Rob Harbison, Capt. Dave Erickson, Sgt. Tom Tamas, Sgt. Lance Hopper and Maj. James Meredith won berths on the U.S. CISM team.

This year, teams from 102 countries have been invited to compete at the CISM match.

Airports giving flying flock a place to pray

From wire reports

Amid the busy concourses and security checkpoints, air travelers worldwide can check in with a power higher than the cruising altitudes of their jets.

At Orlando International Airport, a 12-seat chapel serves as a respite from the frantic pace of air travel. In Chicago, reminders about religious services are interspersed with announcements for passengers and relatives. In Atlanta, everything from Bibles to Muslim prayer rugs are available for worshipers between flights.

For members of the International Association of Civil Aviation Chaplains, who are celebrating their 25th anniversary this month, an airport without a chapel is like a town missing a priest, minister or rabbi.

"Picture a city of 35,000 people with 170,000 people going through it," said Bill Eustes, chaplain at Dallas-Fort Worth International Airport. "Picture that, if you would, without a church. . . . We kind of fulfill the need for that because I can't imagine a city of even 5,000 without a church or a synagogue or something."

Your average member of the clergy doesn't get asked how to get to Gate 24 from Gate 52, but these chaplains don't mind that question. It's part of a typical day that can include ministering to a homeless person who has made the airport a temporary home or consoling an employee with a death in the family.

Since 1950, airport chapels have opened as commercial aviation has grown. There are about 70 airport chapels worldwide, including about 20 in the United States. Most have chaplains, who are supported by contributions.

"With as many emotional needs as pop up, we'd like to provide somewhere where people can find a way to get away from the hustle and bustle and find some help other than a cocktail lounge," said the Rev. R.D. Spear, director of the Interfaith Airport Chaplaincy at Hartsfield Atlanta International Airport, which has a 15-seat chapel.

Just like other clergy, airport chaplains often deal with people at the high and low points in their lives. Many are part of the disaster-preparedness teams should a crash occur.

Rabbi Alvin M. Poplack has been called at home at 11:30 p.m. from New York's John F. Kennedy International Airport to help a family whose relative died unexpectedly in flight. He has made arrangements for families burying a relative in Israel.

On the brighter side, the chaplains occasionally get to officiate at weddings, usually of airport employees.

"It's a great place if you don't want to invite a large number of people," Spear joked. "You don't have to worry about a guest list."

In Orlando, Elvie Griffin, an airport community relations receptionist, often uses her lunch hour to visit the chapel.

She has run into a friend with preflight butterflies and a family saying the Lord's Prayer before a

"I've really felt that I've been blessed," she said.

Northwest Airlines pilot Paul Aust sometimes stops by the chapel.

"It's really nice to have that quiet area within the busy-ness of the airport to kind of go in and pray," he said.

But there are many who exit the nearby shuttles and never look back toward the chapel as they trudge toward baggage claim. Attempts by a Catholic deacon and officers of the international chaplains' group to get a chaplain to draw more people there have not borne fruit.

Orlando airport spokeswoman Carolyn Fennell said the lack of a chaplain fits the universal aspect of the chapel.

"We've not had a chaplain because different people would identify a different need," she said, adding that clergy of many faiths probably would be called in for an emergency.

Even so, members of the International Association of Civil Aviation Chaplains continue to encourage airports to consider chapels and chaplains.

Edwin Hogg, a former Eastern Airlines employee, has been encouraging the start of chapels since the 1940s — and, at 79, he is still at it, hoping to start one in Russia. He finds he's most successful with airports that are being refurbished.

And he's always ready to share a brochure with the group's slogan: "Have an airport chapel in your airport and let the chaplain be a shepherd of your flying flock."

Humvee project leaves the driving up to computers

From wire reports

GAITHERSBURG, Md. — Computerized vehicles are great, just so long as you remember to set the steering mechanism.

The folks at the National Institute of Standards and Technology were demonstrating a fully computerized Humvee last week, having installed four TV cameras, a computerized tracking system and a fully automated steering mechanism inside the all-terrain vehicle made famous in the Persian Gulf War. Confidently, they invited a reporter along for the first ride.

The ultimate goal is to have a fully computerized car, truck or van that uses video cameras to "read" the road, setting proper speeds and distance behind other vehicles.

Only thing is, the engineer cooling his heels in the driver's seat — he had nothing to do, after all, since the vehicle is supposed to drive itself — forgot to activate the steering mechanism.

The Humvee started down the road, quickly accelerating to 30 mph. Then, at a bend in the highway, the vehicle kept going straight, heading for a grass embankment.

"Better activate the steering," the engineer said. He did, and moments later, the Humvee was again gliding smoothly down the road, its television cameras feeding pictures of the double-yellow dividing line and other reference points to a computer guiding the vehicle's course.

"What we're doing is literally converting swords into ploughshares," said Richard Bishop, research director for the Federal Highway Administration's advanced vehicle research group. "This is technology transfer in the best sense."

To those who scoff at the idea of a computerized vehicle, project engineer Karl Murphy makes a point:

"Most people, when you ask them, 'Do you want a computerized car,' they say, 'No, I don't trust it.' Then you ask, 'What about anti-lock brakes?' They say, 'Sure — it's safer.' But that's a computer too."

And that's the thought behind the project, which is mixing the Army's technology, and the FHA's vision for error-proof driving in the 21st Century. The research work is being done, with contributions from both, by the Commerce Department's National Institute of Standards and Technology.

The vehicle Murphy was demonstrating has a price tag of $100,000 and a top speed of 45 mph. It has an on-board computer system, but still must receive guidance on turns from a bank of computers evaluating its video images in a nearby office building.

"This is a first step," said James Albus, chief of the NIST's robot systems division. "Essentially, you can think of this as an advanced cruise control system."

The ultimate goal is to have a fully computerized car, truck or van that uses video cameras to "read" the road, setting proper speeds and distance behind other vehicles. Other variables, like the road grade and weather conditions, also would be factored in.

Aircraft achieves 70-degree attack angle

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — An experimental aircraft known as the X-31 has flown maneuvers at a 70-degree angle of attack, the Pentagon announced on Monday.

The development is important because most aircraft operate beyond their aerodynamic lift limit at such extremely sharp angles. They spin or tumble out of control, often with catastrophic results.

Other advanced U.S. fighter aircraft commonly do not exceed 20 to 45 degrees, the Pentagon said in a statement.

Achieving the capability would allow fighter aircraft in the future to turn tighter and point at targets more quickly than today's fighters can.

Two of the planes, known as the X-31 EFM for enhanced fighter maneuverability, have been built to demonstrate techniques and equipment to help improve the next generation of aircraft.

On Sept. 18, a Navy test pilot was the first of six project pilots to demonstrate the aircraft's ability to fly at extremely high angles of attack. He decelerated and stabilized the aircraft at 70 degrees angle of attack for approximately 40 seconds, a Pentagon statement said.

The development is important because most aircraft operate beyond their aerodynamic lift limit at such extremely sharp angles. They spin or tumble out of control, often with catastrophic results.

On Sept. 22, a Rockwell pilot demonstrated the aircraft's controllability by flying 30 degree bank-to-bank maneuvers at 70 degrees angle of attack.

The plane first flew in October 1990.

Pictures of the aircraft in flight show it flying forward, nose lifted upward at the high angle.

All flights were flown from the National Aeronautics and Space Administration Ames-Dryden Flight Research Facility in Edwards, Calif.

The plane is able to achieve its new capabilities through a highly sophisticated digital flight-control system, the Pentagon said.

The program is a joint international experimental program with participants from the United States and Germany. It was partially funded under legislation that called for closer cooperation in weapons systems between the United States and its NATO allies.

The program includes the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency, U.S. Navy, U.S. Air Force, NASA, Rockwell International North American Aircraft, the German Federal Ministry of Defense and Messerschmitt-Bolkow-Blohm of Munich, the Pentagon said.

Federal bucks were flowing freely after storm

From wire reports

MIAMI — When the Army came to the rescue in South Florida after Hurricane Andrew, it forgot one highly symbolic piece of equipment: the Stars and Stripes.

No problem.

Within hours, 200 U.S. flags were ordered from Freedom Flag and Banner in Opa-locka. The bill: $19,223.75.

When relief supplies started to spoil and tempers of victims and volunteers began to rise in near 100-degree heat in Homestead and Florida City, Uncle Sam turned to a company in Amarillo, Texas, to ship 100,000 pounds of ice a day. The bill: $26,778.

And when the Federal Emergency Management Agency planned a weeklong conference on preventing future catastrophic damage in South Dade County, officials went to a private consultant in Albany, N.Y. He boasted that he would "produce maximum work output in the shortest period of time." The bill: $17,928.

Disasters, like wars, are expensive, officials say.

The challenge to federal contract officers was to buy badly needed equipment and services as quickly as possible without falling victim to disaster profiteers.

In some cases, the government appears to have found genuine bargains, such as the Navy officers who negotiated a 10 percent discount on sunblock and mosquito repellent.

In other cases, the crunch of time and logistics resulted in contracts that might not have survived the rigid scrutiny of customary competitive bidding. In one case, the government may have been, quite literally, taken to the cleaners.

A Miami-based company, Global Marketing Concept USA, received a $50,000 contract to wash and dry Army uniforms. The agreed-upon price: $1 a pound. Global Marketing later subcontracted much of its work to a Miami laundry, Blue Ribbon Laundry Systems Inc., that charges 45 cents a pound for the same work, 55 cents a pound lower than paid by the government, said Mark Kushner, general manager of Blue Ribbon.

These examples of U.S. government spending in the aftermath of Andrew were culled from more than 250 General Services Administration contracts on file at disaster headquarters at Miami International Airport.

Under federal law, most government purchases must result from full and open competition through bidding. In an emergency, such as a hurricane, those rules are suspended for purchases of relief supplies and services.

To arrange purchases, contract officers often let their fingers do the walking.

"We went to the Yellow Pages. We didn't know who was who. All we did was look up the item and called them," said Bill Harris, a GSA contract officer. "If the price was reasonable, we bought it. If it was not reasonable, we went to the next guy."

Like penny-pinching consumers, GSA officials from Atlanta turned to familiar discount chains and well-known manufacturers. In a few days, they converted the vacant and dreary former Eastern Airlines building at the Miami airport into a bustling headquarters equipped with telephones, fax machines, tables, chairs, photocopiers, televisions, state-of-the-art communications and the like. By the end of the week, there was a map on every wall, a coffee maker in every office.

"We were just in full mode to get whatever we needed to get here as quick as possible," said Fleming James, a GSA spokesman.

Not every Miami company wanted to do business with the federal government.

Early on, Harris was scrambling to get drinking water for thirsty personnel at the disaster headquarters. When he identified himself on the phone as a FEMA contract officer, a manager with a Miami company insisted that he provide credit references. Harris provided references. Two days later, still no water. He called the company back.

"They said they had checked our credit references and that our credit was no good," Harris said. "I told her I was the GSA contracting officer for FEMA. I said do you know who this is?

"She said, 'Yes, I know who you are, and your credit is no good.' "

Harris returned to the Yellow Pages and found another water company.

The relief effort itself generated some purchases. With power out and warehouses quickly filling with donated canned goods, someone in the Army realized the need for can openers — at least 8,650. Contract officers found a sufficient cache at a company in Hialeah. The bill: $12,975.

The sun and rain dictated other purchases. The Navy ordered 576 tubes of lip balm, 53 cases of sunblock and 768 cans of mosquito repellent. The bill: $9,656.22. It would have been $1,300 higher, but thrifty sailors on the USS Hunley insisted on a 10 percent discount.

Ice was a problem from the start.

"I called FEMA and the Red Cross in Washington, and I told them I had plenty of ice," said Don Johnson, vice president of Host Ice Co. in Amarillo. "Their reaction was: 'Ice? We don't need ice,' " Johnson said. "I told them when you figure out that you need ice, you call me," he said. "Two days later, they called."

Of all the emergency purchases, perhaps the most significant came at the Army's request.

When the military arrived in Homestead, officers realized that they needed something more than just strong men, helicopters and big trucks to fulfill their role in the recovery. They asked the GSA to buy 200 large U.S. flags.

"We raised the flags as a visible beacon . . . as an immediate symbol that help was available," said Lt. Col. Stuart Wagner, a military spokesman.

Benning troops trickling home

There were only two Fort Benning units left in Florida early in the week. The 988th Military Police Company had a platoon returning to Georgia on Thursday with the rest departing on Saturday and arriving on Sunday.

Still in southern Florida is the 533rd Transportation Company.

In addition to the two complete units, a handful of soldiers from the 608th Ordnance Company and a group of mechanics from the 598th Maintenance Company are involved in mop-up operations.

HISTORY

WW II 50TH ANNIVERSARY

Fifty years ago this week on the Eastern Front, German forces, under the command of Gen. Friedrich Paulus, launched their fourth major [illegible] taking Stalingrad. Reinforced by police units for street fighting and additional combat engineers, the Germans attacked Soviet posts at Barrikady, Krasnye, Red October and Tractor Factories.

Here, according to research by the Military History Division at Fort Benning, were the top news items of the week:

■

On Guadalcanal, the 1st Marine Division, commanded by Gen. Alexander A. Vandegrift, attacked west from the American beachhead in an attempt to free Henderson Field from Japanese artillery fire. The Marines encountered fierce Japanese resistance along the river Matanikau.

Britain and the United States announced the inception of a United Nations' commission established to investigate Axis war crimes.

■

In Belgium, German authorities issued decrees mandating that all males between the ages of 18 and 50 and all unmarried 21 to 35 year-old females register to do work aiding in the war effort.

■

Representatives from the United States and the USSR signed an additional lend-lease agreement.

■

The Stabilization of the Cost of Living Act became law, and Congress granted President Roosevelt the power to control wages, salaries and agriculture prices starting Nov. 1.

■

At Fort Benning, the 1st Student Training Regiment continued to provide hands-on instruction for second lieutenants as part of the 12-week Infantry Officer's Motor Maintenance Course.

Whistle-blower wins $200,000 in Bradley case

From wire reports

SAN JOSE, Calif. — An engineer who said he was fired by FMC Corp. for telling government officials about defects in the Bradley Fighting Vehicle won a $200,000 award Monday from the military contractor.

A Santa Clara County Superior Court jury delivered the verdict after about 1½ days of deliberation, rejecting arguments that Henry Boisvert was entitled to a much larger amount in punitive damages as part of his wrongful termination suit.

Both sides hailed the decision as a victory.

Boisvert's lawyers had argued that he was fired in September 1986 in violation of a state law that protects whistle-blowers. The former FMC test analyst lost his job, they said, for warning authorities that the Bradley — an armored personnel carrier designed to "swim" across rivers and lakes — could sink without additional safety features, drowning hundreds of soldiers.

But FMC attorneys contended Boisvert was a mediocre employee who became disgruntled when he was fired during a round of scheduled layoffs.

Foreman Rudy Waibel said jurors believed the firing was wrong but were constrained by Judge John S. McInerny's definitions of "malice" and "oppression," two terms required to prove Boisvert was entitled to punitive damages.

The former FMC test analyst lost his job, his lawyers said, for warning authorities that the Bradley — an armored personnel carrier designed to "swim" across rivers and lakes — could sink without additional safety features, drowning hundreds of soldiers.

"It wasn't an easy decision," Waibel said. "There wasn't a smoking gun on either side."

After the verdict, Boisvert said, "I feel like a 10,000-pound weight was taken off my back."

Although he said he wished he had received a larger award, Boisvert said he didn't file suit against the San Jose company for the money. "The good thing was that the jury said that what FMC did to me was wrong," he said.

Company spokesman William Highlander disagreed.

"Mr. Boisvert had claimed his suit would be worth millions of dollars," Highlander said. "This decision clearly rejected (his) claim of being a whistle-blower."

In August 1986, Boisvert notified officials at the Department of Justice about what he contended were serious problems with the Bradley. He was fired the following month.

According to FMC lawyers, Boisvert was one of 170 employees laid off because a big defense contract was winding down. The decisions were based on performance evaluations, the lawyers said, and Boisvert ranked lowest in the engineering testing group.

But lawyer Robert Bohn, representing Boisvert, said the company kept another employee who had just moved to the group with no real engineering experience. The actual reason for Boisvert's dismissal, Bohn said, was that he continued to include information about the Bradley's flaws in his reports.

Questions about the Bradley, once the subject of a congressional investigation, mostly have subsided. After changing some procedures for its use, military officials praised the vehicle's performance in the Persian Gulf War. Highlander said the military has about 5,500 of the $1.5 million vehicles in service and another 1,300 on order.

Boisvert still has a separate suit pending against FMC in U.S. District Court. He based that complaint on the little-used federal False Claims Act, which allows citizens to sue on behalf of the federal government. In the federal case, Boisvert hopes to show that the Bradley was seriously flawed and that FMC tried to deceive the government about its problems.

"We felt like this was Round 1, and we beat them," Boisvert said. "Now Round 2 is coming up."

Marines integrate basic training

Men and women hit the firing line together

From wire reports

QUANTICO, Va. — Male and female Marine officers stood side by side on the firing line last Friday in a military first — men and women getting basic training together.

The 19 women and 230 men are the first mixed-sex military company in 20 years, but those companies didn't train together.

The Marines and other services tried a similar arrangement in the 1970s but abandoned the practice because of morale and logistical problems.

The Marines are using a new approach that differs from the earlier experiments, which didn't expose women to the full array of combat exercises such as tank training and amphibious landings. This time, women and men will get the same lessons, down to hand-to-hand combat and a simulated beach assault.

Associated Press

The 19 women and 230 men at Quantico, Va., are the first mixed-sex military company in 20 years.

"I don't think much about it. It's just natural, the way it should be," Lt. Kristin McKinley, 23, said as she stood ankle-deep in mud on the M-16 rifle range.

The Marines and the other services still bar women from combat assignments. But the six months of war training required for all Marines will prepare the women for anything, said Col. Robert Fawcett, who heads the training school in Quantico, 45 miles south of Washington, D.C.

"It just seemed to make sense to do it this way," Fawcett said. "They need to be able to handle themselves in a fluid battlefield."

Until now, the Marines trained female and male recruits separately and, in joint exercises, gave them different task.

Other services maintain segregated training, though classroom instruction and other activities often are mixed.

The women in the integrated Marine company will be the first taught to crawl through woods alongside men in simulated battles with live ammunition. And they will hammer each other with wooden pikes that simulate bayonets.

Also a part of the change, the Marines named a woman — Capt. Kyle Walton, 28 — to lead an integrated platoon. Previously, women only led women's units.

"We do not treat them as special," Walton said. "We are Marines just like everybody else."

While their training will be identical, men and women will still have different tests for physical fitness. But company commander Maj. Jeffrey Dorn said he encourages the women to try meeting the men's standard.

"They have all attempted it and they are doing real well," he said. "Some of them are doing it better than I did."

"Being short doesn't help, but I'm working very hard," said Lt. Racquel Lyles, 22, who was loaded down with heavy cotton battle gear and more than 50 pounds of equipment.

Last week, the women were indistinguishable from the men when they threw themselves into the mud with their M-16s, helmets and gas masks. Later, they all ran up a slippery hillside carrying live grenades.

"I like it myself, it makes sense," said Capt. Tim Ferry, an instructor. The Marines' change comes as debate is intensifying over the role of women in the military.

And a presidential commission is to release findings this fall on whether women should serve in battle.

Several women interviewed last week said they encountered no resentment or harassment from their male colleagues.

"I've never had that happen to me and I hope I never do," said Lt. Jennifer Marks, 23, who attended the Naval Academy.

Two new child development centers are scheduled to open in coming months which will provide more than 240 additional openings for children to receive day care on post.

The first — known as the Main Post Child Development Center although it hasn't officially been named — is scheduled to open later this month, said Jennifer Williams, coordinator of child development services.

Located at the corner of Ingersoll Street and Dexter Avenue — near Faith and Dexter schools — the Main Post center has capacity for 99 children. More than half of those slots, however, already are filled.

One of the post's five existing child-care facilities — the Marne Road Child Development Center near the main exchange mall — will close when the first new center opens. Those staff members and the 54 children who attend that center will be transferred to the new building when it opens, Williams said. The Marne Road center is being closed because it is too small to comfortably accommodate such a child-care facility, she said.

The other on-post child development centers — McGraw Child Development Center, Custer Terrace Child Development Center, Tot Town and Fort Benning Early Childhood Development Center (also known as the Patch preschool program) — will remain open.

Construction of the second new center, located near Dental Clinic No. 1 at the intersection of Santa Fe and 1st Division roads, is expected to be completed in December. Scheduled to open in late January, the center has capacity for 198 children, Williams said. It, too, has yet to be named.

Construction of the two new centers, which cost $2.6 million, was begun in the spring of 1991, Williams said.

Active duty soldiers, military retirees and Department of the Army civilian employees are eligible to use the new or existing on-post child development centers.

The centers can accommodate children from 6 weeks through 12 years in full-time or part-time care programs, and are open 5:30 a.m. to 6:30 p.m. Cost of the care is based on family income.

Those interested in enrolling their children at one of the on-post child development centers should apply at Child Development Services' central registration office. That office is located in building 11302 on Custer Road, across from the McGraw Hill housing area, and is open 8 a.m. to 1 p.m. Monday through Friday. For more information, call the registration office at 544-1623 or 687-4038.

Parents also can apply for other child-care programs, such as in-home care, at the registration office, Williams said.

If space is not available in a particular program, parents may add their names to an "excess demand" waiting list to await space, and obtain child care elsewhere.

Or, parents may enroll their children in another Child Development Services program or facility and add their names to a "preferred care" waiting list, which puts them in line to move their children when space is available in the preferred program, Williams said.

When an opening occurs, she said, children on the preferred care list have priority over those on the excess demand list. By regulation, moves within the Child Development Services facilities are made before offering openings to children not already attending an on-post program.

Scouts play Santa Claus, collect toys for children

By Jerry Rutledge
Patriot Editor

As Brian Morgan leafed through the Eagle Scout pamphlet, this one idea for a life scout project just seemed natural. The idea was a gift of giving — collecting toys for children living in unfortunate circumstances.

"This project just seemed like a good one and I had a friend who worked at Santa's Castle," said Morgan earlier this week.

Morgan's idea was a good one. He and other members of Boy Scout Troop 27 collected more than 500 items — toys, books, etc — and donated them to Santa's Castle Monday. Santa's Castle is a volunteer organization that donates toys to needy children of soldiers.

The items were collected over two weekends and involved the efforts of 14 scouts and six adults. The group went door-to-door to nearly 600 homes in the Main Post housing areas.

"I expected a little more," said Morgan, "but I'm pleased with the number of items we got."

Morgan said a major donation was made by X-press Printers of Main Street Village, who printed and donated 600 flyers the scouts distributed during the first weekend and included heart-shaped stickers to identify donors during the second weekend of work.

Donations ran the gamut. They included more than 50 stuffed animals, 30 board games and puzzles, 200 children's books, two bicycles and a large number of dolls and infant's toys. Two very special donations were a handcrafted Christmas bear and a $50 check.

The project didn't end with Monday's donation. Those who would like to contribute can contact Morgan at 687-2550.

Infantry Museum road race approaching quickly

The 11th annual National Infantry Museum Road Race is scheduled for Saturday, Oct. 24, at Fort Benning.

This year's race consists of three events. One is a 5-miler, which begins at 9 a.m. and is open to individual runners, or five-man or three-woman teams. The other two events are formation races — an 8 a.m., 5-miler open to all units, and a 7:40 a.m. 3-miler for Infantry Training Brigade soldiers.

All races start at Stilwell Field on Vibbert Avenue and end at Doughboy Stadium and Gowdy Field. The route is through portions of Main Post.

Preregistration for the event is $7 from Oct. 1-22 at Kelley Hill Recreation Center, Sand Hill's Santiago Fitness Center and the National Infantry Museum on Baltzell Avenue. Late registration will be $10 at Briant Wells Field House Oct. 23 from 11 a.m. to 9 p.m. and Oct. 24 from 6:30 to 8:50 a.m. Individuals running in formation races will pay $5 in either case.

An awards ceremony is scheduled for the 3-mile formation run at 9:10 a.m. Awards for other races will be given at 10 a.m. For information, call 545-5777 or 545-4300.

Branson becoming country music mecca

By Jean Allen
Fort Lauderdale Sun-Sentinel

Q. Do you have any information on the western music complex in Branson, Mo.? I heard that there are many famous western singers there who have their own stage theaters. Do you have any information on hotel accommodations or tours there? — O.R., Pembroke Pines, Fla.

A. Branson is getting to be the place tourists can see the stars they thought they'd find in Nashville.

This little town in the Ozarks of southwestern Missouri now claims to have more live country music shows than anywhere else in the United States, and that's probably a valid claim.

In Nashville, you can see the stars' recording studios, museums and stores. In Branson, you see the stars live and on stage. Conway Twitty, who is reportedly thinking about moving his whole Twitty City complex from Nashville to Branson, calls it "hillbilly heaven."

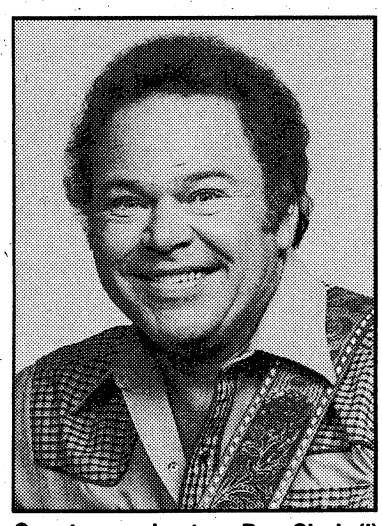
During the season that runs from April through October, visitors can choose from among 45 shows a day in about 56,000 seats in 27 indoor theaters and three outdoor amphitheaters. To stretch out the season, the town in 1988 initiated a Christmas celebration that gets bigger every year and runs through November and December.

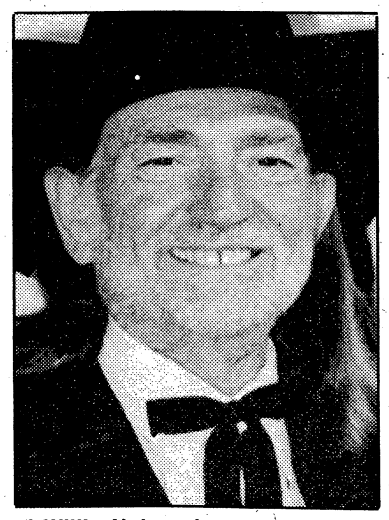
Roy Clark was first to spot the potential of a place where stars have control of their own enterprises by performing in their own theaters. He liked the idea of letting the audience come to him instead of vice versa, in a place where he could sleep in the same bed every night without the exhaustion of touring, free of road managers, long rides and booking agents. He came to Branson in 1983, performing at Roy Clark's Celebrity Theatre, which he later bought (and then built an adjacent Lodge of the Ozarks resort complex).

Boxcar Willie followed in 1987, and was the first to buy a theater and perform in Branson on a permanent basis. Mel Tillis arrived in 1991. They're performing this year, along with:

Willie Nelson, Andy Williams and Johnny Cash, all with their own theaters; Louise Mandrell and Glen Campbell, co-hosting the show at the new Grand Palace, the town's biggest theater with 4,000 seats; Mickey Gilley, Moe Bandy, the Foggy River Boys, Danny Davis and the Nashville Brass, the Branson Brothers and dozens of other regulars.

Guest stars on tap this year include Reba McEntire, Marie Osmond, Tanya Tucker, Loretta Lynn, Merle Haggard, Steve Warner, Ricky Skaggs, Roger Miller, the Statler Brothers, Eddie Rabbitt, Brenda Lee and so on and on.





Country music stars Roy Clark (l) and Willie Nelson have set up their own stage theaters in Branson, Missouri.

Country is king, but there are also dinner theaters, several gospel shows, variety shows (violinist Shoji Tabuchi's is very popular) and supper clubs. There are no strip shows and comedy leans toward homespun.

Nashville remains the recording and publishing hub, but Branson is also a proving ground for country and western groups who want to record in the studios of Springfield, Mo., one hour north.

Branson seems an unlikely place for all this bustle. Visitors who arrive on two-laned Missouri Route 76 through an expanse of pretty Ozark hills, big trees and lakes get a shock when they get near Branson and hit the traffic jam of tour buses, campers and cars towing boats. Route 76 becomes a five-mile strip of neon flashing from theaters, motels, miniature golf courses, craft and souvenir shops, boat ride sales offices, campsites, video arcades, wax museums, T-shirt shops and All-You-Can-Eat $4.95 buffet restaurants.

Branson drew about 4.3 million visitors last year and is ahead of that count this year. It's working on ways to relieve the congestion and tone down the increasingly honky-tonk atmosphere. The Chamber of Commerce reports that tourists spend about $1.5 billion a year there, but the town is a bargain. Last year tourists got by on about $54.73 per person per day in spring, about $66.54 in midsummer.

Theater seats run $10 to $15 and motel rooms range from about $40. There are about 10,000 motel and hotel units and more being built, enough to accommodate the many motorcoach tours as well as people who drive in. There are also a dozen bed-and-breakfasts, 6,000 camping spots and dozens of restaurants.

Branson was a village, population 3,706, when all the Country Music hoopla began, but it has been a resort since the 1960s. That's just after the Army Corps of Engineers built dams on the White River and created Table Rock, Bill Shoals and Taneycomo lakes — all of which are now playgrounds for boaters and fishermen.

Silver Dollar City, a turn-of-the-century theme park, was built in the early '60s atop Marvel Caves, caverns with 32 miles of explored passageways that visitors can see on foot and by cable railway. The country group called Baldknockers arrived and began to perform modern and traditional hill music. The area is the locale of "Shepherd of the Hills," a 1907 best-selling novel by Harold Bell Wright, and in the early '60's Shepherd Hills Farm opened, with a theater that re-enacts the Shepherd story every night in season.

All these attractions are still thriving, and the outdoor recreation draws many visitors who never go near the music palaces.

And now the town is gunning for Nashville's title as Country Music Capital of the World. Some blame the switch of so many stars on the Grand Ole Opry. In one interview, Conway Twitty said, "Nashville blew it. The Grand Ole Opry fought like a tiger to be the only show in town and keep everybody else out. Well, Branson stepped in and took over."

That sounds about right. I was in Nashville this summer and noted the shortage of big show venues. Besides Grand Ole Opry and the live shows at Opryland theme park, there's the small Acuff theater, the Tennessee Performing Arts Center with three auditoriums, and quite a few supper clubs and music bars. But there weren't many stars around in live shows.

A packet of information about accommodations, shows, restaurants, recreation, tour organizers and plans for the Ozark Mountain Christmas events is available from the Chamber of Commerce.

It was so expensive to send out the heavy packets that the chamber installed a number that charges callers $1.50 a minute (average call is under three minutes). The number is 1-900-884-BRANSON.

It's the only chamber I've ever encountered where employees are referred to as "agents." I guess they're too busy to realize that "agents" work for travel agencies, not chambers of commerce.

THE BENNING LEADER
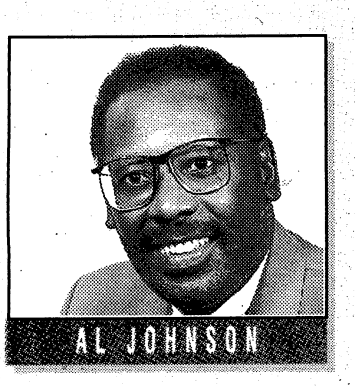
FORMERLY THE BENNING PATRIOT

VOL. 2, ISSUE 6 FREE



We're changing our name

We have changed our name.

Beginning with today's edition, this publication, published by the Columbus Ledger-Enquirer, will carry the name "The Benning Leader." The change is occurring because of a conflict between the former name, "The Benning Patriot," and a newspaper published at Fort Stewart.

The name change doesn't signal a change in content philosophy and goals, nor a change in our commitment to our military audience. We will continue to offer to readers complete and comprehensive coverage of military issues and news and to advertisers a military publication with the most effective distribution at Fort Benning and off post.

We chose the name "The Benning Patriot" for this publication from 105 entries submitted in an employee contest in September 1991. At that time, we knew Fort Stewart published a publication called "The Patriot." However, we saw no conflict because the Fort Stewart newspaper is distributed to a different group of readers and serves a different group of advertisers.

Fort Stewart officials protested our use of the name, contending that "The Patriot" is a registered trademark held by the U.S. Army. We were unable to convince Fort Stewart officials that there was little chance of confusing the two newspapers. The Army threatened to sue over the matter.

Our decision to change the name of "The Benning Patriot" to "The Benning Leader" was our compromise to court action.

"The Benning Leader" was the second choice of employees who participated in our company contest. The name seems even more appropriate today because our newspaper has emerged as the clear leader in providing local,

COMMENTARY

Strategy was to close in on Germany

The guiding principle of Allied strategy in early 1942 in the Atlantic and European areas was to close and tighten the ring around Germany while building up sufficient military power in Great Britain to launch an invasion of the continent to destroy Germany's military power. In fact, Anglo-American leaders hoped that by 1943 the way would be clear for an Allied return to the continent, either across the Mediterranean, by way of the Balkans, or by landings in western Europe.

Al Garland

At the same time, both also believed that a friendly occupation of French North Africa would be of considerable strategic importance and the military planners were put to work to develop the necessary plans.

Unfortunately, their work had to be put on hold because of other events occurring around the world that required their immediate attention — the need to stop the Japanese drives in the Pacific and in southeast Asia, to keep China and Russia in the war, to win the battle of the Atlantic against the German submarine fleet, to get U.S. troops to Ireland and the British Isles to release British troops for service elsewhere, and, finally, the need to defend the U.S. and her outposts. At the same time, a lack of shipping prevented any operation against French North Africa until those other and more pressing demands had been met or solved.

By mid-1942, U.S. and British planners changed their thinking and adopted as their new major objective the concentration of forces in the British Isles for a cross-channel attack in 1943 against the heart of Germany by way of Belgium and France. Thus, they now considered a move toward French North Africa would be nothing more than a diversionary undertaking that would seriously weaken the cross-channel effort.

For a short time, the combined planners did consider launching a preliminary attack across the channel in 1942 to establish a bridgehead that could be expanded in 1943; this, they felt, would help the Russian effort in the east without necessarily interfering with the scheduled main effort. At the time, the Russians seemed unable to halt the various German thrusts all along the eastern front.

But the U.S. and British forces needed to launch a preliminary assault were simply not available. Although the Russians kept pushing the western Allies to start a "second front" as soon as possible, the British remained strongly opposed to the preliminary crossing.

Eventually, in July 1942, in trying to find that somewhat elusive "second front," the U.S. and British military planners took another look at the Mediterranean area and reopened the French North Africa option. After a considerable amount of prodding by their political masters, the military planners finally agreed on Operation TORCH, the code-name used to designate the Allied movement to French North Africa. The U.S. planners were not happy with the final decision for they had had their hearts set on going across the channel in 1943 and feared the North African expedition might seriously disrupt any such idea. As events turned out, their fears were well-taken.

With the final agreement, the combined planners agreed that an American officer would be the operation's supreme commander and approved the appointment of Lt. Gen. Dwight Eisenhower, until then serving as a major general in England as commander of all U.S. forces in the European Theater of Operations, to that position.

On Sept. 12, 1942, Eisenhower announced the official activation of his new headquarters — Allied Forces Headquarters (AFHQ) — although, in reality, it had been taking shape for at least a month. He selected another U.S. officer to be the deputy commander — Maj. Gen. Mark Clark — and yet another as his chief of staff — Brig. Gen. Walter B. Smith. The staff itself was organized on the basis of balanced U.S.-British participation.

Less than two months later, on Nov. 8, 1942, U.S. and British soldiers began striding through the surf to the beaches of northwest Africa.

To this date, many historians, military thinkers, and military buffs have questioned the Allied decision to occupy French North Africa. They believe it prolonged the war by at least a year. It therefore remains the basis for one of those "what if" discussions that fascinates so many people.

At the same time, it doesn't hurt to recall that the Allied landings in northwest Africa had a strong secondary purpose — to trap the German-Italian force then battling the British Eighth Army in the eastern desert regions, a force then in retreat after its disastrous defeat at El Alamein.

national and international military news and information and local advertising.

"Although the name is changing, the newspaper remains essentially the same, or better," says Billy Watson, president and publisher of the Columbus Ledger-Enquirer. "We have plans to improve the distribution and increase the advertising content. We don't anticipate any negative effect from the name change; indeed, it gives us an excuse to re-familiarize readers and advertisers with the strong points of our news coverage, advertising and distribution."

We have hundreds of red, white and blue newspaper racks at Fort Benning and in various parts of Columbus/Muscogee County. They still bear the name "The Benning Patriot." But don't be confused. We will be changing the name on all those racks during the next several weeks.

We are sure you will continue to enjoy reading this publication under its new name, "The Benning Leader."

Al Johnson is executive editor of the Ledger-Enquirer.

Only 50 civilian workers lose jobs to the budget ax

By Jerry Rutledge
Leader Editor

Some 124 full-time employees were expected to be dismissed with 78 jobs expected to be eliminated through retirements, resignations and normal attrition. At RIF's end, the number of dismissals was less than half those expected.

Tyrone Hardy made the cut.

Hardy, Fort Benning's 1981 Handicapped Employee of the Year, was one of 202 Fort Benning civilian employees to receive separation notices last summer in the post's reduction-in-force. His 17-year career as a payroll clerk at Benning was to end Sept. 29.

Last Tuesday, Hardy got a reprieve when he was shifted into an open position. In the good news-bad news process that the budgetary cutback became, Hardy was one of 152 fortunate employees who managed to retain a job. Fifty other employees were not as fortunate.

The reduction-in-force (RIF) was made necessary after Fort Benning's fiscal 1993 operating and maintenance budget was cut by a fifth from fiscal 1992, a total cut of $28 million. Benning officials announced in July that the RIF was to take care of $8.3 million of the budget reduction, with "efficiencies" taking care of the leftover $20 million.

Some 124 full-time employees were expected to be dismissed with 78 jobs expected to be eliminated through retirements, resignations and normal attrition. At RIF's end, the number of dismissals was less than half those expected.

By Sept. 29, all the dismissed employees were gone. Employees shifted into other positions began their new jobs on Sept. 30.

"It was a long, arduous process," said Mildred "Cookie" Watts. Watts and Grace Watson, senior staffing specialists in Fort Benning's civilian personnel office, were primarily in charge of determining separations and retrievals associated with the reduction-in-force. "It's a lengthy process and a stressful process," said Watts. "It was ongoing until the very last day of work the 29th of Sept. We were canceling RIF letters until 4:44 p.m. We normally get off at 4:45, so we continued the process until the very last minute."

Watts said the actual RIF process is "pretty complex."

"It's based solely on seniority," said Watts. "By seniority we mean the career tenure of a person, whether they are a career employee or not, their performance appraisal, their actual federal service computation date and veterans preference. All of that determines seniority — it's not necessarily the first person hired."

Each personnel decision had an impact on another decision. "Every time we made one move, it affected another," said Watts, and the entire RIF would be entirely re-done. "It took an awful lot of time," she added. "We worked pretty much around the clock.

Personnel deputy Gary Burkhalter said a higher-than-expected attrition rate made it possible for more employees to retain jobs than expected in July.

"We didn't expect the attrition rate to be that high," said Gary Burkhalter. "We have a lot of good people who really care about their fellow employees. They chose to leave voluntarily.

"And then we had others who had the early out opportunities and they took advantage of it. Then, of course, our normal attrition rate shot up and I can't explain that. I don't know why more people left at that particular time. I'm sure some were dependents of military personnel who may have been transferred to other posts or left the Army altogether. But the higher attrition rate was a factor."

Burkhalter said the civilian work force cuts were also made easier by on-post and off-post agencies, including the state employment services of both Alabama and Georgia, Fort Benning's Army Career Alumni Program and the Urban League.

There's still no word on just how well the "greater efficiencies" are taking care of the larger part — $20 million — of the 1993 budget cut. The possibilities included combining some operations, reducing contracts and a variety of other cost-cutting measures.

Lynch touts NCOA's special mission

By Jerry Rutledge
Leader Editor

When talking about his military service, John Lynch usually speaks in a joking, self-deprecating fashion.

"I was a sandbag-filler. I never went into combat," he says with a smile. When Lynch talks about the NCOA — Non Commissioned Officers Association of the United States of America — the smile remains but the tone changes.

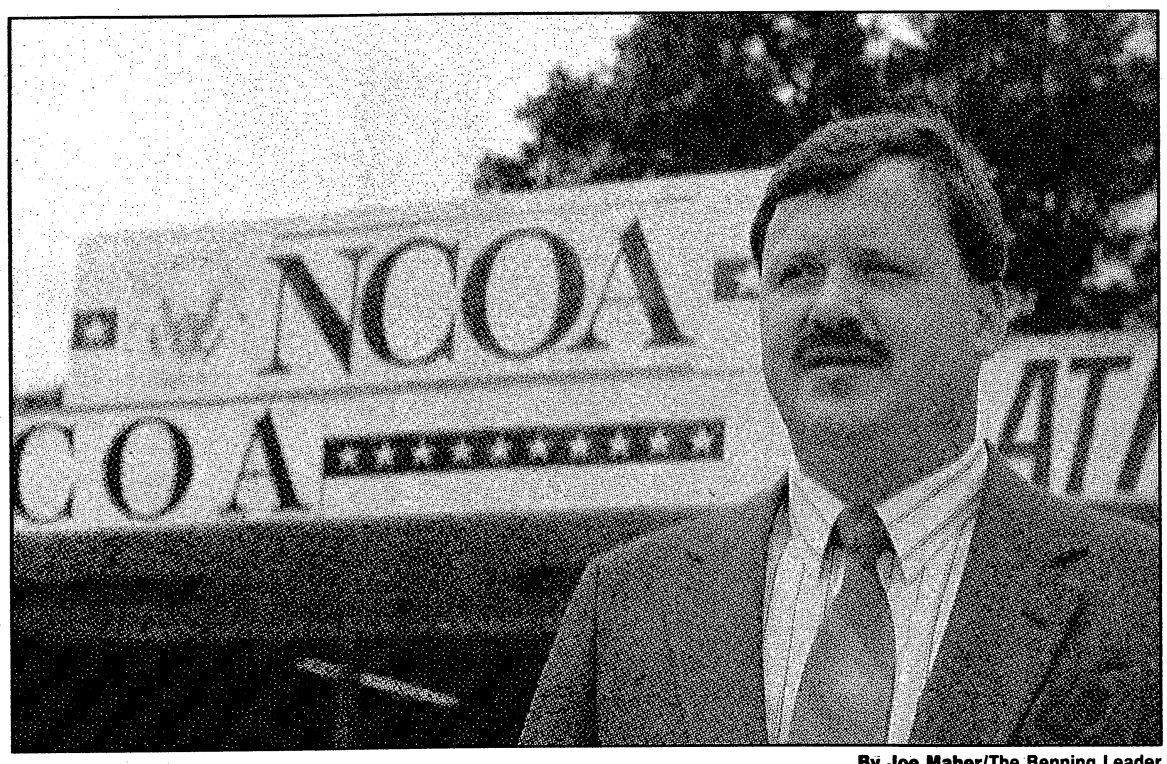
The NCOA is serious business. One of the myriad organizations in the military service arena, it serves a very specialized niche — providing political and economic recognition and enhancement of the image of the professional non-commissioned and petty officer.

"We feel our mission is very important," said Lynch, the district manager for the local NCOA Service Center. Service centers are the recruiting, support and service arm of the NCOA.

"The NCOA provides a very vital service for non-commissioned officers by providing benefits and programs for our members," he said. "Sometimes, NCOs don't get the respect we feel they deserve. People forget the word 'officer' is part of the title. Really, most good officers know the value of a good NCO."

The NCOA was formed in 1960 when a group of NCOs, recognizing the benefits of organization, banded together to create the association. The NCOA is the only association of all five branches of the military.

Today, the NCOA is one of the more effective lobbying organizations of all military or veterans organizations and the largest job placement program in the United States. In addition, the association provided discounts, both locally and nationally, on services for its members and buyer protection measures. Information and education on veterans and military issues is also provided.



By Joe Maher/The Benning Leader

John Lynch serves as district manager for the local NCOA Service Center.

In Columbus, the Follow Me Chapter averages over 4,000 members or benefit users. It brings in over 140 new members a month through the effort of Lynch and the other counselors at the service center on Lumpkin Road.

"We feel we have one of the best NCOA chapters in the association," said Lynch. The chapter has an extensive awards program. Sen. Wyche Fowler, D-Ga, will be receiving an award at a luncheon on Oct. 22. A golf tournament and a Christmas card campaign, where students create cards for distribution to servicemen, are other chapter functions. Lynch says the job placement benefit of NCOA was started during the military drawdown after the Vietnam War. "They started chopping on veterans, pushing them out of the service," Lynch said. "We started helping veterans get jobs.

"Those were tough days, but NCOs are pretty doggone resourceful," Lynch said. "Most of the time you're not going to find an NCO without a job unless he doesn't want to work. He has a lot of skills and they usually have a very good work attitude.

"They didn't just dig ditches. You compare what an NCO has done during his service time with most civilians and you find a wealth of experience. He's moved to different places where most civilians probably lived their lives within a 100 miles of where they grew up. A lot of people don't realize how important that is." Lynch said Columbus is different. "They have a lot of people who have lived in different places and done different things. There's so many of them that it makes for a much more lively place."

Lynch, who is a member of a number of other veterans or military groups, says he wishes there was more communication between them. Each has its own niche and specialized mission, but the base of memberships — the military community — is the same.

"I wish we (NCOA) could work together with some of the local groups. Everyone has their own agendas," he said. "AUSA (Association of the United States Army) and us have more in common because of our membership bases. Our local membership is similar to their local membership. Of course, since we are a veterans organization, we can sign up almost anybody on active duty. Commissioned officers, of course, are not our joiners, our members. But except for the fact we are not looking for civilian members, our memberships base is pretty much the same."

The NCOA leader says competitive attitudes between the groups are counter-productive.

"The AUSA will always be the mother association — the big one — because this is the Army here," Lynch said. "This is the 'Home of the Infantry'. That is the Army. So we certainly need to be getting along with them."

MIA searchers must be diggers and detectives

From wire reports

DONG HOI, Vietnam — The U.S. military's search for clues to servicemen missing from the Vietnam War doesn't require the skills of a warrior, but of a technician.

An American team's work at a suspected plane crash site is much like an archaeological dig.

To help ensure their searching methods are meticulous, the U.S. military even hired a field anthropologist with experience in archaeological excavations in Southeast Asia.

Bert Davis, 50, of Honolulu, served as a medic during the Vietnam War but has spent most of the past 20 years studying prehistoric sites in Thailand, Guam and Hawaii.

The 12-man team also includes a specialist in identifying tiny bits of wreckage, a linguist, mortuary specialists, a medic and an explosives expert.

Their operation is the latest phase of a joint Vietnamese-American effort to resolve the fates of 1,658 American servicemen who are still unaccounted for 17 years after the end of the Vietnam War.

The work is arduous and tedious at the site in Quang Binh province, one of Vietnam's hottest. Whatever their expertise, the main work of all team members is digging, moving and sifting sand and dirt. Local residents are hired to man a bucket brigade that takes the dirt from diggers to sifters.

Rob Darter, a 38-year-old Air Force master sergeant from Weatherford, Texas, brings a speciality recently added to U.S. search teams. He can identify scraps of metal and cloth often no bigger than one square inch from an aircraft that crashed more than two decades ago. From these he can determine with a fair degree of certainty if a pilot went down with his plane.

"If you ever liked putting jigsaw puzzles together, this is like that," said Darter, inspecting scraps recovered from a sand dune.

One piece recovered earlier in the dig was part of a life preserver container — a clue tending to confirm that the pilot was on board when the plane crashed.

Quang Binh province is just above the 17th parallel, which separated North and South Vietnam until the Communist victory in 1975. It was one of the most heavily bombed areas of Vietnam and consequently was the site of many U.S. aircraft losses. From one of two Soviet-made Mi-8 helicopters the Vietnamese lease to the searchers, numerous bomb craters can be seen pitting the area.

Army Capt. Roger Osweiller offered some of the details that brought the recovery teams he commands to this spot. But he withheld the names of the missing, asking reporters not to identify the aircraft type as a courtesy to the families who will first be informed of the details.

The case is unusual because it involves two U.S. aircraft on the same mission that were returning from a night strike in 1968. Investigation teams, with the help of witnesses, have pinpointed where both aircraft apparently went down. U.S. investigators suspect they may have collided.

Each aircraft had a two-man crew; the evidence indicates that one man ejected from each plane, with both taken captive. Vietnam repatriated the remains of one of the men in 1988; the other three remain unaccounted for.

Le Ky, a 50-year-old lieutenant colonel in Vietnam's army who heads the Vietnamese side of the search operation, took the story a bit further:

"As you know, two fighter planes were shot down at the same time ... According to our information, one pilot from the other plane crashed in the village of Hung Thuy, dying in his plane.

"The third and fourth pilots jumped out and were arrested. One, seriously wounded, died. We sent back his remains.

"The fourth pilot was also wounded, so he was sent to higher authorities. At that time, Quang Binh province was the scene of heavy fighting. Where the fourth pilot was sent to, we don't know exactly now."

Court upholds military school's policy of admitting only males

From wire reports

RICHMOND, Va. — A federal appeals court Tuesday refused to strike down Virginia Military Institute's all-male admissions policy but ordered the state to guarantee rights of women, perhaps by establishing a separate military program for them.

A three-judge panel of the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals said the state military school's single-gender education "is justified by a legitimate and relevant institutional mission."

Both sides described the ruling as a positive one.

"It sounds like a win to me," said Sylvia Clute, an attorney for Friends of VMI for Equality. "My understanding is that they have to admit women, build an institution that's equal or go private."

But Robert H. Patterson Jr., attorney for VMI, called the ruling "a ringing endorsement of VMI's educational program."

The all-male appeals panel sent the case back to U.S. District Judge Jackson L. Kiser of Roanoke, who had upheld the admissions policy, and ordered the state to implement a plan that guarantees that the equal protection clause of the U.S. Constitution is not violated.

VMI attorneys had argued that admitting women would damage the school's mission of producing citizen-soldiers. The U.S. Justice Department argued, however, that women could be part of such a mission.

The appeals court said the military institute could be all-male as long as women's rights were protected in some other way.

Among the options would be for the state to "establish parallel institutions or parallel programs, or it might abandon state support of VMI, leaving VMI the option to pursue its own policies as a private institution," Judge Paul V. Niemeyer wrote. He was joined by Judges James Dickson Phillips Jr. and Hiram Ward. Another option, the court said, would be to open VMI to women.

VMI and The Citadel in Charleston, S.C., are the only all-male state-supported schools in the country.

Serviceman's remains identified

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — The remains of another U.S. serviceman previously listed as missing in Southeast Asia have been identified, bringing to 318 the total number of Americans accounted for by the recovery of such remains in Southeast Asia, the Pentagon announced Tuesday.

At the request of the family, the individual's name and the arrangements for interment are not being released to the public, the Pentagon said in a statement.

The remains are the first to be identified from six sets of remains repatriated by Vietnam last Nov. 14.

"The U.S. government welcomes and appreciates the action of the Vietnamese government that resulted in accounting for this American serviceman. We hope that unilateral repatriations will increase in the future," the statement said.

There are still 2,265 servicemen missing and unaccounted for from the conflict in Southeast Asia, the Pentagon said.

Army secretary expresses concern over budget cuts

By Linda Bosley Dailey
Staff Writer

A Department of the Army official said Tuesday he is concerned about the Army's ability to improve its equipment and weaponry because of the shrinking defense budget and the increasingly smaller portion of that budget given to the Army.

"We (the Army) have less than a fourth of the (defense) budget and we've lost a couple percentage (points) of budget share in the last few years," Stephen K. Conver, assistant secretary of the Army for research, development and acquisition, said during his visit to Fort Benning. Conver was on post to study infantry weaponry and equipment.

"That's a little bit alarming to me, since much of those cuts is taken out of the modernization part of the budget," Conver said during a brief press conference. "So I'm concerned with our ability to continue to provide the world's best equipment to our soldiers in the face of a declining budget share."

"We'd like to improve what we've got. And we can do that on a very wide scale basis across the Army," said Conver. "Put new technology into it and it's a lot cheaper than buying something brand new. And that's the way we want to modernize."

The assistant secretary said that even with such money constraints, improvements are feasible. "I think it's very possible to keep the Army modern, if we do it smart," said Conver. "And one of the things in this budget environment that we can't do is we can't buy brand new vehicles to replace the Bradley (Fighting Vehicle), for example."

The Army, rather than funding development and production programs for new systems, is looking to incorporate technological advances into existing systems.

"We'd like to improve what we've got. And we can do that on a very wide scale basis across the Army," Conver said. "Put new technology into it and it's a lot cheaper than buying something brand new. And that's the way we want to modernize."

Fort Benning commander Maj. Gen. Jerry White said modernization of weapon and equipment systems is more important than ever with a smaller Army getting fewer soldiers. "The only way we can accomplish that mission is (to) be able to have a ... technological advantage over the enemy," White said. "... So it's more important today ... than it's ever been in the past.

"There's an acceptance, I think, throughout the Department of Defense that even though we're going to be a much smaller force — a much smaller Army — we're going to have to continue with modernization and keep up with the technological advances."

The two developments White said he considers most important for the Army to fund are a modernization plan the Bradley Fighting Vehicle and some technology to improve how soldiers fight at night, including night vision and navigation systems.

White invited Conver here, the infantry's commanding general said, to explain to the civilian official "how the infantry fights and what our requirements are." White extended the invitation a year ago, when he first assumed command here, and this is the first time their two schedules have permitted the visit, he said.

Among the technologies being developed that Conver considers most significant are an individual anti-tank weapon for soldiers and digital electronics that will permit communication among the Army's weapon systems, he said.

"The single most important weapon for the infantry, as far as I'm concerned, is our new Javelin ... single-man portable anti-tank missile," Conver said. "And that is coming along in development. We're very pleased with it. It's less than 50 pounds — can be carried by a single soldier and it gives a single infantryman the capability to take out the world's best tank by himself. ... We're looking at another three or four years before we can field that system. But once we field it, ... the light infantry will be able, effectively, to hold its own against even an opposing armored force, at least for a limited period of time," he said.

But to coordinate the efforts of the various branches of the Army's combat forces, Conver said, "I think the biggest thing that we're looking at now ... are digital electronics. It is very important that our major weapon systems be able to communicate with each other across the battlefield. ... Everybody has to know where they are, where they are in relation to the enemy, and digital electronics is what is going to revolutionize the modern battlefield," Conver said.

WWII parachute troopers marvel at changes on post

By Jerry Rutledge
Leader Editor

James Semulus felt as if trapped in a time warp.

The Fort Benning he remembered — and toiled on — during the 1940s had precious little resemblance to what the World War II-era 507th Parachute Infantry Regiment alumnus was seeing late last week.

"Everything has changed so much," said Semulus, in town for the reunion of his former unit and the 44th Cavalry Reconnaissance Troop. "You think 'What did they do with this . . . they took it down!' and 'I don't remember that building, where'd it come from.'

"But otherwise, things have been good. It's good to be back in Columbus and at Fort Benning."

The former soldiers from the 507th PIR and the 44th Cavalry were welcomed by Benning commander Maj. Gen. Jerry A. White at a Marshall Auditorium (Infantry Hall) ceremony Friday morning.

The group received updates on recent developments of the Infantry Branch. Later, the groups viewed "Airborne in Action" at Eubanks Field and the graduation of an airborne class.

Semulus was struck by the diversity of the new graduates. In his era, soldiers trained and served in racially segregated units. "There was a little mix in there. When I was in school, blacks and other races weren't part of it," he said. "A couple of years later, when we were in Holland, we had some other (ethnic) people in there as troopers and we asked them 'Where'd you come from and how did you get through there.' You know, we had to check them out and they checked us out. But we got along. We were all good soldiers."

Semulus was wounded at the Battle of the Bulge and left the unit. The circumstances made the reunion last week even more special. "It's really good to see old buddies," he said. "Everything is going really well."

After 42 years at Benning, finance unit moving to Hood

From staff reports

Fresh from an extended stint in the Persian Gulf region, the 215th Finance Support Unit departed for another journey last week. This time, the unit's destination was permanent.

The 215th Finance Support Unit left Fort Benning Friday for its new home at Fort Hood, Texas. The unit's colors were cased and officially reassigned during a ceremony at Engineer Field. The unit had been assigned to Fort Benning for more than 42 years.

The 215th just recently returned from southwest Asia where it assisted units participating in Operations Desert Shield and Desert Storm by providing financial services.

Lt. Col. George C. Smith, the commander of the 215th, will remain as the unit's commander as it moves to Fort Hood.

The responsibilities of the 215th Finance Support Unit will be assumed by Detachment D of the 24th Finance Support Command. Detachment D will be activated next Friday with Capt. Barbara A. Gregory as its commander. Capt. Gregory previously served as the executive officer of the 215th.

The unit will be integrated into the post Finance and Accounting Office to provide financial services and support to Fort Benning and has an organized strength of 19 soldiers. An additional 18 military positions will be authorized to assist the post finance and accounting office. The 215th Finance Support Unit had 62 assigned soldiers as it departed the post.

Cubans flocking to churches since state sanctioned religion

From wire reports

HAVANA — With religion now sanctioned by the state, Cubans are returning to the church in numbers unseen since the 1959 revolution.

Long-suffering priests and ministers are witnessing the phenomenon with delight, welcoming back prodigal sons and daughters and baptizing new believers by the thousands nationwide.

The religious resurgence holds profound implications for Cuba, expanding the influence of church leaders over the island's 10.8 million inhabitants even as Fidel Castro's Communist regime struggles to survive without Soviet economic and political sponsorship.

New adherents are flocking to a variety of faiths and denominations, from Roman Catholicism to Protestant evangelism to Santeria, the slave-rooted folk creed that blends Catholic and African tribal beliefs.

A dramatic example was supplied by recent, heavily attended masses and processions commemorating the country's Catholic patroness, a likeness of the Virgin Mary known as Our Lady of Charity.

"Yes, I believe!" thousands of Cubans shouted in chorus, over and over, during a homily by the country's archbishop, Jaime Ortega, in a packed and sweltering Old Havana cathedral.

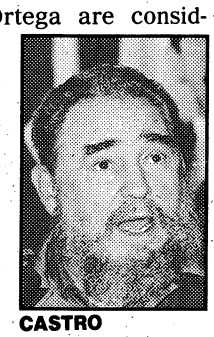
Bystanders called it the biggest turnout since before Castro took power 33 years ago, launching a fierce campaign of religious suppression.

Ortega proudly announced that 35,000 Catholics were baptized last year in Cuba, compared to 17,000 a decade ago. He said they include teen-agers and young married couples who shied away from the church for many years.

While studiously avoiding any direct reference to politics, Ortega defended religion against the Marxist critique.

"Religion is not a myth. It is not something primitive," he declared in his homily.

A strained and wary relationship persists between Castro's regime and most religious leaders, especially those of the traditional Roman Catholic church. Castro and Ortega are considered bitter enemies. The state closely monitors and circumscribes church activities.



CASTRO

But a partial thaw is evident. The government has warmed to some Protestant ministers, and Castro himself has admitted that trying to create an atheist Cuba may have been a mistake. In July, his National Assembly ended official discrimination against worshipers.

Now party members speak of church-state collaboration.

Speaking privately, a party official in central Cienfuegos province said religious groups were helping in state-backed social programs at a community level. Some local and international church organizations are shipping in medicine and other aid, helping solve severe shortages spawned by the loss of Soviet bloc trade and aid.

The new official attitude is reflected throughout society. Bible sales are booming, and state-run tourist stores sell devotional postcards. Once-taboo allusions to religion abound in local art and music.

At the inauguration of a new art exhibit in Cienfuego's state-run gallery a week ago, at least half of the paintings and other works featured images of Jesus Christ or crucifixes.

"There are those who say their belief has ceased, but they slip out before dawn to meet a priest," sings a Cuban musician, Adalberto Ysuson, in a popular new song.

Before the state's recent secular shift, Cubans risked outcast status or the loss of certain state privileges if they attended church.

That fear is now fading, but many Cubans believe other factors are contributing to religion's growing popularity, including the severity of the economic crisis and a loss of faith in Marxism's capacity to solve their problems.

"The people are confused, and they're turning to the church in their confusion," said Manuel Sori, a Havana anesthesiologist and devout Catholic.

Angel Perez, a Catholic priest in the dockside neighborhood of Regla, said four former Communists have shown up at his church in the previous two weeks.

"They had left the party and, looking for something else, they came here," he said.

On a recent Sunday, Perez baptized 14 youths between the ages of 15 and 25. "They weren't baptized at the proper time because of the existing circumstances," he explained.

Time to take a terror-filled vacation

From wire reports

Looking for a little terror to fill your life? It's that time of year again for tricks and treats. And for those who like terror tricks, Spookyworld, just 45 minutes from Boston, is a treat.

From now through Oct. 31, the Berlin (Mass.) Fun Farm is the place for spooky hayrides, a haunted house created by Hollywood's top special-effects people, a museum of Hollywood horrors and lots of scary items to buy. And should you survive the hayride, there's free cider and doughnuts. Admission is $12.50 Sundays to Thursdays, $15.50 Fridays and Saturdays. For information, call (508) 838-0200.

In Connecticut's Farmington Valley, you can take a spooky hayride in West Simsbury Oct. 23-24 and 30-31 ($10 adult, $7.50 child 12 and under). Or, you can tour an old graveyard in Farmington, followed by dinner in an old inn ($29.95 a person). Dates are Oct. 8-10, 15-18 and 22-25. Another idea is to join a Halloween candlelight dinner tour that includes passing through the "coffin door" of an old home (the door used to carry a casket out), then on to a burial ground and dinner ($39.95). These tours are Oct. 22-Nov. 1. For more information on these and other happenings, call the Farmington Valley Visitors Bureau at (203) 674-1035 or (800) 468-6783.

Key West's Halloween in the Devil's Triangle turns this quiet spot into an oasis of utter outrageousness. This year's festival, Oct. 24-Nov. 1, includes a wild Pretenders in Paradise parade with costumed participants from around the world, and there's another unusual event, a Pet Masquerade and Parade. The festival is in its 14th year. For information call (800) LAST-KEY.

Maybe you'd rather stay with some ghosts. The second issue of the newsletter Bed & Breakfast Adventures includes some B&Bs that claim to be haunted. In Beverly Hills, making a regular appearance is the ghost of actor Clifton Webb, who once lived in the home; in Santa Fe, there's a "Weeping Woman" who likes to push and shove, and in Franklin, Tenn., there's a friendly but tricky ghost. Bed & Breakfast Adventures is $1 a copy, or $10 for a year's subscription. Write to BBA Publishers, 8205 Santa Monica Blvd., Los Angeles, CA 90046; or telephone (213) 656-9187.

And for those curious about bed and breakfasts, Bernice Chesler, who has authored many books on the subject, will give a free presentation Oct. 10 and 11 from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. at L.L. Bean in Freeport, Maine.

Clipper Cruise Line is answering a concern of many travelers today about funds they put up in advance for future cruises. Clipper said it has received approval from the Federal Maritime Commission to offer an escrow plan that protects all cruise funds paid by passengers, no matter where they embark. "There is a confidence crisis in the (travel) market ... and we decided to close the loophole of foreign embarkation so that travelers can feel totally secure in planning for voyages," said Paul Duynhouwer, Clipper's president. The plan takes effect in December.

Add Old Chicago's Greek cuisine to the city's menu

By Gail B. Greenblatt

It might very well be that your quest for the quintessential Quincentennial treasure can be realized right here in Columbus.

In the realm of the eating world, multicultural has always been the buzz word. Now, more than ever, diners are warming up to ethnic cuisines.

We are finally comfortable with Chinese, German and Mexican foods here in the Valley. And we have had a brief affair with Cajun.

Now, for your dining pleasure there is hommus, moutabbal, souvlaki and moussaka. If that sounds like Greek to you, you're right. And it's all served up at Old Chicago, 5600 Milgen Road. You're right again, if you know that's a beer.

Tucked in the corner of Manchester Square Shopping Center on Milgen Road, this family restaurant is a friendly, casual and comfortable place to enjoy Mediterranean fare. The three partners who own and run Old Chicago are Essa Raddad, George Saad and Elie Chahwan, who is the chef.

Open less than two months, it already has devotees of falafel (the favorite fast food in the Middle East) and they are introducing their friends to something a little different.

The falafel, described as vegetarian hamburger, combines ground fava and garbanzo beans and spices. The mixture is usually formed into balls and fried in hot oil. They are served in pita bread with lettuce, tomato, chopped onions and tahina sauce. As with most any dish, there are many versions and degrees of spiciness.

An appetizer of hommus — ground chick peas (same as garbanzos) mixed with tahina (sesame) sauce and lemon juice — is served with light olive oil and scooped up with pita bread. The moutabbal is ground eggplant prepared the same way. These finger foods are the counterpart of tortilla chips and salsa ($3.95). Other appetizers are spana copita (filo dough pockets of spinach and feta cheese) and dolmathes (grape leaves stuffed with rice) for $4.95 each.

A note about spelling: Since these dishes are all similarly Greek, Armenian, Lebanese, Syrian, Israeli and several others, the spelling differs from country to country. What's important in this case is that it tastes so good!

The Greek specialties we have enjoyed are the lamb souvlaki, marinated lean lamb pieces with green pepper and onion, served with tzatziki sauce ($7.95) and moussaka, baked eggplant with minced meat and cheese ($5.95). You may have tasted these in other places, and they may have been a little different.

Chef Elie wants to please his patrons. We hope he doesn't Americanize too much. If you prefer additional garlic or other traditional seasonings, don't hesitate to ask.

Along with the Greek specialties are Italian specialties, such as lasagna and chicken Parmesan ($6.95 each) and a variety of hot sandwiches ($3.50-$4.25), salads and kids' meals. Crisp house or Greek salads and a tasty pilaf or vegetables accompany entrees.

The baklava pastry dessert is made with whole pistachios and is too delicious (95¢). We loved the creamy rich rice pudding with white raisins, too ($2.25).

Other of Chef Elie's specialties will probably be forthcoming as requested.

Warning: Old Chicago brings another dining dimension to Columbus, and it may be habit-forming.

Prices are moderate. Beer and wine are available.

Old Chicago is open 11 a.m.-10 p.m. Monday-Thursday; 11 a.m.-11 p.m. Friday-Saturday; 11 a.m.-8 p.m. Sunday. For more information, call 563-5665.

Charles sings the American dream

Legendary entertainer will perform here Saturday

From staff reports

Ray Charles has the distinction of being both a national treasure and an international phenomenon.

He started out from nowhere; years later finds him a global entity.

Hundreds of thousands of fingers have hit typewriter and word processor keyboards telling and retelling his story because it is uniquely American, an exemplar of what we like to think is the best in us and of our way of life.

The Ray Charles story is full of paradoxes, part and parcel of the American dream.

Rags to riches. Triumph overcoming tragedy. Light transcending darkness.

The name Ray Charles is on a star on Hollywood Boulevard's Walk of Fame. His bronze bust is enshrined in the Playboy Hall of Fame. There is the bronze medallion cast and presented to him by the French Republic on behalf of its people. There are the Halls of Fame: rhythm and blues, jazz, and rock and roll. There are the many gold records and the 10 Grammys.

There is the blackness and the blindness. There was the extreme poverty; there was the segregated South into which he was born.

It is Ray Charles' single driving force that catapulted a poor, black, blind, orphaned teen-ager from there to here.

"I was born with music inside me," Charles said. "That's the only explanation I know of . . . Music was one of my parts . . . Like my blood. It was a force already with me when I arrived on the scene. It was a necessity for me — like food or water.

"Music is nothing separate from me. It is me . . . You'd have to remove the music surgically."

Ray Charles

WHAT: The Ray Charles Show '92, featuring The Raelettes and the 17-piece Ray Charles Orchestra.

WHERE: Columbus Municipal Auditorium.

WHEN: 7 p.m. Saturday.

TICKETS: $10.50.

INFORMATION: 327-3688.

Ray Charles has many, many gold records as well as 10 Grammys.

Ray Charles Robinson was not born blind, only poor.

The first child of Aretha and Bailey Robinson was born in Albany, Ga., on Sept. 23, 1930.

He hit the road early, at about three months, when the Robinsons moved across the border to Greenville, Fla. It was the height of the Depression years. And the Robinsons had started out poor.

"You hear folks talking about being poor," Charles said. "Even compared to other blacks . . . we were on the bottom of the ladder looking up at everyone else. Nothing below us except the ground."

It took three years, starting when Charles was four, for the country boy who loved to look at the blazing sun at its height, the boy who loved to try to catch lightning, the boy who loved to strike matches to see their fierce, bright glare, to travel the path from light to darkness.

But Charles has almost seven years of sight memory — colors, the things of backwoods country and the face of the most important person in his early life — his mother, Aretha Robinson.

St. Augustine's was the Florida state school for the deaf and blind. Charles was accepted as a charity student.

He learned to Braille and to type. He became a skilled basket weaver. He was allowed to develop his great gift of music.

He discovered mathematics and its correlation to music. He learned to compose and arrange music in his head, telling out the parts, one by one.

He remained at St. Augustine's until his mother's death when he set out "on the road again" for the first time as a struggling professional musician.

The road to greatness was no picnic, proverbial or literal. In fact, while earning his dues around and about Florida, he almost starved at times, hanging out at various musicians' locals, picking up gigs when he could.

He began to build himself a solo act, imitating Nat "King" Cole. When he knew it was time to head on, he asked a friend to find him the farthest point from Florida on a map of the continental U.S.

Seattle, Washington.

For Charles, Seattle was the turning point.

In Seattle, he became a minor celebrity in local clubs. There he met an even younger musician, Quincy Jones, whom he took under his wing, marking the beginning of an intertwining of two musical lifetimes.

It was from Seattle that he went to Los Angeles to cut his first professional recording. And it was in Seattle, with Gossady McGee, that he formed the McSon Trio — Robin(son) and (Mc)Gee — in 1948, the first black group to have a sponsored TV show in the Pacific Northwest.

"I was born with music inside me," Charles said. "That's the only explanation I know of . . . Music was one of my parts . . . Like my blood. It was a force already with me when I arrived on the scene. It was a necessity for me — like food or water.

Along the way he'd shortened his name in deference to the success of "Sugar" Ray Robinson.

As Ray Charles, he toured for about a year with Lowell Fulsom's band. He formed a group and played with singer Ruth Brown. He played the Apollo, the landmark showcase for black talent. He aspired to Carnegie Hall, then as now epitomizing the pinnacle of artistic success.

These were also the years that brought Charles the first band of his own, his first big hit record, "I Got a Woman."

By the early 1960s, Charles had accomplished his dream. He'd come of age musically. He had become a great musician, posting musical milestones along his route.

He'd made it to Carnegie Hall. The hit records ("Georgia," "Born to Lose") successively kept climbing to the top of the charts. He'd made his first triumphant European concert tour in 1960 (a feat which, except for 1965, he's repeated at least once a year ever since).

He'd treated himself to the formation of his first big band in 1961. In 1962, together with his long-time friend and personal manager, Joe Adams, he oversaw construction of his own office building and recording studios in Los Angeles, RPM International.

He had taken virtually every form of popular music and broken through its boundaries with such awe-inspiring achievements as the LP's "Genius Plus Soul Equals Jazz" and "Modern Sounds in Country & Western."

Charles' music is still marked by the unpredictability that is the genius of consummate artistry.

He is master of his soul, musically and personally.

To this day he selects and produces his own recording material with utter disregard for trends. He doesn't find the time nor necessity to write as much as he once did, but what he gleans, "from the attic of my mind," either old or new, is inevitably surprising, unique, "right."

Traveling in the South in the 1950s, Charles became aware of racial discrimination.

It was a concert date in Augusta that brought the issue of segregation vs. civil rights to a head for Charles.

"A promoter insisted that a date we were about to play be segregated," he said. "The blacks upstairs and the whites downstairs.

"I told the promoter that I didn't mind segregation, except that he had it backward . . . After all, I was black and it only made sense to have the black folk close to me . . . Let him sue. I wasn't going to play. And I didn't. And he sued. And I lost."

This was the incident that propelled Charles into an active role in the quest for racial justice, the development of social consciousness that led him to friendship with and moral and financial support of the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. in the 1960s.

". . . Early on, I decided that if I was going to shoot craps on anyone's philosophy, I was putting my money on Martin Luther King Jr.

"I figured if I was going to pick up my cross and follow someone, it could only be Martin."

Despite his deep commitment to King and the cause of black Americans, Charles came to the logical conclusion that there was no place for him physically in the front lines.

"First, I couldn't have known when to duck when they started throwing broken bottles at my head. And I told that to Martin personally.

"When he intentionally broke the law, he was hauled off to jail. And when you go to jail, you need money for lawyers, for legal research, for court fees, for food for the marchers. I saw that as my function; I helped raise money."

His awareness of racial injustice was not limited to the home front: The same years he fought the war against racial injustice in the American South found in Charles a growing awareness of racial injustice abroad, particularly the notorious policy of apartheid in South Africa.

Modest to the point of mum about his humanitarian and charitable activities, Charles makes an exception for Israel and world Jewry.

Among the many, the world leader Charles has most enjoyed meeting is David Ben-Gurion, with whom he had a conversation of many hours during a concert tour of Israel not long before Ben-Gurion's death.

And the award among the hundreds he claims to have touched him the most is the Beverly Hills Lodge of the B'nai Brith's tribute to him as its "Man of the Year" in 1976.

"Even though I'm not Jewish," Charles said, "and even though I'm stingy with my bread, Israel is one of the few causes I feel good about supporting.

"Blacks and Jews are hooked up and bound together by a common history of persecution . . ."

Book has details on traveling Europe by motorhome

By Jean Allen
Fort Lauderdale Sun-Sentinel

Q. I am planning a trip to Europe this fall and I intend to camp out with a rented motor home. I don't know who to contact. The travel agents I have spoken with don't know anything about it. I hope you can help. — N.P., Coral Springs, Fla.

A. Everything you need to know and then some is contained in a book called "Europe by Van and Motorhome" by David Shore and Patty Campbell. To get a copy, send $13.95 to Shore/Campbell, 1842 Santa Margarita Drive, Fallbrook, CA 92028. For priority mail, add $2.

Shore says he and Campbell have toured Europe by RV every year since 1981 and think "it's the best way to go."

The book lists both U.S. and European agencies that rent vehicles ranging from two-person Volkswagen minivans to big, six-person rigs. "People can make reservations in the United States, or wait until they get to Europe," Shore says. "Amsterdam and Frankfurt are two of the best places to rent, lease or buy new or used RVs." That's all detailed in the book, along with good campgrounds, free camping, route suggestions, driving regulations and other information.

The book explains how to get a camping carnet, a permit required by many European campgrounds. They're available in Europe for $7, or can be obtained in the United States by members of the National Campers and Hikers Association, 4804 Transit Road, Building 2, Depew, NY 14043, phone 1-716-668-6242; membership is $16.

Q. I am going to France for a friend's wedding and, afterwards, will spend five nights in Paris, most likely alone.

I have been to London alone and found no problem getting around at night, going to the theater alone, riding the Underground as late as 11 p.m., and eating alone.

But what about Paris? Where can a middle-aged woman go alone to eat at night, for example? What other things are there to do at night? Is it safe to walk, or to take the Metro, at night? I expect to be staying at the Hotel Jeanne d'Arc on rue Jarente near the Place de Bastille. I have not been to Paris in nearly 30 years, but I understand French very well and speak it passably. — L.S., Fort Lauderdale, Fla.

A. It depends on where you want to go at night, and whether your hotel's street is busy and well-lighted. There are definitely parts of Paris where I would feel uneasy after dark. Avoid the Gare du Nord, the Bois de Boulogne, Les Halles and Pigalle.

The Place de Bastille area is gentrified nowadays. Many restaurants and shops have opened around the new opera house there and the streets are lively late into the night when something's playing. Restaurants around railway stations usually stay open late, and such areas are brightly lighted and generally safe. With a constant flow of travelers, single diners are common (but so are pickpockets and purse snatchers). Check the menus posted outside. There are also bright lights, late crowds and plenty of cafes along the Champs Elysees and the Boulevard St. Germain, although you'll pay more for the privilege of people-watching and dining along those famous streets.

I've never sensed any danger when riding the Metro (unlike London's Underground, which I seldom ride in the daytime and never at night).

Williams' legs aren't enough as Spencer falls to Jordan

From staff reports

Jordan High sent Spencer careening to its second loss in a row last Saturday, dominant in a 26-15 victory over the Greenwave at Memorial Stadium.

Spencer's Maurece Williams had another sparkling night with 162 yards on 24 carries and a pair of touchdowns, but it wasn't nearly enough to hold off the Jackets. Spencer falls to 3-2 with the loss. Jordan's record is now 4-1.

Jordan took the lead and control of the game late in the second period. Eric Brown's 12-yard scoring run and his 37-yard touchdown pass to Lafayette Stanley, both inside the last 4½ minutes of the half, put the Jackets ahead 20-7 at halftime.

Williams ran for a 2-yard touchdown early in the fourth quarter and added a two-point conversion to bring Spencer to within 26-15, but the Greenwave got no closer.

Post 10-miler team has work cut out for it

From staff reports

Minus such firepower as Chuck Dent and Lloyd McDonald, both of whom recently transferred away from post, Fort Benning's entry in this weekend's Army 10-miler will be hard pressed to match last year's winning performance.

Dent, with Olympic Trials credentials, was second overall in last year's Army run in Washington, D.C. McDonald was also one of the top finishers.

This year's team, led by Capt. Christopher Russell, may not be as strong as a year ago but it will be a factor in Saturday's run. Russell led all qualifiers on the rugged Sand Hill course in 54:08. His teammates (and their qualifying times) will be Capt. Curtis Southern (55:25), Pfc. Mike Raymond (57:18), Capt. David Millet (57:31), 2nd Lt. Leon Rozmarynowski (57:58) and 2nd Lt. Alan Holmes (58:51).

Benning's lone female entrant will be Master Sgt. Alyce Oliver, who qualified with a time of 1:21.40.

Army kills $54 billion program

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — The Army dropped two major contracts worth $629 million on Wednesday, in effect killing a $58.4 billion program that was supposed to build a new generation of armored vehicles.

The decision comes only weeks before the presidential election and affects two firms in Michigan, which has 18 electoral votes.

An Army official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the contract cancellation is expected to affect between 600 to 800 jobs in the Rust Belt state.

The program, formally known as the Armored Systems Modernization plan, fell prey to the lessened Soviet threat, the Pentagon's declining budgets and planned cuts in the size of the military.

It was to have produced over 6,000 vehicles for the next century.

However, Congress recently told the Army to focus instead on building a new artillery weapon and an ammunition vehicle for it — systems that will not be fielded until well into the next century, but could potentially cost $20 billion, the Army official said.

The full-sized armored program "just didn't make sense" within the Pentagon's current fiscal constraints, said Army spokesman Maj. Pete Keating.

The core of the ASM program was a common chassis which was supposed to be the base for six armored vehicles — a tank, an engineering vehicle, a new artillery piece, a resupply vehicle, and two infantry vehicles.

Formally, the Army said it intends to "restructure" the contracts — one for $342.8 million with Teledyne Continental Motors, of Muskegon, Mich., and one for $286.7 million with Armored Vehicles Technologies Associated, of Troy, Mich. AVTA is a joint venture of the FMC Corporation and General Dynamics Land Systems.

That means that some work will be retained from the original contracts, but it will deal only in research work on a new engine and electric drive system, the Army official said.

The official said it isn't immediately clear how much of the funds from the two contracts had been spent, nor was it known whether the Pentagon would have to pay any fines for restructuring the contracts.

Michigan hasn't been left without some work in military armored vehicles.

In August, Vice President Dan Quayle announced during a tour of a high-technology factory near Detroit that the Pentagon would spend $300 million to upgrade the Army's M-1 tanks at a Michigan plant.

Pentagon calls allied efforts 'below par'

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — Japan's contributions to the defense of the United States and other allied nations is "substantially below par," a Pentagon report said Tuesday.

The report, required annually by Congress, also faulted Germany, Norway, Portugal, the Netherlands, Belgium, Italy and Spain for "mixed efforts" in contributing to the common defense of the Western allies.

Nations that have improved their efforts include Turkey, Greece, Britain, and France, the report said. Denmark, Luxembourg and Canada were found to be doing "relatively less."

The report uses a complex set of criteria to calculate a nation's role, responsibilities, and defense costs. It attempts to measure a nation's standard of living and economic output, its defense spending and manpower as well as "intangibles" such as the social, economic and political costs of supporting foreign troops or the political and financial support of "shared international goals."

Allied defense efforts have become a sensitive topic on Capitol Hill, because of the downturn in the U.S. economy. In addition, the end of the Cold War has engendered a push to reduce defense spending abroad, in Asian or European nations whose economies have grown more robust in recent years.

"Japan's tremendous recovery since World War II now places it as the world's second largest economy, with a GDP (gross domestic product) greater than that of France and Germany combined," the study said. "... In comparison to these impressive economic statistics, Japan's defense contribution ... is substantially below par," the statement said.

Japan also "ranks last or well below average in all of the indicators displayed" when other factors are used, the report said.

However, the report tempers its criticism by praising Japan for steady progress in adding to its military capabilities to defend its own territory, including adjacent air and sea lanes to a distance of 1,000 miles.

Japan is one of the world's largest contributors of international development assistance, and does assume 50 percent of the labor costs for Japanese workers on U.S. bases in Japan, the report pointed out.

Probe continues in Saratoga incident

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — Investigators may take until the end of October to determine what caused the USS Saratoga missile firing that killed five sailors on a Turkish destroyer last week, the Pentagon spokesman said Tuesday.

"There's been no conclusion (reached) yet on what happened," Pete Williams told reporters at a Pentagon briefing.

Two Sea Sparrow missiles were launched accidentally from the carrier during a NATO exercise in the Aegean Sea on Oct. 1. One missile struck the Turkish ship.

The spokesman said a panel of three U.S. admirals and one Turkish admiral have begun investigating, talking with the carrier crew.

The vessel is still participating in the NATO exercise, which is ongoing, Williams said.

While no official explanation has been given, sources speaking on condition of anonymity said it appeared unlikely that technical reasons were to blame, since a series of steps must be taken by officers or crew members before the weapons can be unleashed.

Williams said the Pentagon has asked Congress for the authority to use Navy funds from the 1993 operating and maintenance budget to compensate the Turkish families of those killed and injured in the accident.

WW II 50TH ANNIVERSARY

Fifty years ago at Guadalcanal, the 1st Marine Division attacked west of the river Matanikau, successfully wiping out a Japanese artillery battalion that had been shelling the airstrip on Henderson Field.

Here, according to research by the Military History Division at Fort Benning, were the top news items of the week:

■

Also on Guadalcanal, the Japanese battleships Kango and Haruna bombarded Henderson Field, destroying 50 U.S. planes to include more than half of the bombers on the island. Adm. Raizo Tanaka took advantage of the American setback, landing 4,500 men and large quantities of supplies at Tassafaronga.

■

Just off Guadalcanal, at Cape Esperance, an American covering squadron, under the command of Adm. Norman Scott, engaged another covering squadron of Japanese ships, commanded by Adm. Aritomo Goto, in a confused night action. The American force lost one destroyer but sank a Japanese destroyer and cruiser. Both side's convoys eventually reached their destinations.

■

On the Eastern Front, Adolf Hitler overruled his military commanders and altered their strategic plan again, suspending all offensive operations on the Eastern Front with the exception of Stalingrad, where the XLVIII Panzer Corps had reached the Volga River. Hitler's constant intrusions inadvertently weakened the German effort.

■

At Stalingrad, the Red Army removed command authority of the commissars as the Soviet forces began to mount reinforcements for a counterattack at Stalingrad.

■

In the Battle of the Atlantic, a British Liberator Bomber sank the German U-boat U.597. This was the first success experienced by the British Royal Air Force's Coastal Command.

■

Fort Benning officials announced plans to offset some of the problems facing the post's increasing wartime population by building a new 250-seat cafeteria on Ingersoll Avenue.

FYI

The Army Emergency Relief offers emergency loans and grants to active duty personnel and family members. Education assistance and emergency food assistance is also available. ■

COMMENTARY

Fog of war can blind 'smart' bombs

WASHINGTON — American warplanes flying high overhead, flinging exotic guided bombs and missiles at ground targets, would have little impact quashing the fighting now raging in the Balkans.

A single chart shows why; bear with the abstract for just a bit, because this chart reduces the reality of conflict to a single piece of paper. You will be skeptical, forevermore, when top Pentagon officials wax eloquent about "the leverage we get from advanced technology," as did Gen. Colin Powell, chairman of the Joint Chiefs, at a Sept. 14 speech to the Air Force Association.

David Evans

The chart in question was produced by C.E. "Chuck" Myers, a former director of air warfare in the Pentagon. It deals with the American vision of "immaculate war," which prominently features pilots flying safely outside the range of enemy air defenses — hence the term "stand-off" — plinking away at ground targets with fancy guided weapons.

The risky alternative is to get close and fire guns.

Myers' chart shows that the performance of costly "wonder weapons" decreases dramatically to a not-so-wonderful level as the environment gets increasingly confused.

"That's why I title it the 'virtual' effectiveness chart, to show how things really are, not how people would like them to be," Myers said in a recent interview.

Across the bottom of his chart, Myers outlined what he regards as the four levels of military activity.

At Level 1 we have firepower demonstrations. "Things are very controlled. There's usually an audience in nearby bleachers, and explosives are put in the target so it'll blow up even if the pilot misses," Myers explained.

Level 2 is test and evaluation, the development phase for new weapons. Again, the firing situation is "scripted" as to altitude and range. If there are any friendly troops on the ground, the pilot is told beforehand exactly where they are.

There are few distractions to confuse the pilot, like decoys, or burning hulks on the ground to confuse a heat-seeking missile and lure it away from its designated target.

"We have the option of making things messy, but we usually don't," Myers said. The Maverick air-to-ground missile, he recalled, was never tested in a situation where friendly and enemy troops were in contact and artillery shells were flying overhead in both directions.

"There is little incentive to add confusion to the testing, because decisions are made to acquire weapons at Level 2. If you want to get promoted, don't make a ruckus," Myers said.

Level 3 is military-political gymnastics. Example: The 1986 air raid on Libya. In this so-called "surgical strike," American laser-guided bombs intended for Moammar Gadhafi landed embarrassingly close to the French Embassy — a good indicator of what can happen to weapons performance when aircrews are under stress.

Since fighting at Level 3 tends to be episodic, large stockpiles of ammunition are not required. A few costly missiles may be adequate for intimidating rogue Third World dictators. Level 3 is like football, with frequent time-outs for planning.

Level 4 is war. "There is total confusion and mayhem, where you may be locked in a death-struggle for survival," Myers said.

The fog of war rolls in with a vengeance — bad weather, smoke, imperfect communications, uncertainty regarding the forward positions of our own troops.

And if a pilot is firing close to our own troops, his weapon must go where it's aimed. This did not happen on Jan. 29, 1991, during the Persian Gulf War, when an Air Force pilot fired an infrared-guided Maverick missile at an Iraqi target 7,000 yards beyond a line of Marine Corps armored vehicles. As soon as the missile left the launching rail it "locked on" to a flare burning next to one of the Marine vehicles to mark the line of friendly troops. Seven Marines were killed when the Maverick slammed into their vehicle.

As the graph shows, the risk of "friendly fire" casualties goes up with an increase in the level of confusion.

Myers described the Balkans fighting as "somewhere between Level 3 and 4."

"We are facing a situation more like rugby than American-style football, only with three teams on the field and everybody's in muddy shirts," he said.

High over such a field, a pilot armed with exotic bombs and missiles is indeed exhibiting a formidable array of hardware, but its "prestige index" is considerably higher than its "performance index."

"We shear away the fog of war to avoid getting egg on our face in testing," Myers said, "but the seductive results lead to the development of expensive systems marginally effective for war."

David Evans is military affairs correspondent for the Chicago Tribune.

VETERANS

Agency gives vets a helping hand

By Jerry Rutledge
Leader Editor

A recent magazine poll says approximately 33 percent of all the homeless people in the United States are veterans, a number which troubles George Webster.

Webster, a former Army sergeant, has decided to do something to help, forming the American Veterans Foundation, Inc. to help down-on-their-luck, homeless veterans get a leg or hand up on life.

"What we're trying to do is fill the gaps between what other veterans organizations are doing," said George Webster, founder of American Veterans Foundation, Inc.

The small, non-profit volunteer operation works out of a small house on Brown Avenue near the AFLAC building. Webster says his organization wants to fill a small niche among veterans service groups — lending temporary help to jobless, homeless veterans with nowhere else to turn.

The organization is raising money through telephone solicitations. The money will be used in a variety of ways — to feed, provide temporary lodging, or even buy bus tickets for veterans in need.

"We haven't gone to the business community yet to see if they can help us," said Webster, who serves the AVFI as director. "Of course we'll be looking for not only donations of money but can goods, clothing, stuff like that.

"What we're trying to do is fill the gaps between what other veterans organizations are doing. We're not affiliated with other veterans organizations, like the American Legion or the VFW (Veterans of Foreign Wars), although we realize they have their place. There are certain things they can do for veterans."

Webster says the Legion and the VFW provide referrals to veterans services, which can involve all sorts of red tape and delays. His organization wants to provide a more hands-on approach — providing temporary work or a small amount of money to tide the veteran over for a day or two.

"Say you've got a guy who doesn't have a job. Most of your veterans organizations will send him down to the employment office, which is fine," Webster said. "But the American Legion or the VFW won't have anyone there to help directly with his getting a job. Most of your other organizations don't have funds to put a guy up for a couple of nights or feed him. If he's looking for some part-time work, we have jobs he can do and we'll give him a couple of bucks. We're not talking about a lot of money because it's only part-time work."

The AVFI has no political agenda and does no lobbying. "Our only mission is to help the veteran in a situation where getting help may be difficult," said Webster.

THe AVFI director says his interest in the homeless veterans stems from an experience of his own when he, suddenly and without warning, found himself with a wife and child but no home and no job.

Webster found enough work doing a variety of jobs to keep his family sheltered and fed and eventually returned to work. He never forgot the experience, however, and decided to try and provide a service for others.

"I always had the will to work and support my family," said Webster. "But someone else may not be as lucky."

Downsizing forcing thousands of prospects into work force

■ Senate Democrats offer a plan to ease the pain of defense cuts/Page 17

From wire reports

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. — Alabama soon can expect an influx of thousands of people seeking jobs after being forced out of the post-Cold War military.

More than 150,000 soldiers and civilians will leave the Army in the next 12 months and about 350,000 more may follow through 1997. Nearly one-fourth of those are expected to seek work in the Southeast, including thousands in Alabama.

"There's an extreme amount of anxiety and stress among people in the military," said Norman Higginbotham, a recently retired Army colonel.

Higginbotham has signed a short-term lease in Huntsville, where he is searching for a job. "Soldiers live with constant worry: Should I start a new career, should I take a chance and try to stay in, what should I do?"

The Army started a program last year to help soldiers and civilians survive the jump and locate employment.

"These people we're putting on the market right now are really a good buy for employers," said Pat Hittle, transition services manager at Fort McClellan in Anniston. "They are drug-free and they are used to giving and following orders. They are on time, take responsibility and have 'people' skills," he pointed out.

The underlying argument of the sales pitch is this: Army training creates quality employees.

"Take a guy who's been an infantry sergeant," Higginbotham said. "You think he runs up and down a hill and shoots a gun. Well, he does. But at the same time, he's a supervisor of people, he has skills in human relations, in motivation and management."

Consider Clarisa Sherman, a Desert Storm veteran who served four years in the Army as a laboratory technician, unit secretary and driver.

The Army transition program — called the Army Career and Alumni Program — has served 3,100 clients at Redstone Arsenal and Fort McClellan since summer 1991. Among other services, it arms job applicants with well-written resumes and readies them for the interview process.

Ramona Roy, training services manager at Redstone in Huntsville, and her staff try to connect with the soldier or civilian Army employee six months before they leave, to get them prepared.

Each client works out an individual transition plan with a counselor and walks through the job search process — including mock interviews — in a three-day workshop.

Top Blackhat makes a difference

Landrum helps soldiers feel good about the military

By Linda Bosley Dailey
Staff Writer

As an airborne instructor, Staff Sgt. Robert Landrum teaches students more than how to jump out of an aircraft.

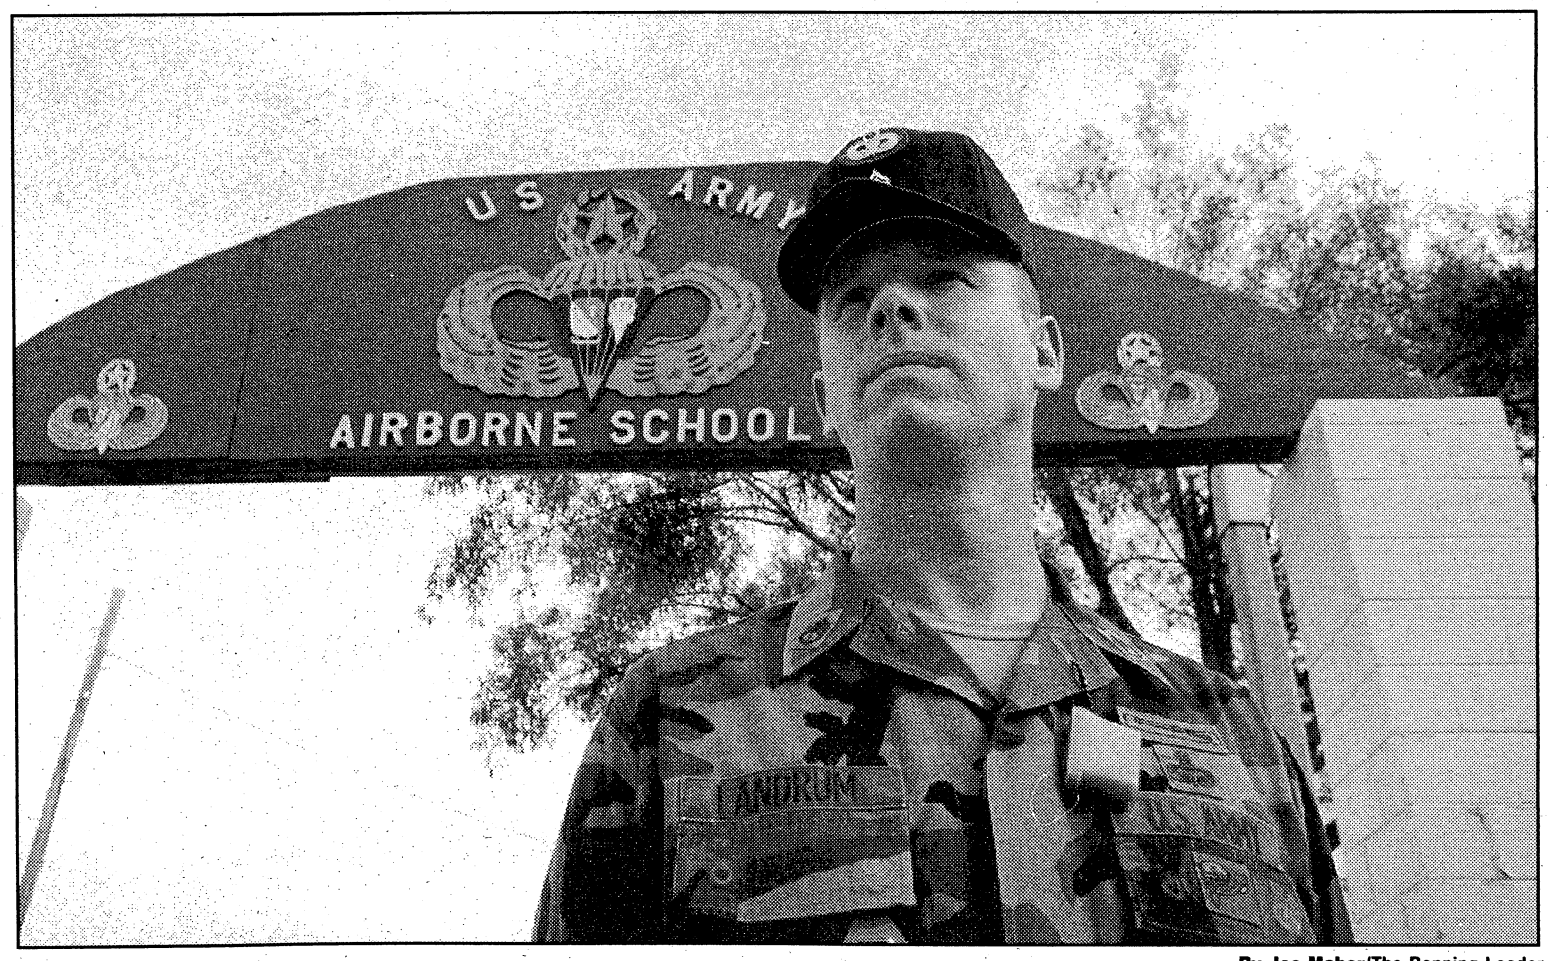
"You can really make an impact on how they feel about the military," said Landrum. And the ability to influence soldiers' development and help shape their attitudes is what Landrum enjoys most about his job as a Blackhat, as airborne instructors are known.

Landrum, a senior instructor with the 1st Battalion (Airborne), 507th Infantry, recently was named Blackhat of the Year. Being named the best instructor by the 507th came as something of a surprise to Landrum, but he was pleased to receive the honor, he said.

To be Blackhat of the Year, he said, "you've got to be dedicated and you've got to give 110 percent. You've got to care about the students and care about the training." And, he added, "you've got to enjoy it."

It was just two years ago, that Landrum became an airborne instructor. Before coming to Fort Benning, Landrum had been stationed at Fort Lewis, Wash. Except for a year spent in Korea, Landrum had been stationed at Fort Lewis since he himself graduated from Airborne School in May 1981.

Washington state — in "the great Northwest" — is what Landrum calls home now, even though he was born in California and spent much time growing up in Oklahoma and Arkansas. Landrum plans to retire in Washington, where he has already bought a home.



By Joe Maher/The Benning Leader

Staff Sgt. Robert Landrum, a senior instructor with the 1st Battalion (Airborne), 507th Infantry, recently was named Blackhat of the Year.

Things have changed in airborne training since Landrum went through the three-week course. Throughout the Army, in fact, "they've made life better for the soldier," he said.

When he was in jump school, Blackhats were people students wanted to avoid. Now Blackhats are much more accessible to students for help with anything, he said.

Being less tense around instructors may help some students to perform better. When they're nervous, they just can't get things right, he said.

But others need the tension of meeting an instructor's strict standard to perform their best. "Sometimes you've really got to get on them hard," Landrum said.

"It takes a few days to learn which ones perform better under which circumstance," Landrum said. But then, he tries to individualize his instruction so that every student learns as much as he or she can and becomes the best airborne soldier possible.

"That's the main objective here — get them to perform, to qualify and to graduate," Landrum said.

Still, it takes "a lot of patience" to deal with students effectively, he said.

Helping students learn — and to develop a love of learning — is a mission Landrum wants to continue after he retires from the Army. He wants to teach grammar school, he said.

Getting children motivated and instilling in them a love of learning are the keys to their academic success, he said. "If they enjoy (learning) when they're young, they'll always enjoy it, and they'll do well in school," Landrum said.

Landrum's love of learning is long-lived. Although not enrolled in any courses this quarter, he is pursuing his college degree, and hopes to also complete a master's degree — perhaps in history — by the time he retires.

"It seemed like when I was younger, history really didn't matter to me," Landrum said. "But a lot of things that are happening today started way back when. And it's just kind of interesting to figure out how things evolved and where we're at now."

In fact, he said, he hated history when he was in school. He got started reading it recently as he helped his children with their homework.

Landrum's committed to learning, even if it means long hours and much work. Last quarter, for example he had college classes four nights a week — two nights until 8 p.m. and two until 10 p.m. — after having reported for work by 5:30 a.m. each day. And Saturdays, he said, were spent "at the library somewhere doing research or behind a typewriter on the kitchen table."

"You've got to be dedicated to getting that college education as well as doing the job here," he said. But it does set a good example for his children, said Landrum, who instead of graduating from high school, got his General Equivalency Diploma at age 16 and went to work.

Seven years after that, at 23, Landrum joined the Army to "see the world and live some of the adventures I saw in the commercials," he said.

His eagerness to learn, however, has been constant throughout his military career. The more military education, the better, as Landrum sees it. "Every school you can go to is another feather in your cap because it gives you a little more qualifications," he said.

Landrum has already completed Jumpmaster, Joint Firepower Control and Pathfinder courses, as well as the Basic and Advance Non-Commissioned Officer courses. Next, he'd like to attend the Battle Staff Course. "You can learn a lot there, and go a long ways with it," he said.

Although already planning a civilian career, he still has several goals yet to accomplish in his military career. He'd like to run a platoon and then serve in a staff job.

And eventually, he'd like to come back to the airborne school. "If I could be command sergeant major here, I'd love it," Landrum said.

U.S. envoy heads to Hanoi for MIA talks

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — A special U.S. envoy left Wednesday for Hanoi to discuss accounting for the more than 1,650 U.S. servicemen missing from the Vietnam war.

The trip by Gen. John Vessey to speak with senior Vietnamese officials comes as families of the missing Americans have expressed deep disappointment over Vietnamese cooperation on the MIA issue.

"It's been slow, way too slow," said Mary Backley, spokeswoman for the National League of Families of American Prisoners and Missing in Southeast Asia.

President Bush was interrupted by hecklers last July while speaking to the league, but U.S. officials denied that the Vessey visit was an election year gesture to the families.

They said the visit grew out of a meeting here last week between Acting Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger and Vietnamese Foreign Minister Nguyen Manh Cam, who was in the United States to attend the U.N. General Assembly.

The trip is the first since January by Vessey, who is being accompanied by State Department and National Security Council officials and Ann Mills Griffiths, the league director. The talks begin Saturday.

The United States is committed to normalizing relations with Vietnam but only if Hanoi cooperates more on the MIA issue.

Backley said Vietnam is devoting increased resources to the accounting but results have been minimal.

"Activity is not a substitute for results," she said. "It looks like they are bending over backwards, but they continue to manipulate and withhold information as well as remains. . . . We have not had full and open access."

Backley said there are 1,657 American servicemen still unaccounted for since U.S. involvement in the Vietnam war ended just under 20 years ago.

She said U.S. and Vietnamese teams have undertaken a number of joint searches for missing servicemen since 1988 but found the remains of only five Americans.

Unilateral Vietnamese operations have been more productive, she said, noting that remains of 111 Americans have been uncovered through this method.

Fests abound this weekend; they're only a drive away

By Sandra Okamoto
Staff writer

Not another festival, you say.

You're right. Not just one — we have several that you can go to this weekend. None are in Columbus, so you'll have to drive.

Hurtsboro festival

The first one is a little different. Hurtsboro has its very own railroad. It goes only about half a mile, but you can ride it all day long, if you like.

The Third Annual Hurtsboro Wildlife Festival is Saturday and Sunday between 8 a.m.-5 p.m. (these times are Central).

From Columbus, it's about a 40-minute trip to Hurtsboro. Take U.S. Highway 431 South to Seale. Go west 15 miles on Alabama Highway 26 to Hurtsboro and follow the signs.

Activities include a parade, Creek Indian exhibits, wildlife exhibits, antique car show, horse jumping show, basket making, syrup making, flint lock rifle exhibit, clogging demonstrations, bow competition, bow demonstration, trophy displays, retriever demonstrations and the Midland fox hounds.

Other activities include an admission fee. The railroad motorcar rides cost $2, train rides (50¢), horseback riding ($6 between 1-5 p.m. Sunday only), hot air balloon rides ($4 for a tethered ride), hay rides, The Tag Williams Band, turkey shoot, skeet shooting ($6.50 for 10 shots) and a 5-K run and a one-mile run/walk ($8 entry fee for each race).

Free entertainment on Saturday includes music by Robert Thomas, Albert Macon and George Daniel; archery trick shooting by Byron Ferguson and western dance demonstrations by the Sierra Rose Dance Club. Mark Torbert is the master of ceremonies.

In the Children's Corner are clowns, face painting, railroad motorcar rides, train rides, story telling by Thad Crowell, a Moon Walk, games and balloons.

Food vendors include Country's Barbecue.

Admission is $1, which includes a map and a chance for a hot air ballon ride.

For more information, call Sam Watkins at (205) 667-6369 or Steve Williams at (205) 667-7311.

Callaway festival

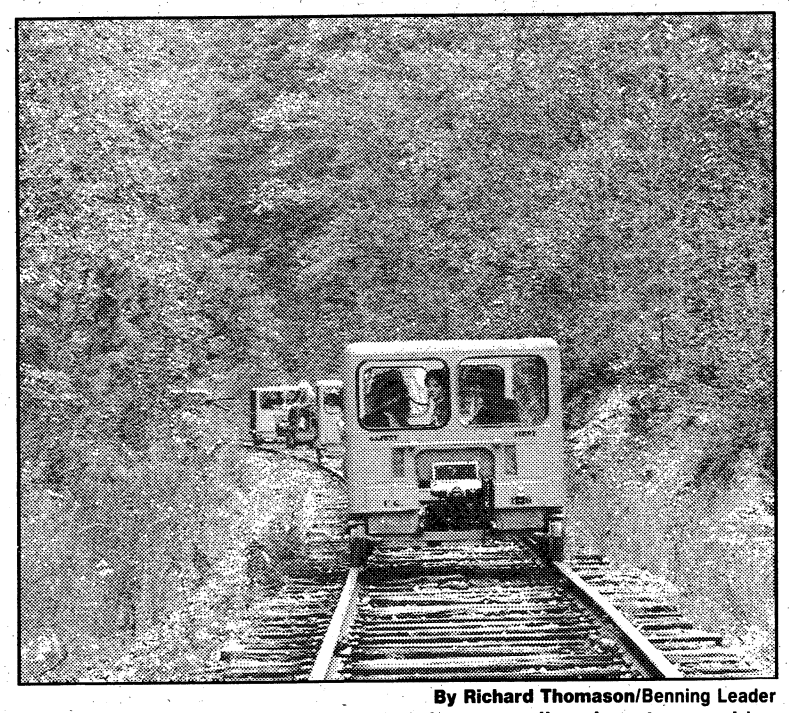
Callaway Gardens, 30 miles north of Columbus on U.S. Highway 27, features its annual Chrysanthemum Festival Saturday and Sunday between 7 a.m.-7 p.m.

There will be music, story telling, living history demonstrations, 1840s minstrel music, educational workshops and performances by The Human Experience Theater for Alice's Wonderland Topiary display. The topiary display, which include the Queen and King of Hearts, the Mad Hatter and March Hare, Cheshire Cat, White Rabbit, chess pieces, the Duchess, will disappear from the Gardens after this weekend.

The First Fine Arts Show will be in the Circus Tent at the Beach between 10 a.m.-5 p.m. Saturday-Sunday.

Admission is $7; $2 for children 6-11; children 5 and under get in free. Annual memberships: $25; $15 for children 6-11.

For more information, call (706) 663-2281.



By Richard Thomason/Benning Leader

The Hurtsboro Wildlife Festival will feature railroad motorcar rides (above) and hot air balloon rides.

Hiawassee festival

The Fall Harvest Music Festival and Old Time Fiddlers Convention in Hiawassee, begins Saturday.

This two-weekend event is Saturday and Sunday and Oct. 23-24. Country music is featured this weekend; gospel music on Oct. 18.

More than 200 musicians and singers are expected to perform.

The Fiddlers Convention and bluegrass music will highlight the second weekend at 8 p.m. Oct. 23 and noon Oct. 24. This includes competition in fiddle, banjo, guitar, mandolin and bluegrass bands.

'Babes in Toyland' auditions set

From staff reports

The Springer Opera House will hold open auditions Monday and Tuesday for its Christmas musical, "Babes in Toyland," the holiday fantasy with Victor Herbert's original score.

Guest director Allen O'Reilly, from Atlanta, will hear vocal auditions on Monday and reading auditions Tuesday. Both auditions begin at 6:30 p.m. in the Red Room of the Springer.

All actors will be required to attend the vocal audition and should bring sheet music or an accompaniment tape and be prepared to sing a verse and a chorus of a lively children's song or Broadway show tune. A pianist will be provided. Each actor will read selected scenes from the script.

O'Reilly asks that performers wear comfortable clothing Tuesday night as some movement or dance may be requested.

"Babes in Toyland" features Herbert's unforgettable songs in a yuletide adventure in Toyland involving the jolly toymaker and all of the Mother Goose characters joining forces to save Christmas from a holiday calamity.

A minimum of 23 actors will be cast for the show — 10 female and 13 male performers of all ages.

O'Reilly has directed at the Georgia Shakespeare Festival, the Atlanta Shakespeare Co. and the Alliance Theater. He has taught classes at the Alliance Theater School and the Georgia Shakespeare Conservatory and staged shows for the Lake Lanier Children's Theater. The director is also a member of the Actors Equity Association and is the former artistic director of the Mystery Cafe in Atlanta.

"Babes in Toyland" will be performed on the Springer Main Stage Dec. 3-20. For more information, call 324-1100.

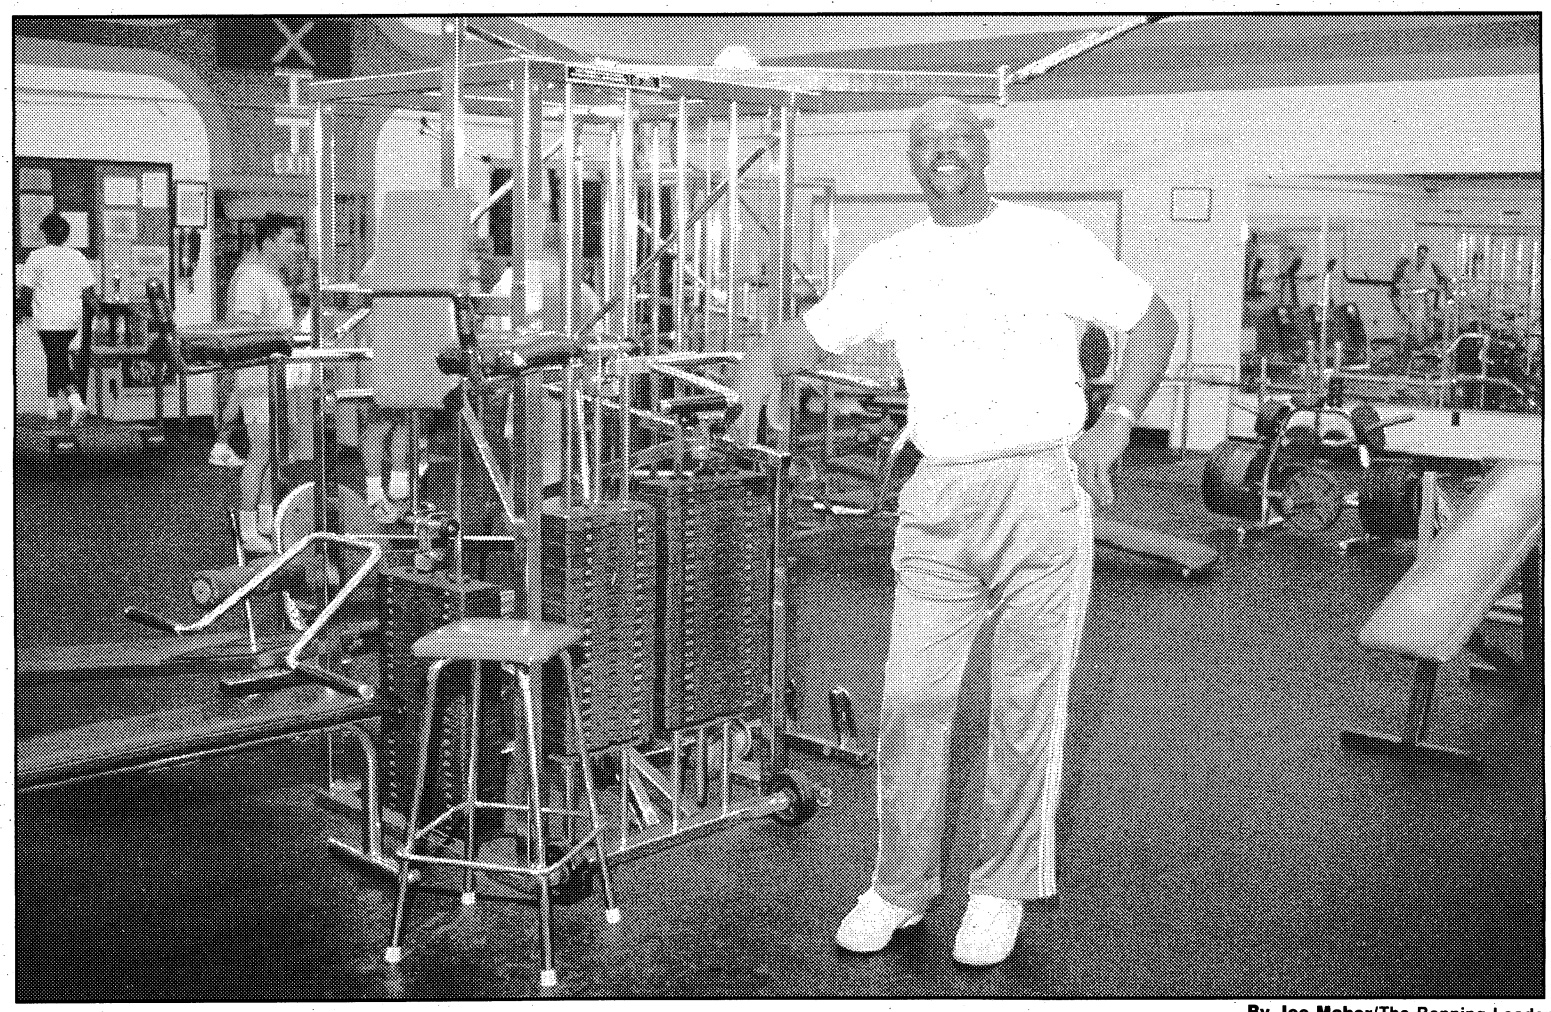
COVER STORY

Mr. Sistrunk goes to Washington

Former NFL player moves to Fort Lewis

By Jerry Rutledge
Leader Editor



By Joe Maher/The Benning Leader

Otis Sistrunk, who ran the Infantry Hall Fitness Center, says his move to Fort Lewis, Wash., will give him more time with his Los Angeles Raiders 'family.'

The idea of pulling up roots and leaving his hometown had been floating around in Otis Sistrunk's mind for quite a few months.

After a solid 9-year career as a defensive lineman for the National Football League's Oakland (now Los Angeles) Raiders plus a couple of years toiling as a professional wrestler, Sistrunk had settled in as head of the Infantry Hall Fitness Center at Fort Benning.

He loved the job and enjoyed his relationships with his fellow workers and soldiers who used the facility during his seven years on post. But when opportunity knocked . . .

"It was a good chance for me to go back to the West Coast," said Sistrunk, 48. "I'll be working at Fort Lewis during the week and working on the weekends for a sports company. It was a real good opportunity."

At Fort Lewis, Sistrunk will be performing the same job as at Fort Benning — helping soldiers build stronger bodies. Sports Network, the sports company the former Raider signed on with, produces card shows in cities along the Pacific Coast. Sistrunk will trade on his name recognition as former pro football player, making appearances and signing cards.

"It's a good situation, but I'm leaving a place I love," said Sistrunk. "My parents — my mother and my grandmother — are here and I hate to leave them. It was kind of tough for me, at first. I talked with them and my grandmother said maybe it would be good for me to make a change.

"I hope to God it works out . . . but if it doesn't, I can always come back home. And if things don't work out, I hope Fort Benning will accept me back if I decide to come back. I have a lot of friends here. I have my family, my relatives, but these people — the soldiers — are my family, too. I'm really going to miss them."

Sistrunk's return to the West Coast, however, will put him in contact with another "family" — the Raiders.

Managing general partner Al Davis has always portrayed his organization as more than just a professional football franchise. He's said the Raiders are a family — once a Raider always a Raider.

Sistrunk says it isn't just image.

"People on the outside look at it as just ex-ballplayers. Talk to an ex-Raider and he'll tell you 'I'm not an ex-Raider, I'm still a Raider regardless,' " he said. "You're part of the family. Like the guys who work here (the fitness center), we always consider ourselves part of a family. Any guy that comes to work here, he has to be like family. I care about all the guys who work here or workout here. We had the same atmosphere here at the fitness center as we did with the Raiders."

Over the years, Sistrunk has annually made two or three trips back to the coast at the Raiders' behest. Now situated in Washington, his availability to the organization is enhanced.

"I'll be helping out, going down to Raiders camp in L.A.," said Sistrunk. "All of this will be on the weekend. Other than that, I'll be around the Fort Lewis area. I'll probably get involved with kids around there. I'm not going to stop doing what I like to do and that's work with kids. I'll keep doing that."

He'll also keep remembering Fort Benning and his friends. "I hate to leave, but sometimes you need to make a change," said Sistrunk. "Fort Benning was good to me. I loved working with soldiers. Since I've been working here on post, I was thrilled that a lot of guys stopped by whether it had something to do with football or not. It was the atmosphere . . . I cared about the job as much as I cared about the money."

Sistrunk and his family left for Fort Lewis and the Seattle area on Saturday. Fort Benning commander Maj. Gen. Jerry A. White was one of several post officials who stopped by on Sistrunk's final day (Friday) to say farewell.

"That was special. But then again, I wouldn't expect anything else from Fort Benning," he said. "They always treated me well."

WW II 50TH ANNIVERSARY

Fifty years ago this week on the Eastern Front, the first winter snow fell at Stalingrad, slowing the continuing German advance through Russia. Ill-equipped for cold weather fighting, the German Army found its progress slowed, considerably, in the Krasnye, Red October and Barrikady Factory provinces.

Here, according to research by the Military History Division at Fort Benning, were the top news items of the week:

■

On Guadalcanal, the Japanese forces used tanks and infantry troops to spearhead an attack on American positions. Poor intelligence and coordination, however, hindered the effort, causing initial setbacks for the attacking force.

■

In New Guinea, Australian forces successfully advanced, forcing the Japanese to withdraw from Eora. The Australian success occurred despite the lack of planned support from American forces, worn down by an unnecessarily grueling, poorly planned march.

■

Adolf Hitler issued orders to his military commanders stating that all prisoners captured during Allied commando raids were to be shot. Hitler's directive was actually in response to similar Allied actions, including several incidents in which British soldiers executed bound German prisoners taken during the commando raids of the Channel Islands.

■

In the United States, Congress passed the largest tax bill in the country's history. Framers of the bill designed it to raise approximately $6,881,000,000.

■

Fort Benning officials announced the completion and scheduled opening of dormitories intended to house 310 wartime civilian post employees.

Bosses get look at 'weekend warriors'

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

"Boss Lift" was set up, in part, to allow employers of Reservists and National Guard members see what those civilian-soldiers do when they're in uniform, said Ray Merchent, a member of the Virginia Committee for Employer Support of the Guard and Reserve.

The Army flew three employers of Virginia reservists to Fort Benning on Wednesday to watch what their civilian-soldiers are doing during their two weeks of annual training here.

Capt. John Palomares, a captain with the investigative division of the Naval Base Police at Norfolk Naval Base, was surprised by the appearance of Staff Sgt. Albert L. White Jr., a reservist who was helping run a company of soldier trainees through squad tactics drills near Sand Hill on Wednesday afternoon.

"I didn't even recognize you, all camouflaged up," he said.

White, a four-year reservist following four years of Regular Army duty, is a corporal on the same police force as Palomares, who is an ex-Marine with four Purple Hearts from wounds he picked up in Vietnam.

White and other soldiers and officers from the 80th Infantry Division, an Army Reserve command based in Virginia, are running three companies in one of Fort Benning's six training battalions at the post's Infantry Training Brigade and Reserve officers are running one of the battalions for this 13-week One Station Unit Training cycle.

"Boss Lift" was set up, in part, to allow employers of Reservists and National Guard members see what those civilian-soldiers do when they're in uniform, said Ray Merchent, a member of the Virginia Committee for Employer Support of the Guard and Reserve.

Merchent was absent from his job as executive vice president of Mary Washington College in Fredericksburg, Va., to accompany Palomares and John Hamilton, a senior inspector with National Exterminating Company in Newport News, Va., on the Benning tour.

Reserve and Regular Army officers and enlisted men took the visitors on a tour of several infantry training sites on Wednesday and spelled out the objectives and techniques of the Infantry Training Brigade. The tour included a chance to drive an Infantry Fighting Vehicle.

Today's tour was to conclude with a tour of the Warfighting Center in Infantry Hall.

Merchent said another objective of Boss Lift, which included an Army flight from Langley, Va., and back, is to reward employers for their support of National Guard and Reserve troops as well as to remind them of their obligations to Reserve troops.

Hospital begins Gateway to Care retiree meetings

By Linda Bosley Dailey
Staff Writer

Martin Army Community Hospital officials met with several hundred military retirees and their family members Tuesday night — in the first of a series of briefings for retirees — to explain the Army's new managed health care program.

Other meetings to explain the program to retirees and answer questions will be held from 6 to 7:30 p.m. at the Infantry Hall auditorium on Oct. 20, 22, 27 and 29.

While some retirees enthusiastically endorsed the care plan — called Gateway to Care — after Tuesday's meeting, others remained uncertain whether the program would adequately meet their health care needs.

Gisela Crowley, of Columbus, is one who is uncertain. She has been receiving treatment from a civilian doctor, and is debating whether the benefits of the program are worth giving up the long-established relationship with her doctor.

"I like this program, but I hate to give him (her doctor) up," Crowley said. But, she said, medical costs factor into the decision, too. "Insurance doesn't pay for everything," she said.

But Flora Morgan had no hesitation in supporting the program. "This is going to be so much better, I believe," said the Waverly Hall resident.

Military retirees who join will be assigned to an Army family practice clinic where they and their families will receive all their primary care, said Lt. Col Charles Bottoms, chief of Coordinated Care at Martin Army.

But if the family practice physician refers a patient to specialized care, he is obligated to see one of the physicians in the Gateway to Care system. Ernest Windsor, of Lanett, Ala., said having the hospital select which doctor he would see for specialized care wouldn't worry him. "Not as long as he's a good doctor," he said.

Hospital officials, however, will try to let patients who join Gateway continue seeing civilian specialists who have been treating them for a long time, Bottoms said. Such decisions would be made, though, on a case by case basis, he said.

Bottoms said that a patient who lacks confidence in a certain doctor or is dissatisfied with the quality of care from a particular physician can ask to see another doctor.

A "lucky few" military retirees — about 1,600 families — already have an assignment to the family practice clinic at Martin Army, Bottoms said. But those retirees will need to join the Gateway program if they want to continue receiving family practice care.

Once the system is fully implemented, the family practice clinics will be limited to treating only those patients assigned to them through the Gateway to Care plan, said Mark Holloway, deputy chief of Coordinated Care at Martin Army. About half of the retirees already assigned to the hospital's family practice clinic will be transferred to the PRIMUS Family Practice Clinic when it opens Feb. 1.

Retirees over 65 who have Medicare are eligible to join the Gateway to Care program. But in certain circumstances, Medicare will be billed.

Doctors working in partnership with Martin Army Community Hospital — civilian physicians who work on a fee-for-service basis at the hospital and its clinics — will bill Medicare for on-going treatment.

Treatment from an active duty doctor at the hospital or from a civilian physician under contract — such as those who will staff the PRIMUS Family Practice Clinic when it opens Feb. 1 — will not be billed to Medicare, Holloway said.

Questions and answers

Several meetings are planned to explain the Gateway to Care program to retirees. They will be held from 6 to 7:30 p.m. at the Infantry Hall auditorium on Oct. 20, 22, 27 and 29.

The campaign trail

By Richard Thomason/The Benning Leader

Vice-President Dan Quayle talks with Fort Benning Chief of Staff Col. Burnet Quick (left) and his daughter Shannon Quick just before Quayle boarded Air Force Two to depart at Lawson Army Airfield Wednesday. Quayle landed at Fort Benning as part of a campaign trip to Auburn University. He arrived at Lawson at approximately 10:50 a.m. and departed at 2:30 p.m.

Appreciation Day Breakfast being held

The Quarterly Excellence Appreciation Day Breakfast will be held at 8 this morning at the Fort Benning Officers' Club Supper Club.

Both military and civilian personnel will be recognized at the breakfast for their contributions to the achievement of excellence at work and in the Fort Benning community.

The breakfast is part of the Training and Doctrine Command's Communities of Excellence Program, in which Fort Benning took first-place honors recently. The award was based on how well the post takes care of soldiers and other customers, as well as its relations with the civilian community.

Excavations link Jesus to the big city

From wire reports

The general impression has been that Jesus was a rural fellow of the fields and sheep pastures of upland Galilee, but it turns out he apparently grew up on the edge of a bustling metropolis.

Recognition of it comes through excavations of the ancient cosmopolitan city of Sepphoris, situated only three miles north of the village of Nazareth, Jesus' small hometown.

Religious scholar Richard A. Batey says the excavations provide evidence of "a sophisticated urban culture that places Jesus in a radically different environment" from his traditionally portrayed background.

"The popular picture of Jesus as a rustic growing up in the relative isolation of a small village of 400 people in the remote hills of Galilee must be integrated with the newly revealed setting," Batey says.

In a recent book, "Jesus and the Forgotten City," published by Baker Book House, he calls the nearby setting "a burgeoning Greco-Roman metropolis boasting upwards of 30,000 inhabitants — Jews, Arabs, Greeks and Romans."

In Jesus' time, Sepphoris was the capital of Galilee, its largest, most ornate and prosperous city. It was rebuilt in splendor by Rome's appointed ruler, Herod Antipas, during Jesus' youth and young manhood.

It had the imposing elements typical of the empire's provincial capitals — a main colonnaded avenue leading to the forum, Antipas' tower-flanked palace, a 4,000-seat theater, public baths, gymnasium, markets, pools, fountains, archives and other public buildings.

Excavations at Sepphoris "have raised the curtain on a new act in the ongoing drama of Jesus. . .," Batey writes. "The stage on which he acted out his ministry was cosmopolitan and sophisticated, and his understanding of urban life was more relevant than previously imagined."

Batey, who teaches religion at Rhodes College in Memphis, Tenn., was an assistant director of excavations at Sepphoris from 1984 to 1989, and currently chairs a seminar on archaeology and the New Testament.

"Our idea that Jesus was just a country boy is no longer viable," Batey said in a telephone interview. "He was very much in touch with the urban world. . . . It makes his images closer to contemporary issues and life."

An excerpted chapter from Batey's book, published recently in the Biblical Archaeology Review, says the nearby urban environment means Jesus had a direct and immediate perspective on city life.

"Sepphoris became the nerve center for the government's control of Galilee and Perea," Batey writes. "Political policy, military strategy, economic regulation and cultural affairs were administered from this seat of power."

The vast reconstruction in Sepphoris during Jesus's early years in nearby Nazareth "redefines the carpenter's occupation" there, Batey writes.

"Many skilled workers from surrounding towns and villages came to Sepphoris and found employment. Artisans from Nazareth would surely have been among them."

Noting that Jesus lived close by the city from boyhood into manhood, Batey says, "Even casual contacts with the capital would have given Jesus firsthand knowledge of Greco-Roman city planning, architectural design and sophisticated engineering technology — as well as the cosmopolitan citizens."

He also obviously was acquainted with royal life as indicated by passages in his later teaching such as Luke 7:25: "Behold, those who are gorgeously appareled and live in luxury are in kings' courts."

Columbus forecast end of the world

From wire reports

NEW YORK — When Columbus began his exploratory voyages, he considered them a quest for gold and glory. But later he saw them as fulfilling biblical prophecy and foreshadowing the end of the world.

It's the sort of speculation that accompanies major turning points — now surfacing increasingly as the turn of the century approaches — and which also eventually gripped Columbus, according to newly examined material.

The little known shift in his outlook is described in the first definitive modern translation and analysis of a work of religious mysticism he wrote in his latter years, "Book of Prophecies."

People "have never thought of Columbus as part of a mystic Christian worldview," said William Melczer, professor of medieval and Renaissance studies at Syracuse University and translator of the obscure work.

In it, Columbus "places himself within sacred history," Melczer said. "He sees himself as a child of Christian destiny, whose discoveries had been prophesied. He, Columbus, fulfills the prophecies of the prophets."

While both laudatory and critical notes have marked the 500th anniversary of Columbus' coming to America, Melczer said the book provides "orientation for a new way of looking at Columbus."

Calling himself a "disciple of the disciples," Columbus links himself with Christ's apostles and sees his discoveries as part of "eschatological history, having to do with the last things," Melczer said.

"After his fourth and last voyage, he was tired, dispirited and dejected, and for that reason he sits down to turn out this magnificent piece of self-justification," Melczer said in an interview.

"That's what happens to a man's goal in life, when he suddenly realizes he can't attain it, he goes home and falls asleep and dreams up whatever he could not attain in real life," Melczer said.

For Columbus, it meant giving up his aspirations for riches and honor, and instead interpreting his voyages as signs of an approaching end of worldly time.

On his first two voyages, settlements he had started were wiped out by Indians, and on his disastrous third and fourth voyages, all his ships were wrecked and he was stripped of territorial governorship, Melczer said.

"Everything was in a mess," he said, noting that Columbus was brought back in chains from this third voyage by an inspector sent to detain him by Spain's king.

It was in this downcast mood, in 1501, five years before his death, that he wrote his "Book of Prophecies," mostly in Latin. Melczer's rendering in modern Italian, with copious notes, is being published in November by Novocento in Palermo, Italy.

He said Columbus, drawing on biblical prophets and various Christian and Jewish Scripture interpreters, concludes that only 155 years remained before the end of the world. That would have made the end in 1656.

Stormin' Norman hyping new book

Retired general talks politics, Desert Storm

By Carlin Romano
Knight-Ridder Newspapers

NEW YORK — On a day when Ross Perot's name is on everyone's lips, another man known for Mideast missions strides into the Peninsula Hotel on Fifth Avenue, his barreling frame taking the first hill — make that staircase — like an M-60 tank in jacket and tie.

"I may announce myself this week," declares H. Norman Schwarzkopf, keeping a full general's step ahead of his entourage.

For a moment — just a moment — the threat of "actual news" hangs over his imminent author interview.

"Why not?" banters the Great Helmsman of Desert Storm, flashing a grin as he cuts toward the elevator. "Everyone else is. Do you understand what's going on?"

Well, yes, sir. I mean, no sir. I mean — it's not every day that the supreme commander of last year's allied coalition asks your opinion on a weighty matter of national politics. But that's the kind of guy H. Norman Schwarzkopf is these days — a regular one — as he promotes "It Doesn't Take a Hero" (Bantam), the autobiography that landed him a reported $5.5 million.

Granted, the 58-year-old retired Army general packs a high profile and a cash flow that would send Beetle Bailey's head spinning (many of his speeches last year reportedly earned him from $50,000 to $75,000 each, a sharp increase over his final $113,000 Army salary). And sure, he is the man of last year's hour — the officer and gentleman who finally punched Saddam Hussein in the mouth, even if he didn't KO him.

But nowadays he gets his international news from the TV and newspapers, like the rest of us. Puts his stylish blue blazer on one sleeve at a time. Can't figure out the message system in his hotel suite any better than your run-of-the-mill dumbo.

"Yeah, my phone keeps beeping at me, saying I have a message," Schwarzkopf grouches into a wafer-sized phone receiver, appealing to a hotel operator for a functional communications system, if not the secure one he used to get. The interviewer's sense of intimidation is, to put it bluntly, in free-fall. The Hero of Desert Storm is smart. He's friendly. He can't court-martial a features writer. He's barred by the rituals of book publicity from reinstating press censorship.

"Might as well ask those touchy questions after all."

So you mention how his early life story reminds you of Bill Clinton's — the same family problem of alcoholism, the same strong teen-age personality rising out of chaos, the same fixation on control, organization, advancement.

Now we know that the general is not exactly sweet on Gov. Clinton, but does Clinton's story of family alcoholism resonate for him? Does he ever think of himself as, well, the "Bill Clinton of Desert Storm"?

Give the man credit — after a big-fella kind of laugh, he nails this Scud out of left field.

"Not hardly," Schwarzkopf says, his smile slipping into bemusement. "I will confess this is certainly the first time that question has been asked of me."

Well, think about it a bit.

"I have not felt parallelism there," he says, repeating his frequently expressed wish to be "apolitical" during the campaign. "But quite frankly, I haven't read his biography."

Want to ponder it for a few days and get back to us?

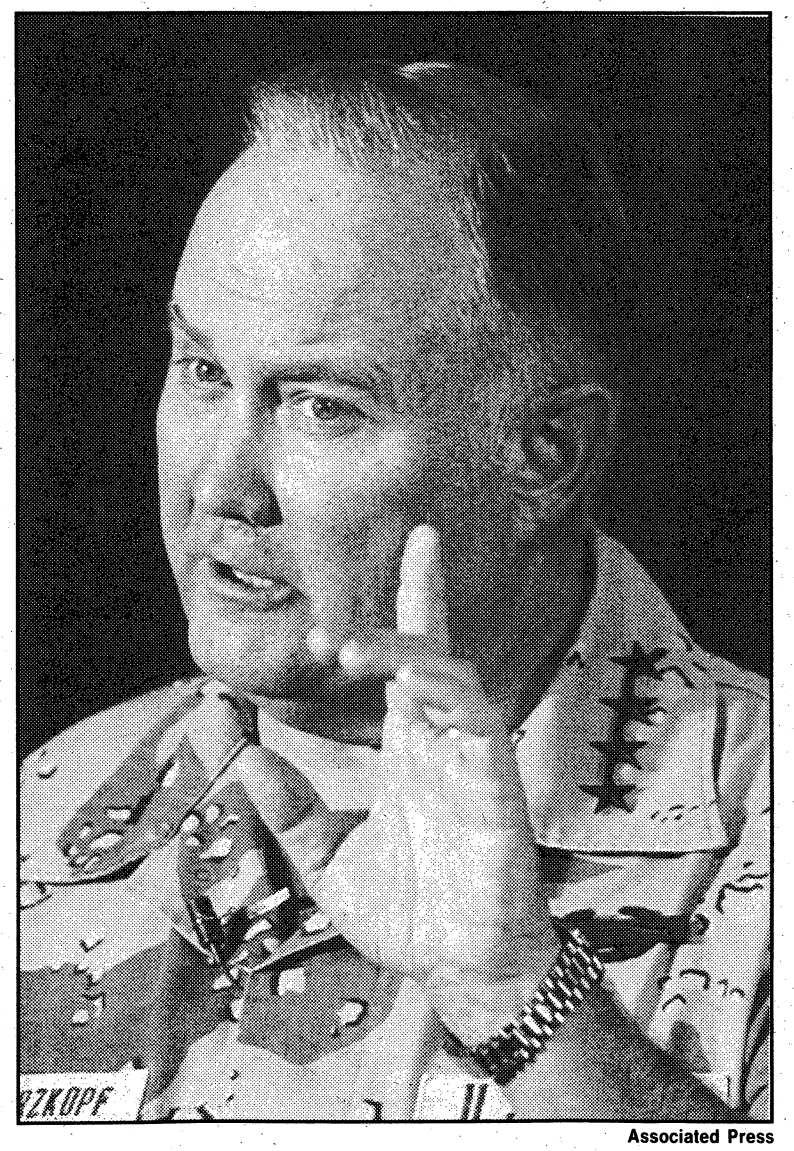
"No," he says, the broad grin returning. "I think I'd like to duck the whole thing."

But he doesn't duck the whole subject because, as his Gulf War TV performances confirmed, H. Norman Schwarzkopf is way smarter and more articulate than the average "Bear" (the nickname he shares, it seems, with every soldier at least two sizes bigger than Richard Gere). There's the oft-reported 170 IQ, the fluency in French and German, the valedictorian niche at Valley Forge Military Academy, the distinguished career at West Point, in Vietnam, and as chief of Central Command in Tampa, Fla.

More than that, Schwarzkopf is also way more complicated than his original media image — a reality driven home by his surprisingly trenchant memoir, soaked in details culled from hundreds of hours of taped interviews with co-writer Peter Petre.

I mean, "The things we didn't know about Stormin' Norman!"

Born to a privileged childhood in Lawrenceville and Princeton, the son of a famous general, N.J. state police chief and radio broadcaster who became a diplomat to Iran after World War II, young Norman spends some of his teen-age years in Tehran — where his sister dates the heavyweight champion of Iran and he downs delicacies such as sheep's eye — an experience that will nurture his lifelong cosmopolitanism and cultural sensitivity.



Associated Press

Gen. Norman Schwarzkopf strikes a familiar pose at a briefing during the Persian Gulf War.

Upset and confused by the alcoholism of his mother, which develops after his father's posting to Iran, young Norman find himself drawn to the ideals of military discipline his father absorbed at West Point, and asks to be sent to military school.

A self-confessed failure as a delivery boy for the Trenton Times, Norman grows up to excel as a military officer, winning three Silver Stars, a Legion of Honor and Purple Heart, while also becoming a Kennedy liberal and fan of Bob Dylan, Joan Baez, Luciano Pavarotti and — yes — ballet!

No wonder Schwarzkopf doesn't run from an awkward subject — that Clinton fellow — even though he has "made it a point" not to endorse anybody.

Schwarzkopf does take exception to Clinton's once describing a person who left the United States to avoid the draft as "brave." Asked whether he thinks President Clinton might face real problems of discipline in extracting military obedience to his orders, Schwarzkopf says he doubts it. But he does think that if Clinton ever had "to pull off a full-scale mobilization" that required a draft, he would face damaging talk of "double standards."

As the conversation begins to drift toward "apolitical" without an "a," the retired four-star Army general is asked whether there's "anything" he likes about Clinton.

He smiles that million-dollar smile.

"I don't want to get into that," he says, pleading no comment with an explanation: "If I were to say I like the cut of Bill Clinton's clothes, the next thing you know, it would be SCHWARZKOPF SUPPORTS CLINTON."

Unlikely. And yet, when queried on whether he would accept an appointment in a Clinton administration, he doesn't deep-six the idea: "It depends upon what the position is. It depends upon what the announced and avowed policy was with regard to whatever area I was dealing in. And whether or not I felt I could make a contribution."

You think Norman Schwarzkopf made it big by parachuting out of Roladexes?

In fact, the sweep of his conversation is as shrewd, yet down to earth, as his book. He agrees with Joint Chiefs chairman Colin L. Powell's recently voiced reservations on using force against the Serbs in the former Yugoslavia. He dismisses claims that he has "cashed in" on the war, noting the many endorsement deals and Mideast consultancies he has turned down to preserve the "dignity" of his Desert Storm role. For his definitive positions on the war, he points people to "It Doesn't Take a Hero."

In it, Schwarzkopf criticizes the "John Wayne" desire of some Bush administration figures (identified by insiders as Brent Scrowcroft and Robert Gates) to launch the ground war earlier. He denies that he wanted to "continue to march" for more than one more day when Washington ordered a cease-fire (he blames hyped interpretations of his remarks during a David Frost interview for the misunderstanding of his stance at the time). He acknowledges tense discussions with Powell, dresses down some fellow officers (though anonymously), disparages the quality of CIA research and plays down such public relations disasters as the bombing of a Baghdad bomb shelter.

Although only time will tell whether "It Doesn't Take a Hero" equals the success of Bantam's previous blockbuster autobiographies (its tomes from Lee Iacocca and pilot Chuck Yeager both sold more than a million hard-cover copies). But the book is already commercially hot.

The Book-of-the-Month Club paid a record sum in the "high six figures" to make it a main selection, and rights have been sold in more than a dozen countries. Magazine excerpts ran in a number of powerful international magazines, and the 700,000-copy first printing, combined with huge media promotion through ads and TV shows such as "20/20," virtually guarantees the book a berth on the bestseller list.

Now living in a rented house on the grounds of the Cheval Polo & Golf Club, which sits in a 2,000-acre gated community in North Tampa, Schwarzkopf calls writing his book "one of the toughest things I've ever had to do in my entire life." But he regards it as just another part of his main retirement obligation to his troops: to stand up against efforts at revisionism in assessing the war.

"If I wanted to cash in," he says forcefully, "I could be standing on TV today holding a soda earning huge amounts of money. I'm representing 541,000 American men and women who went over there and did a great thing for their country. So I feel an obligation to somehow maintain the dignity of what we accomplished."

DEFENSE

Senate Democrats offer plan to ease pain of defense cuts

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — A task force of Democratic senators announced a $1.6 billion basket of programs Thursday to help ease the pain of defense cutbacks and to strengthen government support of industry to improve America's competitiveness.

The money is contained in the fiscal 1993 budget and the programs could be operative within weeks. The money represents a $1.5 billion increase over the $100 million allocated for economic conversion last year, sources said.

"One thousand people a day are losing their jobs, and this will continue for the next five years," said Sen. David Pryor, D-Ark.

His estimate of 1.4 million jobs lost over this period includes uniformed service personnel, Defense Department civilians and workers in the armaments industry.

"They deserve more than a pat on the back," said Pryor, in announcing a variety of new programs for individual retraining and to assist local businesses in making the transition from defense to commercial work.

However, these hundreds of thousands of people will be looking for alternative jobs in an American economy where businesses are at a disadvantage relative to their foreign competitors for lack of government support, said Sen. Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn.

"That's like sending the ball-carrier out on the field without any blockers," he said.

The senators outlined fully 30 programs, a half-dozen of which are new, for job retraining, community adjustment, and government support of research to assist industry in developing new products.

"Seven months ago our country had no plan, no passion for transition, no ideas," grouse Pryor.

Although the new programs were hailed by Sen. Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., as "a major effort for a national manufacturing policy," they are exceedingly modest in terms of the money still programmed for weapons.

For example, in just five programs — "Star Wars" missile defenses and new tactical aircraft programs for the four services — the fiscal 1993 budget contains roughly $8 billion, or more than four times the $1.6 billion allotted for defense transition. In other words, for every $8 being spent on weapons projects begun during the Cold War, about $1.60 will be spent on converting America's Cold War economy to the needs of the new era.

Indeed, when the aircraft programs enter the production stage later this decade, they will require more than $300 billion in funding, according to the House Armed Services Committee.

Pryor agreed that there will not be enough money for all these weapons programs and to support a robust conversion and reinvestment program.

"You are looking at a potential train wreck," he said.

In addition, much of the $1.6 billion was funneled to the Pentagon, which has openly resisted Congressional efforts to spend significant sums on defense conversion.

In a Sept. 9 letter to Sen. Sam Nunn, D-Ga., the chairman of the armed services committee, Defense Secretary Dick Cheney said flatly that allotting more money to conversion is "not necessary (and) would be at the expense of national security programs."

As one example of the conflicting views, the Bush administration requested a one-third cut in the $7 million budget for the Pentagon's Office of Economic Adjustment. This office is charged with helping local communities plan for base and defense plant closures.

U.S. holds firm on troop withdrawals from Korea

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — The United States will not resume troop withdrawals from the Korean peninsula given concerns over North Korea's "destabilizing" nuclear arms program, U.S. and South Korean officials announced last week.

The decision was revealed following a series of meetings in the Pentagon between Defense Secretary Dick Cheney and his South Korean counterpart, Defense Minister Choi Sae Chang.

A second phase of U.S. troop withdrawals was scheduled to begin Jan. 1, 1993 and run through 1995.

"Despite worldwide trends of reconciliation and cooperation, there still exist destabilizing factors in northeast Asia, such as the North Korean nuclear program," a communique issued by both nations said. "In this connection, Secretary Cheney ... reaffirmed the intention of the United States to sustain its security engagement and presence in Asia for the long term."

In 1990, the two nations agreed on a phased withdrawal that pared about 7,000 U.S. military personnel from South Korea in the first stage. There are about 37,000 U.S. troops there now.

But the second movement of troops was put on hold in 1991, in light of what appeared to be North Korea's continued push to develop a nuclear weapons program.

"There is continued concern about North Korea's nuclear development, and the failure of North Korea to take action to dispel our concerns," said a senior Pentagon official, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

One of the items rejected by Pyongyang has been mutual nuclear inspections of both North and South Korea.

Although relations between Seoul and the hard-line communist government in Pyongyang have improved over the past two years, the Bush administration has repeatedly issued warnings that North Korea appears to be intent to improve its ability to produce a nuclear weapon.

Cheney and Choi were taking part in the annual two-day round of discussions between the allies on defense matters.

In the communique, South Korea also agreed to increase its contributions to the cost of maintaining U.S. forces on the peninsula.

The contributions have risen steadily in recent years under pressure from Congress for nations in Europe and Asia with flourishing economies to pay more for their own defenses.

Seoul contributed $150 million in 1991, $180 million in 1992. The amount will increase to $220 million in 1993, the communique said.

The Pentagon estimates that the cost of maintaining the 37,000 troops in South Korea is expected to be about $900 million by the late 1990's.

U.S. puts pressure on Kuwait to buy tanks

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — The Kuwaiti government chose a U.S.-made tank over a British competitor after a blizzard of letters from President Bush and top administration officials to the ruling family urging them to buy American, U.S. officials said Tuesday.

The sales pitch was described as "routine" and as part of an administration effort to promote American weapons when their purchase by foreign governments is deemed in the U.S. national interest.

Bush wrote the Kuwaiti emir, Jaber al-Sabah, while Vice President Dan Quayle wrote in support of the M1-A2 Abrams to the crown prince, Saad al-Sabah, an official told The Associated Press.

Additionally, Defense Secretary Dick Cheney wrote Ali al-Sabah, his counterpart in the Kuwaiti hierarchy, as well as the crown prince; acting Secretary of State Lawrence S. Eagleburger wrote to Foreign Minister Salem al Sabah, and Army Secretary Michael Stone wrote the defense minister, said the official, who declined to be identified.

In Detroit, a spokesman for General Dynamics Corp. said Kuwait's decision to purchase the Abrams tank means economic security for the munitions maker's tank-building division through the end of the century. But the spokesman said the deal would not produce more jobs.

"I'd say it's a press," the official said. "A full-court press would involve telephone calls, and there weren't any. Letters have supported other sales. In that sense, it's routine."

Eagleburger, in a recent cable to U.S. embassies, urged American diplomats to promote the sale of U.S. weapons provided the purchase was in the best interest of the United States.

The officials described the tank deal with Kuwait in that light and denied there were any political implications as Kuwait had initiated the quest for a modern tank immediately after the Persian Gulf War with Iraq in February 1991.

The United States organized the coalition that rescued Kuwait by forcing out Iraqi invaders and then conducting an air and land assault against President Saddam Hussein's government.

In Detroit, a spokesman for General Dynamics Corp. said Kuwait's decision to purchase the Abrams tank means economic security for the munitions maker's tank-building division through the end of the century.

But the spokesman said the deal would not produce more jobs.

Pete Williams, a Pentagon spokesman, said the Abrams was chosen over a British competitor because it is technically superior. He denied election-year politics were involved.

"If the Abrams tank had been an inferior weapon system, I don't think any amount of political pressure would have made a difference," Williams said.

"We believe (the choice) was the result of the clear technical superiority of the Abrams tank ... and also by its success in the Gulf War that liberated Kuwait," he said.

The MI-A2 was the U.S. Army's main battle tank in the Gulf War.

Kuwaiti Defense Minister Ali Al-Sabah said Sunday that a technical committee had decided on the U.S. tank after extensive desert tests of the Abrams and the British Challenger 2 tanks.

The British tank manufacturer Vickers charged Monday that the administration had used its political influence to win the contract in an effort to create American jobs before the presidential election.

In addition, the British national news agency Press Association said Cheney had written to the Kuwaitis that continued U.S. military cooperation in the region largely depended on the multibillion-dollar tank deal.

Williams denied the report, saying, "We made no such threats." The U.S.-Kuwaiti defense cooperation agreement, signed in September 1991, "wouldn't be in any way affected by the sale of the tanks," he added.

"He stressed the combat superiority of the Abrams tank ... and the advantage of acquiring a system that is compatible with the system of some of Kuwait's most important allies, including the United States. And he noted that such commonality would be a major contribution to regional security in the gulf," Williams said. The spokesman said such a letter, involving a major weapons sale to an ally, was "not unprecedented."

Bill requires exams for Gulf War vets

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — The Senate has given final congressional approval to legislation that would require the government to provide health examinations for veterans of Operation Desert Storm.

"Congress has responded quickly to serious concerns raised about the health of veterans and service members who served in the Persian Gulf," said Sen. Alan Cranston, D-Calif., chairman of the Senate Veterans Affairs Committee.

The Senate sent the bill to the White House on a voice vote; the House also passed it by voice vote.

Another provision of the bill would improve and expand Department of Veterans Affairs services for women veterans who were victims of sexual violence while on active duty.

The VA would provide counseling without the need for an administrative determination that the sexual violence was service-connected. The veterans must seek the service within two years of discharge from active duty; those already discharged must apply by Dec. 31, 1993.

As it applies to Persian Gulf veterans, the bill would require the VA to provide the examinations and would finance a National Academy of Sciences review of existing scientific evidence on the health problems of Persian Gulf veterans.

The review would determine whether it's possible at this stage to undertake a new scientific study of the reported problems, including joint pain, hair loss, chronic fatigue, memory loss and skin rashes.

A Defense Department registry of troops exposed to the fumes of burning oil in Kuwait would be expanded to include names of all members of the U.S. armed forces who served in the Persian Gulf.

College faculty opens concert season Thursday

From staff reports

The 1991-92 Columbus College Faculty Concert Series sponsored by the Schwob Department of Music will open its season Thursday at 8 p.m. in the Davidson Student Center Recital Hall.

Featured artists will be the Columbus College Quartet — Patricio Cobos, violin; Anne Diaz, piano; Manuel Diaz, viola and Martha Gerschefski, cello. Guest performer will be George Del Gobbo, conductor of the Columbus Symphony Orchestra, who is also a violinist.

The concert will open with "Quartettsatz, Opus Posthumous" by Franz Schubert. This single movement work was designed as the opening of a quartet which was never finished. It was not performed until almost 40 years after the composer's death. The work is marked by a profusion of melodies, intense passion and unmistakable sensibility.

After intermission the Faculty Quartet will be joined by Del Gobbo, to perform Dvorak's "Piano Quintet in A-Major, Opus 61," a four-movement work composed in 1887. This masterpiece conveys the flair and style of Dvorak's homeland folk songs. The composer even used Bohemian dance rhythms, yet the workmanship and developmental detail are completely in the Germanic mainstream of Brahms and others. This quintet is one of the most popular pieces in the chamber music repertoire.

There will be six concerts in the Faculty Concert Series. Season tickets are $20; $45 for families.

Tickets are $7; Columbus College students, faculty and staff get in free.

For more information, call 568-2049.

College Orchestra

The Columbus College Orchestra, under the direction of Patricio Cobos, performs its first concert of the season Oct. 26 at 8 p.m. in the Fine Arts Hall.

The program will open with "Concerto Grosso in G-Minor, Opus 6, No. 6," by the baroque master George Frederic Handel. Handel was born in Germany, educated in Italy and was director of music for the elector of Hanover in Germany, a relatively obscure position. A stroke of luck propelled him to world renown. The King of England died; and the Queen married the elector of Hanover (Handel's boss) who now became King of England. He took Handel with him to London and made him director of music, the most important post in the musical world. Handel took full advantage of this opportunity and became the most famous musician in the world. He led a rich, rewarding and productive life producing mostly operas which made him rich, powerful and famous.

Mozart was an extremely prolific composer, turning out an amazing amount of music in his short life. He was a master of the small instrument ensemble as well as his more well-known symphonies and operas. He wrote may divertimenti, light entertaining works of several movements, using a wide range of instrumentation. "The Divertimento, K. 136" will be heard on this program.

Next, the string orchestra will play "Nocturne, Opus 40" by Anton Dvorak, who is considered one of the great nationalist composers of the romantic period. One of the most important schools of nationalism in music was the Czechoslovakian or Bohemian School. The music of Dvorak, unmistakeably Czech in character, brought him such fame that he was invited to New York to become director of the National Conservatory of Music, where he remained for three years.

Closing the concert is "Little Suite, Opus 1," by the Danish composer Carl Noelsen, long recognized in Scandinavia and Britain as one of the most important pioneers of new music. He is also growing in stature in other countries, particularly through his monumentally expressive symphonies derived from a neo-romantic tradition.

Kyser kicks Spencer past Blue Devils

From staff reports

It was Scott Kyser's moment in the Spencer Greenwave spotlight Saturday night at Kinnett Stadium against Columbus High School and the senior kicker took full advantage.

Kyser's 37-yard field goal with three seconds left to play lifted the Greenwave over the Blue Devils 17-16.

Maurece Williams, Spencer's running star, had another brilliant game with 173 yards on 30 carries and both Greenwave touchdowns. But it took Kyser's field goal on the final play to get the victory.

"All I know is that we were two points down with three seconds left, and I had to make it," Kyser said after the game. And he did. The win gives Spencer a 4-2 record overall and a 1-1 record in GSHA AAA.

Williams' running, as usual, staked the Greenwave to a first quarter lead. The tailback dashed 34 yards with 10:27 left for a 7-0 lead after Kyser's conversion kick.

Columbus cut the lead to 7-3 later in the quarter when David Levins booted a 41-yard field goal with 6:58 left. Spencer moved the lead to 14-3 early in the second quarter when Williams went one yard at 10:12.

But the Blue Devils took control from there, scoring twice before halftime to take a 16-14 lead. Columbus' first touchdown came on a 59-yard run by Jimmie Tolvert with 9:08 left in the period. Levins' conversion cut the lead to 14-10. A little over a minute later, Kelvin Johnson went 15 yards to give Blue Devils a 16-14 advantage. But a botched conversion left Columbus with a two-point lead with 8:03 in the half.

The score stayed that way through a scoreless third period and deep in the fourth. After a Levins punt stuck Spencer on their 3-yard line with 4:14 remaining, the Greenwave set sail on a long scoring march. Williams' running and quarterback Jerry Price's passing and running moved Spencer steadily down the field. After penetrating to the Blue Devil 20, Kyser nailed the field goal as the horn signaled the end of the game.

Spencer takes a week off, gearing up for a big game against Kendrick at Memorial Stadium next Saturday. Columbus plays Kendrick tonight at Kinnett Stadium.

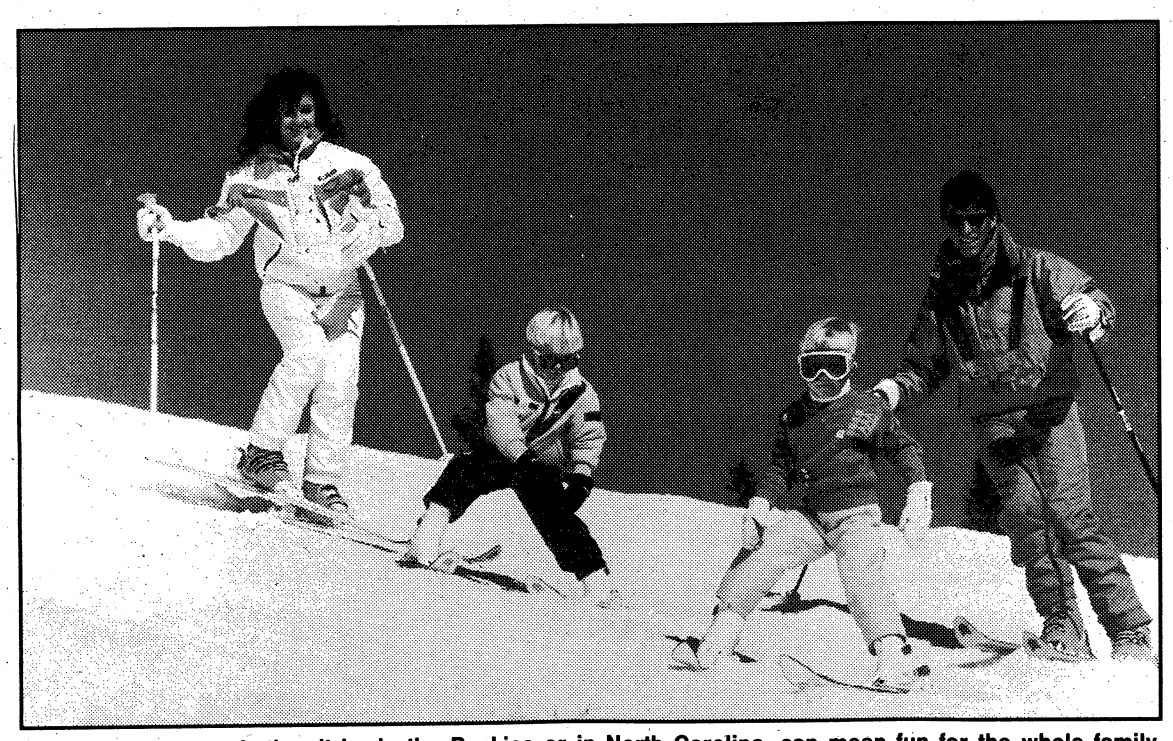
Picture yourself hitting the ski slopes

By Alfred Borcover
Chicago Tribune



Hitting the slopes, whether it be in the Rockies or in North Carolina, can mean fun for the whole family.

It's time for skiers to get serious. Makes no difference that autumn leaves, footballs and golf balls are still flying through the air, but nary a snowflake so far.

Nevertheless, winter athletes should gear up for their season to streak down mountainsides, leaving plumes of powder snow in their wake. Or work out to glide with ease over cross-country ski trails through the woods.

Winter images give many of us a chill. Thoughts of prolonged cold weather, naked trees and frigid winds can depress.

Winter sports enthusiasts, however, contend the only way to beat the winter blahs is to join the so-called winter fun. Skiing, whether it be downhill or cross-country or both, is the answer, they say. Well, maybe.

For skiers, or would-be skiers, here's a course of action outlined by an expert.

Besides making travel plans, checking out or buying equipment, start to picture yourself on the slopes, advises Billy Kidd, director of skiing at Steamboat Resort, northwest of Denver at Steamboat Springs.

Kidd is not your ordinary skier. If you can't picture Kidd, he was the ski commentator wearing the broad-brimmed hat on CBS-TV during the Winter Olympics in Albertville, France. His own ski credits include a silver medal during the 1964 Winter Olympics in Innsbruck, Austria. And in 1970 at Val Gardena, Italy, he became the first American man to win a World Championship in skiing.

When Kidd suggested that skiers picture themselves, the picture for many would be a person out of shape for the rigors of skiing.

"You want to be able to get your money's worth out of your lift ticket," Kidd said in a telephone interview, "so you ought to be in shape to reduce the possibility of injury. Now is a good time to start an exercise program."

Skiing is a sport that uses all the muscles so it's a good idea to exercise all of them, Kidd advised. "Most skiers think they just use their legs. But then they forget that they push themselves through the lift lines with their ski poles. When you ski on the bumps you plant your ski poles every single time you turn. When you make a recovery, very often your stomach muscles are what pull you back up on your skis. When you do ski on bumps there's a tendency to bend over at the waist too much, so your back gets sore."

Kidd suggested that skiers work on strengthening their arms, legs and stomach muscles. "You don't need to be Superman or Wonder Woman, but it's a good idea to increase your strength before you go on a ski trip."

He also stressed the importance of aerobic exercise. "You are going to be skiing at high altitudes. Even at the top of Wilmot (Wis.), you're going to be up there in the Chicago Alps," he said with a laugh. "Skiing is a strenuous sport so you want to make sure you get your lungs in shape. If you ski here in Steamboat, for instance, you're skiing at 7,000 to 10,000 feet."

Finally, he reminded, even the best skiers fall, so stretching and flexibility exercises are a must. "Not only will it reduce the possibility of injury, but it will give you more confidence so that when you do fall, you can relax."

As director of skiing at Steamboat, Kidd also runs a Performance Skiing Center geared to intermediate and advanced skiers who want to get better in a hurry. The center is not for everyone, he said, but skiing lessons are.

"You want to be able to get your money's worth out of your lift ticket," Kidd said, "so you ought to be in shape to reduce the possibility of injury. Now is a good time to start an exercise program."

"Beginners should definitely take lessons from a ski school, not from a friend who knows how to ski," said Kidd. "The friend has good intentions, but if he or she isn't a professional instructor, it's really difficult to teach a beginner.

"You learn about three times as fast at a ski school. The instructor will get you comfortable riding the lift, going on a variety of trails on the mountain. You'll just have a much better time of it at the beginning. Also, as in any sport or activity, you learn the basics correctly. Within a couple of hours you will have learned how to turn both ways and slow down and stop."

People who have never skied, or who want to resume the sport after a long hiatus, will find ski lessons easy, Kidd noted. Shorter, flexible fiber glass skis, molded boots that provide a lot of support and bindings that separate the ski from the boot during a fall made a big difference. So have snow grooming machines that make the surface texture of beginner and intermediate slopes about as smooth as a living room carpet.

In addition to advances in equipment technology that has made the sport safer, psychology also has been applied to ski instruction to dispel fears and misconceptions about the sport, Kidd said.

"If you fall down nowadays, the ski just falls off and you just step back into it," said Kidd, in explaining the new bindings. "You don't have to worry about getting hurt like you used to."

Adults who take lessons should not be intimidated by youngsters grasping the sport more quickly.

Kidd said he put his own children on the skis when they were 2 years old. "I made sure it was a sunny day and that we just went out for a little while so they didn't get too cold. But you find that kids love skiing. It's kind of like getting their first tricycle. Now they can peddle, they're independent. It gives them a great sense of freedom.

"In skiing, kids learn quicker than adults. Adults have all these misconceptions about how dangerous and how difficult it is. And I'm too old and too fat and too fragile and oh, I can't do this.' With kids, you show them and say, 'Come on. It's really fun and easy,' and they try it. And they do it. Kids just copy you."

Kidd said most ski areas have schools for kids as young as 5, 4 and sometimes 3. "Virtually every ski area has a nursery center and ski school for children from 6 months to 2 or 3 years where they take the children out to play in the snow or on skis."

Skiing is becoming such a great sport for families, he said. "I've got three children, two boys and a girl. When you've got different sexes and different ages like 15, 12 and 9, it's hard to find sports and activities that appeal to all of them," Kidd continued. "But skiing is one thing that appeals to families, no matter what the ages. A 5-year-old kid can go skiing with Grandpa who is 75 and have a great time. The nice thing about ski areas is that they recognize the importance of family business. And they try to encourage it with really good ski schools and nursery programs."

Family skiing vacations need not be expensive, he said. The problem, said Kidd, is that people envision themselves in slopeside condominiums with fireplaces at Vail and at dinner in fancy restaurants.

"I suggest that if you're on a budget, ski locally to start," he advised. "Near Chicago you've got a number of areas that are ideal — Wilmot and Alpine Valley in Wisconsin. They are great places to learn how to ski or to tune up your technique for a big trip to the Rockies.

Kidd said one thing that keeps many people from skiing is the intimidation factor: "They say, 'I don't know how to ski, I don't know how to get started, I don't know where to go. I don't know what equipment I need. I don't want to get the wrong clothes.' That's why I suggest that you just take what you've got. Rent your skis, boots and poles at the ski area. Get beginner stuff. Take lessons. And now you're a skier."

COMMENTARY

Invasion of North Africa takes shape

When they decided to launch Operation TORCH, the invasion of North Africa, the U.S. political and military leaders developed a number of specific objectives they wanted Gen. Eisenhower to accomplish — to establish firm and mutually supporting lodgments in the Oran-Algiers-Tunis areas on the north coast and another in the Casablanca area on the northwest coast; to extend control over all of French Morocco, Algeria and Tunisia, and, in the case of hostile Spanish action, over Spanish Morocco, too; to create conditions favorable for further offensive operations through Libya against the rear of the German-Italian forces in the western desert; and to provide a stepping stone for subsequent operations against both Italy and Germany.

Al Garland

Moving into French North Africa posed special problems for Eisenhower's Allied Forces Headquarters (AFHQ). First, there was the problem of British-French relations, which had become seriously strained since June 1940. In fact, those strained relations were the main reason why the invasion itself would take on a U.S. rather than a British complexion, and why a U.S. officer had been named the overall commander. Thus, U.S. troops would make up the bulk of the three major assault forces while the Royal Navy would keep its contributions as inconspicuous as possible during the operation's early stages.

No one could say with any degree of certainty how the French forces in North Africa would react to the Allied landings. If bloodshed was to be averted during the invasion, French sympathies had to be enlisted in advance. Unfortunately, the clandestine negotiations that were conducted before the invasion date produced no guarantee that the French forces would be friendly.

So few troops were available in England, in fact, that troops for the Casablanca landings had to be sent directly from the U.S., which would result in one of history's largest sea voyages preceding an amphibious assault.

Finally, Spain's exact position was equally unknown. Although it was supposedly a neutral country, Spain's leaders appeared to favor the Axis cause.

Eventually, AFHQ did produce a plan and after some haggling over its details it was approved. The Russians were not pleased with the Allied decisions to go to the Mediterranean area in 1942 but finally gave their own grudging approval.

The operation was to begin in western Egypt at El Alamein where the British Middle East commander, Gen. Harold Alexander, was to attack with Gen. Bernard Montgomery's British 8th Army to destroy Gen. Erwin Rommel's German-Italian army in place or to drive it to the west. Then, Eisenhower's combined U.S.-British force would land at various points in French North Africa and launch a converging attack against Rommel's rear.

The U.S. Army faced enormous difficulties in meeting the designated Nov. 8, 1942, invasion date. The units earmarked to take part in the initial assaults had had little amphibious warfare training, much of their equipment was inferior to that of the Axis forces, landing craft were few, and many of the available ones were obsolete. So few troops were available in England, in fact, that troops for the Casablanca landings had to be sent directly from the U.S., which would result in one of history's largest sea voyages preceding an amphibious assault.

The Allied soldiers were directed to take no action against the French troops except in reply to definitely hostile action. If the Allied commanders on the ground deemed it necessary to take action against the French in a certain area, that action was to be an all-out effort using the greatest amount of force and firepower until active French resistance ceased.

The ultimate status of the French colonies was to be decided by U.S. and British political leaders. The Allies, therefore, would approach French North Africa prepared to fight but preferring a friendly association in arms.

Al Garland is former editor of Infantry magazine and writes columns for The Benning Leader occasionally.

WW II 50TH ANNIVERSARY

In North Africa, the Battle of El Alamein began 50 years ago this week as Field Marshal Bernard Montgomery led the British Eighth Army against the German Afrika Korps, under the command of Gen. George von Stumme.

The British X Corps lost 250 tanks but reduced the 15th Panzer Corps to only 40 tanks. Field Marshal Erwin Rommel returned from medical care in Germany to command after von Stumme died of a heart attack.

Montgomery halted to regroup after enjoying initial success and Rommel tried to take advantage of the opportunity by mounting a counterattack at Kidney Ridge. The attempt failed, however, as a relatively small group of British defenders repelled the attack.

Here, according to research by the Military History Division at Fort Benning, were the top news items of the week:

■

On the Eastern Front, German forces advanced in the Red October and Barrikady Factories provinces of Stalingrad. German intelligence assumed higher Soviet casualties than there actually were, a mistake that would later haunt German planners.

■

Near Guadalcanal, the Battle of Santa Cruz began between U.S. and Japanese carrier forces under the commands of Vice Admiral Thomas Kinkaid and Vice Admiral Hiroaki Abe, respectively. The Japanese force squared off with four battleships and the carriers Shokaku, Zuiho, Zuikaku, and Junyo against an American force which included the carriers USS Hornet and USS Enterprise and the battleship USS South Dakota. The Japanese sank the Hornet but at the cost of all of the Zuikaku's pilots. The Americans damaged only the Shokaku and a cruiser.

■

On Guadalcanal, the Japanese discontinued their planned offensive after suffering 3,500 casualties. However, the exhausted American forces were unable to capitalize on the opportunity to seize the initiative.

■

At Fort Benning, actress Mary Martin served as the "Bayonet Girl" for the post's fledgling newspaper, "The Bayonet." Martin had accepted the title in September saying, "My heart belongs to Benning!"

General dismisses campaign radio ad

Commercial says Benning could be closed

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

The statement is contained in a commercial written by the Bush-Quayle campaign. It also claims that a Clinton election could threaten 24,000 jobs in Georgia alone.

Gen. Edwin Burba, a former Fort Benning commander and now the four-star head of all of the country's deployable forces, dismissed Tuesday a Bush-Quayle campaign commercial claiming a Democratic victory next month could mean Fort Benning would close.

Burba, the Forces Command chief, said military professionals have not yet considered the effects of a possible Clinton-Gore election next month.

But he said the commercial airing on some local radio stations saying that a Clinton election "could lead to the closing of Fort Benning at the loss of 5,000 civilian jobs" is "a rather extraordinary statement."

The statement is contained in a commercial written by the Bush-Quayle campaign. It also claims that a Clinton election could threaten 24,000 jobs in Georgia alone.

Burba, the Fort Benning commander from 1986 to 1987, said the local post is one of the country's most important and is seen as "one of our most enduring" establishments in the Army. He said he doesn't know if the local post will get more Forces Command troops — or lose any — in the next few years.

Burba was in charge of deploying the American troops dispatched for Desert Shield/Desert Storm and oversaw the 16,000 soldiers involved in the Florida clean-up in the aftermath of Hurricane Andrew.

The general said the military "is devoted to the economic recovery of this country" and would like to see force cuts remain at today's levels "for at least the next five years." He told the Kiwanis Club of Columbus that "we must stop the budget hemorrhaging and the force-cut hemorrhaging."

"We have brought our force down, dramatically, nearly 25 percent," he said at a press conference following a Kiwanis luncheon. "... My budget in Forces Command has been cut by one-third.... We must be careful not to cut too far. It is still a dangerous world. The threats are there, we just don't know where they are."

He said Army budget chiefs won't look at such things as the Clinton-Gore defense proposals until after the election.

Bill Lacy, a Bush-Quayle spokesman, said the commercial that mentions the Clinton-Gore threat to Fort Benning was based on figures from the Department of Defense that were confirmed by the Benning public affairs office.

What the commercial did not say was that the real total civilian employment at Fort Benning is about 7,600 when contract employees and non-Defense Department employees are included.

Lacy said the commercial is "not a scare-tactic ad," but that it was created because Clinton has not spelled out where he wants to make Defense Department cuts deeper than those recommended or approved by the Bush administration.

"Because he won't say, we're just suggesting that Fort Benning could be closed," Lacy said.

Pentagon to discuss mandated cuts

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon is willing to discuss the congressional mandate to cut U.S. troop strength in Europe to 100,000 by 1996, but is not working on a plan to make such cuts, a spokesman said on Thursday.

"We've got a while to try to work with the Congress on this issue," said Pentagon spokesman Pete Williams.

"We have no real substantial problem with the legislation Congress passed this year. We can work with it," he said at another point.

The spokesman, queried about the newly signed legislation which mandates troop levels in Europe by the end of fiscal 1996, tried to play down any controversy with Capitol Hill by indicating that the Pentagon was willing to discuss the matter with lawmakers.

But he also insisted that it is up to President Bush, as the commander-in-chief, to set troop levels in certain regions of the world. It is the role of Congress under the Constitution to raise armies, not deploy them, Williams said.

"As the President has said before, there is a constitutional question about whether Congress can limit the President's authority as commander-in-chief to deploy the force," Williams said.

Under the military's so-called "base force" plan, U.S. troop levels in Europe are to be reduced to 150,000 by 1995, and the Pentagon intends to hold to that plan, Williams said.

But as that level is approached, the military will have to reassess its troop deployments depending upon the world's security situation — and those levels could go up as well as down, Williams said.

Every year, the Pentagon produces five-year budget plans that look at future weapons and troop level requirements, given the length of time it takes to develop weaponry and train soldiers.

"All those career military folks — will continue to look at this question," he said.

But when he was queried whether plans were being drawn up now to address the 1996 level mandated by Congress, Williams replied, "No."

"We'll do as we have in the past. We will note the congressional concern," he said.

Church plunges into Ranger job

Commander aims to keep training unit at top-notch level

By Jerry Rutledge
Leader Editor

Col. Michael Church expected a fine-tuned, highly motivated unit when he returned to Fort Benning in September as the new commandant of the Ranger Training Brigade.

What he found was a fine-tuned, highly motivated unit — and quite a bit more.

"In the overall, things are certainly as I expected them to be, although I can say the quality of the folks continually exceeds those expectations," said Church. "You just can't say enough about the professionalism or the skill of the Ranger instructors. You see things everyday that makes you just shake your head in wonderment.

"In terms of focus, in terms of a very intricate and detailed understanding of how all the pieces and parts are put together and the ability of the staff and commanders to articulate not only their mission but their resource challenges, this is a top-notch group."

Top-notch is a place Church intends to keep the RTB.

"This appointment was more than I ever expected and more than I ever deserved," Church said. "You bring great humility to brigade command, in general.

A self-professed "Army brat" who spent time growing up on Fort Benning as the son of a 30-year infantryman (retired Col. William Victor Church), Church had spent all of three months as deputy commander of the operations group at the Joint Readiness Training Center at Fort Chaffee, Ark., before getting the RTB appointment.

The commandant's post came open when Col. Alan Maestas stepped down less than a month after replacing Col. John Maher.

The swift change didn't upset Church's family. His wife, Sarah, is the daughter retired Col. Blackburn Stephens. His eldest son, Nick, 18, is a journalism student at Western Kentucky University. Son Bill, 16, is a student at Pacelli High School. "One of the good things about being at Fort Benning is that he'll (Bill) be in the same school for two years in a row," Church said.

"We figured it up and we've moved 22 times in 22 years," he said. "My wife is an Army brat and I'm an Army brat. I was born right here at Fort Benning, Georgia. We've been moving ever since we were born, so we're as adaptable as can be."

Church went to grade school at the former Don C. Faith School (now part of the NCO Academy complex) and returned to Benning twice as a soldier, for IOBC in 1970 and IOAC in 1977.

"To wind up at Benning after all these years for an assignment has just been great," he said. "The community has been very warm in welcoming my family and myself. The post school and center staff has really gone out of their way to make us feel welcome. Church sees this assignment as a great challenge and opportunity.

"This appointment was more than I ever expected and more than I ever deserved," Church said. "You bring great humility to brigade command, in general. But in particular, something that's so vitally important to the Army's future is the Ranger Training Brigade. This is a very, very important job and it's one where you have to constantly assess yourself, maybe more so than in a tactical unit.

"In a tactical unit, you have grown up and trained for maybe 20 years. This is different and at least equally important. The ultimate impact of your efforts that carries on through the next 20 or 30 years is so great."

The RTB commandant said refinements in training techniques, especially the more integrated approach of the various Army courses, is making for a more professional, better-trained soldier than in the past.

Where past training was extremely difficult to weed out "bad" soldiers, a greater emphasis is placed on retention. Better instruction has made for better soldiers.

"The objective was different. If we could weed you out, the mission was accomplished," Church said. "Today, we challenge you in order to instill those characteristics of tenacity and discipline that we consider to be so important and to be the pillars that this course is built on.

"Our objective now is to reinforce previously learned doctrine, tactics and techniques and to build on that. So the instructor today is every bit the taskmaster that he was 20 years ago, but he's a heckuva lot smarter in his ability to teach and his ability to evaluate. Because he's a better teacher and a better evaluator, he's more valuable to the student in the feedback loop."

Church says training has come full circle now instead of a straight line. "Now you come up to the line and somebody goes over things with you — out there in the desert, up in the mountains and down in the swamps, some sergeant is going to take that young stud, put him under a bush and say 'Now the next time you get an opportunity, you benefit from your experiences,' " he said.

The post-Cold War military, with its budget slashed and troop levels decreasing, demands more Ranger-qualified leaders. Church believes Ranger-trained NCOs, because they have much more contact with infantrymen down in the trenches, are even more important than Ranger-schooled officers. "Because of the character that it builds and the commitment he comes away (from Ranger School) with," he said.

The budget cuts are being felt in other areas. Costs have had a limiting effect in training, a problem Church considers a personal challenge.

"I had to begrudgingly recognize the cut in resources that is going on throughout the Army," he said. "I would have hoped, probably vainly so, that we would not have been touched and, in truth, we haven't been touched as hard as a lot of other folks even here at Fort Benning. We have really been fortunate. And I'm thankful for that.

"Even so, everything being relative, you hate to see it happening. But we're still training safely and we're still training to standard — we're still within the band of excellence, if you will, even given the resource constraints that we're operating under right now.

"The long and short of it is, there isn't anything we can't solve over time. Small challenges — we'll work it out." Whatever the case, Church says maintaining the quality of life for his instructors is of great importance during his tenure at the RTB. "It is a very unique group of individuals that come out here to become Ranger instructors," he said. "These are guys who have competed to get this job, so they bring a lot of experience and a lot of capability to the job to begin with."

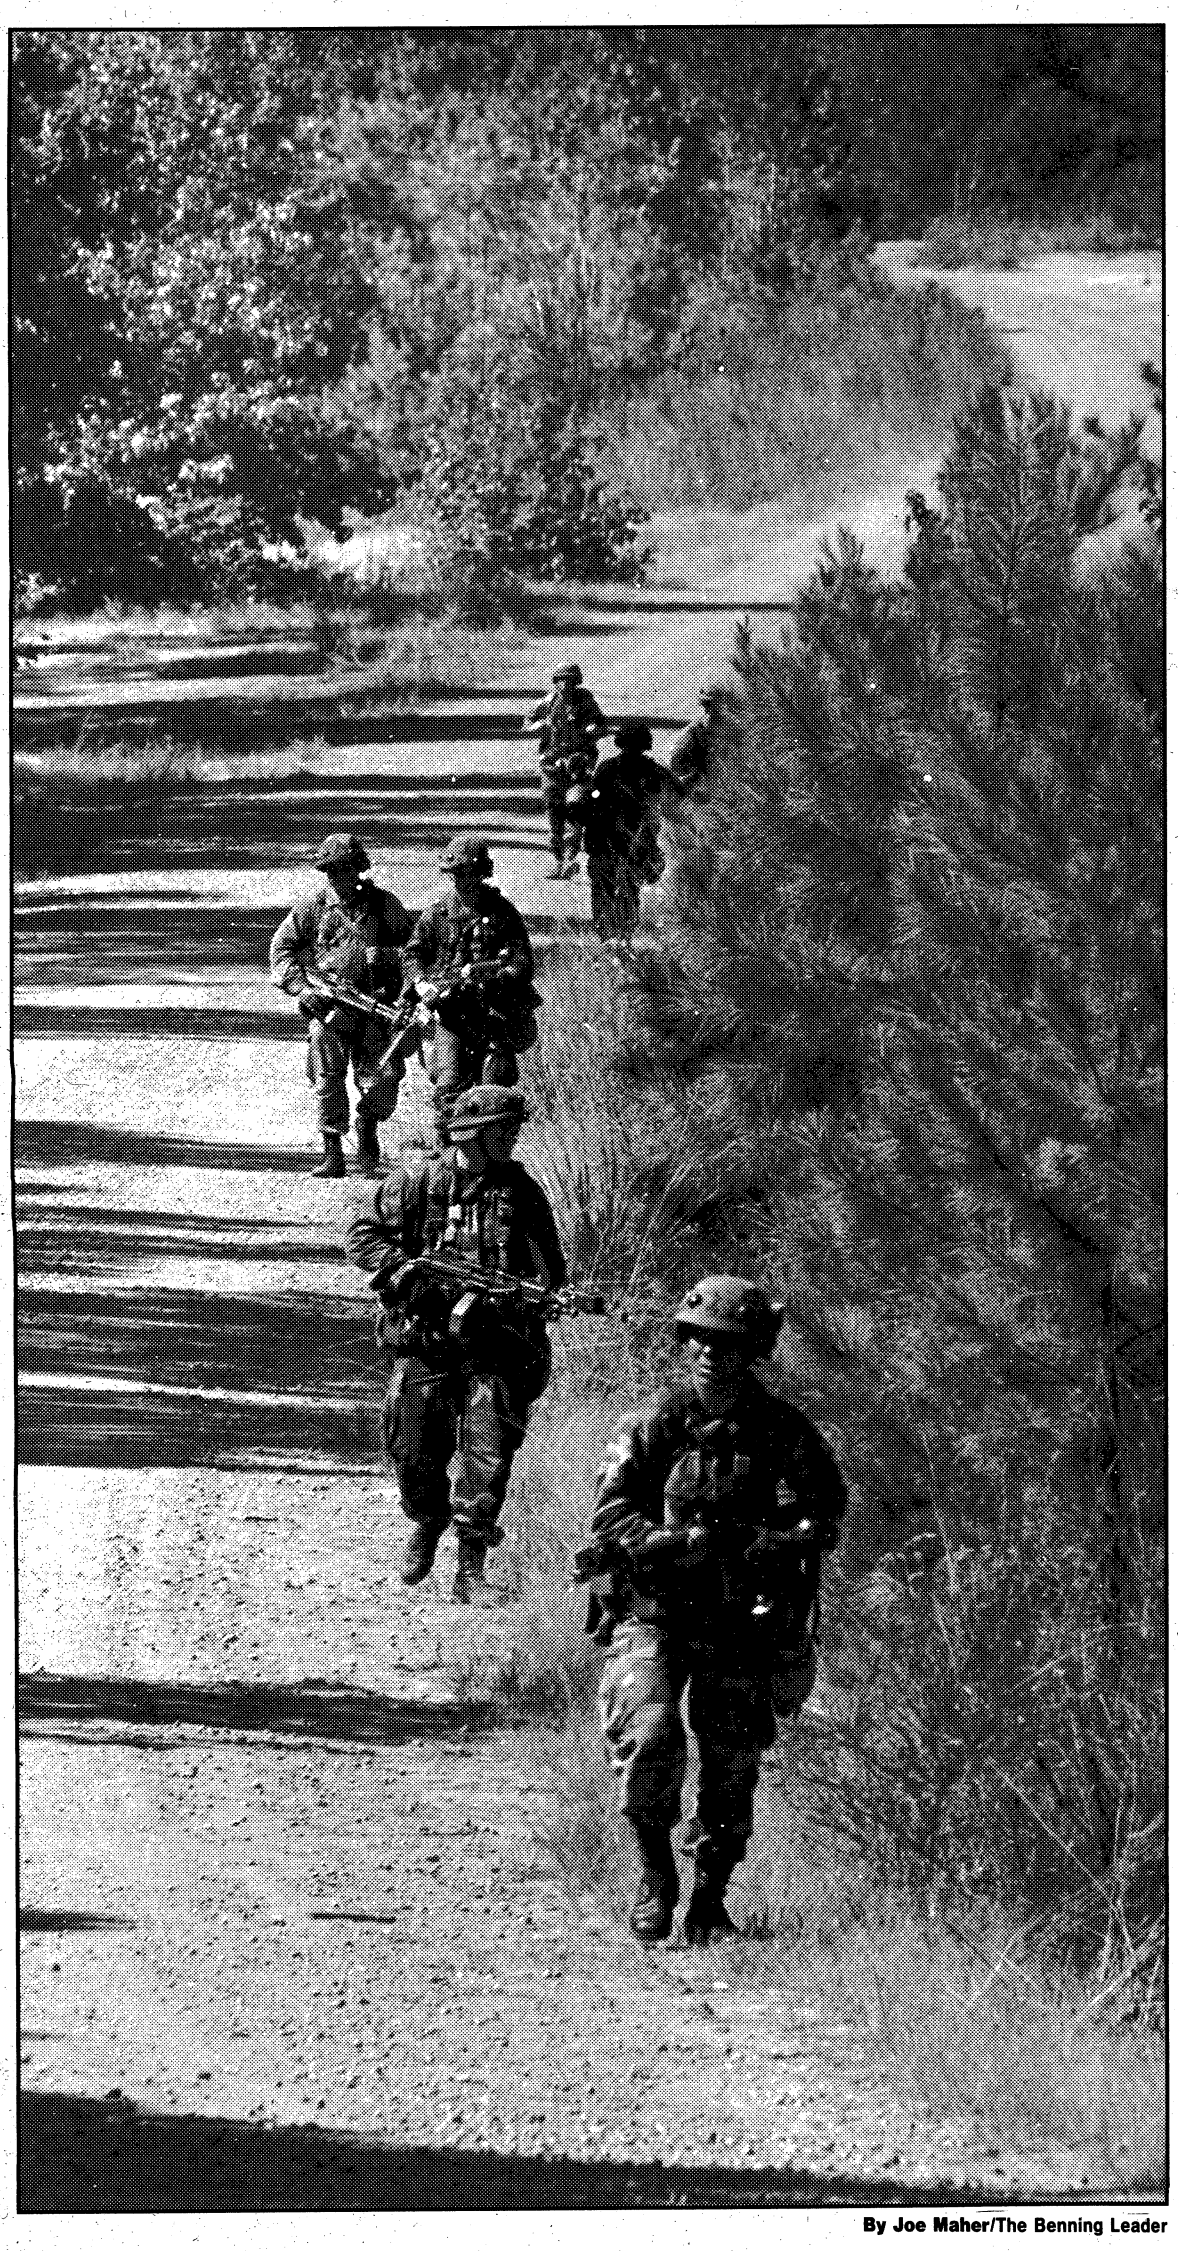
Battle drills teach survival of the smartest



By Joe Maher/The Benning Leader

Students keep their eyes open for an ambush while on patrol.

By Jerry Rutledge
Leader Editor

The ambush had been particularly wicked.

The "enemy" had set up a triangular crossfire smack in the elbow of a bend in the dirt road. Half the squad had passed by when the enemy opened fire. Two minutes later, not one soldier in the squad had survived. By the same token, no one had died either.

It was another battle drill for a squad of lieutenants from Echo Company of the 2nd Battalion, 11th Infantry Regiment in the Infantry Officers Basic Course at Fort Benning. While the entire squad had been "lost" during the ambush (their MILES unit activated by enemy weapons), a reaction drill in the Tactical Leadership Course on Garnsey Range, the lessons learned may help lessen real casualties in actual combat.

"The lieutenants learn small unit tactics. They do numerous different missions or tasks in the form of battle drills," said Capt. Tony Turner, commander of the HHC Company with the 2/11th and the head of the Tactical Leadership Course. "A battle drill is not like a set mission. It is something you should do automatically upon either enemy contact or given a situation. You are supposed to rehearse it, rehearse it, rehearse it and be trained up on it until everyone in that squad knows what to do, so it (the drill) is not a pre-set thing."

Some of the missions at Garnsey Range are react to ambush, react to contact, break contact and squad combat drill attack.

Some of the missions at Garnsey are react to ambush, react to contact, break contact and squad combat drill attack. A react to ambush drill is walking down a road and being engaged by the enemy; react to contact is similar to react to ambush, only the squad is walking in the woods; break contact is disengaging from an enemy with superior firepower; and the squad attack, which is a live-fire exercise which incorporates all of the others.

"It's a different way of training than we used to use," said Turner. "We used to just train them how to run a battle drill, but we're actually training these lieutenants how to set up a situational training exercise.

"The lieutenants actually write the exercise and they coordinate for all of the resources — the ammo, the OPFORS (opposition force) and anything else they need. The significant thing about this is this is early on in their course and they're doing some fairly complicated things. The actual missions aren't that complicated, but setting them up is complicated."

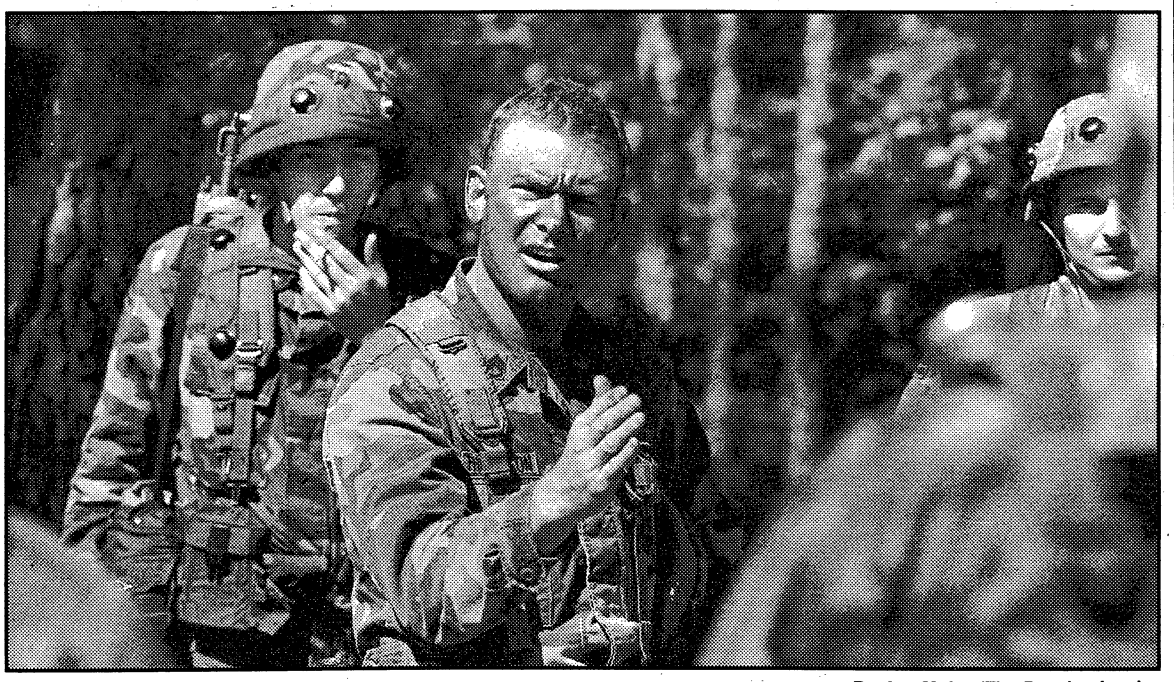
The lieutenants are organized into squads of 9-11 soldiers. Each lieutenant gets his turn writing an STX (situational training exercise) for the squad with the NCO assigned to the squad.

The NCOs are the key components to the training. "We assign one NCO per squad and he stays with them through the whole four days," said Turner, "and he trains them up on everything they need to know about this." The NCOs are experts on every single mission and on setting up the situational training exercise. When the lieutenant prepares his STX, the NCO goes over it with him and makes suggestions, corrections and additions."

After the drill, the NCO goes over the squad's performance and critiques their work. All the NCOs are veterans with combat experience from either Desert Storm, Panama, Grenada or some combination of the three. Most are Ranger-qualified and their experiences run the gamut — light infantry, heavy infantry, Korean assignments, etc. "They are able to give the lieutenants a piece of those experiences," said Turner. "We have some super NCOs."

"They (the lieutenants) are platoon leaders," said Sgt. Richard Reed, one of the NCO evaluators. "What we do out here insofar as our overall mission is give them a feel for what their soldiers will be doing — the type of training, the intensity of the training and a general overview of all the tactics involved with it. That way they have a good basic idea of what their soldiers are going to be doing once they get back to their unit."

After cycling through the various tasks involved in a mission, the lieutenants grow in confidence. "When they first get here, they are kind of unsure of themselves and don't have a feel for what is going on," said Reed. "By Day 3 they have a lot more confidence and they know what to expect as far as the tasks and know what the evaluators will be looking for. Things come into focus for them." The training, for the most part, is exciting and definitely fast-paced. A lot of attention in detail is taken. And the lieutenants appreciate it.



By Joe Maher/The Benning Leader

Staff Sgt. Raymond Thompson gives a critique following the exercise.

"The first mission always is the hardest one to get the cohesion working with the teams," said Lt. Mitchell Bennett, an IOBC student. "But by the third mission the first day we were beginning to work well. My mission was the second one, the second day and was probably one of the best missions so far. The squad executed it just about by the book. The team has learned to do things together."

And the lieutenants will take those lessons back to their platoons.

Major religions working on social welfare reform

From wire reports

NEW YORK — Organizations representing the nation's main religions — Protestant, Orthodox, Roman Catholic and Jewish — are combining their moral authority to help reform U.S. social welfare policies.

It's described as the first time such a wide spectrum of American religious agencies have jointly tackled such a broad concern.

"In the past we have cooperated on issues of general concern, but this project is more comprehensive," said the Rev. Joan Brown Campbell, general secretary of the National Council of Churches, which is participating.

Council members include most major Protestant and Orthodox denominations.

Also taking part are the Synagogue Council of America, embracing the three main branches of Judaism, and the U.S. Catholic Conference, the joint public policy arm of U.S. Roman Catholicism.

Altogether, they represent religious bodies totaling more than 100 million members.

The interfaith effort called "The Common Ground for the Common Good" is based on the conviction that these historic faiths share common principles that support aiding the needy.

Under the plan, participants will pool their influence to get the newly recommended methods implemented.

The interfaith effort called "The Common Ground for the Common Good" is based on the conviction that these historic faiths share common principles that support aiding the needy.

Msgr. Robert N. Lynch, general secretary of the Catholic conference based in Washington, said the religious groups will need to mount an "enduring campaign" to "advocate actively for the new social welfare policies."

The first job is to shape the framework of a reformed system. The Ford Foundation has provided a grant of $152,000 to finance the early phases.

"We expect to draw on some of the best minds of our religious communities to build a broad consensus," Campbell said.

A joint team has been set up by the religious groups to develop a common policy statement and strategies, with an Interfaith Summit on Social Welfare planned in Washington early next year.

Rabbi Henry D. Michelman, executive vice president of the Synagogue Council of America, said that once the common policy statement is ready, special meetings of religious leaders are to be held to discuss it.

"We expect these meetings to lead to comprehensive advocacy for the reform of social welfare policies," he said.

Michael Lipsky, Ford Foundation program officer for public policy, expressed hope the religious efforts will "provide the basis for a new consensus on the need to support effective social policies for all."

He said that could mean "new policies that will be in keeping with America's national ideals."

While the need for welfare reform has been widely recognized in recent years, inclusive steps have been lacking, and although various means for it have been advocated, little progress has been made.

Three years ago, a report by the Ford Foundation stressed the need for a comprehensive approach to social welfare reform.

Campbell said urban upheavals this year in Los Angeles and elsewhere have given the development of new social welfare policy "a new popular urgency that must not end with the rhetoric of an election year."

She said it is an appropriate task on which religious groups can rightly work together because of their common "Judeo-Christian emphasis on justice, mercy and human dignity."

NATO promises to expedite work on peacekeeping

From wire reports

GLENEAGLES, Scotland — The United States and its NATO allies pledged Tuesday to speed up efforts to carve out a new post-Cold War role as European peacekeeper.

U.S. Defense Secretary Dick Cheney also joined other NATO defense chiefs in offering more support for efforts by the United Nations to end the ethnic fighting that has accompanied the break-up of Yugoslavia.

CHENEY

"We are deeply disturbed by the continuing violence and destruction in and around Europe and, in particular, we deplore the tragic and worsening situation in the former Yugoslavia," the ministers said in a statement ending a two-day conference at this resort in northern Scotland.

They also warned of the potential for instability elsewhere in eastern Europe from economic and political upheavals in the transition from communism.

"The United States strongly supports an enhanced peacekeeping role for NATO," Cheney said at a news conference.

Britain's defense secretary, Malcolm Rifkind, said, "NATO has unique assets and experience and a habit of working together in a way that has proven to be extremely effective."

At the start of the meeting, the ministers ordered military aides to draw up plans by year's end for using the alliance's forces in peacekeeping operations.

NATO foreign ministers decided in June their troops and equipment could be dispatched on peacekeeping operations if asked by the 52-nation Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. The decision reversed a decades-old policy limiting the deployment of forces to the territory of NATO countries.

No requests for peacekeeping help have been received. But some NATO nations intend by early December to deploy 5,000 soldiers in Bosnia-Herzegovina to protect convoys carrying food and medicine.

Britain, Canada, France and Spain have agreed to send troops, in line with an alliance decision in early September to offer soldiers to the United Nations for relief work.

NATO's secretary-general, Manfred Woerner, said today that the allies also agreed on new guidelines for defense plans that will be based on "a reduced reliance on nuclear weapons."

Threats to the security of the Western nations are now "much more uncertain," but the changed situation in eastern Europe gives the allies more to respond to a crisis, he said. In the past, the West's plans were drawn up to fend off a surprise attack by the once-mighty Soviet Union.

Congress has refused to fund a new NATO base in southern Italy for F-16 fighter jets, shown here refueling during exercises in the Persian Gulf.

Pentagon temporarily deploys fighter jets to Italian bases

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon is temporarily deploying up to a dozen F-16 fighter jets to Italian military bases since Congress balked at funding a new NATO base in southern Italy, a spokesman announced Tuesday.

Spokesman Bob Hall said the first deployment will occur next week, when six of the jets will be stationed at the Italian base Gioia del Cola for about two weeks.

The aircraft also could be based at Sigonella Naval Air Station in Sicily. The deployments will last from two to six weeks at a time, he said.

The North Atlantic Treaty Organization "has reaffirmed the need for a fighter aircraft presence in the southern region, so that's the need we're trying to fulfill," Hall said.

"On the one hand, you have the requirement, on the other hand you have the congressional view, and we're trying to ... bring them together, shall we say," Hall added.

Last year, Congress refused to fund a new NATO base for fighter aircraft that was supposed to have been built at Crotone in southern Italy. Lawmakers resisted the idea in light of the decreasing Soviet threat. They suggested the Pentagon instead seek cooperative agreements with its NATO military partners to defend Europe, such as the arrangement with Italy.

Pentagon officials said they could not say where the U.S. aircraft would be coming from, as the location is classified until the deployment is done.

Federal job ranks drop for second year in row

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — Federal employment declined for the second straight year and job growth in state and local government slowed last year as the economy struggled to emerge from a recession, the Census Bureau reported Tuesday.

"While state and local government employment grew only 1.2 percent between October 1990 and October 1991, compared with a 3 percent increase the year before, federal civilian government job rolls actually dipped a bit," according to the Census Bureau study, Public Employment: 1991.

Civilian employment in federal, state and local governments was estimated to be 18.6 million as of October 1991, up 1 percent from 18.4 million a year earlier. These payrolls had swelled by 2.7 percent from October 1989 to October 1990.

Federal employees numbered 3.1 million in October 1991, down 0.1 percent from the previous year when it fell 0.3 percent. Federal payrolls also fell 0.1 percent in 1986 and 1982 and 1.4 percent in 1981, the first year of the previous recession.

The latest recession began in July 1990 and is widely believed to have ended in the spring of 1991, although the recovery is one of the weakest ever.

The biggest decline in federal employment was in a broad category of "national defense and international relations," down 1.8 percent or 19,000 positions. The defense budget was cut sharply with the end of the Cold War.

But the latest loss was offset by the increase in state and local government jobs, to 15.5 million. State and local government employment has grown every year since the previous recession, when it dropped 1.2 percent in 1981 and 0.5 percent in 1982.

State employment grew by 0.4 percent, to 4.5 million. while local government payrolls expanded by 1.6 percent, to 10.9 million.

Despite the 1 percent increase in the number of jobs, total salary and wage costs jumped 5.1 percent, to $41.2 billion, and beat the 3.1 percent inflation rate for 1991.

Federal employees' salaries and wages advanced 7.6 percent, to $9.7 billion. That compared to a 3.9 percent gain for state employees, to $9.4 billion, and 4.6 percent for local government workers, to $22.1 billion.

The average monthly earnings were $3,338 for employees on the federal level, $2,565 on the state level and $2,445 on the local level.

"One method of analyzing state and local government employment levels is to consider the ratio of employment to population," said Brad Stovall, author of the report.

"For example, nationwide, the number of full-time equivalent state and local government workers per 10,000 population was 523 for 1991, which is statistically unchanged from the 526 in 1990," he asserted.

Full-time equivalent employment represents the number of full-time employees that could have been employed if the number of hours worked by part-time employees had been worked by full-time employees.

The study said state governments accounted for 152 full-time equivalent employees per 10,000 population while local governments had 371.

"By far, the largest proportion (52.2 percent) of state and local government employees work in education, either at the elementary, secondary or post-secondary levels," the study said.

"Other major employment areas include hospitals, 7.4 percent; police protection, 4.9 percent; highways, 3.6 percent; corrections, 3.4 percent, and public welfare, 3.2 percent," it added.

Ghosts and goblins will haunt symphony concerts in Atlanta

From staff reports

Ghosts and goblins come alive in Symphony Hall as the Atlanta Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of resident conductor George Hanson, performs two Halloween Family Concerts Oct. 30-31. Performances are scheduled at 7 p.m. Oct. 30 and 1:30 p.m. Oct. 31.

Everyone is invited to come dressed in costume, and the orchestra will join in the fun by trading their formal wear for Halloween costumes.

The Atlanta Symphony Orchestra will perform such spooky classics as the theme from "The Addams Family" and "Ghostbusters," plus haunted favorites like Mussourgsky's "A Night on Bald Mountain" and selections from "The Phantom of the Opera" by Andrew Lloyd Webber. Other selections are Bach's "Toccata and Fugue in D-Minor," Gounoud's "Funeral March of a Marionette" (the theme from "The Alfred Hitchcock Show"), Grieg's "In the Hall of the Mountain King" from "Peer Gynt," Mahler's finale from "Symphony No. 1" ("Titan") and Saint-Saens' "Danse Macabre."

Each child will receive a special goodie bag and the Woodruff Arts Center lobby, 1293 Peachtree St. N.E., will be decorated in creepy Halloween style, for a freaking family treat that's fun for everyone. The Symphony will be joined by dancers from North Atlanta High School for the Performing Arts and by visual artist Valerie Gilbert, who will "draw to music" during selected works.

Tickets are $11. For more information, call (404) 892-2414.

Symphony opens season Sunday

From staff reports

The LaGrange Symphony Orchestra will open its 1992-93 season with a varied concert Sunday at 3 p.m. at the Callaway Auditorium of LaGrange College.

Musicians, both amateur and professional, from LaGrange, and surrounding areas, compose the orchestra.

Harry Kruger, music director and conductor, will lead the symphony, now in its fourth season.

The program will include Offenbach's "Orpheus in the Underworld Overture," Corelli's "Concerto Grosso Opus 6, No. 8," selections from Gershwin's "Porgy and Bess," Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet Overture" and Mozart's "Exultate Jubilate" with Teresa Hopkin as guest soloist.

Kruger, who began his musical career as a flutist, is a magna cum laude graduate of the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston. He was assistant conductor of the Atlanta Symphony Orchestra from 1955-61, as well as conductor of the Atlanta Civic Ballet, the Atlanta Community Orchestra, the Southern Ballet, the Kruger Sinfonietta and the Macon Civic Youth Orchestra. Kruger was director of orchestral activities at Bowling Green State University in Ohio from 1961-65. After having conducted the Columbus Symphony Orchestra for 22 years, Kruger retired as its director and is currently associate professor of music at Columbus College Schwob Department of Music.

Hopkin is known to the LaGrange Symphony audience, having been the featured soprano at the 1991 performance of Handel's "Messiah." She has appeared on three continents on concert and recital stages. As a 1983 national finalist of the NATS Artists Award auditions, she was awarded a 1985 fellowship to the Bach Aria Festival of Stony Brook, N.Y.

Tickets are $10; $5 for students. Tickets are on sale at the Auditorium box office between 2-4 p.m. For more information, call (706) 884-2380.

Go back in time at Westville fair

From staff reports

To experience life as it was in the fall of 1850, there is no better time or place than at the Fair of 1850 in Westville, the museum village near Lumpkin. The fair will be Oct. 30-Nov. 15, featuring special demonstrations and events.

In addition to special activities, there will be demonstrations of regular activities which take place at Westville throughout the year. These include blacksmithing, quilting, pottery making, woodworking, candle dipping, leather crafts and spinning and weaving. Also, you can watch gingerbread cook on a wood stove at the McConald kitchen and sausage biscuits cooked over the open fireplace at the farmhouse.

On weekdays during the fair, area school children will be in the academy to portray education of the period. Games of the period will be played. Boys will be shooting marbles and girls will be playing thread the needle.

George and Kathleen Weldon will have special demonstrations of musical instruments from that time period. Sugar cane will be ground for juice to make into syrup. Each day at noon, Westville's mule drawn cotton gin will be in operation.

On Nov. 7, from 10 a.m.-5 p.m., the Stewart County Historical Commission will sponsor the Heritage Days Traditional Crafts Fair at Westville, and the Stewart County Chamber of Commerce will sponsor a Wild Game and Fish Cook-off at the Stewart County Campground on the south side of the village. Tickets may be purchased at Westville for all three events. Guided tours of the Bedingfield Inn and the Hatchett Drug Store Museum in downtown Lumpkin will be available.

Westville is on South Mulberry Street, one-half mile from the Lumpkin town square. Special event hours are 10 a.m.-5 p.m. Monday-Saturday and 1-5 p.m. Sunday. Regular village hours are 10 a.m.-5 p.m. Tuesday-Saturday and 1-5 p.m. Sunday.

Westville is closed on Thanksgiving, Christmas and New Year's days and Jan. 4-8. For more information, call (912) 838-6310.

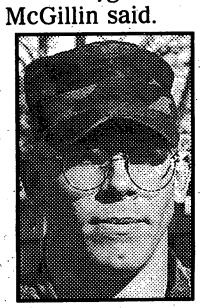
Soldier doing prison time for selling Iraqi weapons

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

A Fort Benning soldier is doing 35 months of hard time at the Army's regional confinement facility at Fort Knox, Ky., after being convicted by a military judge of theft and selling captured Iraqi weapons — spoils of the Persian Gulf War — to undercover agents.

Spc. Richard C. "Mac" McInnis, 21, a member of Fort Benning's 3rd Brigade, 24th Infantry Division during Desert Shield and Desert Storm, was convicted at the end of a two-day court martial on Oct. 1.

There was no jury involved in the trial, said Maj. Howard O. McGillin Jr., the chief of the criminal law division at Fort Benning. McInnis had requested a "bench trial," leaving his fate in the hands of Lt. Col. Keith Hodge, an area military judge — stationed at Fort Benning — who tried the case, McGillin said.



McINNIS

McInnis was originally charged with selling a captured Russian-made AK-47 Rifle and an AKM-56, a later edition AK-47, for profit, McGillin said. He was also convicted of stealing two "flak jackets" from his company's motor pool and selling them to undercover agents.

The Army couldn't get a conviction for selling the guns for a profit, apparently because prosecutors couldn't prove McInnis turned a profit. But it did succeed in convicting him of illegal possession and sale of a machine gun — the Russian-made rifles — and failing to turn in captured or abandoned enemy weapons.

McInnis was ordered reduced from the rank of specialist to Private E-1 and ordered to forfeit $750 of his approximately $1,100 base pay for 35 months, after which he will be given a bad-conduct discharge, according to the judge's ruling. The reduction in rank and "fine" won't become effective until the Fort Benning commander reviews the case. Maj. Gen. Jerry White could reduce McInnis's sentence, overturn part of his conviction, or let the court martial results stand after a review of the trial record sometime during the next couple of months. In addition, because of the severity of the sentence, McInnis will get an automatic review by the Army Court of Military Review in Washington, D.C.

The Army refused to release McInnis when his term of service expired a few months back and ordered him kept on active duty for the court martial on the charges which resulted from two sales of the weapons and flak jackets during the summer of 1991, McGillin said.

The Criminal Investigation Division at Fort Benning and Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms agents, apparently acting on a tip, set up a meeting with McInnis somewhere near "Midnight Pond" on Kelley Hill, and another meeting somewhere off post after which he was accused of selling the weapons and the flak jackets for some $1,100.

Agents making the buys "wore wires" and captured the alleged transactions on concealed tape recorders, McGillin said.

McInnis was known as a hard-charger with a salty vocabulary, who often spewed a stream of Red Man tobacco juice while on maneuvers or in the field at Fort Benning. He worked with the 3rd Brigade's public affairs office during Desert Shield/Desert Storm and afterward. At one time he was slated for Ranger School at Fort Benning but never got there due to an injury the soldier said he received during an overseas parachute jump.

More recently, McInnis was trying to get into a Special Forces school for medics, but decided to get out of the Army after it appeared that request wouldn't be granted, he said several months before the charges against him became known. The charges were not related to a recent probe of soldiers allegedly providing weapons for an Alabama white supremacist group, McGillin said.

McGillin said one other enlisted soldier at Fort Benning still faces charges growing out of possession of a captured Iraqi pistol, but there are no others pending, he said.

The Army apparently couldn't prove how the weapons in the McInnis case were brought into the country, although it was thought somebody else brought them in, McGillin said, apparently concealed aboard a military vehicle.

Pentagon to review sales of explicit publications

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon's top legal officer will review whether the military should be selling sexually explicit publications in its base exchanges, a spokesman announced last week.

The step follows a similar review announced recently by the Navy that was instigated as part of a program to stamp out sexual harassment in the wake of the Tailhook sex abuse scandal.

"It's clearly something we have to take a look at," Pentagon spokesman Pete Williams told reporters at a briefing.

The issue also arose after the commander at a Navy boot camp in Orlando, Fla., pulled such publications from store shelves on his base earlier this year.

The base has been the site of several embarrassing sexual harassment incidents, and the commander determined the publications weren't in "accordance with his mission of teaching young recruits about the importance of human dignity," a Navy spokesman said.

Williams said one issue was: "Can you restrict one sort of magazine, one specific magazine? Does that raise a First Amendment question?"

Other considerations, the spokesman said, include a commander's right under military regulations "to enforce good order and discipline" and whether "these magazines are not politically correct or are sort of dinosaurs of past attitudes."

"There are lots of questions that come into play here, and we have to look at all of them," he said.

Williams said the general counsel, David Addington, will study the matter and report to the Pentagon's assistant secretary in charge of personnel, Christopher Jehn.

Williams noted that Jehn already has been contacted by Playboy's attorneys.

A ban on such publications "would clearly violate the First Amendment," attorney Bruce Ennis said in a Sept. 8 letter. Ennis, who represents Playboy Enterprises, Inc., threatened a lawsuit should the Pentagon prevent Playboy from being sold at military exchanges.

Asked whether Defense Secretary Dick Cheney had received any complaints about such publications from Congress or certain groups, Williams said the Department has gotten "correspondence" on the issue "from time to time."

"There are many groups in the United States that believe that these publications should not be available for sale on military bases, at convenience stores," Williams said, but he did not cite which groups.

GM insists its truck fuel tanks are safe

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — General Motors Corp. has told the federal government there is no need to recall its pickup trucks with "side-saddle" fuel tanks, because they meet or surpass federal safety standards.

GM said a recall petition filed by the Center for Auto Safety, a private consumer group, should be denied because the vehicles don't pose an unreasonable safety risk.

The consumer group objects to the "side-saddle" location of the fuel tank, which is mounted outside the frame rails. There are an estimated 5 million of the 1973-87 Chevrolet and GMC C-K series full-size pickups on the road.

The auto safety group claims more than 300 people have died in side-crash fires and explosions in GM trucks since 1973.

GM admitted to 20 accident reports and 108 lawsuits over the subject in documents filed this week with the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration.

"We know that's certainly inaccurate. They're continuing to conceal information," said Debra Barclay, a spokeswoman for the Center for Auto Safety.

The automaker delivered 79 boxes of documents and a box of videotapes on the subject to safety administration last week. The agency then released a 55-page summary response by GM.

Barclay said the center had filed a Freedom of Information Act requesting all the documents GM gave the agency. "If GM has nothing to hide, why is anything confidential?" she said.

GM's summary, signed by E.E. Conner, manager of product investigations, said, "General Motors strongly believes that the pickup trucks at issue have been safely designed, and that the field performance of the trucks supports this conclusion."

GM said its trucks passed the safety administration's 20 mph side-impact crash tests, as well as other crash tests. In 1980, the automaker began conducting its own 50 mph crash tests though not required by law.

"When the field performance of the vehicle is compared to NHTSA's own measures for evaluating the safety performance of vehicles experiencing fire, it is clear that these vehicles provide a reasonable level of safety to the motoring public," it said.

"NHTSA has never proposed modifying the side-impact requirements and the agency's own evaluations confirm that those requirements continue to meet the need for motor vehicle safety.

"If NHTSA opens a defect investigation into fuel systems which perform at levels at or beyond those which NHTSA has determined offer appropriate protection, NHTSA will improperly penalize General Motors."

GM said an independent analysis of crashes showed that in fatal-fire side collisions, the fire rates for GM trucks were generally higher than other pickups. But GM's fatality rate in all side collisions was generally the same as the rates of other trucks.

Number of wars worldwide have dropped to 24 this year

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — Military spending is down and wars are on the decline worldwide, with annual deaths at half the level of the 1980s, but armed conflicts are not going to disappear anytime soon, a defense monitoring group says.

The Center for Defense Information, an anti-war group that includes several retired U.S. military officers, says the number of wars has dropped dramatically from a peak of 40 in the 1980s to 24 in 1992.

In the new issue of The Defense Monitor, the group chronicles each of the wars and says six of them are close to settlement.

The number of people killed in wars also has declined from about half a million a year during the 1980s to 250,000 deaths in 1990. The figures, however, went up last year with an estimated 100,000 soldiers and civilians killed in the U.S.-led Persian Gulf War. U.S. officials have said that estimate of Iraqi casualties could be as much as 50 percent off.

Delegation returns with MIA documents

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — U.S. officials returned from Vietnam with "very important documentation," including photographs, they said could help determine the fates of many Americans missing from the war in Southeast Asia.

The officials arrived back from the weekend trip Tuesday evening amid reports they had gained access to a cache of secret information, including thousands of photographs, that government sources said hold clues to what became of many of the 2,266 American servicemen unaccounted for from the Vietnam War.

"I believe we have brought home very important documentation which will go a long way in resolving many cases that are still listed as missing in action," said Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., a member of the Senate Select Committee on POW-MIA Affairs.

McCain, a former Vietnam prisoner of war, and retired Gen. John Vessey Jr., Bush's special emissary for POW-MIA affairs, each made brief statements to reporters upon their arrival at Andrews Air Force Base, Md. They said they would brief President Bush on their findings Thursday.

They declined to take any questions, but as they walked to their waiting cars, McCain was asked if they had brought any of the documentation back with them. He replied, "Some." Asked if they had photographs, he said, "Yes."

In Los Angeles, Sen. John F. Kerry, D-Mass., chairman of the Senate POW-MIA committee, confirmed that the cache included more than 4,000 photographs, along with what he called other "very significant" documents.

"We're getting access to the (Vietnamese government's) archives, and the archives are producing a broad spectrum of information, which includes prison records," said Kerry, who was attending an environmental forum Tuesday night.

"It's potentially very, very helpful," he said.

Kerry said he will attend the Thursday meeting in Washington with Bush to discuss the information, but he declined to discuss details of how it was obtained pending that meeting.

Kerry said he had "no clue" as to whether the information could result in the release of possibly unaccounted-for American POWs.

'I kind of think it's not related to that as much as it's related to people who have died," he said.

One source, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the photographs were all of dead servicemen.

Officials said that if positive identifications are made, families of the missing men will be notified first.

On Monday, the official Vietnamese News Agency said Vietnam would expand its help in determining the fate of Americans missing from the Vietnam War by letting U.S. experts study military archives.

In a joint communique, Vessey and Vietnamese officials said accelerated cooperation on resolving the cases of the missing will bring more rapid movement by the United States toward normalization of relations with Vietnam.

McCain said the agreement "will allow us to have an orderly examination of the archives and records of the Vietnamese government and hopefully help make significant progress toward resolution of this terrible nightmare that has afflicted so many American families for now over 20 years."

U.S. is now world's largest seller of weapons

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — Despite the end of the Cold War and President Bush's pledge to curb overseas weapons sales, the United States has become the world's leading arms merchant.

America's arms exports to the Third World have risen from $4 billion in 1986 to $14 billion last year, according to the Congressional Research Service. The United States now supplies more than half of all arms sold to the Third World.

Pentagon suppliers, plotting even greater future sales, were in Washington this week to seek eased export restrictions and more help from U.S. officials in marketing their weapons abroad.

"It's understandable that the goals of the U.S. defense industry are to hold on to old markets, open new ones and be capable of competing freely with foreign defense industries," a top State Department official told the U.S. Defense Trade Advisory Group on Wednesday.

Doing that, said Assistant Secretary of State Robert Gallucci, means "the resulting economic prosperity will be good for the whole nation."

This year, the Pentagon plans to supply arms and military aid worth $32.7 billion to 154 of the world's 190 nations, including such recent foes as Albania, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland and Russia.

This year, the Pentagon plans to supply arms and military aid worth $32.7 billion to 154 of the world's 190 nations, including such recent foes as Albania, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland and Russia.

In recent weeks, the Bush administration, in a series of campaign announcements, has trumpeted multibillion-dollar sales of warplanes to Saudi Arabia and Taiwan, as well as tanks to Kuwait. Defense experts predict that the share of U.S. weapons sold overseas will more than double, to more than one-third of U.S. production, in the years ahead.

The administration, sensitive to job losses during a long recession, is helping arms makers boost their international sales. The State Department office responsible for monitoring such deals, originally known as the Office of Munitions Control, has tellingly changed its name to the Center for Defense Trade.

And the Pentagon office that oversees such sales gets 80 percent of its budget from a 3 percent tax on the selling price — "powerful incentive" to push for such trade, according to the congressional Office of Technology Assessment.

But a report by the OTA underscores the downside to all this commerce: "The international arms business is building up a dangerously armed world in which potentially renegade or terrorist nations can use military equipment or technologies imported from the advanced industrial states to threaten or invade weaker neighbors."

Since the Persian Gulf War ended 18 months ago, the United States has sold Middle Eastern nations about half of the $45 billion in arms they have ordered. "Legitimate defense for a responsible party is not inconsistent with our arms control objectives," Frank G. Wisner, the State Department's undersecretary for international security affairs, said at a recent congressional hearing.

Countered Sen. James M. Jeffords, R-Vt.: "It seems to me that there's going to be no end to the sales under those guidelines."

Cooperstown is more than sports mecca

From wire reports

COOPERSTOWN, N.Y. — Cooperstown at its worst:

Dad and son stand at the counter at Mickey's Place, a memorabilia shop. Dad points to one of two dozen baseballs autographed by Mickey Mantle, a friend of the owner. Seventy-five dollars, says the clerk.

Dad shakes his head. Dad points to another — this one signed Mickey Charles Mantle. Says the clerk, "$125."

Cooperstown at its best:

Everything else.

The memorabilia dealers are trying to turn Cooperstown into Six Flags Over Baseball. They're failing, because even while Cooperstown is baseball, it's more than that.

Pretty. Quaint. Clean, green, serene. A place to discover the New York Giants, but also the Cardiff Giant and a literary giant. A place where the deer in front of the Lake View Motel is not a lawn ornament, and the best golf courses are public.

The main attraction remains the Baseball Hall of Fame and Museum, three glorious floors devoted to the glory of their times. Al Kaline's bat. John McGraw's glove. Shoeless Joe Jackson's shoes. As high-tech as computerized videos and as low-tech as a turnstile from the Polo Grounds, it's a treasure, top to bottom.

You'll find it on Main Street, adjoining the J.J. Newberry five-and-dime. Which is another thing to savor about Cooperstown: For all the tourists having dinner at the Short Stop Restaurant on their way back to the Major League Motor Inn, this is a small town. One stoplight, no McDonald's.

On an average summer day, the village of 2,500 has more visitors than residents. There's another surge now, around World Series time. The rest of the year, crowds are minimal and relaxation is maximal.

You can cruise the tree-lined side streets, admiring the Victorian gingerbread mansions and deciding which of more than 20 bed-and-breakfasts will get your business. You can pick up a newspaper at an old-fashioned drugstore and read it on a park bench.

Why you would choose to do that in the exact geographical center of nowhere has to do with a Civil War officer named Abner Doubleday. Legend says Doubleday invented baseball in Cooperstown in 1839. Keep in mind that another legend says George Washington vandalized a cherry tree; Doubleday was busy being a West Point plebe the year of his supposed inspiration.

By the time anyone thought to question the story, however, the village was collecting artifacts and baseball had agreed that the Buck Ewings and other heroes would stop here, 60 miles west of Albany on the shores of Otsego Lake.

This is where author James Fenimore Cooper grew up — his dad founded the place in 1786 — and Otsego is the hypnotically beautiful pool he called Glimmerglass. Fenimore House, built in 1932, stands on the original Cooper land and is home to the New York Historical Collection, with its exhibits on folk art and local history.

Across the street, the Farmers' Museum and Village Crossroads contains thousands of artifacts and implements from the 19th century. Most of the exhibits work, including the cows, which are of more recent vintage. Staffers churn butter, make candles and pray for air-conditioning, much as our forebearers did 100 years ago.

Along with real people, the museum proudly displays the Cardiff Giant, a hulking stone figure sculpted in 1869. The owner buried it on his farm, arranged to have it "discovered," then charged admission to see it.

He did not think to have the Giant autographed. Like the jewels in the Hall of Fame, it stands by itself.

Museum covers all the bases

From wire reports

COOPERSTOWN, N.Y. — The third base that Henry Aaron touched when he stroked his 715th home run is on a shelf next to Babe Ruth's bowling shoes.

Seats from ballparks long turned to rubble — iron gray from the Polo Grounds, rusty red from Crosley Field — crowd together along a wall.

One of broadcaster Lindsay Nelson's ghastly sport coats hangs on a rack near a 1906 New York Giants uniform that identifies the team only as "World Champions."

Peter Clark holds the keys to baseball's back room. Sometimes, he forgets to be amazed.

"It's pretty much just a job after awhile," says the registrar of the Baseball Hall of Fame and Museum. "The first year or so, every time I opened a box it was, 'Look at this! Look at that!' But like any job, it has its responsibilities."

Clark, in his late 40s, has spent 23 years at the Hall of Fame, which opened in 1939. The Brooklyn Dodgers jacket from Sandy Koufax's rookie season sits folded atop a file drawer in his basement office. He pays it no more attention than the swimsuit calendar by his desk.

"Instead of getting excited about having Honus Wagner's uniform," he explains, "I have to worry about whether it's going to be here in 99 years."

His office adjoins the gray-walled, climate-controlled, 1,600-square-foot storage area where 40 to 50 percent of the museum's collection waits to be inserted into the lineup. Along one storeroom wall, a rack of bats — Hal Newhouser's, Mel Ott's — climbs 11 feet to the ceiling. Metal closets and sliding drawers are packed with gloves, caps, autographed baseballs, photographs and more.

All of it has been donated; the museum has no budget for acquisitions. Umpire Frank Umont's gold-framed eyeglasses, Pete Rose's uniform pants, a commemorative Wheaties box signed by Kirby Puckett and Kent Hrbek of the '91 Twins ...

Surely, even Peter Clark must have a favorite.

He pauses, adjusts his glasses, runs a hand across his balding head. "One of them, certainly, is the first catcher's mask," he says. "It's really hard to say with other things that they're truly the first. We know this is the first catcher's mask."

RECONSIDERING MEDIA #2

"We're discovering new ways to compete more effectively"

Making Newspapers Work Harder

Innovations in format and position result in success

By Wendy Falk Barsky

Frustrated!

That's how we felt about using newspapers as part of our media mix. Ad positioning and format restrictions made it about as flexible and exciting as a high school calculus teacher. Still, the demographics, time spent reading, editorial environment, timeliness, cost effectiveness and local environment were all hard to ignore.

Whether it be in media strategy meetings or creative brainstorming sessions, great ideas were whittled down to less-than-great executions as a result of newspapers' restrictions.

Often, alternatives to newspapers were used as a way to preserve innovative formats and positioning ideas. While we never sacrificed our media goals, we were let down to know we were missing out on some of the inherent advantages to newspapers.

We decided to find a way to make the medium work harder for us. We used our local paper, The (Louisville, Ky.) Courier-Journal, as our test situation. We went through a week's worth of papers and critiqued ad positioning, determining how it could work better for us. At the same time, we identified new areas that could be exciting places for ads.

We didn't let the format of the paper get in our way. Instead, we offered suggestions on how pages might offer various advertising opportunities.

Additionally, we contacted the American Association of Advertising Agencies and the Newspaper Advertising Bureau and received articles written on the subject of ad positioning. These stories led us to various newspapers, whose ad sales staffs were more than willing to share their tricks of the trade.

We spoke to Mike Kelley, promotions director at The Courier-Journal, to gain some additional insight into the newspaper business.

Armed with this information, we contacted Jim Marchal, vice president, advertising, at The Courier-Journal. To effectively present our ideas to him we needed to answer the question that was sure to loom in his mind: "'What's in it for me?"

We positioned ourselves as advocates for creativity and innovation whose ideas would spark excitement for current and potential advertisers. We challenged the newspaper to match the flexibility of TV and radio stations to meet advertisers' needs. Marchal seemed very receptive to our unconventional suggestions. We thought it would be some time before we knew whether any of them had a chance.

Our ideas included:

1) Franchise positions. This is often a key advantage for smaller fractionals. These positions often necessitate an upfront frequency commitment and an ad size restriction if one advertiser hopes for exclusivity. Because the space is continually an advertisement, the reader becomes aware of that particular spot. A successful experience with this format is the long-running Tiffany's ad, on high-profile Page 3 of The New York Times.

2) Islands. These positions possibly offer the advertiser the ultimate in creative flexibility. The island position in the middle of the New York Stock Exchange tables, pioneered by the Newspaper Advertising Bureau, is an exciting opportunity. Additionally, islands set up as a diagonal on a page, or simply floating amid editorial (perhaps across the middle of the fold), are always attractive to the advertiser.

3) Strip ads. While USA Today has done well with this concept on its weather page, we knew it could extend to other areas of The Courier-Journal, such as comics or main news.

4) Consecutive pages. While many advertisers (other than retail accounts) may not run two full pages or fractionals on one date, it would be worthwhile to offer the option of consecutive pages to facilitate the advertiser's creative needs and, quite possibly, extended dollars.

To our delight, Marchal not only responded to our proposals promptly, but also positively. While The Courier-Journal, a Gannett newspaper, has some standards to which it must adhere, it allowed the majority of our ideas to become reality.

To respond to this newfound freedom, we took several steps. First, we scheduled meetings with the account and creative groups to let them know the newspaper had just made a huge stride for local advertisers in Louisville. Second, we set up an agency intra-media department trafficking system to keep all department members abreast of developments and agreements with the paper. Third, each media team recommended new ways for their respective clients to use newspaper. Finally, we implemented a position-tracking report to remain current on how the program was working.

We found ways to facilitate our clients' needs through newspaper. For example, First National Bank of Louisville was the first advertiser to appear in an island position on the stock page.

The bank's CD campaign, in which newspaper was the only medium used, had to be cut short as a result of an unprecedented increase in sales—in just weeks. Another client, Churchill Downs, was able to run in the newspaper five days out of the week by using the cost-effective strip ads.

As time went on, many advertisers were taking advantage of The Courier-Journal's flexibility. Coincidentally Marchal left several months later to head the advertising efforts of all Gannett newspapers. We were ecstatic to see someone of his responsiveness rise to the top.

Excited!

That's how we feel about newspaper advertising in Louisville now. We're finding unconventional places for strip ads, zany ways to dress up the comics page and, most importantly, discovering new ways for our clients' businesses to compete more effectively through newspaper advertising.

Gay pledge could cloud military's future

Executive Order 001:
TERMINATING THE EXCLUSION OF HOMOSEXUALS FROM THE ARMED FORCES

By the authority vested in me as president by the Constitution and laws of the United States of America,

David Evans

I, Bill Clinton, as president and commander-in-chief of the armed forces, find that the policy of excluding homosexuals from the service on the basis of sexual preference or conduct is discriminatory,

Therefore, I do hereby revoke Section H, Department of Defense Directive 1332.14, "Administrative Discharges," which authorizes the dismissal of homosexuals and bisexuals. I do further decree that a homosexual preference shall no longer be considered incompatible with military service and that such persons will be allowed enlisted or commissioned service in the air, at sea and in the field.

This order shall take effect immediately.

Bill Clinton
THE WHITE HOUSE
Jan. 21, 1993

■

If elected president, Arkansas Gov. Bill Clinton has declared he'll issue such a statement revoking the ban on gays in the military, which has been in place since the beginning of World War II.

Clinton's promise would mark the biggest social change to hit the military since July 1948, when President Harry Truman ordered the full integration of blacks into the military.

An argument for the integration of gays was offered by retired Army Brig. Gen. Mike Lynch, a veteran of three wars who received a battlefield commission in World War II. "Gays are a part of our society and should be part of a representative military. It won't be an easy task, but in 1948 the military assumed that blacks were going to cause a problem," he said.

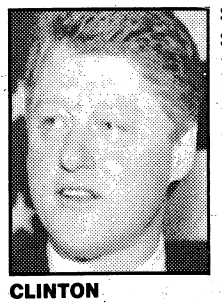
But even Lynch hastened to add, "I can't see how gays would be able to 'practice' in a rifle company."

He suggested there might have to be assignment "restrictions" barring gays from the close living conditions in front-line units.

That caveat gives away the case. In a May letter to Rep. Patricia Schroeder, D-Colo., an ardent advocate of gay and feminist causes, Gen. Colin Powell, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, pointed out that "Skin color is a benign, non-behavioral characteristic. Sexual orientation is perhaps the most profound of human behavioral characteristics. Comparison of the two is a convenient but invalid argument."

Has Clinton really thought this one through?

First, the 14,000 gays discharged over the last decade would have every right to petition the military to be allowed back in. Pregnancy used to be grounds for discharge, and when this regulation was swept aside, many former servicewomen successfully petitioned for re-entry into the armed forces.



CLINTON

Don't forget the heterosexuals in uniform. If Clinton is willing to let gays IN, will he be equally willing to permit servicemembers OUT who object to the gay lifestyle? For sure, some of those heterosexual personnel will request immediate discharge based on their religious beliefs. Let's face it, the Old Testament is tough on the subject. For that matter, will chaplains be instructed NOT to preach the tenets of their faith?

Military recruiters may encounter parents who caution their heterosexual sons and daughters to think twice about joining a military that accepts gay enlistees. In civilian life, a person's decision to associate with gays is voluntary; in a military unit there is no choice.

Sodomy is a criminal offense under the Uniform Code of Military Justice. Unless this part of the military's legal code were rewritten to permit consensual sodomy, gays in uniform would be relegated to celibate status.

We're talking a legal can of worms in which it might be lawful for same-sex couples to engage in sodomy on a military base that happens to be located in one of the 22 states where it's prohibited.

Post exchanges might be required to stock magazines like The Advocate, which was described by sex researcher Dr. Judith Reisman as the Ladies' Home Journal of the gay community. If Clinton is going to be issuing executive orders as president, he might consider instead banning the sale of pornography in PXs, which presently stock magazines such as Penthouse and Playgirl.

But then, Clinton was thinking of the gay vote, which is to say he was thinking of himself and not the impact of his announced policy on the military as an institution. A similar selfishness characterized his sly machinations to avoid the draft, which now makes non-veteran Clinton's position on gays in the military analogous to the pope's stance on birth control.

Sorry, Bill. If you didn't play the game, you can't set the rules.

Women in combat: Let's be rational

■ First of two parts

By Ralph Puckett

The changing roles of women in the military is the focus of a presidential commission that will submit its report to the president next month. The crisis in the Middle East concentrated much attention on this subject.

From all reports, those women did well. For the most part, they were in support roles. Those women were still exposed to risks; some lost their lives. Since all soldiers in a combat zone are exposed to some danger, some people have concluded that there should be no limitation on assignments for women. That is an erroneous conclusion. There are great differences between being in a headquarters in the Army rear and in a rifle squad in the assault, for example.

With the current drawdown on military forces, there is no better time than now to discuss this very important subject. The significant contribution that our female soldiers have made and are making deserves to be given its appropriate recognition. We need to approach this very difficult question logically and unemotionally (if possible).

From all that I have read, the all volunteer Army would not have performed as well without women. They bolstered the peacetime Army's effectiveness. However, peacetime performance is not always the same as combat effectiveness.

Assigning women to a ground combat unit would be a fundamental change in our armed forces. Such a change must be carefully considered before it is implemented. This contemplation should be based on one premise — an Army exists to fight. Nothing should interfere with combat effectiveness.

Women in combat: Let's be rational

Representative Pat Schroeder, among others, has stated emphatically that, in the name of fairness, women should be treated the same as men. Women should have the same assignments as men including command so that women would have the same opportunities for advancement. That is a very commendable social goal.

Because of the importance of leadership to combat effectiveness, only the best people should be selected to command. Command in either peace or war can enhance a person's record and improve that person's chance for promotion. The branches of the Army keep "command lists."

These lists contain individuals who, judging from previous performance, are best qualified for and most deserving of command.

Rep. Schroeder has recommended that the military conduct a test to determine whether women are suited for combat roles. Determining what will comprise the test will be extremely difficult. Having it conducted and the results evaluated fairly and unemotionally will be even more difficult. However, the importance of the question makes the effort worthwhile. We should not drift into a situation that may adversely affect combat effectiveness or for which the American public has not been psychologically prepared.

What should the test examine? Most objections to women in ground combat units focus on the following allegations. First, women lack the physical strength to do many of the tasks. Second, women lack the psychological and emotional stability for the pressures of combat command. Third, male soldiers are unable to accept their female peers, superiors, and subordinates, as soldiers rather than women. Fourth, the physiological differences of women inhibit performance under combat conditions and, in some cases, in peacetime. Fifth, the American public is unwilling, if not unable, to accept large numbers of women casualties.

These allegations are discussed in Part 2.

Columbus resident Ralph Puckett is a military retiree who occasionally writes articles on issues affecting today's armed forces.

Philson takes songwriting to heart

Sergeant hopes to hit the big time one day

By Linda Bosley Dailey
Staff Writer

When Sgt. 1st Class E.J. Philson gets a tune in his head and a message in his heart, he soon has a song — of his own — on his lips.

Philson, non-commissioned officer in charge at Fort Benning's Emergency Operations Center, has been writing poetry and song lyrics in his spare time for nearly 20 years.

Drawing from experiences of his own and of those close to him, Philson writes of life — everything from love to war — in his lyrics and poetry.

And drawing from his own musical background, Philson — a lifelong country music fan — writes country music songs that are tinged with a taste of rhythm and blues. The majority of his songs, Philson said, are a mixture of the two music styles, incorporating a strong story line into the lyrics and a "funky beat" in the rhythm. It's a blend he calls "soulful country."

What makes Philson's efforts so noteworthy is that he is among the very small group of country music artists and performers who are black. Among them are Charley Pride, Cleve Francis and the group Wheels, which is based here in the Chattahoochee Valley.

To Philson, though, music is music, he said, and the labels that categorize it are unimportant, as are notions that particular types of music belong to certain ethnic groups, he said. Among his favorite artists are country artists Ronnie Milsap, Don Williams, Kenny Rogers, Anne Murray and Barbara Mandrell, as well as R&B stars James Brown, Lionel Ritchie, Lou Rawls, Aretha Franklin and Patti LaBelle.

Still unpublished and still unknown, Philson hopes he can turn his avocation into a vocation once he retires from the Army early next year. He's submitted two of his songs to Wheels in hopes the group will record them.

Sgt. 1st Class E.J. Philson mans his station at the post's Emergency Operations Center.

So far, "I haven't made a penny from this," he said of his songwriting, which includes gospel and contemporary Christian songs, pure rhythm and blues and even a few rap songs. But then, he added, "Money is not the motivation in the first place."

The motivation is the satisfaction he gets from expressing thoughts, viewpoints and emotions, Philson said. Still, it'd be nice to earn a paycheck from something he enjoys doing so much. But until he gets his break in the music industry, he said, Philson realizes that he has to have a "real job."

Sometimes the songs come to him just before he drifts off to sleep and he has to rouse himself to write them down. If he waits, he'll forget the words and the tune.

At times, he's stayed up until 2 or 3 — or even all night — writing. "I pay for it the next day," he said. But the fatigue is worth it, he said.

It's with a touch of sadness that Philson recalls the instances he has "lost" a song because he has failed either to write it down or to keep it after putting it on paper.

And, too, he's learned the hard way of the importance of keeping pen and paper handy to prevent any more lost songs.

Once, years ago, Philson got up during the night to write down some lyrics that had come to him. But failing to find any writing paper, he resorted to writing his words on a paper plate. And another time, he wound up writing his song on a brown paper bag.

"Now I keep pen and paper close at hand," he said. And a pen and a clipboard full of paper by the bed.

Although he can't write the music, Philson does create tunes and rhythms to accompany the words he writes. "I can't play it, but I can hear it," he said of the tunes he creates.

And when he recites the words of his songs, he sings them.

But Philson is looking for a composer or musician who can commit his tunes to written form or compose a new tune for his words. Philson is confident that someone is out there who has music but lacks lyrics. "Somewhere down the line our paths have to cross," he said.

He may not be able to write the music to go with his words, but it's not because he hasn't tried to learn to play an instrument. "I've got a piano at home, and I went through three guitars, and I just can't get it."

And because he doesn't play an instrument doesn't mean he is without musical ability. Philson has been singing since he was a boy growing up in Rosedale, La., a town near Baton Rouge, and was a member of his high school choir.

The interest in music has carried on in Philson's family. His older daughter plays seven instruments and plays in her school's symphonic and marching bands, he said, and his other daughter — "she's the voice" — is in her school's choir.

Philson first began writing poetry and song lyrics nearly 20 years ago, after he — then stationed in South Korea — got a letter from his hometown girlfriend saying she wanted to end their romance.

But he didn't keep that poem. And it was years before he got to writing again — about 1980 — and saving what he authored.

Within the last two years, though, he's "gotten serious" about writing, composing about 75 in the last two years, and recently getting 219 of his 250 songs copyrighted.

And the subjects he addresses cover a broad spectrum. One of his favorite songs is his "Country Love Song." And while his younger brother was stationed in Saudi Arabia during the Persian Gulf War, he wrote "Baghdad is Booming," which goes, in part, "Baghdad is shaking to the Saddam Hussein beat . . ."

"This is what I do better than anything else in life," Philson said.

It is important to Philson that his song lyrics and poetry be "clean" — "not polluted" with profanity.

He wants to be able to listen to his songs with his wife, his daughters and his mother, Philson said, without having to flinch. If lyricists are really artists at writing, their creativity should allow them to avoid profanity and still express their messages, he said.

Somebody once told him that his songwriting was a waste of time. But "when" — not if, but "when" — he receives a "songwriter of the year" award, he hopes his detractor is watching. "I'm going to show him," Philson said. "I hope he buys one of my songs."

What makes Philson's efforts so noteworthy is that he is among the very small group of country music artists and performers who are black. Among them are Charley Pride, Cleve Francis and the group Wheels, which is based here in the Chattahoochee Valley.

Army mixes it up with Air Force

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

Lessons learned during the Persian Gulf War and at the National Training Center in California, coupled with the aging of some of its planes have the Air Force and the Army working closer together these days.

Close air support training has been intensified because of both "good and bad" lessons from the war against Saddam Hussein's forces and recent experiences at the National Training Center at Fort Irwin, Calif., an Air Force officer helping run some of that training at Fort Benning said last week.

While Capt. Phil Taber was talking, two F-16 jets were buzzing like giant, angry killer bees over soldiers on a training mission at Concorde observation point, dropping 500-pound bombs only a few hundred meters beyond where 3rd Brigade mortars and artillery pieces were firing and Infantry Officer Basic Course lieutenants were getting an introduction to this type training.

The F-16s were flying in theoretical support of the infantrymen from 1st and 2nd Battalions, 18th Infantry and 2nd Battalion, 69th Armor. The 4th Battalion, 41st Field Artillery was laying on artillery rounds to "mark" targets for the F-16s and to suppress "enemy" air defense fire.

There are about 50 Air Force personnel attached to Fort Benning, about 20 of them with Ranger units. The two dozen 500-pound bombs the F-16s were dropping all appeared to strike within meters of burned-out vehicle hulks that were among the targets.

"You'll see more of this as a result of lessons learned from the NTC and from Desert Storm. We realize we need to work closer with the Army," Taber said. Marine and Navy aircraft may be involved in such close-air-support training in the future, according to the Air Force.

Another reason for using F-16s in such exercises is that the Air Force's A-10 Warthogs are aging and the Air Force wants more practice at employing F-16s in close-air-support bombing runs like these as well as on strafing runs.

"It's just smart money to use a plane that can do dogfights then turn to close-air-support roles," said Col. Chick Eagle. Eagle, the senior Air Force representative to Fort Benning's Infantry School, said the Air Force wants to "stay in the loop" as new infantry doctrine and tactics are developed so "we can work ideas out together." He said part of his job is to "interface with the infantry on doctrine issues."

Earlier on this day, Air Force Lt. Col Chuck Robinson had lectured these relatively inexperienced infantrymen on air power and how it's involved in supporting ground units.

Such interservice training may get more emphasis in the future, especially with the downsizing of the military, said Robinson. "As the cuts come, the actual combat readiness is not going to be sacrificed."

Saudi commander blasts Schwarzkopf autobiography

From wire reports

NEW YORK — The Saudi prince who led Arab forces in the Persian Gulf war complains that Gen. H. Norman Schwarzkopf is trying to take all the credit for the victory over Iraq.

"Gen. Schwarzkopf wants to be seen as the sole supreme commander and finds it hard to acknowledge that this was not the case," Lt. Gen. Khalid Bin Sultan said last week in a six-page statement released to newspapers and other publications in the United States, Europe and the Middle East.

Khalid criticized Schwarzkopf's autobiography, "It Doesn't Take a Hero," which was published three weeks ago.

A spokesman for Schwarzkopf's publisher, Linda Grey-Bantam, said Schwarzkopf was in London and not immediately available to comment.

Khalid complained that Schwarzkopf's book:

■ Falsely credits Lt. Gen. John Yeosock and Lt. Gen. Charles Horner, the U.S. ground and air commanders respectively, with key roles in Khalid's appointment as Arab forces commander. Khalid said he was picked by King Fahd of Saudi Arabia and the Americans "had nothing to do with" it.

■ Asserts that Schwarzkopf "orchestrated the liberation of Kuwait City," whereas, Khalid said, his Arab troops carried out that mission. In fact, Schwarzkopf restates what was apparent at the time — that the first troops to reach Kuwait City were U.S. Marines, who held up their advance to let Khalid's forces claim the honor.

WW II 50TH ANNIVERSARY

In North Africa 50 years ago this week, units participating in Field Marshal Bernard Montgomery's Supercharge Operation at El Alamein sustained heavy casualties, but forced Field Marshal Erwin Rommel to signal Adolph Hitler and concede defeat due to crippling shortages of fuel and ammunition. Rommel then withdrew, allowing the Allied forces to capture 30,000 prisoners, 1,000 guns, and the remains of 450 tanks. British losses for the operation totaled 13,500 killed or wounded and 150 tanks destroyed with an additional 300 damaged.

Here, according to research by the Military History Division at Fort Benning, were the top news items of the week:

■

On Guadalcanal, U.S. forces overcame a heavily resupplied Japanese force to advance, albeit slowly, after inflicting casualties significant enough to force an enemy withdrawal. Additionally, a Japanese landing, attempted east of the American perimeter, as Koli Point, failed after U.S. reinforcements arrived from the west.

■

In London, the Cabinet Anti-U-Boat Warfare Committee held its first meeting. The committee brought together the Allied service chiefs as well as important scientists to coordinate efforts and formulate plans for defeating the menacing German U-Boat threat.

■

Fort Benning officials formally announced the scheduling of the post's own much-anticipated Army-Navy football game to be held at Doughboy Stadium. The event would feature soldiers from the 3rd Armored Division and the 124th, 117th, and 29th Infantry regiments, pitted against a team composed of sailors currently stationed at the Pensacola Naval Air Station in Pensacola, Florida.

FYI

The U.S. Army Infantry Center Recreation Area at Destin, Fla., is located on 15.5 acres on Choctawhatchee Bay, approximately 250 miles from Fort Benning.

There are two-bedroom cabins and duplex cottages that will sleep six people each, three-bedroom cabins that sleep 10 people and a motel with two double beds per unit.

Additional information is available from the Information, Ticketing and Registration Office, 545-4155 or Outdoor Recreation Office, 545-3504. Reservations for Destin Recreation Area are made by calling 1-800-642-0466.

Good news, bad news for Christian ministry

From wire reports

CHICAGO — Anyone who is concerned about the future of Christian ministry in the United States may find comfort in the latest statistics from a group that tries to determine how many graduate students are working toward ordination as ministers or priests.

But on different pages, the recently released annual report of the Association of Theological Schools in the United States and Canada also offers reasons to worry about that future.

It's a good news-bad news-good news picture.

Initially, the good news is that college graduates seeking advanced degrees in theology increased in 1991, the most recent statistics gathered by the association.

The good news is that college graduates seeking advanced degrees in theology increased in 1991. The bad news is that the number who actually completed graduate school with the theology degrees required for ordination decreased in 1991.

The bad news is that the number who actually completed graduate school with the theology degrees required for ordination decreased in 1991. And that downward trend has been going on for more years than the enrollment increases.

The secondary good news is that more and more adults who are not interested in becoming clergy are nonetheless interested in studying theology.

According to the association's report, enrollment in post-graduate seminaries and theology schools was 60,086 in 1991, up 1.5 percent from the previous year and 7 percent from 1989. It marked the third consecutive year of gradual reversal of a downward enrollment trend that bottomed out at 55,745 in 1988.

But the number who graduated with the master of divinity degrees needed for ordination decreased over those same years. The 6,004 graduates in 1991 was down 4 percent from the previous year and 8 percent from 1989. It represents continuation of a gradual decline since 1985.

The Association of Theological Schools performs two critical functions for Christian ministry in the United States.

First, it is the nation's only accrediting agency for post-college seminaries and other graduate schools of theology. Second, it provides the only head count of how many students are interested in ministry in the various U.S. denominations.

And those who do the reports don't rush to judgment about what the figures are telling them.

For example, the Rev. Gail Buchwalter King, editor of the report, said the decline in master of divinity and doctor of ministry graduates last year reflects an economic reality as well as a spiritual calling:

"A lot of people simply can't afford to attend school full-time any more."

"When I went to seminary in the 1960s, most of us carried no debt," the ordained Presbyterian minister said. "Now, a lot of students bring debts from college with them when they begin graduate school. Many work and are part-time students. Some have had other vocations and seek ministry as a second career. So we have a lot of older students and a lot of part-time students, and it often takes them longer to graduate."

Besides the continuing increase of women in seminaries and theology schools — particularly dramatic because Roman Catholicism, a sizable component of the survey, does not ordain women — the general interest in religion was a most significant finding, King said.

TRAINING

Soldiers wind up 'Victory Reach'

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

Several hundred troops from the 3rd Brigade, 24th Infantry Division, will be returning to Fort Benning this weekend after training that took some local troops to the Port of Savannah and others to Fort Drum, N.Y.

"Victory Reach," a readiness exercise, will be evaluated to test the brigade's ability to deploy on short notice and how well the involved troops carried this deployment out, said Richard Olsen, a Fort Stewart, Ga., spokesman. Some Fort Stewart and Hunter Army Airfield soldiers were involved in the exercise that saw 566 Fort Benning soldiers participate, the Army said.

The brigade is becoming one of the 18th Airborne Corps' ready brigades, which means that one of its companies could be the first to deploy in the event of another Persian Gulf War-type conflict.

Maj. Gen. Paul E. Blackwell, the 24th Infantry Division commander, said during exercises at the National Training Center recently that the brigade's "ready company" will be required to deploy within hours whenever the brigade is on its rotating alert status, a duty it shares with other brigades. The ready brigade alert status rotates every 30 days, Blackwell said.

Part of "Victory Reach" involved sending an Immediate Ready Company — apparently from the 1st Battalion, 18th Infantry and other elements, including some from the 2nd Brigade, 69th Armor to Fort Drum, N.Y., for force-on-force training, the Army and individual soldiers said.

Olsen said activities at the Port of Savannah included loading some 110 vehicles on a Merchant Marine ship, then off-loading the equipment on Tuesday. He said some 600 Fort Benning vehicles, including Bradley Fighting Vehicles, were part of that exercise.

The Army first said folks involved in the Savannah operation would be returning to Fort Benning Friday and Saturday. Later, however, Fort Benning spokesperson Monica Manganaro said that for "security reasons" she could only say that all troops involved in Victory Reach would be back home by Nov. 1.

Some Air Force C-5A aircraft were also apparently involved in the exercise, as several were seen and heard roaring in and out of Fort Benning in recent days.

Elements of other Fort Benning units such as the 324th Support Battalion, 317th Engineers and 4th Battalion, 41st Field Artillery were also involved.

Admirals won't face more Tailhook punishment

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — Two admirals who lost their jobs for failing to aggressively investigate the Tailhook sex-abuse scandal will receive no further punishment and will be allowed to retire at their current ranks, Navy sources said Tuesday.

Acting Navy Secretary Sean O'Keefe made the decision last week, said the sources, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

O'Keefe, in a letter to the Pentagon's inspector general, said "no further action is warranted" against Rear Adm. Duvall Williams, the former commander of the Naval Investigative Service, and Rear Adm. John Gordon, the Navy's judge advocate general.

The decision allows both men to retire in their current grades. Williams is a one-star admiral and Gordon is a two-star.

A third admiral who was also criticized for failing to pursue the matter, Rear Adm. George Davis, the Navy's inspector general, was ordered reassigned.

O'Keefe's letter is the formal response to the report issued in September by Pentagon Inspector General Derek Vander Schaaf, which faulted the Navy's internal investigation into the reported assaults on 26 women at a 1991 convention of aviators in Las Vegas, said the sources.

Vander Schaaf criticized the three admirals, as well as one civilian, Navy Undersecretary Dan Howard, for failing to adequately investigate the actions of the Navy and Marine Corps officers, as well as more senior officers, at the convention.

O'Keefe announced at a press conference one day after receiving the report that he had accepted the resignations of Williams and Gordon. Howard was the only one who was allowed to remain in his post.

Both Williams and Gordon have protested the inspector general's findings, contending they were unduly criticized in the report.

Although O'Keefe says Vander Schaaf's finding that a "collective management failure" in the Navy investigation "is beyond question," he criticizes the inspector general for hasty release of the report, only hours after those criticized in it were allowed to read it.

"Refusal to give these individuals a significant opportunity to review the report prior to its release unduly fueled concerns that they had not been dealt with fairly," said O'Keefe's letter, a copy of which was provided to The Associated Press.

The Navy secretary also termed "highly inappropriate" Vander Schaaf's decision to include a section in the report on the actions of former Navy Secretary H. Lawrence Garrett III, which detailed his whereabouts at the Tailhook convention and his refusal to take a lie-detector test.

"You establish no link whatsoever between the Navy's conduct of the investigation and the mere presence of the Secretary at Tailhook," O'Keefe wrote.

As well, O'Keefe wrote, the inclusion of a letter from Garrett declining to take a lie-detector test is inconsistent with Defense Department "policy prohibiting any mention of a witness' declination to take a polygraph examination."

O'Keefe said in his letter that even though Davis, the inspector general, was to be reassigned, "this action should not be viewed as reflecting adversely" on him.

O'Keefe argued that he'd ordered the change for organizational reasons to make the inspector general's job a three-star, rather than two-star, position and give it more clout. Vice Adm. David Bennett has been confirmed by the Senate for the job, the letter said.

The Tailhook Association, a booster club for naval aviation, sponsored the 1991 convention. The group takes its name from the hook on an aircraft that snags a wire on the deck of an aircraft carrier as the plane lands.

Black soldiers' memorial short of funds

From wire reports

The Black Revolutionary War Patriots Memorial is planned on the National Mall near the Reflecting Pool between the Lincoln Memorial and the Washington Monument.

WASHINGTON — A group seeking to build the first national monument honoring black Revolutionary War soldiers will have to abandon the effort if it doesn't raise another $5.2 million soon, leaders said Monday.

"If sufficient support is not forthcoming by February 1993 . . . we would feel compelled to ask Congress to reclaim the site and return any remaining funds to donors," said Maurice A. Barboza, president of the Black Revolutionary War Patriots Foundation.

"We will suffer a tremendous embarrassment," he said. "There will probably not be another memorial built on the (National) Mall." He said he needs the money pledged by February, and in hand by next October.

The Black Revolutionary War Patriots Memorial is planned on the National Mall near the Reflecting Pool between the Lincoln Memorial and the Washington Monument. It will cost an estimated $4.8 million to build, but the foundation is seeking $6 million to cover any cost increases caused by inflation.

The foundation has raised only $800,000. Barboza said major black corporations have not responded to solicitation letters. The group needs to raise about $500,000 per month to meet the goal.

"Ideally, we would like to raise all the money in $1 donations from 5 million caring Americans who see themselves as modern-day patriots," he said in statement.

Barboza said he was inspired to build the memorial in 1984 after his aunt, Lena Santos Ferguson, became the second black woman admitted to the Daughters of the American Revolution. The foundation was established in 1985.

The memorial will honor about 5,000 black civilians, soldiers and sailors who served in the American Revolution from 1775 and 1783, as well as the tens of thousands of slaves who ran away to freedom.

Officials hope to complete the monument by June 1995.

Contributions can be sent to The Patriots Foundation, 1612 K St. N.W., Suite 1104, Washington, D.C., 20006.

He traveled the road to musical success

By Sandra Okamoto
Staff Writer

Don Conoscenti, born and reared in Chicago, didn't like high school and as soon as he graduated he left home. That's not an unusual story, because many young people join the service, go to college or move out and get a job right after graduation.

Conoscenti did one better. He became a hobo. A real live train-hopping nomad.

"I had finished high school and I didn't really enjoy it," he said from his Atlanta home. "I was very independent." He came from a large family and while his parents were concerned, they were just as certain that he would be all right.

"I've traveled so much," he said. "I hitchhiked and hopped trains."

Music was always important in his life. He says there's a picture of him at age 2, with his head right up against the record player.

He learned to play the flute in junior high school and in high school, he was the first chair flute player in the symphonic band.

"When I hit the road, I wrapped my flute in newspapers and I was gone."

He began writing songs during his travels. He now has about 200 songs. He didn't keep a journal while moving about the country, he says he "lets my songs be the journal."

"The songs evoke such images about places and relationships," Conoscenti said. "I can remember places through my songs — how they looked, how they smelled."

He's a singer-songwriter/multi-instrumentalist. It was a "long, long series of musical events" that brought him to Atlanta.

Conoscenti worked in Key West at Slopping Joe's in 1983 and 1984. He got an offer to come to Atlanta to work with a band that didn't work out. He was immediately offered a job in another band and went straight to the Midwest.

"The funny thing is, this band (Tug Mumbo) played in Atlanta a lot."

In 1986 he moved to Atlanta, where he's been ever since. He says it's the longest he's stayed in one city during his adult life.

Conoscenti and his group, The New Cognitos (Dave Webb on bass and Ed Bradley on drums), will perform at The Loft, upstairs at Ok Sun's Cafe, 1032 Broadway, Friday and Nov. 6-7. Cover charge is $2. For more information, call 596-8141. On Friday, look for fellow Atlanta musician Matthew Kahler to perform with Conoscenti.

"Decatur has the best music scene in the country," said Conoscenti. "And it's extended itself to Columbus through The Loft. I think it's beautiful."

And while he disliked school when he was a teen-ager, at 37, he's rediscovering the joys of learning in a structured environment. He's taken classes in mathematics, drafting and tool and die.

In 1987 Conoscenti gave up music completely to study martial arts and Eastern philosophy.

"I was burned out," he said. "I was thinking too much in terms of getting a record deal." He sold all his musical equipment and gave away or loaned his instruments to friends.

He turned to spiritual training, went to the movies, "got a credit card for the first time in my life." He became a carpenter — "weird carpentry." Conoscenti made custom work stations.

He earned a brown belt in Chinese kung fu (the shaolin school). Eastern religion is another subject he's studied.

"That (mysticism) and music are the most important things in my life," he said.

Pharmacy says give 'em a call

From staff reports

Martin Army Community Hospital on Sunday will begin a new pharmacy program that will allow patients to call in their requests for prescription refills.

The Phone-in Refill Service will be available at the hospital's pharmacy only. To use the service, clients call 544-1352 and provide the requested information. Calls will be taken 24 hours a day. Patients must show their identification cards to pick up the prescription.

When they call, clients should have ready the patient's name, sponsor's social security number, the total number of different medications requested, the prescription number (in the upper left portion of the label) and the name of the medication.

Requests made before noon on weekdays will be available at the hospital pharmacy's pick-up window after 4 p.m. the same day. Requests called in between noon and midnight Monday through Thursday will be ready at 9 a.m. the next weekday.

Refill requests made on holidays, weekends or after noon on Fridays will be available after 9 a.m. the next weekday.

Clients must pick up the prescription within one week of calling, or the medication will be returned to stock.

Patients may still request refills in person at the hospital pharmacy or use the Refill Pharmacy at the Main Exchange Mall.

The hospital pharmacy is open 8 a.m. to 6 p.m. Monday through Friday, 9 a.m. to noon and 1 to 6 p.m. on Saturday and most holidays. It is closed on Sunday, Thanksgiving, Christmas and New Year's Day.

The refill pharmacy at the Main Exchange Mall is open 9:45 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday. It is closed Saturday, Sunday and holidays.

More Gateway to Care briefings scheduled

From staff reports

Martin Army Community Hospital officials will hold 10 more meetings in November and December to explain the Gateway to Care program to retirees and their families and to answer their questions concerning the new managed care program being instituted at the hospital and its clinics.

Evening briefings, set for 6 p.m. at the Infantry Hall's Marshall Auditorium, will be held on Nov. 2, 5, 12, 17 and 24 and on Dec. 1 and 3.

Three other briefings will be held during the day. Those meetings are scheduled for 10 a.m. Nov. 10 in classroom 5, Infantry Hall; 10 a.m. Nov. 14 in Infantry Hall's Marshall Auditorium, and 10 a.m. Nov. 19 in classroom 3, Infantry Hall.

Retirees may attend any meeting that best suits their schedules. The daytime briefings set to be held in classrooms 3 and 5 are limited to an audience of 200 people because space is limited.

U.S. team heading back to Vietnam

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — A five-man team was to travel to Vietnam this week to continue the search for new material that could help resolve the cases of American servicemen still missing from the Vietnam War, the Pentagon said Tuesday.

"That's when we expect to get more pictures," Pentagon spokesman Pete Williams said at a briefing.

Last week, a U.S. delegation headed by retired Gen. John Vessey brought back more than 4,000 photos of individuals, artifacts and crash sites after they were released by Hanoi.

Williams called the development a "breakthrough" in attempts to resolve the cases of the 2,265 men still unaccounted for in the wake of the Vietnam conflict.

The spokesman said the team will be headed by Bob DeStatte, a member of the Pentagon's joint task force that is seeking to resolve the cases.

DeStatte will be accompanied by three military officers and the researcher Ted Schweitzer, who disclosed the existence of the photos and other material to the Pentagon, Williams said.

The spokesman said officials hope the team, which will begin searching other archives and help organize the study of additional data promised by Vietnam, will be able to find "some correlating data that will allow us to further learn" from the 4,000 pictures that have been made available.

Last week, Pentagon officials said the new information had helped them resolve the fate of three missing Americans.

Smithsonian displays Vietnam mementoes

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — "Dear Allen," begins the handwritten note left at the Vietnam Veterans Memorial, "It took me twenty years to contact your parents. I couldn't find a way to say, 'Your son died saving my life.'"

"I finally did, though. I talked to your father on the phone. It was difficult for both of us but my load is so much lighter now. Johnny, Chip, Ted, Gerald, Bob and Sgt. Jackson are here with you. I miss you all. Love, Brother Lynn."

Above the note is a photo of 10 men in army fatigues and helmets lounging on a makeshift wall of muddy sandbags. The names and location recall a time long ago and a place far away: "Charlie Squad at Con Thien, Feb. 1968. Fox Co, 2nd Battalion, 1st Marines, 2nd Platoon."

The note, part of a new Smithsonian Institution exhibit, includes more detail than many of the anonymous messages and mementos left beside the black granite wall which bears the names of those who died in Vietnam. But it shares much with them — an effort to deal with the guilt, pain and horrible memories of a war that still troubles Americans 30 years later.

"Sometimes, people make their own decisions about what a monument will be and sometimes they create their own shrines," Roger Kennedy, director of the Smithsonian's National Museum of American History, said of the mementoes on Tuesday. "It's an astonishing and unprecedented expression of a drawing together of people . . . and a washing away of division in the presence of great sorrow."

In conjunction with the 10th anniversary of the Vietnam Memorial, the Smithsonian decided to showcase some 500 of the more than 25,000 heart-wrenching items, notes and artifacts that have been left at the wall since it opened on Veteran's Day, 1982.

"There have been some very somber moments as we've worked on this exhibition," said Ed Ezell, a Smithsonian curator who oversaw the project. "You cannot work with these objects and not be touched with the intense human drama that the Vietnam War represented to this nation."

The items on display include military paraphernalia, one of many bonds between the living and the dead: army fatigues, patches from different battalions and divisions, helmets, boots and dog tags. But there are plenty of remembrances of the halcyon days of youth for more than 58,000 American boys who didn't make it far into adulthood.

Next to two cans of sardines sits a pair of black lace panties. Nearby lies an autographed baseball, a teddy bear, a Christmas tree, and a woman's blue high-heeled shoe. Scrawled in magic marker on a newspaper delivery boy's canvas sack is this message: "To Pat Mooney — Remembering a sweeter, gentler time. We never dreamed serving the people would end this way. God bless you. Rest in peace. — C.A.F."

The exhibit, "Personal Legacy: The Healing of a Nation," will be on display at the American History museum from Oct. 28 through June 7, 1993. Unlike other museum exhibits, it has a near-total lack of guidance for visitors.

"These are objects to contemplate, not explain," Ezell said. "Most of them, the explanation lies with the person who left them and would probably be understood by the person for whom they were left."

Once the wall opened, objects began to trickle in — a pair of boots here, a note there. But as the memorial became more popular, so too did the idea of leaving objects behind. According to curator Duery Felton, more than 1,500 objects were placed in front of the granite panels between Memorial Day and the Fourth of July this year.

"The numbers are increasing, not decreasing," Felton said. "The collection is in a constant state of flux, and it is a living memorial. People are using that memorial to register their feelings. It has become a bulletin board."

The recreation center will be built in the Sand Hill community for use by soldiers in One Station Unit Training (OSUT). The equipment maintenance shop features state-of-the-art automotive equipment for service and maintenance of small tactical vehicles. It is being constructed for the 317th Eng. Bn.

Located at 500 Fifth Ave., in Phenix City, the Lisle Co. specializes in commercial and industrial construction. In business since 1987, Billy Lisle is president of the firm.

Spencer quarterback Jerry Price fires off a pass during his team's 19-0 loss to Kendrick last Saturday.

Cherokees tame the Greenwave

From staff reports

The Kendrick Cherokees knew — and everyone else, for that matter — that senior running back Maurece Williams fuels the Spencer High School attack. Take away Williams and the Greenwave becomes more like a green ripple.

Saturday afternoon at Memorial Stadium, Kendrick took away Williams, limiting the star running back to less than 100 yards for the first time this season as the Cherokees took a 19-0 Region 3-AAA victory.

Williams, who had averaged in excess of 175 yards per game, gained only 72 yards on 15 carries as Spencer fell to 4-3 overall, 1-2 in the region. Kendrick is now 3-5 and 2-2.

After a scoreless first period, Kendrick scored the only points it would really need with 27 left in the first half. Quarterback Jimmy Robinson threw to tight end Mike Taylor for a 51-yard scoring play. Mike Mayberry's extra point gave the Cherokees a 7-0 advantage.

After a short Spencer punt (13 yards), Kendrick was again in scoring position at the Greenwave 27 with 18 seconds left. After an 11-yard run by Robinson, Mayberry kicked a 33-yard field goal with nine seconds left in the half for a 10-0 Cherokee lead.

There were no other offensive fireworks during the game. Kendrick held Williams and the Greenwave in check for the rest of the game, scoring nine points by recovering a fumble for a touchdown and a blocking a punt for a safety.

Spencer tries to get back on track tonight against Hardaway at Kinnett Stadium. Kendrick takes the weekend off.

Iraqis used American weapons

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — Former secret U.S. military reports show that Iraq's arsenal contained American land mines and mortars during the Persian Gulf War.

The reports were prepared by Army intelligence officers before the war. The reports don't say how the Iraqis obtained the weapons.

Iraq obtained the weapons by buying or capturing them from Iran or Kuwait, or by purchasing them on the black market, a U.S. Army source said.

The existence of U.S.-made or U.S.-licensed weaponry in Iraq's inventory could undermine recent statements by President Bush and his top aides that the United States did not contribute to building the massive arsenal of Iraqi President Saddam Hussein.

While these reports contain no evidence that U.S. manufacturers sold weapons directly to Iraq, several intelligence reports describe Iraq's land mine inventory as containing the very types of devices faced by the U.S.-led coalition forces who confronted Iraqi troops in Kuwait in February 1991.

The partially declassified and heavily censored reports were obtained by William Arkin, the director of military research for Greenpeace, a liberal environmental group, under the Freedom of Information Act.

One November 1990 report compiled by U.S. Army Intelligence, entitled "Iraqi Combat Engineer Capabilities," lists four types of U.S. mines in the Iraqi arsenal. They are the M-14 antipersonnel blast mine, the M-16 bounding fragmentation antipersonnel mine, the M-19 nonmetallic antitank blast mines and the M-21 plate-charge antitank mine.

Of the 148 Americans killed and 458 injured during the air and ground war with Iraq, several dozen were casualties of land mines.

Two other types of mines were deleted by the censor presumably, said Arkin, because they designated classified types of U.S. land mines.

Some of the mines listed are of U.S. origin but are manufactured in other countries under license from the United States.

Another Army Intelligence Report, entitled "Iraqi Infantry Weapons," lists the M-30 4.2-inch-caliber mortar and the 81-mm M-29 mortar as being in the Iraqi arsenal. Both weapons are used by the U.S. Army and have also been sold to other countries, including NATO allies.

Some of these countries manufacture the M-30 with modifications under their own model designations, according to the report.

"This all just goes to show how porous the arms market is," said Arkin.

Although President Bush and his aides have in recent weeks vehemently denied that any U.S. technology aided Saddam's nuclear weapons, Arkin said, "it wasn't nuclear weapons that killed U.S. troops in Kuwait."

Of the 148 Americans killed and 458 injured during the air and ground war with Iraq, several dozen were casualties of land mines.

The Army source noted that most of the mines in the Iraqi inventory were of Italian origin, and some came from the Soviet Union. But he did not rule out that some of those encountered by U.S. troops were of American origin.

"It's hard to tell after you've stepped on it," he said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

U.S. sending MASH unit to Croatia

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon is sending a mobile hospital to Croatia.

The Defense Department announced last week that the 212th MASH unit, assigned to the Army's V Corps in Wiesbaden, Germany, is expected to be in place by Nov. 15.

Pentagon spokesman Bob Hall said the 150-member unit will be augmented by 88 members of other U.S. military medical commands in Germany, he added.

The MASH (mobile Army surgical hospital) unit will be set up in Zagreb and will include a 60-bed care unit, physical therapy personnel and units trained in dealing with crisis and stress, the spokesman said.

Casualties among United Nations personnel guarding humanitarian aid shipments have been "very light," so far, Hall said.

Asked whether the unit would aid only U.N. personnel, or if it would provide assistance to civilians caught in the war among feuding republics, Hall said, "They'll deal with what comes their way."

Boy with cancer needs help

From staff reports

The Ladies Auxiliary of American Legion Post 267 in Columbus is raising funds to help pay costs of a 10-year-old boy undergoing treatment in Atlanta for pancreatic cancer.

Doris Tenner, president of the auxiliary, said a trust fund account has been opened to help Gregory Easter, son of Dinah Easter Graves of 2752 Ramsey Road. The auxiliary also will be conducting other fund-raising events to supplement donations, she said.

Gregory, one of five children, was diagnosed with pancreatic cancer about three months ago, said his mother. The illness is rare, affecting about 20 children, and is being treated through chemotherapy every three weeks at Scottish Rite Hospital in Atlanta.

A spokesperson for Trust Company Bank of Columbus' Southside Branch, 3891 Victory Drive, said a trust fund has been established through which donations may be made. Contributions will be accepted at any branch of the bank, or may be made by mailing them to Trust Company Bank of Columbus, Attention: Southside Branch, Account of Gregory Easter, P.O. Box 431, Columbus, Ga. 31994-3199.

To help the auxiliary with its fund-raising activities, or for more information, call Tenner at 682-8956, or call the American Legion Auxiliary after 3 p.m. at 561-8304.

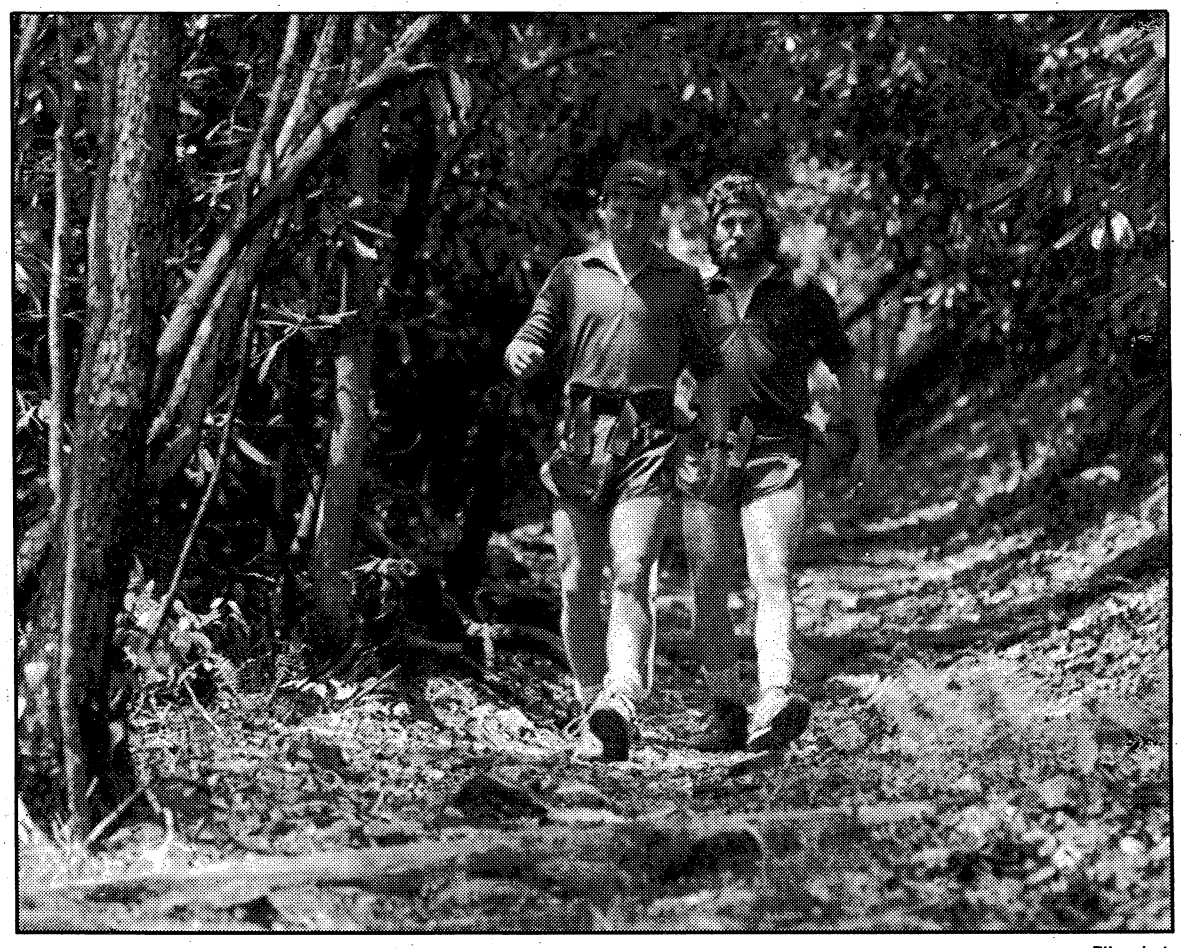
Give crowded Appalachian Trail a rest



File photo

The 2,000-mile Appalachian Trail runs from Georgia's Springer Mountain all the way to Maine.

By Randy Lee Loftis
Dallas Morning News

There are plenty of places to go in Georgia if you love a crowd. Try Atlanta's Hartsfield International Airport. Or a Braves game.

Or the Appalachian Trail.

The country's most famous trail starts its 2,000-mile journey to Maine at Georgia's Springer Mountain. Finished 55 years ago, the AT remains a rarity: a great idea that worked as planned. But as with many of our best ideas, it probably is too popular for its own good. People can stamp something to death in the rush to enjoy it.

North Georgia is a prime example. Freeways from the city reach far into the southern Appalachians. The Blue Ridge has become the misty antidote to the city for tens of thousands of people.

Usage of the trail jumped in 1987 and has been increasing three to five percent a year since then, said Brian King of the Appalachian Trail Conference.

The Appalachian Trail is paying a price. Usage of the AT jumped in 1987 and has been increasing three to five percent a year since then, said Brian King of the Appalachian Trail Conference, the group that links the 5,400 volunteers in 14 states who maintain the trail. The usage numbers are all anecdotal, but they reflect the experience of many hikers.

Volunteers have devoted time, money and muscle in the past decade to rerouting and reinforcing the trail. Thanks to better construction techniques, erosion from all those waffle-soled boots has eased, said King. In Great Smoky Mountains National Park, the AT Conference is handling a sanitation problem — so many hikers, nowhere to go — by installing privies at AT shelters. It's a regrettable but necessary intrusion.

In North Georgia, the AT crosses some of the wildest territory in the East. The trail is a pretty lonely place in many stretches. But elsewhere, a hiker just about has to take a number.

The most visible public areas are the most crowded — national parks, national forest recreation areas and public road crossings. Infamous among AT hikers is the Neels Gap crossing at U.S. 19-129 near Suches, Ga. So many day-hikers use it that the Georgia Appalachian Trail Club has built a short alternative trailhead, the Blood Mountain Spur Trail, to lure people away.

What can a conscientious hiker do? Don't cut across switchbacks, damage the plants or leave the slightest sign of having used a campsite.

There's another solution, too: Pick another trail.

The AT offers dozens of alternatives — loop trails, long approach trails and completely different routes. North Georgia alone has hundreds of miles that can be just as rewarding as the AT and a lot less populated.

Here are three long-distance alternatives:

■ The Benton MacKaye Trail: It's named for Benton MacKaye (pronounced Mac-EYE), the visionary forester who first proposed the Appalachian Trail. His plan included long loop trails off the AT.

The Benton MacKaye Trail is one such effort. As planned, the 250-mile trail will run west of the AT from Springer Mountain through the Chattahoochee, Cherokee and Nantahala national forests. It will cross the AT in the Great Smokies, ending at Davenport Gap, near the Tennessee-North Carolina line.

The 50-mile Georgia portion was completed in the late 1980s, and 10 miles are under construction in Tennessee. The trail gets moderate use, said Roban Johnson of the U.S. Forest Service's Gainesville, Ga., office. It runs through one of the country's outstanding wilderness areas, the 37,000-acre Cohutta Wilderness along the Georgia-Tennessee line. The builders have identified seven trailheads around the southern terminus, so no one point should be too crowded.

■ The Bartram Trail: The plan for this trail is to follow, as closely as it possible, naturalist William Bartram's route from the 18th century. Planners envision a 2,550-mile trail; 36.8 miles are finished in Georgia. North to south is by far the easier trip, says Tim Homan in his "The Hiking Trails of North Georgia." The Georgia segment starts at the Georgia-North Carolina line, crosses Rabun Bald and loops southeast, touching the wild Chatoogat pRiver. The trail runs northeast along the river, ending at Warwoman Creek.

■ The Duncan Ridge National Recreation Trail: At 30.9 miles, this trail has been shortened by five miles and its name changed from the Loop Trail. It has been rerouted and now shares its initial distance with the AT and the Benton MacKaye. But nobody should feel cheated; the last 20.4 miles are truly strenuous. Going south to north, the trail gains 4,100 feet in altitude and then descends 3,400 feet. After diverging from the other trails, the Duncan Ridge runs in a clockwise loop, rejoining the AT at Slaughter Gap.

By doubling back south on the Appalachian Trail, the loop can become a 65-mile round trip.

Soak up food, history in Philadelphia

By Marc Schogol and Elizabeth Duff
Knight-Ridder Newspapers

PHILADELPHIA — So you're looking for a place to take a journey with the family.

What you want, of course, is a place that has lots of charm and lots of interesting things to see and do; an area with pleasant places to dine and convenient, not ruinously expensive, places to stay.

Somewhere with lots of history you can immerse yourself in, lots of culture you can soak up. Somewhere that won't bore children but that isn't too patently kiddy for adults.

Well, have we got a place for you!

Ever considered visiting Philadelphia?

There's a whole range of lodging options, from bed and breakfasts (yes, they have them in the city) to luxury hotels. We wound up choosing the Wyndham Franklin Plaza (800-822-4200), on 16th Street, right off the Vine Expressway, because it was conveniently situated and because for a very modest $84 (plus taxes, no charge for parking), we had a room for the night with two double beds and a rollaway that was just perfect for our needs.

There are about 4.5 million people in the region Philadelphia tourism officials consider their back yard. The message that tourism types would like to get across to those millions of potential day-trippers — and, of course, to anyone else within the sound of their voices — is that everything old is new again.

"It seems to us that there's a tradition that, when somebody does a travel story on Philadelphia, they do the historic areas, mention the nice hotels, the Art Museum and so forth, and that's accurate," says Tom Muldoon, director of the Philadelphia Convention and Visitors Center.

"You can always go to Independence Hall; it's always there."

But, Muldoon adds, focusing on the Liberty Bell and the like tends to obscure the fact that there's so much that's new in Philadelphia that even if you had made a weekend visit to the city four or five years ago, you would now find all sorts of interesting things around that you wouldn't have seen.

Says Muldoon: "We sort of have these new products coming out of the ground: the Franklin Institute Futures Center; we look at the Camden aquarium as ours; Penn's Landing." Not to mention all the old places with new looks, such as the Art Museum, with its Picasso and Chagall exhibitions of recent years, plus old and new ethnic celebrations and special seasonal events, such as the Army-Navy football game, the Philadelphia Flower Show, the Freedom Festival and the Jambalaya Jam.

Muldoon adds: "There's a lot of people who a generation ago lived and worked in the city but who don't have much occasion to get into the city now and so don't necessarily know what's here ... There's a lot more people out there who could be, would be, should be visiting and touching some of these things."

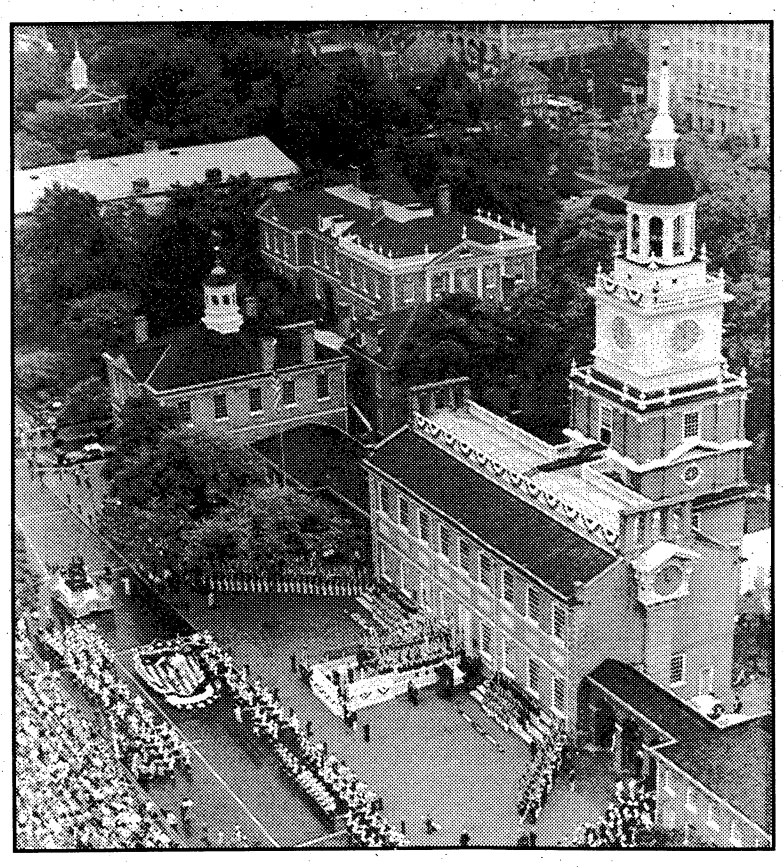
And, in taking a second look at Philadelphia, Convention and Visitors Bureau officials urge that you take a wide-angle look.

"People in Philadelphia have a tendency to think of the city in small little bits — they tend to think of the Art Museum and tend not to connect it in their mind with something five blocks away," says R.C. Staab, the bureau's vice president for communications.

"They don't always think: 'Gosh, I could spend a whole day on the (Benjamin Franklin) Parkway, or I could spend a whole day in the historic waterfront area.' " Or, he adds, "they'll say: 'I've been to the Liberty Bell, to Independence Hall,' but they probably haven't been to the Betsy Ross House or Franklin Court or the mint or Elfreth's Alley.... They don't think of it as a little mini-vacation they could do in one day."

After we pulled up to the hotel, our car was soon whisked away, and we and our luggage, after the fastest of check-ins, were whisked up to a 26th-floor room with a view.

That view up the scenic Parkway, toward the Art Museum, included a dead-on look at the Franklin Institute (215-448-1200), which was to be our first stop. Even though we have been there with our children — and visiting relatives — a number of times, it exemplifies what Muldoon is talking about:



File photo

museum-hopping (the Art Museum; the Academy of Natural Sciences, with its dinosaurs; the Please Touch Museum, with its hands-on exhibits, etc.) along the Parkway.

But there was somewhere old — Oscar's Tavern, in the 1500 block of Sansom Street, where we'd had our first date lo those many years ago — and somewhere new — Liberty Place — that we wanted to see. In addition, the German-American Parade was stepping off. So downtown we went.

Everybody who has spent any time in Philadelphia has a place whose cheesesteaks they swear by. For many, it's Pat's Steaks or Geno's. For us, it's always been Oscar's, and thus it was with a real sense of passing the torch to a new generation that we introduced the children to Oscar's cheesesteak hoagie.

In the few years since we'd last been there, the museum had seen the future and built it a center — the Mandell Futures Center, that is, with its computerized, interactive look into the 21st century and with its Tuttleman Omniverse Theater, whose 60-by-80-foot, wraparound, sense-around, virtual-reality, stereo-to-the-max screen truly puts you into the picture.

We were treated to a showing of "Antarctica," a breathtaking look at that stark, frozen wasteland. "Awesome" is the only word to describe the experience. If you're prone to motion sickness, take some Dramamine.

We could, as Staab suggested, have made a whole day of Everybody who has spent any time in Philadelphia has a place whose cheesesteaks they swear by. For many, it's Pat's Steaks or Geno's on the same bustling corner of Ninth Street and Passyunk Avenue in South Philadelphia. For us, it's always been Oscar's, and thus it was with a real sense of passing the torch to a new generation that we introduced the children to Oscar's cheesesteak hoagie. Perhaps because we're a bit older, Oscar's didn't seem quite as romantic as we remembered it. But except for the price, the cheesesteaks hadn't changed a bit.

With full stomachs, we walked the few blocks over to Liberty Place, the new apex of the Philadelphia skyline, which again is something that has been built and opened since our last real tour of the city. Since next to eating, our family tends to like shopping most of all, suffice it to say that during our visit to the Shops at Liberty Place, we did our bit for the local economy.

Walking out the Chestnut Street exit, we stepped right into the parade, with its floats and proud German-Americans celebrating their ancestry. Next to eating and shopping, we love a parade.

Being history buffs, too, we zipped over to the nearby Civil War Library & Museum (215-735-8196) at 18th and Pine Streets. It houses a very impressive collection; son Jeff, 13, was particularly fascinated by the stuffed and mounted head of Baldy, Gen. George Meade's horse. On catching sight of it, Jeff began humming the music from "The Godfather."

Instead of dinner, we decided to partake of one of our favorite self-indulgences: high tea. So first back to the hotel, to spruce up, and then over to the Four Seasons Hotel (215-963-1500), at One Logan Square, for tea and crumpets.

For our evening's entertainment, we had considered going to see a show. Unfortunately, we were a few weeks early for the new theater season. We debated other options, but being a bit worn out, we decided to repair to our hotel room and catch a pay-per-view showing of "Batman Returns."

Day 2. It turned out to be a soggy blur of activity. The rain that had held off the previous day descended upon us as we headed down to the historic district-Old City-Penn's Landing areas.

We did manage to get to see what's left of Benjamin Franklin's home and businesses at Franklin Court, whose museum, with its many hands-on displays, is terrific for children; to the Betsy Ross House; to the Army-Navy Museum, and, of course, to Independence Hall.

(In a clear case of role reversal, it was our children — particularly Carolyn, whose class at the Shipley School had made a similar trip — who were our guides. At Independence Hall, Carolyn called our attention to the bell in the tower and, intending to convey that it was not original, said, "It's a remake.")

A carriage tour in the rain — daughter Kate, 11, has never met a horse she didn't want to go riding with — gave us a look at most of the rest of the famous sites in the historic district.

Among them was the First Bank of the United States, which the carriage driver informed us was also the scene of the first bank "robbery" in the United States. Problem was, since there was only one bank in the country, when the robber returned the next day to deposit his ill-gotten gains, he was promptly arrested. n combination with some recent inept heists, the driver added, this gives Philadelphia the right to call itself the "Stupid Bank Robbery Capital of the United States."

We had planned to visit the Liberty Bell, but we found ourselves in the middle of another parade — the Puerto Rican Day extravaganza — and so, hemmed in by police barricades around Independence Hall, we watched some of the festivities instead. Despite the foul weather, it was a tuneful, colorful affair.

Again, because of the weather, we decided to postpone a Penn's Landing landing until another day. Instead, we ducked into the City Tavern (215-923-6059) at Second and Walnut Streets, a reconstruction of the favorite watering hole of America's founding fathers. There we had a bit of coffee to ward off the chill and some dessert to ward off the munchies.

The tavern was our last stop, for the children still had their homework to do. Retrieving our car and our baggage at the hotel, we headed back to suburbia. But since we hadn't even come close to scratching off all the places on our wish list, we will return.

With apologies to Chicago, Philadelphia is our kind of town.

COMMENTARY

Alaska Highway was engineering marvel

By Albert N. Garland

Even as the U.S. and British military staffs began their detailed planning for Operation TORCH, the U.S. Corps of Engineers were nearing the end of the first phase of one of its major war-time construction efforts — the Alaska, or Alcan, Highway.

Al Garland

U.S. governmental agencies had examined several times since 1930 proposals for a highway linking the U.S. with Alaska. Before Pearl Harbor, the U.S. War Department, in commenting on the proposals, could find little or no immediate military utility in such a highway.

In 1941, however, the War Department changed its mind and now looked at such a highway as serving two purposes — a logistical land line to Alaska, and a support for a string of air staging facilities between the U.S. and Alaska, a project approved some time earlier and one that was taking on increasing importance. (Between 1942 and 1944, for example, the U.S. alone constructed eight flight strips at points along the highway. In 1943, a monthly average of 440 aircraft actually traversed the route; many of these were intended for the Russians.)

In early 1942, Canadian officials gave their blessings to the idea and agreed for the U.S. to conduct a survey of the proposed route and the construction of a pioneer road that would be needed in connection with the survey.

On Feb. 14, 1942, the Corps of Engineers were instructed to begin the necessary work and to construct a pioneer road from a start point near Fort St. John in British Columbia (later moved south to Dawson Creek), through the Yukon Territory, to Boundary, Alaska. The U.S. assumed the responsibility for and the whole cost of maintaining the highway, which would be turned over to Canada at the end of the war (On July 19, 1943, the highway was officially named the Alaska Highway.)

The first contingent of U.S. troops reached Dawson Creek on March 16, 1942. The engineer forces was soon built up to seven regiments — three of which were Negro units — reinforced by ponton, survey, and other units, totaling 394 officers and 10,765 enlisted men. In the later half of 1942, the engineer troops were reinforced by some 7,500 civilians from a construction organization working under the U.S. Public Roads Administration.

On Oct. 25, 1942, the lead driver of the Negro 97th Engineers and the lead driver of the white 18th Engineers finally broke through and touched blades, marking the closing of the last gap in the pioneer road.

The project itself, evidencing something of the early American pioneer spirit as it cut through ice hills and muskeg swamps in a race against time, captured the American imagination in a way few other projects did in the early summer of 1942.

Overall, the completed road — 1,428 miles between Dawson Creek and Big Delta, Alaska — was a tremendous engineering achievement and a tribute to U.S.-Canadian cooperation. Few projects could match the complexity and enormity of the task of putting the highway through virgin forests within established time limits and in the face of transportation handicaps, muskeg and ice, and thaws, washouts, landslides, freezing temperatures, and other weather problems.

On April 1, 1946, the U.S. officially transferred to the Canadian government that portion of the highway in Canada in an appropriate ceremony at Whitehorse.

This year, the U.S. Postal Service has issued a commemorative Alaska Highway stamp. It is still available at several local post offices, as is a sheet of 20 stamps commemorating 1941 events connected with World War II.

Al Garland writes columns for The Benning Leader occasionally.

Are women physically, mentally ready for war?

■ Second of two parts

By Ralph Puckett

A presidential commission will soon submit its report to the president on the roles women should fill in our military forces. Part 1 contained views of some of the people who recommend that no distinction be made between the assignment of men and women. Since promotion chances are enhanced by command experience, those supporters of that position stress that in the name of fairness women should have the same opportunity for advancement as men.

Part 1 also listed the major objections voiced by those who oppose the assignment of women to ground combat units. Those allegations with ideas for resolving the conflicts are discussed in Part 2.

First is the question as to whether women have the required physical strength. (Brian Mitchell, author of "Weak Link: The Feminization of the American Military," writes that tests have shown that 97 percent of the women in the Army do not have the strength required for "very heavy work.") There should be established for each Military Occupational Specialty (MOS) and position a set of minimum physical requirements which would govern the assignment of any individual, male or female, to that position. There appears to be no insurmountable reason why an adequate test of a person's physical capability cannot be devised. Those individuals, male and female, who meet the strength qualifications will have met a portion of the requirements for a combat unit assignment.

The second area, psychological and emotional suitability, is far more difficult to determine. Perhaps the psychologists, psychiatrists, and sociologists can come up with something. When those teams are put together, they should include (and listen to) some other experts — those who as infantrymen have experienced combat at the bayonet and grenade level. Those individuals who meet the requirements will have passed the next hurdle to a combat unit assignment.

The third area of concern is the difficulty, if not inability, for men to accept women simply as peers, superiors or subordinates, rather than as females. Our culture has inculcated in many males and, perhaps to a lesser degree, some females, the belief that women are to be protected, flirted with, treated as "sex objects," or dominated by males. That opinion can be inhibited or diminished through education, indoctrination, and command influence. Whether it can be lowered to negligible levels is questionable.

Panel advises against women in land combat

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — Women in the military should be allowed to serve on some warships but continue to be barred both from ground fighting and combat missions in Air Force and Navy aircraft, a presidential commission recommended Tuesday.

The 15-member commission on the assignment of women in the armed forces strongly supported retaining the ban on land combat but defied expectations in its 8-7 vote to keep the current policy on air missions.

The panel voted 8-6 with one abstention to repeal existing laws and modify service policies on women serving on combatant vessels. They recommended retaining the current ban on women aboard submarines and amphibious vessels but allowing them to serve for the first time to serve on fighting ships that seek out the enemy, like destroyers, frigates and aircraft carriers.

That vote came after an appeal from the commission's chairman, retired Gen. Robert T. Herres that the panel not to totally accept the status quo.

"A great number of people will not believe we credibly considered these issues" without some concession to changing times, the former vice chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff told the President Bush-appointed group.

The votes on air and sea combat came in the afternoon, following the return of four members who walked out of the morning session to stress their view that there should be no expanded role for women in the military. A fifth man with similar views boycotted the morning meeting.

The recommendation said the Air Force and Navy should retain and codify their prohibition of women on air combat missions in view of the "potential consequences of assigning women to combat positions."

The proposal was made by Air Force Reserve Sgt. Sarah F. White, who deplored that there "are women willing to kill or be killed to promote equal opportunity."

Other opponents spoke of dangers to the national security if women pilots are captured and the possible negative effects of women on the cohesion of fighter pilot units.

The panel earlier voted 8-2 that women should be excluded from direct land combat units. However, it added that service secretaries should recommend to Congress what units and positions should fall under land combat exclusion.

That vote, which gave the services greater leeway in defining what comprises modern-day fighting, came after the panel voted 3-7 to reject a proposal that the Army specifically review three fields — air defense artillery, combat army engineers and field artillery — for exemption from the combat ban. The three votes in favor were cast by women. All seven men voting opposed it.

"It was clear from the vote that the majority does not want women in direct land combat," said commissioner Newton N. Minow.

"There are a couple of borderline activities which are debatable," he said. "Rather than trying to micro-manage, the commission is saying to the secretaries that it's better to take another look."

The role of women in the military has been a prominent issue since the Persian Gulf War, when 35,000 women served — some in non-combat air and sea units.

The Pentagon now keeps all women, who comprise about 11 percent of the uniformed services, out of direct combat. A poll the panel commissioned from the Roper organization found that 57 percent of the military favor continuing that policy while 42 percent oppose it.

Are women physically, mentally ready for war?

Coincidentally with this inability to accept women as equals is the detrimental impact that women may have on the male bonding which is vital to success in any combat unit and, particularly, in an infantry unit. Many studies indicate that men are motivated in combat primarily by the desire not to let their buddies down, by the desire to show themselves as men and all that the term connotes. Success and failure often hinge on this deeply rooted driving force; we eliminate or circumscribe this motivation at our peril.

There are physiological differences between men and women. Often these differences have been dismissed with the statement that separate physical facilities can be provided and the physiological differences will have been surmounted. The question is much more complex. For just one example, picture the male paratrooper on his way from Fort Bragg to Panama. Imagine the difficulty he has in urinating into a milk carton during the lengthy flight while he is rigged for a combat jump. Now, imagine the difficulty for a female.

Finally, is the American public ready to accept women casualties in the substantial numbers which would result from the assignment of women to ground combat units? The casualties in future conflicts may be high. If women are assigned to ground combat units, particularly infantry, a large number of those casualties will be females. The Congress has shield away from this subject; they have not educated the public as to the probable outcome if women are assigned to ground combat units.

There can be little doubt that the selection of the best qualified people to fill combat units and, in particular, the leadership of those units will have a profound impact on their combat effectiveness. Consequently, a carefully considered resolution of the question, "Should women serve in ground combat units?" is of paramount importance. Should we risk the possibly disastrous diminution in combat effectiveness and the concomitant higher casualties and lost battles? The decision should not be one into which we have drifted because of the pressures of politics and emotional arguments which have little rational support. Remember — social engineering is not the reason we have an army. The purpose of an army is to fight! We forget that at our peril.

Private sector receptive to retiring soldiers

From wire reports

ORLANDO, Fla. — Retired U.S. Army Captain Kelly Lowe had doubts about his return to the civilian work force. "I didn't have any profit or loss experience," said Lowe of his 10-year military career. "In the Army we just worked with budget constraints. ... We never worried about maximizing output to make money."

But as a 33-year-old manager trainee for KFC fast food- restaurants in Orlando, Lowe has found that the private sector often is willing to hire well-trained soldiers.

"We have brought in a number of folks from the military over the years," said Richard Lovely, director of human resources for KFC's South division. "They have a lot of strong leadership skills, and they often deal with supervising employees in all kinds of situations."

Indeed, more than 4,200 employers with jobs to offer have contacted the Army through its Army Employer Network.

The network is comprised of 54 job assistance centers at Army bases throughout the world. At the centers, Army personnel deliver job leads to colleagues who have been trained for the job hunt.

"We do an extensive marketing of the program within the Army," said Harold Ericksen, an Army job assistance center manager at Fort Benning. "They (exiting servicemen) are required to listen to what is available to them."

Thousands of military personnel like Lowe have opted to retire early from the Army as shrinking defense budgets and the realities of a post-Cold War world have reduced the nation's need for armed forces.

"They (the Army) were offering quite a few incentives to get out — monetary and benefit incentives that were real attractive to me and my wife," Kelly said. "They got more people to volunteer than they needed."

Civilian jobs are advertised through a national computerized job bank established by the Army last year and through publications such as Army Times, where Lowe discovered the KFC job.

"We have brought in a number of folks from the military over the years," said Richard Lovely, director of human resources for KFC's South division. "They have a lot of strong leadership skills, and they often deal with supervising employees in all kinds of situations."

Peter Morales, an employment and recruitment supervisor with the city of Orlando, said many of these former servicemen simply need help in translating their resumes into civilian terms.

"A lot of military folks spend 10 or 15 years inside and they have no idea of what was going on the outside," Morales said. "Then the next day you get a letter that says, 'Hey Charlie, you have to go.' And you say, 'Wow!' "

Unfortunately, the military's cutbacks have come at a time when shrinking defense funding has hurt industries that once provided an abundant supply of jobs.

The aerospace industry historically has thrived on military talent, but hiring in this sector has all but ceased.

"We are suffering the same cutbacks that the Department of Defense is going through," said Bruce Czarniak, chief of staffing for human resources with Martin Marietta Corp., based in Bethesda, Md. "We are trying to find jobs for our own employees."

In Central Florida, the Army has been promoting its employment program through word-of-mouth efforts that have included presentations to Rotary clubs, chamber of commerces and large employers.

When employers are able to hire, exiting military personnel often discover a corporate world that values the same kind of discipline and skills acquired through the Army experience.

"They (KFC) have put a lot money and time into figuring out what are the best ways of doing things," Lowe said. "As far as dealing with people, I'm dealing with the same kind of people that I dealt with in the military."

Larue loves his excellent adventures

Knee injury an obstacle he couldn't overcome

By Jerry Rutledge
Leader Editor

Cpl. William Larue has lived his life like a big adventure. He's considered no obstacle too great, no objective too difficult to be attained.

But Larue's latest challenge has brought him up short, if only briefly. After four years in the United States Army that included action in Operation Just Cause with the 3rd Battalion, 75th Ranger Regiment, Larue finds himself facing another adventure — civilian life.

A knee injury suffered during preparations for the invasion of Panama (Just Cause) has forced the young New Mexican out of the service and into the everyday world. He's facing this challenge like all of the others — head-on.

"I have some apprehensions, but I'm glad in some ways," Larue said. "I've been in the Army for a little over four years, two months longer than I thought I would be. But I've really enjoyed it. I like the Army quite well.

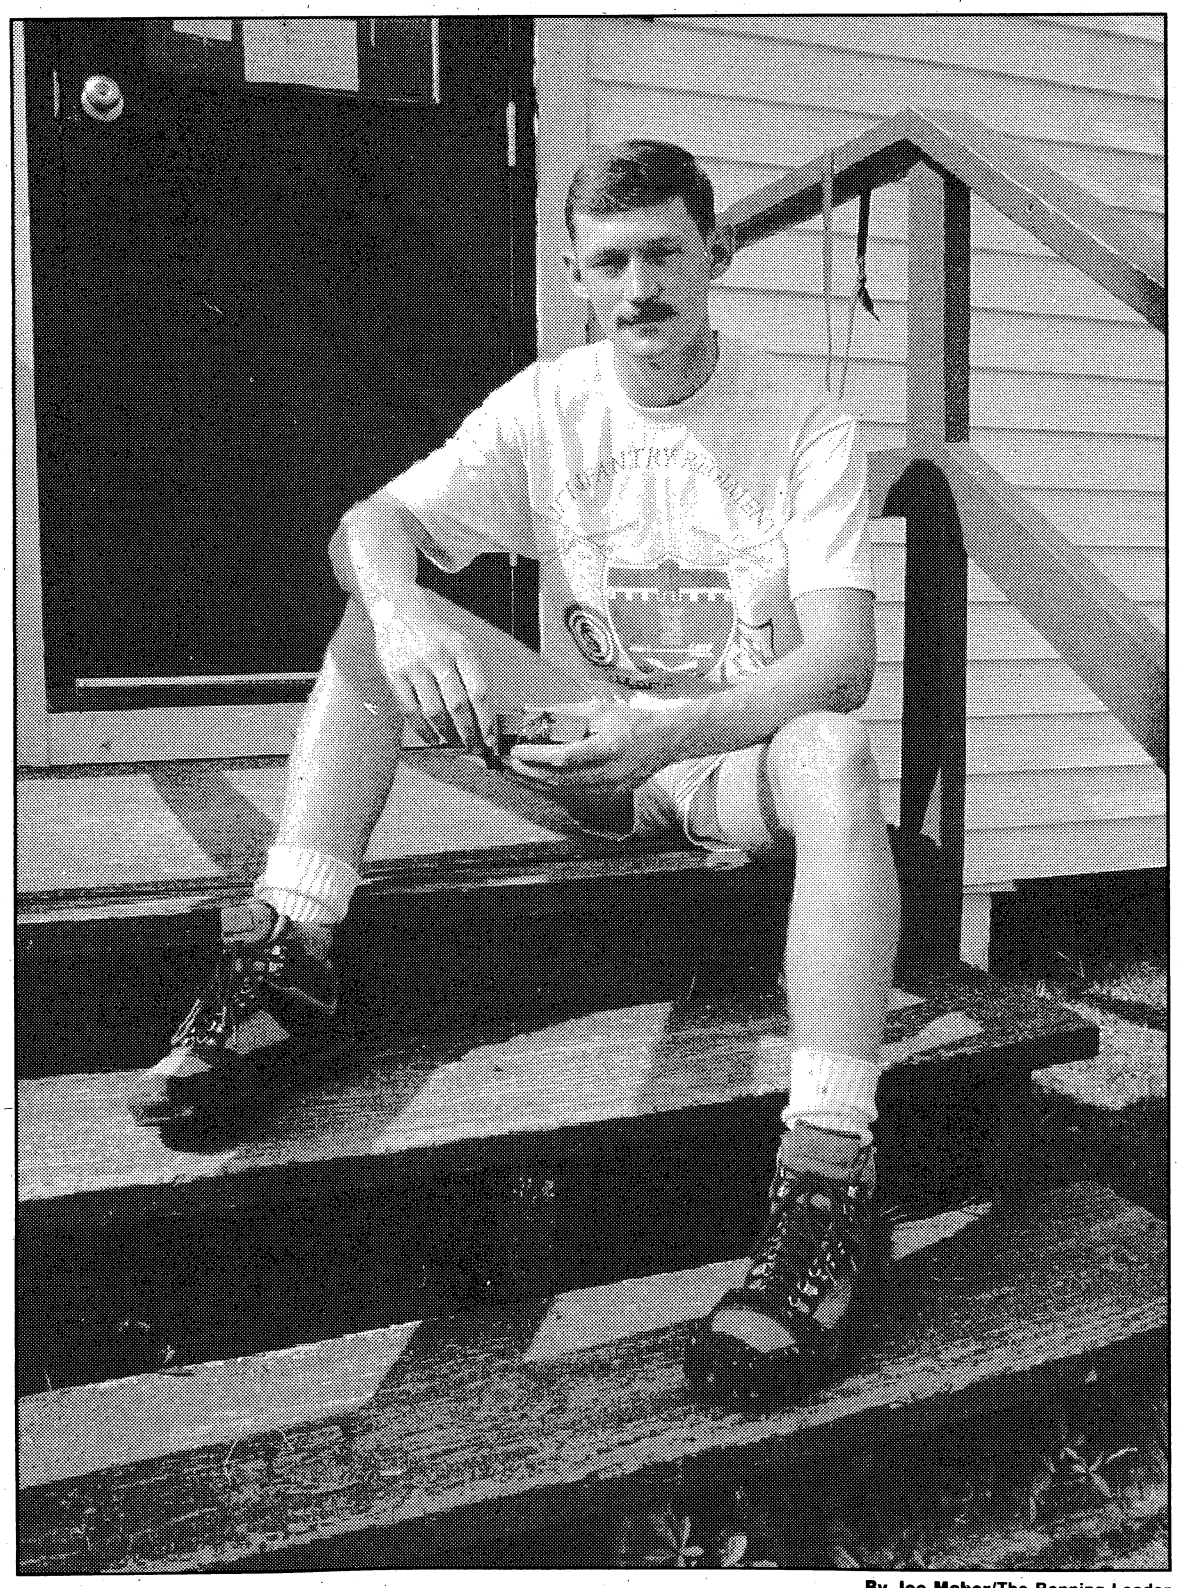
"In a lot of ways, I wish I could stay in (the Army)," said Larue. "But with the injuries and such I've suffered since I've been in the service I'm not able to. It's been a really good experience."

"In a lot of ways, I wish I could stay in. But with the injuries and such I've suffered since I've been in the service I'm not able to. It's been a really good experience."

Larue enjoyed all the rigors and demands of Army life. After OSUT (One Station Unit Training) and airborne training, he joined the Rangers. Life in the 3/75th was the kind of tough, high-speed duty Larue was looking for when he joined the Army less than a year earlier.

But a mishap in late 1989 would change his Army career. Larue had injured his knee several months before, but dislocation of his left knee cap during preparation for Operation Just Cause inflicted major damage.

"We call it 3-to-5 second rush," said Larue. "We jump up (and) run for about 3 seconds and then jump back down. The idea is to get down before enemy fire can find you. It was while diving down behind a tree for cover that I hit my knee."



By Joe Maher/The Benning Leader

Cpl. William Larue has received rave reviews for his soldiering and his renovation work on Viale Hall at the OCS battalion.

The Rangers were already anticipating being sent to Panama, where Manuel Noriega was taking over the government despite losing a legal election. Despite his injuries, Larue dismissed the pain and made a night jump on Dec. 20, 1989, when he entered Rio Hata with the 3rd Battalion.

"I didn't know how severe the injury was, for one thing," said Larue. "So I continued on with my job through all of Panama and through the conflict in the desert (Desert Storm), although I didn't deploy — we trained and prepared a great deal."

It was during Desert Storm that an Army reserve doctor — Maj. Arnie Sheller, team doctor for the National Basketball Association's Boston Celtics — examined Larue's left knee, which was giving him extreme discomfort.

What Dr. Sheller found was not good.

"He came to my unit to look all the guys over and he saw me and decided to operate at that point," said Larue. "He told me at that point I needed to get out of the Rangers and get a desk job. That's how bad it was."

Larue's injuries forced him out of the Rangers. Larue was reassigned to the Officer Candidate School (OCS) Battalion pending a medical board. Shortly after the reassignment, the 3rd Battalion (OCS), 11th Infantry received permission to renovate a building on post for a new battalion headquarters.

Larue, who had done a little contracting work back home in Aztec, N.M., was one of two soldiers selected to oversee the project by Command Sgt. Maj. Gerald Goodman of the 3/11th. "I selected him because of his attitude," said Goodman. "From his background, I knew he had done some work like that and he was willing to give it a shot.

"I really didn't expect him to have those skills," he added. "He did a real professional job. Larue did a better job than some of the contractors we have had around here (Fort Benning) lately. He is a good soldier — innovative and self-motivated and that makes the best kind of soldier. I wish we could have kept him here."

"He did a real professional job," said Command Sgt. Maj. Gerald Goodman of the 3/11th. "He is a good soldier — innovative and self-motivated and that makes the best kind of soldier. I wish we could have kept him here."

The renovation of what is now Viale Hall took five months and only $5,000 worth of supplies, quite a savings for the Army. Viale Hall was selected for the small unit Training and Doctrine Command Community of Excellence award.

Away from the job Larue used his skills to do charity work for Santa's Castle, donating two afternoons a week repairing remote control cars and small electronic toys so that underprivileged kids can have toys come Christmas next month.

Larue plans to take his time jumping into the great adventure called civilian life. He plans to take the next two months and live as unstructured an existence as possible.

"I'm going to go down to the (Florida) Keys and go scuba diving for a month, partially for fun and partially for therapy. It's the best thing for my leg," said Larue. "It's been about six weeks since my last operation and I'm still at the point where I need a lot of therapy.

"After that I'm going to work my way back home (New Mexico) and get there before Christmas. Got to take a few months to spend with the family." A trip to southern California with some friends and a sojourn to Alaska are also in the plans. "I want to travel because I don't know what I want to do when I grow up," he said.

Larue says earning a college degree is high priority in the future, subject matter to be determined. But he doubts if any civilian experience will measure up to his four years in the United States Army.

"This has been the time of most growth in my life," Larue said. "The many different experiences I've had — the travel to different places in the world. The Army puts a person into an environment that maybe only an athlete would experience. Working real close with buddies under extreme physical stress. You get a chance to see things within other human beings as well as within yourselves. I'll miss that."

These simulators are so real that you can feel the vibrations of your tank or Bradley, hear its engine, and listen to "command net" radio as you ride into battle, knowing that the enemy — also via computer simulation — is out there somewhere, ready to zap you.

Soldiers go to war with SIMNET

Staff Writer

Look for more and more simulated training by the Army in the coming days of shrinking Pentagon budgets, escalating equipment costs, fuel and other in-the-field expenses.

Already, at Fort Benning's SIMNET Training Center, you can climb into a Bradley Fighting Vehicle's cockpit or the turret of an M1A1 Abrams Tank (both are simulators very close to what the interiors of these vehicles are like) and "fight" a sophisticated enemy via computers. SIMNET is the Army acronym for Simulations Networking.

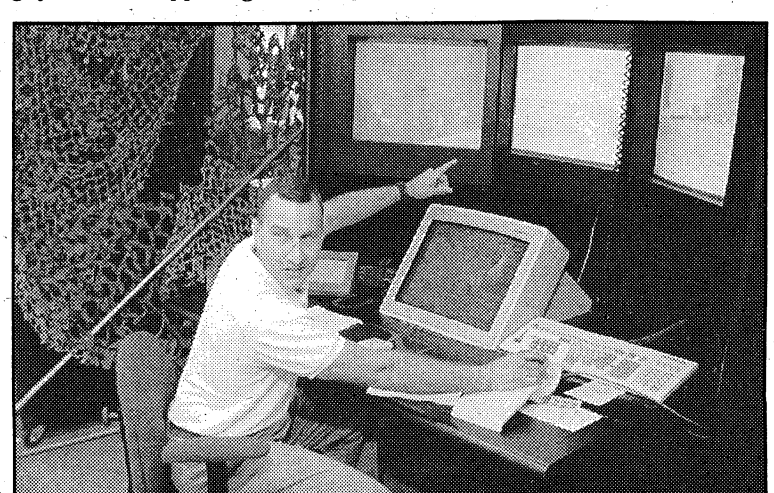
This battle, which might remind you of the games you play on your home video equipment, is much more complicated. It will become even more sophisticated as the center's role in the new Dismounted Warfighting Center at Fort Benning takes shape.

These simulators are so real that you can feel the vibrations of your tank or Bradley, hear its engine, and listen to "command net" radio as you ride into battle, knowing that the enemy — also via computer simulation — is out there somewhere, ready to zap you just as you're ready to "laze" (shoot with a laser) him. A driver, gunner or tank/Bradley commander can operate in these simulators together.

At a "Stealth" control center, a company — and occasionally even a battalion — commander can watch the battle develop, even to being able to form his "logistics train" and tell it where to go and how to get there. The commander can watch the good guys and the opposing force, tape the battle scenario and later go back and tell even an individual tank commander where he screwed up — or what he did right.

Earlier this week, an Advanced Noncommissioned Officer Course class was going through a mock battle on these simulators and computers. There are 23 simulators, including 10 M1A1 tanks and 13 Bradley Fighting Vehicles.

Sgt. 1st Class Irven Ferguson, an ANCO instructor, on Wednesday, was the "company commander" for one of those classes, with three platoons under him, fighting across a piece of the terrain at the National Training Center at Fort Irwin, Calif., which was pre-programmed into the SIMNET computers.



By Joe Maher/The Benning Leader

Mark Baker monitors the action at SIMNET.

Rick Wagner, a civilian contract employee, was running the "opposing force" — a "Soviet" motorized rifle company.

From either man's console, an observer could watch Ferguson's Bradleys (the simulated variety) line up, move out, shoot and die during the early stages of the battle as it rolled across the Mojave Desert. The armored vehicles the soldiers in the simulators were driving appeared on the computer screens as what looked like Bradleys made from Tinker Toys.

There are other advantages, too, said Ferguson, a 22-year Army veteran who is only 38 days from retirement. "I think this (SIMNET training) is a good asset all the way around, not just for using before we take the troops to the field," he said. "It doesn't cost the Army anything for these guys, since the Army already has the equipment. It doesn't cost anything if these guys make mistakes and it doesn't cost the Army anything for these (computer-generated) bullets."

How realistic is this simulator training?

It's real enough that a couple of "players," in a dramatic argument over who did what from his simulator, "ended up on the floor trading punches," said Mark Baker, the operations manager.

Listen to the radio traffic from the troops in these mock-up machines and it sounds an awful lot like what you hear in a tactical operations center at the NTC.

What's its future, given the creation of the Dismounted Warfighting Battle Laboratory?

Having the Battle Lab at Fort Benning will probably "enhance" the SIMNET Warfighting Center's abilities, said Bill Potter, the site manager. That could mean newer, better equipment, and computer links to other battle labs across the country where pitched battles involving artillery, infantry, helicopters and even Air Force planes could be fought simultaneously.

Column will keep AUSA members informed

This is the first weekly column to provide you information about activities and events of the Chattahoochee Valley-Fort Benning Chapter of the Association of the United States Army (AUSA). A special word of thanks to the Columbus Ledger-Enquirer,a corporate AUSA member, for making this possible.

AUSA National Convention: The AUSA national convention was held in Washington, D.C., Oct. 11-15. Our chapter received four national level awards. In addition to being designated as a Merit Chapter, we received for the second straight year the Council of Trustees award for the chapter with over 1,100 members Most Active in Pursuit of AUSA Objectives. These awards attest to the quality of service of chapter members and that our chapter is "not only doing things right, but doing the right things." Other recognition included the chapter contribution to the Institute of Land Warfare and our World War II commemoration program.

New E-1 through E-4 membership program: The AUSA Council of Trustees has approved a special membership rate for junior enlisted soldiers (grades E-1 through E-4) that gives them the option to choose between a $22 membership with ARMY magazine or a $10 membership without ARMY magazine. All other privileges of membership are the same. I encourage all eligible soldiers, active and reserve components, to take advantage of this professional opportunity. WW II 50TH ANNIVERSARY

Fifty years ago this week, the Allied invasion of French North Africa, known as Operation Torch, under the overall control of Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower, began successfully in three main areas. The Western Task Force, commanded by Gen. George S. Patton, swept through Casablanca where French forces sympathetic to the Germans quickly rethought their political preferences and threw down their arms. The Center Task Force, led by Gen. Lloyd Fredendall, captured the city of Oran. The Eastern Task Force, commanded by Gen. Charles W. Ryder, landed at Algiers. Allied forces sustained 1,800 casualties in the initial phases.

Here, according to research by the Military History Division at Fort Benning, were the top news items of the week:

■

On Guadalcanal, the 1st Marine Division began attacks on the east main perimeter, successfully dispersing Japanese forces at Koli Point.

■

In North Africa, Allied forces, commanded by Field Marshall Bernard Montgomery, pursued the Afrika Korps from Egypt into Libya. The new Zealand Division led the pursuit as units from the British 1st and 7th Armored divisions entered Toburk.

■

On the Eastern Front, German Gen. Friedrick von Paulus launched his last major attack against Soviet forces at Stalingrad. The larger German forces inadvertently dispersed, allowing Soviet small unit tactics to prevail.

■

In New Guinea, Australian advances forced a hasty Japanese withdrawal across the Kumusi River which left 600 dead including Japanese commander Gen. Horii. The retreat signaled the collapse of organized Japanese resistance in New Guinea.

■

Despite disadvantages in terms of armaments, the Indian minesweeper Bengal and the tanker Ondina sunk the Japanese merchant raider Hokoku Maru and drove off the Aikoku Maru.

■

Fort Benning prepared for an even larger influx of soldiers as President Franklin D. Roosevelt lowered the draft age from 20 to 18 years old. Estimates placed the U.S. armed forces at the 10,000,000 men mark by the end of 1943.

Victims of clergy abuse speaking out

From wire reports

Grieving, ashamed, emotionally shattered, they suffer alone. A trusted ally had betrayed them. They assumed it hardly ever happened to anyone else. It was too awful even to mention. So they kept silent.

But now they're finding they are not alone, that many others have been subjected to clergy sexual abuse, that it's widespread. So they're increasingly speaking out about it.

"People are being freed up to come forth," said Jeanne Miller of Palatine, Ill., president and executive director of a new organization, Victims Of Clergy Abuse Linkup, or VOCAL.

The group hopes to give victimized families the confidence to "vocalize" their suffering by getting them to band together and to realize they're not isolated cases. Another goal is to prevent such future abuse.

"There's a whole backlog of people who have never had their injuries resolved," Ms. Miller said in an interview. "They thought they couldn't talk about it. They've suffered in silence for decades with no support system, turning in on themselves."

VOCAL (P.O. Box 1268, Wheeling, Ill. 60090) held its first national conference in Chicago Oct. 16-18, drawing about 300 people from across the country. Ms. Miller said about 3,000 others are launching VOCAL chapters in 25 cities.

Speakers included Jason Berry of New Orleans, a Roman Catholic and investigative writer whose new Doubleday book, "Lead Us Not Into Temptation," documents about 400 cases of priests sexually molesting youngsters.

Ms. Miller said studies indicate 3 percent to 6 percent of 52,000 priests — 1,500 to 3,000 of them — are pedophiles with a pathological sexual fixation on children and that a pedophile typically abuses 273 youngsters in a lifetime.

Pedophilia is an "addictive illness" and most child molesters "are repeat offenders," Barry says. He says settling such cases so far has cost the U.S. Catholic church about $400 million.

"No wonder we're seeing more and more cases," Ms. Miller said. "Each of these guys have taken scores of victims. More and more people are coming forth that have been silent for so long.

Ms. Miller, a paralegal worker, a Catholic with a master's degree in theology and a mother of four, said the new organization mainly involves two categories of sexual victims: Women church members in vulnerable situations who seek counseling from their ministers but are sexually exploited, and children, taught that priests represent goodness and God, but who are sexually abused by them.

Barry cites a study of 3,000 mainline Protestant ministers, most married, that found 13 percent said they have had adulterous relationships with women church members.

Both for the vulnerable woman and the vulnerable child, "it's a breach of trust," Ms. Miller said. "It's a violation of sacred-psychological trust. It reaches further into the psyche that any other kind of breach because it's an exploitation of power that gets its authority from a higher plane."

She said that both Protestant ministers and Catholic priests vowed to celibacy are held in "reverence and respect" and when that trust is broken, it shatters "your entire faith system.

"Your faith system is locked into everything you do in life, the way you approach your family and all your other relationships. When that whole faith system is short-circuited, it's like total destruction of the psyche.

"People have a hard time coming back from that. You no longer have a belief system in place anymore. Every facet of life has to be reconstructed in every way — if you have the strength to put it back together."

Ms. Miller, who says one of her own sons was sexually abused by a priest, said it had brought on a "profound grieving and a loss of belief, trust, a loss of many things. But religion was too important to abandon."

She went back to college, getting an advanced theology degree.

She said the prolonged, devastating effects of such abuse "has a lot to do with the way we were conditioned as Christians. In our belief, the highest virtue was to forgive, to turn the other cheek, to suffer in silence.

Horses and riders will be jumping for glory at the Steeplechase at Callaway Gardens Saturday.

Steeplechase at Callaway leaps into action Saturday

By Sandra Okamoto
Staff Writer

"We are very excited about this year's Steeplechase," said Mason Lampton. Lampton, who first organized the Steeplechase at Callaway Gardens in 1985, sounds like a rejuvenated man. The Eighth Steeplechase will be Saturday with gates opening at 10 a.m. and post time at 1 p.m.

"We're feeling a surge of recovery in sponsorship," he said. For the past two years, he's noticed a "shrinking in sponsorship" as local companies tightened their budgets.

"We're seeing a big improvement. We've had tremendous response from the people of Columbus."

In the past seven years, more than $680,000 have been given to arts groups in Columbus, Pine Mountain and LaGrange. Those benefiting from the Steeplechase are the Columbus Museum, Columbus Symphony Orchestra, Historic Columbus Foundation, Springer Opera House, the Ida Cason Callaway Foundation, Lamar Dodd Art Center at LaGrange College and the Chattahoochee Valley Art Museum in LaGrange.

"We don't care how you're dressed," Lampton said. "We just want you there to have a good time. Come with a good crowd of friends and enjoy yourself."

Race director Sue Anne Baker says she's hoping younger people and families will discover how much fun attending a Steeplechase is.

■

Something new this year is a "rail pass." With this, you can "rent" a space for your car (must be under seven-feet high) at a rail (in designated spots, of course), where you can view the races.

The $100 package includes a car pass ($10), six passes to the infield ($60) and $30 for the rail space rent. But call (324-6252) to make a reservation — your space will be held until 12:30 p.m. Saturday.

Or you can go the budget route — for you and a date, it'll cost $30 — $10 car pass and $20 for two infield tickets.

If your checkbook is healthier, then you can spend $35 for a seat in one of the Top-of-the-Turn boxes.

Steeplechase at Callaway Gardens leaps into action Saturday

Mo' money? You can go for one of the boxes. For $425, you can get a Terrace box that seats six people on the stretch and includes preferred parking, a pre-Chase party with hors d'oeuvres and open bar before the races. A cash bar is available during the races and during the post-Chase celebration which features a dance band.

For $200, you can get a Top-of-the-Turn box that seats six people. For an extra $10 per person, you can go to the above-mentioned post-Chase dance. Parking is at the front gate; complimentary shuttle is provided.

To reserve the infield rail package or the boxes, you must do it before 4 today.

But if you tend to procrastinate, you may still be able to get a box or infield rail package Saturday morning. Just ask at the ticket booth.

■

Saturday's Steeplechase will be the third leg of the $1 million Sport of Kings Challenge. The series began at Belmont Park on Oct. 9, then went to Far Hills, N.J. on Oct. 24. After Saturday's race, it moves to Leopardstown, Ireland; Cheltenham, England and Chepstow, Wales.

The Sport of Kings Challenge is a steeplechase series designed to link horsemen on both sides of the Atlantic. Now in its fifth year, the Challenge was developed by the International Steeplechase Group, an organization dedicated to the perpetuation of amateur racing and promoting the sport of steeplechasing.

Like the Triple Crow in flat racing, the series of six races is open to three-year-olds and upward which have not won a race over hurdles or steeplechase fences before July 13,1991.

Delta Air Lines will sponsor the Novice Stakes race. The course will be 2⅜ miles over national fences for a purse of $50,000. Both the Belmont Park and Far Hills races features purses of $50,000 each.

On Nov. 29, the series moves to Fairhouse Race Course in Europe just outside Dublin, Ireland for the Sport of Kings Hurdle, a two-mile race over hurdles, with a purse of 15,000 pounds.

The Mercury Communications Hurdle in Cheltenham will be the site of the next European leg in the series on Dec. 12. The Cheltenham course, located in the northern outskirts of Cheltenham, Gloucestershire (100 miles west of London) will be 2 miles over hurdles, featuring a purse of 10,000 pounds.

The final leg of the Challenger series will be in Chepstow on Dec. 28, with the Racing International Hurdle, two miles over hurdles, featuring a purse of 10,000 pounds.

Gen. Carl Stiner, commander-in-chief of the U.S. Army's Special Operations command, speaks Wednesday at opening ceremonies for the CISM shooting competition.

Soldiers from around world arrive at Benning for CISM

By Linda Bosley Dailey
Staff Writer

Over 300 soldiers from 26 countries including the United States have arrived at Fort Benning in the last two weeks to begin competing in an annual international military shooting match.

The marksmanship contest is one of the 22 sports competitions held each year by the Conseil International du Sports Militaire. CISM, founded in 1947, is an international military sports federation based in Brussels, Belgium.

Hosted by Fort Benning and the U.S. Army Marksmanship Unit, which is based here, the competition was last held here in 1983.

The shooting matches consist of rifle and pistol contests for both men and women.

The competitors should take pride in their individual marksmanship accomplishments and in representing their respective nations in competition, Gen. Carl Stiner, commander-in-chief of the U.S. Army's Special Operations command, said during his address at the opening ceremonies Wednesday morning.

"But more important, you can be proud to be taking part in a peaceful competition," Stiner added. "The growth of CISM is representative of the growth of democratic nations around the world."

Among the nations are four first-time participants — Bulgaria, Russia, Slovenija and Czechoslovakia, said Sgt. 1st Class Mark Kauder, assistant international coordinator of the AMU.

Most of the international competitors arrived Monday. Practice sessions were held Tuesday and Wednesday. The competition got under way yesterday and continues through Monday. The closing ceremony is set for Tuesday, and the competitors are scheduled to leave Wednesday.

"It has been a massive post-wide effort," to host the competition here, said Maj. Harold Grooms, CISM project officer with the marksmanship unit.

The matches are being held at two new ranges at Fort Benning.

The new Pool International Shooting Complex incorporates a newly built indoor range and the outdoor rifle range adjacent to it, formerly called Hook Range, said Lt. Col Bob Aylward, the marksmanship unit's executive officer. And Phillips Range, a decades-old wooden structure, was recently razed and rebuilt. (Fort Benning's shotgun range has been redesignated Hook Range.)

All rifle matches, as well as the women's pistol matches, are being held at the Pool complex, while the men's pistol matches are being held at Phillips Range.

In addition to the shooting matches, CISM also hosts competitions in military, combat, individual and team sports. Among CISM's other contests are skiing, orienteering, parachuting, judo, cycling, basketball and soccer, as well as various pentathlons for ground troops and jet pilots.

CISM, whose motto is "friendship through sports," has 102 member nations, and usually holds the various competitions in different countries each year.

The CFC, an annual on-the-job solicitation, is the only federal employee-authorized method of fund-raising for recognized voluntary agencies.

School bus driver commended for quick thinking

A certificate of commendation was presented to Tammy Shier for exceptional performance of her duties as a school bus driver for the Fort Benning School System.

Shier is being commended for quick thinking and sound judgment demonstrated during an incident involving her bus on Oct. 1. She demonstrated concern for the safety of her passengers as she calmly and quickly reacted to a potentially dangerous situation.

As Shier was delivering her students from school to the Custer Terrace area, a power line fell across the hood of her bus. She quickly stopped the bus and removed the children to an area some distance from the bus. Shier then enlisted the aid of several soldiers on the scene to keep the children in a group while others lifted the power line so that she could drive the bus clear of the area. She then reloaded the students on the bus and delivered them home.

The award was presented to Shier by Dr. Rolla Baumgartner, Superintendent of Schools, during the Bus Driver Training Session which was held Oct. 30 at Dexter Elementary School. The training session is part of an ongoing program designed to keep bus drivers current on school bus safety and procedures.

CHILD SCREENINGS: Fort Benning parents of children ages 3 to 5 who live on post and have concerns about their child's development may have their child screened by the Fort Benning Schools through the Fort Benning Special Education Program.

This will be a covered dish affair. This will be the last meeting of the year. Bowling will be held at the PX Mall Alley from 5:30-7:30 p.m.

Rangers say goodbye to fallen commander

From staff reports

The U.S. Army promoted John Keneally to colonel Monday, the day his family and the family of Rangers gathered to say a goodbye that drifted like the notes of Taps through Marshall Auditorium in Fort Benning's Infantry Hall — final and yet lingering.

Keneally, who died with 11 other servicemen in an Oct. 29 helicopter crash in Utah, also posthumously was awarded a second Legion of Merit, for outstanding service as commander of the 3rd Ranger Battalion at Fort Benning. A Pentagon spokesman said a posthumous promotion "is not that unusual" if an officer is up for promotion.

"He served his country. He gave all he had," said 75th Ranger Regiment commander Col. David Grange.

The Air Force MH-60G Pave Hawk helicopter, a modified Blackhawk, crashed about 9:45 p.m. into the Great Salt Lake during rough weather, authorities said. All but one aboard was killed. The crash occurred 10 miles from Hill Air Force Base during a Special Operations training exercise. A spokesman with the Army Safety Center at Fort Rucker, Ala. said the Air Force is investigating the incident.

In addition to Kennealy, the crash also killed Lt. Col. Ken Stauss, commander of the 1st Ranger Battalion at Hunter Army Air Field near Savannah, Ga. and LaGrange native Sgt. 1st Class Harvey Lee Moore, who was assigned to Strauss' battalion. Moore was once a winner of Fort Benning's 'Best Ranger' competition.

The Army said last week that the helicopter, from Hurlburt Field, Fla., near Panama City, aws on a Joint Mobility Readiness Training mission when it crashed. The exercise involved patrols, raids, ambushes and live-fire exercises, a Hill spokesman said. The exercises involved the 1st Battalion of the 75th Ranger Regiment and the 160th Special Operations Aviation Regiment from Fort Campbell, Ky. Keneally was involved in evaluating the 1st Battalion's readiness when the crash occured.

The deaths of Keneally and Strauss left two of the three battalions in the 1,500-soldier 75th Ranger Regiment without commanding officers. The other unit — the 2nd Battalion — is based at Fort Lewis, Wash. Lt. Col Frank Kearney was named interim commander of the 3rd Battalion at Fort Benning last weekend with Lt. Col. Mick Bednarek being named interim commander of the 1st Battalion.

During Monday's memorial service, Sgt. Maj. Reginald Salinas said his fallen leader "was a man of substance." The sergeant major said that for years, soldiers will look to the 3rd Battalion as a good example and "for a soldier, there can be no greater legacy."

"He served his country. He gave all he had," said 75th Ranger Regiment commander Col. David Grange, Keneally's immediate superior. Grange said Keneally "commanded 700 of the finest warriors this country could muster" and that he had "deployed on this last mission because he had to."

Darrel Jannoy (58) and Chris Harris (78) of Hardaway bring down Spencer running back Maurece Williams during action last week.

Hardaway dumps Spencer

From staff reports

The Spencer Greenwave has its back pinned to the wall.

The Greenwave came into the 1992 high school football season hopeful for a berth in the Class AAA playoffs. After last week's 22-13 loss to the Hardaway Hawks, Spencer finds itself in a must-win situation tonight in a Region 3-AAA contest against Shaw at Memorial Stadium.

Spencer, 1-3 in the 3-AAA race and 4-4 in all games, will need wins over the Raiders and next week against unbeaten Peach County to force itself into the playoff picture.

Last week against Hardaway, the Greenwave had major problems stopping Hawk quarterback Jarvis Lipscomb. Their inability to stop the Hardaway leader and continuing scoring problems cost the game.

Lipscomb ran for two touchdowns and passed for another to lead Hardaway to victory. Spencer running back Maurece Williams found running room enough to score a pair of Greenwave touchdowns, but it wasn't nearly enough.

The Hawks took the lead in the first period when Lipscomb passed 9 yards to mark Johnson to take a 7-0 lead. After Spencer failed to move on its next possession, Hardaway's Willard Lipscomb returned the punt to the Greenwave 28 to set up another score.

Lipscomb got the touchdown, running through several tacklers on an 18-yard scoring run that put the Hawks on top 14-0 with 5:47 left in the half. Williams got Spencer back into the contest less than three minutes later with a 45-yard scoring run. The halftime score was Hardaway 14, Spencer 7.

The Greenwave had a chance to tie the score or take a lead with less than three minutes elapsed in the second half. Spencer marched downfield for its second touchdown, a 1-yard burst by Williams with 9:03 left in the third period. A try fr two points and the lead failed.

Former Army football coach Cahill dies at 73

From wire reports

SCHENECTADY, N.Y. — Tom Cahill, football coach at Army during the Vietnam War, has died of a heart attack. He was 73.

Cahill died Oct. 29 in the emergency room at Ellis Hospital in Schenectady after being stricken while bowling, hospital officials said.

Cahill, hired in 1959 by Earl "Red" Blaik to coach freshman football and baseball, was elevated to head coach in 1966 when Paul Dietzel suddenly resigned to take over at South Carolina.

Although Cahill wasn't the academy's first choice for the job, West Point officials changed their minds when he produced a winner.

Cahill guided the Cadets to an 8-2 mark in his first season, including an 11-0 triumph over Penn State in Joe Paterno's first year there. He was named 1966 Coach of the Year by the American Football Coaches and the Football Writers and Touchdown Club of Washington, D.C.

Suddenly, he was famous.

"Life can change so quickly," Cahill said that first season. "For 20 years I put my shoes on the same way, then all of a sudden people want to know — 'How does it look, Tom?' — people who never asked me anything before."

Army was 8-2 again in 1967 and 7-3 in 1968. Cahill closed out the 1960s with a 4-5-1 mark, a sign of the changing times ahead as opposition to the Vietnam War began to mount.

The war proved devastating to athletic recruiting at West Point and, with football powerhouses as Nebraska, Tennessee, Penn State and Notre Dame remaining on the Army schedule, the Cadets suffered on the field. Army lost to Nebraska in 1972 by a 77-7 score.

Cahill's 1970 squad went 1-9-1, was 6-4 in each of the following two seasons, and then went winless in 1973. It was the first time the team had failed to win a game since football began in 1890.

Prior to the season finale against Navy, West Point administrators assured reporters that Cahill would return as coach, no matter the outcome against the Midshipmen. However, after Navy won 51-0, the worst defeat in the history of the service-academy rivalry, Cahill was fired.

His coaching record at Army was 40-39-2 in eight years, including a 5-3 mark against Navy.

He later coached five seasons at Union College in Schenectady, where his teams were 12-27-1.

In 1984, Cahill returned to West Point and became a fixture in the press box at Michie Stadium as an analyst on the Army radio network. He was scheduled to broadcast Saturday's game against Eastern Michigan.

Cahill, born in 1919 in Fayetteville, N.Y., was a three-sport star in football, baseball and basketball at Niagara University. He graduated in 1942 and entered the Army as a second lieutenant, serving 28 months in the South Pacific during World War II.

Transition was the keyword last week as two Fort Benning units changed commanders in ceremonies at Dickman Field. (In the photo top right) Lt. Col. Michael A. Alex McKindra, center, takes command of the 2nd Battalion, 18th Infantry Regiment, 3rd Brigade, 24th Infantry Division (Mechanized) from Lt. Col. Eric Olson, right, while Col. School of Americas creating alumni association

By Daniel Maloney
School of the Americas

The School of the Americas (SOA) is establishing an alumni association open to all graduates of the school's 34 different Spanish-language, military courses.

According to Col. Jose R. Feliciano, commandant of SOA, the association will commence activities with the graduation of the School's Command and General Staff Course (CGSC) and the Combat Arms Advance Course (CAAC) in December.

As a multinational, Training and Doctrine Command (TRADOC) school, SOA teaches U.S. military tactics and doctrine to the countries of Latin America. Courses often parallel those at other U.S. installations, such as SOA's CGSC course, identical to the course at Fort Leavenworth.

The diversity of the student body and the curriculum create an environment where the classroom and the training sites become a place where cultural exchanges take place and lasting friendships are made.

In order to maintain these friendships, the association will act as a network of information and support for past, present and even future graduates of the school, especially when the graduates return to their respective countries with news of the association, Feliciano said.

Through the use of a newsletter and association reunions the practical application of the organization — cooperation and support among the countries of the Americas — will be achieved.

For Feliciano, the association means another opportunity to enhance the overall training and academic mission of the School of the Americas.

From the school's inception in 1946, through its move from Panama to Fort Benning and into the future, cultural exchange has always finished a close second to the primary mission of military training. An alumni association would allow a cultural exchange long after students left the school.

In addition, the association would be a lasting link to the school for Latin American military personnel after they retire from service and move into the civilian sector, much like the division association popular throughout the United States.

Although still in the planning phase, the school's alumni association would extend from the U.S. to all countries which comprise the Americas.

ISSUES

Military parts company finds new life after Cold War

From wire reports

STURBRIDGE, Mass. — In this defense-driven state, many corporate executives break into a cold sweat at the mere mention of the post-Cold War economy. Not William Hanley.

In less than 10 years, he has successfully weaned his fiber-optics company, Galileo Electro Optics Corp., from the once-secure military sector into the bruising world of commercial sales.

Where Galileo once focused on night-vision devices for the military, its repertoire now includes components for cameras, office copiers, laser printers, mammography machines and X-ray equipment.

"I think there's really a danger in locking yourself into a military market," Hanley said in a recent interview. "What if world peace breaks out? It did!"

When he took over as president and chief executive officer in 1984, some critics viewed him as a corporate heretic who had lost sight of easy Pentagon dollars.

The company, founded in 1959 with start-up money from the Army, was making 85 percent of its sales in military components during President Reagan's arms buildup. Today, about 15 percent of its $36 million in annual sales is military parts.

But the transition has not been painless.

The publicly-held company cut more than a third of its work force last year and lost $2.5 million. It now employs about 330 workers at its plants in Sturbridge and in Forrest, Va.

Hanley admits his changes were risky, but he says, "The rewards will be much greater."

Hanley is a stocky man who rushes through his plant's hallways like a football linebacker during his 50- to 60-hour workweeks. He started his glass-making career at Corning Inc. and later formed an appreciation for the high-tech end of the industry.

State officials are so impressed they have enlisted him to speak to other businesses seeking a niche in the "new world order."

American military spending for goods and services from the private sector peaked at $206 billion in 1987, said Steve Kosiak, an analyst for a nonprofit Washington research group called the Defense Budget Project.

This year, it is expected to drop to $185 billion.

COMMENTARY

Clinton should cut fat cats out of military

WASHINGTON — President-elect Bill Clinton has said he wants to put the military on a diet and trim the size of the operating forces. Why is it that trigger-pullers are the first to be fired and paper-pushers are last?

David Evans

Clinton might consider starting instead right here in Fat City, where an enormous, redundant and superfluous military bureaucracy remains stoutly entrenched.

This bureaucracy is so big that the biggest office building in the world, the Pentagon, houses less than a fifth of it — 20,000 people. However, according to the most recent statistics, there are 116,000 Defense Department civilian and uniformed military personnel in the so-called Greater Washington Metropolitan Area.

That's enough people to provide crews for seven Navy carrier battle groups. Not just the 5,000-man crews on the carriers, but also enough people to staff the cruiser, destroyer and submarine escorts and the accompanying logistics support vessels.

Those 116,000 personnel tied up in management overhead are enough to staff every tactical fighter wing in the Air Force.

The term "division slice" in the Army defines the total number of soldiers needed to put a combat division into the field, 25,000 troops, with all of their attendant support forces. Using the generally accepted figure of 42,000 troops for a division slice, the 116,000 bureaucrats in Washington comprise 2.7 "division slices," the rough equivalent of a three-division corps.

My favorite comparison: Those 116,000 military bureaucrats, sometimes referred to as "milicrats," are the equivalent of all the operating forces in the Marine Corps — every infantry battalion, artillery regiment, fighter squadron, engineer detachment and truck company.

Since Clinton as incoming commander-in-chief has never served in uniform, it's a fair bet that he doesn't know the difference between a battalion and a brigade. He needs to SEE this bloated host of military bureaucrats to appreciate the magnitude of the problem. Let them march in the inaugural parade, right past Clinton's reviewing stand. If that doesn't provide an incentive to start cutting overhead in the Defense Department, by half at least, nothing will.

For details, Staff Sgt. Hal Freeman at the famous 8th and Eye Street Marine Barracks was consulted. This barracks is home of the corps' premier ceremonial units, and the Marines there are experts on drill and ceremonies.

Freeman didn't miss a beat when he was asked to calculate the length of a column of 116,000 people, four abreast, and to figure out how long it would take them to march past a given point.

Those 116,000 military bureaucrats in Washington, sometimes referred to as "milicrats," are the equivalent of all the operating forces in the Marine Corps — every infantry battalion, artillery regiment, fighter squadron, engineer detachment and truck company.

"Yeah, four-abreast sounds appropriate. I'll get back to you in five minutes," he promised.

Starting with the secretary of defense and the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff in the first rank and going all the way down to the last and lowliest clerks, the Washington defense bureaucracy would make an unbroken column about 27.5 miles long.

Marching at the standard rate of 120 paces per minute, it would take all the people in this formation fully eight hours to pass Clinton's reviewing stand.

Even C-SPAN junkies would get bored watching this seemingly endless passage of assistant defense secretaries, deputy assistant defense secretaries, bureau chiefs, department heads, policy wonks, staff officers, analysts, aides and bean-counters.

To be sure, many of these people are highly dedicated. But in toto they comprise a powerful lobby that politicians fear as much as any other interest group in town.

Instead of forcing sergeants and petty officers out of the service, Clinton should take on the big guys. True reform of the military must start in Washington, not at some small base out in the hinterland.

Clinton's script has already been written. All he has to do is appropriate the world-wise insights of military officers who have served inside the system, such as these recent remarks from an Air Force officer: "When politicians talk about reforming the military, they always couch it in terms of closing out a base in Bugsquash, Iowa, or someplace. Nobody is going to fire some assistant defense secretary here in Washington, but politicians have no compunction about closing an entire military base that an entire local community might be dependent on.

"I'd think twice about that, and I'd seriously consider finding and eliminating some redundant department in Washington first," this officer said.

Besides, it would be an unbeatable way for Clinton to show the bureaucracy who's in charge, and he'd have all the trigger-pullers in the military standing on their chairs clapping.

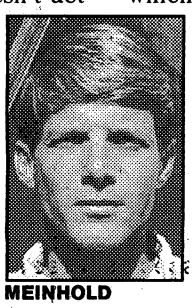
Military faces explosive policy on gays

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — As president, Bill Clinton will be forced to deal with one of the most explosive issues affecting the military in decades — the Pentagon's 50-year ban on homosexuals and his promise to end it.

Clinton has not said when or how such a policy change would be instituted. And few inside the Pentagon have begun to prepare the military's 1.8 million members for such a major change, officials say.

But Lawrence Korb, Pentagon personnel chief during the Reagan administration, predicted, "Even if he doesn't act — which he could by signing an executive order — the courts will make the Pentagon do it."



MEINHOLD

Just Tuesday, a federal judge in Los Angeles reaffirmed his order that the Navy reinstate a homosexual sailor, though the judge did not rule on the overall issue of whether the military ban is legal under the Constitution.

The sailor, Keith Meinhold, 30, of Palo Alto, Calif., was to be sworn in again Thursday and return to his job as a sonar crew instructor at Moffett Naval Air Station near San Francisco.

For the time being, it appears the Meinhold ruling won't affect the Pentagon's overall ban, since the judge did not rule on whether it is constitutional.

But Meinhold, in an interview on NBC's "Today" program on Wednesday, expressed the hope his case will force the Pentagon to shift.

"We're asking the Defense Department to show what its rationale is for the policy..... I think they're going to have a hard time because there is no rationale," Meinhold said.

Revoking the ban would be one of the most far-reaching social changes imposed on the armed services since President Truman ordered blacks integrated into the military in 1948. Proponents of a change in the policy have expressed hope that Clinton will remove the ban in his first days in office.

About 14,000 men and women have been kicked out of the services during the past 10 years because they were homosexual,

In the past, the courts have backed the Pentagon directive that states that "homosexuality is incompatible with military service" and that the presence of homosexuals in the military impedes "discipline, good order and morale."

And two of the Pentagon's most senior officers — Gen. Colin Powell, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and Gen. Gordon Sullivan, the chief of staff of the Army — have repeatedly declared their opposition to any change in the policy.

Both four-star generals — who are expected to continue in service under Clinton — contend the issue affects troops' battle readiness, morale and rights to privacy.

"It is difficult in a military setting where there is no privacy, where you don't get choice of association, where you don't get choice of where you live, to introduce a group of individuals who are proud, brave, loyal, good Americans but who favor a homosexual lifestyle," Powell said in congressional testimony earlier this year. "I think it would be prejudicial to good order and discipline to try to integrate that in the current military structure."

To ask homosexuals and heterosexuals to share latrines, barracks and showers would create "very difficult management problems," Sullivan said in an interview several months ago.

Sullivan said he owes his soldiers "a certain amount of privacy and security."

And privately, other top military officers say they are concerned about a wave of resignations — and even the possibility of violence among the troops — should the ban be lifted.

"It would be a wrenching change," said one four-star general who heads a service branch, speaking on condition of anonymity. "We're not ready for it. Good people will leave the military in droves over this."

More Gateway to Care meetings scheduled

FYI

From staff reports

Martin Army Community Hospital officials will hold 10 more meetings this month and next to explain the Gateway to Care program and to answer questions concerning the new managed care program being instituted at the hospital and its clinics.

The next briefing, set for 10 a.m. Saturday at Infantry Hall's Marshall Auditorium, is open to retirees and their families, as well as to soldiers and their families who missed previous unit briefings.

Other briefings for retirees will be held at 6 p.m. in Infantry Hall's Marshall Auditorium on Tuesday, and again Nov. 24, Dec. 1 and Dec. 3. A daytime briefing for retirees is scheduled for 10 a.m. Thursday in Infantry Hall's classroom 3.

Make-up briefings for active duty soldiers will be held at 10:30 a.m. Monday in Infantry Hall's classroom 8, and at 10 a.m. Dec. 2 in Infantry Hall's classroom 3.

Those eligible for military health care may attend the meeting that best suits their schedule, but they must attend a briefing in order to join the program and get assigned to a family practice clinic.

Hospital officials are continuing to meet with active duty soldiers and their families during unit meetings. Gateway to Care officials next will meet with the 36th Engineer Group at 6 p.m. in Marshall Auditorium on Nov. 23 and 30.

About 14,000 area retirees — those on the post's Retirement Services newsletter mailing list — also will soon receive a letter from hospital commander Col. Vernon Spaulding that provides information on the program and a schedule of the briefings, said John Wynn, the hospital's marketing director.

The Housing Referral Office provides assistance to all military personnel, their family members and Department of the Army civilians moving to the community. The Referral Office is located in Building 2622. Office hours are 7:30 a.m.-4:30 p.m., Monday through Friday. Call 545-3921.

White School having book party

A book party for fourth- and fifth-grade White Elementary School students will be held from 7 to 9 p.m. today in the school cafeteria.

The party will include storytelling, reading activities and a silent reading period. Refreshments will be served.

The school's book fair, which continues through Thursday, will be open during the party so parents can shop for books with their children.

The party, part of the school's celebration of National Children's Book Week, is one of several efforts to promote recreational reading among students. The school also recently issued a reading challenge to students and their parents, asking that they turn off their television for 30 or 40 minutes each night to read together.

Children in kindergarten through the third grade are scheduled to hear a storyteller at a school assembly today.

Middle schools going 'Head to Head'

The Faith Middle School versus Baker Middle School "Head to Head" knowledge bowl competition will be televised 1 p.m. Sunday on WTVM-Channel 9.

The Faith team — Erin Mead, Carrie Parker and Jason Robinson, as well as alternates Lakisha Ladson and Ian Rice — became semi-finalists last week after defeating Rothschild Middle School.

CISM shooters score points with their good will

By Linda Bosley Dailey
Staff Writer

A marksmanship contest designed to foster friendship among soldiers from nations around the globe drew to a close at Fort Benning this week.

The Conseil International du Sports Militaire, or CISM, shooting matches brought more than 300 soldiers from 26 nations to Fort Benning Nov. 2-11 to compete. Among the nations were four — Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Russia and Slovenija — that were first-time participants.

CISM, an international military sports federation based in Brussels, Belgium, sponsors competitions in as many as 22 sports each year. Founded in 1947, CISM aims to promote good will among the members of the world's armed services and to make familiar to them the cultures of other nations.

In addition to the competition, the visit to Fort Benning included a picnic, a tour of the National Infantry Museum and other events to show the visitors some aspects of American culture.

Senator: Korean War prisoners may be alive

Believes they may be in Russia

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — The top Republican on the Senate Committee on POW-MIA Affairs said Tuesday that Americans missing in action from the Korean War could still be alive inside Russia, and he accused Russia of stonewalling U.S. efforts to find out just what happened to them.

Sen. Bob Smith, R-N.H., also said the U.S. government "has covered up what it knew (about Korean War POWs) through a pattern of denial, misleading statements and, in some cases, lies."

His comments came at the committee's first hearing held specifically on U.S. servicemen missing or held prisoner from the Korean War, which ended in 1953. The committee is scheduled to go out of existence at the end of December.

Smith released what he said was the most comprehensive compilation of U.S. government policy and intelligence information that has been known about the fate of men missing from the Korean War and what the government did to find out about them.

"It is a document that shows in explicit detail that the government of North Korea did not return a large number of American servicemen at the end of the war and that some of the men left behind were sent to Communist China and to the Soviet Union," he said.

Officially, there are 8,177 servicemen who never returned from the Korean War. That number includes POWs who died in camps, servicemen lost at sea and buried by Americans in Korea, and people whose fates remain unknown.

Smith said internal U.S. government documents show that "our government believed men were still alive in captivity, and until only a few months ago, has kept that reality from the American people."

However, a joint American-Russian commission searching for U.S. prisoners of war is finally making some progress despite the efforts of some Russian government elements trying to hinder the process, he said. The committee's investigator, who has been in Moscow for the last six months, has reported back "that we are intentionally being stonewalled on this subject," he said.

Smith and other committee members tangled with Defense Department officials over how many Americans may have been left behind in Korea, and how many may have been transferred to China or the Soviet Union.

Alan Ptak, deputy assistant secretary of defense for POW-MIA affairs, told the committee that the Pentagon was still analyzing information received about U.S. servicemen from the Korean War.

However, Paul Cole, a researcher for the Rand Corp. who is under contract to the Defense Department, said he believed a small number — "less than 100 and probably half that" — of Americans captured in Korea were transferred to China and the Soviet Union.

Smith said the evidence is there to show that some prisoners may have been transferred and that some may have been held alive in Korea after the war, despite that country's denial.

To demonstrate how U.S. prisoners might still be alive, Smith said the committee's investigator heard last June that a David Marken, reputedly an Air Force pilot from the Korean War, had been seen alive in the 1980s in a Russian labor camp. Yet the Pentagon has not moved on the case because it has no one by that name missing from the Korean War, Smith said.

The FBI and Fort Benning's Criminal Investigation Division are investigating the post's Directorate of Information Management in connection with alleged contract irregularities involving the telephone system, FBI and Fort Benning officials said Tuesday.

Bud Paepcke, the FBI's senior resident agent in Columbus, refused to release any information except to confirm an investigation is under way. The bureau does not discuss investigations while they are in progress, he said.

Paepcke would not say whether the alleged irregularities were related to installation, repair, improvement, operation, maintenance or use of the telephone system. He also refused comment on the amount of money involved in the alleged contract irregularities.

Paepcke also refused to say whether the bureau is investigating any firms contracted by Fort Benning for telephone system work.

Edgar W. Ennis Jr., U.S. attorney for the middle district of Georgia, would not say whether his office is involved in the investigation.

The Directorate of Information Management plans, operates, programs and maintains communications, electronics and information systems at Fort Benning. It is responsible for telephone and computer operations and software management, as well as maintenance of copy equipment, file equipment and the mail and its distribution, post spokeswoman Monica Manganaro said. It employs as many as 67 people, most of whom are civilian workers, she said.

The post's telephone system — once consistently troubled by dead lines, connections to the wrong number and constant busy signals — underwent a $12.6 million upgrade from 1988-90, when switching equipment and underground cables were replaced.

Housing information available 24 hours a day

Soldiers waiting for post quarters can find out where they are on the housing waiting list 24 hours a day with just a simple phone call.

The Family Housing Branch of the Directorate of Public Works now has a computer-controlled, automated phone system that can be accessed from any push-button telephone.

Soldiers who want to find out their positions on the list can simply dial 545-3107. A pre-recorded message will ask callers to press the number one button. The caller will then be asked to enter the sponsor's Social Security number, followed by the pound key.

"The entire process is very fast," said Jim Young, chief of the Family Housing Branch. "It takes only maybe 20 or 30 seconds, which is far less time than it would take for someone to call us directly and have one of our people look up the same information on the computer."

Young encouraged soldiers to call after duty hours.

"The system works 24 hours a day, but we are trying to cut down on the large number of daytime telephone calls we receive that tie up the system," he said. "More than 75 percent of the calls we receive are from people wanting to find out their position on the waiting list."

Young added that it is important for soldiers who desire to be removed from the housing list to call the Family Housing Branch to be taken off of the list.

Country music veteran Coe takes time to write killer novel

By Sandra Okamoto
Staff Writer

You know David Allan Coe as a country music singer and a songwriter. He's had such hits as "Would You Be My Lady," "Longhaired Redneck," "Lately I've Been Thinking Too Much Lately," "Jack Daniels" and "Tanya Montana." And he's written such hits as "Would You Lay With Me" and "Take This Job and Shove It."

But now, he's David Allan Coe, novelist.

"I just finished a book called 'Psychopath,' " said Coe during a telephone interview last week. "It's about a serial killer."

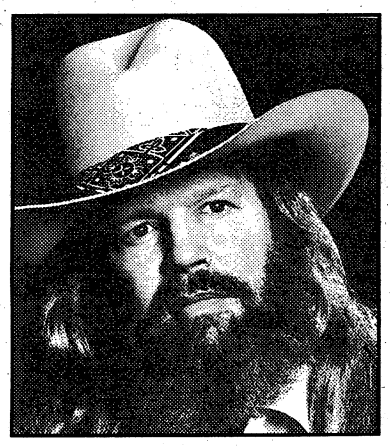
The idea for the novel had been brewing in the back of Coe's mind for a long time. He met Dr. Samuel H. Sheppard in the Ohio Penitentiary. Sheppard was in for murdering his wife; Coe was in for possession of burglary tools.

Sheppard always proclaimed his innocence in his wife's murder and in 1964, after serving 10 years in prison, he was released by Judge Carl A. Weinman because his constitutional rights were denied.

"There was quite a difference" from the other books he's written, Coe said. He's written "Just for the Record" (his autobiography up to 1973), "The Book of David" (a religious book), "Ex-Convict (Or How to Pull Time and Parole)" and "Poems Poetry and Short Stories."

He wrote for two or three hours a day (at no particular time) for about a year to finish "Psychopath."

"It's very different," he said of the book. "The killer never gets caught. It's based on a theory that I got when I was in prison with Dr. Sam Sheppard. He was accused of killing his wife and claimed he never did it."



David Allan Coe will be performing at The Legendary Dallas Club Saturday at 8:15 p.m. Tickets are $13.50.

Written from the killer's vantage point, the serial killer in "Psychopath" has multiple personalities and at one point even undergoes a sex change to disguise himself.

Coe dedicated the book to Sheppard. He published the book himself and is currently shopping the book to major publishers. Only 1,000 copies are available now.

Romance writer Janet Dailey is a friend and she encouraged Coe to send his manuscript to her agent, who said the genre was out of his field, but suggested some other agents.

He and his family live in Branson, Mo., the second mecca for country music fans — the first being Nashville, of course. There, they own and operate the Rhinestone Cowboy Store and Museum.

"We have a lot of stuff there," he said. His own awards, Indian artifacts and items given to him by other music stars like Elvis Presley and Johnny Cash are displayed in the store.

It's a family affair at the Branson store — daughters (from a previous marriage) Carla Dawn and Shelli S. Stephine work there. Wife Jody Lynn tours and sings with him and takes care of their four young children — Tyler Mahan, 8, Tanya Montana, 6, Shyanne Sherrill, 4, and Carson David, 16 months.

"My wife has more responsibilities than I do," Coe said. She handles the merchandising and publishing companies they own and performs.

Sometimes, Coe admits being on the road becomes a problem. His wife misses the children so much she'll often drive from one gig home to see the kids for a few hours and then meets up with the rest of the group at the next concert.

On the road, Coe drives the band bus. Jody Lynn travels in a limousine with a driver and their youngest son.

What they'd like to do eventually is open up their own theater in Branson so they won't have to travel so much. The theaters in Branson operate on a seasonal schedule, much like theme parks — open in early spring, close around Labor Day.

The next project for Coe is a live concert video and album. "There's never been a live David Allan Coe album," he said. "So that project is in our heads."

College faculty artist's works are on display

From staff reports

An exhibit of the works of Columbus College faculty artist Jamie Howard will be on display through Nov. 20 in the Fine Arts Hall gallery.

The exhibit includes watercolors, oil paintings and sculptures, which have been described as containing a "quality of nostalgia arranged by a carefully intellectualized design concept."

His works have been on display at the Will Stone College in San Francisco, the Kenneth Nahan Gallery in New Orleans, Venable Neslege Gallery in Washington, D.C., Castle Gallery in Atlanta, Gallery Raymon Duncan in Paris and the Red Hill Gallery in Brisbane, Australia.

His more than 27 one-man exhibitions have included the Ministry of Culture in Guatemala City, Birmingham Museum of Art, Greenville (S.C.) County Museum, Hunter Gallery in Chattanooga and Morehead (Ky.) University Gallery.

An associate professor of art, Howard has been a faculty member at Columbus College since 1971 and has served as acting chair and chair of the Department of Art.

Howard is active in both community and professional life, demonstrating and lecturing on art topics at area schools, churches and museums, as well as judging area exhibitions.

The gallery is open 9 a.m.-5 p.m. Monday-Friday. For more information, call 568-2047.

New owner to give Dallas Club a new look

By Sandra Okamoto
Staff Writer

One of the biggest clubs in town has a new owner and a new name. Dennis Smith took over The Legendary Dallas Club, 3433 N. Lumpkin Road, last month.

Smith, who owns a club called Gussie Lamour's in Honolulu, came to Columbus about four years ago on business, dropped in at the Dallas Club and "saw a great potential" for the club.

Smith became friends with late owner Jerry Wright, and his wife, Lee. Smith would come to Columbus at least twice a year, visit with the Wrights and go to the club.

"I liked the club," Smith said. "It had a lot of potential." When he learned the club was available, he decided to buy it.

Right now, and for the next six months or so, Smith will be renovating the club. It will remain a country music club, but it will sport a different look. Already, he's painting and tearing out fixtures and replacing the light and sound systems. The carpet will be replaced, the dance floor expanded and new "smoke eaters" will be installed.

"It will be completely renovated by the time we're finished," he said. "It was real dirty when we took over."

A mural of Christopher Columbus' three ships has been painted on the south exterior wall by a friend of Smith's from Hawaii.

Free country dance lessons are offered every Thursday between 7-9 p.m.

The club's new hours are 8:45 p.m.-2 a.m. Tuesday-Saturday. There is no cover charge except the nights when "name" acts are performing. Those tickets will vary, according to the performer.

On the schedule are David Frizzell, Nov. 17; Poco, Nov. 24; Sammy Kershaw, Dec. 1; The Forrester Sisters, Dec. 8 and The Ultimate Five male dance revue, Dec. 12. All shows begin at 8:15 p.m.

For more information, call club manager Pat Fries at 689-8977.

The rain and mud at the Malone 1 Range at Fort Benning last week only added to the realism as would-be soldiers took their turns lobbing grenades at dummy "enemy" troops and sneaking up to the front of a bunker to roll in a grenade.

An instructor screams at a One Station Unit Training rookie, in his fifth week of basic training, as the youngster struggles to wrench the pin from a dummy (practice) grenade, then misses the bunker entrance and freezes, lying prone three feet or so away waiting for the grenade to explode.

Each trainee gets two live grenades during his passage through the grenade range course.

"You're dead! Just lie there on your back," the instructor yells. Fortunately, this is only practice and the dead guy gets up to do it all over again.

The gently falling rain adds a little insult to the injury of having screwed up so basic a task. The soldier gets it right on his second effort and double-times back into his platoon formation where other novice soldiers await their turn on the grenade range.

Mistakes aren't deadly here — these are practice grenades. They pop and spew out smoke, but there's no hot chunks of medal whizzing through the air like with the real thing. But shortly on this miserable day, these men in wet, mostly muddy camouflage battle dress uniforms will be throwing the real thing: Each trainee gets two live grenades during his passage through the grenade range course.

These platoons of "Charlie" Co., 1st Battalion 38th Infantry Regiment — one of the Infantry Training Brigade companies of boys en route to becoming soldiers — "listen up" as a 2nd Battalion, 29th Infantry sergeant instructs them on how to throw from the kneeling, standing and prone positions.

Modern-day soldiers throw from the kneeling position with their "off arm" aimed downrange much like John Wayne did in World War II movies; going through the drill, they look like shot-put artists getting ready to throw.

Capt. Michael Eddings, the Charlie Company commander, watches. He points out that the instructors as well as the drill sergeants wear the same not-so-good rubberized rain gear as do the trainees — there's no GorTex finery here. It's good for morale, Eddings says: Troops respond better when they're shown their superiors won't make them do anything the "old folks" won't do, too.

Drill Sergeant Steven Gonzalez watches his platoon, the last he will usher through OSUT since his two-year stint as a drill sergeant ends when this platoon graduates in December.

Gonzalez and other Charlie Company drill sergeants have already put their troops through an hour or so of practice tosses with their own dummy grenades, just so handling the real things here won't be a big shock.

At the grenade range, the day begins with a "bleacher spiel" during which instructors like Sgt. 1st Class Jarriet Mosley talk these troops through what they'll face today. Mosley makes a graphic point: Once the "spoon" on the grenade is released, even an eight of an inch, you better not squeeze it again in hopes of keeping it from going off. His dummy round goes "boom," shocking his audience.

A basic soldier must be able to identify the types of grenades: fragmentation, incendiary, smoke, white phosphorus and CS gas or riot control varieties.

If a trainee fails at any of the six stops along the way, he'll get another chance. But if he doesn't get a "go" — a passing mark — at each station, the best he can qualify is "second class" with the grenade. If he scores the right number of kills or hits the first time around, he's certified an expert. Ninety to 95 percent of basic soldiers qualify, Mosley said.

RELIGION

Religion a part of White House history

By Michael Hirsley
Chicago Tribune

CHICAGO — The first occupant had a prayer chiseled into the dining room's stone fireplace.

Others who have lived in the house have frequently invited preachers inside to give advice and guidance. One resident briefly instituted a minister-of-the-week rotation to preach on Sundays for the family and house guests.

Rebuilt and remodeled frequently since it was built in 1792, the house has had a high turnover of occupants. The 41st incoming move will find President Clinton and his family arriving in January.

While it is not a religious structure, the White House has been home to a lot of religious practice over the past 200 years, having housed all except the first of the United States' presidents.

Separation of church and state has been a national byword since George Washington was sworn in as the first president of the United States in 1789.

But even as Washington took the oath of office, he reminded his audience that faith cannot be written out of the job. At the end of the scripted recitation, he added an impromptu, "so help me God."

Successors have used that closing phrase ever since.

"America was founded by men of faith, but not necessarily Christians in the sense of believing in the deity of Jesus Christ," says the Rev. John McCollister, author of "So Help Me God: The Faith of America's Presidents."

One of the founding fathers, Thomas Jefferson, who became the third U.S. president, went so far as to doubt Christ's deity, although he called Jesus "the greatest human being who ever lived," said McCollister, a minister of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America.

Every U.S. president has attended church while in office. But in his research, McCollister found that eight of them — Jefferson, William H. Harrison, Zachary Taylor, Abraham Lincoln, Andrew Johnson, Ulysses S. Grant, Rutherford B. Hayes and Chester A. Arthur — never joined a denomination.

Millard Fillmore, the 13th president, was so guarded on the subject that some labeled him an agnostic or atheist, although he was formally a Unitarian, McCollister says.

While in office, the presidents often found it easier to profess their faith than to practice it.

John F. Kennedy, the nation's only Roman Catholic president, made one attempt to go to confession in church while he occupied the White House. "At the confessional, he said, 'Forgive me, Father, for I have sinned.' The priest inside said, 'Good evening, Mr. President.' Kennedy replied, 'Good evening, Father,' and promptly left," McCollister recalls.

When George Bush made the momentous decision to go to war in the Persian Gulf, "he called his Episcopalian pastor, only to find the pastor was at an anti-war rally," McCollister said. So Bush summoned Billy Graham, who quickly answered the call to the White House.

While some presidents were vocal about their faith, others kept a low religious profile, feeling such beliefs were private.

The Civil War sensitized Abraham Lincoln "about how divided America was, and he felt his affiliation with a denomination would divide the country even more," McCollister said. "But he attended Presbyterian Church and was considering joining after the war, as Easter approached in 1865." Lincoln was assassinated on Good Friday, April 15, 1865.

Among the presidents who most publicly professed their faith, McCollister cites Dutch Reformed Theodore Roosevelt, Presbyterian Woodrow Wilson and Southern Baptist Jimmy Carter.

Every U.S. president has attended church while in office. But in his research, McCollister found that eight of them — Thomas Jefferson, William H. Harrison, Zachary Taylor, Abraham Lincoln, Andrew Johnson, Ulysses S. Grant, Rutherford B. Hayes and Chester A. Arthur — never joined a denomination.

Clinton will be the United States' fourth Southern Baptist president, following Warren G. Harding, Harry S. Truman and Carter. Bush was the eighth Episcopalian, the most often represented denomination. There were seven Presbyterians — if you count Grover Cleveland twice. He was the United States' 22nd and 24th president, the only person to win nonconsecutive terms.

Herbert C. Hoover and Richard M. Nixon were Quakers. It was Nixon who instituted the rotating ministers at the White House. McCollister was one of those invited, but the practice was discontinued before his turn.

He did, however, see the prayer etched into the dining room fireplace. Commissioned by John Adams, a Unitarian and the first White House resident, the prayer asks for blessings from heaven and concludes, "May none but honest and wise men ever rule under this roof."

Amen.

WW II 50TH ANNIVERSARY

Fifty years ago this week, the naval battle of Guadalcanal began between American forces, under the command of Admirals Daniel J. Callaghan and Willis A. Lee, and Japanese forces, led by Admiral Nobuyuli Abe and Vice Admiral Nobutaki Kondo.

U.S. forces, consisting of the carrier USS Enterprise, the battleships Washington and South Dakota, eight cruisers and 22 destroyers, squared off against 50 Japanese vessels. The enemy vessels included the carriers Junyo and Hiyo, the battleships Jiei, Kirishima, Kongo, and Haruma, 30 destroyers, and 14 submarines.

The American naval forces lost the cruisers Atlanta and Juneau along with seven destroyers while sinking the Jiei, Kirishima, two destroyers, and the cruiser Kinugasa.

On the Eastern Front, the Soviets launched their winter offensive along the River Don. With Georgi Konstantinovich Zhukov commanding, Soviet forces, consisting of more than half a million infantrymen, 900 new T-34 tanks, and over 1,000 aircraft, began to drive the exhausted Germans from Stalingrad.

■

In North Africa, British and U.S. Airborne forces, under the command of British Gen. Kenneth Anderson, swept through 10,000 German defenders in Tunisia and Algeria, capturing airfields at Youks les Bains and Souk el Arba.

■

In New Guinea, Japanese forces received reinforcements, while the Allied forces continued to advance toward Gona, Buna and Sonada.

From wire reports

Defense cuts are deepest since 1972

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon cut 178,024 sailors, soldiers, airmen and Marines from active duty in the past budget year — the largest single-year cut in two decades, a spokesman said Tuesday.

That leaves about 1.8 million men and women still in uniform. Current plans call for 160,000 more to be trimmed over the next three fiscal years, said Pentagon spokesman Pete Williams.

The previous record year for military cuts was in 1972, when 391,000 men and women in uniform were let go, Williams said.

"It's the single largest decrease in any fiscal year in the total active duty military strength since the end of the Vietnam War — since fiscal '72," Williams said.

The reduction follows plans laid out several years ago by Defense Secretary Dick Cheney and Gen. Colin Powell, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, to trim 25 percent of the military force by 1996.

Their goal is a force of 1,644,200, Williams said.

President-elect Bill Clinton has advocated bringing the force down to 1.4 million men and women but has not set any target dates for the cuts.

Cheney and Powell have argued repeatedly that swifter cutbacks would harm the military's readiness to do battle and would break the morale of the troops and their families.

The spokesman said the past year's reductions went beyond those leaving at the end of their term of service. In addition, he said, fewer people are being brought into the armed services and programs designed to trim the middle ranks are working very well.

Some personnel in certain ranks are being offered bonuses to leave and another program picks higher-level officers for early retirement.

Fewer than 300 people were cut involuntarily in the past year, Williams said.

Some 52,000 men and women with more than six years of service but fewer than 20 years of active duty chose voluntarily to leave through one of the programs, Williams said.

About 3,000 higher-ranking officers were chosen by boards for early retirement, Williams said.

Spencer blows past Shaw to keep playoff hopes alive

From staff reports

The Spencer Greenwave can earn a 3-AAA region playoff berth with a victory over unbeaten, No. 2-ranked Peach County tonight in a key region contest in Fort Valley.

Or the Greenwave can earn a playoff berth if rival Kendrick knocks off Shaw in a 3-AAA showdown at Kinnett Stadium, regardless of the outcome of its own game.

Spencer kept its playoff hopes alive and well with an impressive 33-14 win over the Raiders last week in Doughboy Stadium at Fort Benning. It was the Greenwave's best outing in several weeks and improved its season record to 5-4 overall, 3-4 in Region 3-AAA. Shaw fell to 2-6, 2-3 in 3-AAA.

Maurice Williams — to no one's surprise — was the driving force in Spencer's big victory. The star runner dashed for 128 yards and three touchdowns to lead the Greenwave home despite a pulled hamstring. Williams' effort was ably complemented by a solid performance by backfield mate Vincent Thornton, who ran for 116-yards and two touchdowns of his own.

It was Thornton who got Spencer off and running, running 47 yards for a touchdown with 9:31 left in the opening period to give the Greenwave a 7-0 lead. Williams followed with a 5-yard scoring run less than four minutes later (5:00), pushing Spencer ahead 13-0 at the end of the first quarter.

Shaw rebounded strongly in the second quarter however. The Raiders got touchdowns on a 19-yard run by Chad Williams and a 9-yard scoring pass from Dusty Dyer to Allen Porch to get back into the contest. Williams' 68-yard scoring run in between the two Shaw scores kept Spencer on top 20-14 at halftime.

The Greenwave got the only points of the second half to put the game away. Thornton got his second long-distance score of the night with 9:24 left in the third quarter, streaking 58 yards to push Spencer on top by a 27-14 margin. Williams put the capper on the win on the final play of the game with a 5-yard touchdown run.

Vietnam memorial helps heal wounds

Vets mark 10th anniversary

By Nicole Foy
Dallas Morning News

WASHINGTON — It has taken 24 years for Tim Brown's wounds from Vietnam to heal.

The day in 1968 when a dozen Marines in his unit were killed left emotional scars much deeper than those from physical injuries. But it's the guilt that's hardest to deal with, he said. He still struggles with the memory of leaving his fallen friends behind in the jungles of Vietnam.

"Sometimes I just can't help but think, 'God, I just wish I'd had the opportunity to tell them all I loved 'em as brothers,' " said the resident of Richardson, Texas, a Dallas suburb.

"Sometimes I just can't help but think, 'God, I just wish I'd had the opportunity to tell them all I loved 'em as brothers,' " said the resident of Richardson, Texas, a Dallas suburb.

He knows there's one place where his unspoken words are understood.

Staring at his reflection on the black granite panels of the Vietnam Veterans Memorial, he finds solace in whispers from behind the 58,183 names.

"There at the Wall, I receive messages from those who were killed," he said. "They tell me, 'It's OK — go on with your life. Be active, and don't let the lessons of war be forgotten.' "

Marking its 10th anniversary this week, the Wall has served as the nation's altar for a war fought not only in Southeast Asia, but also at home. It was a conflict as divisive as anything since the Civil War. Many veterans came home from the war, shed their uniforms and immediately went back to work. No talking or reminiscing. Just struggling to forget.

But last weekend, about 200,000 Vietnam veterans were meeting in the nation's capital to remember in a massive 10-year reunion, which ended on Veterans Day. The commemoration — including a new, moving exhibit at the Smithsonian Institution, seminars, concerts and a reading of the names on the Wall — was sponsored by the Vietnam Veterans Memorial Fund.

"People need anniversaries in their lives," explained Jim Burns, a spokesman for the fund. "Especially Vietnam veterans because, unlike World War II, there aren't a lot of positive things associated with the war.

"But the Wall is overwhelmingly positive," he added. "It fulfills different needs for everyone who sees it."

In 1981, Maya Lin's design — two long walls of black granite connecting in a V, with the names of the U.S. dead in Southeast Asia chiseled in chronological order — caused considerable controversy. But since its dedication in 1982, more than 30 million visitors have filed past the Wall between the Washington Monument and the Lincoln Memorial, making it the U.S. capital's most visited monument.

For some, the trip is a search for understanding. For others, it's a personal pilgrimage for healing and catharsis.

"For me, the Wall's a spiritual place — it's like a catalyst for healing," said Brown, the executive director of the Vietnam Veterans Foundation of Texas in Dallas.

Even though the Wall is a tribute to veterans, it's the country's memorial, he said.

"It's a place of national gathering so everyone can vividly see, in stark and realistic terms, the ultimate costs of war," he said.

Many visitors are so touched by the sacrifice of those who died that they leave behind pieces of themselves. The practice began when the Wall was still under construction and a National Park Service ranger picked up a Purple Heart that had been tossed in the wet cement by a Vietnam veteran.

Since then, more than 25,000 personal offerings have been picked up by the National Park Service. Anonymous messages and photos have been tucked into the gully at the base of the Wall. And personal mementos like wedding rings, varsity letters and liquor bottles have been left behind.

In honor of the Wall's 10th anniversary, a collection of 500 of these offerings is being displayed at the Smithsonian's National Museum of American History. The exhibit, "Personal Legacy: The Healing of a Nation," will continue through June.

Columbus pays tribute to nation's veterans

The band was nearly as big as the crowd at the Veterans Day observance at the Government Center in Columbus on Wednesday.

The Jordan High School Band provided the music for the crowd of maybe 100 people, which included several old servicemen in Veterans of Foreign Wars and American Legion caps and a few former servicewomen.

Medal of Honor winners retired Col. Bob Nett and retired Maj. Freeman V. Horner were the guests of honor. Horner is a resident in a Phenix City nursing home these days.

Former U.S. Rep. Jack Brinkley, a pilot during the Korean War prior to his 16 years in Congress, told veterans who had drawn or shed blood from World War II to the killing fields of Vietnam that "you are the glory of your time and you are the glory of your nation ... You have stood in harm's way for your fellow citizens."

He said it is the responsibility of today's parents and others to teach the children about heroes. "Unless we teach our children the difference, they will not know the difference between horses and heroes," he said.

Veterans, he said, "have given a part of their lives so we could have an entirely free country."

Jim Rhodes of the Chattahoochee Valley Veterans Council, sponsor of the Columbus ceremony, pointed out that a bugler who played taps near the end of the event at the Veterans Memorial on the Government Center lawn "was the only active duty member" of the Army from Fort Benning "that we could get to support us here today." Wednesday was a holiday at the local post.

American Legion Post 135 in Phenix City and others were in charge of another ceremony at the National Cemetery at Fort Mitchell, Ala.

Local AUSA chapter recognized as a STAR

The Chattahoochee Valley-Fort Benning Chapter of the AUSA was recognized last week by AUSA National as a STAR Chapter for membership. This shows the hard work and results of many exceptional leaders. It is important that we maintain this STAR status throughout the AUSA year ending June 30, 1993. There is an old saying that applies — "There is plenty of room at the top but nowhere to sit down." My personal thanks for the outstanding work and support of so many dedicated and capable leaders. We have the momentum — let's continue to lead.

Operation Holiday: This year a committee was formed to review Operation Holiday from the soldier's viewpoint. This committee was chaired by retired Maj. Gen. William Steele, an infantry soldier and former division commander, and with a strong voice from the non-commissioned officers at Fort Benning. It is scheduled to run from Dec. 15 to Jan. 4 and will include attendance at athletic events, athletic competition, chapel and Christmas activities and family activities. Look for the entire schedule to be published in the near future.

Did you know?

■ Over 40 years ago the Fort Benning Chapter of AUSA was the first chapter to be organized.

■ Appropriated funds do not pay for awards to outstanding soldiers. AUSA through its awards program recognizes soldier professionalism.

■ The Chattahoochee Valley-Fort Benning Chapter is the second largest AUSA chapter in the world out of 134 chapters.

■ The 1992 AUSA Annual Meeting held in Washington, D.C., in October had the largest participation of industrial exhibits in its history and over 25,000 people attended. Jane's of London stated that the AUSA annual meeting is the largest land warfare convention in the world.

■ The Institute for Land Warfare of AUSA National develops and publishes educational materials to inform the public and build support for the U.S. Army and to provide professional understanding of Army programs and needs.

■ The Chattahoochee Valley-Fort Benning Chapter of AUSA is one of only two chapters that have a sub-chapter organization structure. We have nine sub-chapters (aligning to the major commands on post with a sub-chapter president from that MACOM). A portion of the membership dues returned from national to our local chapter is distributed to the sub-chapter for support of soldiers and activities in the sub-chapter.

■ AUSA resolutions and initiatives strongly support Department of the Army civilians and recognize their contribution to readiness and support of the total Army.

■ AUSA's Army Reserve/National Guard members may get drill attendence credit for attending AUSA activities. Inquire about this at your unit.

Upcoming AUSA events:

■ Dec. 3: AUSA dinner. Featured speaker is Gen. Fred Franks, commanding general, U.S. Army Training and Doctrine Command.

■ Dec. 8: Executive committee meeting. Room 642, Infantry Hall.

■ Jan. 12: Executive committee meeting. Room 642, Infantry Hall

■ Feb. 18: AUSA general membership meeting. Columbus Trade Center.

Ben Register, a retired lieutenant general, is president of the Chattahoochee Valley-Fort Benning Chapter of the Association of the United States Army.

Book tells bloody story of Ia Drang

Several area residents saw action there

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

"We Were Soldiers Once . . . and Young" may involve more Columbus-area people than any book with the threat of substantial sales across the country since "Four Hours in My Lai," which was notorious but not a best seller.

"Soldiers" is about the 1st Air Division's baptism of fire in the Ia Drang Valley in Vietnam, the first major pitched battle of that war, and its aftermath.

The authors, retired Lt. Gen. Hal Moore and Joseph L. Galloway, are no strangers to Columbus: Moore lives in Opelika half-time, and Galloway, now a U.S. News & World Report senior writer, has been in and out of Columbus. He was a protege of the late Charlie Black, the Ledger-Enquirer reporter who covered parts of the Vietnam War, including the Ia Drang campaign.

Folks like retired Sgt. Maj. Basil Plumley and retired Sgt. 1st Class Ernie Savage, now a civilian employee at Fort Benning, figure prominently in the book which takes a detailed, slow-motion look back at the Ia Drang Valley campaign and how it affected the future of the war and the soldiers who slugged it out with North Vietnamese regulars at Landing Zones X-Ray

BOOK REVIEW

Book brings the heroism, gore to life

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

"We Were Soldiers Once ... And Young" (Ia Drang: The Battle That Changed the War in Vietnam)
Random House: Nov. 11, 1992. $25.
By Lt. Gen. Harold G. Moore (U.S. Army Ret.) and Joseph L. Galloway

Don't read this book just for entertainment: No less a miliary authority than Gen. H. Norman Schwarzkopf says it should be "must reading for all Americans, especially those who have been led to believe that war is some kind of Nintendo game."

Read it instead as history — and for a better understanding of the Vietnam War and the men who fought it. But this is different from that war you see in "Platoon" and other movies. This is the first pitched battle — and the actions of men and units are so well-documented and detailed that it's like reading after-action reports.

But there is real blood and guts here, as the survivors of Landing Zone X-Ray and Landing Zone Albany tell it. It is the story of retired Lt. Gen. Harold Moore's 1st Battalion, 7th Cavalry and what they found when they "went looking for trouble" in the Ia Drang Valley, in part at least to test the new Airmobile war-fighting concept. Moore's men "found all we wanted and more," he notes with irony in the book.

Moore didn't choose to circle above the fight in his command helicopter, "you had to get down on the ground to see what was going on," he says, and he was there when by only a lack of intelligence about the backside of his battalion being unprotected — tough, angry North Vietnamese regulars made the mistake that let his bloodied troops, after four days of fighting, limp away.

Why such a book so many years later?

For one thing, it goes into details about the LZ-Albany battle, which followed the X-Ray fight, and about which little had been written previously.

It may be the look back that finally helps folks like Betty Jivens Mapson, 42, of Columbus, whose father died in the Ia Drang campaign, answer the "why" of such things. She talks in the book about seeing her father off to war from Fort Benning, and the trauma of welcoming him back in "a long gray box."

As the authors point out, "this story is about time and memories." And somewhat remarkably, it is also described as a "tribute to the hundreds of young men of the 320th, 33rd and 66th Regiments of the People's Army of Vietnam who died by our hand in that place. They, too, fought and died bravely."

If you want to look at the Vietnam War from a new perspective, this may be as good as it gets. If you don't like the gore of the battlefield, leave it alone.

The first-person narrative of parts of the book grates at times, but the detail and the writing — much of it is poignant — are outstanding.

If you want to look at the Vietnam War from a new perspective, this may be as good as it gets.

If you don't like the gore of the battlefield, leave it alone.

Bookstores between Atlanta and Montgomery were out of copies on Tuesday, but several said it would be re-ordered.

Sergeant major has special place in his heart for veterans

By Jerry Rutledge
Leader Editor

What is a veteran? Command Sgt. Maj. (retired) James Arthur Scott has put a lot of time and thought into the question.

The Columbus resident and veteran of the Vietnam War's Ia Drang Valley battle in mid-Nov. 1965 — the subject of the new book "We Were Soldiers Once . . . And Young" by Lt. Gen. Harold G. Moore and Joseph L. Galloway — is imminently qualified on the matter. A veteran of World War II and the Korean War as well as Indochina, he believes the public's perception is too narrowly defined.

"Let's talk about military veterans. There are the individuals today walking the streets. They are veterans," Scot said. "We have individuals still in the military . . . veterans. We have those soldiers beneath the ground . . . veterans.

"Then we have the family (of the soldiers). They are veterans. I know during World War II as a 17-year old individual, you could call or write to your family and tell them not to worry," he said. "Well, maybe your father didn't worry. Maybe some other members of your family did not worry. But there's that mother. The mother of the veteran — her son — you couldn't tell her not to worry.

"Did it shorten her life? I always thought it shortened my mother's (the late Mrs. Frances E. Scott) life, by virtue of me being in World War II, the Korean War and Vietnam.

"We always remember the dead veterans on Veteran's Day and that's good. But we also should remember the family who sacrificed and took care of life back home, while worrying about the health and welfare of their loved ones in the military."

Scott remembers. The Ia Drang Valley battle was the first major engagement of the Vietnam War and, thus, the first time American forces suffered heavy casualties. The military, including Fort Benning, apparently had not yet established procedures for notifying the families of war casualties.

As the dead and wounded mounted in the days after Ia Drang, families got the word — missing-in-action and killed-in-action telegrams — through delivery by taxi cab drivers or found them laying in the mailbox.

More often than not, Scott's wife Connie and the wives of officers of the 2nd Battalion, 7th Cavalry were called upon to deliver the news and/or lend solace to families, a painful experience. "We offered our condolences and assistance. There was immense grief and bitterness," Mrs. Scott would say later. "After the first visit, there were numerous other visits. Names, addresses and faces became a blur."

"The wives and survivors pay an awfully big price," said Scott.

Scott himself took a bullet in the chest during the early minutes of the ambush at Ia Drang, a valley in the central highlands north of Saigon (now Ho Chi Minh City) in what was then South Vietnam.

Mrs. Scott received notification of his wounding by the Red Cross — after he had called her from Walter Reed Army Hospital in Washington and she had visited him. Scott was wounded three times in conflict, twice in World War II.

The chaos involved in notifications caused some pain and a lot of bitterness. However, Scott says it is impossible for someone to prepare for that kind of news regardless of how it is delivered.

Scott spent six months at Walter Reed and at Martin Army Community Hospital at Fort Benning. He returned to Vietnam for a second tour in 1970-71, serving as Command Sergeant Major of the 1st Logistical Command and 1st Aviation Brigade.

After retiring from the U.S. Army in May 1973, Scott worked with the Muscogee County School System as a Junior Reserved Officers Training Corps (ROTC) instructor and administrator.

Despite having served a couple of tours of duty in Indochina, Scott says he has no hard feelings against those who chose to avoid service and left the United States for Canada.

"It didn't affect me, because, somehow or another, protest was what we were fighting to preserve," said Scott. "We've had armies since the Revolutionary War giving the right for people to do things in America.

"It started with the Minutemen protesting against the British and we've been protesting every since. We fight for the right to protest and all the other rights that go with being an American. Does it bother me that individuals left to go to Canada? Not as much as it bothers them. I think inside, they have to feel some regret."

Book tells bloody story of the fighting at Ia Drang Valley and Albany in mid-November 1965, exactly 27 years ago this weekend.

Moore and Galloway should know the campaign better than anybody. Moore was commander of the 1st Battalion, 7th Cavalry, at LZ (landing zone) X-Ray and Galloway was there covering the war for United Press International. Savage was a squad leader when all hell broke loose at LZ X-ray. Plumley was Moore's sergeant major.

At a reunion in Washington, D.C., on Monday, Savage recalled the hot spot he was in at X-Ray during those furious days, where "bullets were clipping all around us, hitting men and trees and cutting the grass."

His platoon was so battered that Savage ended up as the platoon commander. Moore — before a three or four hours book-signing session on Monday — told the Ia Drang Alumni Association that "Sgt. Ernie Savage is what good soldiering is all about. Even though his unit was surrounded and cut off and losses were so heavy that he eventually ended up commanding it, he got his men out. And when they came out, they had ammo left over. Now that's discipline. Discipline."

The battalion lost 79 men killed and 121 wounded at X-Ray. Another battalion (2nd Battalion, 7th Cavalry) lost some 150 killed at LZ Albany. The Vietnamese lost upwards of 2,500 in the Ia Drang battles.

The 1st Air Cavalry division was formed at Fort Benning, 1963-65 as the 11th Air Assault Division (Test). Moore joined the embryonic unit in January 1964. He was a lieutenant colonel during the Ia Drang fighting.

And the Ia Drang Valley campaign was to be the test-run for the Army's then-new air mobile concept — infantry assaults via helicopter.

But the campaign became much more than that. It turned into a killing ground and life-and-death struggle that some say will be played out on the Army's sand tables wherever infantrymen are trained for years to come.

Their book was a long time coming, Moore said in a recent Columbus interview. Work began in earnest in the spring of 1983. It got shelved for a while, but the general kept pecking away at it with taped interviews and mailed-out forms the men who served with the 7th Cavalry would fill in and return to the "old man."

But the authors didn't stop with the notes and memories of old boys in green who served together in another world. The general made two trips to North Vietnam to sit down with the North Vietnamese officers who were in command during the bloody hell that LZ X-Ray and LZ-Albany touched off.

The Vietnamese came with detailed maps and old campaign notes, to talk about those fights, Moore said. Both commanders learned from those meetings, he said.

Plumley, who retired from the Army after 32 years in green and now lives in Columbus, became one of the first-ever command sergeant majors in 1967. He calls the book "good writing," and says it's obvious "there's been a hell of a lot of work put into it."

The sergeant major remembers that "the old man and I rode the first chopper in and the last chopper out" of LZ X-Ray and he remembers that the command post was right in the middle of the firefight, not in some remote, safe area.

Does the book bring back nightmares?

The sergeant major says you have some of those anyway, but it's "not something you dwell on." One of the many harrowing moments at X-Ray was when the Air Force "dropped napalm on us" the second day, so closely that a doctor helping with the injured appeared to have been singed by the heat.

Twenty-seven years later, the doctor says "he still doesn't have the courage, yet, to look at that tape," according to Moore.

Moore says that despite the heat, fatigue, desperate enemy and the first day's "struggle for survival" never did he think that "as a battalion, we'd go down."

The "Ia Drang" was a horror story, but it was also a significant event in Army history. Col. David Hackworth, author of the best-selling "About Face," calls "We Were Soldiers Once . . . And Young" "the most significant book to come out of the Vietnam War."

Moore, who scoffs at the Vietnam War movie genre, says none has come close to the reality of soldiers at war.

If you want a close-up look, try his version.

COMMENTARY

Special force proved to be a big success

The First Special Service Force was activated at Fort William Henry Harrison, near Helena, Montana, on July 19, 1942. The soldiers, all volunteers, were carefully screened. Each man agreed to undergo parachute training, as well as amphibious, mountain, and winter commando tactical training.

In addition to the Alaska Highway, another remarkable facet of U.S.-Canadian collaboration during World War II was the creation of the First Special Service Force. Unique in its composition, training, equipment, and organization, and outstanding for its fighting ability, the Force was an experiment without parallel in the histories of the U.S. and Canadian armies.

Al Garland

The Force had its beginnings in early 1942 when Vice Admiral Lord Louis Mountbatten, British Chief of Combined Operations, interested Gen. George Marshall in an operation called PLOUGH. Mountbatten believed that a force specially trained and equipped to operate over snow could be used successfully in sabotage raids on Norwegian and alpine hydroelectric and Romanian oil-producing installations, as well as being used to divert German forces from the projected Allied cross-Channel invasion.

Since the British were in no position to produce in sufficient time a proper kind of oversnow vehicle, Mountbatten offered the entire project to Marshall, who accepted it.

Various U.S. agencies, with Canadian assistance, went to work and made rapid progress in designing and producing the vehicle, which was named the Weasel. Lt. Col. (soon Colonel) Robert T. Frederick was tasked with organizing, commanding, and training the unit that would use the vehicle in the proposed manner. He was told his unit might eventually consist of U.S., British, Canadian, and Norwegian soldiers.

Accordingly, he developed the tables of organization and equipment for the unit, which was soon designated as the First Special Service Force (FSSF). As it turned out, British and Norwegian participation did not materialize, although a few Norwegian ski instructors and intelligence specialists were used in training the Force's soldiers.

Canada did agree, after lengthy negotiations, to participate and agreed to furnish a contingent of 47 officers and 650 other ranks. As a condition for its commitment, the Canadian government retained the right to review any operational project that might be contemplated.

The FSSF was activated at Fort William Henry Harrison, near Helena, Montana, on July 19, 1942. The soldiers, all volunteers, were carefully screened. Each man agreed to undergo parachute training, as well as amphibious, mountain, and winter commando tactical training.

The Force was organized into a combat element of 108 officers and 1,167 enlisted men, and a service battalion of 25 officers and 521 enlisted men. The service battalion was made up wholly of U.S. personnel and provided all supply, administrative, messing, and similar facilities.

The combat element comprised Force headquarters and three regiments of two battalions each. Each battalion was divided into three companies, each company into three platoons, and each platoon into two sections, the basic fighting unit of nine men each.

Within the combat echelon, Canadians and Americans were integrated without regard to nationality. Officer and noncommissioned officer appointments were initially allocated on a proportionate basis. Thereafter, promotions were made on the basis of ability, without regard to nationality. This system proved quite successful and resulted in an approximately equal division of promotions.

The Force's weapons were the standard infantry individual weapons used by the U.S. Army, to which were added 60mm mortars, flame throwers, and rocket launchers.

At Fort William Henry Harrison the soldiers undertook an accelerated training program. After early parachute qualification (a two-day course), each man was given intensive training in the use of all of the Force's weapons, in operating the Weasel, and in demolitions, skiing, rock climbing, and hand-to-hand combat. By early June 1943, and after additional training in Vermont, the FSSF was rated ready for combat. In July, after a planned Norwegian operation was canceled, the Force sailed for the Aleutian islands and spearheaded the U.S. and Canadian assault units in the operation to retake Kiska from the Japanese occupying force. After landing on Aug. 15, the Force discovered the Japanese occupiers had evacuated the island some weeks before.

The Force returned to the U.S., underwent a short period of additional training, and then sailed for Italy to join the U.S. Fifth Army. It went into line in late November 1943 and remained engaged in bitter mountain warfare until early January 1944 when it was pulled out of line to go to Anzio.

It arrived in the Anzio beachhead in early February 1944 and held the east flank of the line until its relief on May 9, 1944. It then took part in the Allied drive on Rome and a Force detachment on June 4, was one of the first Allied elements to make a permanent entry into that city.

In August, the Force took part in the Allied invasion of southern France and by Sept. 9 was in position along the Franco-Italian border. By now, Frederick, who had received his first star, had emerged as one of the best combat commanders the U.S Army produced during the war. He soon received his second star and took command of the U.S. 45th Infantry Division.

By joint agreement, the U.S. and Canadian governments decided to disband the Force, and its inactivation took place in France on Dec. 5, 1944. The Canadian component went off to join the British armies in northwest Europe.

A month later, a large part of the U.S. component went off to join the U.S. 82d and 101st Airborne Divisions, while the remainder were assigned to the newly activated U.S. 474th Infantry Regiment (Separate). Oddly enough, this regiment, at the end of the war, found itself in Norway (the Force's original objective) disarming German troops.

Although it was not used for the purpose it was intended, the FSSF proved itself in battle. From the point of view of U.S.-Canadian relations, the unique experiment was a remarkable success.

As an aside, I know of only one individual in Columbus who served with the FSSF — retired Maj. Ed Bunch. He was one of the unit's original members and fought with it throughout the war (winning a battlefield commission along the way), although he did have to take two months off to recover from a serious stomach wound.

Couple wins $12 million for gas poisoning

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

David Elliott is "totally and permanently disabled" and Barbara Elliott also suffered injuries that probably will remain forever, the judge said in his verdict.

The federal government must pay retired Staff Sgt. David Elliott Jr. and his wife $12 million for injuries they received in 1989 when a faulty water heater filled their Fort Benning home with lethal carbon monoxide gas, a Columbus judge has ruled.

U.S. District Judge J. Robert Elliott ruled last week that the government owes Sgt. Elliott $9 million and his wife, Barbara $3 million because of negligence in not repairing a leaky ventilation pipe.

Judge Elliott handed down the verdict in Columbus on Nov. 10. He took several weeks to weigh the evidence and attorneys' final briefs following a weeklong trial without a jury in June.

Plaintiffs' attorneys, Neal Pope and Earle Lasseter of Columbus, said they expect the government to appeal to the 11th Circuit Court of Appeals in Atlanta.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Randy Aderholdt, in Macon, said he will recommend to the Army and the U.S. Justice Department in Washington that we appeal. If those agencies approve it could take six to eight months to ready the appeal, Aderholdt said.

He said the doctrine that basically says that a soldier can't sue the Army for injuries he receives "while doing his duty" should have kept this case from going to court. Elliott ruled about a year ago that the doctrine didn't apply in this case because the injured soldier was on leave, Aderholdt said. He believes an appeals court will overturn the verdict on behalf of David Elliott for that reason, Aderholdt intimated.

Aderholdt said he has "no idea" how long it might take the 11th Circuit Court to hear the appeal once the paperwork to get it there is completed. "But interest is running" in case David and Barbara Elliott "prevail on appeal," Aderholdt said.

Pope called the judgment "by far the largest verdict against the government ever awarded in this area" for injuries he said "are about as bad as you could have without killing someone."

The case could end up before the U.S. Supreme Court over whether a soldier can sue the government in such a case, Pope said.

David Elliott is "totally and permanently disabled" and Barbara Elliott also suffered injuries that probably will remain forever, the judge said in his verdict.

He said the Army was responsible for the injuries since on-post housing inspectors had not replaced a faulty vent pipe on the heater, which was supposed to be replaced when a new water heater was installed in 1985. He found that "had the defendant replaced the vent pipe, this incident would not have occurred."

Barbara Elliott's supervisor in the Finance and Accounting Office on post went looking for her on the morning of Aug. 29, 1989, when Mrs. Elliott didn't show up for work on time.

Mrs. Elliott was found comatose on a bed and Sgt. Elliott was unconscious on a living room couch, according to testimony in the case. The Elliotts were hospitalized for several days and Sgt. Elliott's medical bills since then have exceeded $400,000, the judge said in his verdict.

Judge Elliott wrote in the verdict that an assistant fire chief on post, after the accident, said the pipe was "rotten and a hazard in terms of emitting gases into the apartment."

A few weeks after the mishap, the Army medically retired Sgt. Elliott after 11 years of service, saying he would draw 75 percent of his base pay tax-free for life. Later, the Elliotts were ordered to move out of on-post housing. The Army said that since he was no longer in the Army David Elliott could no longer live on post.

A few days after the Elliotts were injured in their home in the Upatoi housing area, post employees began replacing vent pipes in about 150 houses in the neighborhood. The project had been planned, but it was sped up "to try to ensure that this won't happen again," a post spokesman said at the time.

The judge awarded $3.01 million to Barbara Elliott for pain and suffering, permanent injuries and loss of income. He said David Elliott's injuries, pain, loss of income and "lost of enjoyment of life" is worth $8.97 million.

Staff Writer Eileen Zaffiro contributed to this report.

White to whip fitness school into shape

To focus more on changes in lifestyle

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

Lt. Col. Dave White has change on his mind for the Army's Physical Fitness School at Fort Benning. It's not personality, but performance that will drive the change as he helps push for what he sees as needed revisions in physical fitness programs throughout the Army.

White is not spearheading some radical reform. What he wants to do is push for physical fitness training programs that will focus more on lifestyle and long-term benefits than on passing the Army's physical fitness tests.

His changes would reflect a continuation of the push to make physical training more than push-ups and sit-ups, more than a push for high marks on the Army's physical training tests, even beyond the Army's well-publicized "smoking cessation program" that is now several years old and is generally regarded as a huge success.

In recent years, the Army has moved away from a rigid exercise regimen that was heavy in running, jumping jacks and other routines that could be destructive over relatively long periods of time.

The new fitness school administrator, who arrived at Fort Benning in August, says that his predecessors came "essentially from a physical education background" and that his background and education may mean some changes in how the Master Physical Fitness Trainers who finish the school look at fitness programs.

White has a Ph.D. in Educational Administration from the University of Utah and a Masters of Education Degree from Georgia State University.

He wants to focus on "physical fitness as something everyone does," looking at programs with "a different slant" from that of some commanders, who just want to be sure their soldiers get high marks on PT tests. He agrees that combat effectiveness and physical training go hand in hand, but he wants to get past the attitude that just getting in and staying in shape well enough to do a job is enough for soldiers.

The commandant says the relocation of the Fitness School from Fort Benjamin Harrison in Indiana in the last year at least puts it "more in the mainstream of the Army."

White, 45, wants to see tomorrow's fitness programs keyed more toward lifelong benefits, with the Army actively involved not just in its so-called "smoking cessation" policy, but also in pointing soldiers and their families toward dietary and lifestyle changes that will benefit them now and years in the future.

"I think the attitude's beginning to focus on fitness as an area larger than just exercising," he said in a recent interview. "Nutrition, and lifestyle as well" will get more emphasis, White says, adding that future programs will teach fitness "with a goal of lifetime values as opposed to just being able to pass the PT test."

If that's what he wants, White is in the right place to push it. After all, the school and its 18 civilian and Army personnel write the book on fitness, whether it's for a Ranger outfit that wants to concentrate on conditioning for road marches, or an Airborne unit whose commander wants a PT program built around cutting down on foot and leg injuries.

Master Fitness Trainers "have been being trained that way" — with an eye toward long-term benefits for the last nine or 10 years, White said. "It's just that units have tended to focus on their own PT programs and passing PT tests," he said.

Concentrating on getting soldiers involved in fitness, nutrition and exercise programs with long-term goals will "give you an Army in a better state of readiness," White said.

That training could involve stress-management programs as well as individually tailored fitness programs tailored for different units' combat roles. For example, artillery outfits will probably need more exercises tailored toward lifting and moving heavy loads than do administrative types who should be involved in more general programs.

Under that theory, a soldier in a light infantry unit ought to be concerned more with running and toting heavy loads like he would be required to carry into combat, White notes.

For some 15 years now, the Army has been changing how it exercises. Gone are the days of long-distance running in combat boots and some of the old exercises like deep-knee bends and jumping jacks that by themselves could cause injuries to knees or backs.

A couple of other things White expects to see evolve include better fitness programs for pregnant women aimed at keeping them healthier as well as getting them back into the ranks and deployable status sooner after delivery. He calls that "maternity fitness." About one in eight Master Fitness Trainers is female and there are some 7,000 of those trainers — male and female — scattered throughout the Army.

One other thing Master Fitness Trainers from the school under White may become better at: tailoring individual fitness programs for soldiers and their dependents, whether it's to increase muscle bulk, add or subtract weight, stop smoking, improve cardio-pulmonary function or build endurance.

Active-duty soldiers will not be the only ones to benefit from the training here. White's instructors also teach reserve component classes and he says the "reserve components have really increased their emphasis on physical fitness."

Look for White and his instructors to author the Bible for the Army's fitness programs for the 21st century. And look for it to deal with everything from exercise programs to "mental fitness" to dental health, stress management and the horrors of junk food.

The book won't be fast coming. First it has to get the approval of the Training and Doctrine Command. But if it is successful, look for TRADOC to push it as an Army-wide program, probably to be labeled "Physical Fitness 2000."

Researchers using electricity in effort to improve MREs

From wire reports

SPOKANE, Wash. — Food researchers are turning to electricity to improve "meals-ready-to-eat" fed U.S. soldiers.

Washington State University said last week it will share a nearly $1 million Army grant with Tacoma-based Nalley's Fine Foods to develop more palatable fare for the field.

Bacteria and other undesirable organisms in liquid food can be destroyed with pulses of high-voltage electricity rather than traditional heating methods, said researcher Barry Swanson.

The technique destroys bacteria without subjecting food to high temperatures, which can dull flavor and decrease vitamin content, said Rich Meyer, a vice president at Nalley's.

Using a set of electrodes about one millimeter wide, WSU scientists pulsed electricity through raindrop-sized portions of grape juice, yogurt and bouillon.

The electricity kills off food-borne microorganisms while leaving vitamins and minerals intact, Meyer said.

If the process proves feasible on a large scale, electricity could be pulsed through food immediately after it is processed in the factory, he said.

The research was made possible by new advances in producing extremely high voltages for very short durations. Up to 25 kilovolts of electricity could be pulsed through food in about a millionth of a second, said Swanson, a professor of food sciences and nutrition at WSU.

Swanson said relatively simple workplace precautions would be necessary to protect workers from the high voltages involved. But he said he could think of no dangers to consumers from food sterilized through the process.

The Army hopes the grant will lead to better tasting and more nutritional portable meals, said Patrick Dunne, a food engineering scientist for the Army's Research Development and Engineering Center in Natick, Mass.

The work could also allow soldiers to dine in the field on foods that can't go into MREs now because they would spoil, such as dairy products.

"It looks like it could lead to a real breakthrough in both the quality and variety of foods available," Dunne said.

The MREs, which replaced the military's tin-can C-rations beginning in 1980, are ready-made meals contained in plastic pouches. They have an average shelf life of five years and are used mostly by the Army and Marine Corps.

Meyer said scientists are attempting to validate the WSU findings and plan to buy or build equipment big enough to handle solid foods.

Researchers hope the technology can someday replace most frozen and canned foods.

"What we hope to get out of this is a restaurant-quality, shelf-stable food," Meyer said. "It could have quite an impact on frozen and canned foods."

MOVIE REVIEW

'Dracula' fails to satisfy moviegoers' horror pangs

By Dave Kehr
Chicago Tribune

Following in the footsteps of F.W. Murnau ("Nosferatu"), Tod Browning ("Dracula") and Carl Dreyer ("Vampyr"), Francis Ford Coppola has taken his crack at the legend of the undead.

As promising as the conjunction of America's most technically advanced and stylistically audacious filmmaker with the most cinematically potent of supernatural tales might have seemed on paper, the results are choppy and unsatisfying.

"Bram Stoker's Dracula" is a film that fails to make the most of its good ideas and spends far too much time fussing over its bad ones.

Never at home with eroticism on the screen, Coppola has chosen to make sex — and sex in its darker, kinkier, more forbidden forms — the central metaphor of his film.

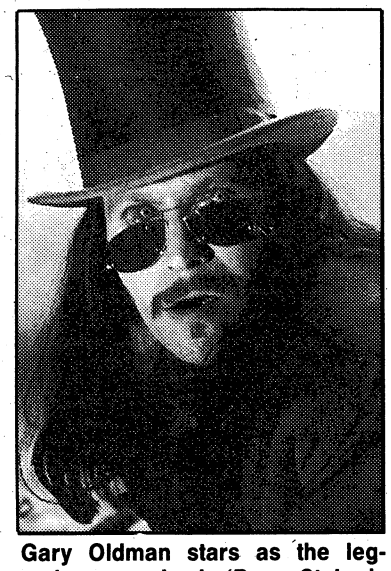
But huff and puff as the movie might, it fails to generate any real real heat, perhaps because the principals are so thinly defined and poorly developed.

As Dracula, the ancient Romanian aristocrat come to Victorian London in search of life and light, Coppola has cast Gary Oldman, the British actor who made his first international impression as the zomboid Sid Vicious of "Sid and Nancy" and was most recently seen as Oliver Stone's meek, victimized Lee Harvey Oswald in "JFK."

Mina Harker, the staunch daughter of the British bourgeoisie who becomes the focus of Dracula's dark passions (and, in some versions of the tale, his most effective opponent), is played by Winona Ryder — a perverse choice for her first grown-up role. (Her first screen kiss becomes, in effect, a murder/suicide.)

As Van Helsing, the utch professor of exotic medicine who is the world's leading expert on vampires, there is the venerable British ham Anthony Hopkins, fresh from his Oscar-winning, scenery-chomping serial killer in "The Silence of the Lambs."

And yet, Coppola has managed to neutralize most of this talent, by subjecting his actors to the demands of his elaborate visual style rather than making them a part of the movie's overall design. They aren't employed as actors, but only as figures in a storyboard.



Gary Oldman stars as the legendary vampire in 'Bram Stoker's Dracula.'

It isn't easy to get a fix on Oldman's Dracula, as he evolves through a series of different looks — including a handsome young 15th century prince, bloodily defeating a Turkish army in the film's motivational prologue; a withered, sexless crone with a Kabuki pompadour planning his invasion of 19th century London; and a slathering man-beast who confronts Van Helsing near the film's finale.

Only in his middle incarnation — as a dashing young dandy who accosts Mina in a London street — does Oldman have much of a chance to stand on his own, without the encumbrances of heavy makeup and costuming. He's handsome and needful enough, though hardly the magnetic figure the part requires. Oldman doesn't possess what Andrew Sarris once memorably described as Bela Lugosi's "demented poetry" nor the sexual threat of Christopher Lee.

Though in most versions of the tale, including Stoker's, Mina is the pivotal point of the story's basic conflict between middle-class sexual reticence and the decadent pleasures of a dying aristocracy, Coppola has eliminated much of the tension by making Mina a fully liberated, modern young woman.

She now sneaks looks at erotic engravings, sips absinthe in smoky bars and succumbs almost immediately to Dracula's seductions, throwing over her hopelessly square husband (Keanu Reeves, in a wholly thankless role) in favor of forbidden, vampirish pleasures. No longer a terrified virgin, she has become a sort of 19th century Madonna, a sexual adventurer ready and eager to defy convention.

Even so, Mina is upstaged by her wealthy best friend Lucy Westenra (Sadie Frost), a man-eating redhead who asks Mina if her husband "measures up" and becomes Dracula's first victim in England. In the film's steamiest sequence (the movie was briefly threatened with an NC-17 rating), Lucy allows herself to be ravaged in a rainstorm by the Count in his wolf form, as Mina looks on.

Arriving with Lucy is a whole host of secondary characters — including three suitors played by Richard E. Grant, Cary Elwes and Bill Campbell — whom the movie could have done without.

Coppola and his screenwriter, James V. Hart, have restored a number of characters that most versions, wisely it now seems, have eliminated. Even with a running time of two hours and 10 minutes, the movie doesn't have room to accommodate them all, and most make only perfunctory, obviously pruned appearances (Tom Waits' mad Renfield seems a particular victim). The film rushes along from incident to incident, leaving no time for atmosphere to develop or characters to take hold.

But if this "Dracula" doesn't function as drama, it does have its merits as a visual extravaganza. Noting the near simultaneity of "Dracula's" publication and the birth of the movies (Coppola's Dracula first seduces Mina at a Victorian "cinematographe"), Coppola has turned to silent-era techniques for his special effects, including accelerated motion, extensive matte and miniature work, and artfully composed superimpositions and dissolves.

Working with cinematographer Michael Ballhaus, production designer Thomas Sanders and costume designer Eiko Ishioka, Coppola has tried to capture the fin-de-siecle spirit of symbolist painting.

The reference contains an interesting suggestion, one that makes Dracula the projection of a social-historical moment rather than the usual psycho-sexual forces, and one that is probably closer to Coppola's own gifts for social portraiture, as manifested in the Godfather films. Following that line, Coppola might have composed a "Dracula" to remember, rather than one to endure.

"Bram Stoker's Dracula," rated R, is now playing at Carmike Cinema 7. Violence, adult situations, brief nudity.

Cadets mix machine guns, democracy

Latin American troops move quietly through the forests on Fort Benning.

Post's School of Americas stays busy

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

Staccato M-16 fire, along with long, guttural M-60 machine gun bursts, chew up the "enemy" 100 yards downrange. Camouflaged figures flit from behind trees to drop and shoot from behind logs lying around a hilly engagement area.

Mortar rounds pop, spewing dense smoke.

Radios squeal and squawk. But, to an observer, its only gibberish.

There's no radio problem. It's just that these mostly 19-year-old troops are speaking Spanish. There's good reason for that: They're all from the Dominican Republic and the Republic of Colombia, seniors at military academies back home, stationed at Fort Benning for 20 weeks to complete the School of the Americas' "cadet course."

This live-fire exercise, where the "enemy" is pop-up targets, is the culmination of their training in individual, squad and platoon-level infantry tactics, explains Lt. Col. John Bastone, head of the SOA's Department of Tactics and Combined Arms.

School of the Americas cadets mix machine guns and democracy

By year's end, the school will have pushed 700 to 900 Central American youngsters through the course.

But this course is not all just about shooting and maneuvering and communicating: There is also a strong dose of indoctrination in democracy that goes along with it, as well as some English language instruction.

Col. Jose Feliciano, the School of the Americas commandant, is an observer today while Bastone's instructors, most of them noncommissioned officers are putting these soldiers through their paces. There's an evaluator — a senior sergeant or officer with each squad.

Bastone is also keeping his eyes on this exercise. SOA noncommissioned officers are running the show, and they don't have a problem with the language — they're all bilingual in English and Spanish. Capt. Bert Colon is the officer-in-charge.

This is no walk-through — and no cheap show. The platoon's three squads work their way toward a known observation point, where they'll hit an enemy outfit, M-16s at the ready.

While two squads move to assault a little hillock where the enemy is lodged, another squad hits the deck some 100 yards from the enemy and unleashes a hail of small-caliber rounds. The smell of cordite is heavy in the air. Tracer rounds ricochet and scream across the objective and dummy mortar explosions add a touch of realism.

In about 15 minutes, the enemy is wiped out — even the remote-controlled pop-up targets have quit bouncing up after they're "killed." Now these aggressive young men roll over the objective and wipe out a theoretical counter-attack force.

There are a variety of other SOA courses annually. An officers' advanced course, a sniper course, a basic infantry officers' course, a NCO development course and another handful of special operations-type courses run by the Special Operations Command at Fort Bragg, although the courses are conducted here.

School officials predict some 1,900 students will attend SOA courses next year, compared to some 1,600 this year.

Feliciano has good words for these troops, and also points out to a visitor that "everything didn't go perfect." But he softens that by noting that these are mostly "kids," the equivalent of fourth-year ROTC or service academy students.

He gets in a plug for democracy, along with congratulations, telling these students, "We hope you take back home with you what you have learned here" — from tactics to how to deal with prisoners-of-war and civilians these soldiers might run into some day when the bullets that are flying are real.

Spencer trounced, still makes the playoffs

From staff reports

It was a good news, bad news Friday for the Spencer High Greenwave in Fort Valley.

The good news was Spencer earning the berth in the Region 3-AAA playoffs it wanted when Kendrick defeated Shaw in Kinnett Stadium. The bad news was No.2 Peach County's one-sided 34-3 pasting of the Greenwave at Anderson Field.

Spencer, 5-5 and 2-4 in the region, gets a second crack at Peach County tonight when the Greenwave returns to Fort Valley to challenge the unbeaten Trojans in the first round of the playoffs.

Maurece Williams gained 182 yards on 23 carries for Spencer but, after an early 3-0 lead on a Scott Kyser field goal, the Greenwave never really got a handle on things. Peach County scored 10 points in the second quarter to take a 10-3 halftime lead and used a 24-point second half to win going away.

Penalties — 124 yards of them — plagued the Greenwave. Three players were ejected during the game, two for fighting and another for hitting the holder while Peach County attempted a field goal.

Deer check station open for business

The Department of Natural Resources deer check station, building 5883, in Harmony Church is now open from 7:45 a.m. to 4:15 p.m. Monday through Friday and from 8 a.m. to 8 p.m. Saturday and Sunday.

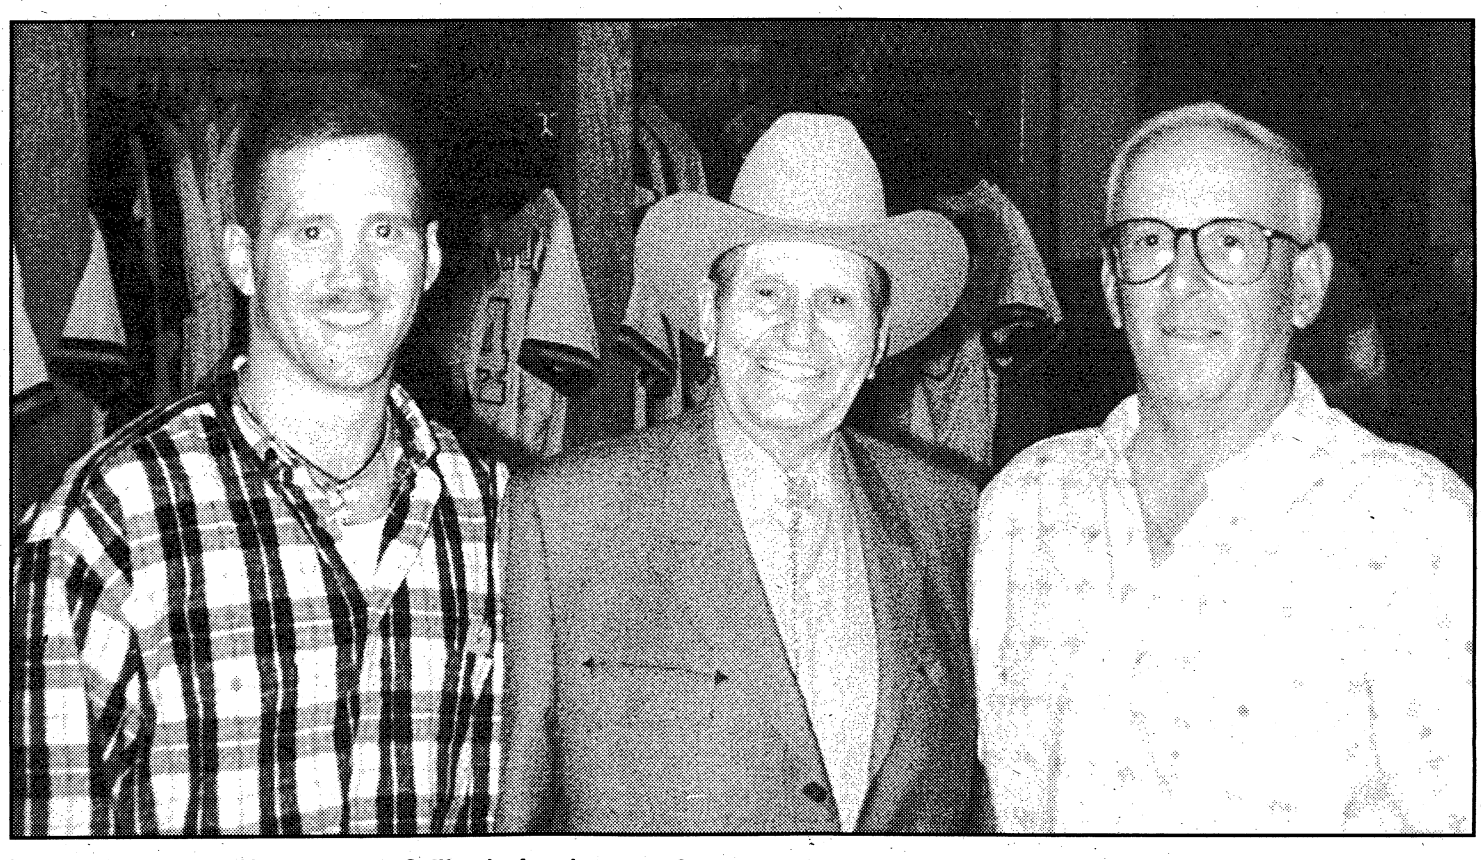
DNR staff members will take samples of blood and ticks to check for Lyme disease. They will also weigh the deer, check its age and measure its antlers.

The check station will be closed Thanksgiving and Christmas.

ARMS CHAMPIONSHIP: The U.S. Army Infantry Center Small Arms Championship will be Dec. 7 through 11 at McAndrews, Wagner and Shelton ranges.

Competition will include individual and team participation with the M-60 machine gun, 9mm pistol and M-16A2 rifle.

Deadlines for entries is Nov. 20. For more information, call Sgt. 1st Class John Gonzales or Staff Sgt. Pierre McKnight at 545-4525 or 545-2917.



Sgt. Tim Lachemann (l) got to meet California Angels owner Gene Autry (c), and throw out the first ball at a game at Anaheim Stadium last season. Tim's father, Bill (r), is a minor league manager in Phoenix.

A baseball family

Sergeant's uncle managing new Florida Marlins club

By Dan Pever
Correspondent

Sgt. Tim Lachemann is looking for the 1965 rookie baseball card of Jim "Catfish" Hunter but not because he's a huge fan of the famous mustachioed Hall of Fame pitcher.

The card, which features a pair of rookies for the Oakland Athletics, is one he can relate to — literally. Hunter also shares billing with his uncle, Rene Lachemann, manager of one of Major League Baseball's newest teams, the Florida Marlins.

"You wouldn't believe how many people have asked me for tickets when the Marlins come up next year to play the Atlanta Braves," said Lachemann, a member of Charlie Co. 317th Engineer Battalion on Kelley Hill.

"A lot of people say I look like Rene when he was younger. He's a good guy, he's a funny man."

There's no doubt that baseball is the game of choice in the Lachemann family. The Alou and DiMaggio brothers have nothing on the Lachemann's — the family reads like a Who's Who in Baseball.

Another uncle, Marcel, a former pitcher for Oakland and pitching coach for the California Angels, will be the Marlins' pitching coach.

His father, Bill, a former catcher in the Los Angeles Dodgers organization, is now a minor league manager in Phoenix for the Angels' rookie-league team. He had the honor recently of coaching the first Russians to play in the Major League Baseball system. He was an all-city catcher in Los Angeles, a hotbed for baseball talent.

Prior to managing the Marlins, Rene was a catcher for the Athletics and managed the Seattle Mariners and Milwaukee Brewers. He most recently was the third base coach for the A's and has a World Series ring from when they defeated the San Francisco Giants in 1989. He was a batboy for the Dodgers in the 1950s when they won a world championship.

His cousin, Brett Lachemann, Uncle Marcel's son, is a minor league pitcher in the Angels' organization.

Tim, who has been at Fort Benning since 1990, is a catcher like his father. He played at Skyline Jr. College in San Francisco and is now the catcher for the Columbus city team, the Royals.

"You wouldn't believe how many people have asked me for tickets when the Marlins come up next year to play the Atlanta Braves," said Sgt. Tim Lachemann, a member of Charlie Co. 317th Engineer Battalion on Kelley Hill.

When Tim came back from Desert Storm, he received a very pleasant surprise two weeks later. He had the honor of throwing out the first pitch for the Angels in Anaheim Stadium. As a memento, he was given a bat with all of the Angels' autographs, including Dave Winfield's, who was on the Angels last year before leading the Toronto Blue Jays to a championship this year.

"My father was the catcher when I threw it and my name was on the scoreboard. Winfield was in the dugout. It was a quite a rush," Tim said.

"The funny part was that no one told me I was going to throw out the first pitch so it was a surprise. Wally Joyner (first baseman) said 'Is your arm loose?' and then he told me and I said 'Wait a minute.' It was quite a thrill. There were more fans in the stands than in my hometown in Montana.

"There were a lot of cameras there and they told me not to be nervous and make sure I got the ball to my father at the plate. But it was great, I got to meet Gene Autry (owner of the Angels) and Jimmy Reese, who was a roommate of Babe Ruth."

Now 28, Tim has been around Major League Baseball all of his life. His father went to high school with former Cincinnati Reds manager and current Detroit Tigers manager Sparky Anderson. Anderson came to his house in Great Falls, Montana, when he was 11 or 12 and gave a speech to the children. That was in 1975, the year Anderson managed the Big Red Machine to a World Series victory.

Tim says he knew there was something special about his family when Rene got his first managing position with the Mariners.

"We would all sit in front of the television and say 'Hey, there's Uncle Rene.' One time he got mad and went crazy and threw an ice chest on the field and got tossed out of the game.

"He's a very smart man about baseball, very knowledgeable," Tim said. "He gets the most out of his players."

Nothing personal to Catfish Hunter, Tim says, but at $150 for the rookie card of the two, he would prefer Rene had a card to himself.

"Then maybe I could afford it," he said.

HISTORY

WW II 50TH ANNIVERSARY

On the Eastern Front 50 years ago this week, Gen. Erich von Manstein arrived to take command of the beleaguered German Army Group A, finding the once-advancing forces significantly worn down by the harsh Russian winter conditions and an encircling Soviet army. Despite the realities of the situation, Adolph Hitler, inexplicably, ordered von Manstein to hold Stalingrad with little or no chance for escape.

Here, according to research by the Military History Division at Fort Benning, were the top news items of the week:

■

In New Guinea, Australian and American attacks initially broke through Japanese positions at Gona, only to be driven back later.

■

In North Africa, Field Marshal Bernard Montgomery halted his pursuing British Eighth Army in Libya to reorganize. This allowed the fleeing Axis troops to safely withdraw from El Agheila. The British advance had pushed the Germans back 600 miles in the last 14 days.

■

Also in North Africa, in Tunisia, British forces drove the Germans out of Mediez el Bab in Tunisia as U.S. tanks raided a German airfield at Djedeida.

■

In Greece, local resistance fighters, benefiting from British support, blew up an important viaduct on the Athens-Salonika railroad at Gorgopotamos, cutting off a railroad used to supply Field Marshal Erwin Rommel's Afrika Korps.

■

Fort Benning officials announced the arrival of the post's first contingent of the Women's Army Auxiliary Corps, the 43rd WAAC Post Headquarters Company. The Auxiliary Corps effectively assumed service support positions previously held by enlisted Army servicemen.

Off-post clinic to expand, treat families

Winder, Kelley Hill facilities to be consolidated

By Linda Bosley Dailey
Staff Writer

PHP Healthcare Corp., an Alexandria, Va.-based firm, last week won the contract to operate an off-post family practice clinic for Fort Benning's Martin Army Community Hospital.

PHP, which currently operates the Primary Care for the Uniformed Services (PRIMUS) Clinic on Boxwood Place in central Columbus, will expand its facility and convert by Feb. 1 to a clinic that provides primary medical care to only those military beneficiaries assigned there.

Until Feb. 1, the clinic will continue to operate as a walk-in clinic for those eligible for military health care services.

The award of the multimillion dollar contract to PHP is part of Martin Army Community Hospital's effort to implement a managed care program for the families of active duty and deceased soldiers, retirees and their families. Soldiers will continue to be treated at troop medical clinics on post.

Called Gateway to Care, the managed care program is designed to trim health care costs while increasing patients' access to care. It is the Army's part of a Defense Department-wide managed care program called Coordinated Care.

Establishing the PRIMUS Family Practice Clinic, for example, will allow Martin Army to begin providing primary care to area retirees and their families, a group of beneficiaries largely denied access to family practice clinics here previously because of a lack of resources and staffing, Lt. Col. Charles Bottoms said earlier. Bottoms is Martin Army's chief of Coordinated Care.

Details about the five-year contract — such as its total cost — have not yet been provided to hospital officials by the Army's Health Services Command, which let the contract, Bottoms said Tuesday. But the cost for the first eight months of the contract — from Feb. 1 through Sept. 30, the end of the government fiscal year — is $1.98 million dollars, Bottoms said. The annual cost in subsequent years will be higher because the contract will be in effect for all 12 months of the fiscal year and will be adjusted for inflation, Bottoms said.

The number of patients assigned to the clinic also affects the contract's cost, said John Wynn, Martin Army Community Hospital's marketing director. The hospital will pay a flat fee to PHP for a certain number of patients, and then will pay an additional sum for each additional patient assigned there. "It works very much the same" as a health maintenance organization (HMO), he said.

Initially, hospital officials expect to assign 16,000 patients to the PRIMUS Family Practice Clinic, and that number may grow to as many 20,000 in the future, Wynn said.

The PRIMUS clinic will be renovated in the coming months to increase the 6,500-square-foot building by 2,000 square feet and provide additional room for record storage, offices and examination rooms, said Wayne Vinson, PHP's project manager at the PRIMUS clinic. The clinic will remain open during the construction, which will be completed by Feb. 1, he said.

Vinson expects to add some clerical workers to his staff to handle records and appointments under the new contract. Doctors will be added as the patient load warrants, he said.

Currently the clinic has a staff of full- and part-time employees equivalent to 19 full-time workers, plus 10-12 full- and part-time doctors. About 60,000 patients visited the clinic in fiscal 1992, Vinson said. However, he doesn't expect the number of patient visits to change significantly when it becomes a family practice clinic with an assigned population, he said.

Initially, hospital officials expect to assign 16,000 patients to the PRIMUS Family Practice Clinic, and that number may grow to as many 20,000 in the future.

Construction to enlarge another of Martin Army's family practice clinics — the on-post Winder Health Clinic in Sand Hill — was completed just last week, Bottoms said. Early in January, officials plan to merge the Winder and the Kelley Hill family practice clinics. Staff and patients from the Kelley Hill clinic will be transferred to the newly expanded Winder Health Clinic. The Kelley Hill facility may become a troop medical clinic, he said.

Officials decided to merge the clinics into one because they determined a single, larger clinic could operate more efficiently and treat more patients than the two smaller clinics could separately, Bottoms said.

In the future, treatment at family practice clinics will be limited to those assigned there. And to get assigned to a family practice clinic, patients must join the Gateway to Care program. Even those already assigned to a family practice clinic must join if they wish to continue being treated there, officials said.

Hospital officials are continuing to hold briefings at which they explain Gateway to Care, answer questions and register beneficiaries for the program. Information on the schedule of briefings is available from the program's health care finder, at 544-1447 or 544-1591.

Joining Gateway to Care is not mandatory. Those who don't will be able to get treatment from the hospital's outpatient clinic or, if necessary, the emergency room at Martin Army.

Hospital hires a child psychiatrist

From staff reports

With the assignment of a child psychiatrist Dr. (Maj.) Karl Zeff to its staff, Martin Army Community Hospital now offers additional child and adolescent psychiatric services.

Rather than having to refer all child and adolescent patients to civilian providers for psychiatric treatment, the hospital can provide some inpatient and outpatient services on post, said Dr. (Lt. Col.) Andrea Bradford, chief of the department of psychiatry at the hospital and of the post's community mental health service.

Although the request to have a child psychiatrist on staff had been made years ago, the efforts to implement the Gateway to Care program — which seeks to lower health care costs and increase patients' access to care — helped get the request finally approved, Bradford said.

Using military rather than civilian health care providers eliminates CHAMPUS fees and co-payments.

Most of the services offered to youth initially will be evaluation and testing because with only one child psychiatrist on staff, the ability to provide treatment remains limited, she said. Currently, Martin Army is handling all the evaluations, but offers adolescent in-patient treatment only to 17-year-olds. Eventually, in-patient services also will be available to younger children, too, Bradford said.

The services available include testing children for learning disorders and evaluation for any kind of psychiatric disorder, such as behavioral problems, depression or substance abuse, Bradford said.

But the services don't focus on the child alone. The services also will be offered to families. The family is such an integral part of the child's life, Bradford said, "If you don't assess the family at the same time, then it's really an incomplete assessment."

Those interested in scheduling an appointment for the child, adolescent and family psychiatric services can call their family practice clinic. Those not assigned to a family practice clinic can call the outpatient psychiatric clinic at 545-5964 or 545-2587 for an appointment.

Pentagon sets up hotline on DDT-tainted clothing

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon had no explanation Tuesday why it kept using wool contaminated with DDT to make uniforms and blankets for two decades after the pesticide was banned as a carcinogen.

But it set up a hotline to answer questions about blankets and uniforms distributed since 1956 and advised that children should not be allowed to use the items. The hotline number is: 1-800-888-3338.

Meanwhile, Defense Department and Environmental Protection Agency officials were attempting to assess the health risks involved in coming in contact with the material, said Pentagon spokesman Pete Williams.

EPA banned DDT in 1972. But until a few months ago, the Pentagon was using wool contaminated with the pesticide to make cold-weather uniforms for military troops and blankets for homeless shelters, Williams said.

ABC News reported Monday night that over the past five years, the military manufactured and distributed 7 million uniforms and 1.5 million blankets made from the contaminated wool.

Asked why, Williams said, "I haven't the slightest idea."

But he said the 1972 ban did not apply to material that already had been treated.

ABC News reported Monday night that over the past five years, the military manufactured and distributed 7 million uniforms and 1.5 million blankets made from the contaminated wool.

Williams said he did not immediately know how much DDT-treated material remained in the Pentagon's stockpiles, nor how many uniforms were made from the treated wool.

Two Pentagon studies have found "the health risks are minuscule" from use of the items, he said, but the EPA was checking the military's data. No decisions have been made about what to do with the remaining material until the EPA study is completed, he said.

The Defense Department began using a wool-synthetic blend for its uniforms in 1982, so those made since are not tainted with DDT. However, blankets continued to be produced and distributed.

Because children might be more susceptible to the pesticide, Williams advised that they not be allowed to use the items.

"Children have a tendency to suck on things, and if you suck on the blanket, that clearly raises the risk than if it's just next to

If someone wears an old, DDT-treated uniform "to the always-hilarious high school reunion ... I don't think you're going to be vastly increasing your health risk," he said. "On the other hand, I wouldn't give that wool blanket to your 7-year old to drag around the house."

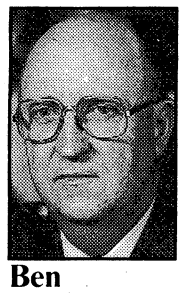
AUSA resolves to meet 'Future Challenges'

The AUSA National meeting held in Washington, D.C., each year is the business meeting for the association. One of the most important business matters completed is the drafting and adoption of resolutions for the next year.



Ben Register

In view of changes in defense strategy, the new administration and executive branch of our government and the large number of congressional member changes in the next Congress, the resolutions for 1993 take on an added importance to the U.S. Army.

The commitment of the association through the resolutions is expressed in the preamble titled, "The Army — Central to Meeting Future Challenges." The preamble concludes as follows: "In the resolutions that follow, this association expresses its resolve to dedicate its energies and resources to assist the Army in maintaining its fighting edge as it continues to reshape itself to support the national military strategy. We will further resolve to ensure that the necessary resources are provided to strengthen the total force so that the men and women in America's Army will, just as they have for two centuries, be ready to answer the call."

In future weeks we will discuss these resolutions of the association which are strongly supported by the Chattahoochee Valley-Fort Benning Chapter of AUSA.

Ban on women priests likely to continue

From wire reports

A survey says about 14 percent of U.S. Roman Catholic bishops favor admitting women to the priesthood, but few bishops have expressed that view openly as they ponder a new proposal upholding the ban.

Their long, faltering attempt to speak out on the proper role of women in church and society was to highlight the agenda of a meeting of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops, which began Monday in Washington.

After nine years of work, the conference is scheduled to take up a fourth draft of a pastoral letter rejecting women in the priesthood. But considering the rankled reactions to it, chances for its acceptance seem doubtful.

The new draft letter greatly expands on rejection of ordaining women, saying only men can be priests since they symbolize Christ, the "bridegroom of the church," and that this link relies "on the natural symbolism of gender."

However, an apparent growing number of bishops disagree with the ban, as indicated by the survey whose results were detailed in a recent book, "A Church Divided," by the Rev. Terrance Sweeney of Los Angeles.

Sweeney was expelled from the Jesuits for refusing to suppress the results, but is still a priest. He said surveys of bishops in 1985 and 1990 indicated support for ordaining women had increased from 7.6 percent to 14 percent.

"A lot more want a changed policy than have said so publicly," he said in a telephone interview. "To make their positions public would jeopardize their standing with the Vatican. So they remain silent."

However, a scattered few bishops have openly voiced support for ordaining women. The latest doing so was auxiliary Bishop P. Francis Murphy of Baltimore, who says he favors admitting women to the priesthood.

"A lot more want a changed policy than have said so publicly," the Rev. Terrance Sweeney of Los Angeles said. "To make their positions public would jeopardize their standing with the Vatican. So they remain silent."

"Justice demands it," he says. "The pastoral needs of the church require it."

Writing in the lay-edited Catholic weekly, Commonweal, he criticized the new draft of the proposed pastoral letter, and like other critics, both reformists and traditionalists, asked that it be abandoned.

It "introduces questionable theological arguments" to keep women excluded, he writes. "It seems to absolutize the image of Christ as bridegroom, while ignoring the Christ who challenged the status quo. . . ."

The proposed revision supports equal dignity of women, and condemns "sexism" that discriminates against them, but partly blames them for it, though less than men, saying it's linked to the "sexual revolution" involving both.

The document warns against minimizing sexual differences, describing them as complementary rather than mutual.

Besides Murphy, at least three other bishops have made known support for ordaining women, including Michael H. Kenny of Juneau, Alaska; Kenneth E. Untener of Saginaw, Mich., and retired Charles A. Buswell of Pueblo, Colo.

Sweeney's survey would indicate many more bishops privately support such a change, about 44, or 14 percent of 312 bishops. But such projections were arguable, since Vatican objections to the survey cut responses from 144 in 1985 to 57 in 1990.

Canadian bishops, also included in the 1990 survey, showed considerably stronger support for ordaining women — 36 percent of them.

Among the U.S. laity, 67 percent favor ordaining women, according to a Gallup Poll last May of a representative cross section of 802 Catholics. The margin of error was 4 percentage points.

Support for women's ordination has risen 29 percent in 1974 to 47 percent in 1985.

However, Pope John Paul II has firmly rejected the idea, sometimes admonishing against even discussing it, but without much avail.

The rejection is echoed in the proposed bishops' document on women, concerning which there have been several Vatican interventions, with ensuing drafts reflecting more restrictive stances.

Whether the latest version would be accepted by the bishops seemed highly uncertain. Even their own National Advisory Council, a 50-member group of priests and lay people, advised that the proposed letter be shelved.

It's "defensive and authoritarian rather than pastoral," the council said.

MONEY MATTERS

VA, FHA expanding home loan programs

From wire reports

BOSTON — Uncle Sam is opening the door to homeownership a little wider for thousands of Americans by liberalizing the guidelines of the government's two most popular home mortgage programs.

FHA and VA loans — respectively backed by the Federal Housing Administration and the Veterans Administration — have long helped first-time buyers who have steady jobs but little money for a down payment.

The VA will now offer an adjustable-rate mortgage in addition to its fixed-rate loan, on a trial basis. It will also make loans available to reservists and National Guard members with six or more years of service.

In recent years, changing economic circumstances had begun to lure more applicants to the programs in New England, where historically the loans were underutilized. Changes enacted by Congress only last month are expected to add to the momentum.

In Brockton, Mass., a magnet for neophyte buyers because of relatively low prices, the share of buyers using FHA or VA mortgages has gone from 10 to 50 percent in three years, according to broker Paul E. Clancy.

"We're getting first-time buyers putting as little as 4 percent down FHA and no money down VA," Clancy said. "Of course the banks like these loans because they're all government guaranteed."

Now come the changes in rules that are expected to add to the loans' appeal: The maximum FHA loan available on a single-family house has been raised to $151,725, opening up the program to applicants in expensive areas like Greater Boston who could not previously find homes in the price range financed by the FHA. Also, a July 1991 rule limiting the amount of closing costs that the borrower could fold into the loan has been rescinded, reducing what applicants have to pay up front.

The changes in VA loans are also significant. A requirement that the seller pay any points (loan fees equal to 1 percent of the loan for each point) beyond the first point has been rescinded. The interest rate, the number of points and who pays the points are now all subject to negotiation. That should make sellers less resistant to VA-financed buyers than they were when the seller had to pay any excess points, according to Bruce Carstarphen, the VA loan guarantee officer in New England.

Also, the VA will now offer an adjustable-rate mortgage in addition to its fixed-rate loan, on a trial basis. It will also make loans available to reservists and National Guard members with six or more years of service, who were not eligible before.

Both Carstarphen and Kenneth H. Salk, who oversees FHA loans as the Department of Housing and Urban Development's deputy regional director for housing, expected the changes will add to the already growing popularity of the government-backed loans.

"The biggest problem you have with purchasing a home today is coming up with the down payment," Salk said. With the changes in FHA requirements, he added, "We expect to do much more business this year than we have in the past."

The FHA loan was of little use to many Boston area residents during the real estate boom of the 1980s because the maximum loan amount, $101,250 for a single-family house in Boston, fell too far below the area's high median house prices ($186,200 in 1989) to permit most purchases. Raising the ceiling to $124,875 in 1990 helped, and the latest increase, along with falling prices, is expected to help further.

The government loans, available through banks and mortgage companies, have become critical for many would-be homeowners now that newly conservative lenders are shying away from the 5-percent down payment loans that used to be standard. Most lenders now want buyers to put at least 10 percent down and require 20 percent in the absence of private mortgage insurance.

On the FHA loan, the down payment amounts to 3 percent of the first $25,000 of the loan and 5 percent of the balance. That would come to $7,000 on a $150,000 loan, or 4.7 percent. The borrower also pays closing costs and an insurance premium equal to half a percent of the face value over the life of the loan, but those costs can now be financed as part of the loan, Salk said. There is no down payment at all for a VA mortgage. A 1 percent fee that goes to the VA (2 percent for reservists) can be financed as part of the loan.

Live-fire tests no place to pinch pennies

These arguments unraveled when the Bradley infantry fighting vehicle was tested against real enemy shells. The test vehicles exploded spectacularly and melted into puddles of congealed aluminum.

WASHINGTON — Rep. Charles E. Bennett, D-Fla., hasn't even retired yet and already those cold, fish-eyed bureaucrats in the Pentagon are trying to undermine one of his proudest achievements: the 1987 law that requires all major items of new military hardware to undergo live-fire tests.

David Evans

In these mandated trials, enemy missiles and shells must be fired at our equipment, set up in full, battle-ready condition. The law's overarching goal is to minimize vulnerability to enemy fire, and as such, it is a fantastic form of life insurance for America's soldiers, sailors and aircrews.

The armed services fiercely opposed the live-fire testing requirement. They claimed it was too expensive and that computer models simulating the effects of enemy hits were good enough for analysis.

These arguments unraveled when the Bradley infantry fighting vehicle was tested against real enemy shells. The test vehicles exploded spectacularly and melted into puddles of congealed aluminum.

The Army, chastened by the results, modified the design. Interior panels were lined with extra armor, the fire extinguishing system was improved, and ammunition was placed in separate compartments.

Bennett, impressed, became a key sponsor of the 1987 legislation intended to replicate the Bradley success story for all new systems. In 1988, the live-fire-test law was strengthened with a cautionary note to the Pentagon that the director of the live-fire-test program "may not be assigned any responsibility for developmental test and evaluation . . ."

Developmental testing is the process of ensuring that a weapon will work; live-fire testing answers a different question: If I get hit, will I survive?

More than 1,000 so-called high-survivability Bradleys saw action in the Persian Gulf War. Many took hits. No major problems.

While the Army got religion with the Bradley experience, the Navy, Air Force and their allies in the Pentagon have continued to wage guerrilla war against live-fire testing.

The most recent action occurred Oct. 19, when Charles Adolph, the Pentagon's director of test and evaluation, disbanded the live-fire-test office and assigned developmental and live-fire test responsibilities to the principal incumbents, contrary to the intent of Congress.

Adolph declined an interview but in a written statement said he was "streamlining" the bureaucracy.

The word on Capitol Hill is that he is circumventing the intent of Congress and that there may be a move to reverse Adolph's action.

The Navy is fighting the law too. Over the objections last spring of the then-director of live-fire tests, the Navy obtained a waiver from live-fire testing of its new F-18 fighter-bomber, a drastically modified version of the model now flying. The upgraded F-18 may be more vulnerable to enemy fire, since it will carry an additional 3,600 pounds of fuel and feature a higher-pressure hydraulic system, which, if hit, could produce a fierce fire close to all that fuel — akin to the effect of holding a lighted match up to the nozzle of an aerosol can of hair spray. Unfortunately, live-fire tests of the new F-18 will be limited to still-unspecified "components."

The Air Force has fought against full-scale, live-fire testing of the C-17 cargo plane, which is designed to fly into dirt airstrips near front lines, meaning it is likely to encounter enemy anti-aircraft guns and shoulder-fired missiles.

For example, one such missile downed an Italian cargo plane attempting to land at the Sarajevo airfield in the former Yugoslavia in September, and two Air Force C-130 cargo planes flying food into Somalia have been hit by bullets in recent weeks.

The Air Force claims it is too expensive to shoot up a complete C-17, although an internal Defense Department study shows that it would cost $158 million, or less than one-half of 1 percent of the $35 billion cost of the entire program.

The Air Force proposes instead to shoot bullets at a 13-foot section of the wing leading edge. That's not realistic. According to the internal report of C-17 testing, "The test article accounts for less than 10 percent of the critical . . . area" and "relies heavily on computer modeling."

The Air Force opposes a compromise in which a complete wing of the C-17 would undergo live-fire tests. This approach would cover the fuel tanks, engines and most of the flight controls, but not critical components in the fuselage or tail. It would cost about one-tenth of 1 percent of the entire program and would reveal whether a single key hit could blow the wing apart.

That's the whole idea behind live-fire testing: to spend a little money up front to deny real-world foes a cheap kill later. What we have instead is a continuing mindset that places a higher value on program survivability than pilot survivability.

Renovated post library to reopen Tuesday

By Linda Bosley Dailey
Staff Writer

Whether or not all the books have been unpacked and placed on the new shelves, Sayers Memorial Library will reopen Tuesday at 11 a.m. after several months of renovation, said Librarian John Cook.

The new shelving system is a key part of changes at the library, Cook said. The shelves, which are movable, slide along tracks in the floor when users rotate handles on the side of the shelves. The movable shelves stack together when not in use, thus requiring less space than stationary shelves.

When a patron needs access to a particular shelf, he cranks the handle, moving the shelf to create an aisle for him to enter, locks the shelf in place and then browses for books, Cook said.

The more compact shelving system allowed the library to use 7,000 fewer square feet to shelve its approximately 54,000 books, Cook said. That space is now used for seating, Cook said. Prior to the renovation, the library had room to seat only about 35 people, but now has capacity to seat 125 people.

The new shelving system cost about $56,000, Cook said. By comparison, adding about 5,000 square feet to the 16,000-square-foot building would have cost about $1 million, he said.

The renovation of the Sayers building also included painting, recarpeting, installation of new light fixtures, construction of handicapped-accessible restrooms and replacement of windows with energy-efficient tinted glass — which cost about $26,000, he said.

In addition, five work rooms were built within the library to accommodate the three computers and two typewriters available for patrons' use, Cook said.

From early July through Nov. 1, the library operated out of the second floor of the Arts and Crafts building while the Sayers building, near the intersection of Ingersoll Street and Wold Avenue, was renovated, Cook said. But the library has been closed since Nov. 2 so employees and volunteers could move the books back onto the Sayers building shelves, set up furniture and get its computers working, he said.

After reopening Tuesday, the library will be open Monday through Thursday from 11 a.m. to 8:50 p.m.; Saturday from noon to 7:50 p.m., and Sunday from noon to 8:50 p.m. It is closed on Friday.

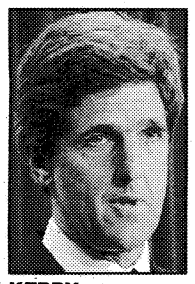
Senators say U.S. should reward Vietnam

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — The United States should reward Vietnam for cooperating in the search for missing American servicemen but should hold back on normalizing diplomatic relations, lawmakers returning from a search mission in Southeast Asia said Monday.

Members of the Senate Select Committee on POW-MIA Affairs said Vietnam had extended "extraordinary" cooperation, including allowing lawmakers access to Vietnam's equivalent of the Pentagon.



KERRY

The 10-day trip by the committee turned up no new evidence that Americans may be alive in Vietnam but opened up the possibility of extended cooperation with the Vietnamese government, they said.

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., chairman of the committee, said the president of Vietnam, Vo Chi Cong, asked the committee to deliver a letter to President Bush discussing the POW-MIA issue and its connection with possibly improved relations between the two countries.

Kerry said he would advise Bush and the incoming Clinton administration to "take steps to respond to their cooperation but don't give up your bargaining power."

The committee has investigated 50 live sighting reports and found no evidence to confirm any of them, Kerry said. With American and European tourists all over Vietnam, there may be "a law of diminishing returns" in continuing to investigate each new report, Kerry said.

"We've got people hiking on the Ho Chi Minh Trail, folks. I've got two constituents biking through Vietnam. Are they going to be the subject of live sighting reports?" Kerry said.

Sens. Thomas Daschle, D-S.D., and Hank Brown, R-Colo., joining Kerry at the Capitol Hill news conference, agreed that it would be premature to open diplomatic relations with Vietnam.

"I oppose normalization. There's a great deal we need to do beforehand," Brown said. But he said, "the Vietnamese government has exhibited extraordinary cooperation. The relationship today is dramatically different to what it was a couple of years ago."

Brown said one promising area of inquiry will be documents promised by Vietnam on Americans captured in the countryside who appear to have been killed or lost in transit to a central POW receiving area. Vietnam said it would provide access to its own war veterans, some of whom may recall details of engagements or downed airmen.

In addition, Vietnam has discussed opening lines of communication between Vietnamese and American veterans groups in hopes of pinpointing the whereabouts of remains. And the Vietnamese government invited family members of the missing to come to Vietnam and investigate for themselves.

Vietnam has adamantly denied holding any live POWs after the war. But Kerry said government officials admit that private citizens may be illegally holding remains of U.S. servicemen in the hope of receiving a reward. Kerry said no such rewards would be forthcoming.

One year ago, Kerry said, the United States had no office in Hanoi, no people on the ground in Vietnam investigating POW-MIA cases, no access to government archives, and no ability to fly about the country pursuing live-sighting reports.

"Today all of that is different," Kerry said. He warned that some within the Vietnamese government oppose cooperation with the United States. If the United States fails to reciprocate in some way, Kerry said, Vietnam could once again deny investigators access.

"You can't have this be a one-way street," Kerry said.

This line, though echoed by the Bush administration and Republicans on the committee, is not universally accepted. Shortly before the news conference began, a Vietnam veterans group held a news conference outside the Capitol criticizing the committee for being too quick to debunk live-sighting reports and overly trusting of the Vietnamese government.

Angel watching over war hero

Horner fought his heart out during the war in Europe

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

Freeman Horner's angel took a day off.

First, though, on Nov. 16, 1944, she provided the shield that allowed then-Staff Sgt. Freeman V. Horner, to walk untouched through a hail of gunfire and alone, against unknown odds, shoot his way out of an encounter with three German machine gunners. He thinks his entire platoon was lost that day, but isn't sure.

For that brief, shining moment in Wurselen, Germany, Horner stood taller than other men. He destroyed all three machine gun nests, killed or captured seven enemy and cleared the way for the capture of the town. For those exploits, President Harry Truman, on Oct. 12, 1945, hung the Medal of Honor around Horner's neck.

Horner was a civilian by then. But he missed the Army and signed up again in 1947. He retired as a major in 1962, then spent about 20 years as a civil service employee.

He looks back, not in amazement, but as though that Medal of Honor day was pre-destined. Confined mostly to a wheelchair at Canterbury Nursing Home in Phenix City these days, battling back from a stroke, Horner can't define what makes some men stand out above others in time of crisis. "I was just doing my job," he said.

Then he looks at it from a different slant and says, "I truly believe I have a guardian angel up there looking out for me."

He waded onto Normandy Beach about a week after "D Day" and went on to fight his way into the heart of Germany, including a stop-over at the Battle of the Bulge. He earned five stars for his Combat Infantryman's Badge along the way.

There have been other special days. "One time I had a wrist watch shot off, but it (the wound) was only a scratch," he said.

By Joe Maher/The Benning Leader

Freeman Horner, with wife Joyce, displays the many medals he earned during World War II.

Good enough, though, for one of two Purple Hearts in a shadow box display of medals that includes two Bronze Stars with a V device for valor.

He saluted the end of World War II with a one-night drinking bout with a few Russian soldiers deep in Germany. Even today, he won't talk about that night except to say that two of the ugliest, strongest women he ever saw tossed him back toward his lodgings sometime in the wee hours. "It was the first time I'd ever been drunk, and the last," he remembers with a shudder.

He's had still other good days. There was the one in 1982, when as a member of an inspector general's team looking over the commissary at Fort Benning Horner met Joyce. She wouldn't go out with him, at first, but changed her mind when his commander vouched for him as a good guy who'd recently lost his wife.

They were married a few months later. Mrs. Horner was then the assistant commissary officer and retired later with more than 30 years as a civil service employee at Fort Benning.

There was another day, after World War II, when his mother, prompted by news stories about her hero son, contacted him for the first time since leaving him as a baby with his grandparents in Mt. Carmel, Pa.

He reflects on being a Medal of Honor recipient and says with a laugh, "I was just plain crazy" to take on two machine gun nests, much less three — one of them opened fire on him while Horner stood exposed to fire from the other two, his Thompson submachine gun blazing.

On another day, this self-taught golfer capped his playing days, at age 64, with a hole-in-one at the Follow Me Golf Course at Fort Benning.

He was a closed-mouthed husband at first, Joyce says. Now, since his stroke, he'll tell her sometimes about that day in Germany, and what World War II was really like.

President Harry Truman presents Horner the Medal of Honor on the White House Lawn on Oct. 12, 1945.

Nearly a half-century later, that fabled day in Wurselen comes back in his dreams. "It just happens from time to time. If I see a war movie or something, it takes me back." He recalls the day: "I just stood up and took over. It was just instinct. The man upstairs, God, looked after me. I've had his hand on me a long time. I was never really religious, but I believed in Him. On the battlefield, I said a prayer every morning and every night.

"I didn't know fear then. I was too young."

The men of Company K, 119th Infantry, 30th Infantry Division, will remember him as "Ma Horner." That's because on a cold German day, when rations were running low, he "shot some geese and cooked them for the men. They didn't have any (other) food."

He explains that charmed day, which brought him the medal like he does the other good things that have come his way: "I really believe I've got a guardian angel out there looking out for me."

That doesn't mean that his life has always been charmed. His guardian angel took a day off in February 1990 when a massive stroke almost claimed his life. Since then, he's seen tough times that might make facing enemy machine guns seem easy — huge medical bills and struggling to get the Veterans Administration bureaucracy in motion on his behalf. The big bills, meanwhile, have pushed Horner up against the wall.

He has made major progress in recovery, having recovered the use of his arms and some movement of one leg.

It was only in recent months that the VA approved him for 10 percent disability — which amounts to $83 a month. His wife is still pushing to force the Army to admit that her husband's hypertension, which was discovered before his retirement, was a contributor to the stroke.

Mrs. Horner is slow to criticize, but quick to point out the severe financial straits the stroke, rehabilitation, prolonged hospital stays and nursing home care can impose.

She says it was only a few months back that the VA finally agreed to pick up the tab for room and board at Canterbury Nursing Home in Phenix City. She said that only happened after "(U.S. Sen.) Sam Nunn put in a good word for him."

For that brief, shining moment in Wurselen, Germany, Horner stood taller than other men. He destroyed all three machine gun nests, killed or captured seven enemy and cleared the way for the capture of the town.

Joyce Horner also credits Bernie Baharany, a social worker at the VA Medical Center in Tuskegee with much of the help in getting squared away.

Hard times suffered by several Medal of Honor winners triggered a bill in Congress last year that would have substantially increased the $200 monthly pension they now draw. But Congress didn't pass the bill, even though legislators were told that several of the approximately 200 Medal of Honor winners are living beneath the poverty level.

Even so, says Joyce Horner, "We've been lucky, we've been through a lot."

MOVIE REVIEW

'Home Alone' sequel offers more violence than laughs

By Dave Kehr
Chicago Tribune

When a modestly budgeted movie like 1990's "Home Alone" goes on to become the highest grossing comedy and third highest grossing film of all time, you can bet there are going to be sequels, and lots of them, at least until child star Macaulay Culkin sprouts a beard, gets a tattoo and acquires a taste for Monte Cristo cigars.

You would still have a right to hope, however, for something a bit more inventive and risk-taking than "Home Alone 2: Lost in New York," the sequel that has been concocted by writer-producer John Hughes and director Chris Columbus.

The new film does little but repeat the gags and situations of the first movie, with a slight change of venue — little Kevin, having boarded the wrong plane at Chicago's O'Hare Airport, finds himself alone in the streets of Manhattan, while his parents (Catherine O'Hara and John Heard) and six siblings jet off to a rainy Christmas vacation in Florida.

As an emissary of Hughes's affluent, North Shore suburban Arcadia, Kevin finds money no problem, and quickly checks himself into the Plaza Hotel, using his dad's credit card and some ingenious fast talk to secure himself a luxurious suite and unlimited room service.

Better than being home alone, this is being home alone with servants. As the Plaza staff — amusingly played by concierge Tim Curry, desk clerk Dana Ivey and bellman Rob Schneider — fawns over him, Kevin gorges himself on custom sundaes and forbidden videocassettes.

But no one can return to the same material without a loss of innocence. "Home Alone 2" plays like a coarsened, self-parodying version of the original, in which the fantasy elements have become grubbier and more materialistic, the sentimentality more treacly and aggressive, and the slapstick violence — already astonishingly intense in the first film — even more graphic and sadistic.

'Home Alone 2: Lost in New York,' starring Macaulay Culkin, is now playing at Carmike Cinema 7. It is rated PG.

Having solved the emotional problems of lonely old man Roberts Blossom in the first film, Kevin turns his therapeutic talents to a Central Park pigeon lady, played by Oscar-winner Brenda Fricker of "My Left Foot."

Hughes has never seemed smarmier than in the speech he has composed for Kevin here, in which he employs an extended simile comparing the untested human heart to a pair of neglected roller blades as he urges the lonely old woman to take another chance on love.

But these gentle bromides serve only to soften up the audience and prepare the way for the film's real payoff — the 20 minutes of intense, cruelly imaginative violence perpetrated by little Kevin against the film's two hapless stand-ins for adult authority, burglars Harry (Joe Pesci) and Marv (Daniel Stern), also returning from the first film.

Foiling their plan to rob a toy store owned by sweet, snowy-haired Eddie Bracken, Kevin lures Harry and Marv to a brownstone undergoing renovation, where he executes a detailed, Sadean plan — titled "Operation Ho-Ho-Ho" — to inflict as much anguish as possible on his two old enemies.

The treats this time include bricks dropped from upper stories, a staple gun fired into Marv's nostrils, a lead pipe swung from a rope, a toilet filled with turpentine and electrocution with a portable generator (Kevin is seen slyly dialing up the power, as a trick shot shows Marv literally reduced to a screaming skull).

If this material is meant to evoke Warner Brothers cartoons or the mock violence of the Three Stooges, it is filmed far too realistically, with high-impact visuals and reverberating sound effects, to be very funny.

Rather than laughs, the violence provokes gasps of sympathy and amazement, even among the children in the audience. The pleasures here are entirely cruel, with an unhealthy concentration on the suffering of the victims, on the thudding impact of various objects against their heads, on their howls of agony. "Have you had enough pain yet?" asks Kevin, before delivering a particularly horrible coup-de-grace.

For the next sequel, perhaps Twentieth Century Fox should consider merging "Home Alone 3" with "Die Hard 3." There are no terrorists in the world that Kevin couldn't take out, even with one tiny, pale hand tied behind his back.

Get into Christmas spirit with concert Sunday

From staff reports

The LaGrange Symphony Orchestra, the Lafayette Chorale and the LaGrange High School Chorus will present their Christmas concert on Sunday at 3 p.m. at Callaway Auditorium.

The 72-member orchestra, under the baton of Harry Kruger, will play Leroy Anderson's "Sleigh Ride" and excerpts from "The Nutcracker" by Tchaikovsky.

"Sleigh Ride" is a wonderful melody which evokes images of horse-drawn sleds gliding over the snow-covered hills with sleigh bells ringing merrily.

Tchaikovsky's music from his ballet, "The Nutcracker" is very beautiful and rich as it weaves the story of Clara and her beloved Nutcracker Prince; a bewitched Christmas present from her Godfather Drosselmeier.

The Lafayette Chorale, a 30-member choir of local performers, is under the direction of Lee Johnson. Johnson, chairman of the LaGrange College Music Department, graduated magna cum laude from Auburn University with a degree in composition and theory and received a master's degree in music composition from Indiana University. His music has been performed throughout the U.S. and Europe. Johnson orchestrated and conducted the Emmy Award-winning film score "It May Not Be Tara" for a Fox Theater Gala Benefit for the Margaret Mitchell House in Atlanta. He is chairman of the Cultural Olympic Activities for Troup County and composed the music for and directed the 100 Voices for 100 Years Chorus for the Olympic flag stop in Columbus last month. Johnson will premiere on March 5 his symphony in memory of Fuller E. Callaway, which will involved the choruses from Auburn University, Georgia Tech, LaGrange College and the Lafayette Chorale.

The LaGrange High School Chorus is a 100-member voice ensemble of students from grades nine-12. The choir is under the direction of Marty Gaffney, who is in her third year at LaGrange High School. She received her undergraduate degree from Winthrop College and her graduate degree from the University of South Carolina. She has been a member of the Cleveland Orchestra Chorus, the Chicago Symphony Chorus and is currently in the Atlanta Symphony Chorus.

Spaniards tackle the Darby Queen

By Jerry Rutledge
Leader Editor

Ensconced in the Rangers' Camp Darby on several acres of southwest Georgia timberland, the Darby Queen is a taxing test of strength, agility, balance and determination.

The young Spaniards had enjoyed their whirlwind visit to America.

The cadets from the Academia de Infanteria in Toledo, Spain, had found the contrast in their training techniques and those used in the IOBC (Infantry Officers Basic Course) at Fort Benning both interesting and refreshing.

Leadership reaction courses, S.A.W. (Squad Automatic Weapons) training, bayonet drills — it had all been such a rush.

"We have been well-treated here," said cadet Andres Gonzalez Alverado. "We were received with open arms and open hands. It has been very pleasant." The Spaniards — cadets Alverado, Jose Antonio Lopez Valenzuela, Carlos Miragall Prieto and Jose Maria Pascual, joined by Capt. Javier Gallego Garcia Lorenzana of the Spanish military academy — had participated in the LRC and SAW exercises and observed the bayonet work.

"I think the Leadership Reaction Courses were the most important," said Capt. Lorenzana, as interpreted by Alverado, "because I am very concerned with the leadership we teach our cadets."

The cadets said that observing and participating in training methods different from their own was their primary goal. "We can take the things we learn and use the ideas for our own drills," said Alverado.

By early Friday morning, only one major exercise was left to be realized by the cadets — the Army Rangers' Darby Queen, the "mother" of all obstacle courses. As the Spaniards would learn, this Darby Queen ain't no lady and she's very unforgiving.

Ensconced in the Rangers' Camp Darby on several acres of southwest Georgia timberland, the Darby Queen is a taxing test of strength, agility, balance and determination.

The Spanish cadets had been hearing of its praises and of its curses all week. By Friday morning, all that was left was a mixed feeling of eagerness and healthy apprehension.

Th cadets were looking forward to going through the Queen. "At least, we are going to try," said Alverado.

The Spaniards gave a good account of themselves, tackling the Queen. They excelled in some areas, struggled with others in a manner similar to the IOBC students.

At the end of the course, Alverado was happy but exhausted. "I feel fine — now that it's over," he said, with an American-style wry grin. "It was hard while we were doing it, but I'm happy that it's over."

Gays in military say lifting ban won't change life

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — If President-elect Clinton lifts the ban on homosexuals in the military, many gays and lesbians already in uniform say they will heave a collective sigh of relief and get back to work.

What they won't do is declare their homosexuality.

"It will not change my day-to-day life at all," said a gay Navy lieutenant who recently came off active duty and is a reservist. "However, I'll be completely relieved because I love the Navy. ... This would be one less hindrance to me just wanting to be able to serve my country."

"The people I want to know already know," said a naval petty officer who also is gay. "I don't think anyone's really going to come out of the closet."

The lieutenant and the petty officer, like everyone else interviewed for this story, insisted on anonymity.

A lesbian Army reservist whose partner is on active duty said she hopes many homosexuals in uniform do come out — even though she said she and her partner won't.

"If the ban is lifted and no one comes out, gee, it's all for nothing," she said.

During his presidential campaign, Clinton said he would issue an executive order ending the 50-year-old policy. He has reiterated that promise since the election, despite warnings from top military men that the action would disastrous for the services.

Pentagon policy states that "homosexuality is incompatible with military service" and that the presence of homosexuals in the military impedes "discipline, good order and morale."

"For most people, myself included, the issue is not whether or not you can come out, whether or not you want to, but whether or not it should be a point of concern," said a gay Marine aviator. "Just like religion, politics and what your favorite baseball team is, your sexual preference has no place at work."

No one knows how many gay people are serving in uniform. About 14,000 men and women have been kicked out of the services during the past 10 years for being homosexual.

The Associated Press interviewed a cross-section of gay and lesbian soldiers, sailors and airmen to learn how they feel about Clinton's promise and the controversy that has been raging since he made it.

Those who spoke insisted not only on anonymity but that their locations be omitted. Several would talk only on phones away from their base, fearing that their calls could be monitored.

"For most people, myself included, the issue is not whether or not you can come out, whether or not you want to, but whether or not it should be a point of concern," said a gay Marine aviator. "Just like religion, politics and what your favorite baseball team is, your sexual preference has no place at work."

An Air Force officer who is a lesbian agreed, adding, "There are other things besides the military that give people reasons not to come out — like family."

Most said they have been watching the debate with a mixture of optimism, worry and anger. They are hopeful that the pressure to lie will disappear if the ban is lifted. But they are disgusted by some of the arguments by some top military brass who support the prohibition.

Gen. Colin Powell, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and Gen. Gordon Sullivan, the Army chief of staff, have said the presence of gays would interfere with heterosexual troops' right to privacy. Some former military leaders have said it might become necessary to separate troops not only by sex but by sexual orientation.

But gay members of the military who talked to the AP scoffed at that argument.

"They make a big deal, like there are 20 guys in one shower," the Marine aviator said. "There aren't anymore. ... On all the ships, except in very extreme circumstances, the bathing arrangements are private."

Sen. Sam Nunn, D-Ga., who reportedly is on Clinton's list of potential defense secretaries, has argued that open gays in the military would become targets for harassment or violence.

Service held for Ranger killed during exercise

From staff reports

A memorial service was held Sunday at Marshall Auditorium in Infantry Hall for Sgt. Jeffey A. Palmer, an Army Ranger stationed at Fort Benning who was killed in a training accident in California last week.

Palmer, 21, of Mount Jewett, Pa., died last Wednesday at Twentynine Palms, Calif., of complications resulting from gunshot wounds suffered during a live-fire exercise. He was a member of B Company, 3rd Battalion, 75th Ranger Regiment.

A spokesman from the U.S. Marine Corps said Palmer was wounded during a Nov. 17 live-fire exercise while Marines and Rangers were making assaults from helicopters on an objective on the Twentynine Palms Marine Corps base.

Palmer's unit was clearing bunkers at the time he was hit with two 5.56-millimeter rounds through the right thigh, damaging his femoral artery. The spokesman said doctors determined that the Ranger's leg had to be amputated above the knee. While the procedure was being performed, Palmer went into cardiac arrest and died. He had undergone several hours of surgery at the Naval Hospital at Twentynine Palms when death occurred.

At the time of the accident, Palmer's unit and others from the 1st and 3rd Ranger battalions were taking part in an exercise called Operation Leatherneck Ranger that included some 3,100 troops from the Army, Navy, Marine Corps and Air Force.

Engineers open the door for female commanders

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

There have been some questions asked, especially about what would happen if the 36th Engineers were to become involved in combat again, like they were during Desert Storm.

The 36th Engineer Group at Fort Benning has opened up some previously all-male slots to women. The change means at least one more slot has been filled by a female company commander.

Capt. Kellie Simon, who on Dec. 17 will become commander of the 586th Engineer Company, says its no big deal, except that it's important to her because its her first command at the company level, just as such an assignment "is important to any captain." She will be one of 10 female company commanders on post, a spokesman said.

Her selection by Lt. Col. Phillip Anderson, the 36th Engineer Group commander, after she and eligible men were interviewed for the 586th job, shows that more good jobs are now open to females. "I'm not getting a break. This is how things are in the Army today," Simon said.

Even so, there have been some questions asked, especially about what would happen if the 36th Engineers were to become involved in combat again, like they were during Desert Storm. Simon says she knows that will be her job, even if bullets start flying again. "I think one thing Desert Storm proved is that there's no such thing as a safe job," she said.

Her job, along with a few others in engineer outfits, has been opened up on the orders of Maj. Gen. Daniel W. Christman, the Army's Chief of Engineers and commander of Fort Leonardwood, Mo. The top levels of the Army apparently have not yet put the stamp of approval on what amounts to an exception to the Army's policy forbidding women in combat jobs.

The 36th commander said he decided to open up all jobs, except for "bridge crewmen," to females at the direction of the chief of engineers. Simon will be taking over a company that is responsible for erecting mobile bridges. All the jobs in that company, except that of crewmen who do the actual erection and disassembly of the sectional bridges, are now open to women.

Anderson says Christman made the move "because he wanted to open up more opportunities for female officers in the Corps of Engineers. Once he said that, it became my responsibility to put the best qualified officer in such jobs."

The move has stirred no controversy and no complaints, Anderson said.

Christman didn't hide his feeling about opening up all engineering jobs to females. Earlier this year he told the Presidential Commission on the Assignment of Women in the Armed Forces: "One of the Army's goals is to be the premier employer. We can only attain this goal through equal opportunity for all. (I) know it is a tough call, but it is time to get on with changes so that female soldiers will be afforded full and equal opportunity to pursue careers in the military."

He said, too, that there's been enough talk about women's roles in the armed forces: "... The time spent addressing and readdressing this issue is rapidly preempting other important matters and serves to accentuate the distinctions between our male and female soldiers rather than focus on our united aspiration."

Simon said she's heard no put-downs or catty remarks about her new role: "They (36th soldiers) know I'm not going to paint the ships pink," she says with a laugh.

Anderson says he has made it clear that sexist remarks and sexual harassment won't be tolerated in his command.

The assignment means there'll now be two company commanders in the Simon home. Kellie's husband, Capt. George Simon III, is Alpha Company commander with the 317th Engineers on post. This man-wife team of engineers met while on assignment in Germany and married in February 1990. Later, they attended the engineer officers advanced course together.

Rank is "the same" at home, even though she has a little "time in grade" on her husband, said Kellie Simon. She graduated from West Texas State University with a major in math and physics. Her husband graduated from Vanderbilt University with a degree in civil engineering.

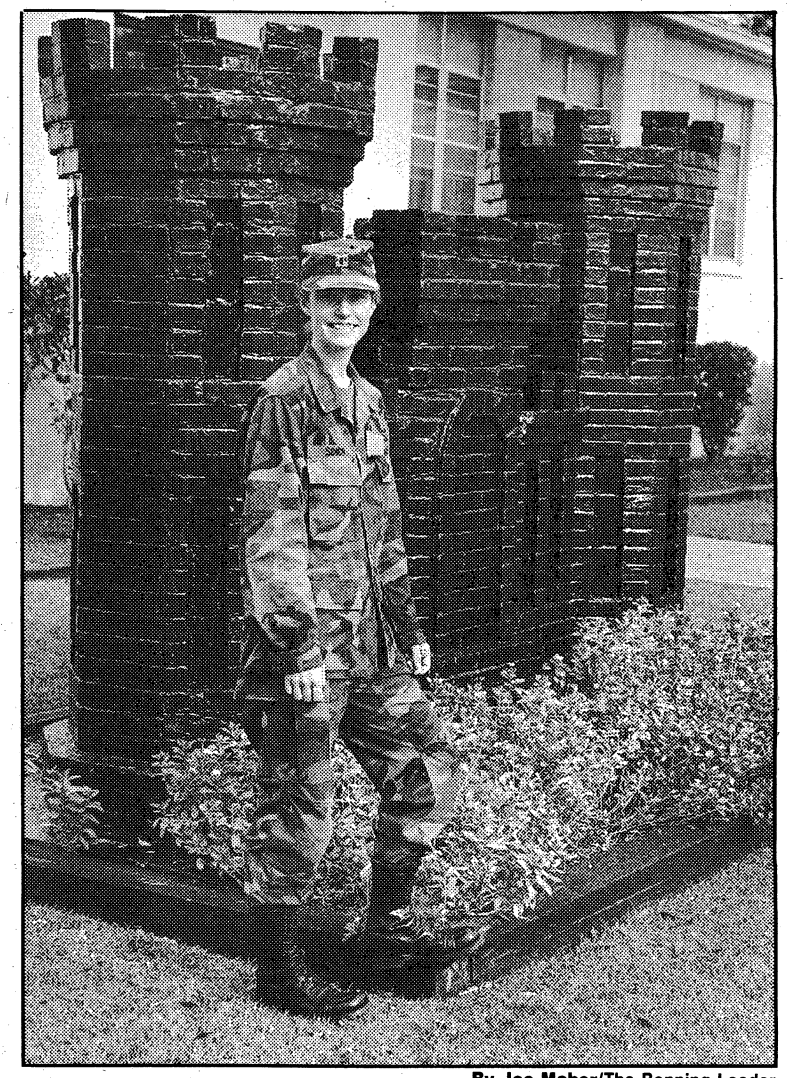
She was talking during a break from doing a complete inventory of everything — from bridge sections to first aid kits — that belongs to the company.

Kellie Simon, 27, is a native of Harrodsburg, Ky. She has already been a platoon leader and won't have much reason to feel "lonesome" as a female company commander: Capt. Bernie Thompson takes over her own engineering company on Dec. 4 and Lt. Heather Warden is already a platoon leader in the company Simon is taking over.

What about the chances of combat, Simon is asked.

"That's what I've been trained to do," she says, "build things," even if it is in a hot zone.

"I understand the possibilities and the probabilities."



By Joe Maher/The Benning Leader

Capt. Kellie Simon will become command of the 586th Engineer Company on Dec. 17. She will be one of 10 female company commanders at Fort Benning.

WW II 50TH ANNIVERSARY

Fifty years ago this week, American forces near Guadalacanal dispatched five heavy cruisers and seven destroyers, under the command of Admiral Carleton Wright, to intercept Rear Admiral Raizo Tunaka's nightly resupply run. In the ensuing battle, Wright lost four cruisers, while sinking only one Japanese destroyer. Despite this seeming failure, the effort successfully prevented Tunaka from delivering the much-needed supplies to the island's starving Japanese soldiers.

Here, according to research by the Military History Division at Fort Benning, were the top news items of the week:

■

Admiral Jean de Laborde, commander of the French Fleet, gave orders to scuttle three battleships, seven cruisers, and 62 other craft at Toulan, before the German II SS Panser Corps, under the command of Gen. Hausser, could capture the naval base.

■

Broadcasting from London, Prime Minister Winston Churchill warned the people of Italy that unless they launched an immediate revolt against Benito Mussolini they would face an impending full-scale Allied invasions.

■

In North Africa, Allied forces came under heavy pressure around Tunisia as strong German counterattacks by the 10th Panzer Division, under Gen. Wolfgang Fischer, succeeded in retaking Djedeida and Tebourba.

■

At Fort Benning, the 505th Parachute Infantry Regiment's mascot, a thrill-seeking dog called Max, qualified as a U.S. parachutist by making the last of five necessary jumps from an airplane in flight.

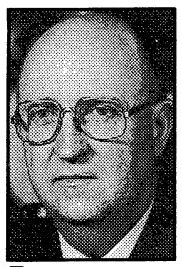
COMMENTARY

Resolutions focus on Army's national missions

The Association of the United States Army (AUSA) resolutions for 1993 are divided into two major categories. Resolutions 93-1 through 93-10 cover the Warfighting Army and Resolutions 93-11 through 93-20 for the institutional Army. These are integrated and mutually supporting areas which greatly impact the strength, capability, and flexibility of the Army to perform its national missions. As stated in the last column, we will discuss these resolutions as approved at the national meeting.



Ben Register

Resolution 93-1: Reshaping the Army. The Army is the nation's strategic force. The National Military Strategy mandates a preeminent role for Army forces in detering regional conflict and aggression. This strategy with fewer deployed forces, requires a Total Army that possesses a range of capabilities — strategic deterence, forward presence, crisis response, and reconstitution. This force must be lethal, deployable, versatile and expansible.

The Army is refining the roles of the active and reserve components in support of the National Military Strategy, and clarifying the interrelationships of the components to assure America's Army is ready for the nation's call. The Army's BOLD SHIFT initiatives will capitalize on the lessons derived for Operations Desert Shield and Desert Storm mobilization, deployment and employment and exploit the potential of our reserve components to execute increasingly important roles in the current defense strategy.

The smaller active component places increased reliance on the reserve components and demands improved readiness. The Army will consist of an appropriate combination of active and reserve component forces, carefully crafted to meet the requirements of the National Military Strategy. Ongoing initiatives to improve training and readiness will enable the reserve components to assume a more meaningful role.

As the Total Army reshapes to the 1995 Base Force, the challenge is to ensure that this force structure enables the Army to develop and maintain the capabilities necessary to implement the National Military Strategy. This force structure retains a two-division corps in Europe, two divisions in the Pacific, a five-division power projection capability with three reinforcing heavy divisions in the continental U.S., and a sustainment force.

WE THEREFORE RESOLVE to urge the Administration and Congress to:

Support an Army Base Force necessary to implement the National Military Strategy and provide the Army leadership flexibility necessary to shape the force structure within the authorized strength of levels."

This resolution is of vital importance to the American people since it addresses the baseline and composition of future Army forces. It is of vital importance to the Chattahoochee Valley-Fort Benning region since the decisions made will directly impact training, combat developments, and other mission responsibilities of Fort Benning. The United States' experience in downsizing and reshaping our Army after conflicts and changes in the world tensions are not good examples to follow. The Army has a strategy and a plan — let's understand and support them both.

Congratulations to the Columbus Junior Chamber of Commerce for the outstanding Military Appreciation Night held Nov. 12 at the Airport Sheraton. This was the 23rd annual event and was greatly appreciated by the outstanding soldiers attending. A special salute to Art Chriss of ARCCO, an AUSA corporate member, for his generous contribution for the meals of the soldiers attending.

Georgia veterans can shop 'Supermarket' of benefits

SAVANNAH — Georgia veterans and their dependents will have an opportunity to acquire information and assistance from some 25 municipal, state and federal agencies about various benefits when the Georgia Department of Veterans Service, together with the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs, conducts a one-day, one-stop service and information session in the National Guard Armory, 12478 Eisenhower Drive, in Savannah from 10 a.m. until 4 p.m. Wednesday, Dec. 9.

Georgia Commissioner of Veteran Affairs Pete Wheeler and Atlanta VA Regional Office Director Charles Wickes explained the program during a meeting Monday with Savannah Mayor Susan Weiner, who signed a proclamation designating Dec. 9 as "Supermarket of Veterans' Benefits Day" in Savannah.

In a joint statement, Wheeler and Wickes said, "There may be many veterans and dependents who are eligible for various benefits, but who, for some reason, have never applied for them. In this one-day session we will place every agency that has any connection whatsoever with veterans' benefits within easy reach of those eligible veterans and their dependents. This includes dependent parents, wives and children. We will not just answer questions and shuffle people from one agency to another, but we will find out what can be done and, in many cases, do it on the spot. We expect to actually file hundreds of claims on Wednesday, Dec. 9."

The 1992 Veterans' Supermarket will be the fourth such event hosted by Savannah. More than 4,000 people attended the "Supermarket" here in 1983.

Since Georgia Department of Veterans Service originated these one-day, one-stop programs 27 years ago in Columbus, more than 116,000 people have received on-the-spot assistance at "Supermarkets" in Augusta, Rome, Macon, Albany, Atlanta, Gainesville, Waycross, Dalton, Savannah, Athens and Valdosta.

Spencer shut out in finale

From staff reports

The Spencer Greenwave rolled into Friday night's Region 3-AAA playoff game against No.1-ranked Peach County determined to write a better ending to this episode than the last — an embarrassing 34-3 loss.

Well, Spencer was successful — partially. The Greenwave avoided the embarrassment of a 31-point defeat in the playoff game, but couldn't turn improvement into victory. Peach County took a 16-0 victory, ending Spencer's 1992 football season.

Maurece Williams, considered the prime college recruiting prospect in the Columbus area this season, rushed for 140 yards on 22 carries in his final appearance in a Spencer jersey.

But Williams' running was not enough to overcome the 1-2 punch of Peach County quarterback Luwon Penamon and halfback Kalen Jackson.

Jackson's 5-yard scoring run with 5:59 left in the opening quarter capped an 11-play, 65-yard drive on the Trojans' first possession. All but two of the 11 plays were on the ground as Jackson and Penamon alternated assaults on the Greenwave defense. Billy Parker added the extra point for a 7-0 lead.

Parker kicked a 22-yard field goal with 4:59 left in the second quarter to push Peach County farther outfront by 10-0, but Spencer, unlike the week before, kept the Trojans in striking distance.

The Greenwave threatened on occasion, but couldn't forge it's way into the end zone. An 18-yard pass from Penamon to Steve Robinson in the fourth quarter put the game — and Spencer — away.

The Greenwave ends the season at 5-6. Unbeaten Peach County hosts Region 2-AAA runnerup Fitzgerald tonight in the first round of the state playoffs.

324th wins flag football championship in overtime

From staff reports

Unlike the Super Bowl of most years, Fort Benning's version of the championship game lived up to its billing on Nov. 13 at Doughboy Stadium.

HHD-324th Forward Support Battalion won the Flag Football Championship, 6-0, in overtime, over Charlie Co. 2nd Battalion, 69th Armored Regiment as both defenses refused to surrender the end zone in regulation.

Quarterback Staff Sgt. Perry Toomer allowed HHD-324th to cap an undefeated season (17-0) when he ran around right end on 2nd-and-goal from the 8-yard line in the second series of penetration.

"It was rough," said HHD-324th coach and tight-end Terrence Galloway. "They had a pretty good team. We usually score 14 points in the first half alone."

After time expired in regulation with the score tied 0-0, each team got four downs to score from the 10-yard line. Charlie Co. was stopped on four downs and then returned the favor by stopping HHD-324th.

In the second series of penetration, HHD-324th middle linebacker Reginald Collins intercepted a pass to stop Charlie Co. That set up the winning touchdown for HHD-324th on its series of downs.

"It was a designed play," said Galloway. "This is great because it is the first time that our battalion has won anything like this.

"Plus, it was two teams from Kelley Hill, so we kind of showed that Kelley Hill was the best," added Galloway.

Both teams moved deep into the opponent's territory in the first half, but the defenses responded.

Players on the championship team were Galloway, Toomer, Collins, Guy Brooks, Edward Crittendon, Nathan Faulk, Christopher Hurley, Byron Knight, Thomas Brewer, Roderick Fairchild, Damian Falso, Kim Newman, John Hurlbutt, Michael Ward, Bobby Cox and Billy Davis.

Ski West

Despite economy, it's hard not to hit slopes

From wire reports

Money's not as free flowing as it was just a few years ago and many people have postponed upgrading the car or wrapping the house in a new coat of paint.

But there's an adage among skiers that makes it difficult to keep this year's ski trip on the shelf with other big ticket items:

You've got to ski when the snow is there.

Northwest skiers were parched last season. No one's saying for sure this will be a banner year in the region, but if hope has sway, nature will make all that newly expanded snowmaking equipment obsolete.

Downhill ski resorts in the Northwest and around the country are not fools. You're not going to see big price increases this year. In fact, some are bragging that they've kept weekend lift tickets at 1990 rates and others have dropped weekday prices to as low as $10 (Mission Ridge, on Mondays and Tuesdays).

Diehard skiers will find a way to go destination skiing, even if it means downscaling. For some it will mean cutting back from one week to three days or dropping from 4-star to 2-star hotels; for many it will mean limiting resorts to those within driving distance.

From Seattle, skiers can drive to top resorts such as Whistler/Blackcomb, Sun Valley and Mt. Bachelor. There's a whole tier of smaller (and less expensive) resorts such as Silver Mountain in Kellogg, Idaho, or its Sandpoint neighbor, Schweitzer; Mt. Hood in Oregon; Big White and other resorts in eastern British Columbia; and close to home, Crystal Mountain or Mt. Baker.

Driving can save a bundle, particularly for families. A family of four can easily spend $1,000 on air fare to Colorado or California.

The crux of it is, there are ways to cut corners so you don't have to eliminate your winter ski holiday because of budget woes.

"The fancy hotels get the publicity but there's a great number of affordable deals to be had," said Connie Rabold, media relations director for Whistler Resort, a world-class ski area north of Vancouver, B.C. where even souvenir sweatshirts cost $60.

People can call the central reservations number, give an idea of their budget and a package will be designed around it, Rabold said.

If that's still too expensive, as it may well be, there are alternatives. There are three budget hostels or lodges at Whistler that may test your tolerance for snoring, but cost one-third the price of a lift ticket. Further savings: use their kitchens to cook.

You don't see it in the slick ski advertisements, but a lot of families or groups of friends rent condominiums at Whistler or Mt. Bachelor in Oregon, load up on warehouse groceries and then splurge with one big night out at the A&W.

Even Whistler, rated the No. 1 ski resort in North America in 1992 by Snow Country magazine (edging out glitzy Vail, Colo.), offers discount lift tickets through grocery store chains outside of the municipality, a surprisingly common practice among resorts.

Patti Polinsky, who leads budget European tours for the Seattle-based Mountaineers outdoors club, says it's all a matter of tradeoffs. Americans are loathe to use the potty down the hall at low-cost pensions, for instance, but they're willing to pass up the appealing hot lunch served at Austrian ski huts in favor of bread, fruit and cheese purchased for a fraction of the cost at shops the previous night.

"There are some costs you just can't get around," said Polinsky, who lately has seen people save harder before they go and think harder before they spend once they're there.

It's not to say that everyone's on the breadline or that a ski trip will put him or her there. For some people, there's still room to splurge on the slopes.

"The higher-priced stuff went real well last year," said Ken Overstreet, owner of Schwartz Tours in Kirkland, Wash. "The lower-priced trips were the ones that were suffering because those were the people who were on the verge of having a job or not."

Schwartz said he sold 40 snowcat ski trips at $250 a day, but 3-day regional ski tours in the $200 range did very poorly.

Dick Gentry of Ski Pak in Bellevue, Wash., noticed the difference in skiers' length of trip.

A ski vacation doesn't have to break the bank with a little planning.

Carve costs of a ski trip

From wire reports

Here are some tips on keeping down the costs of a ski vacation:

■ Food prices tend to be lower the lower the elevation. For instance, at Big Mountain in Whitefish, Mont., a beer and a burger are twice as expensive midway up the mountain than at the base; cheaper still off the mountain.

■ Chat up the "lifties" — the lift operators. In real life, they're often ski bums, or at least always in search of a good bargain. They know who has the best coffee at the best price. They know who serves the biggest breakfast for the least money.

■ Drive or take the bus or train to a ski resort. You don't have to have a state-of-the-art four-wheel drive. We got along for years on chains, and front-wheel drive is a big improvement. The Amtrak train to Big Mountain in Montana is so popular you'll need to book this year for travel during next year's holiday periods.

■ One of the best bargains is in the Okanagan, in south-central British Columbia. You can make a nice circuit of Red Mountain, Big White, Silver Star and Apex, basking in the deep powder and small-town prices. The Canadian dollar is off 20 percent this year. Remember to keep the receipts and get a refund form for Canada's 7 percent Goods & Services Tax for lodging and material goods, although you can't get a refund for food or lift tickets.

■ Inquire about "Stay Free Ski Free" packages. Some resorts offer either free or discount tickets for children, allowing kids under 17 to stay with their parents. Seniors over 70 also ski free in some resorts, but more often it's at a discount.

■ Call ahead to resort offices to find out which grocery stores, radio stations or fast-food restaurants have joined in lift discount promotions. Often they are distributed outside the ski area only. (As yet, many ski areas haven't finalized their contracts.)

■ You can save as much as $100 a week in off-season packages or save substantially by buying multi-day tickets. For instance at Mount Bachelor, where adult tickets sell for $31, you can lessen the daily cost to $25 on a five-day ticket. According to a national survey, only 37 percent of skiers pay full price for tickets, thanks to multi-day tickets, and packages.

■ Check with travel agents and some of the smaller airlines for packages if you want to fly to a resort. Horizon offers Sun Valley packages, Reno Air has Reno packages.

■ If you're after a bargain, forget Christmas when everything is top rate. But consider January, which may have excellent skiing, if a little harsher conditions.

■ Buy equipment and clothes for the long run. That might mean high enough quality to last, but standard enough that you'll still show some style in five years. (Does neon ring a bell?) Watch for pre-season and post-season sales.

It's time to hit the ski slopes

People stopped taking week-long trips except to Colorado or Europe, but would take as many as three three-day weekend trips over the winter.

Cross-country skiing is enjoying a big boom nationwide in part because it's so much less expensive. It's also influencing downhill, say some resort officials, who report that there's decreasing emphasis on fashion in downhill skiing.

"Skis can cost $600," says Gentry, before pulling out the old adage: "It's easy to go another year on hard goods — skis, clothes — but you've got to ski when the snow is there."

There's no question the biggest bargains are on the shoulder seasons, opening day (usually around Thanksgiving in the Northwest) through Dec. 18, in the midst of whiteout January, or in the spring. Generally we miss spring skiing in the Northwest because we throw the skis in the closet and take out the golf clubs, tennis racket and bicycles as soon as we see the first rays of sun.

But pre-season can make or break a ski season.

"Even in recessionary times, skiing is addictive," said Gentry. "If you go out skiing once, you're sort of hooked. If you don't go skiing, you can do without it for the whole season."

It's beginning to feel like snow.

In Hawaii, a place to sleep can cost $150 or more a night at a hotel. However, cabins in state and federal parks go for as little as $15 per night.

Save lots of cash with 'cheap sleep'

By Kristin Jackson
Seattle Times

I hung up the phone and cackled with glee. I'd just found the ultimate "cheap sleep" for our family vacation in Maui — a one-bedroom cabin right by the beach for about $15 a night.

Granted, I haven't seen the place yet. It's probably pretty basic and drab. But who cares — it sits right by the beach in Waianapanapa State Park. Anyhow, we plan to spend most of our time outside, on the beach or hiking.

I don't think I'm alone in these tight-money days in trying to avoid paying big bucks for a place just to sleep. Here are some ways to find — and enjoy — budget accommodations:

IN GENERAL ...

■ Adjust your expectations. If you think of budget accommodations as camping in comfort, you won't be dismayed by drab decor or lack of amenities. You may be pleasantly surprised; some offbeat budget accommodations have lots of charm.

■ Budget guidebooks cover dozens of countries. Among them are the "Let's Go," "Moon Publications" and "Lonely Planet" series. In Mexico, Italy and the U.S. I've stayed in and been pleased with some of the budget accommodations listed in the "Let's Go" guides.

The first four volumes in a new budget guidebook series, "The Berkeley Guides," were published this month and cover Mexico, California, Eastern Europe and the Pacific Northwest (including Alaska). They're packed with information on budget accommodations, campgrounds, restaurants and off-beat places.

For the Pacific Northwest, a fine guidebook is "Northwest Cheap Sleeps" which describes lodgings for under $50 a night in Washington, Oregon and British Columbia (Sasquatch Books, $11.95).

■ Motels can be good value in the U.S. and Canada. I've had good luck with the Days Inn motel chain, particularly in the Southwest U.S. In booking a room at a chain, I phone both the nationwide reservations line (usually an 800 number) and the individual hotel since the prices they give can vary.

■ University lodgings: Visitors can rent rooms in university dorms and conference centers around the world. The rooms may be spartan, but rates often are less than $20 per person. Most are available only during university vacations but some are available year-round, such as the comfortable one-bedroom suites at the University of British Columbia in Vancouver, B.C. (phone 1-604-822-1010). They rent for $57 (Cdn.) in the winter and can sleep four people.

■ Youth hostels are the standard budget accommodations for many travelers worldwide: rates are as low as $8 a person for a bunk in a dorm.

OFF-BEAT PLACES

Here are some offbeat budget places that I've come across in the United States:

■ Alaska: The U.S. Forest Service has more than 200 wilderness cabins for rent in Alaska. They're definitely rustic: you hike, fly or boat in; the cabins have no power or running water. However, they're surrounded by wilderness scenery and cost only $20 a night per cabin. The cabins are popular with hikers, hunters and fishermen. Reservations can be made 180 days in advance. Information on cabins in south-central Alaska: the Alaska Public Lands Information Center in Anchorage, 1-907-271-2737.

■ U.S. Virgin Islands: St. John's, a 19-square-mile island in the Caribbean, is one of the least developed and uncrowded of the U.S. Virgin Islands. Two-thirds of it is preserved as a national park.

There are some glitzy resorts, such as Caneel Bay where rates start at about $265 a night. For those of us without money to burn, there are two clusters of basic, but beachfront, "tent-cottages" for about $70-$80 a night in the December-April high season, a good deal by Caribbean standards.

Maho Bay Campground is a private "ecological resort" with tent-cottages on wooden platforms (phone 1-800-392-9004). Cinnamon Bay campground is in the national park; simple cabins are $79 a night; tent-cabins are $62 (phone Rockresorts at 1-800-223-7637). Or take your own tent and pay $14 a night for a site — phone 1-809-776-6330.

■ Hawaii: An oceanfront condo easily can cost $150 a night on Maui or the other Hawaiian islands. A budget alternative is a cabin in one of the state or national parks. There are only a handful, and they're popular, so book months ahead.

On the Big Island, there are a half-dozen, one-room A-frame shelters for rent in Hapuna Beach State Park, one of the island's best beaches. They're barely a step up from camping — wood bed platforms (bring your own sleeping bag) and a wood table, plus shared kitchen and bathrooms in a nearby building. But they cost only $15 a night and can sleep up to four. Details: Hapanua park, 1-808-882-1095.

On Maui, three wilderness cabins within Haleakala National Park are so popular that the park service uses a lottery to determine who can rent them. The cabins, which lie within the volcanic moonscape of the Haleakala crater and cost $9 per person, can only be reached by rugged hiking trails. Information: Haleakala park, 1-808-572-9177.

Also on Maui, and considerably more comfortable and reachable by car, are the dozen cabins within Waianapanapa State Park. The beachfront park lies on the rugged Hana coast. The plain one-bedroom cabins have kitchens, bathrooms and bunk beds. The price is $14 a night, double occupancy. Information: state parks, 1-808-243-5354.

Get in line for tickets to '94 Olympics

From wire reports

A California company has been selected by the U.S. Olympic Committee to handle ticket sales for the Winter Olympics in Lillehammer, Norway, from Feb. 12 to 27, 1994. Brochures from Cartan Tours of Manhattan Beach, Calif., are expected to be ready for mailing about Dec. 10, and interested people can place their name on a brochure mailing list by calling 800-841-1994.

Ticket prices for the 16 days of games vary depending on the sport, the seat location and the round of competition. Besides tickets to individual events, Cartan will offer tour packages that include transportation, lodging and meals.

Lillehammer is about 150 miles north of Oslo. Events also will be held in the nearby towns of Gjovik and Hamar. Additional travel information is available from the Norwegian Tourist Board, 655 Third Ave., New York, N.Y. 10017; phone 212-949-2333.

Anyone who has driven Interstate 70 across Colorado in the last decade knows too well that roadwork in Glenwood Canyon has caused nightmare backups. But now, $484 million later, the work is done and the interstate has four lanes through the scenic stretch along the Colorado River. The end of the project means smoother driving year-round, and is especially good news for anyone heading for the eight Colorado ski resorts within an hour of Glenwood Springs.

Continental Airlines had the best on-time arrival record — 17.3 percent of its flights were late — in September at Philadelphia International Airport, according to an air-travel consumer report compiled by the Transportation Department and released this month.

Delta had the second-best record, with 19.6 percent of flights late. Four other airlines were clustered with 20 percent to 21 percent of their flights late: American, TWA, United and Northwest.

USAir, the airport's biggest customer with 64 percent of all reported flights, had the worst record for the month, with 22.4 percent of arrivals more than 15 minutes late.

USAir also placed last nationally, with 19.1 percent of its arrivals late. Nationwide, Continental had the best September record, with 12.9 per cent of flights late, followed by Northwest and TWA.

■

The number of overseas automatic banking tellers that accept U.S. cards continues to grow, according to the November issue of Consumer Reports Travel Letter. Both the Cirrus and Plus networks are operating in some far-flung places, although the two networks do not honor each other's cards abroad as they do within the United States. Some tips: ATMs outside North America often don't accept access numbers of more than four digits, so consider changing yours if it's the six-digit variety; also, overseas ATMs may not give you a choice of accounts, so be prepared to have access only to primary checking.

■

A survey by the U.S. Travel Data Center showed that 82 percent of U.S. travelers questioned said their interest in visiting central or south Florida would not be affected by the damage from Hurricane Andrew. Twelve percent said their interest had decreased, while about 4 percent said it had increased since the storm. South Dade County suffered billions of dollars in damage, but most of Miami's major tourist attractions were not badly harmed.

■

Anyone longing for the days of J.R. Ewing and Co. can get a first-hand taste with the reopening of Southfork Ranch outside of Dallas. After being closed for two years, the estate that was the setting for the popular TV series has been renovated by a new owner. Southfork is open 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. daily and admission is $4 for adults, $2 for children. Promised for '93: A museum dedicated ot the history of the show. Information: 214-442-7800.

■

The opening of the Channel Tunnel, which will link England with France and quickly become a tourist attraction, has been delayed again, this time until about Christmas 1993. It's the second time this year that a delay has been announced. Originally the tunnel was set to open in mid-1993. The new delay was attributed to procuring train equipment that will be used to transport passengers within the tunnel.

■

Anheuser Busch Co. and a Spanish partner are developing Europe's second major theme park in the resort town of Salou, about 60 miles south of Barcelona on the Mediterranean coast. Tibi Gardens, expected to open in 1995, will occupy 500 acres featuring five big attractions representing the Wild West, Polynesia, China, Mexico and the northeastern Spanish region of Catalunya (Catalonia). The plan includes 31 rides, 11 daily shows, a 300-room hotel, an 18-hole golf course and 200 private homes nearby. At $450 million to build, Tibi Gardens would be considerably less costly than Euro Disney, which opened earlier this year east of Paris; its price tag was about $4 billion. In the United States, Anheuser Busch operates Busch Gardens parks in two cities and Sea World parks in four cities.

■

Effective this month, U.S. citizens visiting Russia are free to travel outside major cities without having to obtain permission from the Foreign Ministry, according to the U.S. State Department. Also, visitors will no longer be required to make arrangements through state-run organizations.

■

The State Department is warning U.S. citizens against all travel to Peru until further notice because of increased terrorist violence. The department has authorized the voluntary departure of all U.S. government dependents and nonessential official personnel from the country.

Five hotels on the island of Bermuda are offering a temperature guarantee for January, February and March: Any day the mercury fails to reach 68 degrees, guests get 20 percent off their daily room rate. The hotels are the Hamilton Princess, the Southampton Princess, the Elbow Beach, the Grotto Bay and the Marriott Castle Harbor. That guarantee is cutting it close, it seems. According to the World Weather Guide, the average daily high in Hamilton, Bermuda, for each of those months is exactly 68 degrees. They are the coolest three months of the year. CREDITS & REFUNDS

A PRIVILEGE OR A RIGHT?

Stores are not required by law to accept returns (unless the merchandise is defective) but generally do so as a matter of customer good will. During this holiday gift-giving season, know the individual store policy before you buy. Is a sales slip required? Is there a time limit? Must all tags, packaging, etc., be intact and returned? Have a happy holiday season and may all your gifts be the perfect color and the right size so you won't need to return a thing.

The Family Home Daycare Division of the Georgia Department of Human Resources advises that Family Home daycare for 1-6 children can only be registered, not licensed. For 7 or more children, the Family Home daycare status changes to Group Home daycare and licensing is required. If this is an area that is of interest to you when trying to determine daycare facilities for your child, you may call 1-404-894-5688 to inquire further about Georgia regulations.

COMMENTARY

Work on Operation TORCH intensifies

The pace of preparations for Operation TORCH quickened in October 1942. The carefully prepared offensive of the British Eighth Army in Egypt was scheduled to begin on Oct. 23 in the hope that a victory over the combined German-Italian forces would be clearly won before the Allied landings in French North Africa.

Al Garland

The final assault plan called for Gen. George S. Patton's Western Task Force (WTF) to secure the port at Casablanca and several adjacent airfields and, in conjunction with the Center Task Force (CTF) landing at Oran, to establish and maintain communications between Casablanca and Oran.

Sailing from the U.S., the WTF's major combat elements were the 3rd and 9th Infantry Divisions (the latter minus its 39th Infantry Regiment, which was sent to England to join the Eastern Task Force (ETF), the 2nd Armored Division, two separate tank battalions, three tank destroyer battalions, and the 36th Combat Engineer Regiment. These units were grouped into three sub-task forces. The WTF had a total of 33,843 men.

The CTF, led by Maj. Gen. Lloyd R. Fredendall, had as its major combat units the 1st Infantry Division, the 1st Armored Division, the 1st Ranger Battalion, and the 2nd Battalion, 503rd Parachute Infantry Regiment (later redesignated the 509th Parachute Infantry Regiment). CTF's major objective was the port at Oran.

Fredendall's plan called for his units to execute a double envelopment of the city and port by landing simultaneously on three major beaches and one minor beach. The airborne unit, flying from the United Kingdom, was to drop before daylight south of Oran near two airfields, there to be joined by armored columns from the 1st Armored Division. CTF's total strength was about 37,100 U.S. and 3,600 British soldiers. They were also to seize the port and village of Arzew, some distance east of Oran. The units would sail from the United Kingdom.

The Eastern Task Force (ETF), led by Maj. Gen. Charles W. Ryder, took on a complicated complexion. From the United Kingdom, he was to lead two regimental combat teams (one from his own 34th Infantry Division, the other, the 39th Infantry Regiment from the 9th Infantry Division) plus several British units to seize the city and port of Algiers.

When the ETF had seized its objectives, British Lt. Gen. Kenneth A.N. Anderson would relieve Ryder, land his British First Army troops (actually the bulk of the invasion force), and immediately drive to the east to occupy eastern Algeria and Tunisia. At that time, Ryder's force would be redesignated the U.S. 34th Infantry Division and would come under Anderson's command to serve as the Algiers garrison. His British troops would revert to British control.

Ryder's plan called for three simultaneous landings, two to the west of Algiers, the other east of Cap Matifou. The two U.S. assault forces were to drive inland from their beachheads and converge, sealing off Algiers. The third landing force's mission was to protect the ETF's western flank.

Overall, there would be 45,000 British and 10,000 U.S. troops in the ETF.

Training for the amphibious part of the operation, and in some respects for the subsequent phases, fell short of what was desired and perhaps below the requirements of victory over a well-armed and determined foe. For those leaders preparing the units in the U.S. and the United Kingdom, they did the best they could within the limitations imposed by inexperience, uncertainty, and shortness of time.

In the meantime, as the assault forces began putting to sea, the British Eighth Army's attack at El Alamein went off on Oct. 23 with a thunderous artillery preparation. By Nov. 4, the opposing forces, again led by Field Marshal Erwin Rommel who had hurried back from Germany, had been decisively defeated and Rommel began a slow withdrawal to the west.

This British victory was the first in a long series of almost uninterrupted Allied triumphs over Axis forces in the Mediterranean that ended in the Po River valley in northern Italy in the spring of 1945.

Before dawn on Nov. 8, 1942, U.S. soldiers began striding through the surf to the beaches of northwest Africa. They were the first of more than one million Americans to see service in the Mediterranean area during World War II.

A promise to remember 1st Cav veterans

By James A. Scott

During the period of Nov. 6-9, I attended the Ia Drang Alumni Association reunion in Washington, D.C. Former members of the 1st Cavalry Division gathered there as a band of brothers to honor the 10th anniversary of the Vietnam Wall on Veterans Day 1992. One purpose of the reunion was to keep memories alive of the days we spent in Vietnam. And we were also there for the release of the book, "We Were Soldiers Once . . . And Young," the story of the battles that took place in the Ia Drang Valley at Landing Zones X-Ray and Albany in 1965. The authors are Lt. Gen. (retired) Harold Moore and Joseph Galloway, a senior writer for U.S. News and World Report.

I was presented a large plaque at the banquet on Sunday evening, Nov. 8. These are the words I said to the large group when I accepted the plaque, and I quote:

"As my eyes wander around this hall I say to those seated on the left of this podium, "Thank You," to those in the center, "Thank you," to those on the right, "Thank you." I say these words because if it weren't for you I probably would not be here tonight to accept this award. I want you to know that I accept it on behalf of all the former members of our unit.

"Certainly I would like to remain in Washington to participate in your ceremonies at the Vietnam Wall, but must return to Columbus, Georgia tomorrow. On Wednesday, Nov. 11, 1992, I will be with you in spirit at the Wall to honor our deceased members, and I will be in person at Fort Benning, Georgia to pay tribute to the 1st Cav veterans. This I promise each of you present here tonight.

"First, I will visit the Sand Hill area of Fort Benning, then Harmony Church area, followed by Kelly Hill and the Lawson Field area. At each place I will pause and salute to honor all the men who departed these areas in August 1965 for Vietnam as members of the 1st Cavalry Division (Airmobile). I will also remember all the family members as they came to bid farewell to their loved ones.

"My last stop will be at the Fort Benning, Georgia, cemetery. There I will pay a special tribute to our band of 1st Cavalry brothers and comrades who lost their lives in Vietnam, other places and other wars. All veterans will be remembered on this Veterans Day 1992.

"Yes, I will certainly pay tribute to you at Fort Benning, where we organized, trained and then departed as a unit for Vietnam.

"This I promise you!"

One-stop utility shop opens for business

Soldiers may not have to pay deposits

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

Some Fort Benning soldiers may be able to avoid local utility deposits through a so-called "Fort Benning Plan" run through a new Utility Coordination Center on post.

The center, in Building 2633, was officially opened Tuesday by Maj. Gen. Jerry White, who told a crowd of about 40 people that the facility will "make soldiers' lives a lot easier."

It was created so that in-processing soldiers who sign a "deposit waiver" and sign up for the plan will have an easier time applying for and getting gas, water, electric and telephone service, said Becky Carroll, chief of family support on post.

The plan was created so that in-processing soldiers who sign a "deposit waiver" and sign up for the plan will have an easier time applying for and getting gas, water, electric and telephone service.

Two temporary employees paid jointly by Southern Bell, United Cities Gas Co., Columbus Water Works and Georgia Power Co. will help in-processing soldiers fill out the waivers. Then the soldiers can call the utilities from the center and apply for service by telephone, Carroll said.

In many cases, she said, "They won't have to pay a deposit, unless there is known bad credit."

Mike Hill, district manager for Southern Bell, said the facility will keep in-processing soldiers from having to visit the phone company and other utilities to get service.

Besides the public relations benefits to the utilities, there is a practical side, he said: Two noncommissioned officers the Army has promised to staff the center can help the utilities collect on final bills during a soldier's out-processing, or locate a non-payer after he leaves.

Hill said a would-be customer will have to answer Southern Bell's usual questions before being granted phone service, but the deposit waiver might make it easier for lower-ranking soldiers to get utility service in Columbus.

Emory Blount of Columbus Water Works said officials there "felt like it would help our collectibles." He said the program is "beneficial both to the soldier and to us, especially when they get ready to out-process, they have to clear everything up."

Linda Sanders of United Cities said the idea for the program has been around for five or six years, but utility companies had scrapped it earlier because it appeared they would have to furnish full-time employees to run the center. Now, the Army will do that and pay the center's costs.

The plan does not apply to soldiers living outside Muscogee County, but efforts are afoot to expand it to include utility companies from Phenix City, and Chattahoochee, Lee and Russell counties, the Army said.

T-shirts will be presented to all finishers and awards will be presented in each category at the awards ceremony in the Faith School gym.

Pre-registration for 14-year-olds and under is $4 and for 15-year-olds and over is $6. Race day registration begins at 7:30 a.m. with fees of $5 for 14 years of age and under and $7 for 15 years of age and over.

PROFILE

She's an elf to some, a saint to others

Cathy Case loves being a volunteer

By Linda Bosley Dailey
Staff Writer

Donning a red and green elf suit at Christmas, a bunny costume at Easter and Pilgrim attire at Thanksgiving is just part of Kathy Case's effort to repay a personal debt.

It's not money she owes, though. It's service to her fellow man.

As she sees it, Case has an obligation — to others and to God — to employ her particular gifts and talents to benefit others.

"I need to use those gifts to make a difference," she said, explaining the reason she does volunteer work.

But at work, Case faces a different task. Her job is to help others use their talents to make a difference through volunteer efforts. "I think everyone has something to offer," she said.

As the post's volunteer coordinator, Case runs the Volunteer Resource Center, occupying a paid position within the Family Support Division of Directorate of Community Activities. She recruits, trains and places volunteers at dozens of organizations both on and off post. She also plans the annual recognition ceremony for volunteers each spring.

"Volunteers are our greatest natural resource. Without them, if our country didn't come to a grinding halt, it would really slow down," she said.

Case gets excited when discussing the capabilities of the volunteer force and its ability to respond to a need. "They've got the power to do anything they want," she said, slapping her knee and sitting forward in her chair.

But even though she spends 40 hours a week furthering the cause of voluntarism, Case stills feels the compulsion to volunteer during her off-duty hours.

So, Case becomes an elf, the Easter Bunny, a Pilgrim at the appropriate time each year to help spread holiday cheer.

This Christmas Eve, for example, Case will continue her tradition of dressing as an elf and visiting fire departments, the military police station and the hospital to carol and give away candy and cookies she has made.

"I feel sorry for those guys having to work" on Christmas Eve, she said.

But Case won't be alone on that holiday trek. Her four daughters and her husband, Joe, in a Santa suit, will accompany her.

"She (Case) gives so much of herself," said Kathleen Meade, a volunteer who helps Case run the Volunteer Resource Center. "She's constantly doing something for somebody. This is a real way of life for her."

Although the need for volunteers exists year-round, the need is often more apparent during the holiday season.

At present, the greatest need on post for volunteers is at Santa's Castle. A volunteer organization that provides toys to needy soldiers for their children, Santa's Castle needs not only elves, who help parents select their toys, but also leaders to manage the group next year because the current officers will be moving away, Case said.

Case herself takes turns being an elf at Santa's Castle — wearing her elf suit, of course. As far as she knows, Santa's Castle is the only organization of its kind on an Army post, Case said. What Santa's Castle does, she said, is "what Christmas is all about. I wish I weren't working full time," Case said, so she could spend more time being an elf there.

In the larger scheme of things, though, "I think as a nation, we need volunteers to be involved with our youth," she said, because they need help preparing for the future.

By Joe Maher/The Benning Leader

Cathy Case holds an orientation for Red Cross volunteers at Martin Army Community Hospital recently.

"Volunteers are our greatest natural resource. Without them, if our country didn't come to a grinding halt, it would really slow down," said Case.

It was when she was a teen-ager in Shelbyville, Ind., that Case herself began volunteering. She sang in the choir at church and taught a children's Sunday School class. She continued volunteering at her church as an adult. Later, when she and her husband, then on active duty, were transferred to Germany, she began volunteering with the USO. It was with the USO that she assumed the duties of running the volunteer program.

Managing the volunteer program in Germany was an unpaid job, but it gave Case experience that helped her land the paid post of volunteer coordinator first at Fort Ord, Calif., and then here. Case became Fort Benning's volunteer coordinator in 1990.

Under Case's direction from 1985 and 1987, the number of volunteer hours worked annually at that program in Germany increased from 450 to over 8,000, she said. While at Fort Ord, from 1988 to 1990, the number of volunteers rose 25 percent. And between April 1991 and April 1992 here at Fort Benning, the volunteer corps has increased 13 percent.

But volunteer programs, common in previous centuries, will see a resurgence in the future, Case believes. Federal and state programs won't always provide for every need. Consequently, she said there will be an increasing need for volunteers to help care for the society — a need for individuals to take "ownership of their community," she said.

"We're all in this mess together. We have to help each other," Case said.

"I'm only going to have one shot at whatever I do," she said, summarizing the quote she has adopted as her personal motto. It reads in part, "Any good, therefore, that I can do, or any kindness that I can show to my fellow creatures, let me not defer nor neglect it, for I shall not pass this way again."

But helping others is no chore for Case. She enjoys it. After she dies, she hopes others will assess her life as worthwhile and be able to say " 'She gave the best that she had to give,' " she said. She knows already how she'll evaluate her existence: "I had a great time."

Kathy Case

Age: 37.

Job: Volunteer coordinator, Volunteer Resource Center.

Family: Husband, Joe Case; four daughters: Sarah, Susie, Katie and Elizabeth.

Hometown: Born in West Virginia and grew up in Shelbyville, Ind.

On the need for volunteers: "We're all in this mess together. We have to help each other."

On having a volunteer to help her: "I feel like I've died and gone to heaven all of a sudden."

On her willingness to "ham" it up: "I have no shame, they tell me."

On her professional goal: "My ultimate goal in life is to become a training consultant for non-profit organizations."

On where lies the greatest need for volunteers: "I think as a nation, we need volunteers to be involved with our youth."

On her greatest weakness: "I take on too much."

Columbus won't get defense center

By Jim Poole
Business Editor

While it appears Columbus won't get a military accounting center that would have brought 4,000-7,000 jobs, Macon is still in the running, Defense Department officials said Tuesday.

Huntsville, Ala., Pensacola, Fla., Jackson, Miss., New Orleans and Shreveport, La., also are among the top 20 contenders for at least three centers to be established across the nation, the officials said.

The Defense Department's accounting functions are now done at five Defense Finance Accounting Service (DFAS) centers across the country and at military installations around the world. DFAS centers are currently in Cleveland and Columbus, Ohio, Denver, Indianapolis and Kansas City.

In March, the Defense Department said it would consolidate accounting functions into three to five centers, employing 4,000-7,000 workers in each location. Cities were asked to submit proposals to compete for the centers.

Columbus' proposal, submitted in June, called for a high-rise structure to be built on the old City Mills site, overlooking the Chattahoochee River at 18th Street and First Avenue.

These cities still have a chance

Cities still in the running for the Finance and Accounting Centers of the Defense Finance and Accounting Service:

Bangor, Maine; Cleveland, Columbus and Youngstown, Ohio; Denver, Colo.; Indianapolis and Evansville, Ind.; Huntsville, Ala.; Jackson, Miss.; Lubbock, Texas; Macon, Ga.; New Orleans and Shreveport, La.; Oklahoma City, Tulsa and Lawton, Okla.; Pensacola, Fla.; Saginaw, Mich.; San Bernardino, Calif., and Southbridge, Mass.

"Basically, once the communities met the basic criteria test . . . the overriding evaluation criteria was cost to DOD," said Jean Marie Ward, DFAS public affairs officer. "They were all ranked by cost. One can only infer that the Macon proposal by far cost DOD less than the Columbus proposal."

The top contending cities have been notified, she said.

While the list of finalists doesn't include Columbus, Michael Gaymon, president of the Columbus Chamber of Commerce, said the city isn't ready to give up yet.

"You know it's a long shot to begin with. We have the attitude never say never," Gaymon said. "Even though we're not on the list, we're not going to throw in the towel. Obviously we're disappointed."

Essentially, the Defense Department is looking for a cost-free building and land with a number of amenities, including on-site child care and training for employees, federal officials said. Under the most likely scenario, the state would own the facilities and lease them to the federal government at a nominal rate, the officials said.

GAYMON

Through the Department of Industry, Trade and Tourism, the state of Georgia has tentatively committed to two elements that are essential to the project — a state commitment to provide worker training, and a guarantee that the state would issue bonds for construction.

"You know it's a long shot to begin with. We have the attitude never say never," said Michael Gaymon, president of the Columbus Chamber of Commerce. "Even though we're not on the list, we're not going to throw in the towel. Obviously we're disappointed."

A complex housing 7,000 employees would likely involve more than 1 million square feet at a cost of about $70 million. A smaller, 4,000-employee center would cost slightly less.

"I personally think there will be a lot more negotiation," Gaymon said. When it comes down to producing what they need, there's not a lot of cities and states that can say we'll give you a building for nothing. We're ready to provide that."

Even with a new administration taking office next year, politics aren't expected to alter the Defense Department's plans to consolidate the centers, Ward said.

"The Defense Base Realignment and Closure Act of 1990 was designed to provide for needed realignments within the department, while giving protection from politics," Ward said.

Columbus was one of 112 sites from 33 states that submitted proposals.

Now, DFAS representatives will make on-site visits to the 20 cities contending for the centers, before asking them for final proposals. A decision will be made in mid-February on where the centers will be located.

Put into perspective, a center located in Columbus would have meant the addition of nearly as many jobs as it gained in the last decade, which was about 10,000.

Most of the Defense Department accounting jobs would involve data processing, accounting and bookkeeping functions with annual salaries of about $35,000.

Senator says agencies hiding POW documents

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — The Republican leader of the Senate panel investigating Americans missing from the Vietnam War charged Tuesday that federal agencies have been withholding documents from the committee.

Sen. Bob Smith, R-N.H., said he wants to subpoena the documents before the committee goes out of existence Jan. 3.

"We have hundreds of questions yet to be answered, thousands of documents that this committee has not seen and that this government refuses to provide," he said at the opening of four days of hearings.

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., chairman of the Senate Select Committee on POW-MIA Affairs, said that while he has been at times "somewhat distressed" with the Pentagon's level of cooperation, he was satisfied with its overall efforts.

"Any document we ought to have, we get," he said. "The (committee's) effort thus far has been extensive and extraordinary and the response has been extensive."

The documents Smith wants include 60 boxes of intelligence reports from the National Security Agency, operational files from the Central Intelligence Agency, debriefing reports from returned prisoners of war and more than 500 Defense Intelligence Agency reports claiming POWs have been alive in captivity in Vietnam and Laos as late as 1989.

Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, said that while the committee has worked for nearly a year trying to find out what happened to U.S. servicemen who didn't return from Vietnam, "our attempts have been frustrated by prejudgments."

He blamed the Pentagon, saying, "the mindset to debunk (reports of sightings of POWs and MIAs) is alive and well at the Department of Defense."

On the first of four days of hearings this week, the committee was told that the Defense Intelligence Agency's office on POWs and MIAs was hampered by management problems, lack of resources, lack of leadership and pressures from politicians and activists.

The authors of several Pentagon reports critical of the DIA in the 1980s testified that these failings combined with fabricated information caused investigators to become overly cynical.

"A degree of cynicism crept into our analysis," said retired Rear Adm. Thomas Brooks, who wrote a memorandum sharply critical of DIA operations in September 1985 after serving as a flag-rank officer in charge of the agency's POW-MIA office for several months earlier that year.

Though he said the cynicism was "part of human nature," he said "it is not appropriate to intelligence efforts."

Col. Kimball Gaines, a former supervisor of the POW-MIA office who conducted a review highly critical of the office in March 1986, said a major problem at the time was that DIA analysts had no buffer between themselves and members of Congress and outside interests, including activists.

Retired Lt. Gen. Leonard Perroots, who headed the DIA from 1985 to 1988, said part of the problem was that the agency was inadequately financed, but he said another problem was that too many materials were classified.

Military groups discuss ban on gays

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — Representatives of major military and veterans organizations met Tuesday to discuss strategy to keep the ban on homosexuals in the military in place.

"There was not a single dissension" to the consensus that President-elect Clinton's stated intention of ending the ban on gays would affect military readiness, said retired Army Maj. Gen. J. Milnor Roberts.

Roberts said about 60 retired and active-duty military people attended, from such groups as the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Association of the U.S. Army, the Navy League, the Reserve Officers Association and the Retired Officers Association.

He said one conclusion was that the organizing group, called the Coalition To Maintain Military Readiness, should gather evidence of what he said are adverse effects of gays on the military.

The chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Army Gen. Colin Powell, said in a speech Monday night that he supports continuation of the ban, but does not think its lifting would "break the force" or cause mass resignations.

Clinton has said he would move aggressively to end the ban, but promised to consult first with military officials and said he would enforce a strict code of conduct.

'Ebenezer' puts twist on old classic

From staff reports

"Ebenezer" is a new version of an old classic. This musical, written by Sally Giray, who lives in Macon is a reworking of "A Christmas Carol." The Christmas play is the latest production for The Human Experience Theater. The play will run tonight-Sunday, and Dec. 11-13 and Dec. 18-20. Curtain is 8 p.m. Friday-Saturday and 2 p.m. Sunday.

The music was composed by Chuck Leavell, formerly of The Allman Brothers Band and Sea Level. He is also a member of the touring bands for The Rolling Stones and Eric Clapton. He's currently on tour with Ronnie Wood of The Rolling Stones.

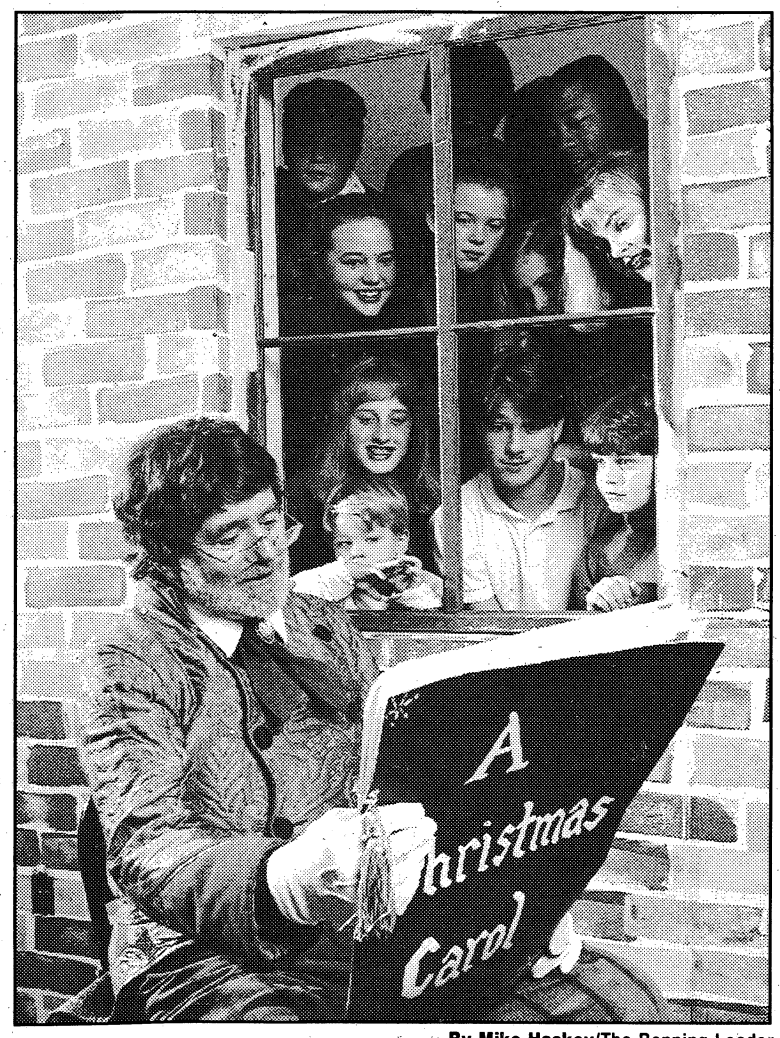
This adaptation is a look through Charles Dickens' eyes as he writes, shares what was in Dickens' day a private matter between him and his publisher.

In October of 1843, Dickens, pressed with bills and deteriorating commitment with his publisher, sat down in desperation to write a filler for the approaching Christmas season.

Before long, however, the potential of the story seized Dickens — Scrooge, Bob Cratchit and other natural and supernatural characters gained control of the story.

"Ebenezer" dives directly into the minds of these characters. "'Ebenezer' offers a different twist to the familiar 'A Christmas Carol' because Dickens is the character of focus, not Ebenezer Scrooge," said director Stephen Sisson.

For those with interest in English literature this adaptation is unique because there is an added thrill of private association to go along with the story. For those who love music, the score is airy and upbeat and the accompaniment will be played on keyboard rather than the piano. The sound resembles qualities of early Elton John and Bernie Taupin compositions.



By Mike Haskey/The Benning Leader

Paul Johnston (as Dickens) reads as the town's children listen in.

The cast is made up of more than 25 children, teen-agers and adults.

"This is a fun show because everyone gets a chance to perform and do things that emphasize their talents," said Sisson. "It is a nice mix of people and most of them have not worked with The Human Experience Theater in the past."

There will be three Sunday matinees during the run of "Ebenezer" so families can attend the play together.

In the cast are Paul Johnston as Charles Dickens/Jacob Marley; director Sisson as Ebenezer Scrooge; Sean Michael Smith as Bob Cratchit and Gary Buchanan as Fred.

Airline's program lets skiers send equipment ahead

From wire reports

Skiers planning to hit the slopes in five Western states — Colorado, Wyoming, Utah, Nevada and New Mexico — can send their equipment ahead under a new United Airlines program. Ticketed United passengers can check their skis in at the airport one or two days ahead of departure, and the equipment will go in advance to the airport at their snowy destination. The airline says it will hold the equipment in a secure area, and the owners may confirm the arrival of their ski bags by phone.

United said research showed that skiers tended to travel with a lot of baggage, and this program would enable them to lighten their load on travel days — especially useful for families traveling together.

The program will be available Dec. 17 to April 20, 1993. For information on the program, contact United at 800-241-6522.

Each Jan. 1 sees price increases for many kinds of travel passes, including the ever-popular Eurailpass. This year, as always, people who plan to travel during the first six months of the new year can beat price increases of up to 25 percent by buying early. (There are exceptions; the cost of BritRail's eight-day first-class adult pass will drop $20, for example.)

There are so many rail passes available it can get confusing. To help determine when to buy for the best deal, Forsyth Travel Library has prepared a free "Summary of 1993 Rail Pass Price Changes." Send a self-addressed, business-size envelope with 29 cents postage to Forsyth Travel Library, 9154 W. 57th St., Box 2975, Shawnee Mission, Kan. 66201.

Connecticut, which distinguished itself in the gambling world this year with the hugely successful Foxwood casino in Ledyard, may be in for another gaming house. Mirage Resorts has proposed a waterfront gambling center for Bridgeport, complete with casino, dog racing track and parimutuel simulcast theater. It's too early to know how the Mirage proposal will go over with state and local officials whose approval is needed. But in making the proposal, Steve Wynn, chief executive of Mirage, which operates a mega-casino in Las Vegas, said the Bridgeport center could employ 5,000 to 7,000 people.

Rangers find it's a jungle out there

Students hit the bushes for 36-hour field problem

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

Paperwork, usually the bailiwick of bureaucrats, seemingly never stops. Even leading a recent daytime reconnaissance patrol with an almost-new class of Ranger School students, Staff Sgt. Daniel Patterson was kept busy on breaks keeping up with his "future" paperwork.

"It was our instructor folder" that he kept studying on breaks, Patterson said. "It has pre-typed orders in it, a kind of fill-in-the-blanks thing, where we (instructors) keep up with the information for the next phase of each maneuver."

The students might have wished there was more paperwork, or at least more breaks. The patrol was part of a 36-hour field problem that started on about the 10th day of the "Benning Phase" of Ranger School.

A student, if he was lucky, "might have gotten two hours of sleep" during these 36 hours, 1st Sgt. Ronald Grenier said.

Patterson, 26, has been a Ranger instructor for about two years. "He's one of my top instructors, they're all tops," said 1st Sgt. Ronald Grenier of Charlie Company, 4th Ranger Training Battalion.

On this exercise, Patterson was acting as a squad leader, showing these would-be Rangers how to do things right when they're doing it all over again for grades — the "Go" or "No-Go" that spells success or failure at various stops through Ranger School.

This exercise involved a reconnaissance patrol, setting up a patrol base, then getting ready for and jumping off into a night ambush. A student, if he was lucky, "might have gotten two hours of sleep" during these 36 hours, Grenier said.

Patterson has eight years in the Army. He got his Ranger Tab in November 1987, and was with the 82nd Airborne Division from 1984 to 1988. Then he went to Fort Lewis, Wash., with the 9th Infantry Division's Long-Range Surveillance Unit. He returned to the Ranger Training Brigade in

What does the introduction to Ranger School feel like for a student? "I think it's a reality shock to quite a few of them," Staff Sgt. Daniel Patterson said. "A lot of them aren't used to the discipline they have to go through."

May 1991 when his Fort Lewis unit was deactivated.

Just having the rank doesn't get it as a Ranger Instructor: Each man has to go through the 20 "problems" a Ranger student will see in the Fort Benning phase, Grenier said, then be able to teach them.

What does the introduction to Ranger School feel like for a student?

"I think it's a reality shock to quite a few of them," Patterson said. "A lot of them aren't used to the discipline they have to go through."

But students, too, can be eye-openers, Patterson said. "Sometimes you get surprised by the knowledge of some of the soldiers, and definitely by the knowledge of the officers coming out of IOBC (Infantry Officers Basic Course)."

"I do see a soldier that's more knowledgeable now than when I first got here (as an instructor). But it seems like the discipline has dropped some, probably because Ranger School has turned more into a learning experience than the harassment-type training. You could actually say it's kind of a new Ranger School, in my opinion."

Patterson is married and lives in Columbus with his wife Diane and 23-month-old daughter, Ashley.

Ranger School changed him and convinced him to make the Army a career, he said. "My first inclination was to do a little time and get out and go to college. But after my first three years, they gave me the opportunity to go to Ranger School as an E-4 and I just jumped at the chance, I guess. It opened up a lot of doors. Ranger School determined me to change my decision on whether to get out."

The Fort Benning phase of the school involves training on subjects ranging from how to cross dangerous areas to field planning and how to work from warning and operations orders.

The Fort Benning phase of the school involves training on subjects ranging from how to cross dangerous areas to field planning and how to work from warning and operations orders.

The day the photographs accompanying this article were made was a "dry run" or "freebie" for these students.

Photographer Joe Maher trailed Patterson's would-be Rangers from 7 a.m. to 4 p.m., when they were just getting ready to launch a night-time ambush. All that time, Patterson was teaching, with a sharp eye out for mistakes. "I was trying to show them how to do it right" the next time around, he said.

Ranger Class 2/93 (the second class of Fiscal 1993), pictured here, will get a much bigger break than most Ranger students: A Christmas break will begin about Dec. 18 and run through Jan. 2. The next day, the class will reassemble at Fort Benning to leave for desert training at Fort Bliss, Texas.

By Joe Maher/The Benning Leader

No rest for the weary: Staff Sgt. Daniel Patterson can't get away from Army paperwork, even while leading a Ranger class on patrol.

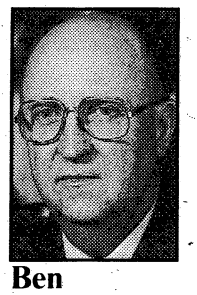
AUSA focuses on Army funding

As the Army downsizes it is important to maintain a force capable of executing those missions that the National Command Authority may assign. This may sound like a statement of the obvious, but the reality of our experience in previous military force reductions resulted in an imbalance in force structure, missions, training, technology advancement and the resources required. As the Berlin Wall came down and the Cold War threats changed on the international scene, the senior Army leadership developed the fundamental imperatives necessary to maintain a Total Army for this country. These imperatives are the foundation for the AUSA resolution on funding of the Army.



Ben Register

FUNDING THE ARMY

The Army's six fundamental imperatives — quality, doctrine, force structure, training, modernization and leader development — proven in combat, remain the foundation for the trained and ready Total Army. This qualitatively superior Army, a strategic force of ready and deployable armored, light and special operations forces, will remain a strategic force capable of swift decisive victory. This competitive edge must be maintained by funding all mission requirements.

■ Quality: Quality continues to be essential for a trained and ready Army and will be even more important as the Army restructures to a smaller force. To attract and retain America's best young men and women in an extremely competitive volunteer environment, the Army must provide them pay and benefits comparable to the private sector, challenge them with tough and realistic training, offer them career opportunities, and provide for their families.

■ Doctrine: The Army's evolving AirLand operations doctrine describes the nature, theory and practice of war fighting for the modern battlefield. This doctrine reflects a wider coverage of global commitments, the non-linear nature of future battlefields, and greater emphasis on power-projection operations from the CONUS base. The doctrine will describe how Army forces operate as the land component in joint, combined, and inter-agency operations. Army doctrine is dynamic, evolves over time, and takes full advantage of technology and the capabilities of the other services. The lessons of Desert Shield and Desert Storm continue to be integrated into doctrinal evolution.

■ Force Structure: The Army will restructure to the 1995 Base Force and continue to be versatile, deployable, lethal and expansible. The Army will consist of a mix of armored, light and special operations forces with roles and missions approximately balanced between the Active and Reserve Components.

■ Training: The Army is trained to mobilize, deploy, fight and win anywhere in the world. Training, the cornerstone of combat readiness, required realistic combat conditions to maintain the capabilities essential for both deterrence and success in combat.

■ Modernization: Modernization demands that the best American technology be integrated into the force in a coherent, predictable and prudent manner. Future modernization of Army forces requires a research and development strategy that will assure soldiers are provided the best possible equipment.

■ Leader Development: The Army leader development system works, having produced competent and confident tactical leaders proven in combat. The Army will continue to develop outstanding leaders through formal institutional training, operations assignments and self-development.

We therefore resolve to urge the Administration and Congress to:

— Support the Army's plan to fund the force, based upon the six fundamental imperatives.

— Provide funding to enable the Army to maintain a recruiting program with uncompromising focus on quality.

— Sustain the modernization program and technology base.

— Fund strategic mobility requirements.

— Support facility revitalization.

— Fund robust training, and operations and maintenance accounts.

■

Congratulations to Major General Jerry Wite and representatives of local utility companies in Muscogee County on establishing the Utility Coordination Center at Fort Benning. This shows by deed, a concern and caring for soldiers and their families. The Georgia Power Company and United Cities Gas Company are AUSA corporate members.

WWII 50TH ANNIVERSARY

On the Eastern Front 50 years ago this week, Soviet forces launched attacks against Nazi-held positions inside Russia, threatening to recapture airfields serving as bases for the German supply operations into Stalingrad. The 11th Panzer Division successfully halted the Soviet advance in a series of battles, but at a high cost in terms of men and equipment.

Here, according to research by the Military History Division at Fort Benning, were the top news items of the week:

■

In Europe, the U.S. Army Air Corps' Ninth Air Force attacked Naples, Italy, and succeeded in sinking two cruisers in the first American air raid on the mainland of Italy.

■

On Guadalcanal, Gen. Alexander Patch's XIV Corps relieved the exhausted 1st Marine Division, under the command of Maj. Gen. Alexander Vandegrift. The Japanese continued their supply operations, but with only limited success.

■

After vicious fighting in New Guinea, Allied forces reached the east side of Buna. Australia's 21st Brigade stormed the Japanese positions at Gona twice in some of the bloodiest combat in the Pacific Theatre to date.

■

On the U.S. home front, President Roosevelt received a petition endorsed by 244 Congressmen supporting the establishment of a Jewish homeland in Palestine.

■

In Britain, Parliament officially lowered the conscription age to 18.

■

Two companies from Fort Benning's 505th Parachute Infantry Regiment tested the abilities of a defense battalion guarding the air base in Orlando, Florida.

Troop deployment to Somalia draws criticism

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — U.S. troops could be in Somalia for four months and could face some risk, Sen. Paul Simon said Wednesday as a key congressman criticized U.S. military intervention there as ill-thought-out and too expensive.

"Realistically, we're talking about 120 days or so," Simon, chairman of the African affairs subcommittee of the Foreign Relations Committee, said on the CBS program "This Morning."

Simon, who recently returned from a visit to the African nation, acknowledged that there will be some risk to U.S. troops, but said part of it is from "a lot of teen-agers who are carrying around AK-47s. I think that kind of opposition will melt."

In a situation in which famine and disease are claiming the lives of possibly 1,000 people every day, the State Department has called on the United Nations to enlist a multinational force as soon as possible to deliver food past feuding factions in the East African country. The Bush administration has offered to provide U.S. troops to help.

But a week after Acting Secretary of State Lawrence S. Eagleburger presented the proposal to Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali in New York, the Security Council has not agreed on a force, its composition or its operational mission.

A leading congressman on defense matters said Wednesday that U.S. military intervention in Somalia is not in America's long-term interest and will place too much pressure on the nation's defense budget.

Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., the chairman of the House Appropriations defense subcommittee, is the first senior member of Congress to speak out against plans for the operation.

Murtha told a group of defense writers the administration shouldn't move forward with any plans to put troops in Africa without extensive consultations with Congress.

"It is not in our national interest," argued the congressman, whose panel holds the purse strings over the nation's defense budget. "I don't think we have the resources."

"(Intervention in Somalia) is not in our national interest," argued Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., whose panel holds the purse strings over the nation's defense budget. "I don't think we have the resources."

"We are so driven by the deficit. . . . We can only afford so much."

On Monday, House Speaker Thomas Foley said he backed sending troops, and that the United States was very close to doing so.

"I don't think we have any problem with the speed with which the U.N. is doing this," Richard Boucher, the State Department spokesman, said Tuesday. But he was unwilling to predict when the council would act, saying only that American diplomats were consulting with others "with a view to reaching a Security Council decision as soon as possible."

Eagleburger's offer came after Boutros-Ghali pleaded for more help in a difficult relief mission. Somalia is virtually lawless and peacekeepers have been fired upon. In the meantime, Somalis, especially children, are dying of starvation and disease.

"In effect, an entire generation of Somalis has been lost," Boucher said, citing some estimates of up to 1,000 deaths a day, though he said statistics cannot be verified.

Students who pay loans timely to get rate break

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — People with some federally backed student loans will soon have a new incentive to make their monthly payments on time — a reduced interest rate.

The Student Loan Marketing Association, the nation's largest provider of student loans, unveiled a program Monday that will cut 2 percentage points from the interest rate of a loan when the borrower has paid on time for the first 48 months.

The program, called Great Rewards, "is a whole new concept in education lending. ... It rewards good repayment habits," said Lydia Marshall, senior vice president of the association, known as Sallie Mae.

"Good borrowers save us time, and they save us money" because Sallie Mae can avoid collection procedures, such as overdue notices and telephone calls."

Sallie Mae is a publicly held, federally chartered financial services corporation that buys education loans from banks and other lending institutions. It owns more than $20 billion in federally insured student loans, which amounts to one in three of all such outstanding loans today.

The program will be limited to Stafford loans, the most common type of student loan under the Federal Family Education Loan Program.

A typical borrower with $5,000 in Stafford loans would save $246 over the life of the loan, usually 10 years. A borrower with $23,000 in loans, which becomes the undergraduate borrowing limit for Stafford loans in July, would save more than $1,100 in interest payments.

Nearly 20 percent of borrowers of Stafford loans pay on time in the first four years, Marshall said. She declined to project how much that might increase under the Great Rewards program.

The program will be available to students who get Stafford loans after Jan. 1, 1993, that are subsequently sold to Sallie Mae and serviced at one of its loan-servicing centers before they begin repaying.

Also eligible will be borrowers whose loans are owned and serviced by Sallie Mae and who begin repaying on or after July 1, 1993.

Joint exercises with Kuwaitis come to end

From wire reports

KUWAIT — Kuwaiti and U.S. troops on Tuesday concluded joint maneuvers designed to train the emirate's forces in ground combat and maintain U.S. readiness in the desert.

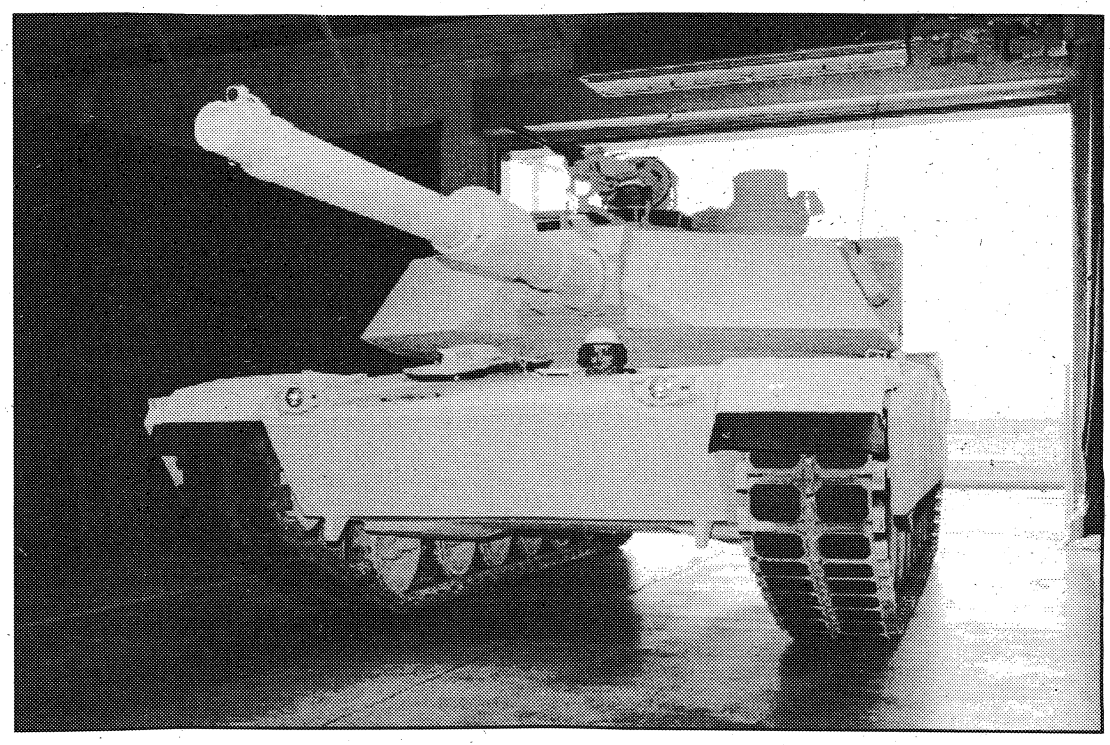
About 900 Kuwaitis and a similar number of Americans participated in the last phase of the joint exercise, named Intrinsic Action, said Capt. Jane Crichton, spokesperson for Joint Task Force Kuwait.

The maneuvers, which started Oct. 26, were "an excellent demonstration of combined arms fire," she said.

Crichton said the American troops, who are mostly from Fort Hood, Texas, will continue another phase of the exercise on their own. She declined to give details.

Joint maneuvers began Aug. 4, two days after the anniversary of Iraq's 1990 invasion of Kuwait. They are part of a 10-year defense pact the two countries signed last year after Iraqi troops were pushed from Kuwait.

Brand new tank



Associated Press

The first M1-A2 Abrams tank rolls off the assembly line at a dedication ceremony at the Lima Tank Plant in Lima, Ohio, Tuesday. The new M1-A2 tanks is the Army's new generation primary battle tank, costing nearly $3.5 million each. The Army has ordered 62 new M1-A2 tanks and plans to upgrade nearly 1,000 older M1 tanks to the M1-A2 models.

Army paid $124 for piece of string

From wire reports

SAN JOSE, Calif. — How much would you pay for a 9-inch piece of string?

The Army paid about $868 for seven 9-inch pieces of "fiber rope assembly" used to secure fuel caps to Humvee vehicles in 1990, according to Rep. Leon Panetta, D-Calif. That's $124 apiece.

The Army did a little better in 1991. It paid $4,620 for 60, or $77 each.

Still too much, Panetta said, and set the wheels in motion to get a refund.

It all started when the cost just didn't add up right with John Robotti of Carmel, a former Army tank commander and now the civilian chief of maintenance for tactical and combat equipment at Fort Ord.

Robotti disdainfully described the material as looking more like a "round shoe string."

He first learned of the outlandish price in a cartoon in a technical manual for Army mechanics who maintain the Humvees, the latest version of jeeps.

"A little know-how with the right parts can save you some bucks," read the cartoon caption. "For about 50 cents, you mechanics can make a cable that will work just as well."

And that's just what the mechanics are doing now — making their own strings.

Last June, Panetta took the matter to the House Armed Services Committee.

The committee went to the manufacturer, Lasmer Industries of Texas, which agreed to refund all the government's money, Panetta said.

COMMENTARY

Despite setbacks, Allies got job done in Northwest Africa

The capture of Safi, 140 miles southwest of Casablanca, opened the Western Task Force's attack in Morocco on Nov. 8, 1942. Simultaneous landings went in at Fedala, 15 miles northwest of Casablanca and at Port Lyautey, 70 miles farther up the coast. At all three locations, the ship-to-shore phases went badly and all of the landing assault units — from the 9th Infantry and 2nd Armored Divisions at Safi and Port Lyautey, and the 3rd Infantry Division at Fedala — suffered numerous casualties, not from French resistance, but from poor navigation and boat-handling by the naval crews of the landing craft.

Al Garland

Too, although French resistance was absent at the beaches it was present, in varying degrees, as the assault units moved inland. It was particularly heavy in the Casablanca area, and it cost the assault forces, including naval gunfire support ships, 337 killed, 637 wounded, 122 missing, and 71 captured. French losses were much heavier.

By Nov. 10, with 2nd Armored Division tanks finally ashore at Safi and driving north toward Casablanca, French resistance became more and more disorganized and then finally ceased. Gen. George Patton, ashore at Fedala, promptly moved his headquarters to Casablanca.

(It is important to keep in mind that during all of the Operation TORCH military actions I mention, there were all sorts of political negotiations going on between the U.S., British and French governments and their political and military representatives in North Africa. These continuing negotiations kept Gen. Eisenhower almost fully occupied during the first months of the Allied campaign.)

At Oran, meanwhile, assault units from the 1st Infantry and 1st Armored Divisions and from the 1st Ranger Battalion encountered many of the same ship-to-shore problems that plagued the Western Task Force and entire companies and battalions drifted off course. The airborne task force, built around the 2nd Battalion, 503rd Parachute Infantry Regiment and after a harrowing 1,500-mile flight from southern England, was scattered from southern Morocco to points east of Oran. Six planes did reach the Senia airport, one of the task force's two objectives inland from Oran, and the airborne soldiers jumped and secured it. (A week later, what could be collected of the battalion was given the mission to jump farther to the east near Tebessa on the Tunisian border to seize yet another airfield. Fortunately for the airborne soldiers an entrenched French battalion held its fire.)

Although there was some French resistance to the U.S. troops at various places in and around Oran, the most serious fight took place in the harbor of Oran itself.

Based on early reports and believing French resistance to be insignificant, the Center Task Force ordered a special landing force — the bulk of which were U.S. soldiers from the 3rd Battalion, 6th Armored Infantry Regiment — to board two British cutters and to enter the harbor in connection with the other landings to seize French ships and shore installations to keep them from being destroyed.

Unfortunately for the armored infantrymen and the British supporting elements, this turned into a suicide mission, for as the cutters neared the harbor entrance and started in, French naval gunners began to exact a heavy toll. Both cutters were severely damaged. The attackers, both Army and Navy, suffered 307 men killed and 350 wounded. Only 47 soldiers landed unhurt and were quickly captured.

By daybreak, Nov. 10, Oran was completely encircled and the U.S. forces were closing in for a final attack. In the early afternoon, the French commanders agreed to the proffered surrender terms, and Gen. Fredendall moved his headquarters ashore to the Grand Hotel. As it turned out, the seizure of Oran was accomplished in less than three days by military means alone. Of the three task forces, only the Center Task Force could subsequently claim to have won a decision wholly by force of arms.

At Algiers, at least initially, the Eastern Task Force's landing units were also scattered and confused for a period of time and it was almost daylight before a column started toward the city.

Here, too, a landing force similar to the one used at Oran, and made up largely of U.S. soldiers, was sent toward the harbor aboard two British destroyers. One of the ships was hit by French fire before it could enter the harbor and withdrew. The other did get into the harbor on its fourth try, berthed, and at 5:20 a.m. began landing its complement of almost 300 men from the 3rd Battalion, 135th Infantry Regiment.

Unfortunately, the French defenders in the city chose to fight and by 12:30 p.m., the U.S. soldiers, low on ammunition, surrendered to a much larger force.

Despite this setback, the U.S. and supporting British assault units began closing in on the city from east and west and soon were in positions to completely surround the city. During the evening of Nov. 9, French resistance stopped as the French leaders agreed to a temporary armistice. For all practical purposes, there would be no further fighting in Algiers, although it took almost three more days of negotiations to arrive at a workable surrender agreement.

Even as these negotiations were taking place, British Lt. Gen. Kenneth A.N. Anderson arrived and assumed command of the Eastern Task Force for the drive to Tunis.

WW II 50TH ANNIVERSARY

Fifty years ago this week, Soviet forces continued to advance, regaining ground in the southern sector of the Eastern Front. The remnants of Italy's 8th Army, hopelessly ill-equipped for the rigors of a Russian winter, attempted to retreat only to be routed.

Here, according to research by the Military History Division at Fort Benning, were the top news items of the week:

■

Also on the Eastern Front, the German Army progressed, but with limited success, in their attempts to secure Stalingrad.

■

In North Africa, fierce fighting between Axis rearguards and New Zealand's 2nd Division occurred at Nofilia, Libya, halfway between El Ayheila and Sirte. Fearing the potential hazards of overextended supply lines and facing the threat of a German counterattack, led by Field Marshal Erwin Rommel, Allied Commander Field Marshal Bernard Montgomery decided against further pursuit at that time.

■

In the Pacific, Gen. Oda, the commander of the Japanese forces of New Guinea, reached Giruwa from Napopo. Soon after, fighting began in all sectors. The Japanese suffered considerable losses as a result of an Allied feint attack in a nearby area which lured the defenders out of fortified positions.

■

On the U.S. homefront, famous musicians, including the great Louis Armstrong, performed in a special radio Christmas program broadcast nationally with the hope of boosting wartime morale.

■

On Fort Benning, Maj. Gen. Paul W. Newgarden took part in a dedication ceremony for a new range constructed to partially accommodate the wartime training needs of the post's ever-increasing Infantry personnel.

NCOA spreads cheer with Christmas cards

By Jerry Rutledge
Leader Editor

Mayo says cards made by students in this area are not sent specifically to Benning-based units. "They can go to any unit, any place in the world where there are American servicemen," he said.

It's a little slice of home for soldiers at a far-flung outpost, a little bit of cheer for the serviceman or woman who finds a holiday away from family and loved ones a lonely experience.

Each year, the NCOA (Non Commissioned Officers Association of the United States of America) collects Christmas cards from students at schools in the districts surrounding their 200-plus chapters world-wide. The cards — most hand-made — carry personal holiday greetings from a student to the random soldier fortunate enough to be a recipient.

"It's a very worthwhile and very gratifying project," said Bill Mayo, a counselor for "Follow Me" Chapter No. 295 of the NCOA. Mayo, a retired command sergeant major of the Infantry Training Center (now the Infantry Training Brigade), is the local chapter's coordinator for the project.

"About 20 schools participated throughout Muscogee County and we picked up about 10-to-15,000 cards. Somewhere in there," said Mayo. He said 1992 was a pretty typical year. Most years there are fewer cards but more schools participated this year from Columbus. In Mayo's five years working with the NCOA, schools from as far north as LaGrange and south to Richland have participated.

Participation in the program seems to ebb and flow with the situation. There was a bigger Chattahoochee Valley-wide response last year when the Persian Gulf situation was still in the public consciousness.

Now, there is Somalia and the probability at least a few Fort Benning-based troops will be deployed there before the end of the year. But Mayo said the aid mission on the east African coast had little effect on this year's response.

"There was no immediate crisis going on when we first sent the letters out," said Mayo. "Somalia was not an overriding concern locally.

"I'm inclined to believe some of the schools who did not participate would have (had the Somalian effort been going on in September). People recognize soldiers leaving and its a big deal when you see soldiers landing overseas. They see immediate need and they want to help out in some way.

"They don't see a soldier stationed in Germany as really being a crisis. He's just stationed there. The same for a sailor on a ship at seas. But when they see an immediate crisis like in Somalia or Bosnia, they react to it."

The process begins with the letters in September. The NCOA initially contacts school superintendents. After the system gives its OK, individual school principals are notified.

"We have to start in September so that by November the students will have gotten the opportunity to participate," said Mayo. Once the cards are made and collected from the schools by the NCOA, they are shipped to Washington, D.C. for distribution to Army, Navy, Air Force and Marine installations worldwide.

Mayo says cards made by students in this area are not sent specifically to Benning-based units. "They can go to any unit, any place in the world where there are American servicemen," he said.

The cards range from the simple — stick men saying "Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year" — to the elaborate — Christmas scenes with a student-authored poem.

Mayo says messages from children are always the most honest and heartfelt best wishes.

"When children say it, it seems natural and without motives," he said. "They really mean it."

DEFENSE

Aspin apparently leading choice for defense chief

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — Silence is uncharacteristic for Rep. Les Aspin, whose rare quiet on Somalia and gays in the military is fueling speculation that the House Armed Services chairman could be the next defense secretary.

Initial rumors about Martin Marietta chief executive Norman R. Augustine, Loral Corp. chairman Bernard L. Schwartz, Oklahoma Rep. Dave McCurdy and Georgia Sen. Sam Nunn have given way to the belief that the 54-year-old Aspin is the leading candidate.

ASPIN

President-elect Clinton is expected to make the announcement within the next week or so, said Mark Ginsberg of the transition staff.

The talk has intensified as the Wisconsin Democrat has been unusually mum on President-elect Clinton's proposal to lift the ban on homosexuals in the military and the use of American force to aid the starving people of Somalia.

Questioned about the 22-year veteran's recent silence, Lynn Reddy, a spokeswoman for the lawmaker, said he was on vacation last week.

A former analyst in the Defense Department, Aspin rose to the chairmanship of the Armed Services Committee seven years ago, building a reputation as a military expert and a masterful handler of the media.

His relationship with the Democratic Caucus in the House has been tenuous at times. In the past, Aspin has voted for aid to the Nicaraguan contra rebels, supported the MX and Midgetman nuclear missiles and in 1989, backed Republican Defense Secretary Dick Cheney's military budget.

The same year, Aspin angered some liberals when he said the House-passed defense package was a "Michael Dukakis budget."

But Aspin's standing got a significant boost with the Persian Gulf War. Shortly before the first air attacks on Iraq, Aspin presented his own military scenario that said a military victory was likely with a low number of U.S. casualties.

Aspin, who backed the use of force, was prescient.

The Yale and Oxford educated lawmaker, who shares the same academic lineage as the president-elect, is known to theorize out loud as he did earlier this year when he presented four types of military budgets for the post-Cold War era.

Hardly a political neophyte, Aspin saw to it that one of his budget options was approved by the House. Following the rocky experience of 1989, Aspin hired a legislative trouble-shooter, Larry Smith, and every year since then, including 1992, the committee budgets have been approved easily.

Aspin knows how to acquire power and how quickly it can slip away. Seven years ago, House liberals helped him secure the committee chairmanship from the elderly Mel Price and several senior members. In 1988, Aspin suffered a no-confidence vote from the Democratic Caucus before regaining his chairmanship back two weeks later.

Longtime military observers, congressional aides and industry officials said this week that Aspin's name has emerged from a field that once included Augustine; Schwartz; McCurdy, the chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, and Nunn, the chairman of the Senate Armed Services panel.

Augustine's selection as defense secretary seems unlikely in light of Martin Marietta's recent purchase of General Electric Co.'s aerospace business for more than $3 billion.

Martin Marietta's "board never would have gone along with that if they thought he was leaving," and neither would General Electric, said one congressional aide.

Schwartz and McCurdy are no longer mentioned and Nunn has been outspoken in his misgivings about the lifting of the ban on homosexuals in the military. The Georgia senator also has been dogged by recent reports that he dismissed two aides a decade ago after learning they were homosexual.

Another congressional aide said the staff on Nunn's panel is preparing for the 103rd Congress with the assumption that the senator will return as committee chairman.

She's shooting for the stars

Determined singer lands recording deal

By Linda Bosley Dailey
Staff Writer

Her song, "A Touch of Magic," just may be touched with magic, but more likely it's tinged with talent and determination.

Since writing that song — prompted by Earvin "Magic" Johnson's announcement a year ago that he's infected with the virus that causes AIDS — Fort Benning resident Yvonne Denise Watkins has landed a recording contract.

With pen and paper lying atop the clothes dryer, Watkins penned the song in her kitchen "in between flipping bacon, frying eggs and popping toast out of the toaster" as she prepared breakfast one November morning last year.

"There was no doubt in my mind she could do it," said her husband, Staff Sgt. Walt Watkins, a drill sergeant, of her getting a contract. "She doesn't stop until she gets where she's going. She's real persistent. Whatever success comes to her doesn't surprise me."

It was Watkins' tenacity — not just her song — that made Columbus businessman Tony Calloway decide to put her in touch with a Michigan businessman he had known since their days together in the Army. His friend, he knew, was acquainted with several professional basketball players — including one with a recording studio, Calloway said.

"A very talented person," Watkins has both "a tremendous voice" and "a tremendous drive," said her manager Bart Nolde. "We respect her for her dogged determination."

So Watkins called that Michigan businessman — Bart Nolde — in hopes he might help her find an opportunity to present her song to Magic Johnson.

Instead, Watkins, who uses Yvonne Denise as her stage name, wound up with a five-year recording and performance contract with Nolde's company, Zingerback Enterprises Inc. A firm that runs basketball camps and clinics and sells a ball rebounding system, Zingerback also is building an entertainment division — around Yvonne Denise, said Nolde, the chairman and chief executive.

Yvonne Denise Watkins holds a plaque featuring her song, 'A Touch of Magic,' which was inspired by 'Magic' Johnson disclosing he had the AIDS virus.

"A very talented person," Watkins has both "a tremendous voice" and "a tremendous drive," said Nolde, who also serves as her manager. "We respect her for her dogged determination."

Nolde introduced her to John Salley, a professional basketball player who also owns a recording studio. It was at lunch together one day that Salley asked to hear her sing.

Caught by surprise, Watkins said, she sent up a silent prayer — "Lord, if this is my break, don't let me blow it."

So she swallowed her mouthful of fish, took a gulp of water and belted out the national anthem. Salley escorted her that afternoon to his studio to hear her sing some more.

And after more auditions at other studios around the country, Nolde's firm committed to recording her album — if a major studio doesn't sign her up after hearing the singles that will be released on her own label early in 1993, he said.

Watkins has been performing at sporting events, sports expos and trade shows since January. She sang the national anthem before the Atlanta Hawks' home game last week, and now aims to sing it before a professional football game.

But since May, when she began working on the album, Watkins has spent most of her time away from her Fort Benning home. Three weeks of every month she is in Detroit recording her songs.

Since early December, though, she has been home with her family, and will be here through the holidays.

Her family, she's noticed, has learned to function without her. Her husband has taken over the cooking and her 12-year-old daughter, Kynesha, helps with the laundry.

And although she hates to admit it, she said, laughing, "Daddy's cooking is better than mine," referring to her husband's culinary abilities.

"It hasn't been that easy the last seven months," Staff Sgt. Watkins said, but added "I manage." And no matter what extra household responsibilities he must assume, he said, "Yvonne's got my full support."

A native of Herington, Kan., Watkins, now 36, began singing in public at age 8 when she began performing in her church.

But "hard-headed" and "rebellious" as a youth, she refused to learn to play an instrument and now regrets that decision. She aims to learn the piano well enough within two years that she can play the tunes she creates for her songs, she said.

But it's not fame and fortune she seeks in her music career. Not anymore, at least. As a youth, she longed for glamour and riches, she admitted. Although she wants money enough to be comfortable and longs to hear her songs on the radio, she wants more the satisfaction of knowing that she has had a positive impact on others through her singing and songwriting.

"I want to be comfortable (financially). I want to (be able to) do things for other people," she said, but still, "I want my kids to know the value of a dollar. I don't want a swimming pool in my back yard."

Watkins plans to give her share of profits from "A Touch of Magic" to AIDS research, she said.

Her main goal is to accomplish something meaningful. "If I touch one person, I've done my job," she said. "God gave me a gift to share with others."

Most of the songs on her album are ones she has written herself. But she is considering recording one by Sgt. 1st Class E.J. Philson, a Fort Benning soldier and Columbus resident who has been writing songs for 20 years and is trying to get his songs recorded.

Although work on her first album isn't complete, Watkins is already thinking about what she'd like to do for her second. She'd like to gear the album toward children and youth, in an effort to bolster their self-esteem and keep kids involved with their education.

But there's no doubt in her mind that there will be a second album. She is confident that she will make it as a professional singer. "It's just a matter of time," she said. "I'm not quitting 'til I get there."

Yvonne Denise Watkins

Age: 36.

Hometown: Herington, Kan.

Family: Husband, Staff Sgt. Walt Watkins; daughter, Kynesha, 12; son, Walter III ("T.W."), 10.

On being home for the holidays: "I'm just spending quality time with my family."

On why she is pursuing her dream: "I want a reason to have been here. God gave me a gift to share with others."

On her inspiration for songs: "Sometimes God sits on my shoulder . . . and he gives me the lyrics."

On what's she learned about performing: "When you sing, you've got to sing with an attitude."

On her determination to be a successful singer: "It's meant for me to sing. I'm gonna make it. If I touch one person, I've done my job."

VIP program catching children's fancy

By Linda Bosley Dailey
Staff Writer

Each Wednesday at Wilbur School, nearly 100 parents report to class with their children.

Wilbur added a new element to its Very Involved Parent — or VIP — program this year by bringing parents into class one hour each week to work with their children on classroom assignments and activities.

"The greatest single factor relating to success in school is parental involvement," Principal Gail Wilson told parents early in the school year at an orientation session for the program.

The program is designed to get parents more actively involved with their children's education, increase communication between home and school, build self-esteem and improve students' achievement, school officials said.

And now, about a third of the way through the school year, parents and teachers are noting changes in students as a result of the program.

"Your involvement is really making a difference," Wilson told parents at a meeting last month.

Among her kindergartners, teacher Barbara Hutchins said, she has noticed a better attitude, better self esteem and faster skill development.

Children get less confused and learn more quickly if parents, when helping with school work, teach the same way as the teachers do, educators told parents during orientation.

Parents also always help children other than their own during the weekly, hour-long sessions, said kindergarten teacher Barbara Hutchins. Thus, the program helps even those children whose parents aren't in class.

"No one's left out. Everyone has benefited," Hutchins said. But, she added, "the more (parents) that come in, the better."

And teacher Felicia Hamilton has noticed more enthusiasm among her fourth-grade students — a spark, she said, that is present not just on Wednesdays, but other days, too.

The program is designed to get parents more actively involved with their children's education, increase communication between home and school, build self-esteem and improve students' achievement, school officials said.

Staff Sgt. Richard and Deborah Kazee have noticed that their two daughters get excited about school, are more motivated and happier, they said.

"I'm not a spectator parent," said Sandi Hill, mother of second-grader and a kindergartner, and is generally very involved with her boys' education. Still, she said, her participation in VIP has helped her children's self esteem.

"Personally, I can't see a parent not wanting to participate," said Staff Sgt. Gary Mednik who attends as often as he can, but "not as often as I'd like."

Parents as well as children can benefit from the VIP program. Mednik said he models the teachers and, consequently is improving his ability to explain things in ways his children understand.

His experience isn't unique. Parents, seeing effective teaching strategies in use in the classrooms, are able to improve their own skills at helping children with schoolwork, Hutchins said.

"It helps us to help them," said Deborah Kazee, mother of a kindergartner and a fifth-grader, of being in class with her daughters.

Since it began early in the school year, the program has grown from less than 40 parents to nearly 100, Wilson, the principal, said.

The program was conceived by the school's leadership team, a committee of teachers from each grade level, that meets each spring to help the school plan programs for the next year and identify what areas the school needs to address, Wilson said.

But whether the program will continue next year is uncertain. Wilbur closes at the end of this school year — because the new Stowers Elementary School opens in August 1993 — and educators have not yet made plans about whether to implement the program at their respective schools, school officials said.

Rolla W. Baumgartner, superintendent of the Fort Benning schools applauded the Wilbur staff who set up the program, the commanders who make it possible for soldiers to attend the session and the parents who make the VIP program possible.

"The real winners . . . are these kids," Baumgartner said.

Firms, workers struggle to adapt to end of Cold War

By Anthony Gnoffo Jr.
Knight-Ridder Newspapers

In 1985, Susanne Cahill said goodbye to her $5-an-hour secretarial job and went to work at more than twice the pay for RCA, where she was hired to help build radar gear for the Navy.

Now, laid off since May from General Electric, which bought RCA in 1986, she worries about being able to find such a job ever again.

"Today I looked at the paper, and there was half a page of help-wanted ads, and they're mostly for kids getting out of high school," she said one day last week.

It's little comfort to Cahill that she may have lost her job to the forces of history.

When she joined RCA, defense industry employment was at its highest since the war in Vietnam, and it would keep climbing for two years, to a peak of 3.36 million in 1987.

But the boom drew to a close as the Soviet Union, the Warsaw Pact and the Cold War dissolved.

U.S. defense spending, adjusted for inflation, plummeted 23.7 percent from 1985 to 1992. Since 1987, when defense employment topped out, 260,000 defense industry jobs have vanished, including Susanne Cahill's. Private-sector defense employment could fall as low as 1.98 million by 1995 and to 1.5 million by 2001, the government estimates.

Those same historic forces led GE and Martin Marietta Corp. to strike a $3.05 billion deal: the merger announced recently of GE Aerospace, based in Valley Forge, Pa., and Martin Marietta, based in Bethesda, Md. If shareholders and federal regulators approve, the consolidation of the companies in the first half of 1993 will create the world's largest defense electronics and aerospace company.

The companies said the merger would enhance job security for their 90,000 employees because the new company would be the strongest competitor in the shrinking defense business. But even if it succeeds in slowing the loss of defense-related jobs at the companies, the merger will not change the reality of the defense business today.

That reality is this: There are too many defense companies and too many defense workers.

"It's wishful thinking to expect employment in the (defense) industry to stay stable while spending is in decline," said Murray Weidenbaum, the former chairman of President Ronald Reagan's Council of Economic Advisers.

There is no shortage of ideas. Many industry analysts predict there will be many more consolidations.

"My advice to the companies is to consolidate," said Weidenbaum. Because of the lower overhead and economies of scale that consolidated companies can enjoy, he said, "they may be able to preserve more jobs as a single unit than they can individually."

Many believe the best answer for U.S. defense companies lies in developing new commercial markets.

Martin Marietta Chairman Norman Augustine has cautiously endorsed the concept of such a conversion.

"We have a lot of assets (at Martin Marietta) that can be applied to other industries," he said in a recent interview. But he added that his company and others in the defense business must choose those new markets carefully.

Tops on the list of potential new markets for defense contractors are transportation systems such as high-speed rail and "smart highways" that help motorists find their destinations and direct them to the least congested routes; advanced telecommunications systems that incorporate satellites and wireless technology; air-traffic control systems, and medical equipment.

But most of those new markets are not big enough to support the entry of big defense companies.

'Operation Beware' targets lethal souvenirs

By Jerry Rutledge
Leader Editor

Capt. Douglas Chambers, commander of the 89th Ordnance Detachment (EOD) at Fort Benning, has seen the result of unauthorized civilians handling unexploded ordnance.

It isn't a pretty picture.

Unexploded ordnance — grenades, shells, artillery simulators, ammunition — may seem like the perfect souvenir or ornament for that empty space on the mantle, but a person handling it runs the risk of creating another empty space — in his family.

"Those things may seem like souvenirs, but they can blow you to smithereens," said Chambers. "When people pick up things out on the ranges (at Fort Benning), they are putting themselves at a terrible risk."

"Those things may seem like souvenirs, but they can blow you to smithereens," said Capt. Douglas Chambers, commander of the 89th Ordnance Detachment.

To this end, the EOD unit and the Columbus Police Department will be jointly initiating a project to recover ammunition items and explosives from the Columbus-Phenix City area.

Chambers said this project, called "Operation Beware," is modeled after a similar project retired Master Sgt. Dave Collins, formerly of the 89th, was a part of at Fort McClellan near Anniston, Ala. That project resulted in the retrieval of a large quantity of ammunition items, some live and lethal, from Anniston and the surrounding area.

"In 30 days they collected over 1,200 pieces of military ordnance that was in the civilian community," said Chambers. "Basically, we want to do the same thing."

Amnesty is part of the program. Any person in possession of an ordnance item can turn it in without fear of arrest or prosecution. The intent, said Chambers, is to "make the surrounding area safer by disposing of these ordnance items."

By Joe Maher/The Benning Leader

Staff Sgt. David Davis (l) and Sgt. Troy Pfertsh examine defused bombs that will be used during 'Operation Beware' presentations.

Anyone turning in an item would call the Columbus Police Department and request that it be removed. EOD will respond to the call at the residence along with the police and remove the item. Moving the item to the police or fire departments would be dangerous and unwise.

Fort Benning, being an open post, is susceptible to souvenir hunters sneaking into unauthorized areas and picking up whatever they can find — hand grenades, projectiles, mines, simulators, etc.

On several occasions, including one involving a Phenix City man and his wife late last summer, the scavenger hunts have resulted in serious injury or death.

Chambers said that new construction on Fort Benning and the surrounding areas has unearthed items that could pose a potential hazard.

"They dug up a 105 round behind the new VFW (off Victory Drive) a few weeks ago. With all the work projects going on around Fort Benning, you are constantly digging up military ordnance,"he said. "Fort Benning being an open post, it's not hard to find."

Later during "Beware," the Columbus police and EOD members will go to Muscogee County schools and give presentations to students, educating and alerting them to dangers associated with possessing the items. The program will include visual displays of ordnance from the Civil War up to present-day that are still lethal and could cripple and kill.

"We're hoping that the children will be sensitive enough to the dangers that they will alert their parents and maybe get them to turn them in," Chambers said.

Army to merge intelligence brigades at Gordon

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — The Army announced plans last week to consolidate two military intelligence brigades and move them to Fort Gordon, giving the east Georgia training installation its first operational forces.

The consolidation will add more than 2,000 military and civilian jobs to the Augusta-area base by the end of the decade. Last year, Fort Gordon had a 12,150 military positions and 5,300 civilian employees.

Sen. Sam Nunn, D-Ga., chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said the move bodes well for Fort Gordon as the Pentagon prepares for a second round of post-Cold War base closings later this year.

"These new operational units will diversify Fort Gordon's training mission and enhance its strong reputation as the premier center for communications and electronics in our military," he said.

Nunn said he has worked for months to persuade the Army and the intelligence community to consider such a consolidation.

The Army said both the 513th Military Intelligence Brigade from Fort Monmouth, N.J., and the 470th Military Intelligence Brigade from various locations in Panama will be relocated to Fort Gordon.

In addition, the 201st Military Intelligence Battalion from Vint Hill Farms Station, Va., which is part of the 513th, will move to Fort Gordon.

The 513th Brigade and the 201st Battalion will bring 933 military and five civilian position to the Augusta area, the Army said, while the 470th Brigade will move 435 military and 35 civilian positions.

The Army said 500 additional military positions from other overseas units may also move to Fort Gordon. In addition, authorizations for support personnel at Fort Gordon will increase by 106 military and 123 civilian positions by the end of the year 2000.

"These highly skilled service men and women will not only contribute to the post's ongoing mission, but their experience and talent will be of benefit to the community as well," Nunn said.

The Army said the relocation of the 513th Brigade and 201st Battalion is expected to be complete by Sept. 30, 1993, while the relocation of the 470th Brigade will be final in September 2000.

Fort Gordon was established during World War II as a division training installation. The 56,000-acre post became home to the U.S. Army Signal Center in 1975.

Students give Ia Drang authors rousing reception

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

The applause was loud and sustained at Fort Benning's Marshall Auditorium Dec. 9 as Lt. Gen. (Ret) Hal Moore gave a short, blow-by-blow account of the bloody firefights at Landing Zone X-Ray in Vietnam although the action went down 27 years ago.

The applause and "Hoo-Ahs" only got louder as Moore introduced a half-dozen or so of the survivors of that action in Vietnam's Ia Drang Valley that began Nov. 14, 1965. He also gave a snapshot version of the even bloodier assault on U.S. troops at Landing Zone Albany only hours later.

His audience on Tuesday was made up of Infantry Officer Advanced Course students. They gave the general and the survivors a standing ovation at the end of Moore's hour-long recounting of those battles and some of the lessons learned.

Moore, who now lives part-time in Opelika, also introduced Joe Galloway, whom he called "my blood brother." Galloway was a 24-year old reporter for United Press International in those days and covered the Landing Zone X-Ray fights. Galloway is now a senior writer with U.S. News and World Report.

Galloway and Moore are the co-authors of "We Were Soldiers Once . . . And Young," a Random House book that delivers what may be the most detailed look ever at this first pitched battle of Vietnam, which involved the 1st Cavalry Division. The division was trained at and deployed from Fort Benning.

Among the survivors here for the lecture and an autograph party were retired Sgt. Maj. Basil Plumley, retired Command Sgt. Maj. James Arthur Scott, retired Sgt. 1st Class Ernie Savage and retired 1st Sgt. Edward Gulot, all of Columbus.

The book (at $25) is available at both bookstores on Fort Benning and is available at or can be ordered through most local bookstores.

Jack Nicholson (l) and Tom Cruise star in 'A Few Good Men.'

'Few Good Men' isn't original, but it boasts star performances

By Steven Rea
Knight-Ridder Newspapers

MOVIE REVIEW

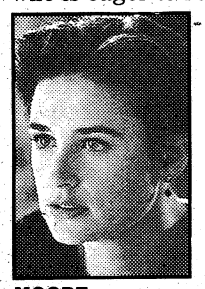
Big-star courtroom dramas don't get any bigger than "A Few Good Men," a straightforward, sturdy affair in which Tom Cruise and Jack Nicholson go eyeball-to-eyeball, and Demi Moore holds her ground as the third above-the-title cast member. If the whole thing seems a little too tried-and-true, well it is, but what do you want from Hollywood — originality?

Based on Aaron Sorkin's successful 1989 Broadway play (and adapted by the playwright), this military trial whydunit has been ably assembled by Rob Reiner, whose stab at the genre is every bit as assured (and commercial) as his previous forays into coming-of-age tales ("Stand by Me"), urban romance ("When Harry Met Sally ...") and Stephen King-sadomasochism ("Misery"). Although it doesn't appear that Reiner will ever again direct with the improvisational nuttiness that marked his mock-documentary debut, "This Is Spinal Tap," the second-generation Hollywood filmmaker has become one of the most dependable storytellers in the business.

In "A Few Good Men," Cruise, doing another take on his boyish, smart-alecky persona (how long can this go on?), is J.G. Kaffee, a Navy lawyer with an impressive record of plea bargains — so impressive, in fact, that in his 15 months out of Harvard Law he has yet to bring a case to trial. Cruise chugs Yoo-hoos and chomps impudently on apples — he's the Mr. Hotshot, the Top Gunslinger, cynical before his time.

Nicholson, sporting a buzzy tuft of Marine-issue hair and gnawing on a Sgt. Fury cigar, plays Nathan R. Jessep, commanding officer of the U.S. Naval Base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Under Jessep's watch, a roundly disliked private has been killed in a "Code Red" incident — Marine jargon for an act of peer-administered discipline — and two Marines have been charged in his death.

Moore is JoAnne Galloway, a Navy internal-affairs attorney, who is eager to represent the two soldiers — and who is passed over for the glib Kaffee, who happens to be the son of a former Navy legend and U.S. attorney general. Thus, the necessary dramatic tension between Cruise and Moore — made all the more dramatic and tense when Moore's character finesses her way onto the legal team anyhow.



MOORE

Set on the Guantanamo Bay base but mostly in a Washington Navy courtroom, "A Few Good Men" addresses some tough moral issues about the not always compatible worlds of military and Constitutional justice. There is no doubt that the two men being court-martialed (played by James Marshall and a very effective Wolfgang Bodison) were physically responsible for the victim's death, but there is every doubt about who holds ultimate responsibility for the act.

Although officially disdained, "Code Reds" were standard practice in hard-nosed platoon life, and the whole case smacks of a coverup to protect the bemedaled Col. Jessep, whose career is trajectoring toward a seat on the National Security Council. Will the cocky young Kaffee opt for an easy plea, or will his better instincts — and his innate talent as a courtroom tactician — take hold? If you vote for the early plea, leave the theater and go see "Under Siege."

Robert Richardson, longtime Oliver Stone cinematographer, doesn't dazzle you with busywork, but the film has a handsomeness befitting its marquee stature. And Richardson's frequent closeups — especially during the final courtroom confrontation between Cruise and Nicholson — have a risky intensity. The literally in-your-face camera work can easily expose an actor's weaknesses, but, with the lens framed on Nicholson's bulldog visage, the actor lets loose with volcanic fury. His demagoguery and his gung-ho self-righteousness are something to behold.

This is Nicholson's Captain Queeg, and if "A Few Good Men" isn't quite "Caine Mutiny,' it certainly honors the tradition.

"A Few Good Men" is now playing at Carmike Cinema 7 and Columbus Square 8. Running time: 2 hours, 18 mins. Parent's guide: R (profanity, violence).

Christmas music pickings are good this year

By Brenda Herrmann
Chicago Tribune

What? No Madonna picture disc for Christmas? Oh well, maybe next year.

Meanwhile, the record companies are offering a surprisingly good selection of new rock and country Christmas music, however. Most are compilations but a few artists did take the time to record complete Christmas albums.

Country cutie Travis Tritt took the most liberty with his caroling on "A Travis Tritt Christmas: Loving Time of the Year." Tritt put country swing into "Winter Wonderland" and also had a little fun covering Buck Owens' overlooked gem, "Santa Looked a Lot Like Daddy."

Tritt took a fresh approach with his selections, ignoring the always-done and tired "White Christmas" in favor of lively country-western versions of "Silver Bells," a subdued "I Heard the Bells on Christmas Day" and an earthy "Have Yourself a Merry Little Christmas."

Country crooner Doug Stone is right behind Tritt with "The First Christmas," which features 10 new songs and the title track, which is a Stone original.

Though it's risky to go with new songs (who can sing along with a Christmas carol they've never heard before?), Stone pulls it off by using melodies meant for relaxing rather than partying.

The first half of the disc is a little slow, opening with Stone's hymnal "The First Christmas," followed by the sweet "The Warmest Winter."

The second half picks up with "Just Put a Ribbon in Your Hair" and the hearty "Santa's Flying a 747 Tonight."

The best song, Kim Tribble and Tim Bay's adorable "Three Little Pennies" would have been best left to close the album but, even when sandwiched, it's a moving ballad.

For those who like their country less modern, a visit to Harmony Ranch may be in order.

Riders in the Sky's "Merry Christmas From Harmony Ranch" is a speedy, lively little collection mixing slightly oversweetened harmonies with plain old fun.

"Here Comes Santa Claus" opens the disc with its happy chorus, making one wonder why this song is seldom recorded now.

"Navidad Y Ano Nuevo" is also a yee-haw of a tune, although not as hilarious as "Sidemeat's Christmas Goose," a must-hear for anyone who plans to raise Christmas dinner.

One of the most prominent rock Christmas albums this year is "A Very Special Christmas 2," which, like its predecessor, helps raise money for International Special Olympics.

"Special Christmas 2" is a bit of a disappointment with Tom Petty and The Heartbreakers' whiny "Christmas All Over Again," Boyz II Men's tired "The Birth of Christ" and Michael Bolton's gawd-awful "White Christmas."

On the other hand, Randy Travis provides a decent (but too-long) "Jingle Bell Rock" and Jon Bon Jovi shows off some dynamic pipes on his irresistible plea, "Please Come Home for Christmas."

Bonnie Raitt and Charles Brown are classic bluesmongers on "Merry Christmas Baby."

36th Engineer advance party may leave soon

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

An advance party of 35-to-40 soldiers from the 36th Engineer Group could depart for Somalia as early as Dec. 24, a spokesman said last week.

Staff Sgt. David Greer said the advance party could leave on Tuesday or Wednesday of next week, with the main party expected to deploy around mid-January. Elements of the 36th began this week uploading its equipment onto railroad cars at Sand Hill.

An advance party of 35-to-40 soldiers from the 36th Engineer Group could depart for Somalia as early as Dec. 24 with the main party expected to deploy around mid-January.

The holiday season may be a strange time to be looking forward to what could be several months in Somalia, but Sgt. 1st Class Harry Oram keeps it all in perspective.

On Thursday of last week, he was lined up for shots and a check of his medical records, looking at the prospect of flying off to Somalia, maybe before Christmas, and leaving his wife and two children behind.

"This (soldiering) is dad's job. The children's job is to enjoy Christmas and have fun," he said.

A 17-year Army veteran, Oram said his wife and children Benjamin and Caroline found out almost by accident that he was on alert to leave on a mammoth humanitarian task in Africa that could be played out in a combat environment. Being apart at Christmas is nothing new, Oram said — this would be his third or fourth one away from his family.

For 20-year-old Pvt. Sulema Ortiz, of El Paso, Texas, it would be her first Christmas away from home. Like others among the approximately 1,000 36th Group soldiers on alert for deployment, Ortiz's Christmas leave was canceled. But, she said, "I'm kind of excited. I'm going to get to see Africa and everything. It'll be an experience, definitely."

Spc. James Deornellis was among 500 or so soldiers getting shots, filling out new ID cards if necessary, being tested for AIDS and giving Martin Army Community Hospital the blood samples necessary to create each soldier's DNA identification record, a successor to the old-time dog tags.

He was philosophical: "I can't do anything about it. I signed the papers (enlistment contract)."

Preliminary orders telling the soldiers to get ready for possible deployment were not a surprise. Some soldiers were rousted out of warm beds about 4 a.m. last Wednesday for a practice alert, Ortiz and others said. Selected soldiers began getting their immunizations then, too.

An earlier deployment to Costa Rica was a special event for Deornellis, a medic. That's when he met the woman he's now engaged to marry. Christmas leave for him was to be a trip to Central America to visit her. No more. His leave was canceled.

Lately, holidays have been special for this Group. It was on New Year's Day 1991 that the 43rd (Combat) Engineer Battalion landed in Saudi Arabia. On Labor Day, several hundred of these soldiers were cleaning up after Hurricane Andrew in south Florida.

The Group's female soldiers have varied tasks. One is a fuel handler, several are mechanics and some operate heavy equipment. Capt. Bernie Thompson is commander of the 43rd's Alpha Co., which could be involved in building base camps. She took over the company only recently. First Lt. Lynn Cowley is Charlie Company's executive officer.

Staff Sgt. Victor Coker gives this tale a seasonal touch. "I feel like we're going over there to do a good deed. It's Christmas for them (the Somalis). I hate to be gone from my family for the holidays. But I've got a job to do," he said.

Engineers load 'em up to move 'em out

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

Dale Ellis, Fort Benning's director of logistics, said the heavy equipment these 36th Engineer units will take to Somalia will fill 170 to 200 railroad flat cars.

Sgt. 1st Class Willie Bryant and Spc. Regina Flack were watching the loading of earth-movers, front-end loaders and dump trucks on Wednesday. The 43rd Engineer Battalion and the 63rd Engineer Company were loading their tools of war at the rail siding at Sand Hill on Fort Benning.

Dale Ellis, Fort Benning's director of logistics, was keeping an eye on the loading operations. He said the heavy equipment these 36th Engineer units will take to Somalia as part of the military relief effort in that famine-ravaged African nation will fill 170 to 200 flat cars. "We hope to have it in Savannah on Monday," he said, ready for loading onto ocean-going equipment haulers.

First Lt. Pablo Ruiz, a platoon leader, said the gear will include mostly earth-moving equipment, like scrapers, 2½-yard bucket loaders, and some of those weird-looking "SEES" — small emplacement excavators — which can dig with one end and load with the other.

That beast's heart is a Mercedes Benz truck, and when soldiers are working on it "you're talking about hundredths-of-thousandths and millionths of inches of tolerances," said Staff Sgt. David Greer, the 36th Engineer Group spokesman, who in his real Army job is a heavy-equipment mechanic.

But for the individual soldier, packing will be different, said Bryant. A duffle bag and a large rucksack will carry a soldier's basic gear, like clean skivvies, extra socks, maybe a set of BDUs. But there'll be other stuff like television sets, VCRs and radios "to try to make everyone feel at home" in a strange land.

"That doesn't mean we're going to get the opportunity to have a little fun, but if we do, we'll be prepared," added Bryant.

Spc. Regina Flack said she'll be loaded up with "personal feminine stuff" in addition to a soldier's basic load. "It's basically packed and ready to go" and she could be "loaded up and ready to go when needed in about an hour and a half," she said.

"When" is the operative word. Greer said it appears Dec. 24 may be the deployment date for an advance party of 30 to 40 soldiers, with the "main body" planning on leaving about mid-January.

Pentagon doesn't want mail pipeline overloaded

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon is asking the public to refrain from sending mail at random to U.S. forces in Somalia so family members will be able to get letters to their loved ones, a spokesman said Tuesday.

"The mail is now flowing to Somalia, . . . but the capability to handle mail is still limited," Pentagon spokesman Pete Williams told reporters.

During the Persian Gulf War, people sent letters addressed to any sailor, airman or soldier, and it was distributed randomly to the troops. However, Williams said, the operation in Somalia is just beginning and unable to handle any crush of mail.

Therefore, Williams said, "This is not the time to be sending 'any serviceman' type of mail."

The troops headed for Somalia have been given the military post office numbers they should use and provide to their families for sending mail, Williams said.

Those forces who were previously in the region — such as the Navy sailors or Marines aboard the ships off Somalia — will continue to get their mail through their normal addresses, Williams said.

But since the holidays are not far off, family members should mail their holiday greetings as soon as possible, Williams said.

"It will take a while for that mail to get there," he added.

Stewart soldiers gearing up

From wire reports

SAVANNAH, Ga. — More than 800 soldiers from Hunter Army Airfield and Fort Stewart are preparing to leave for Somalia, Army officials said.

The soldiers will move their equipment to the Savannah port today and Saturday, but no specific departure date has been set, said Fort Stewart spokesman Richard Olson.

But, he added, "they're definitely going."

The troops include 140 soldiers from the 110th Quartermaster Company, based at Hunter in Savannah, which will supply water to soldiers on the mission to feed Somalia's starving people.

Also, 670 soldiers from the 92nd Engineer Battalion will be responsible for construction and road grading, and 20 from the 226th Direct Support Supply Company will help with water supplies.

Eagleburger looks for consensus against Serbia

From wire reports

GENEVA, Switzerland — Secretary of State Lawrence S. Eagleburger on Tuesday ruled out a massive military response to "ethnic cleansing" of Muslims in Bosnia-Herzegovina as he tried to build a consensus for a more limited show of force against Serbia.

Eagleburger probably could expect Britain to join France in agreeing to threaten to shoot down Serbian military flights over the hapless former Yugoslav republic.

British Foreign Secretary Douglas Hurd said he hoped to put forward "some ideas" when 32 nations and an Islamic Conference representative meet here on Wednesday to discuss the Bosnian crisis. But Hurd, speaking to reporters during a conference of 51 foreign ministers and senior diplomats in Stockholm, Sweden, dismissed NATO military planning as only contingency arrangements.

And Eagleburger, along the same lines, urged reporters not to misjudge what is going on within the military alliance. "The NATO people have to do their contingency planning," he said. "That's all it is."

Asked if there might be a massive military response to the unrelenting Serbian onslaught, Eagleburger replied: "The odds, I think, are against that."

In fact, Eagleburger said: "I don't think you should expect from that that there is the likelihood of a massive military confrontation."

But Eagleburger is trying to build a consensus for passage of a new resolution in the U.N. Security Council to enforce the ban imposed on flights over Bosnia in October. Since then, according to U.N. inspectors, Bosnian Serbs have violated the air cap with at least 225 flights of helicopters and fixed-wing aircraft, though none was found to be engaged in bombing raids.

The idea is to enforce the sanction with a threat to shoot down any planes that venture into the "no-fly" zone.

Eagleburger will get started Wednesday by meeting former Secretary of State Cyrus R. Vance and David Owen, a former British foreign secretary, who are the U.N. peace envoys to Yugoslavia.

National Security Adviser Brent Scowcroft, traveling in Texas with President Bush, said, "I don't know, its complicated," when asked Tuesday whether American planes could be flying over Bosnia by Christmas.

Eagleburger in a speech Monday likened what the Serbs are doing to Muslims in Bosnia to Hitler's genocide against the Jews. He urged that the perpetrators of the expulsion and killing of tens of thousands of people be subject to a war crimes trial.

"I don't think the civilized world will just stand back and watch it with without thinking about what more can be done" Eagleburger said after a meeting with Swedish Prime Minister Carl Bildt in Stockholm before flying here.

U.S. allows companies to do business in Vietnam

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration on Monday announced it will reward Hanoi for its efforts toward an accounting of missing Americans by allowing U.S. firms to sign contracts to do future business in Vietnam. However, a 17-year-old trade embargo remains in effect.

The United States will also follow a liberal licensing policy allowing U.S. companies to open offices in Vietnam, hire staff, and carry out preliminary feasibility studies and technical surveys, the White House said.

In October, when Vietnam agreed to turn over all its material on POWs and MIAs — including 4,000 photographs — President Bush indicated normalized relations were not far off.

"It is in keeping with the established road-map policy of a step-by-step process for normalizing relations with Vietnam," said a statement by press secretary Marlin Fitzwater on Monday. "We look to Vietnam to intensify efforts to achieve the fullest possible accounting of all our POWs-MIAs, including the rapid repatriation of all recovered and readily recoverable American remains."

He noted that Hanoi recently called upon its citizens to turn in any remains they may possess.

Fitzwater said the latest steps implement agreements that Bush's special emissary for POW-MIA affairs, retired Gen. John Vessey, reached with Hanoi.

"Effective today, the United States will permit U.S. firms to sign contracts to be executed should the embargo with Vietnam be lifted," Fitzwater said.

"Other than these actions, the embargo with Vietnam remains in effect," he said.

The embargo was imposed in 1975.

"As further results in accounting for missing Americans are obtained, we are prepared to consider additional road-map steps of our own" toward normalized relations, Fitzwater said.

The National League of Families of American Prisoners and Missing in Southeast Asia issued a statement indicating it had no objection to Monday's announcement.

The League has opposed any major concessions to Vietnam until it repatriates remains readily available and resolves cases in which U.S. servicemen were known to have been alive at the time of their capture or shortly before capture.

Sen. John Kerry D-Mass., chairman of the Senate Select Committee on POW-MIA affairs, was part of a delegation to Vietnam last month. He said on his return that the United States should reward the country for its more forthcoming attitude on the issue.

He and other committee members said Vietnam had extended extraordinary cooperations, including access to Vietnam's equivalent of the Pentagon.

At the time, Bush administration officials said the U.S. was weighing concessions — such as the ones announced Monday — to improve ties with its former enemy.

But officials cautioned there was strong sentiment against relaxing restrictions because Vietnam had offered only limited cooperation in returning the remains of missing servicemen.

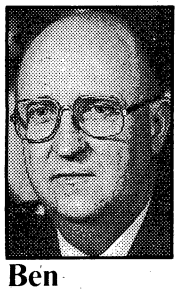
AUSA salutes Army wife, family

Seldom does a flat tire turn into a pleasant experience, but it happened to me this week. After attending the change of command ceremony of the Infantry Training Brigade at Fort Benning, where the outgoing commander Col. Joe Trez passed the responsibility of command to Col. Ted Severn, I ended up at Chadwick's Service Station, an AUSA Corporate member, on South Lumpkin Road for two new tires. Chadwick's is owned and operated by retired Master Sgt. Raymond L. Chadwick.



Ben Register

During our conversation, several things stood out. First and foremost he enjoyed and was very proud of his service as a soldier. Second and equally important, he valued the people of all grades that he had served with, many of whom had reached positions of great responsibility later in their career.

This bonding had been a readiness and combat multiplier and forged lifetime friendships based on mutual respect, often during periods of great stress and hardship. The Tri-Cities is blessed with many such citizens who have retired from military service in this area.

I had been thinking about the change of command — not just the tradition and heritage of such a ceremony — but the recognition of the service and sacrifice of the Army wife and Army family expressed in the remarks of Col. Trez, Col. Severn and Maj. Gen. Jerry White during the ceremony.

While looking at the military memorabilia of the wall of the service station office, I found a tribute to the military wife that really brought into focus their contribution. As we approach another holiday season when many of our soldiers have been deployed or are on alert for deployment for Operation Restore Hope, it is important to remember the Army family. Although the author and publisher of this tribute are unknown, I want to share it with you.

THE MILITARY WIFE

The good Lord was creating a model for military wives and was into his sixth day of overtime when an angel appeared.

She said, "Lord, you seem to be having a lot of trouble with the standard model." The Lord replied, "Have you see the specs of this order? She has to be completely independent, possess the qualities of both father and mother, be a perfect hostess to four or 40 within an hour's notice, handle every emergency imaginable without a manual, be able to carry on cheerfully, even if she is pregnant and has the flu, and she must be willing to move to a new location 10 times in 17 years. And oh, yes, she must have six pairs of hands."

The angel shook her head, "Six pairs of hands? No way!" The Lord continued, "Don't worry, we will make other military wives to help her. And we will give her an unusually strong heart so it can swell with pride in her husband's achievement, sustain the pain of separations, beat soundly when it is overworked and tired, and be large enough to say, "I understand," when she doesn't, and say, "I love you," regardless.

"Lord," said the angel, touching his arm gently, "go to bed and get some rest. You can finish this tomorrow." "I can't stop now," said the Lord. "I am so close to creating something unique. Already this model heals herself when she is sick, can put up six unexpected guests for the weekend, wave goodbye to her husband from a pier, a runway or a depot, and understand why it's important that he leave."

The angel circled the model of the military wife, looked at it closely and sighed, "It looks fine but it is too short." "She might look soft," replied the Lord, "but she has the strength of a lion. You would not believe what she can endure," Finally, the angel bent over and ran her finger across the cheek of the Lord's creation. "There's a leak," she announced, "something is wrong with the construction. I am not surprised that it has cracked. You are trying to put too much into this model."

The Lord appeared offended at the angel's lack of confidence. "What you see is not a leak," He said. "It's a tear." "A tear? What is it there for?" asked the angel.

The Lord replied, "It's for joy, sadness, pain, disappointment, loneliness, pride and a dedication to all the values that she and her husband hold dear." "You are a genius!" exclaimed the angel.

The Lord looked puzzled and replied, "I didn't put it there."

The Chattahoochee Valley-Fort Benning Chapter of the Association of the United States Army (AUSA) salutes the Army wife and Army family — what you stand for, what you do for the Army and the community, and what you mean to our soldiers!

Ben Register, a retired lieutenant general, is president of the Chattahoochee Valley-Fort Benning Chapter of the Association of the United States Army (AUSA).

Benning in the running for Excellence Award

Fort Benning is one of 13 Army installations, worldwide, competing for the Commander-in-Chief's Community of Excellence Award.

The winner will be $1.5 million richer.

Members of the Department of the Army's COE team are expected to visit the post sometime between Feb. 1 and April 2. Team members will be looking at many of the same things that won Fort Benning the Training and Doctrine Command's first place award among large installations.

One such area, and one that especially impressed the team members, according to Fort Benning's Chief of Staff, Col. Burnet Quick, was the involvement of the local community with the post.

He noted that team members were "overwhelmed by the support shown the military by people in the civilian community, from private citizens to the mayors."

Although the Commander-in-Chief's award is the "plum," should Fort Benning not win that award, it will still be competing with Forts Sill and Lewis for "Best Large Installation."

Winner of that competition will receive $1 million, while the runner-up earns $250,000 and the third place finisher, $100,000.

Quick said he and Maj. Gen. Jerry A. White, Fort Benning's commanding general, are most appreciative of the effort the entire post exerted in preparing for the TRADOC competition.

"We couldn't have done it without their untiring support and superb efforts," he said. "Now we must strive together as a team toward the ultimate community recognition award."

Members of the Department of the Army's COE team are expected to visit the post sometime between Feb. 1 and April 2.

Decrying materialism is a Christmas tradition

By George Cornell
Associated Press

Ever since its beginnings, Christmas has been a mixture of the holy and the gaudy, the raucous and reverent, with accompanying discord about it. That sort of combination, and disturbance over it, marks the current season.

The streets and stores swarm, the packages pile up, bills accumulate and holiday travel clogs the terminals and airways, while almost everywhere the air throbs with tooting horns, bells and jingles.

Amid the clamor, some church leaders decry what they consider a commercial demeaning of a sacred occasion, the celebration of the birth of Christ.

"For far too long we have witnessed the spiritual yield to the commercial," with "the spirit of Christmas reduced to a carnival of mass marketing," said a coalition of 25 Protestant and Roman Catholic leaders.

They urged reclaiming "the true glory of Christmas and the true spirit of giving."

That kind of admonition has resounded through the years. "Put Christ back into Christmas," goes an old and recurrent slogan. The strains over it have checkered history.

Celebrating Christmas sometimes and in some places has been outlawed as a "heathen sacrilege" because of the roistering festivities. This was the case in 17th century England under impact of the Protestant Reformation.

The holiday also was banned in colonial New England in America under sway of Puritan Congregationalists. Massachusetts didn't make it a legal holiday until 1856.

For more than 300 years after Jesus' time, Christians didn't celebrate his birth. The observance first began in fourth century Rome, timed to coincide with a midwinter pagan festival honoring the imperial gods Mithra and Saturn.

Their December date simply was taken over to commemorate Jesus' birth, since its exact date isn't known. Consequently, the fusion of the sacred and profane characterized the celebration from the start.

Through the late Middle Ages, accounts say the occasion often was marked by drinking, carousing and various excesses, along with fulminations against such inappropriate conduct.

In a book, "The American Christmas," University of Connecticut sociologist James Barnett says that while gift-giving was always customary at Christmas, not until about 1920 did businesses begin capitalizing on it.

The Protestant-Catholic coalition, in protesting what was termed present-day "excessive commercialization of Christmas," said:

"Massive and alluring advertising crusades have waged war on the essential meaning of the spiritual life, fostering the belief that the marketplace can fulfill our highest aspirations."

Many people, "with earnest intentions," are driven into "obsessive spending as a way to fill the spiritual vacuum left by an overconsumptive society," the statement added.

"In the end, the delirium of commercial Christmas devours some, leaves others in ruinous debt, and punishes the poor for whom the joy of Christmas always seems a dollar away."

Among the signers, Robert Parham, executive director of the Baptist Center for Ethics in Nashville, Tenn., said the statement goes beyond similar past protests against materialism by instead focusing on commercialism.

The religious leaders, including numerous bishops and various denominational heads, urged giving of simple, personal and thoughtful gifts based on need rather than impressiveness.

Jack Schultz, president of the National Retail Federation, said eliminating commercial aspects of Christmas would be economically destructive. He said 19 million retail employees depend on holiday sales.

"In the end, the delirium of commercial Christmas devours some, leaves others in ruinous debt, and punishes the poor for whom the joy of Christmas always seems a dollar away," said a coalition of 25 Protestant and Roman Catholic leaders.

"I don't want to take on the religious community, but an awful lot of jobs depend on Christmas," he told the Charlotte (N.C.) Observer.

Church teaching is that people are so important to God and he cared so much for them that he identified with them in Jesus. For all the railing against materialism at Christmas, that birth itself was a material event.

"And the Word became flesh and dwelt among us, full of grace and truth," the Gospel of John says of that original Christmas gift.

It, like Christmas, might seem an incongruous mixture of the spiritual and secular, of the divine descended to human clay, of the Almighty in a helpless babe. That's the jarring combination — like celebrations of it.

Investment experts have modest outlook for '93

From wire reports

NEW YORK — Financial advisers are keeping their expectations modest as they survey the 1993 outlook for savers and investors.

Hopes have been mounting of late for a significantly stronger showing in the producing and consuming economy as the new year unfolds.

But across the broad range of investment markets — for stocks, bonds, banking products, real estate, collectibles and so forth — many experts say it could well be a better year, in baseball parlance, for hitting singles and doubles than home runs.

"As growth heats up the markets will start to cool down," predicts Stephen Leeb, editor of the advisory letter The Big Picture.

The big question mark for most types of investments is the outlook for short-term interest rates, which have been falling for the past several years to their lowest levels in a generation as the Federal Reserve has eased credit conditions.

Now that the economy appears at last to be perking up, the widespread presumption is that the Fed will stop that kind of stimulus.

"I think barring a real catastrophe the Fed is unlikely to ease further," observes Nancy Kimelman, chief economist at the firm of Technical Data in Boston.

That news actually stands to be welcomed by the many savers who still have a large part of their nest eggs in certificates of deposit, money-market funds and other vehicles whose yields are determined by the level of short-term rates.

Money-market returns have shrunk from two-digit levels in the early 1980s to the practically negligible range of 2.5 percent to 3.5 percent of late.

The big question mark for most types of investments is the outlook for short-term interest rates, which have been falling for the past several years to their lowest levels in a generation as the Federal Reserve has eased credit conditions.

But unless some severe upheaval occurs, few forecasters envision a dramatic rise in short-term rates — particularly if inflation remains low, as expected. So there is little prospect of any return to generous money-market yields.

"We believe short-term rates at the end of 1993 will be no more than a percentage point above current levels," says Standard & Poor's Corp. in the yearend issue of its advisory publication The Outlook.

A rise in short-term rates does not automatically imply a similar increase in long-term rates on bonds and similar investments, especially since long-term rates haven't fallen nearly as far as money-market rates have.

Indeed, many analysts expect a narrowing of the wide differential between these two classes of interest rates. "Income investors should earn moderately positive total returns, in line with those of '92," says Charles Smith, president of the T. Rowe Price New Income Fund.

If rates stay low enough, stocks might continue to benefit. "This might be a very strong argument for stocks in 1993," says Peter Barry, director of research at the investment firm of Rothschild Inc. "There are very few alternatives for the serious investor."

Yet a good many observers worry that stock prices, recently at or near record highs, might be vulnerable to a setback.

Real estate? Well, says Edward Yardeni, chief economist at C.J. Lawrence Inc. in New York, "demographic forces are limiting the upside" for the housing industry.

"The baby boomers caused a boom in housing activity during the 1970s and 1980s. By now most of the baby boomers own their homes. So the demographic outlook for housing is not good."

At the same time, the prospect of low inflation does not look especially bullish for real estate, collectibles or commodities in general — subject to the wide variations that can occur within those markets.

If there is one thing that would scramble most analysts' outlooks, it would be a stronger-than-expected economic recovery and an activist fiscal policy from the new administration in the White House, potentially raising inflation and interest rates above the levels that are now foreseen.

To many advisers, the whole picture makes a forceful case for diversification. Says Standard & Poor's: "We'd approach the challenges of 1993 with a balanced portfolio of roughly 55 percent stocks, 35 percent bonds and 10 percent reserves. Don't rely too heavily on a particular investment theme. Rather, look carefully for value across the board."

Economy continues to show improvement

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — Industrial production and housing construction improved modestly in November, the government said Wednesday, providing fresh evidence that the economy is slowly coming back to life.

"The economy is continuing to make a gradual improvement as we head into 1993," said Stephen S. Roach, an economist with Morgan Stanley & Co. in New York.

Evelina M. Tainer of Economic Consulting in Chicago agreed, saying, "I'm relatively optimistic about seeing better numbers in the coming months, but we're certainly not going to see the economy steam ahead."

The Federal Reserve said the output of the nation's factories, mines and utilities rose 0.4 percent in November for the second straight monthly gain. October's advance was revised to 0.5 percent from the initial estimate of 0.3 percent.

The two-month rise "has more than offset the declines of late summer," including drops of 0.3 percent in September and 0.2 percent in August, the report said. It described the improvement as broad-based.

At the same time, the Commerce Department said construction of new homes and apartments totaled 1.24 million at a seasonally adjusted annual rate in November, up 1.5 percent from 1.22 million a month earlier.

Housing starts in November were at their highest level since a 1.34 million rate last March. The increase was the largest since starts surged 12.1 percent in August.

Single-family starts posted their fourth straight advance, a 1.3 percent increase to a 1.1 million rate. The often-overbuilt multi-family component, which had plunged 19.3 percent a month earlier, rose 2.9 percent in November.

Still, many analysts believe housing growth will drop from about 20 percent this year to 10 percent next year, with industrial growth doubling from this year's 2 percent.

The relatively flat housing performance over the last three months "suggests that the housing recovery has pretty much played itself out, which is what would be expected since housing is the leading edge of any recovery" said Daryl Delano of Cahners Economics in Newton, Mass.

"It looks like the torch has been passed to the industrial sector," he added, noting rising factory orders, lean inventories and growing manufacturing employment and hours worked.

But analysts said growth would continue to be below normal.

"The trend is a sign that the manufacturing sector is coming to life, but it's not an explosive or vigorous recovery," Roach of Morgan Stanley said.

"The most significant increases in the broadly based November advance were in non-durable materials and information processing equipment," the industrial production report said.

But automobile and truck production also continued to improve, up 1.2 percent following October's 7.9 percent gain.

Westerner learns to love Japan's crowds

By Alex MacLeod
Seattle Times

TOKYO — One thing probably needs to be clear from the start.

I'm a Northwest boy. Born in Seattle. Raised on salt water and open spaces.

Crowds? I hate them. Stand in lines? Not even for "A River Runs Through It."

Yet here I am, in Tokyo's main railroad/subway station, which stretches for blocks on several levels, leaving one train and trying to find another. It's about four o'clock on a Sunday afternoon. I'm in a sea of people, surging, purposefully, all around me. The air is thick, the humanity pressing in on all sides, sometimes insistently.

And I'm in Hog Heaven.

A week earlier, in another part of Toyko and near the start of an 11-day stay in Japan, I found myself suddenly caught in a crowd in a narrow walkway outside a neighborhood temple.

No room to move, being shoved from behind, the elbows and hands of one or two but the force of many. I went with the flow. No choice.

Loved it.

Japan, I've found, is full of surprises. Some I found in crowds that otherwise would make me crazy, others in little coastal towns without enough people to make a crowd. Whether it's the life-like plastic food in the restaurant window or the raw egg at breakfast, the high-tech toilets (with heated seats, for starters) or the more common ceramic holes in the floor, the beer in street vending machines, the Nissan sedan called the "Viscous LSD" or the meditative simplicity of the many Zen gardens, one's senses — be they sight, sound, taste or humor — are constantly being awakened.

It's even more fun when you're on your own.

The sense of personal safety in Tokyo is palpable. There is, by most measures, virtually no street crime, nor panhandling nor homelessness. The resulting sense of safety is liberating. Crowds become inviting and fun. No thought goes to calculating the risk of where or when to go, nor what to carry with you.

I've seen Japan both ways. My first visit, three years ago, was with a group of U.S. journalists. We traveled together on an itinerary as precisely set (and followed) as it was interesting and varied. A Japanese guide and interpreter was always near to answer questions and help us communicate. Our week-long tour of the countryside and the two weeks in Tokyo were testimony to Japanese attention to detail, efficiency, graciousness and pride.

The second visit, a couple of months ago, was just the two of us, with enough Japanese language between us to manage "good morning," "good evening" and "thank you" and to keep us in beer ("beer-u") and sushi ("sushi").

We crafted our own itinerary to get us a mix of city and country, to be off the beaten path as well as on it, and to get at least a whiff of salt air, if not the certainty of an ocean-beach walk.

We also made our plans so we could see a fair chunk of the country without having to be on the move too much. About the only security we wanted was knowing we had a place to sleep each night. Other than that, we wanted to be on our own. No group. No lines. No crowds.

We would start and end in Toyko. In between, we'd make a loop of several hundred miles, with stops in Kanazawa, a city of about a half-million people (and seven McDonald's) near the Sea of Japan; Wakura-onsen, a town of about 5,000 (with rooms for at least that many overnight visitors) clustered around hot springs midway up the Noto Peninsula, just north of Kanazawa; Wajima, a coastal fishing town of about 30,000, near the tip of the peninsula, then back south to Kyoto, famous for its temples, shrines and Zen gardens.

Travel would be by train and bus, left to us to figure out. Our accommodations would range from a first-class hotel to a business hotel (bijinesu) to a small Japanese inn (ryokan) and a hostel (minshuku). Food would be whatever and wherever we chose, except for the dinners and breakfasts provided at the ryokan and minshuku.

What all this got us was just about what we expected: moments of discovery, surprise, frustration, bewilderment, awe, anxiety, humor and great satisfaction, not to mention boiled squid served on a stick and enough pickled vegetables to last a lifetime.

And did I mention the raw egg at breakfast?

About 125 million Japanese live in an area about the size of California (which, by comparison, has about 30 million residents). About 15 million live in Tokyo and a lot of them are pretty hard to avoid, day or night. Yet what is most striking to a visitor, especially one from the United States, is the civility that exists despite — or is it because of — so many people living so close together.

The sense of personal safety is palpable. There is, by most measures, virtually no street crime, nor panhandling nor homelessness. The resulting sense of safety is liberating. Crowds become inviting and fun. No thought goes to calculating the risk of where or when to go, nor what to carry with you.

About 15 million Tokyo residents create a mass of humanity.

For me, and probably also for the Japanese who live there, it's what makes Tokyo possible. Along with the honesty and courtesy of everyone you deal with, it makes travel in Japan free of many of the stresses you feel at home.

Which isn't to say the crowds of people aren't sometimes annoying, especially to someone who otherwise avoids them.

Take Kanazawa's Kenrokuen Park, for example. It is regarded as one of the most beautiful Japanese landscape gardens. Its 26 acres are a marvel of serenity and manicured beauty, with ponds and brooks, nooks and crannies.

We spent most of an afternoon there with several thousand Japanese tourists in groups of about 40, each with a tour guide and amplified megaphone. They rolled like waves from the tour-bus parking lot through the park, pausing long enough to interrupt any moment of contemplation. Being Japanese, they weren't rude. They were just there, en masse.

The crowds could have been even more bothersome at a number of temples and shrines in Kyoto, but by then we'd learned to go very early to the temples and Zen gardens to catch a few moments of meditation before the tour groups arrived. Two of the best early morning spots are the Ginkakuji and Ryoanji temples, whose Zen gardens have cast spells for hundreds of years.

The trip gave us moments of discovery, surprise, frustration, bewilderment, awe, anxiety, humor and great satisfaction, not to mention boiled squid served on a stick and enough pickled vegetables to last a lifetime.

Other times and other places, crowds made the moment. In Wajima, a morning street market was a magnet for most of the town's residents. Jammed in a narrow street about five blocks long, framed on either side by stalls of fresh-caught seafood and freshly harvested vegetables, the morning was a sensual rush, highlighted by a class of uniformed grade-schoolers agog at the presence of two Westerners and eager to practice their "hellos."

In 2½ days in Wakura and Wajima, we saw no other Westerners, saw very little English and heard none until we were about to catch a bus back to Kanazawa. I was approached by a Japanese woman, who offered a very good "hello." I'd had several Japanese approach me wanting to practice their English and figured this was another. Turned out it was someone who'd lived the past 40 years in Tacoma and had gone home to visit her mother. She was just curious what had brought two Westerners to her little hometown.

It wasn't the raw egg for breakfast that drew me to Wajima, but that's where I ate it, swirled with some soy sauce and drizzled atop hot rice and dried seaweed. This was breakfast at the minshuku (the hostel), which also included a piece of dried fish, miso soup with daikon radish, a small plate of pickled vegetables and green tea. Happily, almost every street corner, even in little towns, has a vending machine selling cans of latte-like coffee drinks. One can nicely settled the egg.

Life in the ryokan or minshuku had its other moments, too. Shoes come off at the door, replaced by slippers. Clothes come off in your room, replaced by standard, one-size-fits-all cotton robes. The trouble is, the one-size robe is designed for a slender 5-foot-5-inch person and the slippers are about size six. At 5-feet-11-inches and not slender, the robes were only a partial fit and covered even less when I tried to sit crosslegged to eat. And try walking down a flight of stairs to the toilet in the middle of the night with size 13 feet in size 6 slippers. At least there were no witnesses.

You can't talk about travel in Japan without talking about money. With the dollar's decline, the country has gotten a reputation for being very expensive.

It is, and it isn't.

It's true that we found it possible to have a couple of beers and dinner in a Kyoto restaurant for 21,000 yen (or $175 — I don't know which sounds worse) and a night at Tokyo's lovely Imperial Hotel at $325 (though we passed on its standard room-service breakfast of juice, coffee, a couple of eggs and toast, at $30 per person). And there were times it seemed everything (including two oranges and one apple bought in a Tokyo grocery) cost at least $10 (or roughly 1,200 yen).

But a tasty bowl of vegetables and noodles could be found for about $3 and unlimited seven-day train travel cost just $240 each. Dinner, breakfast, a relaxing steamy bath and a futon at the Wajima minshuku was $100 for the two of us. Vending-machine sodas cost about 80 cents.

Finally, there was the sporting goods store whose motto summed up this trip to Japan quite nicely: "Happy Nice Days for You."

Even in a crowd.

Terrorists killing tourism in Egypt

By Thomas Swick
Fort Lauderdale Sun-Sentinel

"Please tell Americans they have nothing to fear in Egypt. It is safer here than in many of the places they visit."

We were on the road from Giza to Saqqara and my tour guide, Marianne Aziz Kamal, had singled me out for this appeal partly because she knew I was a travel writer but mainly because I was the only person on the bus.

"Look at this," she said sharply. "This is November, the beginning of the tourist season. This bus should be full."

The tourists, of course, had been scared off by reports that Islamic extremists had begun choosing them as their latest victims. Tourists, after all, tend to travel in groups, walk slowly and wear bright clothing — a sniper's dream.

They also bring a great deal of money into a very poor country — tourism is Egypt's second-largest industry, earning $4 billion a year — and provide a perfect target for anyone bent on destabilizing the government.

Most of the incidents had taken place in the south, or Upper Egypt, far from Cairo and the Pyramids. In October, a British woman was killed when her bus was attacked near Dairut. After this incident, the British, American and German embassies issued travel advisories for the region. On Nov. 12, a bus carrying German tourists was attacked in the town of Qena, north of Luxor.

I got to Cairo on the evening of Nov. 18, arriving by bus — with a military escort from the Israeli border — and thinking of Alexander Kinglake. The great 19th century British travel writer tells in the classic "Eothen" of blithely going to Cairo during the plague. What, I asked myself, were a few scattered bullets compared to the plague?

The next morning, I stepped gingerly out of my hotel. A gentleman with a turban stood next to his cart while his donkey munched some clover. It shone spectacularly green on the black macadam. Other people, some in robes, some in Western attire, walked in the street, oblivious to my presence.

After I took a taxi downtown, my concerns about safety slipped away. The streets were busy and the crowds were not the least bit threatening. For being such a poor and grievously overpopulated city, Cairo has no tradition of crime.

Muggers, even pickpockets, are rare. And soldiers are numerous, often standing next to spare, primitive guard houses furnished with a concrete stool and a sheet of cardboard for placing on the sidewalk at prayer time.

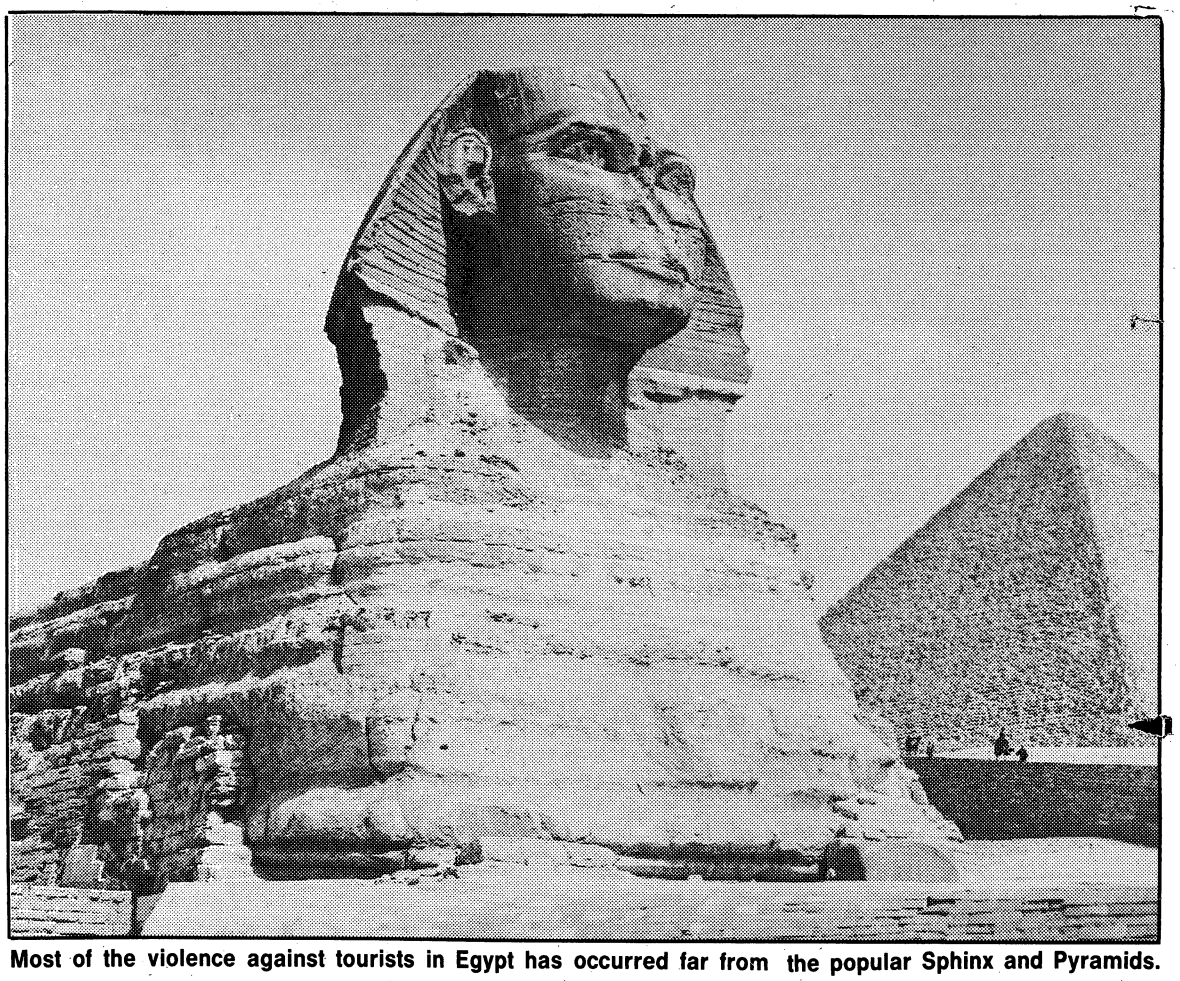
There were also a fair number of tourists about, and I noted with satisfaction that in their shorts and sneakers they looked much more the part than I did. I had actually grown a precautionary mustache in hopes of blending in and, in fact, was stopped three times and asked for directions.

The weekly English language edition of Al-Ahram ran an article on the extensive measures being taken by the government to quash the terrorism, along with an interview with the Mufti of Egypt, Mohamed Sayed Tantawi. The Mufti unequivocally condemned the attacks and said the perpetrators were not Islamic because "Islam is a religion of tolerance, truth and justice."

He went on to say that there is nothing sinful about tourism. "In fact, tourism is encouraged by heavenly Sharia (Islamic law) and there are some Quranic verses which encourage the Muslim to move within the regions of the earth."

But the movement is not always for tourism. "This terrorism is being brought into the country from Iran," Kamal told me angrily. And her remark reminded me of a line from a Jan Morris essay on Cairo:

"The Egyptians are marvelously free of grudge or rancor," she wrote in 1978; "violence is not really their style."



Most of the violence against tourists in Egypt has occurred far from the popular Sphinx and Pyramids.

NEW ISUZU TROOPER

MOTOR TREND calls the 1992 Trooper LS-A Diamond That Has Come Out of The Rough

Through the last half of the 80s, the Trooper consistently led its class in U.S. sales and is still the All-Time Best-Selling Import Sports Utility.

Visually, the Trooper exudes the air of a senior officer: mature, refined and ready to take command when the going gets tough.

Despite a hefty curb weight of over two tons, the DOHC-engined truck is remarkably strong. Response is immediate.

Passing on an uphill at freeway speeds is no problem. And maximum towing capacity is an impressive 5000 pounds.

The Trooper's stopping power is provided by ventilated discs at all corners.

The Trooper is impressively smooth, quiet and squeak-free.

Even the most critical tester comes away saying -it's one of the best all around sport/utility vehicles ever made.

Motor Trend - June 1992*

Car and Driver picks TROOPER over the COMPETITION: Grand Cherokee, Explorer, Montero, Pathfinder and Bravada.

The Verdict: This is the Lexus of off-road vehicles.

The lack of rattles and shakes and squeaks, even in tough conditions, makes the Trooper reek of quality assembly.

A tester wrote "It drives beautifully. Steering action is smooth, tight, progressive."

"A feeling of enormous space inside."

The Trooper is quick getting to 60 mph in 10.5 seconds.

"Solid, stiff structure really pays off. Quiet, high quality feel."

Car and Driver's final logbook entry: "The more I drive it, the more I like it."

Car and Driver - May 1992*

Come in and test drive the new TROOPER today.

Air Force severance policy punishes those who excel

WASHINGTON — Here is the ultimate Catch-22: A superb Air Force fighter pilot seeking to take advantage of bonus payments offered to encourage pilots to leave the service is told he's ineligible because he was selected for accelerated promotion to lieutenant colonel.

David Evans

Meanwhile, the same payments are made to other departing officers selected for promotion WITH THEIR CLASS, and to the departing slugs who were not promoted at all.

How's that for a policy? Dump on the top-quality people. That'll keep them around, all right.

In this case, it didn't. Maj. Rodney Shrader left the Air Force anyway in September, royally irritated and feeling robbed of separation payments worth up to $400,000, and more in some cases, that other ex-officers, some of whom he has flown with, are receiving.

"I stand as a classic example of discriminatory tactics. The promotion process was held over my head like the sword of Damocles," Shrader groused.

This 15-year veteran was willing to stay in the Air Force for 20 years, at which point he would have been vested for retirement at half pay, but he was frustrated. What he wanted to do was keep flying airplanes, but the Air Force had a desk job in mind.

That was hardly good news to Shrader. An F-117 stealth fighter pilot who flew 20 combat missions over Iraq during Operation Desert Storm, mostly to hit targets in Baghdad, Shrader was at the cutting edge of what the Air Force has been doing technologically and operationally the last few years.

The 1977 Air Force Academy graduate had accumulated an impressive 2,800 hours' experience flying single-seat combat aircraft, about 500 of them piloting the state-of-the-art F-117.

The Air Force told Shrader he had to leave the cockpit to make room for junior pilots. As an Air Force general remarked in a service newsletter, today's Air Force is shrinking, and "cockpits are going away faster than we can turn off the pilot-production spigot."

To encourage surplus people in the middle of their careers to leave, the Air Force announced in January that it would offer fat bonuses to officers and non-commissioned officers who requested to leave voluntarily.

Shrader went to the local personnel office and asked if he would be eligible to leave the Air Force under the new voluntary separation incentive, which in his case would have amounted to payments of about $14,000 a year for 30 years.

Yes, no problem, he was told.

Then in February the Air Force announced that Shrader was one of about 1,500 officers chosen for promotion to lieutenant colonel. Normally, Shrader would have come up for promotion a year later, but he was among the 51 hard-charging pilots picked for early promotion, a "fast burner" selected to move ahead of the herd.

Being selected did not involve a commitment. Shrader would have waited months, perhaps a year, to trade in his major's oak leaves for the silver leaves of a lieutenant colonel.

"A week later I submitted my application to leave the Air Force. I was told I wasn't eligible because I had been selected early for promotion," Shrader said.

Note the contradictions: Air Force officers who were selected for promotion in the primary-year group remained eligible for the separation payments that Shrader was denied. So, too, were those officers who flunked the selection process. In their case, call it the incompetence bonus.

Shrader, flying out of the F-117 base at the Tonopah Test Range in Nevada, called the top personnel people at Randolph Air Force Base in Texas.

"I stand as a classic example of discriminatory tactics. The promotion process was held over my head like the sword of Damocles," said former Air Force Maj. Rodney Shrader.

"They told me I would not have been eligible even if I had applied and been selected for the separation program before the results of the promotion board were announced," he recalled.

Question: How was he supposed to know?

Capt. Tom Gilroy, a spokesman at Randolph, explained that early selectees for promotion were not offered separation payments because "we want to keep our best people for tomorrow."

The Army and Navy had similar bonus programs for early retirees, but spokesmen say they probably would have handled the situation differently. The Navy doesn't have a jet-pilot surplus, but a service official said, "We probably would have paid." An Army spokesman said, "We would have paid, whether the application was submitted before or after an officer was selected for early promotion."

Because the Air Force tried to make him stay, Shrader concluded that he "couldn't work for an outfit like this." He hopes to resume flying soon, this time with the airlines.

And as for the Air Force leaders who signed off on this policy, we can hang a board with an old Roman proverb around their necks: A general has the army he deserves.

David Evans is military affairs writer for the Chicago Tribune.

WW II 50TH ANNIVERSARY

On Guadalcanal 50 years ago this week, U.S. forces spearheaded by the 132nd Infantry Regiment restarted a series of unsuccessful attacks against the Japanese Gifu strongpoint on Mount Austen. Despite considerable artillery support, the 132nd sustained losses heavy enough to warrant its amalgamation into another battalion.

After the defeat, American forces immediately regrouped and began to prepare for a larger attack against this strategically important position.

Here, according to the Military History Division at Fort Benning, were the top news items of the week:

■

In Tunisia, Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower and the commander of Britain's 1st Army, Gen. Kenneth Anderson, postponed the planned Allied offensive pending the end of the region's rainy season which had greatly impaired maneuver capabilities.

■

Also in Tunisia, a regimental combat group from the U.S. Army's 1st Division reached the Medjez el Bab positions.

■

Prompted by concerns over the potential postwar misuse of atomic energy, President Franklin D. Roosevelt announced a policy of noncooperation with Britain in all matters relating to U.S. research and development efforts. This decision offended the British and greatly limited the previous flow of information between Allied scientists.

■

On Fort Benning, Maj. Gen. O.R. Gellette, the last surviving member of Confederate Gen. Robert E. Lee's staff, examined the modern U.S. Army's rifle. The 97-year-old Gellette came from Shreveport, La., to pin the gold bars on newly commissioned William C. Gellette, his 37-year-old son, in a ceremony honoring the son's graduation from Officer Candidates School.

Columbus hopes to fuel post's growth

By Marc Rice
Associated Press

Economics and the Army mesh in the basement of a converted Civil War arsenal as Columbus plots to keep its largest employer growing in the face of military cutbacks.

The Chamber of Commerce recently hired a retired Army colonel to be its full-time head of military affairs, a move to keep Fort Benning thriving by attracting defense operations needing a new home when other bases close.

"The effort we'd put into fighting to keep Fort Benning from being closed needs to be put into expanding Fort Benning," said Michael S. Dunbar, the chamber spokesman.

Benning's status as home of the Army's infantry school has left it relatively intact as the military has begun downsizing, especially reducing its forces in Europe. What Columbus wants is to become a magnet for the overseas units that are forced to relocate because of the cutbacks.

"The effort we'd put into fighting to keep Fort Benning from being closed needs to be put into expanding Fort Benning," said Michael S. Dunbar, the chamber spokesman.

"What we need to do is allow the decision-makers in the Army to know the merits of assigning units to Fort Benning. Let them know Fort Benning is out there, and we want 'em," said Patrick Kenney, who took the new military affairs job in October, moving from Benning to an office in the chamber's 19th-century building.

While it is common for economic development agencies in military towns to maintain close relations with their base and court congressional support for the installations, Columbus hopes to go a step further with a sharply focused strategy for bringing new business to Benning.

"I think there's going to be a lot of activity. Folks around the country near military posts are going to be fighting like hell for this," Kenney said. "Our challenge is to find where the right buttons to push are."

Local economic development efforts in military communities tend to be aimed at keeping the posts open, rather than attracting new units, said Thomas Byrne, public affairs officer at the Association of the U.S. Army, a military professional organization in Washington.

"Almost every military base and the nearby community have good input to their congressmen," Byrne said. "They do their best to ensure when it comes time to cut, don't cut me — cut that guy behind the tree," he said. "I don't know of any widespread activity to attract new operations."

The effort in Columbus could signify a shift away from the "reactive" posture traditionally taken, he said.

"The people at Columbus have been through this enough times to say, 'We're going to be ready,'" Byrne said. "They're going to lose some (to downsizing). Here's a way to gain."

Benning and other posts already have made some gains from the consolidation of installations in the United States.

In Killeen, Texas, for example, Fort Hood is absorbing thousands of personnel from Fort Polk in Louisiana. Because of that influx, said Chamber of Commerce Chairman Dan Green, Killeen is not likely to pursue any of the units from Europe.

The chamber did get involved, however, in attracting Polk's 5th Infantry unit to Fort Hood, Green said.

Fort Benning employs 31,693 people. The No. 2 employer, the Muscogee County School District, employs 3,818. By contrast, Georgia's largest private employer, Atlanta-based Delta Air Lines, employs about 26,000.

"We actively promoted the fact that the base had had two divisions before, and was capable of being a two-division base again," he said. "It's that old theory of economic development — one of the best things you can do is foster the business you already have. No matter how big we get, we're never going to walk away from 44,000 paychecks."

It's clearly in the interests of Columbus to put its economic development resources into promoting Fort Benning. The largest military base in Georgia in terms of personnel, Benning is by far the west Georgia city's economic engine.

Benning employs 31,693 people. The No. 2 employer, the Muscogee County School District, employs 3,818. By contrast, Georgia's largest private employer, Atlanta-based Delta Air Lines, employs about 26,000.

On the job only two months, Kenney is still bringing together local business, government and military leaders to begin organizing the effort.

A natural ally in the Columbus effort would seem to be Sen. Sam Nunn, D-Ga., chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee. A spokesman for Nunn declined to speculate on where European units would be relocated.

Nunn said in a speech in Columbus earlier this year the number of military personnel at Benning should remain constant, while civilian employment may drop over the next couple of years.

"As we bring forces back from Europe . . . then you are going to have more activity in that respect," Nunn said.

Kenney, who spent 27 years in the Army, said Benning's future will be dictated by how well it can accommodate the rapidly changing tasks of the military.

"There is a changing role in the Army, and that role is being defined," he said. "We're not going to do anything that's counter to the mission of Fort Benning."

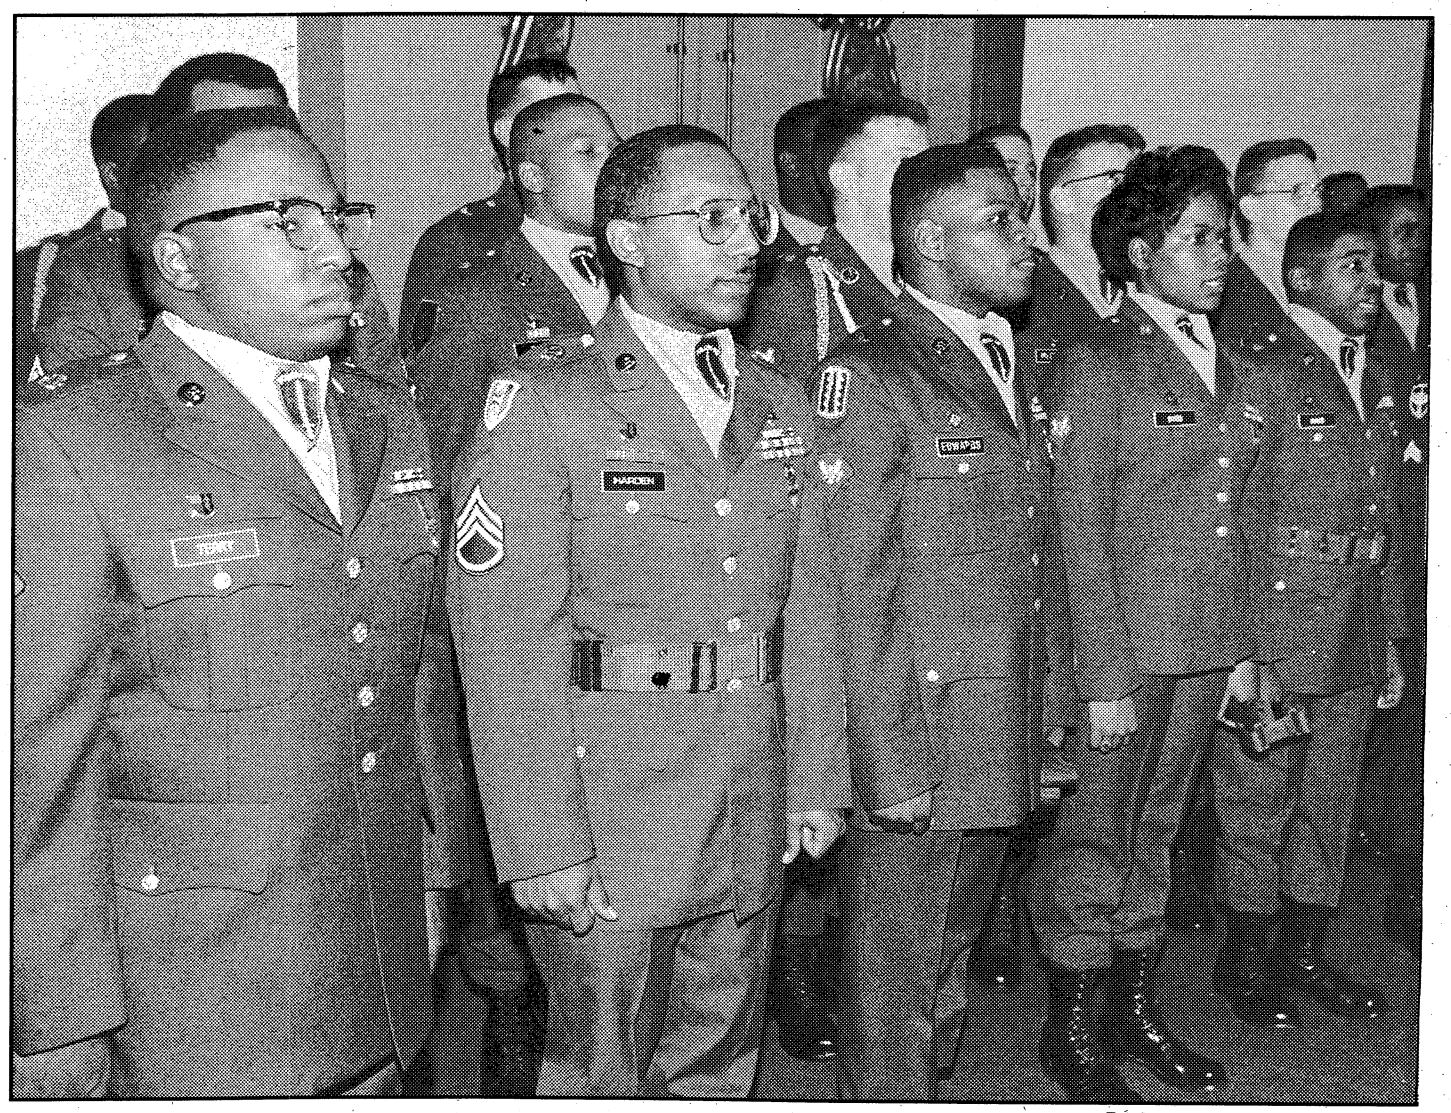
Soldiers find 'song' a special duty

Infantry Chorus is committed to excellence

By Jerry Rutledge
Leader Editor



By Joe Maher/The Benning Leader

From an original group of 13, the Infantry Chorus has evolved into a unit of 40-plus men and women.

Their jobs cover the galaxy of military occupations, from medical specialties to drill instructors to the elite U.S. Army Rangers.

But in addition to their regular MOSs (Military Occupational Specialty), these soldiers have an additional charge that requires the same dedication to duty and commitment to excellence. These soldiers sing. These soldiers are the Infantry Chorus.

One of three from the original group first formed in February under orders from Fort Benning commander Maj. Gen. Jerry White, Pfc. Dorothea Bass works most days in medical supply for the 2nd Mobile Army Surgical Hospital. "I supply hospitals. I supply special units. Whenever the Rangers deploy, I deploy with them," Bass said. Her job is to make sure the medical units in her watch have all the supplies they need from syringes to Band Aids to ear plugs.

On other days — on a lot of other days, including holidays — she is a member of the Infantry Chorus. The chorus is considered the general's "personal choir."

"I enjoy singing. I've been singing all my life and I'm about 33 now so I've been doing it since I was about five years old," she said. "To be able to be a soldier and do this — sing — at the same time, it's nice. It makes you have the feeling that you're not just a soldier.

"Sometimes you get caught up with all the things that are going on in the world and you don't have time to be yourself. This makes me feel good."

Staff Sgt. Patrick Durr is musical director of the Infantry Chorus. A veteran of dinner theater and other productions on post and another original member, he can remember the chorus' embryonic days.

"Initially it was by word of mouth," Durr said. "If they passed the audition, they became singers. But when we didn't have a positive turnout that way, we had to require each major command to send us 'X' number of people."

Now every major command on post has one or more members in the chorus. From an original group of 13, the Infantry Chorus has evolved into a unit of 40-plus men and women.

Seldom does the entire chorus perform at one time. Lt. Lorraine Ferrell, the officer in charge, and Durr decide how many members are needed for each performance.

"Sometimes we need 10 (singers). Other times, we may need five or maybe someone to do a solo," said Bass.

This holiday season, the Infantry Chorus has performed for members of the AUSA at the Iron Works, the Bradley Center and a variety of holiday observances around Fort Benning.

The finished product — another sparkling performance by the Infantry Chorus — belies the fact that each successful "show" took an extremely large amount of work and effort to pull off.

"To be able to be a soldier and do this — sing — at the same time, it's nice," says Pfc. Dorothea Bass. "It makes you have the feeling that you're not just a soldier."

After 3-hour minimum practices the day before a performance, "game day" can begin as early as 9 a.m. with rehearsal. The music is planned according to the audience (military songs for military and veterans, a more familiar mix for civilians).

After the songs are planned, the size of the chorus to perform is determined. Then it's time for practice — for about four hours. After practice, the sound man arranges the microphones and speakers, the chorus practices with the "sound" and practices again with the Army band, if the band is accompanying them.

"It really isn't that difficult to coordinate," said Ferrell, an assistant adjutant with the 11th Infantry Regiment. "It takes planning and keeping things organized."

Said Bass, "It takes a lot of rehearsing. When you sing in church and sing in school, it is different. With a chorus, there is a lot of learning. I've learned a lot of things, like I have more capability (as a singer) than I thought I had, more range than I thought I had. It's really been a growth experience."

There are times when the singers get "flak" from other soldiers and even some superiors. They emphasize one point — this isn't fluff duty.

"It is a job. This is a place of duty for us. Once you get in, you have no choice. (You can't say) 'Oh I don't want to sing today,'" said Bass. "Because you are a soldier. This is the general's choir and this is your place of duty. And they tie in as to say one is just as important as the other.

"This is not as easy as people think it is," Bass adds.

Star power carries 'Few Good Men' to top at box office

From wire reports

LOS ANGELES — The courtroom drama "A Few Good Men" held on to first place at the nation's theaters last weekend, while three new movies packing major star power opened weakly.

Mel Gibson's romantic drama "Forever Young" made just $5.6 million in its debut for fourth place — and that was the best of the three, Exhibitor Relations Co. reported Monday.

"Toys," a comedy starring Robin Williams, made $4.8 million for sixth place. "Leap of Faith," starring Steve Martin as a phony faith healer, earned $3.2 million for ninth.

The only good news for new movies came from two modestly budgeted, less-hyped titles: "Used People" and "Passion Fish," both of which played strongly in limited release.

"A Few Good Men," starring Tom Cruise and Jack Nicholson, sold $11.1 million in tickets for first place in its second week of release. It was followed by "Aladdin" with $7.2 million and "Home Alone 2: Lost in New York" with $6.8 million.

"Malcolm X" nearly dropped out of the Top 10 after five weeks. The Spike Lee film made $1.3 million for 10th place and has earned $37.9 million to date.

Here are the estimated top ticket sales Dec. 18-20, according to Exhibitor Relations, with distributor, weekend gross, number of theater locations, average per location, total gross and number of weeks in release.

Figures are based on actual receipts, and on projections where actual figures were not available. One location can include several screens in multiplex theaters; studios generally do not disclose the true number of screens.

1. "A Few Good Men," Columbia, $11.1 million, 1,925 locations, $5,790 per location, $32 million, two weeks.

2. "Aladdin," Disney, $7.2 million, 1,502 locations, $4,810 per location, $59.8 million, six weeks.

Soldiers head home for the holidays

By Linda Bosley Dailey
Staff Writer

Midnight may be the bewitching hour, but at Sand Hill, one minute past is travelin' time — or at least it is when 'tis the season for the Infantry Training Brigade's "Operation Exodus."

About 3,100 soldiers from the Infantry Training Brigade left Fort Benning early Tuesday morning on their annual treks home for the holidays, said Dave Christensen, coordinator of Operation Exodus.

Once home, Pvt. Roger Wimberly of Medford, Ore., said he plans to "eat what I want to eat, watch what I want to watch and do what I want to do — take advantage of the situation."

Being home with family and friends, for many, is the best gift they could receive this holiday season, according to some soldiers in the 4th Platoon of Company C, 1st Battalion, 50th Infantry Regiment. Those troops are about halfway through the 13 weeks of "boot camp," or One Station Unit Training as it is properly known.

Pvt. Joseph Marchi, who's going home to Boston, is looking forward to visiting both his family and his fiancee. "It's been 10 long weeks," he said.

But before heading to destinations as far away as Belchertown, Mass., and Portland, Ore., the troops had to put their barracks — and themselves — in order Monday.

Bunks had to be stripped, bags had to be packed, belongings inventoried, lockers sealed and BDUs — the camouflage battle dress uniforms worn daily — exchanged for dress uniforms, which they must wear in transit.

And then came the inspection.

For Pvt. Roger Wimberly, who's headed to Medford, Ore., the journey will be a long one — about 14 hours. But spending an entire day traveling doesn't bother him — "as long as I get home," he said.

Once home, Wimberly said, he plans to "eat what I want to eat, watch what I want to watch and do what I want to do — take advantage of the situation."

But many face shopping duty once they get home.

"I don't even want to think about it," said Pvt. Mario Esquer of his last-minute shopping. "The rush will be a killer," said the soldier who's headed for New York.

Getting the new soldiers ready for their journeys and getting them on their way keeps drill sergeants busy, as well.

On post, drill sergeants not only supervised troops' daytime preparation for the exodus, but also spent the evening directing troops onto the correct buses.

Other drill sergeants pulled duty at Hartsfield Atlanta International Airport, helping soldiers locate ticket agents, find their way to the concourses and solve any last-minute problems, Christensen said.

By 9 p.m. Monday, about 70 buses were scheduled to be lined up along 11th Airborne Division Road, poised for boarding. While some buses were slated to carry troops to the Atlanta airport, others were to ferry soldiers directly to their hometowns.

And between 12:01 a.m. — when leave officially began and the first bus could leave — and 7 a.m., all the buses were scheduled to depart, Christensen said.

Two companies, A and C of the 1st Battalion, 38th Infantry Regiment, were not part of Operation Exodus. They aren't returning to the Infantry Training Brigade in January. Those soldiers, who graduated Tuesday, go to their first assignment after the holiday, he said.

The other recruits resume training Jan. 6, Christensen said.

Much of the post closed for holidays

From staff reports

Christmas and New Year's Day are holidays for most soldiers and civilians at Fort Benning.

Martin Army Community Hospital clinics will be closed both days. Those needing emergency care should go to the hospital's emergency room.

All troop medical clinics will be closed, with the exception of TMC 5. It will operate sick call from 7 a.m. to noon on the two holidays.

The Outpatient, Winder Health, Kelley Hill Family Practice and Aviation Medicine clinics will be closed the two holidays; however, the Primary Care for the Uniformed Services Clinic at 1727 Boxwood Place, Columbus, will follow its weekend and holiday schedule, opening from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m.

The hospital's outpatient and Main Mall refill pharmacys will also be closed Dec. 25 and 26 and Jan. 1 and 2. Patients can use the 24-hour phone-in refill service by calling 544-1352.

The Main Post Exchange and Custer Terrace Shoppette will be closed Christmas Day and operate normal hours New Year's Day. Hours for the Mini-Mall are for 9 a.m. to 6 p.m. on Christmas and 9 a.m. to 9 p.m. on New Year's.

The Commissary will operate from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. Christmas Eve and be closed Christmas and New Year's days. Normal hours will be observed on New Year's Eve.

Trash won't be picked up at Fort Benning on Christmas and New Year's Day. Family housing areas normally serviced on Friday will be picked up on Thursday, and those serviced on Thursday will be picked up on Wednesday.

Lawyer wants to appeal carbon monoxide ruling

By Clint Claybrook
Staff Writer

The government lawyer who was on the losing side in a $12 million judgment against the Army favoring a former Fort Benning soldier and his wife is pushing for an appeal of that verdict.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Randall Aderhold defended the Army in the negligence case brought by former Staff Sgt. David Elliott and his wife Barbara Elliott. Sgt. Elliott was left nearly 100 percent disabled by carbon monoxide gas leaking from a water heater in his on-post housing unit. His wife also sustained serious injuries in the Aug. 29, 1989, incident.

At issue is the so-called "Feres Doctrine," established in a 1950 case which held, in essence, that a soldier can't sue the Army for injuries incurred during his normal course of duties.

But Aderhold hopes to convince the U.S. 11th Circuit Court of Appeals in Atlanta to overturn District Judge J. Robert Elliott's November verdict, which followed a June non-jury trial in Columbus.

At issue is the so-called "Feres Doctrine," established in a 1950 case which held, in essence, that a soldier can't sue the Army for injuries incurred during his normal course of duties.

"Feres," said Aderhold, is a significant legal precedent. "Ever since that 1950 decision, it has been a very important defense against claims for injuries in line of duty ... It's a very important doctrine, a very important cornerstone of defense (for the military).

One reason for an appeal would be an attempt to fix the Feres Doctrine even more firmly as a legal doctrine that makes it almost impossible for a service member to sue the military.

Judge Elliott said "Feres" doesn't apply to any aspect of Sergeant and Mrs. Elliott's case since the sergeant was on leave and was merely spending his off time at quarters furnished the couple by the Army. He said the Army failed in its landlord duties and that the people responsible for upkeep on on-post housing violated various Army regulations by not having proper inspection and maintenance procedures in place.

Aderhold said last week he has recommended an appeal and that he's waiting word from the Justice Department to proceed with the paperwork. The deadline is sometime in January. The Army's legal brass in Washington seems to agree that an appeal is in order, Adernold said.

But Neal Pope, the Elliotts' attorney, said an appeal may just focus more attention on housing problems on Army posts around the world, a rash of which were pointed out during the trial here.

Pope also contends that smart lawyers in the Justice Department would rather not see Elliott's verdict spread across law books all over the country, if the case goes to higher courts.

The Columbus lawyer maintains that an appeal "will send shock waves" through the military's Directorates of Public Works around the world, focusing new attention on the military's crumbling infrastructure.

If the Atlanta court agrees to hear the case, it could be next fall by the time that court rules. If the 11th Circuit disagrees with Elliott's ruling, it could then take another year for Pope to get the case before the U.S. Supreme Court — if the high court agreed to hear it, and only one percent of the cases it considers are heard.

Barbara Elliott, 28, a civilian employee in the finance and accounting office at Fort Benning, said recently that even a $12 million judgment — if it is ever paid — "will not bring back what we had" before that nearly fatal day in August 1989.

The couple had a baby in February 1991. Even so, Mrs. Elliott said, her husband "is basically someone who's going to require constant care for the rest of his life."

David Elliott, 33, was left 100 percent disabled, the Army acknowledged originally. But later the Army tried to downgrade that to 75 percent disability. "I guess it was just to try to save money," Mrs. Elliott said.

Judge Elliott said in his ruling that the evidence showed that Mrs. Elliott would also probably be hampered by her injuries for the rest of her life.

Financial hard times have left the Elliotts living with a relative, in a house that is home to eight people. Mrs. Elliott still harbors some bad feelings over her husband being so hurriedly kicked out of the Army. That was a government move, she said, aimed at avoiding some of his medical expenses.

Severn takes command of ITB

From staff reports

Col. Joseph W. Trez, who commanded the Infantry Training Brigade of the U.S. Army Infantry School for the last two years, has turned over the reins of the Fort Benning unit.

Col. Theodore R. Severn took command from Trez during a ceremony last week at Weatherby Field. The former ITB commander is leaving Fort Benning to become the chief of staff of the 7th Infantry Division at Fort Lewis, Wash.

Severn is a distinguished military graduate of the University of Massachusetts where he received his commission as an infantry officer. During his career, he has seen duty in a number of command and staff positions in both the continental United States and abroad. These positions include the command of an infantry company in the 101st Airborne Division in Vietnam and, later, the 1st Battalion, 13th Infantry, 9th Infantry Division in Germany.

Trez is a graduate of The Citadel. He was commissioned a second lieutenant in the infantry upon graduation from the Charleston, S.C., school in 1969. Trez served as an infantryman in combat with both the 4th and 23rd Infantry Divisions in Vietnam and also served multiple tours with the 82nd Airborne Division at Fort Bragg, N.C. He commanded the 2nd Battalion, 27th Infantry, 7th Infantry Division at Fort Ord, Calif.

No suspects yet in home robbery

There is still no suspect in an armed robbery early Friday morning at a Fort Benning home. At 7:30 a.m., an armed robber entered the home of Col. Craiger Parker and fled with an undisclosed amount of money. Col. Parker's wife, Sheila, was at home but did not suffer any injuries. The military police and CID are investigating the incident.

Col. Parker is assistant deputy commander at Fort Benning.

Bush to spend New Year's Day in Somalia

From wire reports

WASHINGTON — President Bush will visit the U.S. forces in Somalia over New Year's, the White House announced Tuesday.

"The president's visit will demonstrate United States concern for the people of Somalia, our commitment to humanitarian assistance and our support for American and United Nations forces," White House press secretary Marlin Fitzwater said.

Bush will depart the United States on Dec. 30 and arrive the next day, in time to spend New Year's Eve with U.S. troops, Fitzwater said.

He will visit relief operations in Somalia on Jan. 1 and depart the East African country that evening, Fitzwater said.

Bush ordered 28,000 U.S. forces into Somalia earlier this month on a military humanitarian mission of unprecedented magnitude. The operation began Dec. 9 when the first troops landed in Mogadishu.

BUSH

They have led U.N. forces now spreading across the impoverished country, where 350,000 people have died since a January 1991 coup threw Somalia into lawlessness.

Bush plans to spend Christmas weekend at the presidential retreat at Camp David, Md., then head to Texas on Dec. 28 for a three-day hunting trip. Fitzwater said Bush was expected to stop in Washington on Dec. 30 before heading to Africa, possibly just long enough to pick up aides.

Bush's wife Barbara recently said they were interested in going to Somalia, but not if that would interfere with relief operations.

Bush, in a televised address to the nation Dec. 4 announcing the operation, said, "The people of Somalia need our help. . . . We must help them live. We must give them hope. America must act.

"In taking this action, I want to emphasize that I understand the United States alone cannot right the world's wrongs. But we also know that some crises in the world cannot be resolved without American involvement," he said.

The head of CARE urged Bush last week to go to Somalia to see for himself the devastation wrought by nearly two years of clan warfare.

The presidential mission could be reminiscent of a dramatic visit that French President Francois Mitterrand paid to besieged Sarajevo in former Yugoslavia last June.

And Bush himself spent Thanksgiving 1990 with U.S. troops in the Saudi Arabian desert as they readied for the Persian Gulf War that drove Iraq's army out of Kuwait a few months later.

Bush has kept a low profile since he lost the election to Bill Clinton on Nov. 3, but he has stayed busy on several foreign policy fronts behind the scenes.

In addition to Somalia, he has been enlisting international support for tougher enforcement of sanctions against Serbia to end the violence in the former Yugoslavia, and he has spoken several times to Russian President Boris Yeltsin in an effort to wrap up a major new strategic arms treaty before Clinton is inaugurated Jan. 20.

Neglected farms may doom the Somalians

Animals forgotten in rush to aid people

From wire reports

AFGOI, Somalia — In a headlong rush to save people, aid workers have neglected the animals and the farms, exposing Somalia to a potentially worse catastrophe next year, agriculture experts warn.

Already, sleeping sickness and rinderpest are killing cows that managed to escape rustlers during two years of war. No one sprays the deadly tsetse fly. Veterinary services have collapsed.

"They just forgot the animals," said Omar Ali Ainanshe, a British-trained veterinarian whose drug stocks are down to some human pain pills. "Somalia is finished without its livestock."

At the same time, irrigation canals off the Shebele and Juba rivers are choked with mud. Relief agencies are reaching only a small fraction of farmers with seed and tools for the coming rains.

"There is no coordination, no systematic coverage to get seed to villages," said Hassan Khalifa of the U.N. Food and Agriculture Organization. "Without it, they can plant nothing."

Khalifa, a Sudanese agronomist with 30 years' experience, works with a Kurdish livestock expert, Talid Ali, at FAO's tiny mission in Mogadishu. Both have received only modest promises of funding.

"You can feed people now, but if you don't save their animals and crops, what do they eat next?" Ali said. "Two-thirds of Somali exports are livestock. Without this, there is no income."

The International Red Cross, spotting the problem early, set up feeding centers early this year in this bustling crossroads on the Shebele, just west of Mogadishu.

"We felt that farmers had to keep up their strength," said Horst Homborg of the Red Cross. "And we also wanted to attract people back to the farms so they did not settle in the city."

Other agencies agree. "The most important thing now is to get people back to their fields so they have food in June and don't have to move again," said James Fennell of CARE in Baidoa.

Before the September rains, the Red Cross distributed seed to 250,000 Somali farmers, and other voluntary agencies reached scores of thousands more. Corn and maize should be harvested next month.

But Khalifa said the donors need a massive program now so that farmers can plant before the longer rainy season which begins in June. He needs at least $3 million and cannot get it.

"We must coordinate," he said. "Agencies want to help, but some know nothing about Somali agriculture."

Marines try to win Somali hearts and minds

From wire reports

MOGADISHU, Somalia — The U.S. military, seeking to assure Somalis it is here to help and not to conquer, has launched a public-relations offensive.

It's trying to get that message out with a Somali-language newspaper, radio broadcasts, leaflets and loudspeakers.

The effectiveness of such a campaign is difficult to measure, but officers on Monday credited it with at least one major success since U.S. forces arrived on Dec. 9.

At Beli Dogle, a transit point for relief convoys between Mogadishu and Baidoa, the military dropped thousands of leaflets the night before a planned military operation to secure a major airstrip.

"After we dropped the leaflets, village leaders came to the commanders at the scene and said they wanted to cooperate with us," said Lt. Col. Charlie Borchini, commander of the battalion running the operation. "We don't know how much the leaflets affected them, but they did."

Officials also said they had scored some success with the newspaper "Rajo," or "Hope" in Somali. Maj. John Markham of Clearwater, Fla., said demand was so high that the first day's run of 3,000 copies Sunday was increased to 8,500 for Monday's edition.

Civilian Abdullahi Omar Mohamed, 35, a Somali-born American from Annandale, Va., is de facto managing editor. He's been distributing the newspaper to judge its reception and found crowds gathering at two giveaway spots.

"It was a mob scene," he said. "Literally, people were grabbing papers from my hand. The people here are thirsty and hungry for news."

Mogadishu has four daily mimeographed newspapers and one weekly. All are linked with clans involved in Somalia's factional fighting and color their news accordingly.

Borchini, 42, of Baltimore, said for credibility's sake, the Army paper is printing news, not propaganda. Tuesday's issue has a story about Marines shooting a young Somali who tried to train a .50-caliber machine gun on them.

"We don't want to be seen as here just to make the Joint Task Force look good," Borchini said.

COMMUNITY

Quality of life is AUSA priority

The phrase "Quality of Life" has been used in American society for years. In the past two decades it has taken on more meaning in the Army as we moved to an all volunteer force, met worldwide commitments, and have seen professionalism reach new heights in all grades. With the support of the Army leadership and the Congress, we have seen some improvements in barracks and support facilities while reducing the number of World War II buildings in use.

Ben Register

But Quality of Life for the soldier and the Army family covers a wide range of areas which must be met consistent with the requirements of military service as a chosen profession. As the Army is reduced in size, we must also consider those who have served honorably and must leave the service through no fault of their own.

The Association of the United States Army (AUSA) addressed Quality of Life as a resolution at the 1992 National Meeting as it applies to the institutional Army. It is important in attracting quality people for service, retention of the best and brightest, and providing a quality of life for the families of those who serve under difficult and stressful conditions. The Chattahoochee Valley-Fort Benning Chapter of AUSA strongly supports this resolution.

"AUSA Resolution 93-11 lity of Life"

e quality of a military force ts effectiveness on the battlefield is related directly to the quality of life provided. The Army, supported by its government, has a long and proud tradition of "taking care of its own" and, in turn, the country's soldiers have served it with distinction for over 200 years. Quality of life issues are, therefore, readiness issues.

Despite a changing world environment and shrinking force levels, Army soldiers and their families will continue to face the unique challenges of dislocation, family separation, overseas service, and the peacetime dangers inherit in serving in a combat-ready force. In order to provide our soldiers with a supporting base from which they can focus their energies on their profession, it is imperative that we maintain effective programs, improve others, and move forward with positive initiatives.

Key infrastructure support areas include the provisions of adequate housing and transient facilities, modernization of barracks for single soldiers, adequate reimbursement to soldiers' families for government sponsored moves and travel, improvement and new construction of post exchanges and commissaries, and funding to continue and improve morale and welfare activities.

As the Army restructures, thousands of outstanding young men and women will return to civilian life during a difficult economic period. The coincidence of departing a chosen career in the middle of a job-scarce period exacerbates an already difficult transition. Reinforcement of transition training programs and improvements to the G.I. Bill will benefit both the individual and the country.

Despite withdrawal of forces from Europe, substantial numbers of soldiers and family members will continue to serve overseas. Special attention must be given to their quality of life commensurate with that in CONUS (continental United States).

We therefore resolve to urge the Administration and Congress to:

- Allocate a portion of the funds, generated by the drawdown in Europe, to improving quality of life in Europe.
- Support legislation to provide appropriate increased to G.I. Bill recipients.
- Enact legislation to provide job training programs for unemployed veterans and recently separated military personnel.
- Provide full support to Defense Commissary Agency and Army and Air Force Exchange Service (AAFES) initiatives to construct new facilities.
- Increase support to Morale and Welfare Activities in CONUS and abroad.
- Continue full support to the role of the Chaplain Corps in enhancing quality of life.

Ben Register, a retired lieutenant general, is president of the Chattahoochee Valley-Fort Benning Chapter of the Association of the United States Army (AUSA).

Churches defy stereotypes in social ministries

By George Cornell
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Although the common assumption is that liberal church congregations are more committed to social-service ministries than their conservative counterparts, researchers find it's not so.

A study finds the two groups show about the same degree of support, and often, theologically conservative churches were more active in helping social-service ministries.

"Many churches defied the stereotypes," said study directors Carl S. Dudley and Thomas Van Eck of the Center for Church and community Ministries in Chicago.

"Evangelical theology does not automatically restrict a congregation from engaging in community ministries, nor does a liberal theology inevitably lead to attitudes that support social ministries," the report says.

In fact, "evangelical churches, when compared with moderate and liberal churches, indicated higher priorities on local social ministries, a greater concern for how systems cause poverty, and more liberal social ideology."

These differences, the report adds, are opposite traditional expectations.

Various other widely held assumptions were toppled, such as the ideas that denominational affiliation of congregations, their size and educational and economic levels of members affected attitudes toward social ministries.

The study involved 100 Midwest congregations of 14 mainline Protestant, Roman Catholic and conservative evangelical churches.

The findings were included in the 1992 Yearbook of American and Canadian Churches recently published by the National Council of Churches.

"Generally, denominational breakdowns do not show significance differences" in attitudes of members toward social ministries, the report says.

"Evangelical theology does not automatically restrict a congregation from engaging in community ministries, nor does a liberal theology inevitably lead to attitudes that support social ministries," the report says.

The study found no support for the thesis that large rather than small churches are more likely to support community ministries.

"Our data show that our smallest churches were nearly as likely as the largest to be in favor of church involvement in the local community and were much more supportive of the view that the church should work for justice."

Also, no significant differences were found in attitudes toward such ministries between congregations of varying, overall socioeconomic status levels, with the following two exceptions:

■ Churches of lower socioeconomic status place uniquely strong emphasis on personal responsibility for situations of poverty.

■ Churches with higher socioeconomic status do not place as much blame on the individual for being in poverty, but they also resist blaming the system.

While membership wealth, denomination and "conservative" or "liberal" labels don't seem to have much impact on social-ministry attitudes, one thing that did have was geography.

The report says congregations in urban areas are more supportive of involvement in community and justice ministries while congregations in small towns and rural communities are less supportive.

Another consistent difference was black churches were "significantly more liberal on social issues and orientation to working for justice" than predominantly white counterparts.

Among general conclusions, the report cited these:

■ Social attitudes of most congregations favor and support social ministries.

■ Lay members are more supportive than many pastors perceive.

■ Clergy frequently overestimate the distance between themselves and their members and underestimate member support for social ministries.

■ Rich churches support social justice ministries as much as low-income congregations.

■ Many conservative churches felt just as strong about social justice as liberal churches.

■ Socially conservative lay members were more inclined to support social justice ministries than their more liberal pastors thought they were.
